Subparagraph (a)(2)(C) provides a defense for any person seeking legal services from an attorney and for any attorney providing legal services. For example, a person who is uncertain of their legal rights and liabilities may be justified in bringing an item to an attorney to seek advice about its legality or about how to proceed. An attorney may be justified in possessing an item during a meeting with a client, while reviewing evidence at the Metropolitan Police Department's Evidence Control Branch, or when distributing contraband to the Office of Bar Counsel. However, the defense does not apply where a person sells contraband to someone who happens to be an attorney, for that attorney's personal use and enjoyment.

Subparagraph (a)(2)(D) provides a defense for any person seeking medical services from a licensed health professional and for any licensed health professional providing medical services. The term "health professional" is defined in RCC § 22E-701. For example, a person who takes someone to a hospital following an overdose may be justified in bringing a controlled substance to the doctor so the doctor can properly diagnose and treat the patient.[13] A doctor may be justified in possessing contraband that is removed from a patient's clothing to administer emergency treatment. The defense does not apply where, for example, a person sells contraband to someone who happens to be a health professional, for that health professional's personal use and enjoyment.

Subparagraph (a)(2)(E) provides a defense where a person has a special responsibility for someone's health, welfare, or supervision and possesses or distributes an item with intent to investigate the circumstances surrounding the item's possession, acquisition. For example, if a parent discovers a controlled substance in their home, they may be justified in temporarily holding on to the substance until their child returns home from school, so that their can confront the child[14] before disposing of the item. However, [11] For example, the defense may be available to a student who finds illegal drugs and gives them to a teacher, a restaurant employee who finds a prohibited weapon and gives it to a manager on duty, and a child who finds contraband and gives it to a babysitter.

[12] For example, a customer in a retail store who discovers a prohibited weapon may be justified in giving that weapon to a manager, security guard, or cashier.

[14] Confronting kids with evidence of their drug use is specifically endorsed as a strategy to combat youth drug abuse by the Partnership for Drug-Free Kids and other national the parent would not be justified in using any portion of the controlled substance in the meantime.[15]

Subparagraph (a)(2)(F) provides a defense where a person possesses or distributes contraband with intent to permanently dispose of it.[16] The term "dispose" is undefined and should be construed broadly to include practical efforts to make the item unavailable to anyone.

Paragraph (a)(3) requires that the person not possess the item longer than is reasonably necessary to accomplish the intended outcome. Determining the time reasonably necessary is fact-sensitive inquiry.[17] The term "in fact" specifies that the person is strictly liable as to whether the duration of the possession is reasonable.[18]

Subsection (b) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC and defines the term "surrender." In this section, the term "surrender" means to permanently relinquish the ability to exercise control over an item. A person does not surrender an item by giving it to another person or agency for temporary safekeeping.[19]

Relation to Current District Law. Temporary possession is a new general defense and, in that sense, all aspects of the revised statute are substantive changes to District law. However, as compared to the closely related immunity provisions for voluntary surrender for certain crimes[20] and defenses of innocent[21] or momentary possession[22] recognized in case law for certain crimes, the RCC temporary possession defense statute clearly changes current District law in two main ways.

[15] Paragraph (a)(2) requires that the person act "exclusively and in good faith."

[16] For example, a person who discovers a controlled substance or weapon on the sidewalk may be justified in carrying it to a garbage can.

[17] For example, a parent who discovers a controlled substance may be justified in retaining it only until the child is confronted and disciplined, whereas a school security guard may be justified in retaining it only until a law enforcement officer arrives.

First, the RCC defense is an affirmative defense, which the defendant must prove by a preponderance of the evidence. The current D.C. Code does not codify any general defenses, for possession and distribution offenses or otherwise. The current voluntary surrender provisions in the D.C. Code require a defendant to prove their intent to deliver and abandon a weapon to the police by "clear and unequivocal" evidence.[23] A trial court's decision to grant or deny immunity under D.C. Code § 7-2507.05 is a question of law.[24] The D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) case law recognizing an innocent or momentary possession defense[25] impose no burden of proof on the defendant insofar as the defense has been construed to negate the intent element of the possessory offense. In contrast, the RCC defense is an affirmative defense with a burden of proof consistent with all other affirmative defenses in the RCC. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statutes.

Second, the revised statute does not require that the contraband or item be made safe prior to distribution. The current D.C. Code does not codify any general defenses, for possession and distribution offenses or otherwise. However, D.C. Code § 7-2507.05(a)(3) requires that every firearm to be delivered and abandoned to the Chief under the section shall be transported in accordance with § 22-4504.02, which specifies that the weapon must be unloaded and transported safely. In contrast, the revised statute does not require proof that a firearm, ammunition, or any other object is made safe for the defense to apply. With respect to firearms, a person should not be subject to liability for surrendering a loaded firearm to law enforcement, as some individuals may not know how to safely check or unload a firearm. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Beyond these two changes to current District law, three other aspects of the RCC statute may constitute substantive changes to District law.

First, the RCC defense applies to a wide array of specified predicate offenses where the primary element that must be proven is possession or distribution of an item. The current D.C. Code does not codify any general defenses, for possession and distribution offenses or otherwise. The current voluntary surrender provisions in the D.C. Code apply only to selected firearm, ammunition, and destructive device charges.[26] Under DCCA case law, an innocent or momentary possession defense has been recognized as applicable to the offense of carrying a pistol without a license[27] and possession of a controlled substance,[28] but District courts have not yet clarified whether it is available as a defense to other offenses. District case law does not address whether these immunity provisions and defenses are more broadly available in a prosecution for possession of other contraband[29] or for distribution offenses.[30] To resolve these ambiguities, the RCC statute creates consistent defenses across RCC possession and distribution offenses for possession and distribution that is not blameworthy and may serve socially beneficial interests. There is a strong public safety interest in encouraging all District residents to safely dispose of contraband or turn contraband over to relevant authorities. The defense does not extend to offenses that are not predicate crimes, maintaining liability for blameworthy conduct.[31] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statutes.

[25] Crim. Jury Inst. for DC Instruction 6.501(c) (2019).
[26] D.C. Code § 7-2507.05 applies only to provisions "in [that] unit," which appears to apply only to Title 7, Chapter 25, although closely related offenses also appear in Title 22, Chapter 45 of the D.C. Code and Title 24, Chapter 23 of the DCMR. See Stein v. United States, 532 A.2d 641, 647 (D.C. App. 1987) (interpreting the phrase "in this chapter" in an earlier version of the statute to apply only to offenses that were enacted as part of the same act and declining to extend immunity to include other firearms offenses). D.C. Code § 7-2510.07(f), the immunity provision in the District's recent extreme risk protection order statutes, precludes arrest and prosecution under D.C. Code §§ 7-2506.01, 22-4503 and 22-4504(a) and (a-1) only.

Second, the RCC statute specifies culpable mental state requirements that must be proven for the defense. The current D.C. Code does not codify any general defenses, for possession and distribution offenses or otherwise. The current voluntary surrender provisions in the D.C. Code do not appear to specify an intent requirement for immunity.[32] The innocent or momentary possession defense recognized in DCCA case law requires a showing of "an absence of criminal purpose" and "an affirmative effort to aid and enhance

Code § 48-901.02 ("'Distribute' means the actual, constructive, or attempted transfer from one person to another other than by administering or dispensing of a controlled substance, whether or not there is an agency relationship.") social policy underlying law enforcement."[33] Dicta suggests that this includes, at minimum, any motive "to protect the finder or others from harm, to turn it over to the police, or to otherwise secure [the contraband]."[34] To resolve these ambiguities, the revised statute specifies six different scenarios in which acting with a specified intent renders a person's temporary possession justified. The RCC statute also specifies that no culpable mental state is necessary as to whether the duration of the possession or distribution is no longer than reasonably necessary, making the matter an objective question of fact. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statutes.

[31] Notably, the temporary possession defense does not apply to charges of tampering with physical evidence, obstruction of justice, or serving as an accessory after the fact. See D.C. Code §§ 22-722 and 723. The following examples are illustrative. During the execution of a search warrant, Roommate A flushes Roommate B's drug stash down the toilet. A is not guilty of possession of a controlled substance as a principal, but may be guilty as an accessory after the fact. A is also guilty of tampering with physical evidence and obstruction of justice. Consider also a pedestrian who discovers an extended magazine on the side of the road, picks it up, and throws it in the garbage. The pedestrian may be justified in committing second degree possession of a dangerous weapon but may still be guilty of tampering with physical evidence upon proof that their intent was "to impair its integrity or its availability for use in the official proceeding."

Third, the RCC statute specifies that the defendant may not possess an item longer than is reasonably necessary to accomplish the intended goal. The current D.C. Code does not codify any general defenses, for possession and distribution offenses or otherwise. The DCCA-recognized innocent or momentary possession defense[35] requires remedial action be undertaken with reasonable immediacy. To resolve this ambiguity, the RCC statute includes a standard requirement that the item is possessed no longer than is reasonably necessary effectuate one of the specified goals. This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised statutes.

RCC § 22E-503. Entrapment.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes an entrapment defense for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The defense applies when law enforcement induces a person to commit a particular crime. The defense is not available if the person was otherwise predisposed to commit the particular crime. The RCC entrapment defense is the first codification of such a defense in the District.

Subsection (a) provides the requirements of the entrapment defense. The term "in fact" indicates that no culpable mental state need be proven for the defense requirements in subsection (a).[1] Under RCC § 22E-201(b), a defendant bears the burden of proving the affirmative defense by a preponderance of the evidence. However, the defense does not require an admission of guilt.[2] The subsection specifies that the defense requires action by a law enforcement officer or a person cooperating with a law enforcement officer.[3] The term "law enforcement officer" is defined in RCC § 22E-701. It does not include other state actors outside the definition of law enforcement.[4]

Subsection (a) also requires that the law enforcement officer was acting under the color or pretense of official right. The phrase "under color or pretense of official right" has the same meaning as used in the abuse of government power penalty enhancement,[5] and as the term "under color of law" in 42 U.S.C. § 1983, 18 U.S.C. § 242, and elsewhere in the United States Code.[6] It includes not only acts done within a law enforcement officer's lawful authority, but also acts done beyond the bounds of lawful authority when there is a nexus between the conduct and the position given to him by the State.[7] For example, the entrapment defense may apply to conduct by a law enforcement officer that violates department policy[8] or who is off-duty at the time of the inducement.[9] The phrase "under color or pretense of official right" does not include purely personal conduct.[10]

[4] Both the exclusionary rule and the entrapment defense serve as a deterrent to government overreach and police misconduct. However, the RCC entrapment statute is limited to the sphere of criminal investigations by law enforcement officers, whereas the exclusionary rule applies more broadly to other state action. *See New Jersey v. [5] RCC § 22E-610.

[6] Unlike 42 U.S.C. § 1983 and 18 U.S.C. § 242, however, the entrapment defense does not apply to private persons acting under color of law.

Paragraph (a)(1) provides that the first way entrapment may occur is directly, if the officer or cooperator commands, requests, tries to persuade,[11] or otherwise induces the defendant to engage in the conduct constituting the offense. The phrase "commanded, requested, or tried to persuade" should be construed to have the same meaning as in RCC § 22E-302, Criminal Solicitation.[12]

Paragraph (a)(2) provides that the second way entrapment may occur is derivatively, if the officer or cooperator commands, requests, tries to persuade,[13] or otherwise induces a third party to engage in criminal conduct, reckless as to the fact that the third person would solicit or induce the defendant to engage in the conduct constituting the offense.[14] "Reckless" is defined in RCC § 22E-206 and here requires that the officer or cooperator consciously disregards a substantial risk that the third person would solicit or induce the defendant into engage in or assist with the criminal conduct. Subparagraph (a)(2)(B) further requires that the third party's efforts to persuade the defendant to engage in criminal conduct did, in fact, persuade the defendant to engage in the conduct constituting the offense. The term "in fact" indicates that no culpable mental state is required with respect to the inducement succeeding.

[8] For example, reportedly, Officer Brian Trainer was found to have violated department policy when he pursued motorcyclist Terrence Sterling before fatally shooting him in the neck and back. See Delia Goncalves, Officer 'broke policy' in fatal shooting of Terrence Sterling, WUSA 9 (December 5, 2017).

[9] For example, reportedly, Officer James Haskel was off duty and looking for his stolen minibike, when he fatally shot 14-year-old Deonte Rawlings, suspected of stealing the bike, in the back of the head. See Timeline: The Deonte Rawlings Shooting, WASHINGTON POST; see also McDade v. West, 223 F.3d 1135, 1139 (9th Cir. 2000) (holding a state employee who accesses confidential information through a government-owned computer acts under state law, even when the motives are entirely personal).

[10] For example, the defense is not available to a person hired to commit murder when the person soliciting the murder happens to be a law enforcement officer acting in a purely personal capacity when committing the crime of solicitation of murder.

[11] Persuasion can take many forms including threats, coercive tactics, harassment, promises of reward (e.g., money, sex, immunity), or pleas based on need, sympathy or friendship.

[12] See also Commentary to RCC § 22E-302.

[13] Persuasion can take many forms including threats, coercive tactics, harassment, promises of reward (e.g., money, sex, immunity), or pleas based on need, sympathy or friendship.

[14] Consider, for example, a law enforcement officer who runs a sting operation to take down a fraudulent college admissions scheme. The officer arrests the owner of the business running the scheme and, by offering a plea bargain, persuades the owner (cooperator) to wear a wire and ask a desperate parent (third person) to sign up her child (actor) to participate. The parent subsequently agrees and then convinces her child to participate in the scheme. The child may raise a derivative entrapment defense (but must also satisfy subsection (b)).

Paragraphs (a)(1) and (a)(2) require that the officer or person acting at the encouragement of an officer act purposely when inducing the actor to engage in the conduct. The term "purposely" is defined in RCC § 22E-206 and here requires that the person consciously desire that they are conveying a command, request, or effort to persuade the defendant to engage in the criminal conduct. Although the solicitor need not explicitly state the conduct constituting the offense,[15] the evidence must demonstrate that the solicitation was for the very conduct constituting the offense charged and not for some lesser or different conduct. The defense does not apply where the officer did not seek to solicit or induce the criminal behavior.[16]

Subsection (b) provides an exception to the entrapment defense. The defense is not available if the defendant was predisposed to engage in the conduct constituting the offense and the actor was merely afforded the opportunity or means to engage in the conduct. If there is any evidence present that the exception should apply, the government must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant was predisposed in conduct constituting the offense and was merely afforded the opportunity or means to engage in such conduct. The defense is not available if the defendant was ready and willing to commit these crimes whenever an opportunity presented itself.[17] A defendant's disposition is a temporary condition, not an immutable characteristic.[18] Subsection (b) applies only when the defendant is predisposed to engage in all of the conduct constituting the offense[19] or enhancement[20] that was induced.

Subsection (c) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised statute changes current District law in one main way.

The revised statute requires that the defendant prove the elements of entrapment by a preponderance of the evidence, but that the government prove predisposition beyond a reasonable doubt in order for the exception to apply. The DCCA has not addressed whether

[15] Consider, for example, an undercover officer who uses the phrase "Let's make this move" as slang for "let's commit a robbery together."

[16] Consider, for example, an undercover officer instructs the defendant to rob a convenience store and the defendant inexplicably burns the store down after robbing it. The defendant does not have an entrapment defense to the arson under RCC § 22E-2501 because the officer did not solicit a fire, explosion, or property damage.

[17] See, e.g., Hampton v. U.S., 425 U.S. 484 (1976); U.S. v. Russell, 411 U.S. 423 (1973).

[18] See U.S. v. Vaughn, 80 F.3d 549 (D.C. Cir. 1996) (explaining that Jacobson v. U.S., 503 U.S. 540 (1992) allows a jury to consider the possibility that a defendant's disposition to commit a crime changed over time).

[19] For example, if a defendant is charged with trafficking of a controlled substance on a possession with intent to distribute theory, the entrapment defense applies even if the defendant is predisposed to possessing a controlled substance, but not predisposed to distributing a controlled substance.

[20] For example, if a defendant is charged with trafficking of a controlled substance with an enhanced penalty for possessing a firearm, if the defendant was not predisposed to possess a firearm, the entrapment defense applies to the penalty enhancement. The defendant may only be convicted of trafficking of a controlled substance, not subject to the enhanced penalty.

entrapment is a traditional defense that must be disproven by the government if it is supported by any evidence, "however weak,"[21] or an affirmative defense that must be proven by the defendant by a preponderance of the evidence. In federal court, a defendant must affirmatively present sufficient evidence of inducement and the government must present sufficient evidence of predisposition.[22] However, the current practice in the Superior Court for the District of Columbia is to require the government to disprove both elements.[23] The RCC specifies that if the defendant bears the burden of proving the elements of entrapment by a preponderance of the evidence, but in order for the exception to apply, the government must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant was predisposed to engage in the specific criminal conduct.[24] This change clarifies the revised statute.

Beyond this change to current District law, three other aspect of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to District law.

First, the revised statute applies standardized definitions for the "purposely" culpable mental state and uses "in fact" to indicate strict liability. The D.C. Code does not codify an entrapment defense, however D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) case law generally recognizes the existence of the defense.[25] DCCA case law does not clearly specify a culpable mental state as to the law enforcement officer's conduct or other requirements, however, the United States Supreme Court has explained that the defense is available when the act for which defendant was prosecuted was instigated by a law enforcement officer and "was the creature of his purpose," without defining the word "purpose."[26] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised statute uses the RCC's general provisions that define "purposefully" and "in fact" and specify that culpable mental states and strict liability apply until the occurrence of a new culpable mental state or strict liability in the offense.[27] These changes clarify and improve the consistency of District statutes.

Second, the revised statute applies the RCC definition of "law enforcement officer." The D.C. Code does not codify an entrapment defense. However, District case law has held that the entrapment defense is available only where conduct was induced by a law enforcement official or by private persons who occupy semi-official status in the scheme of law enforcement but does not extend to inducement by a private citizen.[28] It remains unclear however, whether the law enforcement official must be on-duty or engaged in officially-sanctioned action to invoke entrapment. To resolve this ambiguity, the revised statute defines the meaning of a "law enforcement officer" and requires such a person to be "acting under color or pretense of official right." The phrase "acting under color or pretense of official right" has the same meaning as "under color of law" in 42 U.S.C. §

1983, 18 U.S.C. § 242, and elsewhere in the United States Code and in RCC § 22E-610, Abuse of Government Power Penalty Enhancement. The phrase includes not only acts done within an official's lawful authority, but also acts done beyond the bounds of lawful authority while the official is purporting or pretending to act in the performance of their official duties. The RCC definition of law enforcement officer includes both sworn officers and others, such as special police officers, acting in a semi-official role. This change clarifies and improves the consistency of District statutes.

Third, the revised statute clarifies the scope of a derivative entrapment defense. The DCCA has not yet addressed whether an entrapment defense is available in cases in which unwitting intermediaries deliver the government's inducement to another party. However, the District of Columbia Circuit has held that such a defense is available only if the alleged inducement communicated by the unwitting intermediary is the same inducement, directed at the same target as the inducement that the government agent directs the intermediary to communicate.[29] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised statute requires that the criminal conduct is the result of the same encouragement, inducement, or creative activity by the law enforcement officer or cooperator—that is, it does not apply where an intermediary deviates from the government's plan—but it does not require that the inducement be directed at the same target. This change improves the clarity of the revised statute.

RCC § 22E-504. Mental Disability Defense.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes a mental disability defense for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). This affirmative defense applies in a criminal proceeding when a person satisfies all the elements of an offense but is deemed excused from responsibility because the person lacks substantial capacity to conform their conduct to the law or recognize the wrongfulness of the offending actions as a result of a mental disability. The RCC mental disability statute codifies the current insanity defense recognized in District caselaw.[1] Codification of the defense is not intended to change statutorily specified procedures for the insanity defense described elsewhere in the D.C. Code.[2]

Subsection (a) establishes the requirements for the affirmative defense in a criminal proceeding. Under RCC § 22E-201(b), a person bears the burden of proving an affirmative defense by a preponderance of the evidence.[3] This defense is distinct from any culpable mental state requirements of a given offense and does not require proof of the negation of a culpable mental state.[4] The mental disability defense is available only in criminal trials and is unavailable in juvenile delinquency proceedings.[5]

United States*, 365 A.2d 64, 78-80 (D.C. 1976) (adopting the MPC standard "with certain minor modifications," These modifications include using the word "recognize" rather than "know" or "appreciate" and using the word "wrongfulness" rather than "criminality.").

[4] While a mental disability can affect a person's ability to form a culpable state of mind, the court in Bethea v. United States explicitly declined to allow expert medical testimony regarding insanity to be used to establish that a defendant lacked the ability to form the requisite state of mind, rejecting a "diminished capacity" defense. 365 A.2d 64, 83 (D.C. 1976); *see also O'Brien v. Subsection (a) requires that the actor must be suffering a "mental disability," a defined term, at the time the offense is committed.[6] The disability[7] may affect either volitional control,[8] under paragraph (a)(1), or cognitive understanding,[9] under paragraph (a)(2).[10] Volitional incapacity as a result of a mental disability is distinct from a mere lack of voluntariness as defined under RCC § 22E-203. Voluntariness applies to the conduct elements of an offense and requires only that the conduct be the product of conscious effort

[6] Id. ("To establish a prima facie case, the defendant must present evidence to show that, at the time of the criminal conduct, as a result of a mental illness or defect, he lacked substantial capacity to recognize the wrongfulness of his act or to conform his conduct to the requirements of the law." (Emphasis added.)).

[7] The disability may be cognitive, intellectual, emotional, psychological, psychiatric, or something else.

[8] The classic formulation of volitional impairment is the actor who suffers from an "irresistible impulse;" that is, one who is unable to control themselves despite knowing that their action is morally wrong or criminal. See Paul H. Robinson, Criminal Law Defenses: A Systematic Analysis, 82(2) Colum. L. Rev. Ch.5 § 173 (e)(2).

[9] A cognitive impairment excuses when it prevents a person from being able to "'perceive the physical nature or consequences' of [the] conduct constituting the offense." See Paul H. Robinson, Criminal Law Defenses: A Systematic Analysis, 82(2) Colum. L. Rev. Ch.5 § 173 (c) (March 1982) (internal quotations omitted). That is, the actor's ability to distinguish the reality of their circumstances or the consequences of their own actions is substantially impaired to such a degree that they cannot fairly be held responsible for their actions. Professor Robinson offers the example of actors A and B, both of whom suffer from schizophrenia. A chops off a victim's head because he believes it to be a block of wood as a result of hallucination; his impairment prevents him from perceiving the physical nature of his circumstances. B chops off a victim's head while the victim sleeps because B thinks it would be funny to see the victim search for his head when he wakes up; his impairment causes a delusion that prevents him from understanding the consequences of the act. See Robinson, Criminal Law Defenses: A Systematic Analysis, Ch.5 § 173 (c)(1). Both A and B are included in the cognitive prong under paragraph (a)(1), despite the difference in expression of their impairments.

[10] The RCC provision is heavily influenced by the MPC approach, which also includes both a volitional and a cognitive prong. See Model Penal Code § 4.01; Bethea v. United States, 365 A.2d at 78-79 (D.C. 1976) ("Accordingly, we join those jurisdictions which have adopted either [the MPC's] language or its fundamental principles.") The volitional prong relates to the actor's ability to control their impulses while the cognitive prong relates to the actor's ability to understand or appreciate the morality or consequences of their actions. Furthermore, the RCC statute and the MPC approach require only "substantial" impairment of the actor's mental faculties, not total incapacity. This approach is distinguished from the "irresistible impulse" approach, which requires total volitional incapacity, and the M'Naghten approach, which does not account for volitional incapacity at all and requires total cognitive incapacity. See Wayne LaFave, Substantive Criminal Law § 7.1(a) (3d ed).

or determination.[11] However, the volitional prong of the mental disability defense specifically applies to circumstances where the criminal conduct either is still "the product of conscious effort or determination" or "subject to the person's control" to some degree, but a mental disability substantially prevents the person from exercising control over their actions and abstaining from the conduct, or the criminal conduct would be "the product of conscious effort or determination" or "subject to the person's control" but for a mental disability.[12]

Under both the volitional and cognitive prongs of subsection (a), a person must lack "substantial" capacity but need not be totally unable to either conform their conduct to the requirements of law[13] or totally unable to appreciate the wrongfulness of their actions.[14] The degree of incapacity that qualifies as "substantial" is not defined by the statute and is intended to be broad enough to account for the inevitable evolution of psychiatric medicine and the inherent uncertainty in dealing with the complexities of the human mind.

Subsection (a) also requires that the mental incapacity exists "as a result of" the mental disability existing at the time that the offense was committed. This requires that the mental disability is the cause of the actor's substantial inability to conform their conduct to the requirements of law or recognize the wrongfulness of their conduct.[15]

Subsection (b) refers to D.C. Code § 24-501, which describes the procedural effects of an acquittal by reason of mental disability only.[16] D.C. Code § 24-501 requires that a [13] This differs from the so-called "irresistible impulse" test. See Robinson, Criminal Law Defenses: A Systematic Analysis, Ch.5 § 173 (e)(2); see also State v. Parsons, 81 Ala. 577, 597 (Holding that a person with knowledge of right and wrong may be found not guilty by reason of insanity "[i]f, by reason of the duress of [a] mental disease, he had so far lost the power to choose between the right and wrong, and to avoid doing the act in question, as that his free agency was at the time destroyed"). The classic "irresistible impulse test requires that the ability to choose be entirely "destroyed" and that the criminal conduct was "the product of [the mental disease] solely." Id.

[14] This differs from the so-called "M'Naghten" test. See M'Naghten's Case, 8 Eng. Rep. 718 (1843) ("[T]o establish a defense on the ground of insanity, it must be clearly proved that, at the time of the committing off the act the party accused was laboring under such defect of reason, from disease of the mind, as to not know the nature and quality of the act he was doing; or, if he did know it, that he did not know he was doing what was wrong.") See Paul H. [15] It is insufficient that an actor merely suffers from a mental condition; the mental condition must precipitate the actor's substantial incapacity to comply with the law under subparagraph (a)(1)(A) or (a)(1)(B). See Howard v. United States, 954 A.2d 415, 420 (D.C. 2008) ("The existence of a mental illness does not suffice, as a defendant must establish a 'causal relationship between the criminal conduct and his mental disease.'" (quoting Pegues, 415 A.2d at 1378)).

[16] RCC § 22E-504 does not repeal, replace, or amend D.C. Code § 24-501.

defendant who is found not guilty by reason of insanity (now "not guilty by reason of mental disability") is to be committed to a hospital for the mentally ill with a hearing within 50 days of confinement (unless waived) to determine whether the defendant is eligible for release.

Subsection (c) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC and provides a definition for "mental disability." While medical evidence is highly relevant to the question of the existence of a mental disability, the provision that this definition relates to "any abnormal condition of the mind, regardless of medical label"[17] specifies that the legal standard for a relevant mental incapacitation is not identical to the medical definition of a mental disability.[18] Voluntary intoxication alone cannot serve as the basis for a mental disability defense.[19]

Subsection (d) provides that this section should not be construed to create or limit the court's ability, on its own initiative, to order a psychiatric examination or to raise a mental disability defense.[20]

[17]A mental disease or defect is defined in current District practice as including "any abnormal condition of the mind, regardless of medical label, which affects mental or emotional processes and substantially impairs a person's ability to regulate and control his/her conduct." 1 Criminal Jury Instructions for DC Instruction 9.400. "Mental disease" and "mental defect" (now "mental disability") are currently distinguished from each other based on the permanence of the abnormal mental condition. A disease may be temporary and is capable of improvement or deterioration. A defect or disability is inherent in the actor and permanent, though it may be treatable. See Id.

[18] McDonald v. United States, 312 F.2d 847, 851 (D.C. 1963) ("What psychiatrists may consider a 'mental disease or defect' for clinical purposes, where their concern is treatment, may or may not be the same as mental disease or defect for the jury's purpose in determining criminal responsibility."). As discussed earlier under note 7, supra, it is not sufficient for the basis of an insanity defense that the defendant is medically diagnosed with a mental condition. See Howard, 954 A.2d at 420. It is for finder of fact to determine whether a mental disability sufficiently affects the relevant mental processes as to constitute legal insanity.

[19] McNeil v. United States, 933 A.2d 354, 365 (D.C. 2007) ("[w]hen drug or alcohol abuse is proffered as the basis for a mental disease or defect, there is significant tension between the insanity defense and the universally-accepted tenet that voluntary intoxication does not excuse criminal behavior."). Note, however, that evidence of voluntary intoxication may be relevant under the mental disease or disability defense of RCC § 22E-504 to a factfinder's determination of whether the person lacked substantial capacity to conform or recognize the wrongfulness of their conduct. (Conversely, evidence of mental disease or disability may be relevant under the voluntary intoxication provisions of RCC § 22E-209 to a factfinder's determination of whether the person's voluntary intoxication negated the existence of a culpable mental state.)

[20] If a judge finds that the defendant is capable of making a voluntary and intelligent decision to forego an insanity defense, the judge must respect the defendant's decision and permit the jury's verdict to stand. If, on the other hand, the judge is convinced that the defendant cannot or has not made such a voluntary and intelligent waiver, the judge has

Relation to Current District Law. The revised statute changes current District law in one main way.

The revised statute does not categorically exclude abnormalities "manifested only by repeated criminal or otherwise antisocial conduct" from the definition of "mental disability." Current DCCA case law, following a provision in the Model Penal Code, holds that: "[T]he terms 'mental disease or defect' do not include an abnormality manifested only by repeated criminal or otherwise antisocial conduct."[21] Specifically, D.C. courts have held that this exclusion prevents expert witnesses from testifying that the illegal act alone is sufficient to establish a mental disability.[22] Similar provisions in other jurisdictions have been interpreted to exclude psychopaths or those suffering from antisocial personality disorder from the protection of an insanity defense.[23] In contrast, the RCC statute does not impose a blanket exclusion from the defense for psychopathic diseases. Such exclusion provisions have been heavily criticized by experts as being unsupported by current medical understanding.[24] Modern medical evidence suggests that psychopathy and many personality disorders may well affect cognitive and volitional functions that fall squarely within the ambit of the insanity defense as formulated in the MPC insanity provision (depending, as with all mental conditions, on severity).[25] Under the RCC statute, the availability of a mental disability defense will rely solely on the requirement that the conduct occurred as a result of either cognitive understanding or volitional control be substantially impaired, without categorical exclusion for specific disorders or symptoms. This change allows for expert testimony as to whether a mental disability exists, though the sufficiency of such testimony remains subject to jury determination. This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised statutes.

RCC § 22E-601. Offense Classifications.

Explanatory Note. Subsection (a) classifies all felonies and misdemeanors for the Revised Criminal Code ("RCC"). Felonies, offenses for which more than a year of imprisonment may be imposed, are grouped into nine classes. Misdemeanors, offenses for which a year or less of imprisonment may be imposed, are grouped into five classes. This classification system and definitions provide a clear, consistent, logical framework for organizing offenses of similar seriousness. Subsection (b) cross-references definitions of "felony" and "misdemeanor" in RCC § 22E-701.

Relation to Current District Law. Subsection 22E-601(a) codifies new District law. Current District law does not have any penalty classification scheme.[1] However, the various penalties prescribed for specific offenses de facto cluster into approximately nine felony and five misdemeanor groups (see Commentary to RCC § 22E-603, below). Consequently, the classification distinctions in subsection 22E-601(a) approximate the number of distinct felony and misdemeanor penalties in current law.

Subsection 22E-601(b) cross-references standard definitions of "felony" and "misdemeanor" and does not change current District law.

[1] A few offenses in Title 22 are designated "Class A" offenses, but this is not tied to maximum statutory penalties. The "Class A" designation denotes how supervised release following revocation and "backup time" work for purposes of sentencing per D.C. Code 24-403.01. Class A offenses were so designated because they had "life" penalties prior to the Sentencing Reform Amendment Act of 2000 which abolished the existing parole system. There are no "Class B" offenses in current law, just "Class A" and all other offenses.

RCC § 22E-602. Authorized Dispositions.

Explanatory Note. Subsection (a) cross-references the typical sanctions that a court may impose upon conviction, which are elsewhere authorized. This is a non-exhaustive list and does not preclude the availability of other sanctions authorized by statute. This provision provides notice of the typical dispositions that are authorized in scattered sections and titles of the D.C. Code.

Subsection (b) limits the range of dispositions available under subsection (a) for specified offenses prosecuted by the Attorney General for the District of Columbia. Subsection (b) provides that for the listed offenses a court may sentence a person to either imprisonment or a fine, but not both. The listed offenses include: [RESERVED]. This section is intended to preserve the existing authority of the Attorney General for the District of Columbia to prosecute select crimes and does not itself authorize sanctions.

Subsection (c) specifies judicial deferred dismissal procedures when an actor is found guilty of a Class A, B, C, D, or E (misdemeanor) offense. The procedure authorized in subsection (c) is a new procedural mechanism for when "justice and public safety do not require that the individual be subjected to the stigma and collateral consequences associated with formal conviction."[1] With one exception,[2] the procedure authorized in subsection (c) is not intended to replace or impinge upon the operation of other mechanisms, statutory or otherwise, for deferral or diversion of proceedings.

Paragraph (c)(1) provides that when "a person is found guilty of violation of a Class A, B, C, D, or E offense, the court may, without entering a judgment of guilty and with the consent of the person, defer further proceedings on that offense and place the person on probation upon such reasonable conditions as it may require and for such period, not to exceed one year, as the court may prescribe." Under paragraph (c)(1), if the person violates a condition of probation, the court "may enter an adjudication of guilt and proceed as otherwise provided." If the person does not violate probation, paragraph (c)(1) provides for an early dismissal of the proceedings, and once the period of probation expires, paragraph (c)(1) states that "the court shall discharge such person and dismiss the proceedings against the person." Under paragraph (c)(1), such a dismissal "shall not be deemed a conviction for purposes of disqualifications or disabilities imposed by law upon conviction of a crime," including repeat offender penalties such as in RCC § 22E-606. Under paragraph (c)(1), a judge may defer and dismiss proceedings for the case, even if the defendant has previously had a case dismissed.

Paragraph (c)(2) states that upon discharge of the proceedings under paragraph (c)(1), the person may apply to the court for an order to seal the publicly available records of the arrest and court proceedings. If the court determines, the proceedings were dismissed and the person discharged, paragraph (c)(2) provides that "it shall grant the motion to seal under the procedures in D.C. Code § 16–803(l)."

[2] The procedure in RCC § 22E-602(c) does replace the current deferral procedure for prostitution charges under D.C. Code § 22–2703. See commentary to RCC § 22E-4401, prostitution. Notably, the mechanism in RCC § 22E-602(c) does not apply to the revised statute for possession of a controlled substance, RCC § 48-904.01a, which has its own deferral mechanism (as does current D.C. Code § 48–904.01(e)).

Paragraph (c)(3) further states that the person to whom relief is granted shall have the protections and legal obligations under D.C. Code § 16–803(l) and (m)[3].

Relation to Current District Law.

RCC § 22E-602(a) cross-references existing District law except for its references to RCC § 22E-603 and RCC § 22E-604, which provide new RCC imprisonment and fine penalties.

RCC § 22E-602(b) codifies limitations on available dispositions for RCC offenses that currently exist in those offenses' comparable D.C. Code offenses. To the extent that prosecutorial authority of the Attorney General for the District of Columbia may turn on that limitation,[4] the revised statute preserves the limitation and the designation of prosecutorial authority. No substantive change in law is intended.

RCC § 22E-602(c) changes current District law by specifying deferred disposition procedures for Class A, B, C, D, and E offenses. The current D.C. Code includes judicial deferred disposition procedures for prostitution offenses[5] and possession of a controlled substance[6], but there is no generally applicable judicial deferred disposition statutory provision. In contrast, subsection (c) grants judges the authority, when a defendant is convicted of a Class A, B, C, D, or E offense, to defer disposition and place the defendant on probation. If the defendant complies with the terms of probation, the judge shall dismiss the proceedings against the defendant. This discretionary authority should be offered when it is necessary "to hold the individual accountable for criminal conduct through a formal court process, but justice and public safety do not require that the individual be subjected to the stigma and collateral consequences associated with formal conviction."[7] While the particular language of subsection (c) is largely modeled on D.C. Code § 48-904.01 (e), it differs in three key ways. First, subsection (c) applies to all Class A, B, C, D, and E offenses, not just possession of a controlled substance.[8] Second, subsection (c) does not require that the defendant have no prior convictions; the court may provide deferred dispositions multiple times to a person. Third, subsection (c) does not authorize the court to retain a non-public record of the dismissed proceeding in the same manner as D.C. Code § 48-904.01(e), instead referring to the general record sealing provisions in D.C. Code § 16–803(l) and (m).[9] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised criminal code.

[3] D.C. Code § 16–803(m) states: "No person as to whom such relief has been granted shall be held thereafter under any provision of law to be guilty of perjury or otherwise giving a false statement by reason of failure to recite or acknowledge his or her arrest, charge, trial, or conviction in response to any inquiry made of him or her for any purpose except that the sealing of records under this provision does not relieve a person of the obligation to disclose the sealed arrest or conviction in response to any direct question asked in connection with jury service or in response to any direct question contained in any questionnaire or application for a position with any person, agency, organization, or entity defined in § 16-801(11)."

[4] D.C. Code § 23–101(a) ("Prosecutions for violations of all police or municipal ordinances or regulations and for violations of all penal statutes in the nature of police or municipal regulations, where the maximum punishment is a fine only, or imprisonment not exceeding one year, shall be conducted in the name of the District of Columbia by the Corporation Counsel for the District of Columbia [Attorney General for the District of Columbia] or his assistants, except as otherwise provided in such ordinance, regulation, or statute, or in this section."). Under DCCA case law, the limitation in as to the offense being fine-only or up to one year imprisonment only applies to "penal statutes in the nature of police or municipal regulations." D.C. v. Smith, 329 A.2d 128, 130 (D.C. 1974) ("Here, the context, legislative history, and the long-established application of the statute all support our conclusion that the 'fine only, or imprisonment' phrase modifies only the 'penal statute' phrase. The Corporation Counsel's basic prosecutorial jurisdiction over violations of 'police or municipal ordinances or regulations' is unaffected by the subsequent limitation concerning penal statutes.").

[8] Some jurisdictions provide broader mechanisms for judicial probation before judgement or dismissal in the interest of justice. See, e.g. Md. Code Ann., Crim. Proc. § 6-220 (West) (authorizing judicial probation before judgment procedures for virtually all felonies and misdemeanors other than certain traffic offenses and sex crimes against minors). See also see Margaret Love and David Schlussel, The Many Roads to Reintegration: A 50-State Report on Laws Restoring Rights and Opportunities After Arrest or Conviction (September 2020) at 62-70 (available online at https://ccresourcecenter.org/wp-content/uploads/2020/09/The-Many-Roads-to-Reintegration.pdf) ("19 states now make deferred adjudication broadly available, in many cases for any offense eligible for a probationary sentence and without regard to prior record, leaving it up to the court (and in some states also the prosecutor) to determine the appropriateness of the disposition on a case-by-case basis." (internal citation omitted)).

[9] These provisions specifically provide for prosecutors and law enforcement to keep a non-public record of the arrest and proceedings. See D.C. Code § 16–803(l)(1)(B).

RCC § 22E-603. Authorized Terms of Imprisonment.

Explanatory Note. Subsection (a) provides specific, standardized imprisonment penalties for offenses under Title 22E. Subsection (a) designates for each class a maximum term of imprisonment beyond which a court may not sentence a defendant. Subsection (b) cross-references the definitions for "felony" and "misdemeanor" in RCC § 22E-701.

Relation to Current District Law. RCC § 22E-603(a) codifies new law. Current District law does not codify generally applicable offense classes that provide specific imprisonment penalties for each offense. Currently, each offense has its own penalty which has been determined through piecemeal legislation, without a comprehensive review of other offenses' penalties. Without a formal scheme of offense classification to guide legislative decision making and facilitate comparison of offense penalties, a wide range of authorized imprisonment penalties has organically arisen across current District offenses.[1]

Nonetheless, in practice, most current D.C. Code imprisonment penalties use one of the following nine felony and five misdemeanor numbers: Life (without parole, LWOP),[2] 60 Years (Y), 40Y, 30Y, 20Y, 15Y, 10Y, 5Y, 3Y, 1Y, 180 days, 90 days, 30 days, and fine-only. The RCC penalty classes generally track these de facto felony and misdemeanor penalties in the District by providing nine felony classes and five misdemeanors, though differing in the exact penalties.[3]

The apparent discrepancy between RCC and D.C. Code statutes for low and mid-level felonies is largely a result of the different treatments of "backup" time under the RCC and D.C. Code. Under RCC § 24-403.01(b-1) the amount of possible imprisonment ("backup") time for revocation from supervised release no longer must be subtracted from the maximum statutory penalty when calculating the sentence that a court can impose. In contrast, current D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b-1) has the opposite procedure and requires the court to deduct backup time, such that a person being sentenced for committing an offense with a 3-year statutory maximum can actually only be sentenced to imprisonment for 2 years maximum to allow for the one-year backup time under D.C. Code § 24-403.01 (b)(7). (Similarly, under current law a court can only impose a prison sentence for a maximum of 3 years even though the statutory maximum is 5 years, because every offense that has a statutory maximum of 5 years or more (but less than 25) is subject to 2 years backup time which must be deducted from the 5 year maximum.[4]) The RCC's elimination of the requirement that the court deduct backup time when calculating the term of imprisonment that can be imposed makes the RCC's stated statutory maximum a statement of the imprisonment time a judge can impose at sentencing. The change also means that the slight 1-3 year reductions in the RCC low and mid-felony penalty classes, as compared to the common penalties in the D.C. Code,[5] are largely moot in practice. The amount of the reduction in most cases simply accounts for the fact that backup time no longer has to be subtracted under D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b-1).[6] Consequently, while a number of the RCC low and mid-felony penalty class maximums appear different than those in the D.C. Code, these classes are functionally equivalent in most cases.

The fact that the RCC penalty classes generally track the number of de facto felony and misdemeanor penalties commonly used in the District does not mean, however, that all RCC classes or the RCC penalties for specific offenses are the same as under current law. On the contrary, as described below, the RCC takes a sharply different approach to sentencing for the most serious offenses by eliminating life without release sentences and, for most people, the effective life without release sentences. Also, the RCC classes assigned to each revised offense typically differ sharply from what is authorized for under current District law. Commonly, current District law authorizes penalties that far exceed the sentences issued by sentencing judges in practice. Giving more weight to recent practice than the legal maximums authorized decades ago, the RCC assigns penalties for most revised offenses that accommodate all (or all but the highest 5% of) adult sentences in the last decade. For some offenses, the RCC penalty classes would more severely restrict current sentencing practices to help ensure more proportionate sentences.

This commentary primarily describes the reasons why these particular maximum imprisonment numbers are imposed for the most severe RCC classes (Class 1 and Class 2). Additional commentary briefly addresses: the penultimate level of severity (Class 3); the second misdemeanor level (Class B); the absence of statutory or mandatory minimum sentences; and considerations in the assignment of penalty classes to particular RCC

[6] As discussed further in the commentary to RCC § 24-403.01 under the revised statute, backup time continues to exist, it just is no longer deducted from the statutory maximum. The total term of imprisonment imposed for revocation of supervised release in addition to the initial sentence imposed may exceed the statutory maximum sentence authorized for any given offense.

The RCC realistically sets the two most severe imprisonment punishments at terms that, for most persons incarcerated, would equate to just short of a life without release (LWOR) sentence: 45 years and 40 years for aggravated first degree murder and first degree murder, respectively.

Authorities vary on what imprisonment term constitutes a de facto LWOR sentence, but recent case law from state high courts indicates that a term of 50 years is an effective LWOP sentence for juvenile offenders.[7] Because adult offenders are older at the time of entry into incarceration, a de facto LWOP sentence for adults logically would be shorter than 50 years. In fact, the federal Bureau of Prisons (BOP) calculates persons incarcerated for a "life" sentence, including District persons in BOP custody, as serving a 470-month (39 years and two months) sentence based on their life expectancy.[8]

In individual cases, the length of incarceration that actually constitutes a LWOP sentence for a particular individual is fundamentally speculative and variable. Life expectancy is only an estimate of the average time before death (which, by definition, half the prison population is predicted to exceed), and a minority of incarcerated individuals may significantly outlive what for others are de facto LWOP sentences. Nonetheless, it appears that for many of the District's incarcerated persons, incarceration in the range of 40-50 years would mean those individuals would die in prison.

The District's criminal justice system disproportionately incarcerates black men.[9] Demographic information on adult dispositions in Superior Court between 2010-2019 indicates that 91% of those convicted of felonies were black and 91% were men, making the odds that any given felony conviction in the District would be of a black male 83%.[10] Similar to other felonies, about 89% of first degree murder convictions in the District between 2010-2019 were of black men.[11] Yet, black men comprise only about 20% of the District's population.[12]

This sharp disparity in the incarceration of black men compared others must be considered when realistically assessing what would be a life sentence for most sentenced in the District. The current life expectancy for non-Hispanic black men in the District is just under 69 years.[13] Precise data on the age of persons convicted of murder in the District is unavailable, but a review of publicly accessible data shows that the median age for those convicted of first degree murder between 2010 and 2019 is in the mid-to-late twenties.[14] Given the RCC Class 1 and 2 maximum penalties of 45 and 40 years, without early release a 25 year old adult could still be incarcerated until they are 70 or 65. If that adult were black, this sentence would be in the range of their current life expectancy. An 18 year old black male, without early release, could be incarcerated under an aggravated first degree murder or a first degree murder conviction until they are 63 or 58 - about five to ten years short of their current life expectancy. Adults 30 years or older, when incarcerated with RCC Class 1 and 2 maximum penalties would be, absent early release, in their 70s or older if they outlive their life expectancy and complete their sentence. Bottom line, based on current life expectancies, without early release a sentence of the RCC Class 1 and Class 2 maximum penalties (45 and 40 years, respectively) would result in many, if not most, of the persons so incarcerated dying while in prison.

The RCC and current law do provide a variety of early release mechanisms, however, that are likely to lower the imprisonment term for some people sentenced to the RCC Class 1 and Class 2 maximum penalties. Most significantly, the RCC provides a possibility of early release through its revision to judicial second look procedures,[15] available to persons of all ages after serving at least 15 years in prison. Under existing BOP rules and regulations applicable to the District's incarcerated persons there is a deduction of up to 15% of the sentence for "good time credit."[16] The maximum good time credit deduction of 15% would be 6.75 years from a 45 year sentence (leaving a 38.25 year sentence) and 6 years from a 40 year sentence (leaving a 34 year sentence). With RCC Class 1 and 2 maximum penalties of 45 and 40 years and a maximum good time credit, a 25 year old black adult could still be incarcerated until they are 63.25 or 59, about five to ten years short of their current life expectancy. Existing BOP rules and regulations applicable to the District's incarcerated persons also include compassionate release for elderly persons in poor health.[17] penalties at 45 and 40 years to provide life with the possibility of release for most incarcerated persons convicted of one of these offenses. Somewhat lower or higher maximum penalties, e.g. 40 and 35 years or 50 and 45 years for Classes 1 and 2, would provide more or fewer individuals with effective life with the possibility of release sentences.

Setting the RCC Class 1 and Class 2 maximum penalties at 45 and 40 years ends the District's current authorization of life without release (LWOR) sentences and extreme term-of-years sentences that, practically, are LWOR sentences.

Since the District's repeal of the death penalty in 1981,[18] the most severe punishment under the current D.C. Code is "life without release," a punishment specifically authorized for: aggravated murders,[19] aggravated first degree sexual abuse,[20] aggravated first degree child sexual abuse,[21] and the third conviction for any "crime of violence."[22] However, since Congressional elimination of parole in the District,[23] second degree murder[24] and certain terrorism offenses carrying a term of "life"[25] similarly have no provision for release or automatic review and are de facto LWOR sentences.

In addition, a wide range of District crimes carry term-of-years punishments of 60 years that, in the absence of parole, function as de facto LWOR sentences based on the life expectancy of those incarcerated. These 60-year offenses include: unaggravated first degree murder,[26] first degree burglary while armed,[27] kidnapping while armed,[28] distribution of a controlled substance while armed,[29] possession with intent to distribute a controlled substance while armed,[30] and manslaughter while armed.[31] Since Congressional elimination of parole, incarcerated persons from the District must serve at least 85% of their sentence,[32] meaning that even an incarcerated person with a perfect record while incarcerated would not be eligible for release from a 60 year sentence until they serve at least 51 years.

In the District, the effect of the RCC Class 1 and Class 2 penalties being set at 45 and 40 years is exclusively, or almost exclusively, on penalties for aggravated first degree murder. During the ten year period of 2010-2019, analysis of District court data indicates that sentences to life and life without parole were given almost exclusively for aggravated first degree first degree murder.[33] Similarly, the analysis found that, over the same period, all District sentences other than those for aggravated first degree murder were less than 40 years (when analyzed at the 97.5th quantile).[34] However, a significant number of aggravated first degree murder sentences were for 40 years or more, so it is reasonable to estimate that up to a quarter of the adult sentences for aggravated murder from 2010-2019 were higher than the RCC Class 1 and 2 maximum penalties would allow.[35] Moreover, depending on the behavior at issue a murder charge and penalty is just one way the criminal law provides accountability for an actor's conduct, and in any given case there may be additional convictions and additional enhancements that bring penalties that run [33] CCRC Research Memorandum #40 - Statistics on District Adult Criminal Charges and Convictions, Appendix C - Count of Life Sentences by Charge (Last in Time Data). (Analysis indicates that, over the 10-year period of 2010-2019, there were 30 convictions carrying life sentences for first degree murder, 6 convictions for first degree child sexual abuse, 1 conviction for first degree sex abuse (force), and 1 conviction for second degree murder.) For any of these charges to carry a life sentence, one or more aggravators would have to be found. See D.C. Code §§ 22–2104.01; 22-3020. Six other charges are listed as having 1 conviction for a life sentence, but it is unclear if these are errors in the record or the statistical analysis since under current law these offenses legally could only have a life sentence under the rarely used repeat offender enhancement in D.C. Code § 22–1804a.

Notably, public records indicate that all six of the life sentences for first degree child sexual abuse applied to one individual in one case, which also included numerous additional term-of year sentences. Under the RCC, each conviction for enhanced first degree sex abuse of a child would carry up to a 30-year penalty as a Class 3 offense; a de facto LWOP term of years sentence would be available for two (or more) convictions for such severe conduct.

[34] See Advisory Group Memorandum #40 and Appendices (available at https://ccrc.dc.gov/page/ccrc-documents) for explanation and more information. Analysis by CCRC based on Superior Court data. Note that 97.5% (as high as the analysis goes) of sentences for unenhanced first degree murder were under 40 years.

[35] The same analysis of adult dispositions over the timespan 2010-2019 shows that for other than "felony murder" forms of first degree murder, including both aggravated and unenhanced charges, the 75th quantile of sentences was 40 years, the 90th quantile was 45 years, and 95th quantile was nearly 50 years. The analysis also showed that for "felony murder" first degree murder, including both aggravated and unenhanced charges, the 75th quantile of sentences was 42.5 years, the 90th quantile was 60 years, and 95th quantile was nearly 62 years. Combined, convictions for all forms of first degree murder (felony murder and non-felony murder, enhanced and unenhanced) totaled 168 during the 2010-2019 period. consecutive to the murder penalty or can further raise the penalty.[36]

The grim reality, however, is that any apparent differences among the 45 and 40 year RCC penalties for Class 1 and Class 2 offenses, the current D.C. Code authorized penalties, and recent District practice may be irrelevant in many cases. As described above, the life expectancy for non-Hispanic black men in the District is just under 69 years.[37] If the life expectancy of the incarcerated person is less than either the imprisonment time authorized under the statute (be it RCC or D.C. Code) or the total imprisonment time to which an individual is subject in the case (including charges beyond a single murder charge), then whether the statutorily-authorized murder penalty is 40, 45, or 100 years makes no practical difference. Many people sentenced under these circumstances can be expected to die in prison.

Establishing the most severe RCC Class 1 and Class 2 penalties as life with the possibility of release is strongly supported by the recent sentencing recommendations of the American Law Institute (ALI).[38] The ALI Model Penal Code: Sentencing recommends that, except in jurisdictions where it is the only alternative to the death penalty, imposition of the most severe penalty in criminal law should be life imprisonment with a "meaningful possibility of release before the prisoner's natural death."[39] The rationale for the ALI rejection of life imprisonment without release is grounded not only in a realistic assessment of life expectancy but in skepticism as to the abilities of a sentencing judge:

> Natural-life sentences rest on the premise that an offender's blameworthiness cannot change substantially over time—even very long [36] For example, depending on the facts of the case, there may be additional liability for possession of a firearm, kidnapping, or additional violent acts done on the occasion, or general enhancements for hate crimes or otherwise.

[38] The ALI is a longstanding, leading independent organization in the United States producing scholarly work to clarify, modernize, and otherwise improve the law. Its diverse national membership includes judges, scholars, and practitioners of law. Over the course of eight years, the organization drafted and approved an update to the sentencing provisions in the ALI Model Penal Code. ("With one narrow exception, the revised Code continues the policy judgment of the original Code that the most severe sanction in the criminal law should be a life prison term with a meaningful possibility of release before the prisoner's natural death. In a departure from the Institute's previous position, the Code now also concedes the policy advisability of life prison sentences with no prospect of release—the equivalent of "life without parole" in some systems—but only when this sanction is the sole alternative to a death sentence."). As the District is not a death penalty jurisdiction, the ALI recommendation is to reject a life without possibility of release sentence.

> periods of time. The sanction denies the possibility of dramatically altered circumstances, spanning a prisoner's acts of heroism to the pathos of disease or disability, that might alter the moral calculus of permanent incarceration. It also assumes that rehabilitation is not possible or will never be detectable in individual cases. Such compound certainties, reaching into a far-distant future, are not supportable.[40]

The ALI recommendation that the most severe sentence in a criminal code be life with the possibility of release is made in conjunction with recommendations for a variety of early release mechanisms, including a judicial review of the sentence after 15 years akin to the RCC second look provision.[41]

Despite strong support by legal experts for life with possibility of release sentences, the RCC maximum authorized imprisonment penalties set a new national precedent. All states except Alaska authorize "life without release" sentences for at least some offenses,[42] and Alaska authorizes a mandatory 99 year term for aggravated murder, a de facto life without possibility of release sentence.[43] Nationally, it has been estimated that over 50,000 people are serving life without parole sentences, although just 5 jurisdictions impose the majority of these terms and seven states have fewer than 50 people serving such sentences.[44] Approximately 44,000 people across the country are also serving sentences of 50 years or greater, though, again, seven states have fewer than 50 people serving such sentences.[45]

Yet, the high statutory penalties authorized and imposed by many other states may not be an accurate indicator of actual imprisonment time given the widespread availability of parole in other jurisdictions. Data from other jurisdictions indicates that of those in prison for murder and non-negligent manslaughter (combined), 39.6% served less than 10 years before their first release, 50% served 13.4 years or less before their first release, and 69.6% served less than 20 years before their first release.[46] The average length of sentences imposed for these offenses was much, much higher than what was actually served—40.6 years by one calculation, of which only 57.2% was served before first release.[47] So, while the purported length of sentences imposed for the most serious crimes in other jurisdictions may be substantially longer than provided in the RCC, it does not appear that higher authorized penalties translate into longer incarceration periods.

While determination of the appropriate penalty level for the most severe crimes turns on many considerations, the impact on public safety is minimal when comparing life with or without the possibility of release penalties. In terms of general deterrence, longstanding research indicates that lengthy prison sentences—and even the death penalty—do little or nothing to deter criminal behavior.[48] Individuals "age out" of crime with a sharp drop in criminal behavior as people enter mid and later life.[49] Given the extraordinary length and severity of a 40-45 year sentence, an individual released after such a period generally would not be expected to pose a significant public safety threat.

The RCC provides a penultimate level of punishment, below life with the possibility of release, of a 30-year maximum imprisonment for a Class 3 offense. This remains an extremely severe penalty and only five RCC charges are designated Class 3 offenses—enhanced second degree murder and several forms of enhanced sex offenses that are particularly egregious.[50]

While the 30-year maximum for Class 3 offenses stands in sharp contrast to many of the more severe penalties authorized in the D.C. Code for non-murder offenses,[51] it is sufficiently severe to encompass nearly all District sentences actually given to adults between 2010-2019 for all charges other than first degree murder. Based on analysis of District court data over that 10 year period, up to about 20 convictions for crimes other than first degree murder had sentences in excess of 30 years or were for life.[52] Less than 5% of the 148 sentences for first degree sexual abuse were for more than 30 years,[53] and 8-14 life sentences were given for first degree child sexual abuse, first degree sexual abuse, second degree murder, and perhaps some other offenses.[54] While the RCC Class 3 maximum of 30 years would encompass all but these few sentences and first degree murder subject to the Class 1 and 2 penalties, capping the Class 3 penalty may have a significant effect on plea bargaining. About 10% of second degree murder and first degree sexual abuse sentences of District adult offenders between 2010-2019 are for 25 years or more,[55] and lowering the authorized maximum may put a downward pressure on sentences near the top of the authorized penalties.

The RCC provides for a 180-day penalty for Class B misdemeanors but makes no allowance for a six-month penalty as is currently used for several offenses in the D.C. Code. The distinction between 180 days and six months in current District law does not reflect a substantive distinction in the seriousness of the offense or its imprisonment penalty but triggers a procedural distinction not mentioned in those offenses. Under Supreme Court precedent, offenses involving penalties of more than six months are subject to a Sixth

For any of these charges to carry a life sentence, one or more aggravators would have to be found. See D.C. Code §§ 22–2104.01; 22-3020. Initial CCRC research indicates that all six of these first degree child sexual abuse sentences may have originated from one case. Under the RCC, each conviction for enhanced first degree sex abuse of a child would carry up to a 30-year penalty as a Class 3 offense; a de facto LWOP term of years sentence would be available for two (or more) convictions for such severe conduct.

[55] See Advisory Group Memorandum #40 and Appendices (available at https://ccrc.dc.gov/page/ccrc-documents) for explanation and more information. Analysis by CCRC based on Superior Court data. Notably, RCC § 22E-1301 enhanced first degree sex assault and RCC § 22E-1302 enhanced first degree sex abuse of a minor are Class 3 offenses carrying a 30 year maximum penalty, whereas the unenhanced versions—RCC § 22E-1301 first degree sex assault and RCC § 22E-1302 first degree sex abuse of a minor—are Class 4 offenses, carrying a 24 year maximum penalty. Analysis of court data indicates that, for adult sentences during 2010-2019, the 97.5 quantile of all (enhanced and unenhanced) first degree child sexual abuse (D.C. Code § 22-3008) sentences was 20 years. Similarly, for adult sentences during 2010-2019, the 90th quantile of all (enhanced and unenhanced) first degree sexual abuse (D.C. Code § 22-3002) sentences was 25 years, and the 75th quantile of all (enhanced and unenhanced) first degree sexual abuse was 16.5 years.

Amendment right to a jury trial, whereas offenses with lesser penalties generally are not.[56] However, nothing prevents a jurisdiction from voluntarily extending jury trial rights to offenses subject to penalties of six months or less and RCC makes all offenses with an imprisonment penalty over 60 days jury demandable.[57] Rather than perpetuate a distinction between 180 day and six month penalties in the absence of a difference in jury demandability, the RCC classification system makes all Class B offenses subject to a maximum 180 day imprisonment.[58]

The RCC penalty classes do not include a minimum term of imprisonment of any sort for any offense. Sentencing guidelines, rather than statutory mandates, are a more appropriate way to guide judicial decision making among competing[59] sentencing priorities. The ability of the legislature to foresee all circumstances that may be relevant to sentencing is limited, and even the most severe criminal offense, aggravated first degree murder, may not merit a lengthy imprisonment term in some circumstances.[60] Elimination of legislatively-mandated minimum sentences is consistent the reasoning of the Council in recent years when considering whether to extend mandatory minimum sentences.[61]

A defendant is entitled to a jury trial in such circumstances only if he can demonstrate that any additional statutory penalties, viewed in conjunction with the maximum authorized period of incarceration, are so severe that they clearly reflect a legislative determination that the offense in question is a 'serious' one."). See also D.C. Code § 16-705 (permitting jury trials when the possible cumulative punishment exceeds two years).

(2) Provides for just punishment and affords adequate deterrence to potential criminal conduct of the offender and others; and

(3) Provides the offender with needed educational or vocational training, medical care, and other correctional treatment.").

[60] For example, a spouse or child acting with a bona fide compassionate motive to administer a fatal medication to end the life of a terminally-ill, elderly person may be charged with aggravated first degree murder under RCC § 22E-1101(d)(3)(A) and current D.C. Code § 22–2104.01(b)(10). If compliance with the procedures for physician assisted death in D.C. Code § 7–661.11 cannot be proven, the actor would face a maximum imprisonment of 60 years for a Class 1 offense under the RCC, or a maximum of life without parole and a mandatory minimum of 30 years under D.C. Code § 22–2104.01.

Decades of research indicate that mandatory minimums do not solve the problems of inconsistent sentences that they were intended to solve and, instead, exacerbate disproportionality while creating numerous negative effects on the justice system.[62] In light of this evidence, the most prominent legal authorities have called for an end to mandatory minimums, including the Judicial Conference of the United States,[63] the defendant to a mandated prison term regardless of the defendant's role in the offense, culpability, or seriousness of the actual occurrence. Mandatory minimums severely limit or eliminate a judge's ability to distinguish between the least and most culpable defendants, even though the judge is the most impartial and most familiar with the facts of the case, and the judge's actions are public. Instead, mandatory minimums vest sentencing discretion in the prosecutor, even though the prosecutor is not impartial, and the prosecutor's decision is insulated from public and judicial scrutiny. The prosecutor is the one who seeks to plea bargain. Or who decides what charge (i.e, crime) to prosecute. So the prosecutor decides whether to threaten a mandatory minimum in order to force a plea bargain. Or the prosecutor decides whether to charge a lesser offense, that does not entail a mandatory minimum, because the chance of conviction is better. However the prosecutor chooses to use the range of offenses available to charge in order to obtain a conviction, the fact is that with mandatory minimums the role of discretion is great with the prosecutor and virtually nonexistent with the judge.").

Empirical research and policy analyses have shown time and again that mandatory-minimum penalties fail to promote uniformity in punishment and instead exacerbate sentencing disparities, lead to disproportionate and even bizarre sanctions in individual cases, are ineffective measures for advancing deterrent and incapacitate objectives, distort the plea-bargaining process, shift sentencing authority from courts to prosecutors, result in pronounced geographic disparities due to uneven enforcement patterns in different prosecutors' offices, coerce some innocent defendants to plead guilty to lesser charges to avoid the threat of a mandatory term, undermine the rational ordering of graduated sentencing guidelines, penalize low-level and unsophisticated offenders more so than those in leadership roles, provoke nullification of the law by lawyers, judges, and jurors, and engender public perceptions in some communities that the criminal law lacks moral legitimacy.").

Finally, several points are notable on the classification of particular RCC offenses using the punishments authorized under RCC 22E-603(b).

First, as applied to specific RCC offenses, the RCC penalty classifications seek to ensure proportionate punishment for criminal behavior as a whole, including for the most serious harms inflicted. However, where conduct can be charged under multiple offenses (as is common in particularly egregious cases) the RCC may not rely on the statutory maximum of just one criminal charge to provide a proportionate response to the conduct as a whole. The government may need to charge and prove multiple offenses, each carrying its own penalty, if it chooses to prosecute all aspects of the behavior. If a sentencing judge deems it necessary under the goals of sentencing,[66] they continue to have discretion under the RCC to run sentences consecutively.[67] For example, if a home burglary occurs and the homeowner experiences a serious bodily injury during the encounter, the RCC provides liability for both burglary and aggravated assault and allows for the sentences to run consecutively. This is a different, more tailored approach, compared to current District law and practice which provides, for example, a very high (30 year) penalty for any burglary of an occupied dwelling, regardless of whether anyone was even encountered, on the theory that the penalty would suffice to cover any further bad harms therein.[68]

Second, as applied to particular RCC offenses, the RCC penalty classes typically provide more proportionate punishment than under current District law because the revised offenses are themselves structured to have more gradations. Typically, District offenses work in pursuit of an amendment to 18 U.S.C. § 924(c) to preclude the stacking of counts and make clear that additional penalties apply only when, prior to the commission of such offense, one or more convictions of such person have become final.") (https://www.ussc.gov/sites/default/files/pdf/amendment-process/public-comment/20170731/CLC.pdf).

[64] American Law Institute, Model Penal Code: Sentencing (April 10, 2017) at 166 ("Even if it were a desirable policy in the abstract, legislatively mandated sentencing uniformity has never been achieved in practice. Studies of the operation of mandatory-minimum penalties show that they are not enforced by prosecutors in all eligible cases. Selective charging and the plea-bargaining process lead to uneven application of the seemingly flat penalties. Evidence suggests that racial and ethnic biases sometimes influence the application of mandatory-minimum statutes. In addition, mandatory sentencing laws tend to be applied differently in different locales within a single state. Empirical, theoretical, and anecdotal accounts all support the conclusion that the attempt to eliminate judicial sentencing authority through mandatory-penalty provisions does not promote consistency, but merely shifts the power to individualize punishments from courts to prosecutors.").

[65] ABA House of Delegates, Resolution 10B on Mandatory Minimums (2017), at 4. ("RESOLVED, That the American Bar Association opposes the imposition of a mandatory minimum sentence; and FURTHER RESOLVED, That the American Bar Association urges Congress, state and territorial legislatures to repeal existing criminal laws requiring minimum sentences, and to refrain from enacting laws punishable by mandatory minimum sentences.").

have at most two gradations (versions of the offense to which different penalties apply based on the seriousness of the conduct involved). For example, the District's current theft statute has two gradations (first degree and second degree) and two corresponding penalties (10 years and 180 days), depending on whether the property taken was worth at least $1,000 (first degree) or less (second degree).[69] In contrast, the RCC theft offense has five gradations, each with a different penalty classification, with thresholds at $500, $5,000, $50,000, and $500,000.[70] While the top penalties under the RCC and current D.C. Code may be same for an offense, the RCC's use of more gradations, each with a distinct penalty classification, allows for greater differentiation of penalties according to the amount of harm.

Third, as applied to most RCC offenses, the maximum imprisonment authorized in 22E-603 classes encompass all, or all but the top 5%, of sentences issued by District judges in recent years.[71] In some instances, however, the RCC penalty classification for a particular offense would appear to exclude an even larger percentage of sentences under recent court practice. For example, the RCC proposes penalties for various degrees of burglary under RCC § 22E-2701 ranging from Class 7 (8 years) to Class A (1 year). These RCC burglary maximum penalties are dramatically lower than the statutory penalties under the current D.C. Code—which authorizes up to 60 years even when the burglar encounters no one and takes nothing[72]—and are substantially lower than current District court practice.[73] However, for burglary and other instances, the review of sources beyond current District statutory law and practice, such as the precedent of other jurisdictions[74] and District public opinion research on the relative severity of offenses,[75] have indicated the need for a change to District law.

Fourth, while the RCC's penalty classes and classifications for particular offenses seek to authorize proportionate punishment for all crimes, the RCC also seeks to reduce the District's historic over-reliance on incarceration to achieve criminal justice. Prior to the 2020 Covid-19 emergency, the District's incarceration rate was the highest or nearly the highest of any state in the nation.[76] The broad societal costs of such high levels of incarceration are staggering, even if they are largely hidden in the District due to federal assumption of the costs of incarcerating persons from the District.[77] And those incarcerated from the District have been disproportionately black—91% of all adult felony convictions this past decade.[78] That same percentage holds for crimes like possession of a controlled substance where research shows that there are no racial differences in the use of drugs.[79]

Public safety requires incarceration of criminal actors in many cases and may necessitate lengthy terms in some instances. However, the RCC penalties recognize that incarceration is an inadequate tool to ensure public safety and the need for public safety does not justify current levels of incarceration. In terms of deterrence, the broad consensus of criminal justice research is that effective law enforcement apprehension is far more effective than the length of incarceration.[80] In fact, research by the National Academy of Sciences and others shows that as a form of punishment, the public safety benefits of incarceration in terms of incapacitation and deterrence for some people may be outweighed by the fact that incarceration is inherently "criminogenic"—i.e., incarceration actually increases the likelihood an individual will reoffend, as compared to a scenario where the individual was not incarcerated.[81] Incarceration typically exacerbates the underlying drivers of crime, including social isolation, poverty, substance abuse, and physical and mental health problems.[82] This effect of incarceration on perpetuating violence may undergird the fact that most victims of crime, including victims of violent crime, support shorter prison sentences and a greater focus on prevention and rehabilitation programs.[83]

Fifth, and finally, the RCC penalty classes and classifications for particular offenses are not intended to be a static or fully detailed guide to what constitutes proportionate sentences for crimes. The RCC 22E-603 penalty classifications reflect the first comprehensive review and systematic change to District statutory penalties since the D.C. Code was first enacted in 1901. As crime rates change, public norms shift, and piecemeal amendments are made to District criminal laws to address particular problems, continual monitoring and legislative changes will be necessary to ensure that the overall system of laws authorizing imprisonment and punishment remains proportionate.[84] Further, the District's sentencing guidelines must also be reformed in light of the changes in RCC 22E-603, the classification of specific offenses, and the changes to offense elements and grading in order to further improve the consistency and proportionality of sentencing in individual cases. RCC 22E-603 provides maximum imprisonment sentences to accommodate extreme forms of a particular crime, but it is expected that imprisonment terms for ordinary forms of RCC crimes, following updated sentencing guidelines, will be substantially lower than the statutory limits. The RCC penalty classes and classifications for particular offenses are the crudest measure of the severity of an offense. In practice, the proportionality of penalties under RCC 22E-603 will depend on the ongoing efforts of not only sentencing judges and attorneys but the community as a whole to ensure that penalties are tailored and just in each individual case.

Subsection 22E-603(b) cross-references standard definitions of "felony" and "misdemeanor" and does not change current District law.

And those components are many. The police make arrests, pretrial service agencies recommend bond, prosecutors make charging decisions, defense lawyers defend (sometimes), juries adjudicate (in the rare case that doesn't plead), legislatures establish the sentence ranges, judges impose sentences within these ranges, corrections departments run prisons, probation and parole officers supervise offenders, and so on. The result is an almost absurdly disaggregated and uncoordinated criminal justice system—or "non-system" as Daniel Freed once called it. Although the existence of this diffuse structure is not news, we have yet to comprehend how the lack of coordination has contributed to the growth of our carceral system. In a tough-on-crime era, no single actor doubles or triples the incarceration rate. But as we shall see, if all the actors become even somewhat more punitive, and if they all do so at the same time, the number of people in prison and under criminal justice supervision skyrockets. Yet nobody has to take responsibility for the outcome, because nobody is responsible—at least not fully. This lack of responsibility is crucial to understanding why even reluctant or conflicted crime warriors (which some African Americans were and are) become part of the machinery of mass incarceration and why the system continues to churn even to this day, when its human toll has become increasingly apparent." RCC § 22E-604. Authorized Fines.

Explanatory Note. Subsection (a) provides specific, standardized imprisonment penalties for offenses under Title 22E.

Subsection (b) sets alternative maximum fine penalties, as compared to the standard fines otherwise authorized under subsection (a) or, if applicable, a fine amount expressly specified in another statute. The provisions in paragraphs (b)(1) and (b)(2) are also alternatives to one another—an actor may be subject to an alternative fine under either paragraph (b)(1) or paragraph (b)(2), but not both. Paragraph (b)(1) states that if the offense of conviction is proven to have resulted in pecuniary loss to someone other than the actor, or a pecuniary gain to any person, then the fine imposed may be up to double the pecuniary loss or gain provided that the government's information or indictment alleges the amount of loss or gain and liability for a double fine. "In fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to the amount of pecuniary gain or loss. Paragraph (b)(2) states that if the actor is proven to be an organizational defendant then the fine may be up to triple the fines otherwise authorized, provided that the government's information or indictment alleges the actor is an organizational defendant and liability for a triple fine. "In fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to the actor's status. Both paragraphs (b)(1) and (b)(2) are subject to the limitations in subsection (c).

Subsection (c) states that courts must take into account the defendant's financial circumstances when sentencing a defendant to pay a fine. In particular, the court must consider how imposing the fine will affect the defendant's ability to pay restitution (if restitution has been ordered). The court may not impose a fine that would leave the defendant without the means to provide for his or her reasonable living expenses. The court must also take into account the defendant's obligations to financially support family members.

Paragraph (d)(1) cross-references the definition of "in fact" in RCC § 22E-207 and the definitions of "actor," "felony," "misdemeanor," "pecuniary gain," and "pecuniary loss" in RCC § 22E-701. Paragraph (d)(2) defines the term "organizational defendant" as any actor other than an individual human being. The term encompasses a range of non-natural organizations such as corporations.

Relation to Current District Law. Subsection (a) codifies entirely new law. District law does not set a schedule of fines by offense class. However, the Criminal Fine Proportionality Act of 2012 (FPA) now codified in D.C. Code §§ 22-3571.01 and 22-3571.02 sets fines for most current District offenses that generally correspond to the imprisonment penalty (although not the class) of each offense. The FPA does not precisely track imprisonment penalties insofar as D.C. Code § 22-3571.01(12) provides a separate maximum fine of $250,000 if the offense resulted in death, regardless of the imprisonment penalty, and D.C. Code 22-3571.02(a) provides that specific offenses may state they are exempt from D.C. Code § 22-3571.01 and state a different penalty.

In contrast, RCC § 22E-604(a) provides for fines that are mostly higher than existing District law and does not treat a result of death as categorically different.[1] The higher authorized fines may provide an alternative punishment to incarceration for some persons,[2] including legal entities like businesses and corporations,[3] while low-income and

[1] The FPA authorizes a higher fine for 3-year felonies. This appears to be due to the fact that the FPA does not provide a distinct fine for 3-year felonies, instead grouping such fines with 5-year felonies which are subject to a $12,500 fine. For comparison: a fine-only offense is subject to a $100 fine under the FPA and a $250 fine under the RCC; a 30-day offense is subject to a $250 fine under the FPA and a $500 fine under the RCC; a 90-day offense is subject to a $500 fine under both the FPA and a $1,000 fine under the RCC; a 180-day offense is subject to a $1,000 fine under the FPA and a $2,500 fine under the RCC; a one-year offense is subject to a $2,500 fine under the FPA and a $5,000 fine under the RCC; a 3-year offense is subject to a $12,500 fine under the FPA and a $10,000 fine under the RCC; a 5-year offense is subject to a $12,500 fine under the FPA and a $25,000 fine under the RCC; a 10-year offense is subject to a $25,000 fine under the FPA and a $50,000 fine under the RCC; a 15-year offense is subject to a $37,500 fine under the FPA and a $75,000 fine under the RCC; a 20-year offense is subject to a $50,000 fine under the FPA and a $100,000 fine under the RCC; a 30-year offense is subject to a $125,000 fine under the FPA and a $250,000 fine under the RCC. The RCC further provides escalating fines up to $1,000,000 for 40-, 60-, and 80-year offenses whereas the FPA provides fines above $125,000 only where death results (regardless of the imprisonment penalty) and sets that penalty at $250,000.

[2] See American Law Institute Model Penal Code: Sentencing (2017) commentary to 6.04 (renumbered 6.06 in final text) ("[T]he Code would preserve, and in some instances expand, the use of economic sanctions for defendants of sufficient means, who might be strongly affected by those penalties without being driven below the threshold of reasonable law-abiding subsistence. While not a majority of offenders, there is a significant subset for whom economic penalties can further such goals as proportionate punishment, victim restitution, general deterrence, specific deterrence, and disgorgement of criminally gotten gains. As the original Code also assumed, some classes of offenses require the availability of muscular financial penalties—albeit often for use in conjunction with other sanctions (in original § 7.02(2)(a), where "the defendant has derived a pecuniary gain from the crime"). Effective criminal-justice response to many kinds of organized crime, corporate offending, environmental crime, and fraudulent financial schemes requires an array of economic penalties that can mete out punishments proportionate to the enormous monetary harms suffered by victims, disgorge illegal profits, lower the ex ante incentives of crimes involving large returns and small risks of detection, and disable the operations of criminal enterprises by depriving them of necessary resources. Indeed, historically, for crimes at the high end of the spectrum of white-collar crime, one serious problem in American law has often been the failure of state codes to authorize economic sanctions of sufficient severity to serve the purposes of deterrence and punishment. When they are enforced with seriousness and do not drive offenders into poverty, economic sanctions have advantages not shared by other forms of criminal punishments… [M]any have urged that economic penalties, despite current problems in their use, will ultimately be important sanctioning tools to a nation engaged in downsizing its prison systems. These claims are predictive in nature, and rely on European rather than U.S. precedents. Still, some observers of American criminal justice have argued that undue limitations on the use of economic penalties may close off an important avenue of deincarceration policy. The relevant Code provisions are written to keep the door of experimentation open.").

[3] With respect to Subtitle III of Title 22E, property offenses, "person" is specifically defined to include non-natural persons. See RCC § 22E-701 (defining person to mean "an individual, whether living or dead, as well as a trust, estate, fiduciary, partnership, company, corporation, association, organization, union, government, government agency, indigent persons would not be subject to the higher crimes under RCC § 22E-604(c) (discussed below). Making fines track the imprisonment penalty rather than whether the crime resulted in death allows for differentiation in the seriousness of crimes such as negligent homicide and aggravated murder. These changes improve the consistency and proportionality of the revised statutes.

RCC § 22E-604(b) makes several changes to the D.C. Code's FPA provisions in §§ 22-3571.01 and 22-3571.02 regarding alternative fines. First, the current FPA provisions do not specify what, if any culpable mental state applies to the pecuniary loss or gain that must be proven, either the existence or amount of the pecuniary loss or pecuniary gain, or the nature of the actor(s) as an organizational defendant. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised statute specifies, through use of "in fact," that no culpable mental state requirement exists as to these elements in order to be liable for the alternative fines. Second, the FPA provides double fines, and limits the fines to offenses punishable by six months or more imprisonment.[4] In contrast, the revised statute provides for treble fines and is applicable to all misdemeanors. Third, the FPA does not have any requirements as to the potential for heightened fines (unlike the alternative fine for pecuniary loss or pecuniary gain). In contrast, the revised statute requires the information or indictment to state that defendant is an organizational defendant subject to treble fines. These changes improve the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statutes.

RCC § 22E-604(c) codifies a new provision of District law limiting the applicability of fines to ensure that victim restitution is a priority over the collection of fines, to deter possible criminogenic effects of fines due to rendering a defendant destitute, and to ensure that family members or dependents of a defendant do not suffer additional negative consequences.[5] The current D.C. Code FPA provisions in § 22-3571.01 and § 22-or government-owned corporation, or any other legal entity."). For other RCC and D.C. Code offenses, "person" generally includes non-natural entities. See D.C. Code § 45-604 ("The word 'person' shall be held to apply to partnerships and corporations, unless such construction would be unreasonable, and the reference to any officer shall include any person authorized by law to perform the duties of his office, unless the context shows that such words were intended to be used in a more limited sense.").

[4] Although unclear from legislative history, presumably the underlying concern in this FPA provision was ensuring that such additional penalties only be levied in cases that are jury-demandable (which per current D.C. Code § 16-705 includes offenses with a six month or greater imprisonment). The increased fines for organizational defendants under the current D.C. Code statute has the effect of making charges for 180 day imprisonment offenses jury demandable for organizational defendants but not for natural persons, and this discrepancy would be exacerbated if the alternative fines for organizational defendants apply to all misdemeanors and treble damages are allowed. The revised statute provides the government the choice between pursuing treble fines which would make the charge jury-demandable for even very low-level (Class C or Class D) offenses, or pursuing normal fines with the same jury demandability as for natural persons. The revised D.C. Code § 16-705(b)(1) generally makes all offenses punishable by a fine or penalty of more than $1,000 or by imprisonment for more than 90 days jury demandable.

3571.02 have no comparable provision. However, the DCCA's reasoning in the case One 1995 Toyota Pick-up Truck v. District of Columbia[6] and the consideration of financial means and family obligations when ordering restitution[7] suggest a similar approach. Notably, subsection RCC § 22E-604(c) does not restrict a court's lawful authority to require victim restitution, or otherwise address the relative priority of victim restitution and the defendant's means for reasonable living expenses and family obligations. Subsection (c) clarifies that a person who is eligible for appointed counsel under D.C. Code § 11-2601, whether or not such a person elects to proceed pro se or actually is represented by appointed counsel, shall not be subject to a fine under subsection (a). This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised statutes.

RCC § 22E-604(d) codifies a definition for "organizational defendant" that is currently undefined in the D.C. Code §§ 22-3571.01 and 22-3571.02. The Fine Proportionality Act fails to define any this term, and no case law is on point. The definition of "organizational defendant" is intended to broadly reach any non-individual person recognized by law and is modeled on a definition in the Federal Sentencing Guidelines.[8] This change improves the clarity and completeness of the revised statutes.

RCC § 22E-605. Charging and Proof of Penalty Enhancements.

Explanatory Note. RCC § 22E-605 sets certain procedural requirements for a penalty enhancement, whether a general penalty enhancement under RCC chapter 6 or any other penalty enhancement expressly specified by statute, to apply to an offense. Subsection (a) requires that notice of a penalty enhancement be provided in the information or indictment for the offense. Subsection (b) codifies the constitutional requirement[1] of proof beyond a reasonable doubt for the objective elements and culpable mental states specified in a penalty enhancement, excepting the ability of a court to take judicial notice of prior convictions if certain detailed procedures are followed under D.C. Code § 23-111.

Relation to Current District Law. Subsections (a) and (b) codify procedural requirements for penalty enhancements that the Supreme Court held to be constitutionally required in Apprendi v. New Jersey and subsequent case law. The subsections do not change current District law and provide improved clarity and notice of relevant limitations on penalty enhancements.

In 2000, the Supreme Court held in Apprendi v. New Jersey that: "Other than the fact of a prior conviction, any fact that increases the penalty for a crime beyond the prescribed statutory maximum must be submitted to a jury, and proved beyond a reasonable doubt."[2] The Apprendi decision was foreshadowed by the Court's earlier decision in Jones v. United States, which reasoned that: "under the Due Process Clause of the Fifth Amendment and the notice and jury trial guarantees of the Sixth Amendment, any fact (other than prior conviction) that increases the maximum penalty for a crime must be charged in an indictment, submitted to a jury, and proven beyond a reasonable doubt."[3] The Apprendi rule has been called "[O]ne of the most important developments in sentencing law since the criminal procedure revolution of the mid-twentieth century,"[4] because of its widespread implications for penalty enhancements and other provisions. Subsequent constitutional jurisprudence in Alleyne v. United States clarified that the notice and standard of proof requirements in Apprendi also extend to facts that establish mandatory minimum penalties at sentencing[5] and increase fines.[6] However, facts concerning prior convictions are not subject to the notice and standard of proof requirements under longstanding tradition.[7]

The DCCA has repeatedly recognized the Apprendi rule in the context of aggravating factors.[8] The DCCA has also recognized exception for facts concerning prior convictions,[9] and questions of law concerning the nature of prior convictions as crimes of violence.[10] Subsections (a) and (b) do not change this case law.

Currently, the D.C. Code does not contain a provision that broadly requires penalty enhancements to be alleged in the predicate offense's information or indictment, or establishes the standard of proof for penalty enhancement elements. D.C. Code § 23-111 addresses charging and standards of proof in the limited context of penalty enhancements that involve proof of prior convictions. However, subsections (a) and (b) and the provisions of D.C. Code § 23-111 are not in conflict. The charging requirement in subsection (a) is also imposed by D.C. Code § 23-111. Although D.C. Code § 23-111 provides greater procedural detail, those details supersede the more general requirement in subsection (a).[11] Similarly, the standard of proof requirement in subsection (b) explicitly allows for a lower standard of proof for the establishment of prior convictions as provided in D.C. Code § 23-111.[12]

[11] The repeat offender penalty enhancement in RCC § 22E-606 explicitly recognizes the continued applicability of D.C. Code § 23-111. See Commentary to RCC § 22E-606 for more details.

[12] D.C. Code § 23-111 does not state that alleged facts concerning prior convictions must be proven beyond a reasonable doubt in all instances, but it does state that if a defendant denies any allegation in the information concerning a prior conviction the defendant shall file a response and the court shall hold a hearing on the issue. At the hearing, "the prosecuting authority shall have the burden of proof beyond a reasonable doubt on any issue of fact" except for claims that a conviction was obtained in violation of the Constitution of the United States—in which case the defendant "shall have the burden of proof by a preponderance of the evidence on any issue of fact raised by the response."

RCC § 22E-606. Repeat Offender Penalty Enhancement.

Explanatory Note. This section provides penalty enhancements for repeat offenders. To provide proportionate penalties, the penalty enhancements are differentiated according to the type of instant offense and prior convictions, as well as the number of prior convictions. The revised repeat offender penalty enhancement statute replaces the general repeat offender statutes[1] in the current D.C. Code.

Paragraph (a)(1) specifies the requirement for application of a felony repeat offender penalty enhancement to be proof that the actor in fact presently commits a felony offense under Subtitle II (Offenses Against Persons) or an enhanced burglary offense. "In fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, is used in paragraph (a)(1) to indicate that there is no additional culpable mental state for the current felony beyond what is otherwise required for proof of the felony. "Enhanced burglary offense" is a defined term in paragraph (f)(2).

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies that at the time the actor commits the felony, the actor must have at least one prior conviction of a specified type. The prior conviction or convictions must be for one or more felony offenses in Subtitle II (Offenses Against Persons) of Title 22E, an enhanced burglary offense or offenses, or a comparable offense or offenses. Further the prior conviction or convictions must be for an offense or offenses committed within 10 years of the current offense being enhanced and must not be committed on the same occasion as the offense being enhanced. Subtitle II includes murder, sex offenses, robbery, assaults, kidnapping, human trafficking, and almost all of the other most serious offenses in the entire D.C. Code.[2] The term "enhanced burglary offense" is a defined term in subsection (f)(2) and means enhanced first and enhanced second burglary under RCC § 22E-2701(a)-(b), (d)(4). Only one prior conviction for a felony in Subtitle II, an enhanced burglary offense, or a comparable offense is necessary for application of a felony repeat offender penalty enhancement. If there is more than one such conviction, there still can be only one application of a repeat offender penalty enhancement. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the culpable mental state "in fact" in paragraph (a)(1) applies to each following element in paragraph (a)(2). "In fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, is used in paragraph (a)(2) to indicate that there is no additional culpable mental state requirement as to the prior convictions or their circumstances.

The terms "felony," "prior conviction," and "comparable offense" are defined terms in RCC § 22E-701. A "felony" is an offense with an authorized penalty of over one year of imprisonment. "Prior conviction" broadly refers to final orders by District or other courts, with exclusions for juvenile delinquency adjudications, District convictions with pending diversion requirements or probation requirements under D.C. Code § 48-904.01(e), and convictions that have been vacated, sealed, expunged, commuted, or

[2] Felony offenses in Subtitle II of Title 22E include many offenses that are comparable to those currently deemed a "crime of violence" as defined in D.C. § 23–1331(4), except for property crimes of arson and burglary, which are not in Subtitle II. The felony offenses in Subtitle II of Title 22E include many additional offenses not in the current definition of "crime of violence" despite their direct and severe impact on complainants, such as human trafficking.

pardoned. "Comparable offense" broadly refers to a crime in the District or other jurisdiction with elements that would necessarily prove the elements of a corresponding District offense—here, a felony in Subtitle II of Title 22E or enhanced first and enhanced second burglary. The determination of whether another jurisdiction's statute (or an older District statute) is equivalent to a current District offense is a question of law.

Paragraph (b)(1) specifies the requirement for application of a misdemeanor repeat offender penalty enhancement to be proof that the actor in fact presently commits a misdemeanor offense under Subtitle II of Title 22E (Offenses Against Persons) "In fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, is used in paragraph (b)(1) to indicate that there is no additional culpable mental state for the current misdemeanor beyond what is otherwise required for proof of the misdemeanor.

Paragraph (b)(2) specifies that at the time the actor commits the misdemeanor, the actor must either have at least two prior convictions for a misdemeanor in Subtitle II of Title 22E, or a comparable offense, or at least one prior conviction for a felony in Subtitle II of Title 22E, an enhanced burglary offense, or a comparable offense. Further the prior conviction or convictions must be for an offense or offenses committed within 10 years of the current offense being enhanced and must not be committed on the same occasion as the offense being enhanced. Subtitle II includes misdemeanor sex offenses, assaults, and other direct harms to persons. The term "enhanced burglary offense" is a defined term in subsection (f)(2) and means enhanced first and enhanced second burglary under RCC § 22E-2701(a)-(b), (d)(4). Only two prior convictions for a misdemeanor offense in Subtitle II or a comparable offense, or one prior conviction for a felony in Subtitle II, an enhanced burglary offense, or a comparable offense, is necessary for application of a misdemeanor repeat offender penalty enhancement. If there is more than two such misdemeanor convictions or one such felony conviction, there still can be only one application of a repeat offender penalty enhancement. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the culpable mental state "in fact" in paragraph (b)(1) applies to each following element in paragraph (b)(2). "In fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, is used in paragraph (a)(2) to indicate that there is no additional culpable mental state requirement as to the prior convictions or their circumstances.

The terms "misdemeanor," "prior conviction," and "comparable offense" are defined terms in RCC § 22E-701. A "misdemeanor" is an offense with an authorized penalty of one year or less of imprisonment. "Prior conviction" broadly refers to final orders by District or other courts, with exclusions for juvenile delinquency adjudications, District convictions with pending diversion requirements or probation requirements under D.C. Code § 48-904.01(e), and convictions that have been vacated, sealed, expunged, commuted, or pardoned. "Comparable offense" broadly refers to a crime in the District or other jurisdiction with elements that would necessarily prove the elements of a corresponding District offense—here, any misdemeanor in Subtitle II of Title 22E, or , a felony in Subtitle II of Title 22E or enhanced first and enhanced second burglary. The determination of whether another jurisdiction's statute (or an older District statute) is equivalent to a current District offense is a question of law.

Subsection (c) states that the procedural requirements of D.C. Code § 23-111, regarding the establishment of prior convictions, continue to apply to RCC § 22E-606. D.C. Code § 23-111 specifies the manner in which the government must provide notice of the prior convictions to be relied upon for a penalty enhancement, as well as hearing procedures should a defendant either deny an alleged prior conviction or claim that the alleged prior conviction was unlawfully obtained.

Subsection (d) specifies the nature and extent of the punishments for the felony and misdemeanor repeat offender penalty enhancements.

Paragraph (d)(1) specifies the additional imprisonment penalty and fine for a felony repeat offender penalty enhancement. The additional authorized penalty depends on the classification of the current offense and is: for a Class 1 or Class 2 offense is 6 years and $50,000; for a Class 3 or Class 4 felony, 4 years and $40,000; for a Class 5 or Class 6 felony, 2 years and $30,000; for a Class 7 or Class 8 felony, 1 years and $20,000; and for a Class 9 felony, 180 days and $10,000.

Paragraph (d)(2) specifies the additional imprisonment penalty and fine for a misdemeanor repeat offender penalty enhancement. The additional authorized penalty depends on the classification of the current offense and is: for a Class A or Class B misdemeanor, 60 days and $500; for a Class C, Class D, or Class E misdemeanor, 10 days and $50.

Subsection (e) specifies that application of an enhancement under this section is in addition to, and does not bar, application of any other penalty enhancements specified in Chapter 6 or elsewhere in the Title 22E. Also, in calculating the class of the offense under subsection (d), the penalty class of the unenhanced offense is to be used.[3]

Subsection (f)(1) cross-references the RCC § 22E-207 standard definition of "in fact," and the RCC § 22E-701 standard definitions of "comparable offense," "felony," "misdemeanor," and "prior conviction." Subsection (f)(2) defines the term "enhanced burglary offense" to mean, in this section, enhanced first and enhanced second burglary under RCC § 22E-2701(a)-(b), (d)(4).

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC repeat offender penalty enhancement statute changes current District law in twelve main ways.

These changes to current District law are chiefly a result of the fact that the revised statute divides the penalty enhancement into two gradations based on the current offense's seriousness and general nature (i.e. whether the offense is a felony or misdemeanor offense against persons in Subtitle I of Title 22E, enhanced burglary offense, or a comparable offense), and the number, seriousness, and general nature of prior convictions. These changes to current District law generally reflect a modest expansion in liability for prior offenses against persons, elimination of repeat offender liability for non-violent offenses and consideration of non-violent offenses as relevant to this enhancement, and a sharp reduction in the authorized punishments for all repeat offender enhancements. The changes eliminate the three-strikes life without possibility of release punishment under D.C. Code § 22-1804a(a)(2).

[3] For example, consider a person who commits offense fourth degree assault under RCC § 22E-1202(d) and that offense is subject to enhancement under RCC § 22E-1202(h)(7) for being against a protected person and under RCC § 22E-608 for being a hate crime. If a repeat offender penalty enhancement is also applied, the calculation would be based on the class of the unenhanced fourth degree assault—not, on the offense classification after application of enhancements in RCC § 22E-1202(h)(7) and/or RCC § 22E-608.

Currently, the D.C. Code contains two separate repeat offender penalty enhancements, each with two penalty gradations, for a total of four gradations. D.C. Code § 22-1804 creates two gradations based on whether the defendant had one, or more than one, prior conviction, but the prior convictions must have been for an offense that "is the same as, constitutes, or necessarily includes" the instant offense. Thus, D.C. Code § 22-1804 does not grade according to the seriousness (misdemeanor or felony) of the current offense or prior convictions, or the nature of the offense (e.g., an offense against persons). Rather, D.C. Code § 22-1804 grades solely on the number and specific nature of the prior conviction (for the same or nearly same kind of offense). A different approach is taken in current D.C. Code § 22-1804a, which grades its penalty enhancement on the seriousness of the current offense and prior convictions (felonies), the number of prior convictions (two or more), and whether the prior convictions were for a "crime of violence."[4] The current penalty enhancement statutes overlap with each other to the extent that they both are applicable to felonies (including crimes of violence) where the prior convictions are the same or nearly same kind as the instant offense.[5] Nothing in the statutory language for either current D.C. Code §§ 22-1804 or 22-1804a prevents "stacking" both penalty enhancements.[6] [4] "Crime of violence" is a defined term in D.C. Code § 22-1804a which refers to the definition in D.C. Code § 22–4501, which in turn refers to D.C. Code § 23–1331(4). The definition of "crime of violence" in D.C. Code § 23–1331(4) includes many (but not all) crimes comparable to felony offenses against persons in the RCC, as well as some crimes comparable to property crimes in the RCC.

[5] For example, consider a person who commits first degree fraud under current D.C. Code § 22-3222(a) for stealing property by deception worth more than $1,000, and has three prior convictions for first degree fraud not committed on the same occasion. That person appears to be subject to both the repeat offender provision of D.C. Code § 22-1804 (because the prior convictions were the same as the current offense) and D.C. Code § 22-1804a(a)(1) (because the person committed two prior felonies not on the same occasion). Each enhancement involves proof of a fact not required by the other, and the limitation in D.C. Code § 22-1804(b) regarding stacking with a "provision of law which provides an increased penalty for a specific offense by reason of a prior conviction" does not apply to D.C. Code § 22-1804a because it is not concerned with a specific offense. Consequently, whereas first degree fraud is currently subject to up to 10 years imprisonment, the enhancement under D.C. Code § 22-1804 would treble that amount to 30 years, and D.C. Code § 22-1804a would enhance the statutory maximum another 30 years. Stacked, the enhancements would raise the penalty to 60 years for first degree fraud with three prior first degree fraud convictions.

[6] In general, a legislature can impose cumulative punishments, through multiple statutes, for the same conduct. Missouri v. Hunter, 459 U.S. 359, 366 (1983). Thus, if a defendant were convicted of first-degree burglary and that defendant had two prior convictions for first-degree burglary, then that defendant may be subject to both the enhancement in D.C. Code §§ 22-1804 and 22-1804a. But, where the legislative intent to impose cumulative punishments is unclear, there may be litigation challenging the cumulative punishments under the Double Jeopardy Clause. See, e.g., Whalen, 445 U.S. at 687. Notably, the legislative history is silent as to the issue of stacking of the overlapping repeat offender

First, in contrast to current District law, the revised repeat offender penalty enhancement is structured as one statute that precludes "stacking" repeat offender penalties with other repeat offender penalties (the application of multiple repeat offender penalty enhancements). Under the revised statute, subsection (a) applies only to felonies and subsection (b) applies only to misdemeanors. This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Second, in contrast to current District law, the revised felony repeat offender penalty enhancement narrows liability by providing an enhancement only when the instant offense is an offense against persons in Subtitle II of Title 22E or an enhanced burglary offense. For example, a theft charge is not subject to the repeat offender penalty enhancement because it is not an offense in Subtitle II. While burglary may be a felony crime, it does not require injury to people—and where burglary involves infliction of bodily injury or some other harm of a person (e.g., threats, sexual harms), those charges may be brought and, as charges in Subtitle II, they are subject to this enhancement as currently drafted. Consequently, the revised statute includes only the most serious burglary charges, enhanced first degree and enhanced second degree burglary, involving entry into a building or dwelling with a dangerous weapon and intent to commit a specified crime. This change improves the proportionality of the revised statutes.

Third, in contrast to current District law, the revised felony repeat offender penalty enhancement expands liability somewhat by providing an enhancement when a person has only one prior conviction for any felony in Subtitle II of Title 22E or an enhanced burglary offense (not just for a crime that has the same elements or a crime that necessarily includes the current offense[7]). For example, under the revised statute, a person who commits a sex assault under RCC § 22E-1301 and has a single prior conviction for kidnapping under RCC § 22E-1401 would be subject to the felony repeat offender enhancement provision. This change improves the proportionality of the revised statutes.

Fourth, in contrast to current District law, the revised misdemeanor repeat offender penalty enhancement expands liability somewhat by providing an enhancement when a person has two or more prior convictions for any misdemeanor in Subtitle II of Title 22E (not just for a crime that has the same elements or a crime that necessarily includes the current offense[8]). For example, under the revised statute, a person who commits a fourth degree assault that causes bodily injury to a protected person under RCC § 22E-1301 and has two prior convictions for committing first degree criminal threats under RCC § 22E-1204 would be subject to the misdemeanor repeat offender enhancement provision. This change improves the proportionality of the revised statutes.

Fifth, in contrast to current District law,[9] the revised repeat offender penalty enhancement (felony and misdemeanor) expands liability for prior convictions that were enhancements in D.C. Code § 22-1804 and D.C. Code § 22-1804a which were established by Congress in 1971. See, e.g., H.R. REP. NO. 907, 91st Cong., 2d Sess. 73-74 (1970).

[7] Compare with D.C. Code § 22-1804.

[8] Compare with D.C. Code § 22-1804.

[9] D.C. Code § 22-1804 is limited to prior convictions under "a criminal offense under any law of the United States or of a state or territory of the United States," and D.C. Code § 22-1804a refers to a conviction by "a court of the District of Columbia, any state, or the United States or its territories."

adjudicated by courts of federally-recognized Indian tribes. For example, a conviction for an assault adjudicated by the Navajo Nation may be a prior conviction under the revised statute. This change updates District law in line with the recent Supreme Court opinion in United States v. Bryant,[10] recognizing that convictions of federally recognized Indian tribes which are subject to the Indian Civil Rights Act (ICRA) of 1968[11] could be used as prior convictions under the federal repeat offender law there at issue.[12] This change fills a possible gap in the revised statutes.

Sixth, in contrast to current District law, except for prior convictions for a felony offense against persons in Subtitle II of Title 22E or an enhanced burglary offense, the revised misdemeanor repeat offender penalty enhancement eliminates liability for having just one prior conviction that has the same elements or a crime that necessarily includes the current offense. For example, under the revised statute, a person who commits a misdemeanor third degree criminal threat and has a single prior conviction for a third degree criminal threat would not be subject to any repeat offender penalty enhancement. This change improves the proportionality of the revised statutes.

Seventh, in contrast to current District law the revised repeat offender penalty enhancement (felony and misdemeanor) eliminates liability for prior convictions of offenses that occurred over 10 years ago.[13] For example, under the revised statute, a person who commits fraud under RCC § 22E-2201 and has two prior convictions for assault committed over 10 years ago would not be subject to any repeat offender penalty enhancement. The current D.C. Code repeat offender provisions do not have any time limitation and can be applied decades after the prior conviction. This change improves the proportionality of the revised statutes.

Frase, Criminal History Sentencing Enhancements Imprison Too Many Aging, Low-Risk Offenders (September 20, 2017), online at https://sentencing.umn.edu/content/criminal-history-sentencing-enhancements-imprison-too-many-aging-low-risk-offenders (last visited 2/1/2021) citing Piquero, Alex R., David Farrington, and Alfred Blumstein, Key Issues in Criminal Career Research, Cambridge University Press (2007). Notably, there is a significant drop-off in public support for increasing sentences based on prior convictions as the priors are more than 10 years or so old. See Julian Roberts, Public Attitudes Regarding Look-Back Limits: Findings from New Robina Institute Research (September 20, 2017), online at https://sentencing.umn.edu/content/public-attitudes-regarding-look-back-limits-findings-new-robina-institute-research (last visited 2/1/2021) (Reviewing results of a public opinion survey and stating: "The most significant finding is that in the eyes of the public, older prior convictions carry less weight than more recent priors: the public was less punitive when the prior crime was older. In addition, there was substantial public support for look-back limits on counting prior convictions. Two-thirds of respondents were in favour of a policy that restricted judges from considering old offenses, and of those, three quarters believed the time limit should be set at ten years or less.").

Eighth, in contrast to current District law,[14] the revised repeat offender penalty enhancement (felony and misdemeanor) eliminates liability for prior convictions based on conduct on the same occasion as one another. For example, under the revised statute, a person who commits a bodily injury fourth degree assault crime and has two prior convictions, one a state charge and the other a federal charge arising out of the same occasion as one another, would not be subject to any repeat offender penalty enhancement. While current D.C. Code § 22–1804a doesn't count more than one prior conviction based on the same occasion, D.C. Code § 22–1804 does count multiple convictions arising from the same occasion. This change improves the proportionality of the revised statutes.

Ninth, in contrast to current District law, the revised repeat offender penalty enhancement (felony and misdemeanor) eliminates liability for prior convictions that were juvenile delinquency adjudications, prior convictions subject to diversion or probation under D.C. Code § 48-904.01(e), convictions that were vacated, sealed, or expunged, and convictions that were pardoned.[15] For example, a person who commits a misdemeanor offense under Subtitle II of Title 22E and has only one prior conviction for a misdemeanor offense under Subtitle II of Title 22E which was sealed, would not be subject to any repeat offender penalty enhancement. This change improves the proportionality of the revised statutes.

Tenth, in contrast to current District law, the revised felony repeat offender penalty enhancement eliminates liability for prior convictions that were felonies or crimes of violence in another jurisdiction or under prior District law, but not under current District law.[16] For example, a person who engages in pickpocketing and receives a felony

[14] D.C. Code § 22-1804a excludes multiple prior felonies or crimes of violence "committed on the same occasion." D.C. Code § 22-1804, however, has no limitations regarding the prior convictions occurring "on the same occasion."

[15] Neither D.C. Code §§ 22-1804 nor 22-1804a limit application in these circumstances, though both statutes specifically exclude prior convictions that were "pardoned."

[16] The plain language of D.C. Code § 22-1804a(b)(1) refers simply to being "convicted of a felony by a court of the District of Columbia, any state, or the United States or its territories," without any limitation as to whether the felony in the other jurisdiction would count as a felony under current District law. While jurisdictions may vary on what crimes constitute felonies and misdemeanors, for most offenses and jurisdictions there is a consistent differentiation between misdemeanors and felonies based solely on whether the imprisonment penalty is over one year. However, the meaning of a "crime of violence" in another jurisdiction is unclear and the meaning of the current D.C. Code § 22-1804a(b)(2) is arguably ambiguous when it requires that a person "was convicted of a crime of violence as defined by § 22-4501, by a court of the District of Columbia, any state, or the United States or its territories." This language may be construed to mean that a conviction for any crime in another jurisdiction, regardless of its elements, is a "crime of violence" conviction if it has the label of "burglary" or one of the other enumerated "crimes of violence" in the D.C. Code. Alternatively, it may be that a conviction in another jurisdiction that has the same elements as "burglary" in the D.C. Code, but has a different name, would still be considered a predicate "crime of violence" for purposes of D.C. Code § 22-1804a(b)(2). Given the ambiguity of the current D.C. Code § 22-1804a(b)(2), the revised felony repeat conviction in another jurisdiction for a "robbery" that does not meet the requirements for robbery under RCC § 22E-1201 or any other felony in Subtitle II of Title 22E, would not be subject to a felony repeat offender penalty enhancement based on that prior conviction because it would not be a "comparable offense." This change requires prior convictions that are used for the revised repeat offender penalty enhancement to meet the requirements of current District laws and excludes convictions based on lower standards.[17] This change improves the proportionality of the revised statutes.

Eleventh, in contrast to current District law, the revised repeat offender penalty enhancement eliminates a "three strikes" penalty of life imprisonment without release and authorizes an increase in penalty that is significant but generally less than half the penalty otherwise applicable to the current offense. This change is consistent with the District's ongoing reliance on prior convictions to determine punishments within the statutorily-authorized range. This change improves the proportionality of the revised statutes.

Twelfth, in contrast to current District law, the revised repeat offender penalty enhancement is not classified as a "Class A" offense for purposes of imprisonment following revocation of release. Current D.C. Code § 22–1804a(a)(3) provides that any felony enhanced under that statute is a "Class A" felony for purposes of imprisonment following revocation of release authorized by § 24-403.01.[18] However, under the RCC there are no designated Class A offenses.[19] This change improves the proportionality of the revised statutes.

offender enhancement's requirements for a "comparable offense" may be viewed as a possible, rather than a clear, change in law.

[17] For example, theft of $200 would constitute a felony in the Commonwealth of Virginia punishable by one to twenty years imprisonment (Va. Code § 18.2-95), but under the current D.C. Code would constitute a misdemeanor in the District punishable by up to 180 days (D.C. Code § 22-3212).

[18] D.C. Code § 22–1804a(a)(3) ("For purposes of imprisonment following revocation of release authorized by § 24-403.01, the third or subsequent felony committed by a person who had previously been convicted of 2 prior felonies not committed on the same occasion and the third or subsequent crime of violence committed by a person who had previously been convicted of 2 prior crimes of violence not committed on the same occasion are Class A felonies.").

RCC § 22E-607. Pretrial Release Penalty Enhancement.

Explanatory Note. RCC § 22E-607 provides a penalty enhancement for offenses committed while on pretrial release under D.C. Code § 23-1321. The revised Pretrial release penalty enhancement statute replaces the penalty enhancement for offenses committed during release (OCDR) statute[1] in the current D.C. Code.

Subsection (a) specifies the requirement for application of a pretrial release penalty enhancement to be proof that the actor in fact commits an offense and, at the time the actor commits the offense, the actor is on pretrial release under D.C. Code § 23-1321. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the culpable mental state "in fact" in subsection (a) applies to each following element in subsection (a). "In fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, is used in subsection (a) to indicate that there is no additional culpable mental state for the current offense beyond what is otherwise required for proof of the offense, and no culpable mental state requirement as to the fact that the actor is on pretrial release under D.C. Code § 23-1321.

Subsection (b) specifies offenses to which the pretrial release penalty enhancement does not apply. Paragraph (b)(1) provides that the enhancement does not apply to contempt, tampering with a detection device under 22E-3402(a)(1)(B) (which specifically addresses detection devices worn pretrial), or a violation of a condition of release under D.C. Code § 23-1329. Paragraph (b)(2) provides that the enhancement does not apply to any offense when the person is convicted of contempt, escape from a Correctional Facility or Officer under RCC § 22E-3401(c), tampering with a detection device under RCC § 22E-3402, or a violation of a condition of release under D.C. Code § 23-1329 for the same conduct.

Subsection (c) specifies the nature and extent of the punishments for the pretrial release penalty enhancement. Subsection (c) specifies the additional imprisonment penalty and fine an actor is subject to for the enhancement, which depends on the classification of the current offense. The additional authorized penalty for commission of a Class 1 or Class 2 offense is 6 years and $50,000; for a Class 3 or Class 4 felony, 4 years and $40,000; for a Class 5 or Class 6 felony, 2 years and $30,000; for a Class 7 or Class 8 felony, 1 years and $20,000; for a Class 9 felony, 180 days and $10,000; for a Class A or B misdemeanor, 60 days and $500; for a Class C, Class D, or Class E misdemeanor, 10 days and $50.

Subsection (d) specifies that application of an enhancement under this section is in addition to, and does not bar, application of any other penalty enhancements specified in Chapter 6 or elsewhere in the Title 22E. Also, in calculating the class of the offense under subsection (c), the penalty class of the unenhanced offense is to be used.[2]

Subsection (e) cross-references the RCC § 22E-207 standard definition of "in fact,"

[1] D.C. Code § 23–1328. Notably, although the language of D.C. Code § 23-1328 has led to confusion by some as to whether OCDR is a separate offense or a penalty enhancement, the DCCA has clearly ruled that OCDR is a penalty enhancement. See Tanismore v. United States, 355 A.3d 799, 803 (D.C. 1979).

[2] For example, consider a person who commits offense fourth degree assault under RCC § 22E-1202(d) and that offense is subject to enhancement under RCC § 22E-1202(h)(7) for being against a protected person and under RCC § 22E-608 for being a hate crime. If a pretrial release penalty enhancement is also applied, the calculation would be based on the class of the unenhanced fourth degree assault—not, on the offense classification after application of enhancements in RCC § 22E-1202(h)(7) and/or RCC § 22E-608.

and the RCC § 22E-701 standard definitions of "actor," "felony," and "misdemeanor."

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC pretrial release penalty enhancement changes current District law in three main ways.

First, the revised pretrial release penalty enhancement penalties vary by the particular penalty classification of the current offense, authorizing more severe fine and imprisonment punishment for committing a more severe offense during pretrial release. Current D.C. Code § 23-1329(a) grades the offense by whether the current offense is a felony (subject to up to 5 years additional imprisonment) or a misdemeanor (subject to up to 180 days additional imprisonment), with fines dependent on a more precise breakdown of the length of imprisonment penalty specified in D.C. Code § 22-3571.01. In contrast, the revised statute specifies six different penalties, imprisonment and fine, based on the penalty classification of the offense committed during release. This change improves the proportionality of the revised statutes.

Second, a revised pretrial release penalty enhancement penalty may be set to run consecutive or concurrent to any other sentence. Current D.C. Code § 23-1329(c) requires that any term of imprisonment for OCDR be consecutive to any other imprisonment. In contrast, the revised statute allows judges to decide whether a consecutive sentence is appropriate. This change improves the proportionality of the revised statutes.

Third, the revised pretrial release penalty enhancement expressly bars application of the enhancement to certain listed crimes or any offense when a person is also convicted of one of the listed crimes. Current D.C. Code § 23-1329 has no prohibitions on what offenses can be enhanced. In contrast, the revised statute bars use of the enhancement in relation to several offenses dealing with violation of judicial orders while on release—contempt under D.C. Code § 11-741, escape from a Correctional Facility or Officer under RCC § 22E-3401(c), tampering with a detection device under RCC § 22E-3402, or violation of a condition of release under D.C. Code § 23-1329—or any offense when a person is also convicted of one of these crimes. When a defendant commits an offense while on pretrial release, in virtually every such case a defendant is also subject to the separate but overlapping crimes of violating a condition of release[3] and the general offense of contempt of court[4] for the same conduct based on the practice of prohibiting criminal activity as a condition of release.[5] Also, the tampering with a detection device offense under RCC § 22E-3402(a)(1)(B) specifically refers to the conduct occurring during pretrial release, and escape from a correctional facility or officer under RCC § 22E-3401(c) covers persons in a half-way house pretrial. The subsection (d) limitation preserves existing charging options and does not affect in any manner liability for the contempt offense in Title 11,[6] but reduces the practical effect of the overlapping statutes.[7] This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised statutes.

[3] D.C. Code § 23-1329.

[4] D.C. Code § 11-944.

[5] See Speight v. United States, 569 A.2d 124, 127 (D.C. 1989) (en banc).

[6] Under the Home Rule Act, the District lacks the ability to legislate changes to Title 11 provisions.

[7] The DCCA has shown great reluctance toward punishing these overlapping offenses separately. See Speight, 569 A.2d at 130-31 (narrow concurring opinion forming the en banc plurality relied upon underlying violation of a condition of release to uphold OCDR liability).

Beyond these three substantive changes to current District law, one other aspect of the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute may be viewed as a substantive change of law.

The revised statute, in conjunction with RCC § 22E-605, specifies that the fact that the actor was on pretrial release at the time of the offense is a circumstance element that must be proven beyond a reasonable doubt. Current D.C. Code § 23-1329 is silent as to whether OCDR requires proof beyond a reasonable doubt as to the status of being on pretrial release. The DCCA has twice recognized in recent years that the constitutional protections described in Apprendi may apply to OCDR but declined to resolve the question.[8] In contrast, the revised statute requires proof beyond a reasonable doubt as to the actor's pretrial release status at the time of the offense. By requiring proof beyond a reasonable doubt, the revised OCDR offense moots the question whether proof is required under Apprendi. This statutory clarification of the burden of proof is consistent with pre-Apprendi DCCA case law that previously recognized that the prosecution has the burden of proof for showing a defendant was on release at the time he committed the second offense.[9] Consistent with DCCA case law, however, at trial, a defendant may stipulate as to the fact that the actor was on pretrial release at the time of an offense in order to avoid potentially prejudicial evidence being brought to bear in a case.[10] This change clarifies and fills a possible gap in the revised statutes.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change District law.

The revised statute clarifies that no culpable mental state is required as to the actor's status on being on pretrial release. Current D.C. Code § 23-1329 is silent as to what, in any culpable mental states are required for the offense, but subsection (b) of the current statute expressly states that: "The giving of a warning to the person when released of the penalties imposed by this section shall not be a prerequisite to the application of this section." The revised statute eliminates this provision as unnecessary, particularly because the revised statute specifies there is no culpable mental state requirement.

RCC § 22E-608. Hate Crime Penalty Enhancement.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the hate crime penalty enhancement for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). This general penalty provides a penalty enhancement where the defendant committed the offense because of prejudice against certain perceived attributes of the target. The hate crime penalty enhancement provides additional punishment based on the nature of a person's criminal action, consistent with rulings of the Supreme Court and D.C. Court of Appeals.[1] The revised hate crime penalty enhancement replaces the bias-related crime statute definition and penalty provisions[2] in the current D.C. Code.

Subsection (a) first requires a person to have committed all the elements of a predicate offense as elsewhere defined in Title 22E, including any culpable mental states required for the predicate offense. Any offense to which the general provisions in Subtitle I of Title 22E apply is subject to this penalty enhancement, whether a misdemeanor or felony, or an offense against persons, a property offense, or otherwise. The penalty enhancement also is applicable to inchoate offenses in Title 22E (including attempts and conspiracies).

Subsection (a) also requires the predicate offense to have been committed with the purpose, in whole or part, of threatening, physically harming, damaging the property of, or causing a pecuniary loss to another person or group of persons. The terms "pecuniary loss" and "property" are defined terms in defined at RCC § 22E-701. "Purpose," a term defined at RCC § 22E-206, here means that the actor must consciously desire to threaten, physically harm, etc. the person or group of persons. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with the purpose" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. Consequently, it is not necessary to prove that the actor succeeded in threatening, physically harming, etc. the person or group of persons, and the predicate offense may involve a complainant mistakenly harmed by the actor.[3]

Subsection (a) clarifies through use of the phrase "in whole or part" that the actor's conscious desire to threaten, physically harm, etc. need not have been the sole or primary reason for the conduct.[4] However, the conscious desire to threaten, physically harm, etc.

[2] D.C. Code §§ 22-3701, 22-3703.

[3] For an example of a mistake, consider a person who throws a bottle at a person with the purpose of harming the person because of their race. If the bottle misses the target person and instead strikes and causes bodily injury to a person passing by, and the actor was reckless as to the bottle hitting the person passing by, then the assault charge against the passerby is subject to the hate crime penalty enhancement even though the complainant was not the target of the prejudiced action. (In addition, an attempted assault charge against the target also would be subject to a hate crime penalty enhancement under this fact pattern.)

must have been "because of" one of the specified types of prejudice, meaning the prejudice was a "but for"[5] cause of the actor's desire. Engaging in conduct that harms a person because of that person's sex or other characteristic does not suffice for the enhancement unless prejudice against the person was a but-for cause of the actor's motive. For example, a burglar who targets the homes of elderly persons not out of prejudice against the elderly, but because of a belief that these homes were most likely to have expensive medications that could be stolen, would not be subject to a hate crime penalty enhancement.

Subsection (a) further requires the prejudice against another that is a cause of the actor's conduct be against the perceived race, color, religion, national origin, sex, age, sexual orientation, homelessness, physical disability, political affiliation, or gender identity or expression of a targeted person or group of persons. Mistakes as to the actual existence of the race, color, religion, or other protected attribute do not limit liability as it is the actor's perception of the protected attribute that matters. In addition, the complainant harmed by actor's conduct may be chosen despite the actor's awareness that the complainant does not themselves possess one of the protected attributes.[6] The complainant who experiences the offense, the target of the harm, and the person or group of persons against whom the actor is prejudiced also need not be a particular identifiable person for the hate crime penalty enhancement to apply.[7] All that is required regarding the person or group of persons is that the actor's conduct is committed because of prejudice against the perceived race, color, etc. of a person or group of persons.

Subsection (a), through the requirement that the offense be "with the purpose", excludes liability based on unconscious[8] bias and other circumstances where the actor does 342 (D.C. 2020) ("Bias need not be the sole cause, or even the primary cause. And it may interact with several other causes in causing the end result.").

[5] For further details of the meaning of "but for" causation, see RCC § 22E-204(b) and associated commentary. See also Lucas v. United States, 240 A.3d 328 (D.C. 2020); United States v. Miller, 767 F.3d 585, 592 (6th Cir. 2014) (stating that any lesser causation standard "treads uncomfortably close to the line separating constitutional regulation of conduct and unconstitutional regulation of beliefs").

[6] For example, a hate crime penalty enhancement is applicable to an actor who destroys the office of a lawyer representing a political party when the actor's purpose was to engage in criminal damage to the property in part because of prejudice against the perceived political affiliation of the lawyer's client.

[7] For example, if other requirements are proven regarding the purpose to cause harm because of prejudice against others, it would suffice for liability that the actor painted graffiti on a church, mosque, or synagogue without understanding or desiring that the conduct would affect any particular person who is a member of that church, mosque, or synagogue.

[8] For example, while it may be relevant to the question whether a person acted with the purpose to harm another because of their prejudice against those of the opposite gender, it may not be sufficient to prove through testing (see e.g., https://implicit.harvard.edu/implicit/) that the actor is implicitly biased against another gender.

not consciously desire to cause a harm because of their prejudice against another.[9] The revised statute also requires that the actor to have a "prejudice against" a target, precluding liability for action because of positive biases.

Subsection (b) establishes that the effect of the penalty enhancement is an increase of one class to the predicate offense's otherwise applicable penalty classification except, for Class 1 offense, the authorized term of imprisonment and fine for an offense increases by 6 years and $50,000.

Subsection (c) specifies that application of an enhancement under this section is in addition to, and does not bar, application of any other penalty enhancements specified in Chapter 6 or elsewhere in the Title 22E.

Subsection (d) cross references definitions elsewhere in the revised criminal code.

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC hate crimes penalty enhancement statute changes current District law for bias-related crimes in four main ways.

First, the revised statute bases liability for the hate crime penalty enhancement on the subjective intent and personal prejudice of the actor when committing a crime. Under current D.C. Code § 22-3701(1), there is only an objective standard of whether there is a "designated act [crime] that demonstrates an accused's prejudice," with no express culpable mental state requirement for any aspect of the enhancement. Case law has not addressed whether the current statute has any subjective requirement that the actor be aware of their reasons for committing the crime. In contrast, the revised statute requires the actor to consciously desire—at least to some degree—that the crime harm the target person or persons because of prejudice. The revised statute does this by requiring proof that a crime was committed "with the purpose, in whole or part, of threatening, physically harming, damaging the property of, or causing a pecuniary loss to another person or group of persons because of prejudice…". "Purposely" is a defined term in the RCC[10] meaning the actor must consciously desire that the harm occur because of their prejudice. Applying at least a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence,[11] and insofar as the statute addresses a motive for criminal conduct it is the actor's desire (not knowledge as to their internal state) that is relevant. The approach of the revised statute avoids challenges to the statute's constitutionality that may arise under the current statute's purely objective requirement that a designated act merely "demonstrate"

[9] For example, consider a straight person who knows that he has a prejudice against gay people and is aware another person is gay. If the straight person then assaults the gay person because the latter is an Astros fan, the straight person is not subject to liability under the revised statute unless the factfinder determines that, at least in part, the assaultive conduct was committed with the conscious desire to harm the complainant because of their sexual orientation.

[10] RCC § 22E-206.

[11] See Elonis v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2001, 2009 (2015) ("[O]ur cases have explained that a defendant generally must 'know the facts that make his conduct fit the definition of the offense,' even if he does not know that those facts give rise to a crime. (Internal citation omitted)").

prejudice.[12] This change improves the clarity, completeness, and constitutionality of the revised statutes.

Second, the revised statute extends liability for the penalty enhancement in some situations to harms to a complainant who is not themselves perceived to have (or does not actually have) one of the protected characteristics. Under current D.C. Code § 22-3701, the penalty enhancement applies to a crime that "demonstrates the accused's prejudice based on the actual or perceived race…of a victim of the subject [crime]". While there is no case law on point, the plain language of the current statutory text appears to require the prejudice be based on a characteristic of the complainant. In contrast, the revised statute permits application of the penalty enhancement when the complainant of the predicate offense is not the person possessing the attribute that is the subject of the actor's prejudice—so long as the actor's criminal conduct results from the actor's desire to threaten, physically harm, etc. because of a specified type of prejudice against anyone (e.g., a third party). This change allows the hate crime penalty enhancement to apply to crimes which are motivated by one of the specified types of prejudice but the person who experiences the harm is a third party.[13] This change fills a possible gap in liability in the revised statute.

Third, the revised statute eliminates liability for relevant conduct in connection with prejudice based on marital status, personal appearance, family responsibility, and matriculation. Under current D.C. Code § 22-3701, the penalty enhancement applies to prejudice based on these four characteristics, as well as more traditional protected characteristics such as race, color, religion, national origin, and gender. The list of protected characteristics in the current bias-related crime statute tracks the list of characteristics protected under District civil law in the areas of employment, housing, etc.[14] In contrast, the revised statute applies to prejudice concerning a more limited list of characteristics, omitting marital status, personal appearance, family responsibility, and matriculation. While any prejudice based on the omitted characteristics is condemnable, in practice, criminal action in connection with these four matters may be more rare[15] and be difficult to distinguish from individual dislikes and hatred (as compared to a categorical prejudice against an identifiable class). The omission of these characteristics as separate, independent bases of liability for the hate crimes penalty enhancement does not preclude

[12] See State v. Pomianek, 110 A.3d 841, 843 (2015) ("We hold that N.J.S.A. 2C:16–1(a)(3) [N.J. bias enhancement], due to its vagueness, violates the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. In focusing on the victim's perception and not the defendant's intent, the statute does not give a defendant sufficient guidance or notice on how to conform to the law. That is so because a defendant may be convicted of a bias crime even though a jury may conclude that the defendant had no intent to commit such a crime.").

[13] For example, a hate crime penalty enhancement is applicable to an actor who destroys the office of a politically unaffiliated lawyer representing a political party when the actor's purpose was to engage in criminal damage to the property in part because of prejudice against the perceived political affiliation of the lawyer's client.

[14] See, e.g., D.C. Code § 2-1401.11 (employment prohibitions).

their evidentiary value in proving another characteristic that is recognized in the revised statute.[16] This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Fourth, the effect of the revised hate crime penalty enhancement is to raise by one class the penalty classification of the predicate offense to which the actor is otherwise subject, except, for Class 1 offense, the authorized term of imprisonment and fine for an offense increases by 6 years and $50,000. Under current D.C. Code § 22-3701 the effect of the enhancement is to raise the fine and imprisonment penalties by one and one-half times. In contrast, the revised statute generally utilizes the standardized set of penalty classifications in RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 to provide more severe, proportionate enhancement penalties. As there is no higher class than Class 1, this provides a penalty increase equal to that of the RCC repeat offender and offenses committed during release enhancements. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change District law.

First, the revised statute clarifies the existence and nature of the link between the predicate crime and the actor's prejudice as one of but-for causation. Under current D.C. Code § 22-3701 it is unclear whether there is any required connection between the crime and the actor's prejudice, or to what degree there must be a connection, because the current statute only requires that the crime "demonstrates an accused's prejudice." However, in Lucas v. United States[17] the DCCA rejected primarily on constitutional grounds that the bias enhancement in D.C. Code § 22-3701 required something less than "but-for" causation.[18] The Lucas court went on to describe but-for causation using the ordinary language "because of" as used in many other states' statutes.[19] In line with the Lucas Bias need not be the sole cause, or even the primary cause. And it may interact with several other causes in causing the end result. For purposes of the Bias-Related Crime Act, however, bias against the victim's protected characteristic must be a but-for cause for a factfinder to find that the accused committed the underlying crime.").

holding, the revised statute clearly requires a but-for causal nexus between the actor's criminal act and his or her prejudice—the crime must be committed with the purpose, in whole or part, of threatening, physically harming, etc. a person or group of persons because of the actor's prejudiced perception of another person or group of persons. The reference to "in whole or part" clarifies that there may be other purposes involved in the criminal act, but that for the enhancement to apply the actor must have engaged in the crime consciously desiring to threaten, physically harm, etc. a person because of the prejudice. RCC § 22E-204, as applied to RCC § 22E-607, further clarifies the role of prejudice compared to other motives—the prejudice must have been the "but for" cause of the commission of the predicate offense. This change improves the clarity, completeness, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Second, the revised statute clarifies what the DCCA has called the "puzzling wording"[20] of existing D.C. Code § 22-3701, which refers to a "designated act" as the predicate for the penalty enhancement. Consistent with current District law and the DCCA holding in Aboye, the revised statute clarifies that any criminal offense is subject to the hate crime penalty enhancement.

Third, the revised statute is renamed a "hate crime" penalty enhancement instead of the "bias-related crime" title currently used in D.C. Code § 22-3701. The term "hate crime" is popularly used to denote criminal acts of this nature.[21]

Fourth, the revised statute combines the multiple statutory sections currently in D.C. Code §§ 22-3701, 22-3703 into one section. The revised statute also makes conforming changes to the civil provisions to match the changes made regarding the penalty enhancement.

RCC § 22E-609. Hate Crime Penalty Enhancement Civil Provisions.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes civil provisions for the hate crime penalty enhancement for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The civil provisions concern data collection and civil legal actions related to the hate crime penalty enhancement. These civil provisions replace the civil provisions of the bias-related crime statute[1] in the current D.C. Code.

Subsection (a) provides for data collection and publication concerning the incidence of crimes subject to a hate crime penalty enhancement. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that MPD shall afford a victim the opportunity to submit a written statement in support of a claim that the conduct that occurred was a crime subject to a hate crime penalty enhancement. Paragraph (a)(2) requires the Mayor to collect and compile data on the incidence of crime subject to a hate crime penalty enhancement provided that the information gathered does not reveal a complainant's identity. Paragraph (a)(3) requires the Mayor to publish an annual summary of the data it collects and submit the summary and recommendations to the Council.

Subsection (b) provides civil liability for conduct that constitutes a hate crime penalty enhancement. Paragraph (b)(1) specifies that a civil action may be brought by any person who alleges that they have been subjected to conduct that constitutes a criminal offense committed with the purpose, in whole or part, of threatening, physically harming, damaging the property of, or causing a pecuniary loss to any person or group of persons because of prejudice against the person's or group's perceived race, color, religion, national origin, sex, age, sexual orientation, homelessness, physical disability, political affiliation, or gender identity or expression as defined in D.C. Code § 2-1401.02(12A).

Paragraph (b)(2) specifies a non-exhaustive list of remedies that shall be available in a civil action under subsection (a).

Paragraph (b)(3) specifies that an actor's parent, or a person acting in the place of a parent under civil law, who is responsible for the health, welfare, or supervision of the actor is responsible for the payment of any damages required in a civil action against an actor who is under 18 years of age, if the parent or person acting in the place of a parent under civil law contributed to the actor's conduct. The term "person acting in the place of a parent under civil law" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 and includes both persons who have put themselves in the situation of a lawful parent in practice, and those formally appointed by a court. Parents who are not legally responsible for the health, welfare, or supervision of the actor are not liable under paragraph (b)(3).

Subsection (c) cross references definitions found elsewhere in the revised criminal code.

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC hate crimes penalty enhancement civil provisions statute changes current District law for bias-related crimes in one main way.

The revised hate crimes penalty enhancement statute civil provisions describe the conduct that is the subject of data collection and a civil action in accordance with the revised elements in the hate crimes penalty enhancement, RCC § 22E-608. The current civil provisions in D.C. Code §§ 22-3702 and 22-3704 restate the elements of the current bias enhancement in D.C. Code § 22-3701, including reference to an "act that demonstrates an accused's prejudice based on the actual or perceived race, color, religion, national origin, sex, age, marital status, personal appearance, sexual orientation, gender identity or expression, family responsibilities, homelessness, physical disability, matriculation, or political affiliation." In contrast, the revised civil provisions track the articulation of elements provided in the revised hate crimes penalty enhancement statute, RCC § 22E-608, which makes multiple changes to current District law. This change clarifies the revised statutes.

Beyond this one change to current District law, two other aspects of the revised hate crime penalty enhancement civil provisions statute may constitute substantive changes of law.

First, the revised statute makes a "parent, or a person acting in the place of a parent under civil law, who is responsible for the health, welfare, or supervision of the actor," responsible for any civil damages assessed against an actor under 18 years of age. The current D.C. Code § 22-3704(c) states that the "parent of a minor shall be liable for any damages that a minor is required to pay under subsection (a) of this section, if any action or omission of the parent or legal guardian contributed to the actions of the minor." It is unclear whether the reference to a "legal guardian" in the second half of this sentence (regarding acts and omissions) means that legal guardians also have financial liability along with parents per the first half of this sentence. The terms "legal guardian" and "minor" are also undefined and there is no DCCA case law on point. It is also unclear whether any biological parent, regardless whether the parent has custody, is liable. To resolve these ambiguities, the revised statute consistently refers to "parent, or a person acting in the place of a parent under civil law, who is responsible for the health, welfare, or supervision of the actor," who is under 18 years of age. The term "person acting in the place of a parent under civil law" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and consistently applied to multiple statutes. The language excludes parents who are not at the time legally responsible for the welfare of their child. This change clarifies the revised statutes.

Second, the revised statute does not include an evidentiary standard for the civil proceeding. The current D.C. Code § 22-3704(b) states that whether a person has been subjected to conduct under the bias-related crime statute "shall be determined by reliable, probative, and substantial evidence." The statute does not define the meaning of these terms and there is no case law on point as to whether codification of this standard—particularly the use of the term "substantial"—is intended to limit the otherwise applicable rules of evidence in a civil proceeding. To resolve this ambiguity, the revised statute eliminates reference to "reliable, probative, and substantial evidence." This change clarifies the revised statute.

RCC § 22E-610. Abuse of Government Power Penalty Enhancement.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the abuse of government power penalty enhancement for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). This general penalty provides a penalty enhancement where the defendant commits an offense against persons or property offense under color or pretense of official right. The RCC abuse of government power penalty enhancement is the first codification of such an enhancement in the District.

Paragraph (a)(1) requires a person to have committed all the elements of an offense in Subtitle II or Subtitle III of the RCC, including any culpable mental states required for the predicate offense. The term "in fact" specifies that the person is strictly liable as to whether the predicate offense appears in Subtitle II or III. For example, the enhancement is applicable if a police officer is charged with the murder during a pursuit,[1] assault during (or after) an arrest,[2] criminally restraining someone without cause,[3] engaging in nonconsensual sexual conduct during a traffic stop,[4] or criminally damaging property during execution of a search warrant.[5]

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies that the person must be a public official at the time of the offense. The term "public official"[6] is defined in RCC § 22E-701. "Knowing" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and applied here means the person must be practically certain that they are one of the specified types of government actors.

Paragraph (a)(3) requires state action, specifying that the person must be acting under color or pretense of official right. The phrase "under color or pretense of official right" has the same meaning as "under color of law" in 42 U.S.C. § 1983, 18 U.S.C. § 242, and elsewhere in the United States Code.[7] Misuse of power, possessed by virtue of state law and made possible only because the actor is clothed with authority of state law, is action taken under color or pretense of official right.[8] It includes not only acts done within an official's lawful authority, but also acts done beyond the bounds of lawful authority while the official is purporting or pretending to act in the performance of their official duties.[9] For example, the enhancement may apply to a public official who violates their department's policy[10] or who is off-duty at the time of the offense.[11] The government is not required to prove that the government entity itself was a moving force behind the conduct.[12]

Subsection (b) establishes that the effect of the penalty enhancement is an increase of one class to the predicate offense's otherwise applicable penalty classification, except, for Class 1 offense, the authorized term of imprisonment and fine for an offense increases by 6 years and $50,000.

Subsection (c) specifies that application of an enhancement under this section is in addition to, and does not bar, application of any other penalty enhancements specified in Chapter 6 or elsewhere in the Title 22E.

Subsection (d) cross references definitions elsewhere in the revised criminal code.

Relation to Current District Law. Abuse of government power is a new general enhancement and, in that sense, all aspects of the revised statute are substantive changes to District law.

Both current District law and the RCC authorize additional punishment where the victim of a crime is especially vulnerable. For example, the revised homicide,[13] robbery,[14] assault,[15] and criminal threats[16] statutes provide a penalty enhancement when a victim is targeted because they are a minor, elderly person, vulnerable adult, law enforcement officer, public safety employee, transportation worker, or District official.[17] The RCC also authorizes a hate crime penalty enhancement that punishes the targeting of a victim based on race, color, religion, national origin, sex, age, sexual orientation, gender identity or RCC § 22E-701. Generally Applicable Definitions.

This section establishes definitions that apply to all provisions of Title 22E, unless otherwise specified. Each definition is discussed separately, below.

"Act" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-202.

Explanatory Note. The definition of "act" is addressed in the Commentary accompanying RCC § 22E-202. The revised definition of "act" appears in six revised definitions,[1] six revised offenses,[2] and six revised provisions.[3]

[1] "Commercial sex act" (RCC § 22E-701); "consent" (RCC § 22E-701); "deceive" (RCC § 22E-701); "personal identifying information" (RCC § 22E-701); "sadomashochistic abuse" (RCC § 22E-701); "undue influence" (RCC § 22E-701).

[2] Criminal conspiracy (RCC § 22E-303); Murder (RCC § 22E-1101); Manslaughter (RCC § 22E-1102); Blackmail (22E-1403); Forgery (RCC § 22E-2204); Parental kidnapping criminal offense (RCC § 16-1022).

[3] Proof of offense elements beyond a reasonable doubt (RCC § 22E-201); Voluntariness requirement (RCC § 22E-203); Merger of related offenses (RCC § 22E-214); Hate crime penalty enhancement civil provisions (RCC § 22E-609); Civil action (RCC § 22E-1611); Merger of related weapon offenses (RCC § 22E-4119).

"Actor" means person accused of a criminal offense.

Explanatory Note. The term "actor" is generally used in RCC offenses to avoid both the confusion that may arise from multiple references to a "person" and the potential bias that may arise from other references to the alleged perpetrator in a criminal case. Use of the term "actor" is a drafting convention that is not intended to substantively affect any provision in the RCC.

The RCC definition of "actor" replaces the current definition of "actor" in D.C. Code § 22-3001(1),[1] applicable to provisions in Chapter 30, Sexual Abuse (although the term is not used consistently).[2] The RCC definition of "actor" is used in numerous RCC provisions.

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "actor" is substantively identical to the statutory definition under current law.[3]

[1] D.C. Code § 22-3001(1) ("'Actor' means a person accused of any offense proscribed under this chapter.").

[2] Only three of the current sex offense statutes use the term "actor." First degree and second degree sexual abuse of a patient or client (D.C. Code §§ 22-3015 and 22-3016) and the aggravating circumstances statute (D.C. Code § 22-3020). Instead of "actor," the other current sex offense statutes use terms like "a person," "the defendant," or by the specific position that the defendant has, e.g., "teacher."

[3] D.C. Code § 22-3001(1).

"Ammunition" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 7-2501.01.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "ammunition" is new; the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code. The RCC definition of "ammunition" is used in the revised definitions of "class A contraband"[1] and "large capacity ammunition feeding device,"[2] the revised offenses of possession of an unregistered firearm, destructive device, or ammunition[3] and carrying a pistol in an unlawful manner,[4] and the provisions for lawful transportation of a firearm or ammunition[5] and the exclusion from liability for weapon offenses.[6]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "ammunition" is new and does not itself substantively change existing District law.

[2] RCC § 22E-701.
[3] RCC § 7-2502.01A.

"Amount of damage" means:

(A) When property is completely destroyed, the property's fair market value at the time it was destroyed; or

(B) When the property is partially damaged, either:

(i) The reasonable cost of necessary repairs if there are repairs; or

(ii) If there are no repairs, the change in the fair market value of the property due to the damage.

(C) Notwithstanding subparagraph (B) of this paragraph, if the reasonable cost of necessary repairs is greater than the fair market value of the property at the time it was partially damaged, that fair market value is the amount of damage.

Explanatory Note. The term "amount of damage" provides a standard for the valuation of damage or destruction to property in the RCC criminal damage to property offense (RCC § 22E-2503). The valuation method used generally depends on whether property is "completely destroyed" or "partially damaged." The characterizations of "complete[]" destruction and "partial" damage may be redundant, but they are used to draw clear distinctions between the different types of valuation in the RCC definition.

Subparagraph (A) provides that when the property is completely destroyed, the "amount of damage" is the property's "fair market value" at the time it was destroyed. "Fair market value" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that generally means the price which a purchaser who is willing, but not obligated to buy would pay an owner who is willing, but not obligated to sell. "Owner" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701.

If the property is only partially damaged, however, the valuation methods in subparagraph (B) are used. Under sub-subparagraph (B)(i), if there are repairs, the amount of damage is the reasonable cost of necessary repairs. Under sub-subparagraph (B)(ii), if there are no repairs, the change in the fair market value of the property due to the partial damage is used. Fair market value" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that generally means the price which a purchaser who is willing, but not obligated, to buy would pay an owner who is willing, but not obligated to sell. "Owner" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701.

Under subparagraph (C), notwithstanding the valuation methods of subparagraph (B), if the reasonable cost of necessary repairs is greater than the "fair market value" of the property at the time it was partially damaged, that fair market value is the amount of damage. For example, if an item of property has a fair market value of $100 at the time of the partial damage and there is a reasonable cost of $500 for necessary repairs, the amount of damage is $100, not $500. Fair market value" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that generally means the price which a purchaser who is willing, but not obligated, to buy would pay an owner who is willing, but not obligated to sell. "Owner" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701.

The RCC definition of "amount of damage" is new, the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code. The current malicious destruction of property statute in D.C. Code § 22-303 refers to the "value" of the property, but there is no statutory definition of this term.[1] The RCC definition of "value" replaces the reference to "value" in the current

[1] D.C. Code § 22-303 ("Whoever maliciously injures or breaks or destroys, or attempts to injure or break or destroy, by fire or otherwise, any public or private property, whether real malicious destruction of property statute. "Amount of damage" is used in the revised aggregation to determine property offense grades provision,[2] as well as in the revised offense of criminal damage to property.[3]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "amount of damage" is generally consistent with the District case law interpreting the "value" of damaged or destroyed property in the current malicious destruction of property (MDP) offense.

Subparagraph (A) codifies DCCA case law for the current MDP statute that states that the "value" of property that is completely destroyed is the fair market value of the property.[4]

Sub-subparagraph (B)(i) codifies DCCA case law that states where "repairable damage or destruction is caused to a portion or portions of a greater whole, the value of the property damaged or destroyed is to be measured by tye [sic] reasonable cost of the repairs necessitated by the malicious conduct.[3] However, not every instance of property damage that could be repaired will actually be repaired. There is no DCCA case law that establishes how to value partially damaged property when repairs could be done, but are not. Sub-subparagraph (B)(ii) establishes that in such a case, where there are no repairs, the amount of damage is the change in fair market value of the damaged property.

Subparagraph (C) establishes a final method of valuation. Notwithstanding the methods of valuation in subparagraph (B) for partial damage, "if the reasonable cost of necessary repairs is greater than the fair market value of the property at the time it was partially damaged, that fair market value is the amount of damage." Subparagraph (C) codifies DCCA case law that states it "would be unjust" to use the cost of repairs to determine the value of the property in the current MDP statute when the cost of repairs is greater than the value of the property.[5]

The RCC definition of "amount of damage" improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised criminal damage to property offense.

[5] Nichols v. United States, 343 A.2d at 342 n.3:

> We perceive one type of case in which it would be unjust to measure the value of the damaged portion by the cost of restoration. Such a situation would occur where the total value of the entire item of property involved is less than $200 [the previous felony threshold in the MPD statute], but the cost of repair would be $200 or more. For example, an old car might have a value of only $150, while the cost of repairing a damaged portion of it could exceed $200. In such a case, the maximum value chargeable should be determined by the overall value of the entire item of property before the damage occurred.

"Assault weapon" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 7-2501.01.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "assault weapon" is new; the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code. The RCC definition of "assault weapon" is used in the revised offenses of possession of a prohibited weapon or accessory[1] and unlawful transfer of a firearm,[2] as well as the civil provisions for licenses of firearms dealers.[3]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "assault weapon" is new and does not itself substantively change existing District law.

"Audiovisual recording" means a material object upon which are fixed a series of related images which are intrinsically intended to be shown by the use of machines or devices such as projectors, viewers, or electronic equipment, now existing or later developed, together with any accompanying sounds.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "audiovisual works" is new, the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code (although similar language is used to define "audiovisual works" in D.C. Code § 22-3214.01, the deceptive labeling statute).[1] The RCC definition of "audiovisual recording" replaces the current definition of "audiovisual works" in D.C. Code § 22-3214.01, applicable to the deceptive labeling statute. The RCC definition of "audiovisual recording" is used in the revised definition of "sound recording"[2] and in the revised offenses of unlawful creation or possession of a recording[3] and unlawful labeling of a recording.[4]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "audiovisual recording" is substantively identical to the statutory definition of "audiovisual works" in current law.[5]

Code § 22-3214.01(a)(1) ("'Audiovisual works' means material objects upon which are fixed a series of related images which are intrinsically intended to be shown by the use of machines or devices such as projectors, viewers, or electronic equipment, now known or later developed, together with accompanying sounds, if any, regardless of the nature of the material objects, such as films or tapes, in which the works are embodied.").

"Block" and other parts of speech, including "blocks" and "blocking," mean to render safe passage through a space difficult or impossible.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of 'blocks' is new; the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code (although a similar word, 'obstruct,' is used in the current crowding, obstructing, or incommoding statute).[1] The RCC definition of "block" is used in the revised offense of blocking a public way.[2]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "block" is new and does not substantively change District law.

As applied in the revised offense of blocking a public way, RCC § 22E-4203, the term "block" does not substantively change District law. The current crowding, obstructing, or incommoding statute[3] uses the terms "crowd," "obstruct," or "incommode" without statutorily defining the terms, and there is no case law on point. The revised blocking a public way statute uses the word "blocks" to avoid confusion with other offenses referring to broader "obstruction" conduct (e.g. with respect to a law enforcement investigation). The revised blocking a public way statute uses the term "blocks" to include all conduct that would[4] substantially interfere with motor traffic or foot traffic on public grounds. This does not include minor incommoding that poses no risk to passers-by, such as standing or sitting on part of a sidewalk, causing pedestrians to step around. However, blocking does include conduct that would render the public way impassable, but for the intervention of a law enforcement officer. Whether a hazard is reasonable or unreasonable is a question for the factfinder. Use of the term "blocks" applies consistent, clearly articulated definitions and improves the clarity of the revised offense.

"Bodily injury" means physical pain, physical injury, illness, or impairment of physical condition.

Explanatory Note. The term "bodily injury" is the lowest of the three levels of bodily injury defined in the RCC. No minimum threshold of pain is specified for "physical pain." Examples of a "physical injury" may include a scratch, a laceration, a bruise, an abrasion, or a contusion. "Illness" may include a viral, bacterial, or other physical sickness or physical disease.[1] "Impairment of physical condition" is intended to be construed broadly.[2] The definition does not specify a minimum threshold of impairment. Subject to causation requirements, the definition of "bodily injury" may include indirect causes of pain, illness, or impairment, such as exposing another individual to inclement weather or administration of a drug or narcotic that has a negative effect on physical condition.

The RCC definition of "bodily injury" replaces the current statutory definition of "bodily injury" in D.C. Code § 22-3001(2),[3] applicable to provisions in Chapter 30, Sexual Abuse, and undefined references to "bodily injury" in the current child cruelty,[4] obstruction of a police report,[5] and animal cruelty statutes.[6] Similar terms are used in other Title 22

Jarvis*, 665 N.W.2d 518, 521-22 (Minn. 2003) (concluding that "any impairment of physical condition" in the definition of "bodily harm" means "any injury that weakens or damages an individual's physical condition" and finding the evidence sufficient for bodily harm when the complaining witness involuntarily ingested drugs), and Hanic v. State, 406 N.E.2d 335, 337-38 (Ind. Ct. App. 1980) (finding that red marks and bruises on a woman's arms and "minor scratches" on her breast area were sufficient evidence for "bodily injury."), with Harris v. State, 965 A.2d 691, 694 (Del. 2009) (holding that a red mark on complainant's skin from being elbowed to the forehead and scratches on the complainant's knee did not constitute impairment of physical condition as required by the definition of "physical injury" because they "did not reduce the [complainant's] ability to use the affected parts of his body."), and State v. Higgins, 165 Or.App. 442 (2000) (holding that "scratches and scrapes that go unnoticed by the victim, that are not accompanied by pain and that do not result in the reduction of one's ability to use the body or a bodily organ for any period of time, do not constitute an impairment of physical condition" as required by the definition of "physical injury.").

statutes,[7] and there is a definition[8] and several uses[9] of "serious bodily injury" in the current D.C. Code. The RCC definition of "bodily injury" is used in the revised defenses for defense of self or another person[10] and duress,[11] in the revised provision for admission of evidence in sexual assault and related cases,[12] in the RCC definitions of "serious bodily injury"[13] and "significant bodily injury,"[14] and in sixteen revised offenses.[15]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "bodily injury" makes two clear changes to the statutory definition of "bodily injury" in D.C. Code § 22-3001(2).[16] First, the RCC definition of "bodily injury" does not require "significant" pain. Eliminating the current limitation of "significant" pain may help avoid difficult and subjective assessments[17] as to the appropriate degree of pain and improves the clarity of the revised definition. Second, the RCC definition of "bodily injury" no longer specifically includes loss or impairment of a "mental faculty," although such an injury may be included to the extent that it otherwise satisfies the definition of "bodily injury." It is unclear whether "mental faculty" refers to the physical condition of the brain or more generally to psychological distress, and deleting it improves the consistency of the revised definition. The remaining changes to the current sex offense definition of "bodily injury" are clarificatory.[18] Despite the substantive revisions to the definition of "bodily injury," it is unclear whether the RCC definition actually changes current District law for the current sexual abuse offenses due to the broad definition of "force" for these offenses. The commentary to the RCC sexual assault offense (RCC § 22E-1301) discusses further the effect of the revised definition of "bodily injury" on current District law.

The RCC definition of "bodily injury" is generally consistent with the limited District case law interpreting the term "bodily injury" in non-sexual offenses, where there is no statutory definition of the term.[19] This limited case law does not generally discuss the meaning of the term. However, the RCC definition of "bodily injury" results in changes to current District law as applied to particular offenses. For example, the RCC assault statute (RCC § 22E-1202) is graded, in part, based in part on whether "bodily injury" was inflicted. Physical contacts that do not cause physical pain or otherwise satisfy the RCC definition of "bodily injury" may be criminalized by the RCC offensive physical contact offense (RCC § 22E-1205), whereas current District law would criminalize these physical contacts as assault.[20] However, there may be a question in a particular case as to whether the pain, illness, injury, or impairment of condition that is inflicted is so minor that the judicial dismissal for minimal or unforeseen hams provision (RCC § 22E-215) may apply. The commentaries to relevant RCC offenses against persons discuss further the effect of the RCC definition of "bodily injury" on current District law. The revised definition of "bodily injury" improves the consistency and proportionality of revised offenses.

The commentaries to relevant RCC offenses against persons discuss further the effect of the RCC definition of "bodily injury" on current District law.

[18] The RCC definition of "bodily injury" makes several non-substantive clarifications to the current definition of "bodily injury" in D.C. Code § 22-3001(2). The references to impairment of a "bodily member" or "organ," and "physical disfigurement" in the current definition are deleted as superfluous to the more inclusive term of "impairment of physical condition" in the RCC definition. Similarly, the current definition's references to "disease, sickness" are covered by the RCC definition's reference to "illness." Finally, the RCC definition specifies that "physical injury" is included.

[19] See, e.g., Jones v. United States, 67 A.3d 547, 548, 550 (finding the evidence sufficient for second degree child cruelty when the child sustained a "large raised bump on her head.").

[20] Under current District law, mere offensive physical contact is sufficient for assault liability. See, e.g., Mahaise v. United States, 722 A.2d 29, 30 (D.C. 1988) ("A battery is any unconsented touching of another person. Since an assault is simply an attempted battery, every completed battery necessarily includes an assault. Appellant's statement that he removed the phone from the complainant's hand and then took her cigarette from her other hand and extinguished it is thus an admission, at least prima facie, of two separate assaultive acts".") (citing Ray v. United States, 575 A.2d 1196, 1199 (D.C. 1990)). However, this case law, and the scope assault, is in active litigation in the DCCA. A panel of the DCCA recently ruled (in an opinion since vacated pending an en banc ruling) that unwanted touchings do not necessarily constitute "force or violence" necessary for assault liability. Perez Hernandez v. United States, 207 A.3d 594, 604 (D.C.), vacated, 207 A.3d 605 (D.C. 2019).

"Building" means a structure affixed to land that is designed to contain one or more natural persons.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "building" is new; the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code (although undefined references to "building" are in several current property offenses[1]). The RCC definition of "building" is used in the revised definitions of "correctional facility," "dwelling," "halfway house," and "secure juvenile detention facility," as well as the revised offenses of arson,[2] reckless burning,[3] trespass,[4] burglary,[5] blocking a public way,[6] possession of a stun gun,[7] and carrying an air or spring gun,[8] and the civil provisions for licenses of firearms dealers.[9]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "building" is new and does not substantively change District law.

"Bump stock" means any object that, when installed in or attached to a firearm, increases the rate of fire by using energy from the recoil of the firearm to generate a reciprocating action that facilitates repeated activation of the trigger.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "bump stock" replaces the current definition of "bump stock" in D.C. Code § 22-4501, applicable to provisions in Chapter 45, Weapons and Possession of Weapons. The RCC definition of "bump stock" is used in the revised offense of possession of a prohibited weapon or accessory,[1] as well as the revised civil provisions for taking and destruction of dangerous articles.[2]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "bump stock" is identical to the statutory definition under current law.[3]

"Business yard" means securely fenced or walled land where goods are stored or merchandise is traded.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "business yard" is new; the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code (although similar language is used in the current burglary statute[1]). The RCC definition of "business yard" is used in the revised offense of burglary.[2]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "business yard" is new and does not substantively change District law.

As applied in the revised burglary statute, the term "business yard" may substantively change District law. The current burglary statute uses the phrase "any yard where any lumber, coal, or other goods or chattels are deposited and kept for the purpose of trade."[3] Case law has clarified that the phrase is limited to sites that store items for the purpose of a future commercial transaction.[4] The revised code uses the words "goods" and "merchandise," which are more common in modern English usage and broadly encompass lumber, coal, and chattels for trade. The revised code specifies that the yard must be walled or fenced, so as to distinguish a yard from open land. This change applies consistent, clearly articulated definitions and improves the clarity of the revised offenses.

"Check" means any written instrument for payment of money by a financial institution.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "check" is new, the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code (although undefined references to "check" are in several current offenses[1]). The RCC definition of "check" is used in the revised definition of "value,"[2] as well as the revised offense of check fraud.[3]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "check" is new and does not substantively change District law. There is no case law defining "check" where the term is used in current property offenses.

"Class A contraband" means:

(A) A dangerous weapon or an imitation dangerous weapon;
(B) Ammunition or an ammunition clip;
(C) A flammable liquid or explosive powder;
(D) A knife, screwdriver, ice pick, box cutter, needle, or any other tool capable of cutting, slicing, stabbing, or puncturing a person;
(E) A shank or a homemade knife;
(F) Tear gas, pepper spray, or any other substance that is designed or specifically adapted for causing temporary blindness or incapacitation;
(G) A tool that is designed or specifically adapted for picking locks, cutting chains, cutting glass, bypassing an electronic security system, or bypassing a locked door;
(H) Handcuffs, security restraints, handcuff keys, or any other object that is designed or specifically adapted for locking, unlocking, or releasing handcuffs or security restraints;
(I) A hacksaw, hacksaw blade, wire cutter, file, or any other object or tool that is designed or specifically adapted for cutting through metal, concrete, or plastic;
(J) Rope; or
(K) A law enforcement officer's uniform, medical staff clothing, or any other uniform.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "Class A contraband" replaces the current definition of "Class A contraband" in D.C. Code § 22-2603.01(2)(A),[1] applicable to the unlawful possession of contraband offense and related provisions. The terms "dangerous weapon," "imitation dangerous weapon," and "law enforcement officer" that are used in the definition of "Class A contraband" are defined elsewhere in RCC § 22E-701. The RCC definition of "Class A contraband" is used in the revised offense of correctional facility contraband.[2]

[1] D.C. Code § 22-2603.01(2)(A) ("'Class A Contraband' means: (i) Any item, the mere possession of which is unlawful under District of Columbia or federal law; (ii) Any controlled substance listed or described in Unit A of Chapter 9 of Title 48, or any controlled substance scheduled by the Mayor pursuant to § 48-902.01; (iii) Any dangerous weapon or object which is capable of such use as may endanger the safety or security of a penal institution or secure juvenile residential facility or any person therein, including,: (I) A firearm or imitation firearm, or any component of a firearm; (II) Ammunition or ammunition clip; (III) A stun gun, as defined in § 7-2501.01(17A); (IV) Flammable liquid or explosive powder; (V) A knife, screwdriver, ice pick, box cutter, needle, or any other object or tool that can be used for cutting, slicing, stabbing, or puncturing a person; (VI) A shank or homemade knife; or (VII) Tear gas, pepper spray, or other substance that can be used to cause temporary blindness or incapacitation; (iv) Any object designed or intended to facilitate an escape; (v) Handcuffs, security restraints, handcuff keys, or any other object designed or intended to lock, unlock, or release handcuffs or security restraints; (vi) A hacksaw, hacksaw blade, wire cutter, file, or any other object or tool that can be used to cut through metal, concrete, or plastic; (vii) Rope; or (viii) When possessed by, given to, or intended to be given to an inmate or securely detained juvenile, a correctional officer's uniform, law enforcement officer's uniform, medical staff clothing, any other uniform, or civilian clothing. (B) The term "Class A contraband" does not include any object or substance which a person is authorized to possess in the penal institution or secure juvenile residential facility by the director of the penal institution or secure juvenile residential facility and that is in the form or quantity for which it was authorized.").

[2] RCC § 22E-3403.

The RCC defines "Class A contraband" to include contraband that may be used to cause an injury or facilitate an escape more readily than other prohibited items.

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "Class A contraband" makes several substantive changes to the current definition of "Class A contraband" in D.C. Code § 22-2603.01(2).

First, the revised definition does not classify controlled substances as Class A contraband. The current D.C. Code definition of "Class A contraband" includes "[a]ny controlled substance listed or described in Unit A of Chapter 9 of Title 48 [§ 48-901.01 et seq.] or any controlled substance scheduled by the Mayor pursuant to § 48-902.01."[3] In contrast, the revised code classifies contraband according to the danger presented into: (A) weapons and escape implements; and (B) alcohol, drugs, drug paraphernalia, and cellular phones. This change improves the proportionality of the revised definition.

Second, the revised definition does not classify clothing, other than uniforms, as Class A contraband. The current D.C. Code definition of "Class A contraband" includes "civilian clothing."[4] In contrast, the revised definition includes a law enforcement officer's uniform, medical staff clothing, or any other uniform. The term "law enforcement officer" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 to include Department of Corrections employees, probation officers, and others. If disallowed by a facility, possession of civil clothing may still subject an incarcerated person to administrative sanctions. This change improves the proportionality of the revised definition.

Third, the revised definition does not classify unlawful items other than weapons as Class A contraband. The current D.C. Code definition of "Class A contraband" includes "[a]ny item, the mere possession of which is unlawful under District of Columbia or federal law."[5] There is no case law on point. However, the language would seem to include items that pose no apparent threat to the safety or order of a correctional facility.[6] In contrast, the revised definition of Class A contraband is limited to items that pose a clear security or escape risk. This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised definition.

Fourth, the current statute also classifies as Class A contraband, "Any object designed or intended to facilitate an escape."[7] There is no case law on point. In contrast, the revised code refers more specifically to "A tool created or specifically adapted for picking locks, cutting chains, cutting glass, bypassing an electronic security system, or bypassing a locked door." The revised language creates a more objective basis for identifying contraband—rather than making the subjective intent to facilitate escape the sole criterion for whether any object is Class A contraband—and is consistent with language in the revised possession of tools to commit property crime offense.[8] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised definition.

"Class B contraband" means:

(A) Any controlled substance or marijuana;

(B) Any alcoholic liquor or beverage;

(C) A hypodermic needle or syringe or other item that is designed or specifically adapted for administering an unlawful controlled substance; or

(D) A portable electronic communication device or an accessory to a portable electronic communication device.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "Class B contraband" replaces the current definition of "Class B contraband" in D.C. Code § 22-2603.01(3)(A),[1] applicable to the unlawful possession of contraband offense and related provisions. The term "controlled substance" used in the definition of "Class B contraband" is defined elsewhere in RCC § 22E-701. The RCC definition of "Class B contraband" is used in the revised offense of correctional facility contraband.[2]

The RCC defines "Class B contraband" to include contraband that may impede a facility's ability to provide an orderly, safe, and humane environment more readily than other items prohibited under administrative regulations. The phrase "item that is designed or specifically adapted for administering an unlawful controlled substance" means an object that could be used to assist a user to introduce the drug into the body.[3] "Accessory" refers to device or devices that "enable or facilitate the use of a mobile telephone or other portable communication device. It is difficult to be exhaustive in light of changing technology, but accessories include chargers and batteries."[4]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "Class B contraband" makes one substantive change to the current definition of "Class B contraband" in D.C. Code § 22-2603.01(3)(A): it reclassifies controlled substances, including marijuana,[5] which are classified as Class A contraband under current law[6] as Class B contraband. The current statute roughly classifies contraband as (A) any item prohibited by law, weapons, escape implements, and drugs; (B) alcohol, drug paraphernalia, and cellular phones; and (C) any item prohibited by rule (only administrative sanctions are authorized for Class C contraband). In contrast, the revised code classifies contraband according to the danger presented into: (A) weapons and escape implements; and (B) alcohol, drugs, drug paraphernalia, and cellular phones. This change improves the proportionality of the revised definition.

"Close relative" means a parent, grandparent, sibling, child, grandchild, aunt, or uncle.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "close relative" is new, the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code. The RCC definition of "close relative" is used in the revised kidnapping[1] and criminal restraint[2] offenses.

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "close relative" is new and does not substantively change District law.

As applied in the revised kidnapping statute, the term "close relative" substantively changes current District law in one main way. The current kidnapping statute contains an exception to liability "in the case of a minor, by a parent thereof," but otherwise does not address kidnapping by close relatives.[3] In contrast, the revised statute codifies a defense to kidnapping if the accused is a "close relative" of the complainant, acted with intent to assume custody of the complainant and did not cause bodily injury or threaten to cause bodily injury. This change improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

[1] RCC § 22E-1401.
[2] RCC § 22E-1402.
[3] D.C. Code § 22-2001.

"Coercive threat" means a communication that, unless the complainant complies, any person will do any of the following:

(A) Engage in conduct that, in fact, constitutes:

(i) An offense against persons under Subtitle II of this title; or

(ii) A property offense under Subtitle III of this title;

(B) Take or withhold action as a public official, or cause a public official to take or withhold action;

(C) Accuse a person of a crime;

(D) Expose a secret, publicize an asserted fact, or distribute a photograph, video or audio recording, regardless of the truth or authenticity of the secret, fact, or item, that tends to subject another person to, or perpetuate:

(i) Hatred, contempt, ridicule, or other significant injury to personal reputation; or

(ii) Significant injury to credit or business reputation;

(E) Notify a federal, state, or local government agency or official of, or publicize, another person's immigration or citizenship status;

(F) Restrict a person's access to either a controlled substance that the person owns or a prescription medication that the person owns; or

(G) Cause any harm that is sufficiently serious, under all the circumstances, to compel a reasonable person of the same background and in the same circumstances as the complainant to comply.

Explanatory Note. The RCC defines "coercive threat" as consisting of seven forms of threatened behavior—six per se types of "coercive threat" and one flexible standard of what constitutes a "coercive threat." A person making a coercive threat may communicate that the person will carry out the coercive conduct himself or herself, but that need not be the case.[1] A coercive threat requires some form of communiation. Communication requires not only that the actor take action to convey a message, but also that the message is received and understood by another person.[2] No precise words are necessary to convey a threat; it may be bluntly spoken, or done by innuendo or suggestion.[3] The verb "communicates" is intended to be broadly construed, encompassing all speech[4] and other

[1] For example, a person may compel another person to perform labor by threatening that a third party will injure the laborer if he or she refuses to perform.

[2] DCCA case law clarifies in Evans v. United States, 779 A.2d 891, 894-95 (D.C. 2001), and the RCC criminal threats statute recognizes, that for there to be a communication of a threat the recipient must be able to access or comprehend it, at the most basic level. For example, there is no communication of a threat if the content of the threat is in a language that the recipient does not comprehend.

[3] Griffin v. United States, 861 A.2d 610, 616 (D.C. 2004) (citing Clark v. United States, 755 A.2d 1026, 1030 (D.C. 2000)).

[4] The term "speech" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and means oral or written language, symbols, or gestures.

messages,[5] which includes gestures or other conduct,[6] that are received and understood by another person.

Subparagraph (A) specifies that coercive threats include communicating that any person will engage in conduct that constitutes a criminal offense against persons as defined in Subtitle II of Title 22E, or a property offense as defined in Subtitle III of Title 22E. This form of coercive threat does not include threats to commit any other types of criminal offenses.[7] The use of "in fact" indicates that no culpable mental state is required as to whether the threatened conduct constitutes an offense against persons or a property offense, or a criminal offense. However, all the elements of the predicate offense against persons or property offense, including their culpable mental states, must be proven.

Subparagraph (B) specifies that coercive threats include communicating that any person will take or withhold action as a public official, or to cause a public official to take or withhold action. This form of coercive threat includes threats to cite someone for violation of a regulation, make an arrest, or deny the award of a government contract or permit. The term "public official" is defined in RCC § 22E-701, and means "a government employee, government contractor, law enforcement officer, or public official as defined in D.C. Code § 1-1161.01(47).

Subparagraph (C) specifies that coercive threats include communicating that any person will accuse another person of a crime. Under this form of coercive threat it is immaterial whether the accusation is accurate.

Subparagraph (D) specifies that coercive threats include communicating that any person will expose a secret, publicize an asserted fact, or distribute a photograph, video or audio recording, regardless of the truth or authenticity of the secret, fact, or item, that tends to subject another person to, or perpetuate hatred, contempt, ridicule, or other significant injury to personal reputation, or a significant injury to credit or business reputation. This subparagraph does not require that the asserted secret or fact be true or false. This form of "coercive threat" is intended only to include threats to expose secrets or assert facts that would have traditionally constituted blackmail.[8] There is one possible exception, in that this form of coercive threat also includes threats to expose secrets, assert facts, etc., that

[5] A person may communicate through non-verbal conduct such as displaying a weapon. See State v. Murphy, 545 N.W.2d 909, 915 (Minn. 1996) ("Many physical acts considered in context communicate a terroristic threat. We may find our examples in the case law, such as drawing a finger across one's throat or discharging a firearm over the telephone; in the movies, such as boiling a rabbit on the stove in the tranquil setting of former paramour's new family home, or placing a severed horse's head in a bed; or as here, depositing dead animals at a residence or planting a fake bomb. Life is replete with such examples, and whatever the source, the principle is the same: physical acts communicate a threat that its originator will act according to its tenor." (Internal quotations omitted.)).

[6] For example, if a person consistently beats people who refuse to comply with his demands, this pattern of conduct may constitute a coercive threat when that person makes similar demands of others. In addition ongoing infliction of harm may constitute a coercive threat, if it communicates that harm will continue in the future.

[7] For example, threatening to commit a controlled substance offense would not constitute coercion.

[8] D.C. Code § 22-3252.

would tend to perpetuate hatred, contempt, ridicule, or other significant injury to personal reputation. A person who is already subject to hatred, contempt, and ridicule may still be the target of this form of coercive threat.[9]

Subparagraph (E) specifies that coercive threats include communicating that any person will notify a federal, state, or local government agency or official of, or to publicize, another person's immigration or citizenship status. The definition of "coercive threat" includes these threats because of the unique, often life-changing consequences stemming from a person's immigration or citizenship status becoming publicized.

Subparagraph (F) specifies that coercive threats include communicating that any person will restrict a person's access to a controlled substance that the person owns, or to prescription medication that the person owns. As this form of coercive threat requires that the other person already owns the controlled substance or prescription medication, a threat to refuse to sell or provide a controlled substance or prescription medication does not constitute a coercive threat under this subparagraph.[10]

Subparagraph (G) specifies that coercive threats include communicating that any person will cause any harm that is sufficiently serious under all the circumstances to compel a reasonable person of the same background and in the same circumstances as the complainant to comply. This is a catch-all provision intended to capture potential harms that are not per se included in the RCC's coercive threats definition. In determining whether the harm was sufficiently serious, fact finders should consider the nature of the harm, the complainant's particular circumstances and background, and the conduct demanded by the defendant. A threat may be coercive to a particular complainant, but not another.[11] In addition, harms that may constitute a coercive threat when used to compel certain conduct may not necessarily constitute a coercive threat when used to compel different conduct.[12]

The RCC definition of "coercive threat" is new, the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code (although the close-related term "coercion" is currently defined for the human trafficking statutes[13] and other statutes[14] use the undefined term "coercion"). The RCC definition of "coercive threats" replaces the current definition of "coercion" in [9] For example, even if it is well known that a person has engaged in numerous acts of infidelity, a threat to reveal an additional act of infidelity may still constitute a coercive threat under this paragraph. Although there is no clear DCCA case law on point, it is possible threats to reveal this type of information may not have constituted blackmail at common law.

[10] However, in some cases refusal to sell or provide a controlled substance of prescription medication may constitute a coercive threat under the catch-all provision set forth in subparagraph (G).

[11] For example, threatening to leave a small child alone in an unknown part of a city may constitute coercion, but would not if the same threat were made to an adult.

[12] For example, some harms that would compel a reasonable person to perform basic tasks may not necessarily be sufficient to compel a reasonable person to engage in sexual activity.

D.C. Code § 22-1831(3),[15] applicable to provisions in Chapter 18A, Human Trafficking. The RCC definition of "coercive threat" is used in the revised definition of "effective consent"[16] and in the revised offenses of sexual assault,[17] kidnapping,[18] criminal restraint,[19] forced labor,[20] forced commercial sex,[21] trafficking in labor,[22] trafficking in forced commercial sex,[23] commercial sex with a trafficked person,[24] and extortion.[25]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "coercive threats" makes several substantive, possibly substantive, and clarificatory changes to the current definition of "coercion" in D.C. Code § 22-1831(3). As applied to the revised sexual assault offense in RCC § 22E-1301, the RCC definition of "coercive threats" may change current law.

The revised coercive threat definition makes two changes that constitute substantive changes to current District law in D.C. Code § 22-1831(3).

First, the revised "coercive threat" definition excludes fraud, deception, or causing a person to believe he or she is property of another. The current D.C. Code coercion definition for human trafficking offenses includes as one form "fraud or deception."[26] Similarly, the current D.C. Code states that coercion includes "knowingly participating in conduct with the intent to cause a person to believe that he or she is the property of a person or business and that would cause a reasonable person in that person's circumstance to believe that he or she is the property of a person or business."[27] There is no DCCA case law interpreting the meaning of these provisions. In contrast, the RCC definition of coercive threat does not specifically address frauds or deceptions. Leading someone to believe that they are property of another appears to be a particular form of deception.[28] Although deceiving another person for personal gain is wrongful and may be subject to criminal liability,[29] it is not equivalent to the coercive behavior listed in this definition when it is the sole form of wrongdoing.[30] This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised statute.

Second, the revised "coercive threat" definition includes communicating that any person will "restrict a person's access either to a controlled substance that the person owns or a prescription medication that the person owns." The current D.C. Code definition of "coercion" for human trafficking offenses refers to "facilitating or controlling" a person's access to "an addictive or controlled substance" or "restricting a person's access to prescription medication." There is no DCCA case law interpreting the meaning of these terms. In contrast, the revised definition of coercive threats is narrower in three respects. First, this form of coercive threat requires that the defendant restricts another person's access to a controlled substance or prescription medication. This form of coercive threat does not include facilitating or controlling a person's access to controlled substances.[31] Second, this form of coercive threat requires that the accused threaten to restrict a person's access to a controlled substance that the person owns, or to a prescription medication that the person owns. This form of coercive threat excludes a refusal to sell or provide a controlled substance or prescription medication that the other person does not already own. Third, this form of coercive threat does not include limiting a person's access to addictive but legal substances like alcohol and tobacco. Including threats to restrict access to any addictive substance as a form of coercive threat creates the possibility of criminalizing conduct that is comparatively less harmful than other forms of coercive threats included in the revised definition.[32] These changes improve the clarity and proportionality of the revised statute.

[28] As a matter of practice, in most cases in which a reasonable person would believe that he or she was the property of another, that person may also be subject to threats of physical injury or other form of abuse that would satisfy other forms of coercive threat included in the revised definition.

[29] E.g., using deception to cause another person to provide labor is punishable under the RCC's revised fraud statute. RCC § 22E-2201.

[30] Deception may be a critical part of a human trafficking scheme involving other types of coercive threats that would trigger liability. For example, a person may deceive a person with the false promise of high wages to entice a person to begin providing labor, and then use threats of bodily harm to compel the person to continue providing labor.

[31] However, a person can satisfy this subparagraph by facilitating or controlling a person's access a controlled substance, when doing so constitutes an implicit threat that future access will be limited. For example, a person may behave coercively by giving heroin to a heroin addict if by doing so he or she implicitly threatens that access to heroin will be limited in the future.

[32] For example, under current law inducing a person who is a regular tobacco user to perform any service by offering cigarettes in exchange arguably may constitute forced labor, an offense punishable by up to 20 years imprisonment. In addition, although alcohol is an addictive substance, it is not a controlled substance and is relatively easier to obtain. Restricting a person's access to alcohol is not as inherently coercive as restricting a

In addition, the revised coercive threat definition makes six changes that may constitute substantive changes to current District law in D.C. Code § 22-1831(3).

First, the revised "coercive threat" definition includes communicating that any person will engage in "any criminal offense against persons as defined in subtitle II of Title 22E, or a property offense as defined in subtitle III of Title 22E" or any "harm that is sufficiently serious, under all the surrounding circumstances, to compel a reasonable person of the same background and in the same circumstances to comply." The current D.C. Code definition of "coercion" for human trafficking offenses includes "force, threats of force, physical restraint, or threats of physical restraint,"[33] conduct that generally would constitute the criminal offenses of assault or kidnapping. The current D.C. Code also references any scheme intended to cause a person to believe that someone would suffer "serious harm or physical restraint."[34] The current definition of "coercion" also includes "serious harm or threats of serious harm,"[35] and "serious harm" is defined, in relevant part, as "harm . . . that is sufficiently serious, under all the surrounding circumstances, to compel a reasonable person of the same background and in the same circumstances to perform or to continue to perform labor, services, or commercial sex acts to avoid incurring that harm."[36] It is unclear under the current D.C. Code whether threatening to commit other offenses against persons or property offenses would constitute "serious harm." There is no DCCA case law interpreting the meaning of these terms. However, the revised definition clarifies that threats to commit a criminal offense against persons or a property offense suffices to establish a coercive threat, while at the same time preserving an explicit catch-all provision for other sufficiently serious harms. These changes improve the clarity and consistency[37] of the revised statutes.

Second, the revised coercive threat definition does not specifically include "force," "physical restraint," or "serious harm." The revised coercive threat definition includes communicating that another person will "commit any criminal offense against persons as defined in subtitle II of Title 22E[.]" Although the use of force, physical restraint, and serious harm may constitute offenses against persons[38], the revised definition requires that the accused communicates that another person will commit a criminal offense against persons or to inflict serious harm. Committing an offense against persons without an implicit or explicit threat of further criminal activity would not constitute a coercive threat under the revised definition. However, in almost any case in which a person coerces a person by using force or physical restraint, there is at least an implicit threat to commit an additional crime against persons. This change clarifies and improves the consistency of the revised statute.

Third, the revised coercive threat definition specifically includes communicating that an person will notify a federal, state, or local government agency or official of, or person's access to a controlled substance, as it is relatively easy for a person to obtain alcohol by other means.

publicize, another person's immigration or citizenship status. The current D.C. Code coercion definition does not explicitly refer to threats to reveal a person's immigration or citizenship status. However, such conduct or threats may constitute "serious harm" as that term is used in the current human trafficking offenses,[39] or may constitute "[t]he abuse or threatened abuse of law or legal process" which is included in the current coercion definition.[40] There is no relevant case law interpreting what constitutes "serious harm." The revised definition clarifies that any threat to notify a federal, state, or local government agency or official of, or publicize, another person's immigration or citizenship status constitutes a coercive threat. This change clarifies and improves the consistency of the revised statute.

Fourth, the revised definition includes communicating that any person will "expose a secret, publicize an asserted fact, or distribute a photograph, video or audio recording, regardless of the truth or authenticity of the secret, fact, or item, that tends to subject another person to, or perpetuate: Hatred, contempt, ridicule, or other significant injury to personal reputation; or significant injury to credit or business reputation." The current D.C. Code "coercion" definition does not explicitly refer threats to cause significant reputational harms. However, such threats may constitute "serious harm" as that term is used in the current human trafficking offenses.[41] There is no relevant case law interpreting what constitutes "serious harm." The revised definition clarifies that such severe reputational harms constitutes a coercive threat. This change clarifies and improves the consistency of the revised statute.

Fifth, the revised coercive threat definition does not specifically include "the abuse or threatened abuse of law or legal process." The current D.C. Code definition of "coercion" for human trafficking offenses includes "the abuse or threatened abuse of law or legal process."[42] There is no relevant case law, or legislative history that provides examples of what would constitute abuse of law or legal process. The RCC definition of coercive threat omits specific reference to the abuse of law or legal process, although such conduct may still constitute a coercive threat if it involves threats to accuse a person of a crime, threats to reveal a person's immigration or citizenship status, or other harm sufficiently serious to compel a reasonable person to comply.[43] This change improves the clarity of the revised offense.

[42] D.C. Code § 22-1831(3)(C).

[43] Whether threats to abuse law or legal process would satisfy the requirements of the catch-all provision would be determined on a case by case basis. It is possible that only certain abuses of law or legal process would be sufficiently harmful given the surrounding circumstances to constitute coercion. For example, a threat to file a suit in small claims court for very minor damages against a wealthy complainant may not necessarily be sufficiently harmful to satisfy the catch-all provision. Similarly, it is unclear whether threatening to file a civil noise complaint would be sufficiently coercive to satisfy the revised definition's catch-all provision.

Sixth, the revised coercive threat definition does not explicitly include making a "wrongful threat of economic injury." The current extortion statute[47] includes the phrase "wrongful threat of economic injury," but the phrase is not defined in the statute, and there is no relevant DCCA case law. The legislative history notes that this language was "not intended to cover the threat of labor strikes or other labor activities," or "consumer boycotts,"[44] but is intended to cover "a leader of an organization [who] threatens to strike or boycott in order to extort anything of value for his personal benefit, unrelated to the interest of the group he represents."[49] However, the RCC's definition of "coercive threats" does not specifically include a "wrongful threat of economic injury." While the revised coercive threat definition is not intended to include threats of labor strikes or consumer boycotts, certain types of threats of economic injury may still satisfy the catch-all provision. However, because it is not clear exactly what constitutes a "wrongful threat of economic injury under current law," it is unclear whether the catch-all provision would necessarily cover all such threats. This change clarifies and improves the consistency of the revised statute.

The remaining changes to the revised coercive threat definition are clarificatory and are not intended to change current District law in D.C. Code § 22-1831(3).

First, the revised coercive threat definition does not specifically include "threats of force" or "threats of physical restraint." This change is not intended to change current law. The revised coercive threat definition includes communicating that another person will "commit any criminal offense against persons as defined in subtitle II of Title 22E[.]" Threats of force and threats of physical restraint involve threatening to engage in a criminal offense against persons.[45]

Second, the revised coercive threat definition does not specifically include "threats of serious harm." Omitting this language is not intended to change current District law. The revised coercive threat definition includes "any harm that is sufficiently serious, under all the surrounding circumstances, to compel a reasonable person of the same background and in the same circumstances as the complainant to comply." The language in this catch-all provision in the revised coercive threat definition is intended to include threats of all harms that constitute threats of "serious harm" under current law.[46]

Third, the revised coercive threat definition does not specifically include "any scheme, plan, or pattern intended to cause a person to believe that if that person did not perform labor or services, that person or another person would suffer serious harm or [45] Force, threats of force, physical restraint, or threats of physical restraint could constitute assault, criminal threats, kidnapping, or criminal restraint.

[46] The DCCA has never issued an opinion interpreting the definition of "serious harm" under current law. However, federal courts interpreting analogous provisions in federal human trafficking statutes have approved jury instructions defining "serious harm" as "any consequences, whether physical or non-physical, that are sufficient under all of the surrounding circumstances to compel or coerce a reasonable person in the same situation to provide or to continue providing labor or services." United States v. Bradley, 390 F.3d 145, 150 (1st Cir. 2004) cert. granted, judgment vacated on other grounds, 545 U.S. 1101, 125 S. Ct. 2543, 162 L. Ed. 2d 271 (2005).

physical restraint[.]" Omitting this language is not intended to change current District law. The revised coercive threat definition includes communicating that any person will commit a criminal offense against persons, or cause any harm sufficiently serious to compel a reasonable person to comply. An explicit or implicit communication may be established by a single act, or a scheme, plan, or pattern of behavior.[47]

As applied to the revised sexual assault offense in RCC § 22E-1301, the RCC definition of "coercive threats" may change current law. The current D.C. Code sexual abuse statutes do not use the term "coercion," but second degree and fourth degree sexual abuse broadly prohibit causing a complainant to engage in sexual activity "by threatening or placing that other person in reasonable fear (other than by threatening or placing that other person in reasonable fear that any person will be subjected to death, bodily injury, or kidnapping)."[48] However, as discussed further in the commentary to the revised sexual assault statute (RCC § 22E-1301), second degree and fourth degree of the revised sexual assault statute prohibit causing a complainant to engage in sexual activity by a "coercive threat." The use of "coercive threat" in the revised sexual assault statute's second and fourth degrees is not limited to threats "other than by threatening or placing that other person in reasonable fear that any person will be subjected to death, bodily injury, or kidnapping," and thereby is a lesser included offense of those specific kinds of threats which remain a basis of liability in first and third degree sexual assault. Otherwise, the RCC definition of "coercive threat" captures the breadth of the plain language of the current second degree and fourth degree sexual abuse statutes as well as limited DCCA case law interpreting these statutes.

[47] For example, if a person routinely beats laborers, causing other laborers to fear that they will face similar beatings if they refuse to work, that person would satisfy the requirements of a coercive threat even without an explicit threatening language.

"Commercial sex act" means any sexual act or sexual contact on account of which or for which anything of value is given to, promised to, or received by any person.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "commercial sex act" replaces the definition of "commercial sex act" in D.C. Code § 22-1831. The RCC definition of "commercial sex act" is copied verbatim from the definition in D.C. Code § 22-1831, except that it does not include violations of various Chapter 27 offenses.[1] The terms "sexual act" and "sexual contact" are defined in RCC § 22E-701. The RCC definition of "commercial sex act" is used in the revised definition of "debt bondage"[2] and the revised offenses of forced commercial sex,[3] trafficking in forced commercial sex,[4] sex trafficking of minors or adult incapable of consenting,[5] misuse of documents in furtherance of human trafficking,[6] commercial sex with a trafficked person,[7] and trafficking in commercial sex.[8]

Relation to Current District Law. The revised definition of "commercial sex act" changes current District law in two main ways.

First, violations of offenses under Chapter 27 do not constitute commercial sex acts, unless they involve a sexual act or sexual contact on account of which or for which anything of value is given to, promised to, or received by any person.[9]

Second, the RCC definition of "commercial sex" act uses the terms "sexual act" and "sexual contact," which are also defined in RCC § 22E-701. The current definition of "commercial sex act" also uses the terms as they are defined in D.C. Code § 22-3001. To the extent that the RCC definitions of "sexual act" and "sexual contact" change current District law, the RCC definition of "commercial sex act" also changes current District law.

Code 22-2713 states that "[w]hoever shall erect, establish, continue, maintain, use, own, occupy, or release any building . . . for the purpose of lewdness, assignation, or prostitution in the District of Columbia is guilty of a nuisance[.]" This conduct does not constitute a "commercial sex act" as defined in the RCC.

"Comparable offense" means an offense committed against the District of Columbia, a state, a federally-recognized Indian tribe, or the United States and its territories, with elements that would necessarily prove the elements of a corresponding current District offense.

Explanatory Note. This definition which offenses in other jurisdictions are deemed "comparable offenses" as to any given offense under the RCC. The words "current District offense" refers to an offense under the RCC at the time the comparable offense was committed. The RCC definition of "comparable offense" is new; the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code. The RCC definition of "comparable offense" is used in the revised repeat offender penalty enhancement,[1] as well as in the revised offenses of stalking,[2] electronic stalking,[3] possession of a firearm by an authorized person,[4] and contributing to the delinquency of a minor.[5]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "comparable offense" is new and does not substantively change District law.

As applied in the revised stalking and electronic stalking offenses, the term "comparable offense" may substantively change District law. The current stalking statute defines a "course of conduct" and provides an extensive list of activities that already are separately criminalized in the D.C. Code, such as efforts to "threaten," "[i]nterfere with, damage, take, or unlawfully enter an individual's real or personal property or threaten or attempt to do so," and "[u]se another individual's personal identifying information."[6] Case law on the stalking statute has not addressed whether the listed conduct differs from their corresponding separate criminal offenses in the District or elsewhere. The revised statute refers to the term "comparable offense" to clarify that these separate crimes serve as a predicate for stalking, even if committed outside the District of Columbia. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and completeness of the revised offense.

"Complainant" means person who is alleged to have been subjected to the criminal offense.

Explanatory Note. The term "complainant" is generally used in RCC offenses to avoid both the confusion that may arise from multiple references to a "person" and the potential bias that may arise from other references to the alleged victim in a criminal case. Use of the term "complainant" is a drafting convention that is not intended to substantively affect any provision in the RCC.

The RCC definition of "complainant" is new, the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code (although similar language is inconsistently[1] used in the provisions in Chapter 30, Sexual Abuse, through the definition of "victim" in D.C. Code § 22-3001(11)).[2] The RCC definition of "complainant" replaces the current definition of "victim" in D.C. Code § 22-3001(11) and is used in numerous RCC provisions.

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "complainant" is substantively identical to the definition of "victim"[3] provided in the current sex offense statutes under current law.

[1] Only three of the current sex offense statutes use the term "victim." The consent defense for first degree through fourth degree and misdemeanor sexual abuse (D.C. Code § 22-3007), the defense statute for sexual abuse of a ward and sexual abuse of a patient or client (D.C. Code § 22-3017), and the aggravating circumstances statute (D.C. Code § 22-3020). Instead of "victim," the other current sex offense statutes use terms like "another person" or "child," "ward," etc.

[3] D.C. Code § 22-3001(11).

"Conduct element" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-201.

Explanatory Note. The definition of "conduct element" is addressed in the Commentary accompanying RCC § 22E-201. The revised definition of "conduct element" is used in the revised voluntariness requirement.[1]

[1] RCC § 22E-203.

"Consent" means a word or act that:

(A) Indicates, explicitly or implicitly, agreement to particular conduct or a particular result; and

(B) Is not given by a person who:

(i) Is legally unable to authorize the conduct charged to constitute the offense or to the result thereof; or

(ii) Because of youth, mental disability, or intoxication, is unable to make a reasonable judgment as to the nature or harmfulness of the conduct to constitute the offense or to the result thereof; and

(C) Has not been withdrawn, explicitly or implicitly, by a subsequent word or act.

Explanatory Note. The RCC defines "consent" to mean that a person has expressed (by word or act) agreement to particular conduct or to a particular result and the person is generally competent and able to make a reasoned judgment to give such agreement. "Consent" generally means to agree to some act or to choose some act. The RCC relies on civil law principles of agency to determine when an individual is authorized to give "consent" on behalf of another person.[1]

Per subparagraph (A) a word or words such as saying, "Yes, I agree," or writing the same in an email, or an act or acts such as nodding or gesturing positively, typically will constitute consent. However, the word or act is not limited to a literal "yes," and includes other, indirect types of agreement, such as the use of well-recognized customs.[2] Inaction at a certain point in time may indicate agreement if there was a prior word or act that indicated ongoing agreement.[3] However, in the absence of any communication or prior communication establishing ongoing agreement, inaction necessarily means that no

[1] Thus, an employee may sell her employer's merchandise by giving "consent" on behalf of the employer to a transaction. See RCC commentary for particular offenses regarding whether and under what circumstances a person may consent, on behalf of another person, to conduct constituting an offense against person. Generally, it would be improper for one person to give consent to conduct on behalf of another where that conduct harms the person. However, there may be categorical exceptions to this general rule for offenses against persons. For example, it may be that a parent or guardian may consent to an elective medical procedure, ear piercing, or participation in a karate lesson on behalf of their child or ward.

[2] For example, raising one's fists or assuming a fighting stance may be commonly understood to indicate that the person has agreed to mutual combat, and handing a merchant currency or a method of payment is commonly understood to indicate that the person has agreed to the transaction.

[3] Determining whether inaction at a given is consenual based on a prior word or act is a context-sensitive factual inquiry that may require examination of the parties' relationship and prior experiences with one another, as well as the nature of the conduct that is the object of the alleged consent. For example, absent a prior act or word indicating ongoing consent, the inaction of a coworker to say or do anything would not constitute consent if, when taking one of several inexpensive pens from the worker's desk the coworker says "you don't mind if I borrow your pen?" However, if a coworker at one time asks if she can borrow a person's expensive pen and returns it, then five minutes later takes the pen again while the owner is absent or passively watches, the relevant question is whether the earlier consent to borrowing constituted an ongoing grant of permission.

consent, as here defined, was given.[4] The word or act also must be to some particular conduct or to a particular result.[5] Typically, in the RCC's offenses against persons, the particular conduct is defined by the use of consent within an offense definition or within an affirmative defense.

Notably, "consent" in subparagraph (A) can be conditioned or unconditioned.[6] This means that "consent" can be the product of completely free decision making (unconditioned),[7] or it can be the product of decision making driven by external pressures

[4] For example, imagine a case of assault where a person is walking down a street late at night, and the defendant sees the person and strikes him from behind. There would be no evidence in this case that the victim consented to mutual combat, because the victim gave no words or actions that indicated consent to the defendant's strikes. Or, imagine a case of theft where a person leaves his laptop out on a table at a café while he goes to use the restroom. A thief sees the person step away from the laptop, and promptly takes it. The taking would be completely without consent, because the owner gave no words or actions that indicated consent to the taking.

[5] For example, a person may agree to particular conduct (e.g. playing football) or a particular result (getting pushed to the ground). The distinction may be important in some cases where there is consent to one aspect but not the other. For instance, a complainant may give consent to sexual intercourse but not to anal penetration.

[6] This characteristic of consent is important: often, the term "consent" used both casually and in the law can mean one of two things. It can mean "agreeing to something," and it can also mean, "agreeing to something with sufficient freedom and knowledge." Imagine, for example, a person who is tricked by a fraudster into giving over her life savings. It would be correct in one sense to say that she consented to giving the money, because she voluntarily handed over her fortune. On the other hand, it could also be correct to say that she did not consent to the transaction, because her consent was vitiated by the fraudster's deception.

Both descriptions are arguably correct: if one takes "consent" to mean "agreement," then the victim has consented because she has agreed. But if one takes "consent" to mean "agreement given pursuant to certain normative conditions, such as having sufficient knowledge about the nature of the transaction," then the victim has not given consent, because she did not have sufficient knowledge about the actual nature of the transaction. She had no idea, after all, that her money was getting put in a fraudulent scheme. Both descriptions of the hypothetical are equally valid depending on what the definition of "consent" in use.

Unfortunately, having dual, competing, and equally valid meanings for a single term is a recipe for confusion. How can one know which sense of "consent" is being used at a given time? It is impossible to say. Therefore, rather than persist in confusing these two distinct but useful concepts by employing a single word to describe them, the Revised Criminal Code distinguishes them. "Consent" is employed to refer to mere agreement, while "effective consent" is employed to refer to consent given under sufficient conditions of knowledge and freedom (i.e., consent free from problematic coercion and deception).

[7] E.g., if a person went to a store and said, "I am going to buy the largest television in this store, no matter the cost!" This is an expression of an unconditional preference - the person has stated that he or she will purchase the property no matter what.

placed on the person giving consent (conditioned).[8] Conditioned "consent" may be present even when there is an extreme or normatively disturbing condition that induces a person's agreement, which makes the "consent" not freely given.[9] In the RCC, the degree to which "consent" may be subject to conditions is specified by the elements of particular offenses or by the requirement of "effective consent."[10]

Per subparagraph (B), consent is ineffective in a varity of circumstances.[11] First, consent cannot be given by a person who is legally unable to authorize the conduct charged to constitute the offense or to the result thereof.[12] Consent also cannot be given by a person who because of youth, mental disability, or intoxication, is unable to make a reasonable

[8] E.g., if a person went to a store and said, "I would like to buy the largest television in this store - but because the largest television is too expensive, I'll settle for this smaller one." The person here has an unconditional preference for the largest television, just as the person in the previous footnote does; but here, the person's budget is an external condition that has pressured the person to choose something other than his or her unconditional preference.

[9] E.g., a defendant walks into the victim's store and says, "You better pay me some protection money, or you might find you suffer an unfortunate accident!" The victim's preference in this situation may well be to pay the protection money, rather than risk being murdered or assaulted -- therefore, the victim hands the cash over to the extortionist. In this case, the victim has given consent to the transaction. Admittedly, the victim's unconditioned preference is likely that he have to provide the money at all. But faced with either giving the money or suffering a physical harm, the person may well consent to giving the money. This is not to say that the extortionist in this hypothetical will avoid liability, of course: under the RCC, the extortionist would have obtained the victim's consent by means of coercion.

[10] The RCC defines "effective consent" in RCC § 22E-701 as agreements that are obtained by means other than the use of a coercive threat, or deception. Thus, an agreement that is not freely or voluntarily given may constitute "consent," but it would not constitute "effective consent." The commentary to the RCC definition "effective consent" further discusses the definition and its role in the RCC.

[11] See Model Penal Code § 2.11(a) commentary ("Ineffective Consent. Unless otherwise provided by the Code or by the law defining the offense, assent does not constitute consent if: (a) it is given by a person who is legally incompetent to authorize the conduct charged to constitute the offense; or (b) it is given by a person who by reason of youth, mental disease or defect or intoxication is manifestly unable or known by the actor to be unable to make a reasonable judgment as to the nature or harmfulness of the conduct charged to constitute the offense[.]"); § 6.5(a)Consent, 1 Subst. Crim. L. § 6.5(a) (3d ed.) (citing to reform jurisdictions that have adopted Model Penal Code § 2.11(a) and (b) in their codes).

[12] The RCC language deviates slightly from the language in Model Penal Code § 2.11 and following jurisdictions by referring to a person who is legally "unable" to authorize the conduct rather than legally "incompetent." While a person may be unable to authorize conduct because of a severe cognitive disability or other mental disability, the RCC reference to legally "unable" refers more broadly to a person who is legally barred from giving authorization. For example, a person may be legally unable to provide consent as to use of property because of a court ruling or their lack of necessary property rights under civil law, such as where, as the Model Penal Code § 2.11 notes, "where a stranger 'consents' to the removal of another's property." The RCC reference to legally "unable" thus seeks to follow the broad intent of Model Penal Code § 2.11 while avoiding the narrow connotation of the term "competent."

judgment as to the nature or harmfulness of the conduct to constitute the offense or to the result thereof.[13] What precise age, mental disability, intoxication, etc. is sufficient to undermine consent is a highly fact-dependent inquiry, and may vary significantly according to the nature of the conduct at issue.[14]

Per subparagraph (C), consent does not persist after it has been withdrawn by a subsequent word or act. It exists only until nullified or revoked by the person giving the consent.

There is no culpable mental state specified in the definition of consent,[15] rather the use of the term in particular RCC offenses determines what culpable mental state applies.

"Consent" is statutorily defined in current D.C. Code § 22-3001(4)[16] for sexual abuse offenses and related provisions in Chapter 30, Sexual Abuse, although the undefined term is used in other Title 22 statutes.[17] The RCC definition of "consent" replaces in [13] Again, the RCC language closely follows Model Penal Code § 2.11, although it refers to "mental disability" instead of "mental disease or defect" to be consistent with the phrase in RCC § 22E-504, Mental disability defense, which broadly refers to both short-term and long-term mental conditions affecting cognition and behavioral controls.

[14] For example, with respect to an agreement to play a game of touch football, a thirteen year old may be both legally able and/or apparently able to make a reasoned judgment as to participation, while a three year old would be neither legally able nor apparently able to make a reasoned judgment about such conduct.

[15] The RCC differs somewhat from the Model Penal Code in this respect, the former potentially allowing for a lower culpable mental state (e.g. recklessness) than the latter's specification that the lack of reasonable judgment be "manifest" or "known." See Model Penal Code § 2.11 ("Unless otherwise provided by the Code or by the law defining the offense, assent does not constitute consent if… (b) it is given by a person who by reason of youth, mental disease or defect or intoxication is manifestly unable or known by the actor to be unable to make a reasonable judgment as to the nature or harmfulness of the conduct charged to constitute the offense[.]"). The RCC approach of not specifying a culpable mental state in the definition of "consent also avoids also avoids changing the culpable mental state applicable to following offense elements after the term. See Rules of Interpretation Applicable to Culpable Mental State Requirement in RCC § 22E-207.

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC breaks the current definition of "consent" in D.C. Code § 22-3001(4) and the general concept of consent into two terms. The RCC definition of "consent" refers to the bare fact of an agreement by a competent and reasonable person obtained by any means, while the RCC definition of "effective consent" (see commentary entry below) refers to agreements that are obtained by means other than the use of physical force, a coercive threat, or deception.[24] While the RCC

Meanwhile the RCC definition of "effective consent" corresponds to the later part of the first sentence and the second sentence of the current definition of "consent" in D.C. Code § 22-3001("'Consent' means … a freely given agreement…. Lack of verbal or physical resistance or submission by the victim, resulting from the use of force, threats, or coercion by the defendant shall not constitute consent.").

definition of "effective consent" may change current District law with respect to multiple aspects of "consent" per D.C. Code § 22-3001(4) and other current statutory provisions, the revised definition of "consent" substantively changes current District law in one way.

The RCC definition of "consent" makes one substantive change and several clarificatory changes to the current definition of "consent" in D.C. Code § 22-3001(4), which applies only to sex offense provisions.

The substantive change to the definition of "consent" is that the RCC restrictions in subparagraph (B) provide a flexible standard for determining a minimum age of consent rather than a fixed age. District sex offense case law, relying on various indications of legislative intent, has held that persons under 16 years of age categorically cannot consent to sexual activity with an adult that is at least four years older.[25] However, the DCCA recently reaffirmed that a person that is at least 16 years of age can consent to a simple assault that consists of non-violent sexual touching by an adult.[26] In contrast, no specific age is specified under the revised definition of consent, which allows for evaluation of the specific facts of the case (e.g. the conduct involved, the ages of other participants, and the relationship between the participants). This definitional change is more compatible with norms recognizing that, for example, a fifteen year old can consent to sexual conduct with another fifteen year old. However, despite this definitional change to "consent," the RCC resistance or submission by the victim, resulting from the use of force, threats, or coercion by the defendant shall not constitute consent.").

[25] The DCCA has held that the current D.C. Code fourth degree sexual abuse statute, which prohibits a sexual contact with a complainant that is "incapable of appraising the nature of the sexual contact," categorically merges into the current D.C. Code second degree child sexual abuse statute, which prohibits a sexual contact with a complainant that is under the age of 16 years when the actor is at least four years older. In re M.S., 171 A.3d 155, 165-166 (D.C. 2017); D.C. Code §§ 22-3005; 22-3009; 22-3001(2A) (defining a "child" as a "person who has not yet attained the age of 16 years."). The court stated that "once the government proves in a sexual assault case that the defendant was four or more years older than the [complainant under the age of 16 years], there is a conclusive presumption that the defendant knew or should have known that the [complainant under the age of 16 years] was incapable of appraising the nature of the sexual conduct." In re M.S., 171 A.3d 155, 165-166 (D.C. 2017).

In addition, the DCCA has held that in a prosecution under the current D.C. Code general sexual abuse statutes, if the complainant is a "child" under the age of 16 years "an adult defendant who is at least four years older than the complainant may not assert a "consent" defense. In such a case, the child's consent is not valid." Davis v. United States, 873 A.2d 1101, 1106 (D.C. 2005). "Child" is defined in D.C. Code § 22-3001 as "a person who has not yet attained the age of 16 years." D.C. Code § 22-3001(3). "Adult" is not statutorily defined in the current sex offenses, and the DCCA does not provide a definition in Davis. The DCCA further noted that the four-year age gap requirement in the current child sexual abuse statutes "appears [to] modify the traditional rule [that a child is legally incapable of consenting to sexual conduct with an adult] so as to allow bona fide consent of a child victim to be a potential defense where the defendant is less than four years older than the child." Id. at 1105 n.8.

[26] The District's current assault statute prohibits, in relevant part, an "assault." D.C. Code § 22-404(a)(1). District case law establishes that an assault includes non-violent sexual touching that causes no pain or impairment to the complainant's body. See, e.g., Augustin v. United States, No. 17-CF-906, 2020 WL 6325889 (D.C. Oct. 29, 2020) at 8. In general, the elements established by the case law are a "voluntary touching of another in a sexually sensitive or private area without consent." Id. at 8. In Augustin v. United States, the DCCA stated that the District's current sexual abuse statutes, and their age-based requirements for liaiblitly and limitations on defenses for offenses involving minors, "does not mean that the Council raised the age of consent in a simple assault prosecution for a non-violent sexual touching of a minor." Id. at 9. The DCCA stated that "sixteen years is the age of consent for the non-violent sexual toucing prosecuted as simple in this case." Id. at 10.

Remaining changes to the current definition of "consent" in D.C. Code § 22-3001(4) are clarificatory. First, the revised definition omits the word "overt" in the current definition as redundant. The plain meaning of the current and RCC definitions of "consent" is that there must be something that "indicates" that there is an "agreement," precluding any reliance on covert words or actions. Second, the RCC defines "consent" as a "word" or "act" instead of "words" or "actions." This revision clarifies that a single word or act may suffice for "consent." Third, the RCC specifies that the word or act may express agreement either expressly or implicitly. This revision clarifies that the word or act is not limited to a "yes" or a nod in response, and includes any other words or acts that indirectly indicate agreement. Fourth, the RCC defines consent to include consent to a "particular result" in addition to "particular conduct," whereas the current definition of "consent" for the sex offense statutes requires consent to "the sexual act or sexual contact in question," and it is unclear whether this includes the result, conduct, or both.

The RCC definition of "consent" also clarifies uses of the term in various offenses against persons in current Title 22 of the D.C. Code. Current District law does not codify a definition of "consent" for offenses against persons outside of Chapter 30 Sex Offenses, however the term has been used in case law concerning some offenses against persons. For example, two DCCA rulings state that, in certain circumstances, "consent" is a defense to the District's simple assault statute and is not a defense to the District's felony assault statute,[27] but the rulings do not define the precise meaning of "consent." Regarding a consent defense to the non-violent sexual touching form of simple assault, case law has said the consent may be "actual or apparent"[28] without discussing the difference between these terms.[29] The RCC definition of "consent" is consistent with and further clarifies existing the meaning of the term for offenses against persons.

The RCC definition of "consent" also clarifies references to the term in connection with various property offenses in current Title 22 of the D.C. Code. Current District law has not codified a definition of "consent" for property offenses, nor does case law discuss [29] The language, however, suggests that "actual consent" refers to the internal, subjective wishes of the person giving consent, whereas the "apparent consent" refers to the expressed wishes or desires of the person giving consent. See Guarro, 237 F.2d at 581 ("In a case like the present, to let the suspect think there is consent in order to encourage an act which furnishes an excuse for an arrest will defeat a prosecution for assault.") (emphasis added). To the extent that "apparent consent" refers to expressed consent, the RCC definition is consistent with current District case law.

the term or concept at length in property offenses. However, there are similar terms and phrases in current property statutes and case law. On a few occasions, the DCCA has recognized the relevance of consent in proving many property offenses.[30] Consent is also an explicit element in several of the District's current property offenses, such as the current extortion offense[31] and unauthorized use of a motor vehicle offense.[32] Further, the current definition of "appropriate" in Chapter 30 of the D.C. Code makes use of "without authority or right," which is roughly in line with the RCC's definition of consent.[33] Additionally, DCCA case law has acknowledged that an agent's consent is relevant to determining whether a defendant has been given consent by the actual owner of the property,[34] and some current offense definitions explicitly include agents.[35] The RCC definition of "consent" is consistent with and further clarifies existing the meaning of the term for property offenses.

The commentaries to relevant RCC provisions further discuss the effect of the RCC definition of "consent" on current District law.

"Controlled substance" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 48–901.02.

Explanatory Note. This definition specifies that under the RCC, the term "controlled substance" has the same meaning as defined under D.C. Code § 48–901.02. The term "controlled substance" also incorporates limitations to the definition relating to marijuana included in D.C. Code § 48-904.01.[1] Note that a conforming amendment may be needed to incorporate the marijuana limitations that are currently included in the offense statutes. The term "controlled substance" is used in the revised definitions of "class B contraband"[2] and "coercive threat,"[3] and in the revised offenses of blackmail,[4] criminal neglect of a minor,[5] criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person,[6] forgery,[7] correctional facility contraband,[8] possession of a controlled substance,[9] trafficking of a controlled substance,[10] trafficking of a counterfeit substance,[11] possession of drug manufacturing paraphernalia,[12] and trafficking of drug paraphernalia.[13]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC's definition of "controlled substance" is identical to the definition under current law and is not intended to substantively change District law.

[1] Under the current District Code, the term "controlled substance" is defined under D.C. Code § 48-901.02. However, D.C. Code § 48-904.01, which defines the possession and distribution of controlled substance offenses, includes limitations to the definition pertaining to marijuana. D.C. Code § 48-904.01 states that the term

"Correctional facility" means any building or building grounds located in the District of Columbia, operated by the Department of Corrections, for the secure confinement of persons charged with or convicted of a criminal offense.

Explanatory Note. Building grounds refers to the area of land occupied by the correctional facility and its yard and outbuildings, with a clearly identified perimeter. The word "secure" makes clear that a placement in an unsecured inpatient drug treatment program or independent living program is excluded. The definition does not include facilities such as behavioral health hospitals that are principally concerned with providing medical care. The definition does not include buildings used by private businesses to detain suspected criminals, such as a booking room in a retail store.

The RCC definition of "correctional facility" is new; the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code (although similar language is used in the current escape from institution or officer[1] and unlawful possession of contraband[2] offenses). The term "building" that is used in the definition of "correctional facility" is defined elsewhere in RCC § 22E-701. The RCC definition of "correctional facility" is used in the revised offenses of sexual abuse by exploitation,[3] escape from a correctional facility or officer,[4] and correctional facility contraband.[5]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "correctional facility" is new and does not substantively change District law.

As applied in the revised escape from a correctional facility or officer offense, the term "correctional facility" may substantively change District law. D.C. Code § 22-2601 uses the phrase "penal or correctional institution or facility" but does not define it. Case law has held that the phrase includes the District's halfway houses.[6] In contrast, the revised code separately defines "correctional facility," "halfway house," and "secure juvenile detention facility" to be used universally throughout the RCC. This change applies consistent, clearly articulated definitions and improves the clarity of the revised offenses.

As applied in the revised correctional facility contraband offense, the term "correctional facility" may substantively change District law. D.C. Code § 22-2603.01 defines "penal institution" to mean "any penitentiary, prison, jail, or secure facility owned, operated, or under the control of the Department of Corrections, whether located within the District of Columbia or elsewhere." It defines "grounds" to mean "the area of land occupied by the penal institution or secure juvesnile residential facility and its yard and outbuildings, with a clearly identified perimeter." In contrast, the revised code separately defines "correctional facility," "halfway house," and "secure juvenile detention facility" to be used universally throughout the RCC. Each definition includes buildings (also defined in RCC § 22E-701) and building grounds. This change applies consistent, clearly articulated definitions and improves the clarity of the revised offenses.

"Counterfeit mark" means any trademark, service mark, trade name, label, term, picture, seal, word, or advertisement or any combination of these adopted or used by a person to identify such person's goods or services and which is lawfully filed for record in the Office of the Secretary of State of any state or which the exclusive right to reproduce is guaranteed under the laws of the United States or the District of Columbia, that is used without the permission of the owner of the trademark, service mark, trade name, label, term, picture, seal, word, or advertisement.

Explanatory Note. The term "counterfeit mark" defines specific types of marks, when used without the permission of the owner of the mark. Invalid marks, or marks used with the permission of the mark's owner are not included in the definition of "counterfeit mark." The revised definition of "counterfeit mark" is used in the revised definition of "retail value"[1] and in the revised offense of trademark counterfeiting.[2]

Relation to Current District Law. The definition of "counterfeit mark" does not substantively change current District law. The term "counterfeit mark" replaces the current terms "counterfeit mark" and "intellectual property." The current definition of "counterfeit mark" includes "any unauthorized reproduction or copy of intellectual property" or "intellectual property affixed to any item knowingly sold, offered for sale, manufactured, or distributed, or identifying services offered or rendered without the authority of the owner of the intellectual property[.]"[3] In turn, "intellectual property" is defined as "any trademark, service mark, trade name, label, term, picture, seal, word, or advertisement or any combination of these adopted or used by a person to identify such person's goods or services and which is lawfully filed for record in the Office of the Secretary of State of any state or which the exclusive right to reproduce is guaranteed under the laws of the United States or the District of Columbia."[4] The revised definition of "counterfeit mark" incorporates the current definition of "intellectual property," and requires that the mark be used "without the permission of the owner[.]" The term "without the permission" is intended to have the same meaning as "without authority" or "unauthorized." The revised definition of "counterfeit mark" is not intended to substantively change current District law.

"Crime of violence" means:

(A) Murder under RCC § 22E-1101;
(B) Manslaughter under RCC § 22E-1102;
(C) Robbery under RCC § 22E-1201;
(D) First degree, second degree, and third degree assault under RCC § 22E-1202(a)-(c);
(E) Enhanced first degree criminal threats under RCC § 22E-1204(a), (d)(4)(B);
(F) First degree, second degree, and third degree sexual assault under RCC § 22E-1301(a)-(c);
(G) First, second, fourth, and fifth degree sexual abuse of a minor under RCC § 22E-1302(a)-(b), (d)-(e);
(H) Kidnapping under RCC § 22E-1401;

(K) First and second degree criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person under RCC § 22E-1503(a)-(b);
(L) Forced labor under RCC § 22E-1601;
(M) Forced commercial sex under RCC § 22E-1602;
(N) Trafficking in labor under RCC § 22E-1603;
(O) Trafficking in forced commercial sex under RCC § 22E-1604;
(P) Sex trafficking of a minor or adult incapable of consenting under RCC § 22E-1605;
(Q) [Reserved. Acts of terrorism under RCC § 22E-1701;]
(R) [Reserved. Manufacture or possession of a weapon of mass destruction under RCC § 22E-1702;]
(S) [Reserved. Use, dissemination, or detonation of a weapon of mass destruction under RCC § 22E-1703;]
(T) Enhanced first degree and enhanced second degree burglary under RCC § 22E-2701(a)-(b), (d)(4); or
(U) For any of the offenses described in subparagraphs (A)-(T) of this paragraph, a criminal attempt under RCC § 22E-301, a criminal solicitation under RCC § 22E-302, or a criminal conspiracy under RCC § 22E-303.

Explanatory Note. The RCC defines "crime of violence" to include enumerated RCC offenses that are serious (felony) offenses against persons that require or likely involve actual use of violence, as well as armed burglary. Enhanced versions of the ennumerated offenses are also included within the definition.

The RCC definition of "crime of violence" replaces the current definition of "crime of violence" as used in D.C. Code § 22-4503, Unlawful possession of firearm, which defines the term by reference to the definition in D.C. Code § 23–1331(4). The RCC definition of "crime of violence" is used in the revised offense of possession of a firearm by an unauthorized person.[1]

[1] RCC § 22E-4105.

Relation to Current District Law. While the RCC definition of "crime of violence" is broadly consistent with the scope of the current District definition, the revised definition substantively changes District law in multiple ways. First, the revised definition includes several additional offenses concerning human trafficking[2] and criminal abuse of vulnerable adults and elderly persons.[3] Second, unlike the current D.C. Code § 23–1331(4) definition, the revised definition does not include "arson" as the revised statute does not require endangerment of human life, does not include "gang recruitment, participation, or retention by the use or threatened use of force, coercion, or intimidation,"[4] or "extortion or blackmail accompanied by threats of violence." The exclusion of these and other RCC crimes from the definition of crime of violence does not reflect that such crimes involving threatening or risk-creating conduct are not serious, but rather focuses the definition on crimes that require or typically include actual violence. Third, the revised definition of "crime of violence," by reference to RCC offenses, gradations, and enhancements with different elements than their counterparts in the current D.C. Code, differs in the precise extent of coverage. For example, the robbery under RCC § 22E-1201does not include conduct such as pickpocketing, in contrast to the current robbery statute in D.C. Code § 22–2801.

This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised statutes.

[2] Current D.C. Code § 23–1331(4) does not include any human trafficking crimes. In contrast, the revised statute includes: Forced labor under RCC § 22E-1601; Forced commercial sex under RCC § 22E-1602; Trafficking in labor under RCC § 22E-1603; Trafficking in forced commercial sex under RCC § 22E-1604; and Sex trafficking of a minor or adult incapable of consenting under RCC § 22E-1605.

[3] Current D.C. Code § 23–1331(4) does not include D.C. Code § 22–933, Criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person. In contrast, the revised statute includes: First and second degree criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person under RCC § 22E-1503(a)-(b).

"Dangerous weapon" means:

(A) A firearm;

(B) A restricted explosive;

(C) A knife with a blade longer than 3 inches, sword, razor, stiletto, dagger, or dirk; or

(D) A blackjack, billy club, slungshot, sand club, sandbag, or false knuckles;

(E) A stun gun; or

(F) Any object, other than a body part or stationary object, that in the manner of its actual, attempted, or threatened use is likely to cause death or serious bodily injury to a person.

Explanatory Note. The RCC defines "dangerous weapon" to include enumerated weapons and any object that in the manner of its actual, attempted, or threatened use is likely[1] to cause death or serious bodily injury. The enumeration of items in the definition of "dangerous weapon" does not mean that the simple possession of these items is criminal. In fact, possession of some enumerated items is constitutionally protected in certain circumstances. Besides firearms, stun guns are arms protected for use in self-defense under the Second Amendment to the United States Constitution[2] and knives may also be afforded protection.[3]

The phrase "[a]ny object" is to be interpreted broadly, including, for example, not only solid objects[4] but fluids and gases. Stationary fixtures such as floors, curbs, and sinks are not dangerous weapons, regardless of how they are used.[5] Body parts such as teeth, nails, hands, and feet are not dangerous weapons, regardless of how they are used. However, objects used by a person's hands or feet (e.g., steel-toed boots) or expelled from the body (e.g., bodily fluids) potentially may be dangerous weapons. Whether an object or substance "in the manner of its actual, attempted, or threatened use is likely to cause death or serious bodily injury" is a question of fact, not a question of law.

The RCC definition of "dangerous weapon" is new; the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code (although undefined references to "dangerous weapon" are in the possession of dangerous weapons offense[6] and the unlawful possession of contraband offense,[7] and an apparently non-exhaustive list of "dangerous or deadly" weapons is in the penalty enhancement provision for committing crime while armed[8]). The terms "false knuckles," "firearm," "restricted explosive," "serious bodily injury," and "stun gun" that are used in the definition of "dangerous weapon" are defined elsewhere in RCC § 22E-701. The RCC definition of "dangerous weapon" is used in the revised defense for defense of self or another person,[9] in the revised definitions of "Class A contraband"[10] and "imitation dangerous weapon,"[11] in the revised provision for merger of related weapon offenses,[12] and in fourteen revised offenses.[13]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "dangerous weapon" is new and does not substantively change an existing statute.

As applied in the revised offenses of robbery, assault, menacing, sexual assault, kidnapping, criminal restraint, possession of a prohibited weapon or accessory, carrying a dangerous weapon, possession of a dangerous weapon with intent to commit crime, and possession of a dangerous weapon during a crime, the term "dangerous weapon" is generally consistent with, but in several ways changes or may change, current District law.

First, subparagraphs (A) - (E) of the revised definition specify a complete list of items which constitute inherently "dangerous weapons." Together, subparagraphs (A) - (E) include nearly all the objects specifically listed in the District's current possession of a prohibited weapon offense[14] and while armed penalty enhancement.[15] However, there are various differences between the items listed in these current statutes and the RCC statute. For the RCC offenses against persons subtitle, an "imitation dangerous weapon" is a separately defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that is incorporated into various specific offenses,[16] but is not a per se dangerous weapon.[17] District case law has recognized that many of the objects listed in the possession of a prohibited weapon offense and while armed penalty enhancement are inherently dangerous.[18] However, District case law has been unclear as to what other weapons may be per se dangerous weapons besides those listed in the statutes, and at times has appeared to say that inherently dangerous weapons, even those included in the statutes, are actually dangerous only in certain circumstances and ordinarily the matter of weather a weapon is dangerous is a question of fact.[19] Under the RCC "dangerous weapon" definition, only the items listed in subparagraphs (A) - (E) are considered inherently or per se dangerous weapons, based on their design rather than the manner of their use.[20] Providing a single, complete list of items that are inherently dangerous clarifies District law.

Second, the RCC definition in subparagraph (F) provides a functional definition of ways any item may be deemed a dangerous weapon. Any "object or substance, other than [17] The commentaries for relevant RCC offenses against persons discuss further, below, how excluding imitation firearms affects current District law. Besides the current while-armed penalty enhancement statute, DCCA case law currently establishes that an imitation pistol may be sufficient for ADW liability. Harris v. United States, 333 A.2d 397, 400 (D.C. 1975).

[18] See Dade v. United States, 663 A.2d 547, 553 (D.C. 1995) ("The only grammatical way to construe this statute [D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)] is to read it, first, as including all pistols and other firearms (or imitations thereof) within the category of dangerous or deadly weapons, and second, as identifying a dozen other objects as dangerous or deadly weapons, in addition to pistols and other firearms. Thus any pistol or other firearm is, by statutory definition, a dangerous or deadly weapon, and the jury need not find specifically that a particular pistol is a dangerous or deadly weapon in order to find the defendant guilty of an armed offense."); Jones v. United States, 67 A.3d 547, 550–51 (D.C. 2013) ("We have acknowledged that § 22–4515(b) includes a "non-exhaustive list of weapons readily classifiable as dangerous per se." (citing In re D.T., 977 A.2d 346, 349, 353 (D.C.2009)).

[19] See Williamson v. United States, 445 A.2d 975, 979 (D.C. 1982) ("Some weapons, under appropriate circumstances, are so clearly dangerous that it is prudent for the court to declare them to be such, as a matter of law. Included in this class are rifles, pistols, swords, and daggers, when used in the manner that they were designed to be used and within striking distance of the victim. Whether an object or material which is not specifically designed as a dangerous weapon is a "dangerous weapon" under an aggravated assault statute, however, is ordinarily a question of fact to be determined by all the circumstances surrounding the assault. See generally 2 C. Torcia, Wharton's Criminal Law § 200 (14th ed. 1979). The trier of fact must consider whether the object or material is known to be "likely to produce death or great bodily injury" in the manner it is used, intended to be used, or threatened to be used. The jurors' knowledge of the dangerous character of the weapon used generally can be based on "familiar and common experience." [citation omitted].)" a body part" can be a "dangerous weapon" if "the manner of its actual, attempted, or threatened use is likely to cause death or serious bodily injury." The DCCA has said that, to determine whether an item is a dangerous weapon, "the manner [in which an item] is used, intended to be used, or threatened to be used"[21] should be considered. However, there is also District case law which suggests that "intended use" may be the same as "attempted use."[22] Subparagraph (F) of the RCC definition of "dangerous weapon" codifies actual use, threatened use, and "attempted use" (instead of "intended use"). Under the RCC definition, a mere "intended use" of an item as a dangerous weapon (separate from an actual, threatened, or attempted use) still may be sufficient to make that item a dangerous weapon, but only if such an intended use of the weapon is sufficient to satisfy the requirements of a criminal attempt.[23] Notably, current District practice with respect to charges of assault with a dangerous weapon does not appear to distinctly recognize as dangerous weapons either objects that are "intended to be used" or are involved in an "attempted" use to cause serious bodily injury or death.[24] Creating a functional test as to whether an item is a dangerous weapon based on its actual, attempted, or threatened use clarifies District law with respect to attempts, and may provide a more objective basis for determining liability as compared to a general inquiry, per current law, as to the defendant's intent for the item.

[20] The design of an object may be an important fact in determining whether the object is a "dangerous weapon" per subparagraph (I), but it is not determinative.

Third, under the RCC definition of "dangerous weapon" in subparagraph (F) the object or substance must be "likely" to cause death or serious bodily injury. The DCCA has discussed whether an object or substance is a "dangerous weapon" both in terms of whether it is "capable" of producing death or serious bodily injury, as well as "likely" to produce death or serious bodily injury, without discussion.[25] The RCC definition adopts a "likely" standard as is consistent with current District practice[26] and long-established case law.[27] This change clarifies District law.

Although Williamson is an ADW case, several cases use the same standard to determine whether an object is a "dangerous weapon" under the "while armed" enhancement in D.C. Code § 22-4502. its standard for determining whether an object is a "dangerous weapon" is used in "while armed" enhancement cases under D.C. Code § 22-4502. See, e.g., Arthur v. United States, 602 A.2d 174, 177-78 (D.C. 1992) (discussing *Williamson v. [23] See RCC § 22E-301. For example, if a person carries an iron spike in their pocket with intent to use that object as a weapon to cause serious bodily injury to an enemy, that person may be guilty of an attempted assault with a dangerous weapon if the person satisfies the requirements for attempt liability, including the requisite intent as to the result (i.e. causing serious bodily injury by means of the spike) and being "dangerously close" to completing the offense.

Fourth, the RCC definition of dangerous weapon in subparagraph (F) refers to the revised definition for "serious bodily injury." Current DCCA case law has discussed whether an object or substance is a "dangerous weapon" both in terms of causing death or "great bodily injury,"[28] and death or "serious bodily injury."[29] The DCCA has explicitly stated that in this context the terms "great" and "serious" are interchangeable.[30] Using "serious bodily injury" does not appear to constitute a change in District law, except to the extent the RCC definition of "serious bodily injury" differs from the current definition.[31] Referencing "serious bodily injury" in the RCC definition of "dangerous weapon" improves the consistency of language and definitions across offenses.

Fifth, the RCC definition of a dangerous weapon does not include items that a complaining witness incorrectly perceives as a dangerous weapon, changing current District law.[32] Imitation dangerous weapons are now separately defined in RCC § 22E-701 and do not constitute per se dangerous weapons. Liability for use of such apparently dangerous objects is provided in specified RCC offenses, such as the revised criminal threats offense.[33] Excluding these objects from the scope of "dangerous weapon" does not change District case law holding that circumstantial evidence may be sufficient to establish an object or substance is a dangerous weapon.[34] These changes clarify and improve the proportionality of the definition of a dangerous weapon, basing the definition on objective criteria and increasing penalties based on the actual increased risk of harm.

Sixth, the RCC definition of a "dangerous weapon" in subparagraph (F) precludes a body part from being deemed a dangerous weapon. A panel of the DCCA has specifically upheld a conviction for assault of a police officer using a deadly or dangerous weapon based on the defendant's use of his teeth to bite an officer's leg.[35] Dicta in the case indicated that any other body part could similarly be a deadly or dangerous weapon depending on its usage,[36] although there does not appear to be an appellate ruling to date in the District on whether other body parts may be considered dangerous weapons. The DCCA ruling that some uses of a person's body parts—without an external item—may constitute use of a dangerous weapon creates uncertainty as to what types of physical contacts should and should not be subject to enhanced liability. The RCC definition, by contrast, clarifies that a person's body parts, including teeth, nails, feet, hands, etc., categorically cannot constitute a dangerous weapon.[37] This change clarifies the law by providing a bright-line distinction as to what may be a dangerous weapon, penalizing more severely a defendant's use of external objects to inflict damage.

The revised definition of a "dangerous weapon" does not change other DCCA case law as to whether certain objects—be they cars,[38] flip flops[39] or stationary bathroom fixtures[40]—constitute dangerous weapons under the facts in those cases. Inoperable and unloaded firearms also remain dangerous weapons under subparagraph (A) of the RCC definition.

Seventh, the revised definition of dangerous weapon includes any object that is actually likely to cause death likely to cause death or serious bodily injury. The DCCA

[37] However, as noted above, bodily fluids are not considered a body part and may constitute a "dangerous weapon" under the RCC definition. For example, a defendant who recklessly exposes another person to infectious bodily fluids that results in harm to that person may be liable for assault by means of a dangerous weapon—his or her own bodily fluid.

[38] See, e.g., Frye v. United States, 926 A.2d 1085, 1097 (D.C. 2005) ("The complainant's testimony concerning the manner in which appellant used his vehicle, trying to run her off the road and force her into oncoming traffic, over a substantial stretch of roadway was sufficient to permit the jury to find reasonably that appellant used his vehicle as a dangerous weapon in committing an assault against [the complaining witness]."); Powell v. United States, 811 A.2d 808, 810 (D.C. 2002))). In contrast, the revised definition uses an objective analysis of likelihood and a standardized definition of the term "serious bodily injury" used across the RCC. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised code.

"Deadly force" means any physical force that is likely to cause serious bodily injury or death.

Explanatory Note. The term "deadly force" includes any force, with or without the use of a weapon, that is more likely than not to cause death or serious bodily injury. The likelihood could arise from the degree of force, the duration of the force, the location of the force on the human body, the complainant's health, or other factors. A person may use deadly force even if the person does not intend to cause a serious injury[1] and even if death or serious injury does not occur.[2] The term "deadly force" is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code, however a definition of the term recently was codified for the first in the Comprehensive Policing and Justice Reform Second Emergency Amendment Act of 2020).[3] The term "serious bodily injury" that is used in the definition of "deadly force" is defined elsewhere in RCC § 22E-701. The RCC definition of "deadly force" is used in the revised defenses for execution of public duty,[4] defense of self or another person,[5] and defense of property,[6] as well as in the revised offense of murder.[7]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "deadly force" may constitute a substantive change to District law in two ways.

First, the revised definition does not specifically include a reference to force "intended" to cause serious bodily injury or death. The current D.C. Code definition of deadly force, codified only with respect to law enforcement officer use of force, refers to "any force that is likely or intended to cause serious bodily injury or death." The definition's term "intended" is not defined in the D.C. Code (nor are cognate words "intent," etc.), and there is no case law or legislative history as to the meaning of "intended" in the definition. However, prior DCCA case law defined the term as "force likely to cause serious bodily injury or death."[8] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised definition omits from the codified definition a reference to "intent." In the RCC, "intent" is a defined culpable mental state with a meaning and RCC definitions generally do not contain culpable mental states to avoid confusion as to the scope of their operation. The RCC codification of defense of self or others, moreover, refers in relevant part to an actor who "uses or attempts to use deadly force" which may practically have the same meaning as "intended" within the current D.C. Code definition of "deadly force."[9] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statutes.

[1] For example, a factfinder may find that an actor who repeatedly stabs a person in the abdomen with a long knife used deadly force that was objectively likely to kill the person, even though the actor subjectively intended to only inflict a superficial wound. Expert testimony may be required to assist the factfinder in understanding whether particular conduct is likely to cause death or serious bodily injury.

[2] For example, a factfinder may find that a bullet wound was likely to cause a serious bodily injury if not for immediate intervention by a medical professional. Expert testimony may be required to assist the factfinder in understanding whether a particular injury is likely to cause death or serious bodily injury.

Second, the revised definition primarily relies on a different, revised definition of "serious bodily injury." The current D.C. Code definition of deadly force, codified only with respect to law enforcement officer use of force, uses a definition "serious bodily injury" that refers, in relevant part, to "extreme physical pain, illness, or impairment of physical condition." These terms in the definition are not defined in the D.C. Code, and there is no case law or legislative history as to their meaning. This D.C. Code definition of "serious bodily injury" with respect to a law enforcement officer use of force differs from the D.C. Code definition of "serious bodily injury" for sexual abuse offenses,[10] case law defining "serious bodily injury" for other offenses,[11] and case law defining "deadly force" by a person other than a law enforcement (in defense of property).[12] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised definition of "deadly force" uses the standard RCC definition of "serious bodily injury" which does not specifically refer to "extreme physical pain, illness, or impairment of physical condition." The revised definition of "serious bodily injury may narrow in some respects, and expand in other respects, the scope of conduct constituting "deadly force."[13] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statutes.

"Debt bondage" means the status or condition of a person who provides services or commercial sex acts, for a real or alleged debt, where:

(A) The value of the services or commercial sex acts, as reasonably assessed, is not applied toward the liquidation of the debt;

(B) The length and nature of the services or commercial sex acts are not respectively limited and defined; or

(C) The amount of the debt does not reasonably reflect the value of the items or services for which the debt was incurred.

Explanatory Note. The term "debt bondage" is defined as the status or condition of a person who provides labor, services, or commercial sex acts for real or alleged debt under one of three specified circumstances where such a transaction is unfair.

"Debt bondage" is currently defined in D.C. Code § 22-1831(5) for human trafficking statutes. The RCC definition of "debt bondage" replaces the current definition of "debt bondage" in D.C. Code § 22-1831 and is used the revised offenses of forced labor,[1] forced commercial sex,[2] trafficking in labor,[3] trafficking in forced commercial sex,[4] and commercial sex with a trafficked person.[5]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC's definition of "debt bondage" is identical to the definition under current law and is not intended to substantively change District law.

"Deceive" and other parts of speech, including "deception," mean:

(A) To create or reinforce a false impression as to a material fact, including a false impression as to an intention to perform future actions;

(B) Preventing another person from acquiring material information;

(C) Failing to correct a false impression as to a material fact, including false impressions as to intention, which the person previously created or reinforced, or which influences another to whom they stand in a fiduciary or confidential relationship; or

(D) For offenses under Subtitle III of this title, failing to disclose a lien, adverse claim, or other legal impediment to the enjoyment of property which they transfer or encumber in consideration for property, whether or not it is a matter of official record; provided that under subparagraphs (A)-(D) of this paragraph:

(i) The term does not include puffing statements that are unlikely to deceive ordinary persons; and

(ii) Deception as to a person's intention to perform a future act shall not be inferred from the fact alone that they did not subsequently perform the act.

Explanatory Note. This definition enumerates means by which a person can deceive another. Although other conduct may be deemed deceptive in the ordinary use of the word, for purposes of the RCC, "deceive" and "deception" only include the means listed in this definition.

Subparagraph (A) defines "deception" to include creating or reinforcing a false impression. It is not necessary that the defendant create the false impression. Even if another person has a pre-conceived false impression, a person can deceive by merely reinforcing that false impression. "Deception" requires a false impression, but not necessarily false statements. A person can "deceive" by making statements that are factually true to create or reinforce a false impression. Creating or reinforcing a false impression does not require any oral or written communications. Acts and gestures that create or reinforce false impressions can also constitute deception under this definition.

Subparagraph (A) also requires that the creation or reinforcement of a false impression be about a material fact, a fact that a reasonable person would deem relevant under the circumstances. A material fact can include a false impression as to law[1] or the value of the property.

Subparagraph (A) also defines "deception" to include creating or reinforcing false impressions as to an intention to perform future actions. However, mere failure to perform the promised future action does not constitute deception. The person must have had the requisite mental state as to whether he would not perform at the time he or she made the promise.[2]

[1] For example, a person can deceive another by creating a false impression that a car for sale is street-legal, when in fact it is not.

[2] See Warner v. United States, 124 A.3d 79 (D.C. 2015) (the trial judge noted that whether a promise is fraudulent or not depended on "whether or not at the time the defendant made the promise, he knew he was going to [fail to perform the promise.]").

Subparagraph (B) defines "deception" to include preventing a person from acquiring material information.[3]

Subparagraph (C) includes two exceptions to the general rule that there is no duty to correct a false impression. Ordinarily, a person has no duty to correct another's pre-existing false impression, and is free to take advantage of that false impression.[4] However, if a person had previously created or reinforced a false impression, even if innocently, that person can "deceive" by later failing to correct that false impression. Subparagraph (C) also states that a person can "deceive" if he or she has a fiduciary or other confidential relationship with another person, and fails to correct a false impression held by that person.

Subparagraph (D) defines "deception," when used in offenses under Subtitle III, to include failing to disclose a known lien, adverse claim, or other legal impediment to the enjoyment of property which he or she transfers or encumbers in consideration for property, whether or not the impediment is a matter of official record. This is a specialized form of deception that only arises in the context of real estate transactions.

Sub-subparagraph (D)(i) provides one limitation to the definition of "deception," and excludes puffery that is unlikely to deceive ordinary persons. Such statements that exaggerate or heighten the attractiveness of a product or service do not go so far as to constitute deception. When representations go beyond mere exaggeration to actually create or reinforce an explicit false impression, however, then an actor may cross the line into criminal deception. In many cases, this exception is unnecessary as puffery ordinarily does not, and is not intended to, actually create or reinforce a false impression. However, advertising may include puffing statements that will create a false impression in at least some listeners. In this context, there is no "deception" if the puffery is unlikely to deceive ordinary persons. With non-puffing statements however, there is no requirement that the deception be likely to fool an ordinary person.

Sub-subparagraph (D)(ii) provides an evidentiary rule regarding false intentions to perform a future act. Under this sub-subparagraph, failure to perform a promised act, without any additional evidence, is insufficient to prove that the a person intended to deceive another.

Notably, the "deception" definition does not itself require any culpable mental state. If a person creates a false impression, it is not required that he or she knew that the impression was false. However, specific statutes in the RCC that use the "deception" definition may specify a mental state for that particular offense. For example, if an offense requires a culpable mental state of "knowingly", and the deception is premised on creating or reinforcing a false impression, then the defendant must have been practically certain that the impression was false. If another offense requires a culpable mental state of "recklessly," and the deception is premised on creating or reinforcing a false impression,

[3] For example, if a person selling a car that had been seriously damaged in an accident hides or destroys records of the accident to prevent a buyer from learning that information, he may have deceived the other person, even if he did not actually create or reinforce the false impression that the car had never been in an accident.

[4] For example, if a person is selling a ring that he believes is made of fool's gold, but a buyer realizes that the ring is made of real gold, the buyer has no obligation to correct the seller's false impression.

then the defendant must only have been consciously aware of a substantial and unjustifiable risk that the impression was actually false.

The RCC definition of "deceive" and "deception" is new; the terms are not statutorily defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code (although the undefined terms are used in other statutes[5] in Title 22. The RCC definitions of "deceive" and "deception" are used in the revised definition of "effective consent,"[6] as well as the revised offenses of nonconsensual sexual conduct,[7] kidnapping,[8] criminal restraint,[9] fraud,[10] forgery,[11] identity theft,[12] impersonation of an official,[13] and misrepresentation as a District of Columbia entity.[14]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC "deception" definition is new and does not itself change current District law, but may result in changes of law as applied to particular offenses (including through the definition of "effective consent").

As applied to the current D.C. Code fraud and theft offenses which specifically criminalize taking property of another by means of creating a false impression,[15] there is no substantive change to District law. The D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) has not explicitly held whether fraud or theft include obtaining property by reinforcing a false impression, preventing another from obtaining information, failing to correct a false impression that the defendant first created or when a person has a fiduciary or confidential relationship with another[16], or failing to disclose a lien or other adverse claim to property. However, the "deception" definition appears consistent with current theft and fraud law in several respects. First, the DCCA has held that both fraud and theft criminalize taking property of another by means of "false representation."[17] Second, the current fraud statute "Demonstration" means an act of marching, congregating, standing, sitting, lying down, parading, or patrolling by one or more persons, with or without signs, with the desire to persuade one or more individuals, or the public, or to protest some action, attitude, or belief.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "demonstration" is substantively identical[1] to the definition of "demonstration" in D.C. Code § 22-1307(b)(2). The RCC definition of "demonstration" is used in the revised offenses of unlawful demonstration[2] and contributing to the delinquency of a minor.[3]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "demonstration" is nearly identical to the definition of "demonstration" in D.C. Code § 22-1307(b)(2) and does not substantively change current District law. The phrase "for the purpose of" is changed to "with the desire to," so as to avoid confusion with the defined term "purpose" in RCC § 22E-206.

[1] The sole difference between the RCC definition and the current definition of "demonstration" in D.C. Code § 22-1307(b)(2) is that the former deletes the circular reference to "demonstrating" in the latter. Currently, D.C. Code § 22-1307(b)(2) states: "Demonstration" means marching, congregating, standing, sitting, lying down, parading, demonstrating, or patrolling by one or more persons, with or without signs, for the purpose of persuading one or more individuals, or the public, or to protest some action, attitude, or belief." "Deprive" means:

(A) Withhold property or cause it to be withheld from an owner permanently, or for so extended a period or under such circumstances that a substantial portion of its value or its benefit is lost to the owner; or

(B) Dispose of the property, or use or deal with the property so as to make it unlikely that the owner will recover it.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition includes "owner," itself a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means a person holding an interest in property that the actor is not privileged to interfere with.

The RCC definition of "deprive" replaces the current statutory definition of "deprive" in D.C. Code § 22-3201(2),[1] applicable to provisions in Chapter 32 of title 22.[2] The RCC definition of "deprive" is used in the revised offenses of robbery,[3] theft,[4] fraud,[5] financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult or elderly person,[6] extortion,[7] and possession of stolen property.[8]

Relation to Current District Law. The revised definition of "deprive" makes one clear change to the statutory definition of "deprive" in in D.C. Code § 22-3201(2), applicable to certain property offenses.[9] Subparagraph (A) of the current definition of "deprive" requires, in part, that the property be withheld "for so extended a period or under such circumstances as to acquire a substantial portion of its value." It is unclear whether this language includes a situation where the actor does not actually gain any value or benefit from the property, but causes an owner to lose value or benefit. In contrast, subparagraph (A) of the revised definition of "deprive" replaces "as to acquire a substantial portion of its value" in the current definition with "that a substantial portion of its value or its benefit is lost to the owner." The revised definition clearly includes situations where the actor does not actually gain any value or benefit, but causes an owner to lose it. In the rare situation where an actor gains a substantial portion of the value or benefit of the property without causing an owner to lose it a substantial portion of its value or benefit,[10] the revised definition of "deprive" is not satisfied and the conduct would be covered by unauthorized use of property in RCC § 22E-2102.

The remaining changes to the statutory definition of "deprive" in in D.C. Code § 22-3201(2)[11] are clarificatory and not intended to change District law. The revised definition of "deprive" replaces two references to "a person" with "an owner," a defined term in 22E-701 meaning a person holding an interest in property with which the accused is not privileged to interfere without consent. Subparagraph (b) of the current definition of "deprive" uses the term "owner,"[12] but it is not a statutorily defined term in the current D.C. Code. Replacing the two references to "a person" with "an owner" clarifies the revised definition.

Code 22-3201(2) ("'Deprive' means: (A) To withhold property or cause it to be withheld from a person permanently or for so extended a period or under such circumstances as to acquire a substantial portion of its value; or (B) To dispose of the property, or use or deal with the property so as to make it unlikely that the owner will recover it.").

"Detection device" means any wearable equipment with location tracking capability, including global positioning system and radio frequency identification technologies.

Explanatory Note. The RCC defines "detection device" to mean any wearable equipment with location tracking capability, such as global positioning system ("GPS"), or radio frequency identification ("RFID") technology. A detection device is any technology installed on a person's body or clothing that is capable of monitoring the person's whereabouts. It includes mechanisms such as bracelets, anklets, tags, and microchips. It explicitly includes the GPS that is currently used by the Pretrial Services Agency, Court Services and Offender Supervision Agency, and Court Social Services. It also explicitly includes the RFID technology that is currently used by the Department of Corrections.[1] It is also intended to capture other wearable equipment that may be developed in the future.

The word "wearable" modifies "electronic monitoring," "global positioning system," and "radio frequency identification technology." Accordingly, the definition does not include surveillance devices that are not worn, such as video cameras, infrared cameras, and international mobile subscriber identity-catchers (which intercept cellular phone traffic). The term refers to the physical device itself and does not include the records or reports that it generates.

The RCC definition of "detection device" replaces the current definition of "device" in D.C. Code § 22-1211(a)(2),[2] applicable to the offense tampering with a detection device. The RCC definition of "detection device" is used in the revised offense of tampering with a detection device.[3]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "detection device" may change the current definition of "device" in D.C. Code § 22-1211(a)(2) in one main way. Current law defines the term "device" to "includes a bracelet, anklet, or other equipment with electronic monitoring capability or global positioning system or radio frequency identification technology." Case law has not addressed the term's meaning. The revised code completely defines the meaning of the term instead of providing a partial definition as to what is included, and specifies that a detection device means any "wearable" monitoring equipment. This change improves the clarity of the revised offense.

"District official" has the same meaning as "public official" in D.C. Code § 1-1161.01(47)(A) - (H).

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "District official" is new, the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code (although the current protection of District public officials statute defines "official or employee" in D.C. Code § 22-851[1]). The RCC definition of "District official" replaces the current definition of "official or employee" in D.C. Code § 22-851, applicable to the current protection of District public officials statute. The RCC definition of "District official" is used in the RCC definition of a "protected person,"[2] and in the revised offenses of murder,[3] manslaughter,[4] assault,[5] criminal threats,[6] offensive physical contact,[7] kidnapping,[8] criminal restraint,[9] stalking,[10] and impersonation of an official.[11]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "District official" makes one clear change to the statutory definition of "official or employee" in D.C. Code § 22-851.[12] The current definition of "employee or official" is "a person who currently holds or formerly held a paid or unpaid position in the legislative, executive, or judicial branch of government of the District of Columbia, including boards and commissions."[13] In contrast, the revised definition, by incorporating the definition of "public official" in D.C. Code § 1-1161.01(47)(A) – (H)[14] is limited to District officials and employees that have special obligations in District government.[15] The RCC definition of "District official" improves the proportionality of the revised offenses against persons.

As applied to several RCC offenses against persons, the RCC definition of "District official" substantively changes current District law. For example, the RCC assault statute (RCC § 22E-1202) incorporates enhanced penalties for assaults committed against a "District official" while in the course of official duties (through the RCC definition of "protected person"), as well as for assaults committed "with the purpose of harming" a "District official" due to his or her status as a "District official." The District's current assault and related statutes do not have any such enhanced penalties, although such assaultive conduct is prohibited under D.C. Code § 22-851.[16] In contrast, the RCC assault statute incorporates enhanced penalties for assaults against a "District official" directly into the gradations of the offense, part of the general repeal of D.C. Code § 22-851. The revised definition of "District official," limited to District officials and employees that have special obligations in District government,[17] improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense.

The commentaries to relevant RCC offenses against persons discuss in detail the effect of the RCC definition of "District official" on current District law.

"Domestic partner" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 32-701(3).

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "domestic partner" replaces the current definition of "domestic partner" in D.C. Code § 22-3001(4A),[1] applicable to the the provisions in Chapter 30, Sexual Abuse. The RCC definition of "domestic partner" is used in the RCC definition of "position of trust with or authority over"[2] and the revised provision for the admission of evidence in sexual assault and related cases.[3]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "domestic partner" is identical to the statutory definition in current law.[4]

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "domestic partnership" replaces the current definition of "domestic partnership" in D.C. Code § 22-3001(4B),[1] applicable to the provisions in Chapter 30, Sexual Abuse. The RCC definition of "domestic partnership" is used in the RCC definition of "position of trust with or authority over,"[2] as well as in the revised offenses of sexual abuse of a minor,[3] sexual abuse by exploitation,[4] sexually suggestive contact with a minor,[5] enticing a minor into sexual conduct,[6] incest,[7] distribution of an obscene image to a minor,[8] creating or trafficking an obscene image of a minor,[9] possession of an obscene image of a minor,[10] arranging a live sexual performance of a minor,[11] and attending or viewing a live sexual performance of a minor.[12]

"Dwelling" means a structure that at the time of the offense is either designed or actually used for lodging or residing overnight, including, in multi-unit buildings, communal areas secured from the general public.

Explanatory Note. The word "structure" is notably broader than the term "building," which is also defined in RCC § 22E-701. A structure need not be affixed to land and includes vehicles and tents, if used as housing.

The RCC definition of "dwelling" is new; the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code (although undefined references to "dwelling" are in several current property offenses[1]). The RCC definition of "dwelling" is used in the revised definition of "position of trust with or authority over,"[2] as well as the revised offenses of arson,[3] reckless burning,[4] trespass,[5] burglary,[6] public nuisance,[7] breach of home privacy,[8] and indecent exposure.[9]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "dwelling" is new and does not substantively change District law.

As applied in the revised burglary statute, the term "dwelling" clarifies, but does not substantively change, District law. The current burglary statute does not define the term. District case law has held that it includes the secured communal areas of multi-unit buildings.[10] The DCCA has also interpreted the phrase "dwelling, or room used as a sleeping apartment."[11] The revised code adds a definition of "dwelling" to be used universally throughout the RCC. This change applies consistent, clearly articulated definitions and improves the clarity of the revised offenses.

"Effective consent" means consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "effective consent" is new, the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code (although the closely-related term "consent" is currently codified in D.C. Code § 22-3001(4),[1] applicable to provisions in Chapter 30, Sexual Abuse, and the undefined term is used in numerous other Title 22 statutes[2]). The RCC definition of "effective consent" replaces, in relevant part,[3] the current definition of "consent" in D.C. Code § 22-3001(4) and is used in numerous RCC provisions.

Relation to Current District law. The RCC breaks the current D.C. Code definition of "consent" in D.C. Code § 22-3001(4), applicable to sex offense provisions, and the general concept of consent into two terms. The RCC definition of "consent" (see commentary entry above) refers to the bare fact of an agreement by a competent and reasonable person obtained by any means, while the RCC definition of "effective consent" refers to agreements that are obtained by means other than the use of physical force, an express or implied coercive threat, or deception.[4] While the RCC definition of "consent" substantively changes current District law with respect to D.C. Code § 22-3001(4) in one way and does not substantively change District law referencing the term in connection with Code § 22-3001(4) ("'Consent' means words or overt actions indicating a … agreement to the sexual act or contact in question."). Meanwhile the RCC definition of "effective consent" corresponds to the later part of the first sentence and the second sentence of the current definition of "consent" in D.C. Code § 22-3001("'Consent' means … a freely given agreement…. Lack of verbal or physical resistance or submission by the victim, resulting from the use of force, threats, or coercion by the defendant shall not constitute consent.").

[4] The RCC definition of "consent" corresponds to the first part of the first sentence of the current definition of "consent" in D.C. Code § 22-3001(4) ("'Consent' means words or overt actions indicating a … agreement to the sexual act or contact in question."). Meanwhile the RCC definition of "effective consent" corresponds to the later part of the first sentence and the second sentence of the current definition of "consent" in D.C. Code § 22-3001("'Consent' means … a freely given agreement…. Lack of verbal or physical resistance or submission by the victim, resulting from the use of force, threats, or coercion by the defendant shall not constitute consent.").

other statutory provisions, the RCC definition of "effective consent" may substantively change current District law in multiple aspects.

The RCC definition of "effective consent" makes one possible substantive change to the current definition of "coercion" in D.C. Code § 22-3001(4), applicable to sex offense provisions. The current definition of "consent" in D.C. Code § 22-3001(4) for the sex offense statutes requires that the agreement between the actor and the complainant to engage in sexual conduct be "freely given." The meaning of "freely given" is ambiguous as to whether it includes agreements based on deception, and DCCA case law does not address the matter. The RCC definition of "effective consent" resolves this ambiguity by stating that an agreement caused by deception is not "effective consent." "Deception" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that explicitly excludes minor "puffery."[5] To the extent that a person agrees to conduct based on a deception, it is questionable whether there is an "agreement," let alone one that is "freely given" under current District law. This change clarifies and improves the consistency of the revised statutes.

The RCC definition of "effective consent" also clarifies the current definition of "consent" in D.C. Code § 22-3001(4), which applies to sex offense provisions in Chapter 30. The current statute, besides saying that consent must be "freely given," states separately that: "Lack of verbal or physical resistance or submission by the victim, resulting from the use of force, threats, or coercion by the defendant shall not constitute consent."[6] However, the RCC definition of "effective consent" eliminates this second sentence as unnecessary and potentially confusing. The sentence in the current statute appears to provide a specific example of when a "freely given agreement" is not reached—namely, when there is a "lack of verbal or physical resistance or submission by the victim resulting from the use of force, threats, or coercion…." The RCC definition of "effective consent" generally excludes consent obtained by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, and deception, and communicates the same point in a more general way that is applicable to all offenses in the RCC. This change clarifies the revised statute.

The RCC definition of "effective consent" also clarifies references to the term "consent" in various offenses against persons in Title 22 of the current D.C. Code. Current District law has not codified a definition of "consent" for offenses against persons outside of Chapter 30 Sex Offenses, however the term has been used in case law concerning some offenses against persons. For example, two DCCA rulings state that, in certain circumstances, "consent" is a defense to the District's simple assault statute and is not a defense to the District's felony assault statute.[7] Although the rulings do not define the [5] In addition, the RCC nonconsensual sexual conduct offense (RCC § 22E-1307) limits liability for engaging in a sexual act or sexual contact by deception to instances where the actor used deception as to the nature of the sexual act or sexual contact. Examples of deception as to the nature of the sexual act or sexual contact include deceptions as to: the object or body part that is used to penetrate the other person; a person's current use of birth control (e.g. use of a condom or IUD); and a person's health status (e.g. having a sexually transmitted disease). precise meaning of "consent," there was a recognition in one case that forms of forced consent are clearly not intended to be a defense to assaultive conduct.[8] Regarding a consent defense to the non-violent sexual touching form of simple assault, case law has said the consent may be "actual or apparent"[9] without discussing the difference between these terms.[10] The RCC definition of "effective consent" is consistent with and further clarifies existing the meaning of the term "consent" for offenses against persons.

The RCC definition of "effective consent" also clarifies references to the term "consent" in current Title 22 property offenses. Current District law has not codified a definition of either "effective consent" or "consent" for property offenses, nor does case law discuss these terms or concepts at length in property offenses. However, there are similar terms and phrases in current property statutes and case law. On a few occasions, the DCCA has recognized the relevance of consent in proving many property offenses.[11] Consent is also an explicit element in several of the District's current property offenses, such as the current extortion offense[12] and unauthorized use of a motor vehicle offense.[13] Further, the current definition of "appropriate" in Chapter 30 of the D.C. Code makes use of "without authority or right,"[14] which is roughly in line with the RCC's definition of consent. Additionally, DCCA case law has acknowledged that an agent's consent is relevant to determining whether a defendant has been given consent by the actual owner of the property,[15] and some current offense definitions explicitly include agents.[16] The RCC definition of "effective consent" is consistent with and further clarifies existing the meaning of the term for property offenses.

The commentaries to relevant RCC provisions further discuss the effect of the RCC definition of "effective consent" on current District law.

"Elderly person" means a person who is 65 years of age or older.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "elderly person" replaces the current definition of "elderly person" in D.C. Code § 22-932(3),[1] applicable to provisions in Chapter 9A, Criminal Abuse and Neglect of Vulnerable Adults. The RCC definition of "elderly person" is used in the revised offenses of criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person,[2] criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person,[3] and financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult or elderly person,[4] as well as in the financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult or elderly person civil provisions.[5]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "elderly person" is identical to the statutory definition under current law.[6]

"Factual cause" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-204.

Explanatory Note. The definition of "factual cause" exclusively appears in RCC § 22E-204 and is addressed in the Commentary accompanying the statute.

"Fair market value" means the price which a purchaser who is willing but not obligated to buy would pay an owner who is willing but not obligated to sell, considering all the uses to which the property is adapted and might reasonably be applied.

Explanatory Note. In the RCC, "fair market value" is defined as the price "which a purchaser who is willing, but not obligated to buy, would pay an owner who is willing, but not obligated to sell, considering all the uses to which the property is adapted and might reasonably be applied."

The RCC definition of "fair market value" is new, the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code. The RCC definition of "fair market value" is used in the RCC definitions of "amount of damage"[1] and "value."[2]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "fair market value" is may substantively change current District law in one way.

The RCC definition of "fair market value" is taken from Nichols v. United States,[3] a malicious destruction of property case. It is also the definition that the jury instructions use for "value."[4] However, he DCCA has recognized at least two other definitions of fair market value in the context of other property offenses.[5] These definitions of "fair market value" differ from the Nichols definition by not specifically requiring that the buyer and seller be willing, but not obligated, or that all reasonable uses of the property be considered. There is no DCCA case law that discusses whether the variations between the definitions of fair market value are substantive. Given the ambiguity of the case law, adopting the more expansive Nichols definition of "fair market value" could be viewed as a substantive change in law.

"False knuckles" means an object, whether made of metal, wood, plastic, or other similarly durable material that is constructed of one piece, the outside part of which is designed to fit over and cover the fingers on a hand and the inside part of which is designed to be gripped by the fist.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "false knuckles" replaces the current definition of "knuckles" in D.C. Code § 22-4501, applicable to provisions in Chapter 45, Weapons and Possession of Weapons. The RCC definition of "false knuckles" is used in the revised definition of "dangerous weapon."[1]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "false knuckles" is identical to the statutory definition of "knuckles" under current law.[2] The word "false" clarifies that the term does not include a body part.

"Felony" means:

(A) An offense punishable by a term of imprisonment that is more than one year;

(B) In other jurisdictions, an offense punishable by death; or

(C) First or Second Degree Parental Kidnapping under RCC § 16-1022.

Explanatory Note. The RCC defines "felony" for all offenses. The definition depends on the maximum penalty or whether in another jurisdiction the penalty is punishable by death. Principally, the definition captures offenses punishable by more than one year imprisonment. In addition, the term "felony" includes first and second degree parental kidnapping,[1] which is not punishable by a term of imprisonment of more than one year.[2] The RCC definition of "felony" is used in eight revised provisions[3] and three revised offenses.[4]

Relation to Current District Law. While there is no current D.C. Code definition of "felony," the RCC definition reflects current DCCA case law.[5] Specifying the "felony" includes parental kidnapping is consistent with current District law.[6]

[1] RCC § 16-1022.

[2] RCC § 16-1022 (h)(6) specifies that first and second degree parental kidnapping are designated as felonies, notwithstanding the maximum allowable penalties.

"Financial injury" means the reasonable monetary costs, debts, or obligations incurred by a natural person as a result of a criminal act, including:

(A) The costs of clearing a name, debt, credit rating, credit history, criminal record, or any other official record;

(B) The costs of repairing or replacing any property that was taken or damaged;

(C) Medical bills;

(D) Relocation costs;

(E) Lost wages or compensation; and

(F) Attorneys' fees.

Explanatory Note. The RCC defines "financial injury" to include all financial losses sustained as a result of a crime. The list of examples provided in the definition is not exhaustive. The loss may be incurred by any natural person, including the victim of a crime, a person who is financially responsible for the victim, and a person other than the victim who is threatened by the criminal conduct.[1] However, the loss may not be incurred by an agency or organization.[2] The factfinder must determine that the expenditures were reasonably necessitated by the criminal conduct.[3]

The costs of clearing a record include the litigation costs necessitated by a civil or administrative proceeding. The costs of repairing or replacing property should be calculated based on the cost actually reasonably incurred and not limited by market value at the time of the loss. Medical bills include health expenses paid by a natural person but exclude expenses paid by an insurance company. Relocation costs may include penalties for breaking a lease. Lost wages or compensation includes salaries, other earnings, and benefits. Attorneys' fees must reasonably result from the criminal act and must be reasonable in amount.

The RCC definition of "financial injury" replaces the current definition of "financial injury" in D.C. Code §§ 22-3132(5) and 22-3227.01(1). The term "act" that is used in the definition of "financial injury" is defined elsewhere in RCC § 22E-701. The RCC definition of "financial injury" is used in the revised offenses of stalking,[4] electronic stalking,[5] identity theft,[6] and financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult or elderly person.[7]

[1] Consider, for example, a criminal offense in which an actor stalks a victim by repeatedly threatening to injure the victim's sibling, causing the sibling to relocate to a hidden residence. Although the sibling is not a victim of stalking conduct per se, the costs of relocation may qualify as a financial injury resulting from the stalking.

[2] For example, the costs incurred by a police department or court system are excluded from the calculation of a financial injury.

[3] Consider, for example, a person who relocates to an expensive, high-security apartment to avoid a stalker. The jury will first have to decide whether it was reasonable to relocate under the circumstances. Then the jury will have to decide which expenses incurred as a result of the move were reasonably necessary, e.g., the moving truck, the rent increase, the cost of furnishing the new apartment.

[4] RCC § 22E-1801.

[5] RCC § 22E-1802.

[6] RCC § 22E-2205.

[7] RCC § 22E-2208.

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "financial injury" makes two substantive changes to the current definition of "financial injury" in D.C. Code §§ 22-3132(5) and 22-3227.01(1).

First, the revised definition includes costs incurred by any natural person. Current D.C. Code § 22-3132(5) limits the calculation of financial injury to expenses incurred by the victim, a member of the victim's household, a person whose safety is threatened by the stalking, or a person who is financially responsible for the victim. In contrast, the revised definition includes costs incurred by anyone, so long as they are reasonably related to the criminal act. This change applies consistent, clearly articulated definitions, improves the clarity of the revised offenses, and fills an unnecessary gap in liability.

Second, the revised definition explicitly requires that the costs be "reasonably incurred" as a result of the criminal act. The current statutes do not specify that the calculation of financial injury must be objectively reasonable. In contrast, the revised statute explicitly requires a rational and justifiable nexus between the criminal act and the resulting expenditures. This change applies consistent, clearly articulated definitions and improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised offenses.

"Firearm" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 7-2501.01, except that in Chapter 41 of this title the term "firearm":

(A) Shall not include a firearm frame or receiver;

(B) Shall not include a firearm muffler or silencer; an

(C) Shall include operable antique pistols.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "firearm" replaces the current definition of "firearm" in D.C. Code § 22-4501 and the exceptions provision in D.C. Code § 22-4513. The RCC definition of "firearm" is used in the revised definitions of "bump stock,"[1] "dangerous weapon,"[2] and "imitation firearm,"[3] as well as in sixteen revised offenses[4] and four revised provisions.[5]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "firearm" is identical to the statutory definition of "firearm" under current D.C. Code Title 22 Chapter 45,[6] except that it does not include frames, receivers, mufflers, or silencers. The RCC instead separately criminalizes silencers as a firearm accessory in the revised possession of a prohibited weapon or accessory offense.[7]

As applied in the revised possession of a dangerous weapon during a crime offense, the revised definition may change current law in one way. The revised definition categorically excludes toy and antique pistols unsuitable for use as firearms. Current D.C. Code § 22-4513 excludes toys and antiques for all sections in Chapter 45 of Title 22 except possession of a firearm during a crime of violence or dangerous crime,[8] possession of a prohibited weapon with intent to use unlawfully against another,[9] and the while armed enhancement.[10] In contrast, the revised code combines these three provisions into two offenses titled possession of a dangerous weapon with intent to commit crime[11] and possession of a dangerous weapon during a crime.[12] The revised offenses criminalize possession of a toy or antique firearm if used as an imitation firearm or as a dangerous weapon. An imitation firearm is "any instrument that resembles an actual firearm, closely enough, that a person observing it might reasonably believe it to be real."[13] Dangerous weapons include "any object, other than a body part, that in the manner of its actual, attempted, or threatened use is likely to cause death or serious bodily injury to a person."[14]

"Firearms instructor" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 7-2501.01.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "firearms instructor" is new; the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code. The RCC definition of "firearms instructor" is used in the revised exclusions from liability for weapons offenses provision.[1]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "firearms instructor" is new and does not itself substantively change existing District law.

"Ghost gun" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 7-2501.01.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "ghost gun" cross-references to the definition of the term as currently[1] defined in D.C. Code § 7-2501.01. The RCC definition of "ghost gun" is used in the revised offense of possession of a prohibited weapon or accessory.[2]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "ghost gun" is identical to the definition in existing District law.

[1] The term is defined in the Omnibus Public Safety and Justice Amendment Act of 2020, Act A23-0568 (projected law date of May 18, 2021).

"Halfway house" means any building or building grounds located in the District of Columbia that are used for the confinement of persons participating in a work release program under D.C. Code § 24-241.01.

Explanatory Note. Building grounds refers to the area of land occupied by the correctional facility and its yard and outbuildings, with a clearly identified perimeter. A work release program is a program established under D.C. Code § 24-241.01.

The RCC definition of "halfway house" is new; the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code (although similar language is used in the current escape from institution or officer[3] offense). The term "building" that is used in the definition of "halfway house" is defined elsewhere in RCC § 22E-701. The RCC definition of "halfway house" is used in the revised escape from a correctional facility or officer[4] offense.

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "halfway house" is new and does not substantively change District law.

As applied in the revised escape from a correctional facility or officer offense, the term "halfway house" may substantively change District law. D.C. Code § 22-2601 uses the phrase "penal or correctional institution or facility" but does not define it. Case law has held that the phrase includes the District's halfway houses.[5] In contrast, the revised code separately defines "correctional facility," "halfway house," and "secure juvenile detention facility" to be used universally throughout the RCC. This change applies consistent, clearly articulated definitions and improves the clarity of the revised offenses.

"Health professional" means a person required to obtain a District license, registration, or certification in D.C. Code § 3-1205.01.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "health professional" is new, the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code. The RCC definition of "health professional" is used in the revised defenses for special responsibility for care, discipline, or safety[1] and temporary possession,[2] the revised provision for principles of liability governing intoxication,[3] and the revised offenses of sexual abuse by exploitation[4] and trafficking of drug paraphernalia.[5]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "health professional" may substantively change current District law as applied to the revised sexual abuse by exploitation statute. The current sexual abuse of a patient or client statutes do not specify the medical professionals that fall within the scope of the statute.[6] The revised sexual abuse by exploitation statute, by using a defined term in current District civil law for "health professional," clarifies the scope of the revised statute. The commentary to the revised sexual abuse by exploitation statute discusses this change further.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "healthcare provider" is new, the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code. The RCC definition of "healthcare provider" is used in the revised offense of sexual abuse by exploitation.[1]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "healthcare provider" may substantively change current District law as applied to the revised sexual abuse by exploitation statute. The current sexual abuse of a patient or client statutes do not specify the medical professionals that fall within the scope of the statute.[2] The revised sexual exploitation of an adult statute, by using a defined term in current District civil law for "healthcare provider," clarifies the scope of the revised statute. The commentary to the revised sexual abuse by exploitation statute discusses this change further.

"Homelessness" means the status or circumstance of an individual who:

(A) Lacks a fixed, regular, and adequate nighttime residence; or

(B) Has a primary nighttime residence that is:

(i) A supervised, publicly or privately operated shelter designed to provide temporary living accommodations, including motels, hotels, congregate shelters, and transitional housing for persons with a mental illness;

(ii) An institution that provides a temporary residence for individuals expected to be institutionalized; or

(iii) A public or private place not designed for, or ordinarily used as, a regular sleeping accommodation for human beings.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "homelessness" is taken almost verbatim from the current bias related crime statute in D.C. Code § 22-3701,[1] and is intended to have the same meaning as under current law. The RCC definition of a "homelessness" replaces the definition of "homelessness" in D.C. Code § 22-3701. The RCC definition of "homelessness" is used in the revised hate crime penalty enhancement,[2] and in the revised hate crime penalty enhancement civil provisions.[3]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "homelessness" is nearly identical[4] to the definition in the current bias related crime statute,[5] and does not change current District law.

[1] The revised definition refers to a "housing facility" rather than a "shelter" as used in current D.C. Code § 22-3701. The reference to "housing facility" is less confusing and is in accord with the definition of "homeless" in D.C. Code § 4–751.01 (18).

"Image" means a visual depiction, other than a depiction rendered by hand, including a video, film, photograph, or hologram, whether in print, electronic, magnetic, digital, or other format.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "image" is new; the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code (although undefined references to "image" are in some current Title 22 offenses[1]). The RCC definition of "image" is used in the revised definitions of "audiovisual recording,"[2] "live broadcast,"[3] "personal identifying information,"[4] and "recording device,"[5] in the revised offenses of electronic stalking,[6] voyeurism,[7] unauthorized disclosure of a sexual recording,[8] distribution of an obscene image,[9] distribution of an obscene image to a minor,[10] creating or trafficking an obscene image of a minor,[11] possession of an obscene image of a minor,[12] and unlawful labeling of a recording,[13] and in the revised identity theft civil provisions.[14]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "image" is new and does not itself substantively change existing District law. As applied in the revised voyeurism and unauthorized disclosure of sexual recordings statutes,[15] the revised definition may change current District law. D.C. Code § 22-3531(d)(1) makes it unlawful to "capture an image" of a person's private area without permission. The term "image" is not defined in the statute and District case law has not addressed its meaning. It is unclear whether "capture an image" has the same meaning as "electronically record" in § 22-3531(c)(1). It is also unclear whether "image" includes both refers to both "visual" and "aural images."[16] It is also unclear whether the term "image" includes a "series of images"[17] or a derivative image (e.g., a photograph of a photograph, a screenshot). revised code defines the term "image," as described herein. This definition may broaden the offense by including images that are captured without an electronic device (such as those captured using a mechanically-operated camera)[18] but may narrow the offense by excluding images that are hand-drawn or illustrated on an electronic device (such as a tablet). The definition also clarifies that a film or video constitutes a single image, not a series of images.

As applied in the creating or trafficking an obscene image of a minor and revised possession of an obscene image of a minor statutes,[19] the revised definition may change current District law. The current sexual performance of a minor statute defines "performance" as "any play, motion picture, photograph, electronic representation, dance, or any other visual presentation or exhibition."[20] There is no DCCA case law on the precise scope of "any visual presentation or exhibition," but the legislative history for the current statute seems to indicate that paintings, sculptures, and other hand rendered depictions would be included.[21] However, there are constitutional concerns with banning the creation, distribution, and possession of images that are hand-rendered because these depictions may not be based on real children engaged sexual conduct.[22] Resolving this ambiguity, through the definition of "image" in RCC § 22E-701, the revised creating or trafficking an obscene [18] While the current voyeurism statute counterintuitively defines an "electronic device" in to include "mechanical" equipment D.C. Code § 22-3531(a)(1), the voyeurism statute restricts liability in D.C. Code § 22-3531(c)(1) not to installation or use of an "electronic device" but to the act of "electronically record[ing]" which appears to exclude use of a mechanical or film-based camera. See D.C. Code § 22-3531(c)(1) ("Except as provided in subsection (e) of this section, it is unlawful for a person to electronically record, without the express and informed consent of the individual being recorded, an individual who is…"). Similarly, the exception to liability for images taken during medical procedures in the current D.C. Code is limited to "electronically recording" and appears to leave liability for use of a mechanical or film-based camera for no apparent reason. See D.C. Code § 22-3531(e)(4) ("Any electronic recording of a medical procedure which is conducted under circumstances where the patient is unable to give consent.").

[21] See Council of the District of Columbia, Report of the Committee of the Judiciary, Bill 4-305, The "District of Columbia Protection of Minors Act of 1982" at 8 (stating that the definition of "performance" is mean to "to include any visual presentation or exhibition without regard to the medium.").

[22] In New York v. Ferber, the Supreme Court established that live or visual sexual depictions of real children do not have to be "obscene" and are not entitled to First Amendment protection. Specifically, the Court held that a New York statute did not violate the First Amendment when the statute banned the production and distribution of live or visual depictions of specified sexual conduct with minors and had a mental state requirement for the defendant. New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747, 764-66 (1982). Although Ferber was specific to the creation and distribution of visual sexual depictions of minors, the Court later held in Osborne v. Ohio that a state can constitutionally proscribe "the possession and viewing of child pornography" due, in part, to the same rationales the Court accepted in Ferber. Osborne v. Ohio, 459 U.S. 103, 111 (1990). In Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, the Supreme Court struck down as unconstitutionally overbroad a federal statute on sexual images of minors in part because it applied to "any visual depiction" without regard to whether it was obscene, however, the ruling did not turn on the medium or method visual representation. This case law is discussed further in the commentaries to the revised creating or trafficking of an obscene image of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1807) and the revised possession of an obscene image of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1808).

image of a minor statute and the revised possession of an obscene image of a minor statute are limited to images that are not hand-rendered. However, the RCC may still criminalize the underlying sexual conduct that is depicted in the hand-rendered image.[23] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and constitutionality of the revised statutes.

As applied in the revised identity theft civil provisions RCC § 22E-2206, the revised definition of "image" clarifies current District law. The term "District of Columbia public record" is defined in D.C. Code § 22-3227.05 to include a "photographic image[.]"[24] Current law does not specify whether "photographic images" include images stored in print, electronic, magnetic, or digital formats. The term "photographic image" is not defined in the current statute, and there is no relevant DCCA case law. This corresponding RCC provision in RCC § 22E-2206 was copied verbatim from the current D.C. Code § 22-3227.05 and provides procedures to correct District of Columbia public records that contain false information as a result of identity theft. By use of the RCC definition of "image," the revised statute clarifies that photographic images includes print, electronic, magnetic, or digital formats.

The commentaries to specific RCC offenses using the revised definition may discuss further the effect of the revised definition on current District law for that specific offense.

[23] For example, if a defendant forced a minor to have sex with an adult and sketched a drawing of the encounter, there would be no liability under the creating or trafficking statute because a sketch is not an "image" as defined in the RCC. However, the defendant would be liable under the RCC sexual assault statute (RCC § 22E-1301) for the use of force.

"Imitation dangerous weapon" means an object used or fashioned in a manner that would cause a reasonable person to believe that the object is a dangerous weapon.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "imitation dangerous weapon" is new, the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code (although the undefined term "imitation pistol" is used in two current statutes[1] and the undefined term "imitation firearm" is used in four others[2]). [The Commission has not yet issued recommendations for weapons offenses or enhancements.] The term "dangerous weapon" that is used in the definition of "imitation dangerous weapon" is defined elsewhere in RCC § 22E-701. The RCC definition of "imitation dangerous weapon" is used in the revised definition of "Class A contraband,"[3] as well as the revised offenses of robbery,[4] assault,[5] criminal threats,[6] sexual assault,[7] sexual abuse of a minor,[8] kidnapping,[9] and criminal restraint.[10]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "imitation dangerous weapon" is new and does not substantively change District law.

As applied in the revised offenses against persons of robbery, assault, menacing, sexual assault, kidnapping, and criminal restraint, the term "imitation dangerous weapon" is generally, but not entirely, consistent with current District case law defining an imitation pistol or firearm, and current District practice.

In several cases, the DCCA has upheld jury instructions stating, with minor variations, that "[a]n imitation [pistol] is any object that resembles an actual firearm closely enough that a person observing it in the circumstances would reasonably believe it to be a [pistol]."[11] District practice appears to rely on a similar definition at present.[12] The revised definition similarly provides that any object may be an imitation weapon if it is used or fashioned in a manner that would cause a reasonable person to believe that the article is a dangerous weapon. Codification of this definition clarifies District law. However, the definition of "imitation dangerous weapon" is not included in the list of per se (inherently) dangerous weapons in RCC § 22E-701. Combined with the fact that the revised assault and robbery statutes criminalize causing bodily injury by means of a dangerous weapon, the RCC imitation dangerous weapon definition often[13] will preclude penalty enhancements for assaults or robberies involving imitation dangerous weapons.[14] However, the RCC does provide enhanced liability for use of imitation dangerous weapons in the aggravated criminal menace statute, RCC § 22E-1203, and in fourth degree robbery based on displaying an imitation weapon, in RCC § 22E-1201. The RCC's manner of addressing the use of imitation dangerous weapons ensures that such weapons are penalized the same as real dangerous weapons when used with intent to frighten victims. However, imitation dangerous weapons are not treated as automatically equivalent to real dangerous weapons when grading more serious assault and robbery charges involving actual harms and actual risks of death or serious bodily injury. By confining penalty enhancements for imitation dangerous weapons to intent-to-frighten offenses, the proportionality of District offenses involving an imitation weapon is improved.[15]

[13] Even though imitation weapons are not per se dangerous weapons in the RCC, it is still is possible, depending on the facts of a particular case, that an imitation weapon (e.g. a starter pistol) constitutes a dangerous weapon per RCC § 22E-1001(5)(F) due to the manner in which it is used (e.g. "pistol-whipping" a victim) to inflict injury.

[14] A defendant may still be liable for assault by virtue of causing the other person harm, even if the imitation weapon does not make the person liable for an enhanced assault gradation.

[15] The RCC definition of "imitation weapon" resolves judicial concern that has been expressed over whether to distinguish an object designed as an imitation dangerous weapon (e.g., a starter gun) and an object that merely appears to the victim to be a dangerous weapon (e.g., a cell phone, metal pipe, or finger used in a manner that it reasonably appears to be a dangerous weapon) for purposes of assessing penalties. See Washington v. United States, 135 A.3d 325, 332 (D.C. 2016) (C.J. Washington, concurring)(Concluding from legislative history that the actual design of the object rather than a victim's perception is the critical consideration for whether an object is an imitation firearm for purposes of District's assault with a deadly weapon and possession of firearm during crime of violence statutes). Under the RCC definition of an imitation dangerous weapon, objects not fashioned or designed to look like a dangerous weapon (e.g., a finger jabbed into someone's back) may nonetheless be an "imitation dangerous weapon." However, such additional liability for the use of such "imitation dangerous weapons" is provided in the RCC only for aggravated criminal menace, second degree robbery based on an aggravated criminal menace, and [other revised offenses against persons], but not assault.

As applied in the revised correctional facility contraband statute, the term "imitation dangerous weapon" clarifies, but does not substantively change, District law. The current statute uses the phrase "imitation firearm" but does not define it.[16]

[16] D.C. Code § 22-2603.01(2)(A)(iii).

"Imitation firearm" means any instrument that resembles an actual firearm closely enough that a person observing it might reasonably believe it to be real.

Explanatory Note. It is the actual design of the object rather than a victim's perception that is the critical consideration for whether an object is an imitation firearm.[1]

The RCC definition of "imitation firearm" is new, the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code (although undefined reference to "imitation firearm" and "imitation pistol" are in some current Title 22 provisions[2]). The term "firearm" used in the definition of "imitation firearm" is defined elsewhere in RCC § 22E-701. The RCC definition of "imitation firearm" is used in the revised offenses of burglary,[3] possession of a dangerous weapon with intent to commit crime,[4] possession of a dangerous weapon during a crime,[5] endangerment with a firearm,[6] trafficking of a controlled substance,[7] and trafficking of a counterfeit substance,[8] as well as in the revised civil provisions for licenses of firearms dealers.[9]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "imitation firearm" codifies the definition articulated by the D.C. Court of Appeals in Bates v. United States[10] and does not substantively change current District law.

"In fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207.

Explanatory Note. The definition of "in fact" is addressed in the Commentary accompanying RCC § 22E-207. The revised definition of "in fact" appears in numerous RCC provisions.

"Incapacitated individual" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 21-2011.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "incapacitated individual" is new, the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code. The term "incapacitated individual" is defined, however, in Title 21 of the D.C. Code[1] and that definition is incorporated by cross-reference in the RCC. The RCC definition of "incapacitated individual" is used in the revised definition of "person with legal authority over the complainant,"[2] in the revised special responsibility for care, discipline, or safety defense,[3] and in the revised offenses of kidnapping[4] and criminal restraint.[5]

Relation to Current District Law. The definition of "incapacitated individual" does not change current District law.

Explanatory Note. The definition of "knowingly" is addressed in the Commentary accompanying RCC § 22E-206. The revised definition of "knowingly" and other parts of speech, including "know," "known," "knows," "knowing," and "knowledge," appears in numerous RCC provisions.

"Labor" means work that has economic or financial value.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "labor" includes any work that has economic or financial value. The term is intended to include commercial sex acts.

"Labor" is currently defined in D.C. Code § 22-1831(6) for human trafficking statutes. The RCC definition of "labor" replaces the current definition of "labor" in D.C. Code § 22-1831(6) and is used in the RCC definition of "services,"[1] as well as in the revised offenses of forced labor,[2] trafficking in labor,[3] benefitting from human trafficking,[4] the misuse of documents in furtherance of human trafficking,[5] and fraud.[6]

Relation to Current District Law. The definition of "labor" makes one change that may constitute a substantive change to current District law that improves the clarity of the revised criminal code.

The current D.C. Code definition of "labor" makes no reference to commercial sex acts, referring generally only to acts that have "economic or financial value." Neither DCCA case law nor legislative history address whether "labor" includes commercial sex acts.[7] However, it is notable that the current human trafficking statutes sometimes appear to use the term "labor" as if it did not include commercial sex acts.[8] The RCC's "labor" definition is intended to include commercial sex acts in the definition of "labor." This change improve the clarity of the revised statute.

Code § 22-1833, entitled "Trafficking in labor or commercial sex acts" includes as an element that, "Coercion will be used or is being used to cause the person to provide labor or services or to engage in a commercial sex act". The specification of both "labor" and "commercial sex act" in the offense suggests the former does not include the latter. In addition, the current code defines "debt bondage" as "the status or condition of a person who provides labor, services*, or commercial sex acts*, for a real or alleged debt, where: (A) The value of the labor, services, or commercial sex acts, as reasonably assessed, is not applied toward the liquidation of the debt; (B) The length and nature of the labor, services, or commercial sex acts are not respectively limited and defined; or (C) The amount of the debt does not reasonably reflect the value of the items or services for which the debt was incurred." D.C. Code § 22-1831 (emphasis added). The inclusion of the words labor and commercial sex act may suggest that labor does not include commercial sex acts.

"Large capacity ammunition feeding device" means a magazine, belt, drum, feed strip, or similar device that has a capacity of, or that can be readily restored or converted to accept, more than 10 rounds of ammunition. The term "large capacity ammunition feeding device" shall not include an attached tubular device designed to accept, and capable of operating only with, .22 caliber rimfire ammunition.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "large capacity ammunition feeding device" is new, the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code. The RCC definition of "large capacity ammunition feeding device" is identical to the definition in D.C. Code § 7-2506.01 (Person permitted to possess ammunition). The term "ammunition" used in the definition of "large capacity ammunition feeding device" is defined elsewhere in RCC § 22E-701. The RCC definition of "large capacity ammunition feeding device" is used in the revised offense of possession of a prohibited weapon or accessory,[1] as well as in the revised civil provisions for taking and destruction of dangerous articles.[2]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "large capacity ammunition feeding device" is identical to the definition in D.C. Code § 7-2506.01 and does not substantively change current District law.

[2] RCC § 22E-4117.

"Law enforcement officer" means:

(A) An officer or member of the Metropolitan Police Department of the District of Columbia, or of any other police force operating in the District of Columbia;

(B) An investigative officer or agent of the United States;

(C) An on-duty, civilian employee of the Metropolitan Police Department;

(D) An on-duty, licensed special police officer;

(E) An on-duty, licensed campus police officer;

(F) An on-duty employee of the Department of Corrections or Department of Youth Rehabilitation Services; or

(G) An on-duty employee of the Court Services and Offender Supervision Agency, Pretrial Services Agency, or Family Court Social Services Division.

Explanatory Note. Subparagraph (A) includes Metropolitan Police Department officers and members (such as a reserve officers). It also includes other police departments operating in the District of Columbia. This includes organizations that operate regularly throughout the city, such as Metro Transit Police, Housing Authority Police, and Department of General Service Protective Services Police. It also includes officers who are working in a designated location on assignment, such as California Highway Patrol officers working at the National Law Enforcement Memorial. It does not include off-duty out-of-state officers.

Subparagraph (B) includes federal law enforcement officers such as Deputy U.S. Marshals, United States Park Police, and Capitol Police.

Subparagraphs (C) – (G) apply only when the person is on duty.[1] The phrases "licensed special police officer" and "licensed campus police officer" refer to persons who are duly authorized by law to act as special police officers or campus police officers.[2]

The RCC definition of "law enforcement officer" replaces the current statutory definitions of "law enforcement" in D.C. Code § 22-405(a)[3] applicable to assault on a police officer (APO), and D.C. Code § 22-2106(b)(1), applicable to murder of a law enforcement officer.[4] The RCC definition of "law enforcement officer" is used in seven revised provisions,[5] three revised definitions,[6] and twenty-two revised offenses.[7]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "law enforcement officer" makes one clear change to the statutory definition of "law enforcement officer" in D.C. Code § 22-405(a,)[8] applicable to assault on a police officer (APO).

The RCC definition of "law enforcement officer" no longer includes officers or members of a fire department operating in the District of Columbia or investigators or code inspectors employed by the government of the District of Columbia. These categories of individuals are included in the current definition of "law enforcement officer" for the APO statute, but not for the current murder of a law enforcement officer statute.[9] In contrast, in the RCC, these categories of individuals are included in the definition of "public safety employee," defined in RCC § 22E-701. This change clarifies District law by distinguishing persons who are regularly involved with criminal law enforcement from others who are not, and creating one broad, consistent definition as to who constitutes a "law enforcement officer."

The revised definition of "law enforcement officer" makes one possible change to the statutory definition of "law enforcement officer" in D.C. Code § 22-405(a,)[10] applicable to assault on a police officer (APO), and one possible change to the statutory definition of "law enforcement officer"in D.C. Code § 22-2106, applicable to murder of a law enforcement officer.

First, subparagraphs (C) – (G) of the revised definition include non-police officers such as licensed special police officers and licensed campus police officers, only when they are "on-duty." The definition of "law enforcement officer" in the current D.C. Code APO statute does not specify whether such individuals must be "on-duty" or "off-duty" to fall within the scope of the statute. There is no DCCA case law on this issue for the current APO statute, but in the context of a conviction for carrying a pistol without a license, the DCCA has stated that "a special police officer" will be considered a policeman or law enforcement officer "only to the extent that he acts in conformance with the regulations governing special officers."[11] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised definition of "law enforcement" requires that the non-police officers in subparagraphs (C) – (G) be "on-duty." There is no such requirement for subparagraphs (A) or (B) of the revised definition pertaining to police officers,[12] which is consistent with DCCA case law stating that the current APO statute includes "off-duty" police officers "provided they are engaged in the performance of official duties."[13] This change improves the clarity, consisntecy, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Second, the RCC definition of "law enforcement officer" does not include a federal, state, county, or municipal officer, investigator, or agent from a police force that does not operate in the District. Nor does it include an off-duty or out-of-state parole officer, and probation officer, or pretrial service officer. D.C. Code § 22-2106 criminalizes causing the death of a law enforcement officer on account of the performance of such officer's official duties. The term "law enforcement officer" there is defined to include officers who serve in the Metropolitan Police Department, District of Columbia Protective Services, District of Columbia Department of Corrections, or any probation, parole, supervised release, community supervision, or pretrial services officer of the Court Services and Offender Supervision Agency or The Pretrial Services Agency. In addition, the definition includes "[a]ny federal, state, county, or municipal officer performing functions comparable" to the District officers listed, "including state, county, or municipal police officers, sheriffs, correctional officers, parole officers, and probation and pretrial service officers." This definition provides no specific exception for off-duty officers from other jurisdictions or federal officers who perform these duties, so they may qualify as "law enforcement officers." There is no DCCA case law on point. The revised definition of "law enforcement officer" resolves this ambiguity and clarifies that off-duty non-federal officers from other jurisdictions who do not constitute "law enforcement officers" under the RCC. This change clarifies the revised statutes.

[12] However, the RCC definition of "protected person" requires that a law enforcement officer be "in the course of his or her official duties" in order for the "protected person" penalty enhancements to apply to a given RCC offense, which is consistent with this DCCA case law.

Other changes that the RCC definition of "law enforcement officer" makes to the current definition "law enforcement officer" in D.C. Code § 22-405(a),[14] applicable to assault on a police officer (APO), are clarificatory and do not substantively change District law.

First, the revised definition of "law enforcement officer" no longer specifically includes reserve MPD officers like the definition in the current APO statute. As is noted in the explanatory note, resesrve MPD officers are included in subparagraph (A) of the revised definition. This change improves the clarity of the revised statute.

Second, subparagraph (B) of the revised definition includes an investigative officer or agent of the United States. The definition of "law enforcement officer" in the current APO statute does not specifically list this type of officer or agent, but does broadly include "any officer or member of any police force operating and authorized to act in the District of Columbia."[15] This would appear to include federal investigative officers and agents. This change improves the clarity of the revised statute.

Third, subparagraph (E) of the revised definition specifically includes licensed campus police officers, in addition to licensed special police officers (subparagraph (D)). The definition of "law enforcement officer" in the current APO statute specifically includes "any licensed special police officer"[16] and licensed campus police officers perform a similar function. This change improves the clarity of the revised statute.

Third, subparagraph (F) of the revised definition does not include an express reference to any "officer or employee of the government of the District of Columbia charged with supervision of juveniles being confined pursuant to law in any facility of the District of Columbia regardless of whether such institution or facility is located within the District," as in the definition of "law enforcement officer" in the current APO statute.[17] The revised definition includes these employees as "on-duty employees of the Department of Youth Rehabilitation Services." This change improves the clarity of the revised statute.

The remaining changes to the definition of "law enforcement officer" in the current APO statute are non-substantive and clarificatory.[18] [18] The remaining changes to the definition of "law enforcement officer" are intended to be non-substantive, clarificatory wording changes as compared to the definition of "law enforcement officer" in the current APO statute. For example, subparagraph (G) of the revised definition of "law enforcement officer" pecifies an on-duty employee of the Court Services and Offender Supervision Agency, Pretrial Services Agency, or Family Court Social Services Divisoin, and deletes as surplsuage "any officer or employee" of the specified agencies "charged with intake, assessment, or community supervision" in the current definition in the current APO statute.

As applied to certain RCC offenses, the RCC definition of "law enforcement officer" may substantively change current District law. For example, the revised assault statute, which replaces the District's current APO statute (D.C. Code § 22-405), varies in scope as compared to the current APO statute in terms of the complainants that constitute a "law enforcement officer." In addition, some RCC offenses against persons, such as robbery, include enhanced penalties for a complainant that is a "law enforcement officer" in certain circumstances through gradations for a "protected person," which is a change to current District law.

The commentaries to relevant RCC offenses against persons discuss in detail the effect of the RCC definition of "law enforcement officer" on current District law.

"Legal cause" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-204.

Explanatory Note. The definition of "legal cause" exclusively appears in RCC § 22E-204 and is addressed in the Commentary accompanying the statute.

"Live broadcast" means a streaming video, or any other electronically transmitted image, for simultaneous viewing by an audience, including an audience of one person.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "live broadcast" is new; the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code. The RCC definition of "live broadcast" is used in the revised offense of attending or viewing a live sexual performance of a minor.[1]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "live broadcast" is new and does not itself substantively change existing District law. The commentaries to specific RCC offenses using the revised definition may discuss further the effect of the revised definition on current District law for that specific offense.

"Live performance" means a play, dance, or other visual presentation or exhibition for an audience, including an audience of one person.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "live performance" is new; the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code. The RCC definition of "live performance" is used in the revised offenses of arranging a live sexual performance of a minor,[1] attending or viewing a live sexual performance of a minor,[2] and unlawful creation or possession of a recording.[3]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "live performance" is new and does not itself substantively change existing District law. The commentaries to specific RCC offenses using the revised definition may discuss further the effect of the revised definition on current District law for that specific offense.

"Machine gun" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 7-2501.01.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "machine gun" is new; the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code. The RCC definition of "machine gun" is used in the revised offenses of possession of a prohibited weapon or accessory[1] and unlawful transfer of a firearm,[2] as well as in the revised civil provisions for licenses of firearms dealers.[3]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "machine gun" is new and does not itself substantively change existing District law.

"Misdemeanor" means an offense punishable by a term of imprisonment that is one year or less.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "midemeanor" depends on the maximum term of imprisonment. All offenses punishable by a term of imprisonment of one year or less, including any offenses punishable by fine only, are categorized as misdemeanor. The RCC definition of "misdemeanor" is used in the revised provisions for offense classification,[1] authorized terms of imprisonment,[2] authorized fines,[3] repeat offender penalty enhancement,[4] and pretrial release penalty enhancement,[5] as well as in the revised offenses of failure to appear after release on citation or bench warrant bond[6] and failure to appear in violation of a court order.[7]

Relation to Current District Law. While there is no current D.C. Code definition of a "misdemeanor," the RCC definition reflects current DCCA case law.[8]

Stephens v. United States, 106 U.S.App.D.C. 249, 250 n.1, 271 F.2d 832, 833 n.1 (1959).").

"Monitoring equipment or software" means equipment or software with location tracking capability, including global positioning system and radio frequency identification technologies.

Explanatory Note. Monitoring equipment or software is any technology that is capable of monitoring a person's whereabouts. Like the RCC definition of "detection device," "monitoring equipment" includes wearable mechanisms such as bracelets, anklets, tags, and microchips. However, unlike the RCC definition of "detection device," monitoring equipment also includes surveillance devices that are not worn. "Monitoring equipment or software" is intended to capture other equipment and software that may be developed in the future. The term refers to the equipment and software itself and does not include the records or reports that it generates.

The RCC definition of "monitoring equipment or software" is new; the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code (although the current stalking statute[1] includes a definition of "any device"[2] and undefined references to "monitor" and "place under surveillance"). The RCC definition of "monitoring equipment or software" is used in the revised offense of electronic stalking.[3]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "monitoring equipment or software" is new and does not itself substantively change existing District law. The commentaries to specific RCC offenses using the revised definition may discuss further the effect of the revised definition on current District law for that specific offense.

"Motor vehicle" means any automobile, all-terrain vehicle, self-propelled mobile home, motorcycle, truck, truck tractor with or without a semitrailer or trailer, bus, or other vehicle designed to be propelled only by an internal-combustion engine or electricity.

Explanatory Note. The RCC defines "motor vehicle" to include most self-propelled vehicles used for the transportation of persons. "Other vehicle designed to be propelled only by an internal-combustion engine or electricity" is intended to include motorized boats and aircraft. The "designed to be" language includes vehicles that happen to be moved by human exertion in a given case, but are "designed" to be propelled only by an internal-combustion engine or electricity.[1]

The RCC definition of "motor vehicle" replaces the definitions of "motor vehicle" in D.C. Code § 22-3215(a),[2] applicable to the unauthorized use of a motor vehicle statute, and D.C. Code § 22-3233(c)(2),[3] applicable to the altering or removing motor vehicle identification numbers statute. The RCC definition of "motor vehicle" is used in the RCC definition of "transportation worker"[4] and "vehicle identification number,"[5] in the revised offenses of robbery,[6] theft,[7] unauthorized use of a motor vehicle,[8] alteration of a motor vehicle identification number,[9] trespass,[10] possession of an open container or consumption of alcohol in a motor vehicle,[11] and in the revised civil provisions for lawful transportation of a firearm or ammunition.[12]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "motor vehicle" makes two clear changes to the statutory definitions of "motor vehicle" in D.C. Code § 22-3215(a)[13] and D.C. Code § 22-3233(c)(2).[14]

[14] D.C. Code § 22-3233(c)(2) (for the offense of altering or removing vehicle identification numbers, defining "motor vehicle" as "'Motor vehicle' means any automobile, self-

First, the revised definition of "motor vehicle" includes any vehicle "designed to be propelled only by an internal-combustion engine or electricity," which includes motorized boats and aircraft. The statutory definition of "motor vehicle" for the current unauthorized use of a motor vehicle (UUV) offense does not have such a provision.[15] The statutory definition for the alteration of a motor vehicle number (VIN) offense has a similar provision, but does not require that the vehicle be propelled "only" by internal-combustion engine or electricity.[16] In contrast, the revised definition of "motor vehicle" requires that the vehicle be "designed to be propelled only by an internal-combustion engine or electricity." This language includes motorized boats and aircraft and eliminates possible gaps in current District law.

Second, the revised definition of "motor vehicle" excludes vehicles such as mopeds, which are designed to be propelled, in whole or in part, by human exertion. The statutory definition of "motor vehicle" for the current UUV statute is limited to a list of specified vehicles,[17] although the DCCA has held that mopeds fall within this definition.[18] The statutory definition of "motor vehicle" for the VIN offense includes other vehicles "propelled by an internal-combustion engine, electricity, or steam."[19] In contrast, the revised definition of "motor vehicle" requires that the vehicle be "designed to be propelled only by an internal-combustion engine or electricity." This language excludes vehicles like mopeds, that are designed to be propelled, in part, by human exertion. These types of vehicles are generally not as expensive and do not pose the same safety risks to others that a "motor vehicle" does. Unauthorized use of vehicles such as mopeds, that fall outside the RCC definition of "motor vehicle," remains criminalized by the RCC unauthorized use of property offense (RCC § 22E-2102). This revision improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised definition.

Other changes to the statutory definitions of "motor vehicle" in D.C. Code § 22-3215(a) and D.C. Code § 22-3233(c)(2) are clarificatory and are not intended to change current District law.

First, the revised definition of "motor vehicle" no longer states that the definition includes "any non-operational vehicle that is being restored or repaired." This language is present in the current definition of "motor vehicle" for the VIN offense.[20] There is no

[18] In United States v. Stancil, the DCCA held that "[a]fter considering the language and history of the UUV statute, and the characteristics of the vehicle in question, we hold that a moped is a 'motor vehicle' for the purposes" of the then-current UUV statute." 422 A.2d 1285, 1286 (D.C. 1980). Stancil was decided under an earlier version of the UUV statute, but the definition of "motor vehicle" in this earlier statute is substantively identical to the current definition of "motor vehicle" and the case is still good law. The jury instruction for UUV adopts the holding in Stancil and includes "moped" in the definition of "motor vehicle." D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 5.302 cmt. at 5-42.

DCCA case law interpreting this language. The scope of this language is unclear and any non-operational vehicle that is being restored or repaired would still qualify as a "motor vehicle" if the other requirements of the revised definition are met. Deleting this language improves the clarity of the revised definition without changing current District law.

Second, the revised definition includes a reference to all-terrain vehicles. The DCCA has held that all-terrain vehicles[21] fall within the current definition of "motor vehicle" for the purpose of the UUV statute, and such all-terrain vehicles would satisfy the current statutory definition of the VIN offense.[22] This revision improves the completeness of the revised definition without changing current District law.

Finally, the revised definition of "motor vehicle" includes a "truck tractor with or without a semitrailer or trailer." Both statutory definitions for "motor vehicle" in Title 22 of the current D.C. Code refer to a "truck tractor,"[23] and include a reference to either a truck tractor with a semitrailer or trailer[24] or with just a semitrailer.[25] The revised definition of "motor vehicle" deletes the reference to "truck tractor" and instead specifies that a truck tractor "with or without a semitrailer or trailer" constitutes a "motor vehicle." This language clarifies that the truck tractor, and not the semitrailer or trailer, is the "motor vehicle" and does not change current District law.

As applied to certain RCC offenses, the RCC definition of "motor vehicle" may substantively change current District law. For example, due to the revised definition of "motor vehicle," the revised unauthorized use of a motor vehicle offense (RCC § 22E-2103) no longer includes vehicles like mopeds that are designed to be propelled, in whole or in part, by human exertion, although the DCCA has held explicitly held that mopeds[26] fall within the current definition of "motor vehicle."

The commentaries to relevant RCC offenses discuss in detail the effect of the RCC definition of "motor vehicle" on current District law.

"Movie theater" means a theater, auditorium, or other venue that is being utilized primarily for the exhibition of a motion picture to the public.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "movie theater" requires that the venue be utilized primarily for the exihibtion of a motion picture to the public.

The RCC definition of "movie theater" replaces the current statutory definition of "motion picture theater" in D.C. Code § 22-3214.02,[1] applicable to the current D.C. Code unlawful operation of a recording device in a motion picture theater offense,[2] and undefined references to "motion picture theater" in an affirmative defense for the current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute.[3] The RCC definition of "movie theater" is used in the revised offenses of distribution of an obscene image,[4] distribution of an obscene image to a minor,[5] creating or trafficking an obscene image of a minor,[6] possession of an obscene image of a minor,[7] arranging a live sexual performance of a minor,[8] attending or viewing a live sexual performance of a minor,[9] and unlawful operation of a recording device in a movie theater.[10]

Relation to Current District Law. The revised definition of "movie theater" makes three possible changes to the statutory definition of "motion picture theater" in § 22-3214.02.[11]

First, the revised definition of "movie theater" includes "other venue[s]" that are "being utilized primarily for the exhibition of a motion picture to the public." The current D.C. Code definition of "motion picture theater" is limited to a "theater or other auditorium in which a motion picture is exhibited."[12] It is unclear whether the current D.C. Code definition extends to other venues where a movie may be exhibited, such as a drive-in theater or a concert hall. There is no DCCA case law interpreting this definition. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised definition of "movie theater" includes "other venue[s]" that are "being utilized primarily for the exhibition of a motion picture to the public." This change improves the clarity and completeness of the revised statutes.

Second, the revised definition of "movie theater" excludes venues where a motion picture is exhibited, but such an exhibition is not the primary purpose of the venue. The current D.C. Code definition of "motion picture theater" is limited to a "theater or other auditorium in which a motion picture is exhibited."[13] It is unclear whether the current D.C. Code definition extends to venues where a motion picture may be exhibited, but it is incidental to the primary purpose of the venue—such as an electronics store where portions of a movie are being shown to demonstrate the capabilities of a widescreen television. There is no DCCA case law interpreting this definition. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised definition of "movie theater" requires that the primary purpose of the venue is to exhibit a motion picture to the public. This change is consistent with the legislative history of the current D.C. Code unlawful recording statute[14] and a comparable federal offense.[15] This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised offense.

Third, the revised definition of "movie theater" excludes venues where a motion picture is being exhibited, but the exhibition is not open to the public. The current D.C. Code definition of "motion picture theater" is limited to a "theater or other auditorium in which a motion picture is exhibited."[16] It is unclear whether the current D.C. Code definition extends to venues where a motion picture may be exhibited, but the exhibition is not open to the public—such as person's home television screen. There is no DCCA case law interpreting this definition. This change is consistent with the legislative history of the current D.C. Code

The legislative history for the federal statute notes that "the bill is not intended to permit a prosecution of . . . a salesperson at a store who uses a camcorder to record portions of a movie playing to demonstrate the capabilities of a widescreen television" or "a university student who records a short segment of a film being show in film class." Family Entertainment and Copyright Act of 2005, House Committee on the Judiciary, H. Rpt. 109-33 Part I, April 12, 2005, Cong. Session 109-1, at 3. In these instances, the venue is not being used "primarily" to exhibit a motion picture. Id. The legislative history for the federal statute notes that it "deals with the very specific problem of illicit 'camcording' of motion pictures in motion picture exhibition facilities. Typically, an offender attends a pre-opening 'screening' or a first-weekend theatric release, and uses sophisticated digital equipment to record the movie. A camcorded version is then sold to a local production factory or to an overseas producer where it is converted into DVDs or similar products and sold on the street for a few dollars per copy." Id. at 2.

Other changes that the revised definition of "move theater" makes to the current definition "motion picture theater" in D.C. Code § 22-3214.02 are clarificatory and do not substantively change District law.

The RCC definition of "objective element" is used in the revised defenses of lesser harm[1] and the duress,[2] in the revised provision for charging and proof of penalty enhancements,[3] as well as in the revised offense of endangerment with a firearm.[4]

"Obscene" means:

(A) Appealing to a prurient interest in sex, under contemporary community standards and considered as a whole;

(B) Patently offensive; and

(C) Lacking serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value, considered as a whole.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "obscene" is consistent with the multi-factor test for obscenity announced by the United States Supreme Court in Miller v. California.[1] Namely, to determine whether material is obscene, one must consider: (a) whether the average person,[2] applying contemporary community standards[3] would find that the work, taken as a whole, appeals to the prurient interest,[4] (b) whether the work depicts or describes, in a patently offensive way,[5] sexual conduct specifically defined by the applicable state

[2] The phrase "average person" distinguishes the broader community from fetishists and persons with paraphilic disorders. See also 2 Modern Federal Jury Instructions-Criminal P 45.01 (2019) ("The test is not whether it would arouse sexual desires or sexually impure thoughts in those comprising a particular segment of the community—the young, the immature or the highly prudish—or, would leave another segment—the scientific or highly educated or so-called worldly wise and sophisticated—indifferent and unmoved.").

[5] In Parks v. United States, 294 A.2d 858, 859–60 (D.C. 1972), the court explained:

> [A] trial judge may rule, based on the 'autoptic' evidence, that a reasonable person could only conclude that the material affronts contemporary community standards relating to the description or representation of sexual matters, i. e., the material is obscene per se…[I]f the trial judge finds that the material is obscene per se on the Government's case-in-chief, the burden of going forward shifts to the defense. If the defense introduces no evidence, then…the Government prevails. However, it the defense introduces some law, and (c) whether the work, taken as a whole, lacks serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value.

The RCC definition of "obscene" is new; the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code (although undefined references to "obscene" are in some current Title 22 offenses[6]). The RCC definition of "obscene" is used in the revised offenses of distribution of an obscene image,[7] distribution of an obscene image to a minor,[8] creating or trafficking an obscene image of a minor,[9] possession of an obscene image of a minor,[10] arranging a live sexual performance of a minor,[11] and attending or viewing a live sexual performance of a minor.[12]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "obscene" is new and does not itself substantively change existing District law. The commentaries to specific RCC offenses using the revised definition may discuss further the effect of the revised definition on current District law for that specific offense.

> evidence that the material does not violate contemporary national community standards, the finding of obscenity per se evaporates, much as a rebuttable presumption does, and the burden of proceeding shifts back to the Government to prove beyond a reasonable doubt a violation of contemporary national community standards…Once the burden of proceeding has shifted back to the Government and the Government introduces evidence on the contemporary national community standards, it is for the trier of fact to weigh the conflicting evidence.

"Offense element" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-201.

Explanatory Note. The definition of "offense element" exclusively appears in RCC § 22E-201 and is addressed in the Commentary accompanying the statute.

"Official custody" means full submission after an arrest or substantial physical restraint after an arrest.

Explanatory Note. Official custody may include, for example, being detained by an officer on the street, being securely confined to a holding cell, and being securely transported to a court appearance or medical facility. Official custody is not established merely because officers tell a suspect he is under arrest or seize him for investigative purposes.[1] There must be a completed arrest.[2] A defendant is in official custody when he is physically restrained by an officer pursuant to a lawful arrest or when he fully[3] submits to a lawful arrest.[4]

The RCC definition of "official custody" is new; the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code (although an undefined reference to "custody" appears in the escape from institution or officer offense[5]). The RCC definition of "official custody" is used in the revised duress defense,[6] as well as in the revised offenses of murder,[7] sexual abuse by exploitation,[8] and escape from a correctional facility or officer.[9]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "official custody" is new and does not substantively change District law.

As applied in the revised Escape from a Correctional Facility or Officer offense (RCC § 22E-3401), the term "official custody" does not substantively change District law. Case law has interpreted the term to require physical restraint.[10] The revised code adds a definition of "official custody" that incorporates this current District case law. This change applies consistent, clearly articulated definitions and improves the clarity of the revised offenses.

As applied in the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute (RCC § 22E-1303), the definition of "official custody" may change current Districdt law and is discussed further in the commentary to that offense.

"Omission" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-202.

Explanatory Note. The definition of "omission" is addressed in the Commentary accompanying RCC § 22E-202. The revised definition of "omission" is used in the revised provisions for proof of offense elements beyond a reasonable doubt[1] and voluntariness requirement,[2] the revised hate crime penalty enhancement civil provisions,[3] and the revised offenses of criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person[4] and criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person.[5]

"Open to the general public" means a location:

(A) To which the public is invited; and

(B) For which no payment, membership, affiliation, appointment, or special permission is required for an adult to enter, other than proof of age or a security screening.

Explanatory Note. The RCC defines "open to the general public" to mean no payment or special permission is required to enter. The term includes location where there is a security screening, such as a District government building, or a location where proof of age is required, such as a restaurant serving alcohol. For example, in a Metro train station, a location outside the fare gates normally would be open to the general public during business hours, but a location inside the fare gates would not be open to the general public.[1] Locations for which the general public always needs special permission to enter, such as public schools while in session or the Central Detention Facility (D.C. Jail), are not "open to the general public."

The RCC definition of "open to the general public" is new; the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code (although undefined references to "open to the general public" appear in the current disorderly conduct[2] and aggressive panhandling[3] statutes and an undefined reference to "in public" appears in the current lewdness statute[4]). The RCC definition of "open to the general public" is used in the revised offenses of criminal restraint,[5] distribution of an obscene image,[6] distribution of an obscene image to a minor,[7] burglary,[8] endangerment with a firearm,[9] disorderly conduct,[10] public nuisance,[11] and indecent exposure.[12]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "open to the general public" is new and does not itself substantively change existing District law.

As applied in the revised burglary offense, the term "open to the general public" may change District law. The current burglary statute does not distinguish between public and private locations leading to some counterintuitive outcomes.[13] In contrast, the revised burglary statute requires a trespass into a dwelling or into a building or business yard that is not open to the general public at the time of the offense. The revised code adds a definition of "open to the general public" to be used universally throughout the RCC. This change applies consistent, clearly articulated definitions and improves the clarity of the revised offenses.

As applied in the revised disorderly conduct and public nuisance statutes, the term "open to the general public" clarifies, but does not clearly change, District law. The current disorderly conduct statute (which includes public nuisances) uses the phrase "open to the general public" but does not define it. Case law does not address its meaning. The revised code adds a definition of "open to the general public" to be used universally throughout the RCC. This change applies consistent, clearly articulated definitions and improves the clarity of the revised offenses.

The commentaries to specific RCC offenses using the revised definition may discuss further the effect of the revised definition on current District law for that specific offense.

"Owner" means a person holding an interest in property with which the actor is not privileged to interfere without consent.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "owner" specifies the requirements for being considered an "owner" in the RCC. Under the RCC definition, there can be more than one "owner" for a given piece of property. The RCC definition also includes a person whose interest in property is possessory but otherwise unlawful. For example, it is possible for a third party to rob from a thief.[1]

The RCC definition of "owner" replaces the current statutory definition in D.C. Code § 22-3214(a)(1),[2] applicable to the commercial piracy statute, and undefined references to "owner" in several current Title 22 property provisions and offenses.[3] The RCC definition of "owner" is used in the revised defense for defense of property[4] and the revised civil provisions for taking and destruction of dangerous articles,[5] as well as in four revised definitions[6] and thirteen revised offenses.[7]

Relation to Current District Law. Although several of the current property offenses in Title 22 of the D.C. Code use the term "owner," only one offense, commercial piracy, statutorily defines it. The RCC definition of "owner" may substantively change current District law for the commercial piracy offense, because the current definition[8] is very specific, referring either to the person who owns the original fixation, the exclusive licensee with reproduction and distribution rights, or in the case of a live performance, the performer. The revised unlawful creation or possession of a recording statute, through the

In the case of a live performance the term "owner" means the performer or performers.").

RCC definition of "owner," is intended to more broadly identify the relevant person whose consent must be obtained. The definition of "owner" reduces potential gaps in the offense and improves the consistency of definitions across property offenses. The commentary to the revised unlawful creation or possession of a recording statute (RCC § 22E-2105) discusses this possible change further.

For the other current D.C. Code property offenses that use the term "owner" without statutorily defining it,[9] there is no D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) case law discussing the term "owner" or a similar term. As the commentaries to the RCC property offenses discuss, the RCC definition of "owner" does not appear to change current District law. It should also be noted that the RCC definition of "owner" is also consistent with District practice apparently recognizing that in robbery, the victim need not have strict legal ownership of the item taken, but merely some legally superior custody and control over the item.[10]

Codifying a definition of "owner" improves the clarity and consistency of District law.

Code §§ 22-3201(2)(B) (definition of "deprive."); 22-3215 (unauthorized use of a motor vehicle); 22-3214.02 (unlawful operation of a recording device in a motion picture theater); 22-3218.03 (presumptions and rebuttal evidence provisions for theft of a utility service); 22-3312.01 (defacing public or private property)' 22-3312.05(4) (definition of "graffiti.").

U.S.*, 362 A.2d 718 (D.C. 1976) (it is not required to show that victim of robbery owned property that was taken but only that the victim had custody and control of the property).").

"Payment card" means an instrument of any kind, whether tangible or digital, including an instrument that is a credit card or debit card, that is issued for use by the cardholder to obtain or pay for property, or the number inscribed on such a card.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "payment card" includes any instrument issued for use by the cardholder to pay for or obtain property. The definition includes credit cards and debit cards. The definition includes the physical cards themselves, intangible payment cards[1], and the number or description of the cards.

"Payment card" is not statutorily defined for Title 22 of the current D.C. Code. However, "credit card" is currently defined in D.C. Code § 22-3223(a)[2] for the current credit card fraud offense. The RCC definition of "payment card" replaces the definition of "credit card" in D.C. Code § 22-3223(a) and is used in the RCC definitions of "revoked or canceled"[3] and "value,"[4] as well as the revised offense of payment card fraud.[5]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "payment card" clarifies, but makes no substantive changes, to current District law.

[1] For example, an issuer may provide a credit card number attached to an account that allows payments on credit, without actually providing a physical card. This intangle "credit card" would be included in the definition of "payment card."

"Pecuniary gain" means before-tax profit that is monetary or readily measurable in money, including additional revenue or cost savings.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "pecuniary gain" means before-tax profit that is monetary or readily measured in money. The definition specifies that pecuniary gain includes non-monetary benefits that are readily measurable in money, such as cost savings.

The term "pecuniary gain" is used in D.C. Code § 22-3571.02, but the term is undefined. The RCC definition of "pecuniary gain" is used in the revised provision for authorized fines.[1]

Relation to Current District Law. The term "pecuniary gain" is used in D.C. Code § 22-3571.02 (b), but the term is undefined. The Fine Proportionality Act authorizes fines of up to twice the pecuniary gain to the actor, or the pecuniary loss to the complainant.[2] However, the Fine Proportionality Act fails to define any of these terms, and no case law has been published interpreting these phrases. The definitions of "pecuniary loss" and "pecuniary gain" are modeled on the definitions provided in the Federal Sentencing Guidelines.[3] This change improves the clarity and completeness of the revised statutes.

"Pecuniary loss" means actual harm that is monetary or readily measurable in money.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "pecuniary loss" means actual harm that is monetary or readily measurable in money. The definition specifies that "pecuniary loss" includes actual monetary losses, as well as other losses that are readily measurable in money.[1]

The term "pecuniary loss" is used in D.C. Code § 22-3571.02, but the term is undefined. The RCC definition of "pecuniary loss" is used in the revised provision for authorized fines[2], as well as in the revised hate crime penalty enhancement[3] and hate crime enhancement civil provisions statutes.[4]

"Person," in Subtitle III of this Title, means an individual, whether living or dead, as well as a trust, estate, fiduciary, partnership, company, corporation, association, organization, union, government, government agency, or government-owned corporation, or any other legal entity, notwithstanding the definition in D.C. Code § 45-604.

Explanatory Note. This provision codifies a definition of "person" that applies only to Subtitle III of Title 22E (Property offenses). The definition establishes that "person" categorically includes natural persons and non-human legal entities such as trusts, estates, companies, etc. The definition applies to the property offenses and provisions in Subtitle III of Title 22E notwithstanding the definition of "person" in D.C. Code § 45-604 that appears to otherwise apply.[1] This definition of "person" replaces the current statutory definition of "person" in D.C. Code § 22-3201(2A),[2] applicable to Theft, Fraud, Stolen Property, Forgery, and Extortion offenses and provisions in Chapter 32 of the current Title 22. The definition of "person" in RCC § 22E-701 is applicable to all RCC property offenses and provisions in Subtitle III of Title 22 that use the term. In addition, the revised definition is applicable to the revised definitions of "actor," "complainant," "owner," and "property of another" when they are used in Subtitle III, because these definitions refer to a "person."

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "person" for property offenses makes one possible substantive change to the current statutory definition of "person" in D.C. Code § 22-3201(2A). The plain language of the current D.C. Code statutory definition of "person" makes no distinction in use of the definition for a complainant or an actor. However, legislative history at times suggests that the Council was focused on including businesses and similar non-natural entities as complainants who may be the victims of property loss, and there may not have been an intent to categorically

[1] D.C. Code § 45-604 contains a more limited and flexible definition of "person" that includes partnerships and corporations "unless such construction would be unreasonable." See D.C. Code § 45-604 (stating that "person" shall be held to apply to partnerships and corporations, unless such construction would be unreasonable, and the reference to any officer shall include any person authorized by law to perform the duties of his office, unless the context shows that such words were intended to be used in a more limited sense."). This definition in D.C. Code § 45-604 applies to the entire D.C. Code. See D.C. Code § 45-601 (rules of interpretation stating that "[i]n the interpretation and construction of this Code the following rules shall be observed."). As such, the definition of "person" in D.C. Code § 45-604 appears to apply to the current D.C. Code theft and related offenses in Chapter 32 of Title 22, notwithstanding the specific definition in Chapter 32 for those offenses. D.C. Code 22-3201(2A) ("For the purposes of this chapter, the term . . . 'Person' means an individual (whether living or dead), trust, estate, fiduciary, partnership, company, corporation, association, organization, union, government department, agency, or instrumentality, or any other legal entity."). There is no DCCA case law on the definition of "person" in D.C. Code § 22-3201(2A) or D.C. Code § 45-604, or any DCCA case law that addresses the apparent conflict between the two definitions.

[2] D.C. Code 22-3201(2A) ("'Person' means an individual (whether living or dead), trust, estate, fiduciary, partnership, company, corporation, association, organization, union, government department, agency, or instrumentality, or any other legal entity.").

include liability for such non-natural entities as actors who commit theft, etc.[3] The RCC resolves this ambiguity by following the plain language of the current statutory definition in D.C. Code § 22-3201(2A) and making the definition applicable to both complainants and actors—anywhere the definition of "person" appears in the revised statutes, or is contained an RCC definition like "owner" or "property of another." This change clarifies the revised statutes.

The RCC definition of "person" for property offenses makes one clarificatory change to the current statutory definition of "person" in D.C. Code § 22-3201(2A). The RCC definition of "person" replaces "government department, agency, or instrumentality" in the current definition of "person" in D.C. Code § 22-3201(2A) with "government," and "government instrumentality." This language is consistent with other RCC provisions,[4] but does not change the meaning of the statute which reaches any "any other legal entity."[5]

As applied to several RCC property offenses, however, the RCC definition of "person" may be viewed as a substantive change in law. The current definition of "person" in D.C. Code § 22-3201(2A) establishes that "person" includes natural persons as well as non-human legal entities. The current definition in D.C. Code § 22-3201(2A) applies only to the offenses and provisions in Chapter 32 of the current D.C. Code Title 22—theft, fraud, receiving stolen property, extortion, etc. It does not apply to other property offenses codified elsewhere in the current D.C. Code, such as malicious destruction of property,[6] despite a similar scope of conduct. Limiting the specific definition of "person" to theft offenses leads to inconsistent liability and disproportionate penalties. For example, if an actor steals money from a donation box for a charity, the charity, as a non-human entity, clearly falls within the definition of "person," and the actor's conduct is criminalized. However, if the defendant chooses to set the money in the donation box on fire, it is unclear

[3] Committee on Public Safety and the Judiciary, Report on Bill 18-151, "Omnibus Public Safety and Justice Amendment Act of 2009" (June 26, 2009) at 18 ("This provision would amend D.C. Official Code 22-3201 et seq. to: amend definitions to . . . ensure that businesses and entities that may be victimized are contemplated by law."). Chairperson Clarke of the Judiciary Committee, Extension of Comments on Bill No. 4-193: The District of Columbia Theft and White Collar Crimes Act of 1982 (July 20, 1982) at 3 (regarding the meaning of "property of another" protected by the statutes: "Paragraph (4) of this section defines the term "property of another". This term is defined as property in which another has an interest which the offender may not infringe upon or interfere with without consent, whether or not the offender also has an interest in the property. In this context, "person" not only means individuals, but includes corporations, partnerships, associations and other entities."). But see id. at 74 (Regarding a provision for enhanced penalties: "The term 'commits' as used in this section is meant to be interpreted to cover persons who act as principals as well as persons who aid or abet the commission of one of the offenses: The term "person" is intended to include individuals as well as corporations, partnerships, associations am other legal entities. Thus, individual defendants as well as corporate defendants are subject to the enhanced penalty.").

in the current D.C. Code whether the theft-specific definition of "person" would apply.[7] Similarly, applying the specific definition of "person" to theft ensures that corporations and other non-human entities can be held liable as actors for theft and other property crimes, whereas it is unclear in the current D.C. Code if corporations and other non-human entities could be held liable for property damage or destruction.[8] The RCC resolves this ambiguity by applying this specific definition of "person" to both the defendant and the complainant in all property offenses in Subtitle III of Title 22E.

[7] As was noted earlier in this commentary, D.C. Code § 45-604 would still apply to theft offenses in Chapter 32 of Title 22, but the definition in D.C. Code § 45-604 is not categorical. It includes partnerships and corporations in the definition of "person" "unless such construction would be unreasonable." See D.C. Code § 45-604. It is thus ultimately unclear whether a non-human legal entity would be included in the scope of current D.C. Code property offenses that are not in Chapter 32 of Title 22.

"Person acting in the place of a parent under civil law" means:

(A) A person who has put themselves in the situation of a lawful parent by assuming the obligations incident to the parental relation without going through the formalities necessary to legal adoption; or

(B) A person acting by, through, or under the direction of a court with jurisdiction over the child.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "person acting in the place of a parent under civil law" refers in the first part of the definition to persons acting in loco parentis, as that doctrine has been described in District law.[1] The second part of the definition refers broadly to persons assigned jurisdiction over a child by court order, including a person with "legal custody" as defined under D.C. Code § 16-2301 (21) of a child and a "permanent guardian" as defined under D.C. Code § 16–2382.

The RCC definition of "person acting in the place of a parent under civil law" is new; the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code. The RCC definition of "person acting in the place of a parent under civil law" is used in the revised definitions of "person with legal authority over the complainant"[2] and "position of trust with or authority over,"[3] as well as in the revised special responsibility for care, discipline, or safety defense,[4] and the revised hate crime penalty enhancement civil provisions.[5]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "person acting in the place of a parent under civil law" does not itself substantively change current District law.

It differs from adoption in that it is strictly temporary in nature, rather than permanent.

"Person with legal authority over the complainant" means:

(A) When the complainant is a person under 18 years of age:

a. A parent, or a person acting in the place of a parent under civil law, who is responsible for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant; or

b. Someone who is acting with the effective consent of such a parent or such a person; or

(B) When the complainant is an incapacitated individual:

a. A court-appointed guardian to the complainant; or

b. Someone who is acting with the effective consent of such a guardian.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "person with legal authority over the complainant" refers to two main categories of people with legal authority over the complainant.

Subparagraph (A) applies only when the complainant is under 18 years of age. Then, the phrase "person with legal authority over the complainant" refers to: a parent who is responsible for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant; a person acting in the place of a parent under civil law who is responsible for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant; or a person acting with the effective consent of such a parent or such a person. The modifier "responsible for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant" limits the definition to those parents who have a relevant legal duty to the complainant at the time of the alleged offense.[1] The phrase "person acting in the place of a parent under civil law" refers to persons acting in loco parentis, as that doctrine has been described in District law.[2] Under the definition, a person must not only have rights as a person acting in loco parentis, but also a relevant legal duty to the complainant at the time of the alleged offense. Finally, a person who is acting with the effective consent, a defined term,[3] of such a parent or person also falls within the scope of the definition.

Subparagraph (B) applies only when the complainant is an "incapacitated individual," a defined term referring to an adult with certain impairments.[4] In that instance,

[1] For example, an estranged parent with no legal rights over the minor would not be within the scope of the definition.

[2] See, e.g., In re K.J., 11 A.3d 273, 276 (D.C. 2011) ("In Fuller, we discussed the in loco parentis relationship as follows:

"Personal identifying information" means:

(A) Name, address, telephone number, date of birth, or mother's maiden name;

(B) Driver's license or driver's license number, or non-driver's license or non-driver's license number;

(C) Savings, checking, or other financial account number;

(D) Social security number or tax identification number;

(E) Passport or passport number;

(F) Citizenship status, visa, or alien registration card or number;

(G) Birth certificate or a facsimile of a birth certificate;

(H) Credit or debit card, or credit or debit card number;

(I) Credit history or credit rating;

(J) Signature;

(K) Personal identification number, electronic identification number, password, access code or device, electronic address, electronic identification number, routing information or code, digital signature, or telecommunication identifying information;

(L) Biometric data, such as fingerprint, voice print, retina or iris image, or other unique physical representation;

(M) Place of employment, employment history, or employee identification number; and

(N) Any other numbers or information that can be used to access a person's financial resources, access medical information, obtain identification, serve as identification, or obtain property.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "personal identifying information" provides a non-exhaustive list of information that relates to a person's identity, and is taken nearly verbatim from the current identity theft sub-chapter of the D.C. Code.[1] This definition is intended to have the same meaning as under current law.

"Personal identifying information" is currently defined in D.C. Code § 22-3227.01(3)[2] for the identity theft offense and related provisions. The RCC definition of "personal identifying information" replaces the definition of "personal identifying information" in D.C. Code § 22-3227.01(3) and is used in the revised offense of identity theft.[3]

[3] RCC § 22E-2205.

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "personal identifying information" does not substantively change current District law.

"Physically following" means maintaining close proximity to a person, near enough to see or hear the person's activities as they move from one location to another.

Explanatory Note. The phrase "close proximity" refers to the area near enough for the accused to see or hear the person's activities and does not require that the defendant be near enough to reach the person. Distances may vary widely, depending on facts including crowd density, noise, and height. Examples may include walking a couple of stores down the street from the complainant or driving near a person in a vehicle.

The RCC definition of "physically following" is new; the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code (although similar language appears in the current stalking statute[1]). The RCC definition of "physically following" is used in the revised offense of stalking.[2]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "physically following" is new and does not substantively change District law.

As applied in the revised offense stalking, the term "physically following" clarifies, but does not substantively change, District law. The current statute uses the word "follow" but does not define it. Case law has not directly addressed its meaning.[3] This change applies consistent, clearly articulated definitions and improves the clarity of the revised offenses.

[1] D.C. Code § 22-3132(8) ("To engage in a course of conduct" means directly or indirectly, or through one or more third persons, in person or by any means, on 2 or more occasions, to: (A) Follow…").

[2] RCC § 22E-1801.

[3] However, the District of Columbia Court of Appeals discussed an allegation of following in Coleman v. United States, 16-CM-345, 2019 WL 1066002, at *2–3 (D.C. Mar. 7, 2019). In that case, the defendant sprinted across a baseball field and stood eight feet in front of the complainant, in her pathway. When the complainant left the field and walked home, the defendant also exited and remained outside the complainant's home long enough for a neighbor and a family member to each come outside and tell the defendant to leave. The defendant testified that he had not been intentionally following the complainant but had simply been "follow[ing] everyone else off the field" and trying to go to his own home. During these events, the defendant and the complainant were near enough to one another to engage in a conversation. The revised code defines "physically following" to require maintaining a close enough proximity to see or hear the complainant. Remotely following or monitoring another person will be separately punished as Electronic Monitoring in RCC § 22E-1804.

"Physically monitoring" means being in close proximity to a person's residence, workplace, or school to detect the person's whereabouts or activities.

Explanatory Note. The phrase "close proximity" refers to the area near enough for the accused to see or hear the complainant's activities and does not require that the defendant be near enough to reach the complainant. Distances may vary widely, depending on facts including crowd density, noise, and height.

The RCC definition of "physically monitoring" is new; the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code (although similar language appears in the current stalking statute[1]). The RCC definition of "physically monitoring" is used in the revised offense of stalking.[2]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "physically monitoring" is new and does not substantively change District law.

As applied in the revised offense stalking, the term "physically monitoring" may change District law. The current statute uses the word "monitor" and the phrase "place under surveillance" but does not define these terms. Case law has not directly addressed their meanings. The revised code defines "physically monitoring" to require maintaining a close enough proximity to see or hear the complainant. Remotely following or monitoring another person will be separately punished as Electronic Monitoring in RCC § 22E-1804. This change applies consistent, clearly articulated definitions and improves the logical organization and clarity of the revised offenses.

"Pistol" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 7-2501.01.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "pistol" is new; the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code. The RCC definition of "pistol" is used in the definition of "firearm"[1] and in the revised offenses of carrying a dangerous weapon,[2] unlawful sale of a pistol,[3] use of false information for purchase or license of a firearm,[4] and carrying a pistol in an unlawful manner,[5] as well as in the revised civil provisions for issuance of a license to carry a pistol[6] and in the revised provisions for exclusions from liability for weapon offenses.[7]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "pistol" is new and does not itself substantively change existing District law.

"Position of trust with or authority over" means a relationship to a complainant that is:

(A) A parent, grandparent, great-grandparent, sibling, or a parent's sibling, or an individual with whom such a person is in a romantic, dating, or sexual relationship, whether related by:

(i) Blood or adoption; or

(ii) Marriage, domestic partnership, either while the marriage or domestic partnership creating the relationship exists, or after such marriage or domestic partnership ends;

(B) A half-sibling related by blood;

(C) A person acting in the place of a parent under civil law, the current spouse or domestic partner of such a person, or an individual with whom such a person is in a romantic, dating, or sexual relationship;

(D) Any person, at least 4 years older than the complainant, who resides intermittently or permanently in the same dwelling as the complainant;

(E) A religious leader described in D.C. Code § 14-309;

(F) A coach, not including a coach who is a secondary school student; a teacher, counselor, principal, administrator, nurse, or security officer, provided that such an actor is an employee, contractor, or volunteer at the school at which the complainant is enrolled or at a school where the complainant receives educational services or attends educational programming;

(G) Any employee, contractor, or volunteer of a school, religious institution, or an educational, social, recreational, athletic, musical, charitable, or youth facility, organization, or program, that exercises supervisory or disciplinary authority over the complainant; or

(H) A person responsible under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "position of trust with or authority over" provides a close-ended list of individuals based upon their relationship with a complainant.

Subparagraph (A) includes a "parent, grandparent, great-grandparent, sibling, or a parent's sibling," as well as an individual with whom such a person is in "a romantic, dating, or sexual relationship." The language "romantic, dating, or sexual relationship" tracks the language in the District's current definition of "intimate partner violence"[1] and is intended to have the same meaning. Sub-subparagraph (A)(i) establishes that the specified relationships established by blood or adoption are sufficient. Sub-subparagraph (A)(ii) establishes that the specified relationships established by marriage or domestic partnership are sufficient, both while the marriage or domestic partnership creating the relationship exists, and after such marriage or domestic partnership ends. "Domestic partnership" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701.

Subparagraph (B) includes a "half-sibling" related by blood.

[1] D.C. Code § 16-1001(7) ("'Intimate partner violence' means an act punishable as a criminal offense that is committed or threatened to be committed by an offender upon a person: (A) To whom the offender is or was married; (B) With whom the offender is or was in a domestic partnership; or (C) With whom the offender is or was in a romantic, dating, or sexual relationship.").

Subparagraph (C) includes a "person acting in the place of a parent under civil law," a defined term in RCC § 22E-701, as well as the current spouse or domestic partner of such a person, or an individual with whom such a person is in "a romantic, dating, or sexual relationship." The language "romantic, dating, or sexual relationship" tracks the language in the District's current definition of "intimate partner violence"[2] and is intended to have the same meaning. "Domestic partner" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701. Unlike subparagraph (A) of the revised definition, which includes former spouses or domestic partners, subparagraph (C) does not.

Subparagraph (D) includes any person, at least 4 years older than the complainant, who resides intermittently or permanently in the same dwelling as the complainant. The terms "complainant" and "dwelling" are defined in RCC § 22E-701.

Subparagraph (E) includes a "religious leader described in D.C. Code § 14-309." A "religious leader described in D.C. Code § 14-309" is a "priest, clergyman, rabbi, or other duly licensed, ordained, or consecrated minister of a religion authorized to perform a marriage ceremony in the District of Columbia or duly accredited practitioner of Christian Science,"[3] regardless of whether the religious leader hears confessions or receives other communications.

Subparagraph (F) includes a "coach, not including a coach who is a secondary school student; a teacher, counselor, principal, administrator, nurse, or security officer" that "is an employee, contractor or volunteer at the school at which the complainant is enrolled or at a school where the complainant receives educational services or attends educational programming."[4]

Subparagraph (G) includes any employee, contractor, or volunteer of a school, religious institution, or other specified institution, such as a youth organization, provided that that individual "exercises supervisory or disciplinary authority over the complainant."

Finally, subparagraph (H) includes a "person responsible under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant." "Person responsible under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant" is a phrase used in several RCC provisions and offenses, such as the statutes for the criminal abuse of minors[5] and criminal neglect of minors,[6] and has intended to have the same meaning that is discussed there. There may be overlap between subparagraph (H) and the other subparagraphs of the revised definition, but subparagraph (H) is a stand-alone category that does not modify any of the other categories of individuals in subparagraphs (A) through (G).

The RCC definition of "position of trust with or authority over" replaces the term "significant relationship," currently defined in D.C Code § 22-3001(10),[7] (applicable to Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition "position of trust with or authority over" makes two clear substantive changes to the current statutory definition of "significant relationship in D.C. Code § 22-3001(10).[18].

First, the RCC definition of "position of trust with or authority over" is close-ended and requires that an individual satisfy at least one of the categories in subparagraphs (A) – (H). The current D.C. Code definition of "significant relationship" is open-ended and defines the term as "includ[ing]" the specified individuals or "any other person in a position of trust with or authority over" the complainant."[19] There is no DCCA case law interpreting the D.C. Code definition of "significant relationship." It is unclear whether a job title or specified relationship to the complainant is sufficient, or if a substantive analysis of the relationship between the actor and the complainant is required. In contrast, the RCC definition of "position of trust with or authority over" is limited to the specified individuals in subparagraphs (A) – (H). The RCC definition makes clear that no substantive analysis of the relationship between the actor and the complainant is necessary beyond determining if it fits into one of the specified categories. This revision improves the clarity and completeness of the revised definition.

[19] D.C. Code § 22-3001(10)(D).

Second, the revised definition includes great-grandparents in the list of "per se" relatives in subparagraph (A). The current D.C. Code definition of "significant relationship" establishes a "per se" list of relatives that includes grandparents, but not great-grandparents.[20] In contrast, subparagraph (A) of the revised definition includes great-grandparents, whether related by blood, adoption, marriage, or domestic partnership. Including great-grandparents recognizes that great-grandparents occupy a position of trust with or authority over minor complainants and is consistent with the scope of the RCC incest statute (RCC § 22E-1308). This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statutes, and removes a gap in liability.

The RCC definition of "position of trust with or authority over" makes eight possible substantive changes to the current statutory definition of "significant relationship in D.C. Code § 22-3001(10).[21]

First, subparagraph (A) of the revised definition includes an individual with whom a specified relative, such as a parent, is "in a romantic, dating, or sexual relationship." Subparagraph (A) of the current D.C. Code definition of "significant relationship"[22] establishes a "per se" list of relatives, including these relatives' spouses or domestic partners, regardless of whether these individuals have any responsibility for the complainant ("A parent, sibling, aunt, uncle, or grandparent, whether related by blood, marriage, domestic partnership, or adoption."). Subparagraph (C) of the current D.C. Code definition of "significant relationship,"[23] however, includes "the spouse, domestic partner, or "paramour" of "the person who is charged with any duty for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant." To the extent that the specified relatives in subparagraph (A), for example, a biological parent, also have a responsibility for the complainant, subparagraph (A) and subparagraph (C) of the current D.C. Code definition overlap, and also for those relatives' spouses or domestic partners. However, subparagraph (C) of the current D.C. Code definition includes a "paramour" of the person with a responsibility for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant and subparagraph (A) does not. This apparent discrepancy means that the current D.C. Code definition of "significant relationship" includes the "paramour" of an individual that has a responsibility for the complainant (subparagraph (C)), but does not include the "paramour" of a specified "per se" relative with no responsibility for the complainant (subparagraph (A))—for example, the paramour of a biological parent with no responsibility for the complainant. There is no DCCA case law interpreting the definition of "significant relationship." Resolving this ambiguity, the revised definition includes the paramour" of the specified relatives in subparagraph (A), regardless of the relatives' relationship with the complainant. There is no reason to categorically treat a paramour of a specified relative in subparagraph (A) differently than a spouse or a domestic partner. This change improves the clarity of the revised definition and removes a possible gap in liability.

Second, subparagraph (A) of the revised definition includes specified relatives that are related by marriage or domestic partnership "either while the marriage or domestic partnership creating the relationship exists, or after such marriage or domestic partnership ends." The current D.C. Code definition of "significant relationship"[24] includes specified relatives "related by . . . marriage [or] domestic partnership" and it is unclear whether this includes the specified relatives after the marriage or domestic partnership ends. There is no DCCA case law interpreting the definition of "significant relationship." Resolving this ambiguity, the revised definition includes specified relatives that are related by marriage or domestic partnership "either while the marriage or domestic partnership creating the relationship exists, or after such marriage or domestic partnership ends." Including specified relatives after the marriage or domestic partnership ends recognizes that they occupy a position of trust with or authority over minor complainants and is consistent with the scope of the RCC incest statute (RCC § 22E-1308). This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statutes, and removes a gap in liability.

Third, the revised definition includes a "half-sibling related by blood." The current D.C. Code definition of "significant relationship" includes a "sibling . . . related by blood."[25] It is unclear whether this definition includes a half-sibling and there is no DCCA case law on the definition. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised definition includes a "half-sibling related by blood." Including half-siblings by blood recognizes that they occupy a position of trust with or authority over minor complainants and is consistent with the scope of the RCC incest statute (RCC § 22E-1308). This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statutes, and removes a gap in liability.

Fourth, subparagraph (C) and subparagraph (H) of the revised definition replace subparagraph (C) of the current D.C. Code definition of "significant relationship." Subparagraph (C) of the current D.C. Code definition of "significant relationship" includes "The person or the spouse, domestic partner, or paramour of the person who is charged with any duty or responsibility for the health, welfare, or supervision" of the complainant."[26] The scope of "charged with any duty or responsibility for the health, welfare, or supervision" of the complainant is unclear and, interpreted broadly, would include the spouses, domestic partners, and significant others of any individual with any duty or responsibility for the health, welfare or supervision of the complainant, such as doctors, taxi drivers, etc. There is no DCCA case law interpreting the current definition of "significant relationship." Resolving this ambiguity, the revised definition replaces subparagraph (C) of the current D.C. Code definition with subparagraph (C) and subparagraph (H). Subparagraph (C) ("A person acting in the place of a parent under civil law, the current spouse or domestic partner of such a person, or an individual with whom such a person is in a romantic, dating, or sexual relationship") limits spouses, domestic partners, and significant others to those of a person acting in the place of a parent under civil law, as opposed to any individual with any duty for the health, welfare, or supervision. In addition, as opposed to subparagraph (A) of the revised definition, subparagraph (C) of the revised definition is limited to the "current" spouse or domestic partner of such an individual, which is consistent with the scope of a "person acting in the place of a parent under civil law," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701. Subparagraph (H) of the revised definition ("A person responsible under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant") continues to provide liability for any individual that has a duty under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant. This language improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised definition.

Fifth, subparagraph (E) of the revised definition codifies a "per se" list of religious leaders—"A religious leader described in D.C. Code § 14-309." The current D.C. Code definition of "significant relationship" includes "[a]ny employee or volunteer of a . . . church, synagogue, mosque, or other religious institution . . . including a . . . clergy, youth leader, chorus director . . . administrator, or support staff, or any other person in a position of trust with or authority over a child or a minor."[27] There is no DCCA case law interpreting the current D.C. Code definition of "significant relationship." It is unclear in the current D.C. Code definition whether "any other person in a position of trust with or authority over" a complainant modifies the preceding list of specified individuals and requires a substantive analysis of the relationship between the actor and the complainant, or if an actor holding a specified job title is sufficient. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised definition codifies "A religious leader described in D.C. Code § 14-309" as a "per se" category of a "position of trust with or authority over." A "religious leader described in D.C. Code § 14-309" is a "priest, clergyman, rabbi, or other duly licensed, ordained, or consecrated minister of a religion authorized to perform a marriage ceremony in the District of Columbia or duly accredited practitioner of Christian Science,"[28] regardless of whether the religious leader hears confessions or receives other communications. The relationship between these individuals and a minor complainant rises to the level of coerciveness necessary to make otherwise consensual sexual activity criminal. Subparagraph (G) and subparagraph (H) of the revised definition may provide liability for employees, contractors, and volunteers at a religious institution that fall outside of the specified religious leaders in subparagraph (E), such as youth leaders and chorus directors. This revision improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Sixth, subparagraph (F) of the revised definition codifies a "per se" list of actors in a school—"A coach, not including a coach who is a secondary school student; a teacher, counselor, principal, administrator, nurse, or security officer, provided that such an actor is an employee, contractor, or volunteer at the school at which the complainant is enrolled or at a school where the complainant receives educational services or attends educational programming." The current D.C. Code definition of "significant relationship" includes "[a]ny employee or volunteer of a school . . . including a teacher, coach, counselor . . . chorus director, bus driver, administrator, or support staff, or any other person in a position of trust with or authority over a child or a minor."[29] There is no DCCA case law interpreting the current D.C. Code definition of "significant relationship." It is unclear in the current D.C. Code definition whether "any other person in a position of trust with or authority over" a complainant modifies the preceding list of specified individuals and requires a substantive analysis of the relationship between the actor and the complainant, or if an actor holding a specified job title is sufficient. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised definition codifies as a "per se" category of a "position of trust with or authority over" "A coach, not including a coach who is a secondary school student; a teacher, counselor, principal, administrator, nurse, or security officer, provided that such an actor is an employee, contractor, or volunteer at the school at which the complainant is enrolled or at a school where the complainant receives educational services or attends educational programming." In current law[30] and in the RCC, whether an actor that is 18 years of age or older is in a "position of trust with or authority over" or a "significant relationship" with the complainant is the basis of criminalizing otherwise consensual conduct with a complainant that is over the age of 16 years, but under the age of 18 years. Subparagraph (F) of the revised definition requires that the actor is at the school at which the complainant is enrolled or at a school where the complainant receives educational services or attends educational programming, and, in the case of a coach, that the actor is not also a secondary school student. These requirements ensure that the relationship between the actor and the complainant rises to the level of coerciveness necessary to make otherwise consensual sexual activity criminal. Subparagraph (G) and subparagraph (H) of the revised definition may provide liability for employees, contractors, and volunteers at a school that fall outside of the specified individuals in subparagraph (F), such as bus drivers or support staff. This revision improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Seventh, subparagraph (F) and subparagraph (G) of the revised definition of "position of trust with or authority over" include a "contractor" at a school, religious institution, or other specified organization. Subparagraph (D) of the current D.C. Code definition of "significant relationship" includes "any employee or volunteer" of a school, religious institution, or other specified organization.[31] There is no DCCA case law interpreting the current D.C. Code definition of "significant relationship" and it is unclear whether a "contractor" would be included. Resolving this ambiguity, subparagraph (F) and subparagraph (G) of the RCC definition of "position of trust with or authority over" specifically include a "contractor." A contractor may fill one of the specified roles at a school (subparagraph (F)) or exercise supervisory or disciplinary authority over minors at a school or other institution (subparagraph (G)), similar to an employee or volunteer. This change clarifies and may eliminate a gap in liability in the revised statutes.

Eighth, subparagraph (G) of the RCC definition of "position of trust with or authority over" requires that the actor "exercises supervisory or disciplinary authority over the complainant" and deletes the phrase "including a teacher, coach, counselor, clergy, youth leader, chorus director, bus driver, administrator, or support staff" that is in the current D.C. Code definition. Subparagraph (D) of the current D.C. Code definition of "significant relationship" specifies "any employee or volunteer" of a school, specified institution, etc., "including a teacher, coach, counselor, clergy, youth leader, chorus director, bus driver, administrator, or support staff, or any other person in a position of trust with or authority over a child or a minor."[32] There is no DCCA case law interpreting the definition of "significant relationship." It is unclear in subparagraph (D) of the current D.C. Code definition whether "any other person in a position of trust with or authority over" a complainant modifies the preceding list of specified individuals and requires a substantive analysis of the relationship between the actor and the complainant, or if an actor holding a specified job title is sufficient. In current law[33] and in the RCC, whether an actor that is 18 years of age or older is in a "position of trust with or authority over" or a "significant relationship" with the complainant is the basis of criminalizing otherwise consensual conduct with a complainant that is over the age of 16 years, but under the age of 18 years. Requiring the actor to exercise supervisory or disciplinary authority over the complainant ensures that the relationship between the actor and the complainant rises to the level of coerciveness necessary to make otherwise consensual sexual activity criminal. Subparagraph (E) and subparagraph (F) of the revised definition establish "per se" categories of religious leaders and actors at a school that are in a "position of trust with or authority over the complainant," regardless of whether they exercise supervisory or disciplinary authority over the complainant. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

The remaining changes to the current definition of "significant relationship" in D.C. Code § 22-3001(10) are clarificatory and are not intended to change current District law.

First, subparagraph (C) of the revised definition replaces "legal or de facto guardian" in the current D.C. Code definition of "significant relationship"[34] with a "person acting in the place of a parent under civil law." "A legal or de facto guardian" is undefined in the current D.C. Code definition of "significant relationship" and there is no DCCA case law interpreting its scope in the current D.C. Code sexual abuse statutes. The RCC consistently uses the term "person acting in the place of a parent under civil law," as defined in RCC § 22E-701. This change improves the clarity of the revised statute.

Second, subparagraph (C) of the revised definition replaces "paramour" in the current D.C. Code definition of "significant relationship"[35] with an individual with whom a specified person is "in a romantic, dating, or sexual relationship." "Paramour" is undefined in the current D.C. Code definition of "significant relationship," not everyday language, and there is no DCCA case law interpreting its scope in the current D.C. Code

[32] D.C. Code § 22-3001(10)(D).
[33] D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.01 (first degree sexual abuse of a minor); 22-3009.02 (second degree sexual abuse of a minor); 22-3001(5A) (defining "minor" as a "person who has not yet attained the age of 18 years.").
[34] D.C. Code § 22-3001(10)(B) (defining "significant relationship" to include "A legal or de facto guardian or any person, more than 4 years older than the victim, who resides intermittently or permanently in the same dwelling as the victim.").
[35] D.C. Code § 22-3001(10)(C) (defining "significant relationship" to include "The person or the spouse, domestic partner, or paramour of the person who is charged with any duty or responsibility for the health, welfare, or supervision of the victim at the time of the act.").

sexual abuse statutes. "Romantic, dating, or sexual relationship" is identical to the language in the current D.C. Code definition of "intimate partner violence"[36] and is used throughout the RCC. This change improves the clarity of the revised statute.

Third, subparagraph (D) of the revised definition replaces "more than 4 years older" in the current D.C. Code definition of "significant relationship" with "at least 4 years older." The current D.C. Code definition of "significant relationship" includes certain individuals "more than 4 years older than the complainant."[37] The current D.C. Code child sexual abuse statutes, in contrast, are worded to require that the complainant be "at least four years older" than the complainant.[38] Consequently, there is a difference of a day in liability due to the different required age gaps.[39] For clarification, the revised definition uses "at least four years older," the same age gap that is in other RCC sex offenses, such as sexual abuse of a minor (RCC § 22E-1302). The change improves the consistency of the revised offense.

Fourth, subparagraph (G) of the revised definition deletes "church, synagogue, mosque" from the phrase "church, synagogue, mosque, or other religious institution" in subparagraph (D) of the current D.C. Code definition of "significant relationship."[40] Subparagraph (G) of the revised definition still specifies a "religious institution," and subparagraph (E) codifies as a "per se" category the religious leaders in D.C. Code § 14-309. Including specific types of religious institutions is unnecessary and inconsistent with the general references to school, athletic program, etc. in the rest of the subparagraph. The reference to a "religious institution" in subparagraph (G) is intended to include a church, synagogue, or mosque. This change clarifies the revised definition.

Fifth, subparagraph (H) of the revised definition of "position of trust with or authority over" does not specify "at the time of the act" like the generally equivalent

[36] D.C. Code § 16-1001(7) ("'Intimate partner violence' means an act punishable as a criminal offense that is committed or threatened to be committed by an offender upon a person: (A) To whom the offender is or was married; (B) With whom the offender is or was in a domestic partnership; or (C) With whom the offender is or was in a romantic, dating, or sexual relationship.").

[37] D.C. Code § 22-3001(10)(B) (defining "significant relationship" to include "A legal or de facto guardian or any person, more than 4 years older than the victim, who resides intermittently or permanently in the same dwelling as the victim.").

Code §§ 22-3008 (first degree child sexual abuse prohibiting "[w]hoever, being at least 4 years older than a child, engages in a sexual act with that child or causes that child to engage in a sexual act."); 22-3009 (second degree child sexual abuse statute prohibiting "[w]hoever, being at least 4 years older than a child, engages in sexual contact with that child or causes that child to engage in sexual contact."); 22-3001(3) (defining "child" as a "person who has not yet attained the age of 16 years.").

[39] For a complainant that is 15 years and 364 days old, an actor that is 19 years and 364 days old would be liable under the current child sexual abuse statutes because the complainant is under 16 years of age and the actor is "at least four years older" than the complainant. However, the actor would not be included in the current definition of "significant relationship" because the actor is not "more than four years older" than the complainant.

provision in the current D.C. Code definition of "significant relationship."[41] The RCC sex offenses specify that the actor must be in the "position of trust with or authority over" the complainant at the time of the sexual conduct and this language is surplusage. This clarifies the revised statute.

Sixth, the revised definition replaces "victim" in the current D.C. Code definition of "significant relationship"[42] with "complainant," consistent with the meaning of "complainant" in RCC § 22E-701.

Seventh, subparagraph (A) of the revised statute replaces the references to "aunt" and "uncle" in the current D.C. Code definition of "significant relationship"[43] with references to a "parent's sibling." This language is consistent with the other references in the subparagraph to "parent," "grandparent," etc., and with the language used in the RCC incest statute (RCC § 22E-1308). This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

"Possess," and other parts of speech, including "possesses," "possessing," and "possession," mean:

(A) To hold or carry on one's person; or

(B) To have the ability and desire to exercise control over.

Explanatory Note. Subparagraph (A) of the RCC definition addresses actual possession, while subparagraph (B) addresses constructive possession.

The RCC definition of "possess" is new, the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code (although undefined references to "possess" are in some current offenses[1]). The RCC definition of "possess" and other parts of speech, including "possesses," "possessing," and "possession," appear in numerous RCC provisions.

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "possess" is new and does not substantively change District law.

The RCC definition of "possess" closely follows current District practice in defining actual and constructive possession.[2] The definition of actual possession in subparagraph (A) is rooted in longstanding District case law.[3] As under current law,

This is called 'constructive possession.'").

"Prior conviction" means a final order by any court of the District of Columbia, a state, a federally-recognized Indian tribe, or the United States and its territories, that enters judgment of guilt for a criminal offense. The term "prior conviction" does not include:

(A) An adjudication of juvenile delinquency;

(B) Probation under D.C. Code § 48-904.01(e);

(C) A conviction that has been reversed, vacated, sealed, or expunged; or

(D) A conviction for which a person has been granted a pardon.

Explanatory Note. The term "prior conviction" does not include juvenile adjudications[1] or convictions that have been reversed or vacated[2] but does include convictions that have been set aside under the Youth Rehabilitation Act.[3] The RCC definition of "prior conviction" is new; the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C Code. The term "prior conviction" is used in the revised provisions for the charging and proof of penalty enhancement[4] and the repeat offender penalty enhancement,[5] as well as in the revised offenses of stalking,[6] electronic stalking,[7] and possession of a firearm by an unauthorized person.[8]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "prior conviction" is new and does not substantively change District law.

As applied in the revised statutes, the RCC definition of "protected person" may substantively change current District law in one way.

Although Title 22 does not define the term "conviction," other titles define it to mean a finding of guilt, an entry of judgment, or a sentence.[9] Defining "conviction" to require a sentencing may result in some unintuitive outcomes.[10] On the other hand, defining "conviction" to attach upon a finding of guilt may be overinclusive of pleas that will not ultimately lead to a final sentence. To resolve this ambiguity, the revised term is defined to mean a finding of guilt but carves out several exceptions for circumstances in which the finding may be only temporary. This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised offense.

901(2). In Title 32, it means "any sentence arising from a verdict or plea of guilty or nolo contendere, including a sentence of incarceration, a suspended sentence, a sentence of probation, or a sentence of unconditional discharge." D.C. Code § 32-1341(4).

"Property" means anything of value and includes:

(A) Real property, including things growing on, affixed to, or found on land;

(B) Tangible or intangible personal property, including an animal;

(C) Services;

(D) Credit;

(E) Money, or any paper or document that evidences ownership in or of property, an interest in or a claim to wealth, or a debt owed; and

(F) A government-issued license, permit, or benefit.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "property" replaces the current definition of "property" in D.C. Code § 22-3201(3),[1] applicable to provisions in Chapter 32, Theft, Fraud, Stolen Property, Forgery, and Extortion offenses and provisions. The RCC definition of "property" is used in seven revised provisions,[2] twelve revised definitions,[3] and twenty-one revised offenses.[4]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "property" makes one possible substantive change to the statutory definition of "property" in D.C. Code § 22-3201(3). The RCC definition deletes "debt" and instead includes "money" and "any paper or document that evidences ownership in or of property, an interest in or a claim to wealth, or a debt owed." The current definition of "property" includes "debt."[5] The term is not defined statutorily and there is no DCCA case law interpreting it. It is unclear, however, how "debt" can be "anything of value" that is required by the definition of "property." Resolving this ambiguity, the revised definition of "property" deletes "debt" and specifies types of property that satisfy the definition's requirement of "anything of value." This change improves the clarity of the revised statute.

The RCC definition of "property" makes one clarificatory change to the statutory definition of "property" in D.C. Code § 22-3201(3). Subparagraph (B) of the revised definition includes an "animal." This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised definition.

The RCC definition of "property" is otherwise identical to the statutory definition under current law.[6] or found on land; (B) Tangible or intangible personal property; (C) Services; (D) Credit; (E) Debt; and (F) A government-issued license, permit, or benefit.").

[6] D.C. Code 22-3201(3).

"Property of another" means any property that a person has an interest in with which the actor is not privileged to interfere without consent, regardless of whether the actor also has an interest in that property. The term "property of another" does not include any property in the possession of the actor with which the other person has only a security interest.

Explanatory Note. In the RCC, the revised definition of "property of another" generally builds upon separate, civil law determinations of property rights. With the exception of property in the possession of the accused that the other person has only a security interest, the definition of "property of another" follows civil law determinations of property rights.

Property is "property of another" when a person has an interest in the property with which the actor is not privileged to interfere without consent, regardless of whether the actor also has an interest in that property. It is irrelevant that the other person may be precluded from civil recovery because the property was used in an unlawful transaction or was subject to forfeiture as contraband.[1] In addition, this language does not categorically determine issues of joint ownership, such as, for example, whether a spouse can steal from a spouse or a partner can steal from a partnership. The phrase "regardless of whether the accused also has an interest in that property" in the revised definition clarifies that having joint ownership or other property interests in an item does not necessarily mean it is not "property of another." The state of civil law as to whether a joint owner or person with a property interest has a right to interfere with the other joint owner's right to an item will continue to control whether that property is "property of another," as it does under current District law.

The second sentence of the revised definition of "property of another" establishes a narrow exclusion for security interests. Under this part of the revised definition, an individual who is a debtor cannot steal, misappropriate, or damage property in his or her possession in which the other person—the complainant—has only a security interest. Civil remedies such as contract liability, rather than criminal liability, address this situation between the debtor and creditor. However, under the revised definition, a third party can be criminally liable for stealing, misappropriating, or damaging property that is in the possession of the debtor because the debtor does not have only a security interest in that property, the debtor also has a possessory interest.

The RCC definition of "property of another" replaces the current statutory definition of "property of another" in D.C. Code § 22-3201(4),[2] applicable to provisions in Chapter 32, Theft, Fraud, Stolen Property, Forgery, and Extortion offenses and provisions.

[1] For example, a second thief can steal previously stolen property or contraband from the first thief, even though the second thief may not be able to sue the first thief in civil court to recover the property or contraband.

[2] D.C. Code 22-3201(4) ("'Property of another' means any property in which a government or a person other than the accused has an interest which the accused is not privileged to interfere with or infringe upon without consent, regardless of whether the accused also has an interest in that property. The term "property of another" includes the property of a corporation or other legal entity established pursuant to an interstate compact. The term "property of another" does not include any property in the possession of the accused as to which any other person has only a security interest.").

The RCC definition of "property of another" is used in the revised defense for defense of property[3] as well as in twelve revised offenses.[4]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "property of another" makes one clear change to the current statutory definition of "property of another" in current D.C. Code § 22-3201(4). The RCC definition of "property of another" narrows the scope of the security interest exception that is in the current definition of "property of another." The last sentence of the current definition of "property of another" states that "property of another" excludes property in the possession of the accused as to which "any" person has only a security interest.[5] As a result, any offense that requires property to be "property of another" excludes from its coverage a broad category of property. The legislative history for the current definition of "property of another" contains conflicting explanations of the intended meaning of the exclusion of security interests.[6] The legislative history does not recognize that its explanations conflict with one another, which indicates that the Council likely did not intend to exclude all property in which another person has a security interest. In contrast, the revised definition of "property of another" narrows the exclusion for security interests to situations where "the other person"—the complaining witness—is the party that has the security interest. Civil remedies such as contract liability, rather than criminal liability, address this situation. The revised definition of "property of another" does not change the limited D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) case law holding that the government does not have to prove the security interest exception as an element of shoplifting.[7] This change clarifies the definition and reduces a gap in District law.

[5] D.C. Code 22-3201(4) ("The term 'property of another' does not include any property in the possession of the accused as to which any other person has only a security interest.").

[6] The legislative history for the 1982 Theft Act notes that the definition of "property of another" "does not extend to property in which the other person has only a security interest. Thus, the ordinary credit transaction is not included in this definition." Extension of Comments on Bill No. 4-193 at 17 (emphasis added). However, the legislative history also notes that "property of another" "is not intended to cover property that is in a person's possession and in which another person has only a security interest." Id. at 4 (emphasis added). Given the different wordings in the explanations of "property of another," it appears that the drafters of the 1982 Theft Act did not consider or realize that the definition of "property of another" may exclude all property that has a security interest from theft offenses.

[7] Alston v. United States, 509 A.2d 1129, 1130-1131 (D.C. 1986) ("there was no intention [on the part of the Council] to transform the exception for property in which a security interest is held by another in the definitional section into an element of the offense of shoplifting which must be proved by the government in its case in chief. We therefore may not impose that requirement of prof on the government in shoplifting cases.").

The remaining changes to the revised definition are clarificatory and are not intended to change current District law.

First, the revised definition of "property of another" deletes the reference to "government" in the first sentence of the current definition.[8] The reference is surplusage because the revised definition of "property of another" incorporates the revised definition of "person." The revised definition of "person" in 22E-701 includes governments, corporations, and other legal entities, where such construction is reasonable. Deleting the reference to government clarifies the definition without changing District law.

Second, the revised definition deletes the sentence, "The term 'property of another' includes the property of a corporation or other legal entity established pursuant to an interstate compact" that is in the current definition.[9] The sentence is superfluous because the revised definition of "property of another" incorporates the revised definition of "person." The revised definition of "person" in 22E-701 includes corporations and other legal entities, where such construction is reasonable.

Third, the revised definition of "property of another" refers to "actor" instead of the "accused" that is in the current definition.[10] RCC § 22E-701 defines "actor" as a "person accused of any criminal offense." Using "actor" instead of "accused" is a drafting change and does not substantively change current District law.

Finally, the revised definition deletes "infringe upon" that is in the current definition of "property of another."[11] The revised definition specifies "not privileged to interfere," rendering "infringe upon" superfluous. Deleting "not privileged to interfere" does not change District law.

Code 22-3201(4) ("'Property of another' means any property in which a government or a person other than the accused has an interest which the accused is not privileged to interfere with or infringe upon without consent, regardless of whether the accused also has an interest in that property. The term "property of another" does not include any property in the possession of the accused as to which any other person has only a security interest.").

"Protected person" means:

(A) A person who is under 18 years of age and at least 4 years younger than an actor who is 18 years of age or older;

(B) A person who is 65 years of age or older and at least 10 years older than an actor who is under 65 years of age;

(C) A vulnerable adult;

(D) A law enforcement officer, while in the course of their official duties;

(E) A public safety employee, while in the course of their official duties;

(F) A transportation worker, while in the course of their official duties; or

(G) A District official, while in the course of their official duties.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "protected person" is new, the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code (although there are several similar terms and related provisions in Title 22 concerning crimes against minors,[1] elderly persons,[2]

(d) A person who stalks, threatens, assaults, kidnaps, or injures a family member or vandalizes, damages, destroys, or takes the property of a family member on account of the

The RCC definition of "protected person" replaces these terms and provisions and is used in the revised offenses of murder,[9] manslaughter,[10] robbery,[11] assault,[12] criminal threats,[13] offensive physical contact,[14] kidnapping,[15] and criminal restraint.[16]

Relation to Current District Law. The revised definition of "protected person" makes seven clear changes to the statutory language of the provisions in current Title 22 for crimes against minors,[17] elderly persons,[18] vulnerable adults,[19] law enforcement officers,[20] public safety employees,[21] taxicab drivers,[22] transit operators and Metrorail station managers,[23] and District officials or employees.[24]

First, subparagraph (A) requires at least a four year age gap between the actor and the complainant. The District's current penalty enhancement for certain crimes against minors requires only a two year age gap[25] between an actor that is 18 years of age or older and a complainant that is under 18 years of age.[26] In contrast, subparagraph (A) of the RCC definition of "protected person" requires a four year age gap, which is consistent with the required age gap in several current District offenses[27] as well as several of the revised [26] Subparagraph (A) of the RCC definition of "protected person" and the current penalty enhancement for crimes against minors have the same age requirements for the actor and the complainant. The current penalty enhancement defines "adult" as a "person 18 years of age or older at the time of the offense" and a "minor" as a "person under 18 years of age at the time of the offense." D.C. Code § 22-3601(c). Rather than separately defining the terms of "adult" and "minor" like the current statute, subparagraph (A) incorporates the definitions of these terms directly into the revised statute, improving the clarity of the definition.

sex offenses in RCC chapter 13. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised offenses against persons.

Second, subparagraph (B) requires that the actor is under 65 years of age and that there is at least a 10 year age gap with the elderly complainant. The current penalty enhancement for crimes committed against senior citizens[28] and the current offenses for criminal abuse[29] and criminal neglect of an elderly person[30] do not require an age gap between the elderly complainant and the actor or an age for the actor. In contrast, subparagraph (B) of the RCC definition of "protected person" requires that the actor be under the age of 65 years and at least 10 years younger than the elderly complainant. The age gap and age requirements for the actor reserve enhanced penalties for predatory behavior targeting the elderly, rather than violence between elderly persons, and are consistent with a penalty enhancement in the revised sexual assault statute (RCC § 22E-1301). This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offenses against persons statutes.

Third, subparagraph (C) of the RCC definition of "protected person" includes a complainant that is a "vulnerable adult," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701. Under current District law, a vulnerable adult is extended special protection under the criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult,[31] financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult,[32] and criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult[33] statutes, but those are the only offenses. In contrast, subparagraph (C) of the RCC definition of "protected person" consistently enhances penalties for harms to a "vulnerable adult" in certain RCC offenses against persons because vulnerable adults are among those most susceptible to criminal acts. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised offenses against persons.

Fourth, subparagraph (D) and subparagraph (E) of the RCC definition of "protected person" include complainants that are a "law enforcement officer" and a "public safety officer," as those terms are defined in RCC § 22E-701. Under current District law, harms to law enforcement officers receive enhanced penalties for assault and murder,[34] and harms to public safety employees receive enhanced penalties for murder.[35] In contrast,

Code § 22-851 prohibits committing specified crimes against a law enforcement officer while the law enforcement officer is engaged in the performance of his or her duties or on account of the performance of those duties, provided that the law enforcement officer is also a District "official or employee," as that term is defined in D.C. Code § 22-851. D.C. Code § 22-851(a)(2), (c).

subparagraph (D) and subparagraph (E) of the RCC definition of "protected person" consistently enhance penalties for harms to law enforcement officers and public safety employees in certain RCC offenses against persons. This change improves these offenses' consistency and proportionality of statutes by treating persons in similarly protected positions equally.

Fifth, subparagraph (F) of the RCC definition of "protected person" includes complainants that are a "transportation worker," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701. Under current District law, certain harms to taxicab drivers,[36] transit operators, [37] and Metrorail station managers[38] receive enhanced penalties, but the enhancements apply to different offenses as compared to other current penalty enhancements in District law, such as the penalty enhancement for crimes committed against minors.[39] Current District law also does not have a penalty enhancement for crimes committed against private car service drivers. In contrast, subparagraph (F) of the RCC definition of "protected person, through the definition of "transportation worker" in RCC § 22E-701, consistently enhances penalties for harms to transportation workers, including private car service drives, in certain RCC offenses against persons. This change improves these offenses' consistency and proportionality of statutes by treating persons in similarly protected positions equally.

or on account of the performance of those duties, provided that the public safety employee is also a District "official or employee," as that term is defined in D.C. Code § 22-851. D.C. Code § 22-851(a)(2), (c).

[39] For example, the current penalty enhancement for crimes committed against minors applies to any crime that is a "crime of violence," as that term is defined in D.C. Code § 22-1331(4). D.C. Code § 22-3611(a), (c)(2). The definition of "crime of violence" is broad and includes several crimes that are not included in the penalty enhancements for taxicab drivers, transit operators, and Metrorail station managers in D.C. Code §§ 22-3751, 22-3751.01, and 22-3752. For example, assault with significant bodily injury, assault with intent to kill, assault with intent to commit first degree or second degree child sexual abuse, and burglary are included in the penalty enhancement for crimes against minors, but not the penalty enhancement for the transit operators, and Metrorail station managers. Although the scope of crimes for the penalty enhancement against minors is far broader than the penalty enhancement for crimes committed against transit operators, and Metrorail station managers, there are a few crimes in the penalty enhancement for crimes committed against transit operators, and Metrorail station managers that are not include in the penalty enhancement for minors, such as fourth degree sexual abuse and misdemeanor sexual abuse.

Sixth, subparagraph (G) of the RCC definition of "protected person" effectively repeals current D.C. Code § 22-851. Current D.C. Code § 22-851(b)[40] and (c)[41] prohibit committing specified crimes against any District "official or employee," broadly defined in D.C. Code § 22-851(a)[42] as "a person who currently holds or formerly held a paid or unpaid position in the legislative, executive, or judicial branch of government of the District of Columbia, including boards and commissions."[43] Current D.C. Code D.C Code § 22-851(d) prohibits committing specified crimes against a "family member" of a District official or employee, as defined in D.C. Code § 22-851(a),[44] on account of the official or employee's performance of official duties.[45] In contrast, subparagraph (G) of the RCC definition of "protected person" is limited to a "District official," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701,[46] and does not include family members of District officials. The RCC definition of "District official" narrows the penalty enhancement to individuals that have [40] D.C. Code § 22-851(b) ("A person who corruptly or, by threat or force, or by any threatening letter or communication, intimidates, impedes, interferes with, or retaliates against, or attempts to intimidate, impede, interfere with, or retaliate against any official or employee, while the official or employee is engaged in the performance of his or her duties or on account of the performance of those duties, shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both."). Conduct within the scope of subsection (b) of D.C Code § 22-851 may also be affected by the revised [obstruction of justice offenses in RCC § 22E-XXXX, forthcoming].

[41] D.C. Code § 22-851(c) ("A person who stalks, threatens, assaults, kidnaps, or injures any official or employee or vandalizes, damages, destroys, or takes the property of an official or employee, while the official or employee is engaged in the performance of his or her duties or on account of the performance of those duties, shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not more than 3 years, or both, in addition to any other penalties authorized by law.").

[42] D.C. Code § 22-851(a) ("For the purposes of this section, the term: (2) 'Official or employee' means a person who currently holds or formerly held a paid or unpaid position in the legislative, executive, or judicial branch of government of the District of Columbia, including boards and commissions.").

[43] D.C. Code § 22-851(a)(2).

[44] D.C. Code § 22-851(a) ("For the purposes of this section, the term: (1) 'Family member" means an individual to whom the official or employee of the District of Columbia is related by blood, legal custody, marriage, domestic partnership, having a child in common, the sharing of a mutual residence, or the maintenance of a romantic relationship not necessarily including a sexual relationship.').

[45] D.C. Code § 22-851(d) ("A person who stalks, threatens, assaults, kidnaps, or injures a family member or vandalizes, damages, destroys, or takes the property of a family member on account of the performance of the official or employee's duties, shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not more than 3 years, or both, in addition to any other penalties authorized by law.").

[46] RCC § 22E-701 defines "District official" as having the same meaning as the term "public official" in D.C. Code § 1-1161.01(47). D.C. Code § 1-1161.01(47) is limited to individuals that have special ethical and campaign finance obligations under the current D.C. Code and is discussed further in the commentary to RCC § 22E-701.

special obligations in District government.[47] This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offenses against persons.

Seventh, the RCC definition of "protected person" eliminates the current penalty enhancement for a "citizen patrol member." Current District law has a penalty enhancement for committing specified crimes against a member of a citizen patrol in the course of his or her duties or because of his or her participation in a citizen patrol.[48] In contrast, the RCC definition of "protected person" does not include citizen patrol members and, by extension, does not enhance penalties for this category of complainants in the RCC offenses against persons. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offenses against persons.

Other changes to the statutory language of the provisions in current Title 22 for crimes against minors,[49] elderly persons,[50] vulnerable adults,[51] law enforcement officers,[52] public safety employees,[53] taxicab drivers,[54] transit operators and Metrorail station managers,[55] and District officials or employees[56] are merely clarificatory. For instance, because the element that the complainant is a "protected person" is part of the gradations in several RCC offenses against persons, rather than a stand-alone penalty enhancement, there is no need to specify that the complainant must satisfy the requirements of the definition "at the time of the offense" as some current sentencing enhancements do.[57]

As applied to certain RCC offenses against persons, the RCC definition of "protected person" may substantively change current District law. For example, the RCC assault and robbery offenses eliminate the affirmative defenses in the current penalty enhancements for committing crimes against the elderly or minors. Under current District law, it is an affirmative defense to the senior citizen penalty enhancement that "the accused knew or reasonably believed the victim was not 65 years old or older at the time of the offense, or could not have known or determined the age of the victim because of the manner in which the offense was committed."[58] Similarly, under the current minor victim enhancement, it is an affirmative defense that "the accused reasonably believed that the victim was not a minor [person less than 18 years old] at the time of the offense."[59] Instead of an affirmative defense, the RCC assault and robbery offenses apply a "reckless" culpable mental state to penalty enhancements that require that the complaint is a "protected person." "Reckless" is defined in RCC § 22E-206 and here requires that the accused must consciously disregard a substantial risk that the complainant was under 18 or was 65 years of age or older. The "reckless" culpable mental state preserves the substance of the defenses for both the senior citizen enhancement and minor enhancement.[60] However, requiring a "reckless" culpable mental state improves the clarity and consistency of the offenses because the RCC assault and robbery statutes apply a "recklessly" mental state to the other categories of individuals in the definition of "protected person."

The commentaries to relevant RCC offenses against persons discuss in detail the effect of the RCC definition of "protected person" on current District law.

[60] The current enhancement for crimes against senior citizens makes it an affirmative defense that "the accused knew or reasonably believed the victim was not 65 years old or older at the time of the offense, or could not have known or determined the age of the victim because of the manner in which the offense was committed." D.C. Code § 22-3601(c). In the RCC, an accused that knew or reasonably believed that the complainant was not 65 years or older or could not have known or determined the age of the complainant would not satisfy the culpable mental state of recklessness as to the age of the complaining witness. The accused would not consciously disregard a substantial risk that the complainant was 65 years of age or older. Similarly, the current enhancement for crimes against minors has an affirmative defense that "the accused reasonably believed that the victim was not a minor at the time of the offense." D.C. Code § 22-3611(b). If an accused reasonably believed that the complaining witness was not a minor, the accused would not satisfy the culpable mental state of recklessness as to the age of the complaining witness because the accused would not consciously disregard a substantial risk that the complainant was under 18 years of age.

"Public conveyance" means any government-operated air, land, or water vehicle used for the transportation of persons, including any airplane, train, bus, or boat.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "public conveyance" is new; the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code (although undefined references to "public conveyance" appear in the current disorderly conduct statute[1]). The RCC definition of "public conveyance" is used in the revised offenses of endangerment with a firearm,[2] disorderly conduct,[3] public nuisance,[4] and indecent exposure.[5]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "public conveyance" is new and does not substantively change District law.

As applied in the revised public nuisance statute, the term "public conveyance" clarifies, but does not change, District law. The current disorderly conduct statute (which includes public nuisances) uses the phrase "public conveyance" but does not define it. Case law does not address its meaning. The revised code adds a definition of "public conveyance" to be used universally throughout the RCC. This change applies consistent, clearly articulated definitions and improves the clarity of the revised offenses.

"Public official" means a government employee, government contractor, law enforcement officer, or public official as defined in D.C. Code § 1-1161.01(47).

Explanatory Note*. The RCC definition of "public official" is new; the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C Code. The term "law enforcement officer" is defined elsewhere in RCC § 22E-701. The RCC definition of "public official" is used in the RCC definition of "District official,"[1] as well as in the revised provisions for execution of public duty[2] and the abuse of government power penalty enhancement.[3]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "public official" is new and does not substantively change District law.

"Public safety employee" means:

(A) An on-duty District of Columbia firefighter, emergency medical technician/ paramedic, emergency medical technician/intermediate paramedic, or emergency medical technician;

(B) Any other on-duty firefighter, emergency medical technician/ paramedic, emergency medical technician/intermediate paramedic, or emergency medical technician operating in the District of Columbia; or

(C) An on-duty District of Columbia investigator, vehicle inspection officer as defined in D.C. Code § 50-301.03(30B), or code inspector.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "public safety employee" replaces the current statutory definition of "public safety employee" in D.C. Code § 22-2106(b)(1),[1] applicable to the current murder of a law enforcement officer statute. The RCC definition of "public safety employee" is used in the RCC definition of "protected person"[2] and in the revised offenses of murder,[3] manslaughter,[4] assault,[5] criminal threats,[6] offensive physical contact,[7] kidnapping,[8] criminal restraint,[9] and impersonation of an official.[10]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "public safety employee" makes one clear change to the current statutory definition in D.C. Code § 22-2106(b)(2).[11] The current definition of "public safety employee" is limited to specified firefighters and emergency medical personnel, as well as any federal, state, county, or municipal officers performing comparable functions.[12] In contrast, subparagraph (B) of the RCC definition expands the definition to include "[a]ny on-duty investigator, vehicle inspection officer as defined in D.C. Code § 50-301.03(30B), or code inspector, employed by the government of the District of Columbia." These categories of complainants are included in the definition of "law enforcement officer" for the District's current assault on a police officer (APO) statute,[13] as well as the assault on a public vehicle inspection officer statutes.[14] This change clarifies District law by distinguishing persons who are regularly involved with criminal law enforcement from others who are not, and creating broad, consistent definitions as to who constitutes a law enforcement officer or public safety employee.

The revised definition of "public safety employee" makes two possible changes to the statutory definition of "public safety employee" in D.C. Code § 22-2106(b)(2).[15]

First, the revised definition requires that District of Columbia firefighters, emergency medical technicians (EMTs), and paramedics be "on-duty." The definition of "public safety employee" in current D.C. Code § 22-2106(b)(2) does not specify whether District of Columbia firefighters, EMTs, or paramedics must be "on-duty" and there is no DCCA case law interpreting the definition. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised definition requires that the firefighter, EMT, or paramedic be "on-duty." This is consistent with the scope of the RCC definition of "law enforcement," which requires specific types of law enforcement other than police officers be "on-duty."[16] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Second, the RCC definition of "public safety employee" does not include an off-duty federal, state, county, or municipal firefighter, EMT, or paramedic that does not operate in the District. The current D.C. Code definition of "public safety employee" includes "[a]ny federal, state, county, or municipal officer performing functions comparable" to the District of Columbia firefighters, EMTs, and paramedics specified in the definition. This definition provides no specific exception for off-duty firefighters, EMTs, and paramedics from other jurisdictions, so they may qualify as "public safety employees." There is no DCCA case law on point. The revised definition of "public safety the same meaning as provided in § 50-303(19)," in fact the term "public vehicle inspection officer" no longer exists in Title 50 of the D.C. Code. The definition of "public vehicle inspection officer" was repealed with the passage of the Vehicle-For-Hire Innovation Amendment Act of 2014 ("VFHIAA") (Mar. 10, 2015, D.C. Law 20-197, § 2(a), 61 DCR 12430), although the VFHIAA included a substantially similar, new definition for a "vehicle inspection officer." D.C. Code §50-301.03(30B) ("'Vehicle inspection officer' means a District employee trained in the laws, rules, and regulations governing public and private vehicle-for-hire service to ensure the proper provision of service and to support safety through street enforcement efforts, including traffic stops of public and private vehicles-for-hire, pursuant to protocol prescribed under this act and by regulation.") The VFHIAA legislative history does not, however, appear to include reference to the assault on public vehicle inspection officers offenses in D.C. Code §§ 22-404.02 and 22-404.03 or discuss how those offenses might be affected by the elimination of "public vehicle inspection officers."

[15] D.C. Code § 22-2106(b)(2).

[16] In the context of a conviction for carrying a pistol without a license, the DCCA has stated that "a special police officer" will be considered a policeman or law enforcement officer "only to the extent that he acts in conformance with the regulations governing special officers." Timus v. United Staes, 406 A.2d 1269, 1272 (D.C. 1979)). Based upon this case law, the RCC definition of "law enforcement officer" limits a special police officer and other specific types of "law enforcement officer" to those that are on-duty. In addition, there is no on-duty requirement in subparagraphs (A) or (B) of the revised definition of "law enforcement officer" pertaining to police officers due to DCCA case law stating that the current assault on a police officer statute includes "off-duty" police officers "provided they are engaged in the performance of official duties." Mattis v. United States, 995 A.2d 223, 227 (D.C. 2010).

employee" resolves this ambiguity and clarifies that off-duty firefighters, EMTs, or paramedics from other jurisdictions do not constitute "public safety employees" under the RCC. This change clarifies the revised statutes.

As applied to certain RCC offenses against persons, the RCC definition of "public safety employee" may substantively change District law. For example, under current District law, murder is the only offense that enhances penalties specifically for physical harms to paramedics and emergency medical technicians.[17] Through their gradations referencing a "protected person," however, additional RCC offenses against persons, such as robbery and assault, provide new, enhanced penalties where a public safety employee—including paramedics, and emergency medical technicians—is victimized. The expansion of a penalty enhancement for harming such persons improves these offenses' consistency and proportionality of statutes by treating persons in similarly protected positions equally.

The commentaries to relevant RCC offenses against persons discuss in detail the effect of the RCC definition of "public safety employee" on current District law.

[17] Note however, that assault-type behavior against all District employees in the course of their duties (including paramedics and emergency medical technicians) are subject to higher level penalties under the District's protection of district public officials statute, D.C. Code § 22-851.

"Purposely" and other parts of speech, including "purpose," have the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206.

Explanatory Note. The definition of "purposely" is addressed in the Commentary accompanying RCC § 22E-206. The revised definition of "purposely" and other parts of speech, including "purpose," appears in numerous RCC provisions.

"Rail transit station" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 35-251.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "rail transit station" is new; the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code. The RCC definition of "rail transit station" is used in the revised offenses of endangerment with a firearm,[1] disorderly conduct,[2] and indecent exposure.[3]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "rail transit station" is new and does not itself substantively change existing District law.

"Recording device" means a photographic or video camera, audio recorder, or any other device that is later developed that may be used for recording sounds or images or both.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "recording device" replaces the current definition of "recording device" in D.C. Code § 22-3214.02,[1] applicable to the current unlawful operation of a recording device in a movie theater statute. The RCC definition of "recording device" is used in the revised offense of unlawful operation of a recording device in a movie theater.[2]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "recording device" is nearly identical to the statutory definition in current law, with only clarificatory changes.[3]

"Restricted explosive" means any device that is designed to explode or produce uncontained combustion upon impact, including a breakable container containing flammable liquid and having a wick or a similar device capable of being ignited, but excluding any device that is lawfully and commercially manufactured primarily for the purpose of illumination, construction work, or other lawful purpose.

Explanatory Note. Lawfully and commercially manufactured explosives may include, but are not limited to, emergency flares, kerosene lamps, candles, toy pistol paper caps, chemistry sets, liquid nitrogen,[1] gunpowder,[2] pest control bombs, and mining equipment.

The RCC definition of "restricted explosive" replaces the current definition of "molotov cocktail" D.C. Code § 22-4515a(a). The RCC definition of "restricted explosive" is used in the revised definition of "dangerous weapon,"[3] in the revised offenses of possession of a prohibited weapon or accessory[4] and carrying a dangerous weapon,[5] and in the revised civil provisions for taking and destruction of dangerous articles.[6]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "restricted explosive" is similar to the definition "molotov cocktail" in D.C. Code § 22-4515a(a) and does not substantively change current District law.

"Retail value" means the actor's regular selling price for the item or service bearing or identified by the counterfeit mark. In the case of items bearing a counterfeit mark which are components of a finished product, the retail value shall be the actor's regular selling price of the finished product on or in which the component would be utilized.

Explanatory Note. The definition of "retail value" specifies the relevant value of items bearing or identified with a counterfeit mark. The RCC definition of "retail value" is used in the revised offense of trademark counterfeiting.[1]

Relation to Current District Law. No change to current District law. This definition is taken verbatim from D.C. Code § 22-901 (3), and is intended to have the same meaning as under current law.

"Sadomasochistic abuse" means flagellation, torture, or physical restraint by or upon a person as an act of sexual stimulation or gratification.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "sadomasochistic abuse" replaces the current definition of "sado-masochistic abuse" in D.C. Code § 22-2201(b)(2)(E)[1] and the reference to "[s]adomasochistic sexual activity for the purpose of sexual stimulation" in the definition of "sexual conduct" in D.C. Code § 22-3101(5)(D). The RCC definition of "sadomasochistic abuse" is used in the revised offenses of unauthorized disclosure of a sexual recording,[2] distribution of an obscene image,[3] distribution of an obscene image to a minor,[4] creating or trafficking an obscene image of a minor,[5] possession of an obscene image of a minor,[6] arranging a live sexual performance of a minor,[7] and attending or viewing a live sexual performance of a minor.[8]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "sadomasochistic abuse" makes one clear change to the definition of "sado-masochistic abuse" in D.C. Code § 22-2201(b)(2)(E). The revised definition makes no reference to the type of clothing that must be worn by the participants in sado-masochistic abuse. The current definition of "sado-masochistic abuse" includes any "flagellation or torture by or upon a person clad in undergarments or a mask or bizarre costume, or the condition of being fettered, bound, or otherwise physically restrained on the part of one so clothed." Read literally, this definition is both overinclusive and underinclusive.[9] In contrast, the revised definition requires sexual stimulation or gratification without reference to any particular manner of dress. This change improves the clarity of the revised distribution of an obscene image and distribution of an obscene image to a minor statutes.[10]

As applied in the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image of a minor, possession of an obscene image of a minor, arranging a live sexual performance of a minor, and attending or viewing a live sexual performance of a minor offenses,[11] the RCC definition of "sadomasochistic abuse" clarifies current District law. The current sexual performance of a minor statute prohibits "sadomasochistic sexual activity for the purpose of sexual stimulation"[12] without any further definition and there is no DCCA case law. RCC definition specifies discrete types of sadomasochistic abuse and retains the requirement of sexual stimulation. The RCC definition also adds sexual "gratification" for consistency with the desire to sexually "gratify" in the RCC definitions of "sexual act"[13] and "sexual contact."[14] The revised definition clarifies the scope of the revised statutes.

The commentaries to specific RCC offenses using the revised definition may discuss further the effect of the revised definition on current District law for that specific offense.

"Sawed-off shotgun" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 7-2501.01.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "sawed-off shotgun" is new; the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code. The RCC definition of "sawed-off shotgun" is used in the revised offenses of possession of a prohibited weapon or accessory[1] and unlawful transfer of a firearm,[2] as well as in the revised civil provisions for licenses of firearms dealers.[3]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "sawed-off shotgun" is new and does not itself substantively change existing District law.

"Secure juvenile detention facility" means any building or building grounds, whether located in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, operated by the Department of Youth Rehabilitation Services for the secure confinement of persons committed to the Department of Youth Rehabilitation Services.

Explanatory Note. Building grounds refers to the area of land occupied by the correctional facility and its yard and outbuildings, with a clearly identified perimeter. The word "secure" makes clear that a placement at home or in a community-based residential facility is excluded.[1] The definition does not include facilities such as behavioral health hospitals that are principally concerned with providing medical care. The definition does not include buildings used by private businesses to detain suspected criminals, such as a booking room in a retail store.

The RCC definition of "secure juvenile detention facility" is new; the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code (although similar language is used in the current escape from institution or officer,[2] escape from juvenile facilities,[3] and unlawful possession of contraband[4] offenses). The term "building" that is used in the definition of "secure juvenile detention facility" is defined elsewhere in RCC § 22E-701. The RCC definition of "secure juvenile detention facility" is used in the revised offenses of escape from a correctional facility or officer[5] and correctional facility contraband.[6]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "secure juvenile detention facility" is new and does not substantively change District law.

As applied in the revised escape from a correctional facility or officer offense, the term "secure juvenile detention facility" may substantively change District law. D.C. Code § 22-2601 uses the phrase "penal or correctional institution or facility" but does not define it. DCCA case law has held that, in addition to the Central Detention Facility ("D.C. Jail"), this phrase also includes the District's halfway houses,[7] however, case law is silent as to whether any juvenile detention facilities qualify.[8] D.C. Code § 10-509.01a uses the word "institution" and cross-references D.C. Code § 10-509.01, which is limited to locations outside the District of Columbia that operate as a "sanitorium, hospital, training school, correctional institution, reformatory, workhouse, or jail." In contrast, the revised code separately defines "correctional facility," "halfway house," and "secure juvenile detention facility" to be used universally throughout the RCC. This change applies consistent, clearly articulated definitions and improves the clarity of the revised offenses.

[8] Juvenile detention facilities are generally regarded as service providers and are not, strictly speaking, "penal" or correctional in nature.

As applied in the revised correctional facility contraband offense, the term "secure juvenile detention facility" may substantively change District law. D.C. Code § 22-2603.01 defines "secure juvenile residential facility" to mean "a locked residential facility providing custody, supervision, and care for one or more juveniles that is owned, operated, or under the control of the Department of Youth Rehabilitation Services, excluding residential treatment facilities and accredited hospitals." It defines "grounds" to mean "the area of land occupied by the penal institution or secure juvenile residential facility and its yard and outbuildings, with a clearly identified perimeter." In contrast, the revised code separately defines "correctional facility," "halfway house," and "secure juvenile detention facility" to be used universally throughout the RCC. Each definition includes buildings (also defined in RCC § 22E-701) and building grounds. This change applies consistent, clearly articulated definitions and improves the clarity of the revised offenses.

"Self-induced intoxication" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-209.

Explanatory Note. The definition of "self-induced intoxication" is addressed in the Commentary accompanying RCC § 22E-209. The RCC definition of "self-induced intoxication" is used in the revised offenses of murder,[1] manslaughter,[2] and assault.[3]

"Serious bodily injury" means a bodily injury or significant bodily injury that involves:

(A) A substantial risk of death;

(B) Protracted and obvious disfigurement;

(C) Protracted loss or impairment of the function of a bodily member or organ; or

(D) Protracted loss of consciousness.

Explanatory Note. "Serious bodily injury" is the highest of the three levels of bodily injury defined in the RCC. The definition incorporates the definitions of both lower levels: "bodily injury" and "significant bodily injury," also defined in RCC § 22E-701. The injury must involve a substantial risk of death or result in protracted and obvious disfigurement, protracted loss or impairment of the function of a bodily member or organ, or protracted loss of consciousness. "Protracted" is intended to have the same meaning in subparagraphs (B), (C), and (D).

The RCC definition of "serious bodily injury" replaces the current statutory definition of "serious bodily injury" in D.C. Code § 22-3001(7),[1] applicable to provisions in Chapter 30, Sexual Abuse, and undefined references to "serious bodily injury" in the current aggravated assault,[2] criminal abuse or neglect of a vulnerable adult,[3] and unauthorized use of motor vehicle[4] statutes. There are undefined references to the term[5]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "serious bodily injury" makes three clear changes to the current statutory definition of "serious bodily injury" in D.C. Code § 22-3001(7),[12] applicable to provisions in Chapter 30, Sexual Abuse.

First, the revised definition of "serious bodily injury" requires a "protracted loss of consciousness" instead of "unconsciousness." The District's current aggravated assault statute requires "serious bodily injury," but does not define the term,[13] and the DCCA has generally applied the sex offense definition of "serious bodily injury."[14] In the context of aggravated assault, the DCCA has specifically declined to hold that "unconsciousness" is categorically of the same severity as the other harms in the definition of "serious bodily injury."[15] In contrast, the RCC definition of "serious bodily injury" requires a "protracted statute requiring that the weapon of mass destruction be "capable of causing . . . serious bodily injuries to multiple persons."); 22-3155(a), (b) (use, dissemination, or detonation of a weapon of mass destruction statute requiring that the weapon of mass destruction be "capable of causing . . . serious bodily injuries to multiple persons."). [14] Nixon v. United States, 730 A.2d 145, 150 (D.C. 1999) ("Since the definition of "serious bodily injury" which appears in . . . the District's sexual abuse statute . . . is consistent with that followed in the majority of jurisdictions, we adopt it for the purpose of determining whether the government met its burden to prove 'serious bodily injury' under the aggravated assault statute.).

[15] In re D.P., 122 A.3d 903, 908 n. 10 (D.C. 2015) ("In light of our conclusion that [appellant] lacked the requisite mens rea for aggravated assault, we do not determine whether the complainant's brief loss of unconsciousness—from which she fully recovered without medical treatment and which did not amount to loss of consciousness." In the RCC offenses against persons, a brief loss of consciousness constitutes at least "significant bodily injury," also defined in RCC § 22E-701. This revision improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised definition.

Second, the revised definition of "serious bodily injury" no longer includes "extreme physical pain." The DCCA has stated that the term "extreme physical pain" "is regrettably imprecise and subjective, and we cannot but be uncomfortable having to grade another human being's pain."[16] This revision improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised definition.

Third, the revised definition of "serious bodily injury" no longer includes "protracted loss or impairment of the function" of a "mental faculty." It is unclear whether "mental faculty" (emphasis added) refers to the physical condition of the brain or more generally to psychological distress. The DCCA has not interpreted this part of the current definition of "serious bodily injury." To the extent that "mental faculty" refers to the brain, "mental faculty" is redundant with "organ" in the current definition of "serious bodily injury." To the extent that "mental faculty" refers generally to emotional or psychological distress, it may be hard to qualify, similar to "unconsciousness" and "extreme physical pain" in the current definition. This revision improves the clarity and the proportionality of the revised definition.

Other than these changes, the revised definition does not change existing District law on the meaning of "serious bodily injury" as defined in the current sexual abuse statutes and applied to the current aggravated assault statute. The revised definition is meant to preserve case law interpreting the parts of the current D.C. Code definition, including "disfigurement," that were carried over to the RCC definition. The threshold for such an injury remains high.[17] The syntax of the revised definition clarifies that, as under current significant bodily injury . . . amounted to serious bodily injury."); Vaughn v. United States, 93 A.3d 1237, 1269 n. 39 (D.C. 2014) ("We question whether the government presented evidence that [the complainant] suffered serious bodily injury at all. The government presented evidence that [the complainant] briefly lost consciousness following the attack, that the head injuries he incurred did not cause substantial pain, and that, although he sought medical care, he fully recovered from these injuries without medical intervention. This appears to fall well below the "high threshold of injury" . . . we have set to prove aggravated assault.") (internal citations omitted).

[16] Swinton v. United States, 902 A.2d 772, 777 (D.C. 2006).

[17] Swinton v. United States, 902 A.2d 772, 775 (D.C. 2006) ("Our decisions since Nixon have emphasized 'the high threshold of injury, that "the legislature intended in fashioning a crime that increases twenty-fold the maximum prison term for simple assault." Jenkins v. United States, 877 A.2d 1062, 1069 (D.C.2005) (internal quotation marks and citations omitted). The cases in which we have found sufficient evidence of 'serious bodily injury' to support convictions for aggravated assault thus have involved grievous stab wounds, severe burnings, or broken bones, lacerations and actual or threatened loss of consciousness. The injuries in these cases usually were life-threatening or disabling. The victims typically required urgent and continuing medical treatment (and, often, surgery), carried visible and long-lasting (if not permanent) scars, and suffered other consequential damage, such as significant impairment of their faculties. In short, these cases have been horrific." (internal citations omitted)).

District case law interpreting the definition for the sexual abuse statutes,[18] the "substantial risk" applies only to the risk of death.

However, as applied to certain RCC offenses against persons, the revised definition of "serious bodily injury" may change current District law. For example, the revised sexual assault statute (RCC § 22E-1301) and revised sexual abuse of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1302) have a penalty enhancement if the actor recklessly causes "serious bodily injury" to the complainant immediately before, during, or immediately after the sexual act or sexual contact. The current sexual abuse statutes have a similar penalty enhancement for causing "serious bodily injury,"[19] as that term is defined by the current sex offense statutes. Due to the revised definition of "serious bodily injury," the penalty enhancement in the RCC sexual assault offense and RCC sexual abuse of a minor statute no longer apply to injury that results in any unconsciousness, extreme physical pain, or protracted loss or impairment of a "mental faculty," unless the other requirements of the revised definition are met. The revised penalty enhancement ensures the enhancement is reserved for the most serious injuries.

The commentaries to relevant RCC offenses against persons discuss in detail the effect of the RCC definition of "serious bodily injury" on current District law.

[18] Scott v. United States, 954 A.2d 1037, 1046 (D.C. 2008) ("[W]e readily conclude that the 'substantial risk' . . . is only a substantial risk of death, not a substantial risk of extreme pain, disfigurement, or any of the other conditions listed.").
[19] D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(3).

"Serious mental injury" means substantial, prolonged harm to a person's psychological or intellectual functioning, that may be exhibited by severe anxiety, depression, withdrawal, or outwardly aggressive behavior, or a combination of those behaviors, and that may be demonstrated by a change in behavior, emotional response, or cognition.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "serious mental injury" differs from the definition of "mental injury" in the District's current civil statutes for proceedings on child delinquency, neglect, or need of supervision[1] by adding the requirement that the harm be "substantial" and "prolonged."

The RCC definition of "serious mental injury" is new, the term is not currently statutorily defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code. The RCC definition of "serious mental injury" is used in the revised offenses of criminal abuse of a minor,[2] criminal neglect of a minor,[3] criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person,[4] and criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person.[5]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "serious mental injury" is new and does not substantively change current District law.

As applied to the RCC offenses for criminal abuse and criminal neglect of minors, vulnerable adults, and elderly persons, the term "serious mental injury" may change current District law. These RCC offenses prohibit either causing serious mental injury to the complainant[6] or creating, or failing to mitigate or remedy, a substantial risk that the complainant would experience serious mental injury,[7] but the current equivalent offenses in Title 22 either do not include such harm or risk of harm, or it is unclear whether they do. For example, the current District child cruelty statute is silent as to whether the offense covers purely psychological harms,[8] but DCCA case law is clear that the offense extends at least to serious psychological harm.[9] However, the court has not articulated a precise definition of the requisite psychological harm, making it unclear whether the revised definition of "serious mental injury" changes current District law. Similarly, the current

The DCCA has further stated that "the infliction of psychological harm can contravene a criminal statute prohibiting cruelty to children, but the harm must be serious and 'unjustifiable' rather than mild or trivial." Alfaro, 859 A.2d at 159 (agreeing with the analysis of the Supreme Court of Louisiana of a Louisiana child abuse statute).

abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute is graded, in part, based on whether "severe mental distress" resulted,[10] but the statute does not define the term and there is no DCCA case law. Applying the RCC definition of "serious mental injury" to these offenses improves the clarity, completeness, and consistency of the revised offenses.

The commentaries to relevant RCC offenses against persons discuss in detail the effect of the RCC definition of "serious mental injury" on current District law.

(B) The use of vehicles or equipment;

(C) Transportation, telecommunications, energy, water, sanitation, or other public utility services, whether provided by a private or governmental entity;

(D) The supplying of food, beverage, lodging, or other accommodation in hotels, restaurants, or elsewhere;

(E) Admission to public exhibitions or places of entertainment; and

(F) Educational and hospital services, accommodations, and other related services.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "services" replaces the current definition of "services" in D.C. Code § 22-3201(5),[1] applicable to provisions in Chapter 32, Theft, Fraud, Stolen Property, Forgery, and Extortion offenses and provisions. The RCC definition of "services" is used in the RCC definitions of "counterfeit mark,"[2] "debt bondage,"[3] and "property,"[4] as well as in the revised offenses of forced labor,[5] trafficking in labor,[6] misuse of documents in furtherance of human trafficking,[7] fraud,[8] and forgery.[9]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "services" is identical to the statutory definition under current law.[10]

"Sexual act" means:

(A) Penetration, however slight, of the anus or vulva of any person by a penis;

(B) Contact between the mouth of any person and another person's penis, vulva, or anus;

(C) Penetration, however slight, of the anus or vulva of any person by any body part or by any object, with the desire to sexually abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, arouse, or gratify any person, or at the direction of someone with such a desire; or

(D) Conduct described in subparagraphs (A)-(C) of this paragraph between a person and an animal.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "sexual act" specifies several types of sexual penetration and oral sexual contact. The requirement in subparagraph (C) that the penetration be done with "the desire to sexually abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, arouse, or gratify any person, or at the direction of a person with such a desire," excludes penetration done for legitimate medical, hygienic, or law-enforcement reasons. "Sexually" modifies each adjective in this desire requirement and requires that the penetration be sexual in nature.

The RCC definition of "sexual act" replaces the current statutory definition of "sexual act" in D.C. Code § 22-3001(8),[1] applicable to provisions in Chapter 30, Sexual Abuse. The RCC definition of "sexual act" is used in the revised defenses for defense of self or another person[2] and duress,[3] in the RCC definitions of "commercial sex act"[4] and "sexual contact,"[5] and in twenty-two revised offenses.[6]

Relation to Current District Law. The revised definition of "sexual act" makes one clear change to the statutory definition of "sexual act" in D.C. Code § 22-3001(8).[7]

Subparagraph (C) of the revised definition of "sexual act" requires that the defendant have the desire to "sexually abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, arouse, or gratify" any person. "Sexually" modifies each adjective and requires that the penetration be sexual in nature. Subparagraph (C) of the current D.C. Code definition of "sexual act" requires an intent to "abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, or arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person."[8] However the current D.C. Code definition's reference to the "sexual desire of any person" appears limited to an intent to "arouse or gratify" and the current subparagraph (C) appears to include penetration with any intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, or degrade. In contrast, subparagraph (C) of the revised definition of "sexual act" requires that the penetration be sexual in nature. It is disproportionate to include in the RCC sex offenses and similarly serious RCC offenses, like the human trafficking offenses in RCC Chapter 16, conduct that is not proven to be sexual in nature. The RCC provides liability for non-sexual conduct in the revised assault statute (RCC § 22E-1201) or offensive physical contact statute (RCC § 22E-1205). However, practically, it would be an exceedingly rare fact pattern where penetration-type conduct would occur with intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, or degrade, that is not also done with intent to sexually abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, or arouse or gratify.[9] This revision improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised definition, and reduces unnecessary overlap with non-sexual assault offenses.

The revised definition of "sexual act" makes five possible substantive changes to the statutory definition of "sexual act" in D.C. Code § 22-3001(8).[10]

First, subparagraph (A) of the revised definition of "sexual act" requires the penetration of the anus or vulva of "any person" by a penis. The current definition of "sexual act" requires the penetration of the anus or vulva "of another" by a penis.[11] The "of another" requirement in the current definition creates ambiguities in the current sexual abuse offenses regarding liability for the actor engaging in a "sexual act" with the complainant and liability for the involvement of a third party.[12] This revision improves the clarity and consistency of the revised sexual abuse statutes.

[8] D.C. Code § 22-3001(8)(C).

[9] While there can be virtually no penetration or oral contact that satisfies the definition of "sexual act" that is not sexual in nature, defining subparagraph (C) in this way aligns the revised definition of "sexual act" with the revised definition of "sexual contact," where requiring a sexual intent does have practical impact on distinguishing liability for an assault (e.g. hitting someone with a bicycle or car on their buttocks) and a sexual assault (e.g. hitting someone on their buttocks while commenting on their sexual attractiveness).

[10] D.C. Code § 22-3001(8).

[11] D.C. Code § 22-3001(8)(A).

[12] For example, when subparagraph (A) of the current definition of "sexual act" is inserted into first degree and second degree sexual abuse (D.C. Code §§ 22-3002 and 22-3003), the plain language reading is "engages in the penetration, however slight, of the anus or vulva of another, by a penis," "causes another person to engage in the penetration, however slight, of the anus or vulva of another, by a penis," or "causes another person to submit to the penetration, however slight of the anus or vulva of another, by a penis." The plain language

Second, subparagraph (C) of the revised definition of "sexual act" specifies penetration by "any body part or by any object." Subparagraph (C) of the current definition of "sexual act" requires penetration of the "anus or vulva" by "a hand or finger or by any object" with intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, etc.[13] It is unclear in subparagraph (C) of the current definition whether penetration by a body part is limited to "a hand or finger," or if penetration by another body part, such as a toe, would be included as "any object." The scope of subparagraph (C) of the current definition of "sexual act" is also unclear because the current subparagraph (A) requires penetration of the "anus or vulva" by "a penis."[14] Subparagraph (C) of the RCC definition of "sexual act" resolves this ambiguity by specifying penetration "by any body part or by any object." This change improves the clarity of the revised definition and removes a possible gap in liability.

Third, subparagraph (C) of the revised definition clarifies that the penetration can be done "at the direction of a person" with the desire to sexually abuse, harass etc. Subparagraph (C) of the current definition of "sexual act" requires the penetration to be done with an intent to "abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, or arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person."[15] The current definition appears to require that the individual who does the penetration—be it the actor, the complainant, or a third party—also have the intent to abuse, humiliate, etc. This interpretation leads to counterintuitive results and disproportionate penalties for similar conduct[16] and is inconsistent with the legislative history.[17] It is also inconsistent with the part of the current subparagraph (C) that permits an intent to arouse or gratify the sexual desire "of any person." There is no DCCA case law on this issue. Resolving this ambiguity, subparagraph (C) of the revised definition specifies that the actor can himself or herself have the required desire to sexually abuse, etc., if the actor engages in the penetration, but it is also sufficient for the complainant or a third party to engage in the penetration at the direction of the actor or another person with readings create liability for the actor penetrating the complainant, but it is unclear if there is liability for the actor causing the complainant to penetrate a third person or for the actor causing a third person to penetrate the complainant.

[13] D.C. Code § 22-3001(8) ("'Sexual act' means . . . (C) The penetration, however slight, of the anus or vulva by a hand or finger or by any object, with an intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, or arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person.").

[14] D.C. Code § 22-3001(8) ("'Sexual act' means: (A) The penetration, however slight, of the anus or vulva of another by a penis.").

[15] D.C. Code § 22-3001(8)(C).

[16] For example, an actor that digitally penetrates the complainant's anus with the intent to abuse the complainant has satisfied subparagraph (C) of the current definition. The actor has also satisfied the current subparagraph if he or she digitally penetrates the complainant with the intent to sexually gratify a third person that is watching the encounter. However, if the actor makes the complainant digitally penetrate himself or herself, it is unlikely that the complainant shares the actor's intent to abuse the complainant or the intent to sexually gratify a third person and there may not be liability under the current definition.

[17] The Anti-Sexual Abuse Act of 1994 was intended to "strengthen the District's laws against sexual abuse and make them more inclusive, flexible and reflective of the broad range of abusive conduct which does in fact occur." Council of the District of Columbia, Report of the Committee on the Judiciary, Bill 10-87, the "Anti-Sexual Abuse Act of 1994 at 1.

such a desire.[18] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised definition and removes a possible gap in current law.

Fourth, subparagraph (C) of the revised definition of "sexual act" requires penetration with the "desire to" sexually abuse, etc. Subparagraph (C) of the current definition of "sexual act" requires that the defendant act "with an intent" to abuse, etc.[19] The meaning of "intent" is undefined and it is unclear as to whether the meaning is more similar to the RCC § 22E-206 definition of "purpose" as "conscious[] desire" or "intent" as "practically certain." Resolving this ambiguity, subparagraph (C) of the revised definition of "sexual act" requires that the defendant act "with the desire to" sexually abuse, etc. The reference to "desire" tracks the higher culpable mental state in the RCC definition of "purpose." In addition, "intent" is a defined culpable mental state in RCC § 22E-206, and per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, applies to every element that comes after it unless a different culpable mental state or strict liability is specified. If "intent" is included in an RCC offense through the definition of "sexual act" or "sexual contact," that would complicate the interpretation of culpable mental states in that offense. This change improves the clarity of the revised definition.

Fifth, subparagraph (D) the revised definition of "sexual act" specifically includes certain forms of bestiality, mainly an animal sexually penetrating or making contact with a person or a person so sexually penetrating or making contact with an animal.[20] The [18] For example, an actor that causes the complainant to digitally penetrate the complainant's anus has satisfied the first part of the current subparagraph (C) and revised subparagraph (C)—penetration of the anus or vulva of any person (the complainant) by a finger. However, it is arguable that the required intent of current subparagraph (C) has not been met. The actor may have the intent to abuse the complainant, but the complainant is the individual doing the actual penetration and likely does not share this intent. Under the revised subparagraph (C), however, there is no ambiguity as to whether the actor's conduct suffices because the complainant has engaged in the required penetration "at the direction of" the actor with the desire to sexually abuse the complainant.

[19] D.C. Code § 22-3001(8)(C).

[20] Subparagraph (D) of the revised definition of "sexual act" prohibits "conduct described in subparagraphs (A)-(C) between a person and an animal." This requires reading subparagraphs (A) – (C) broadly to include an animal even if the statutory language specifies "person" or is silent as to the ownership of a body part.

As it pertains to subparagraph (A) of the revised definition, subparagraph (D) prohibits an animal penis penetrating the anus or vulva of a person, as well as a human penis penetrating the anus or vulva of an animal. It is not intended to include a human complainant using an animal penis to penetrate an animal.

As it pertains to subparagraph (B) of the revised definition, subparagraph (D) prohibits contact between the mouth of any person and the penis, anus, or vulva of any animal, as well as contact between the mouth of any animal and the penis, anus, or vulva of any person. It is not intended to include a human complainant causing prohibited oral sexual contact between two animals.

As it pertains to subparagraph (C) of the revised definition, subparagraph (D) prohibits the body part of any animal penetrating the anus or vulva of a person, as well as a hand or current definition of "sexual act" does not specifically refer to an animal, although subparagraphs (A) and (B) of the statute do not specifically exclude involvement of animals. Subparagraph (C) does refer to a "person" in the phrase "arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person," but also includes penetration by "any object."[21] There is no DCCA case law interpreting the current definition of "sexual act" as it pertains to animals. The District does not have a separate bestiality statute. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised definition clearly specifies that a sexual act may occur between a human and an animal. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised definition.

Finally, the RCC definition of "sexual act" makes three clarificatory changes to the current definition that do not substantively change District law.

First, subparagraph (B) of the revised definition clarifies that the contact must be with "another person's" penis, vulva, or anus. Subparagraph (B) of the current definition does not specify "any person" or "another person," requiring only "[c]ontact between the mouth and the penis, the mouth and the vulva, or the mouth and the anus."[22] This omission creates ambiguities in the current sexual abuse offenses regarding liability for the actor engaging in the prohibited contact with the complainant and liability for the involvement of a third party.[23] Specifying that the contact can be between the specified body parts of "another person" clarifies the definition.

Second, subparagraph (C) of the revised definition clarifies that the penetration can be of "any person." Subparagraph (C) of the current definition does not specify "any person" or "another person," requiring only "penetration…of the anus or vulva."[24] This omission creates ambiguities in the current sexual abuse offenses regarding liability for the actor engaging in the prohibited penetration with the complainant and liability for the involvement of a third party.[25] Specifying that the penetration can be of "any person" (subparagraph (C)) clarifies the definition.

finger of a person or an object wielded by a person penetrating the anus or vulva of any animal.

[21] D.C. Code § 22-3001(8)(C) ("The penetration, however slight, of the anus or vulva by a hand or finger or by any object, with an intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, or arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person.").

[22] D.C. Code § 22-3001(8)(B).

[23] For example, when subparagraph (B) of the current definition of "sexual act" is inserted into the current second degree child sexual abuse statute (D.C. Code § 22-3009), the plain language reading is "engages in contact between the mouth and the penis, the mouth and the vulva, or the mouth and the anus with that child" and "causes that child to engage in contact between the mouth and the penis, the mouth and the vulva, or the mouth and the anus." It is unclear whether the specified body parts must belong to the complainant, the actor, or a third party.

[24] D.C. Code § 22-3001(8)(C).

[25] For example, when subparagraph (B) of the current definition of "sexual act" is inserted into the current second degree child sexual abuse statute (D.C. Code § 22-3009), the plain language reading is "engages in contact between the mouth and the penis, the mouth and the vulva, or the mouth and the anus with that child" and "causes that child to engage in contact between the mouth and the penis, the mouth and the vulva, or the mouth and the Third, the revised definition of "sexual act" no longer states that "the emission of semen is not required," as is the case in subparagraph (D) of the current definition of "sexual act."[26] Nothing in the remaining subparagraphs of the current definition[27] or in the revised definition of "sexual act" suggests that emission of semen is required. The language is surplusage and potentially confusing. Consequently, the revised definition of "sexual act" omits this language to improve the clarity of the definition.

As applied in the revised voyeurism offense[28] the revised definition makes one possible substantive change to current District law. The voyeurism offense in D.C. Code §§ 22-3531(b)(3) and (c)(1)(C) uses the term "sexual activity," without defining it. District case law has not addressed its meaning. Broadly construed, the term may include in voyeurism liability conduct short of penetration, such as kissing or caressing. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised voyeurism statute uses the defined term "sexual act" to include direct contact between one person's genitalia and another person's genitalia, mouth, or anus.[29] Consequently, the revised voyeurism offense prohibits observing or recording a person who is engaging in a sexual act, masturbation, or displaying certain body parts[30]—but not mere kissing or caressing. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised offense.

As applied in the revised unauthorized disclosure of sexual recordings offense,[31] the revised definition makes one possible substantive change to current District law. The current non-consensual pornography statute protects against depictions of "sexual conduct," including masturbation and "[s]adomasochistic sexual activity for the purpose of sexual stimulation,"[32] while the current felony voyeurism statute protects depictions of "sexual activity"[33] without defining that term. Broadly construed, the term "sexual activity" may include conduct short of penetration, such as kissing or caressing. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised statute includes depictions of a "sexual act," as defined in RCC § 22E-701, as well as masturbation, sadomasochistic abuse, and images certain body parts[34]—but not mere kissing or caressing. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised offense.

The commentaries to specific RCC offenses using the revised definition may discuss further the effect of the revised definition on current District law for that specific offense.

"Sexual contact" means:

(A) Sexual act; or

(B) Touching of the clothed or unclothed genitalia, anus, groin, breast, inner thigh, or buttocks of any person:

(i) With any clothed or unclothed body part or any object, either directly or through the clothing; and

(ii) With the desire to sexually abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, arouse, or gratify any person, or at the direction of someone with such a desire.

Explanatory Note. Including "sexual act" in subparagraph (A) of the revised definition of "sexual contact" establishes that RCC sex offenses that require a "sexual contact" are lesser included offenses of otherwise identical RCC sex offenses that differ only in that they require a "sexual act"—for example first degree sexual assault and third degree sexual assault. The requirement in sub-subparagraph (B)(ii) of the revised definition, "with the desire to sexually abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, arouse, or gratify any person," excludes touching done for legitimate medical, hygienic, or law-enforcement reasons. "Sexually" modifies each adjective in this desire requirement and requires that the touching be sexual in nature.

The RCC definition of "sexual contact" replaces the current statutory definition of "sexual contact" in D.C. Code § 22-3001(9),[1] applicable to provisions in Chapter 30, Sexual Abuse. The RCC definition of "sexual contact" is used in the revised defenses for defense of self or another person[2] and duress,[3] in the RCC definition of "commercial sex act,"[4] and in nineteen revised offenses.[5]

[6] D.C. Code § 22-3001(9).

First, the revised definition of "sexual contact" specifically includes a "sexual act," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701. It is unclear in current District law whether "sexual contact" necessarily includes a "sexual act" because the current definition of "sexual contact" requires the intent to abuse, humiliate, etc., and subparagraph (A) and subparagraph (B) of the current definition of "sexual act" do not.[7] In contrast, the revised definition of "sexual contact" statutorily specifies that "sexual contact" includes a "sexual act." This change establishes that RCC sex offenses that require a "sexual contact" are lesser included offenses of otherwise identical RCC sex offenses that differ only in that they require a "sexual act"—for example first degree sexual assault and third degree sexual assault. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised sex offenses and removes a possible gap in current District law.

Second, the revised definition of "sexual contact" requires that the defendant have the desire to "sexually abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, arouse, or gratify" any person. "Sexually" modifies each adjective and requires that the contact be sexual in nature. Subparagraph (C) of the current D.C. Code definition of "sexual contact" requires an intent to "abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, or arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person."[8] However the current D.C. Code definition's reference to the "sexual desire of any person" appears limited to an intent to "arouse or gratify" and the current definition of "sexual contact" appears to include contact with any intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, or degrade.[9] [7] In In re E.H., the DCCA declined to address whether second degree child sexual abuse is a lesser included offense of first degree child sexual abuse, but noted that "[a]t oral argument, counsel for the government agreed with appellant's counsel that second-degree sexual abuse is not a lesser-included offense of first-degree sexual abuse because, at least in two instances, to prove a 'sexual act' (for first-degree [sexual abuse of a child]) it is not necessary to show the specific intent required to prove 'sexual contact' (for second-degree [sexual abuse of a child])". In re E.H., 967 A.2d 1270, 1275 n.9 (D.C. 2009). The DCCA compared subparagraphs (A) and (B) of the current definition of "sexual act" in D.C. Code § 22-3001(8) and noted that they do not require a specific intent "to abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, or arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person" like the current definition of "sexual contact" in D.C. Code § 22-3001(9) does. The DCCA further noted that "[i]n general, a crime can only be a lesser-included offense of another if its required proof contains some, but not all, of the elements of the greater offense," but "the gravamen of whether a crime is the lesser-included offense of another is legislative intent. Id. (internal quotation omitted).

Although In re E.H. is specific to child sexual abuse, all the current sexual abuse offenses that require a "sexual act" and "sexual contact" have the same issue—the current definition of "sexual contact" has a specific intent requirement that two subparagraphs of the definition of "sexual act" do not. It seems as though the DCCA would find that this specific intent requirement precludes otherwise identical sex offenses from having a lesser included relationship.

[8] D.C. Code § 22-3001(9).

[9] For example, if the current definition of "sexual contact" includes touching with any intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, or degrade, regardless of whether its sexual in nature, throwing a snowball at a person's buttocks with an intent to harass would be included in a "sexual contact."

In contrast, the revised definition of "sexual contact" requires that the touching be sexual in nature. It is disproportionate to include in the RCC sex offenses and similarly serious RCC offenses, like the human trafficking offenses in RCC Chapter 16, conduct that is not proven to be sexual in nature. The RCC provides liability for non-sexual conduct in the revised assault statute (RCC § 22E-1201) or offensive physical contact statute (RCC § 22E-1205). This revision improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised definition, and reduces unnecessary overlap with non-sexual assault offenses.

The RCC definition of "sexual contact" makes two possible substantive changes to the current statutory definition of "sexual contact."

First, the revised definition clarifies that the touching can be done "at the direction of a person" with the desire to sexually abuse, etc. The current definition of "sexual contact" requires the touching to be done with an intent to "abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, or arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person."[10] The current definition appears to require that the individual who does the touching—be it the actor, the complainant, or a third party—also have the intent to abuse, etc. This interpretation leads to counterintuitive results and disproportionate penalties for similar conduct[11] and is inconsistent with the legislative history.[12] It is also inconsistent with the part of the current definition that permits an intent to arouse or gratify the sexual desire "of any person." There is no DCCA case law on this issue. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised definition specifies that the actor can himself or herself have the required desire to sexually abuse, etc., if the actor engages in the touching, but it is also sufficient for the complainant or a third party to engage in the touching at the direction of the actor or another person with such a desire.[13] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised definition and removes a possible gap in current law.

[11] For example, an actor that touches the complainant's breast with the intent to abuse the complainant has satisfied the current definition. The actor has also satisfied the current definition if he or she touches the complainant's breast with the intent to sexually gratify a third person that is watching the encounter. However, if the actor makes the complainant touch his or her own breast, it is unlikely that the complainant shares the actor's intent to abuse the complainant or the intent to sexually gratify a third party and there may not be liability under the current definition.

[12] The Anti-Sexual Abuse Act of 1994 was intended to "strengthen the District's laws against sexual abuse and make them more inclusive, flexible and reflective of the broad range of abusive conduct which does in fact occur." Council of the District of Columbia, Report of the Committee on the Judiciary, Bill 10-87, the "Anti-Sexual Abuse Act of 1994 at 1.

[13] For example, an actor that causes the complainant to touch his or her own breast has satisfied part of the current and revised definitions of "sexual contact"—touching the breast of any person (the complainant). However, it is arguable that the required intent of the current definition has not been met. The actor may have the intent to abuse the complainant, but the complainant is the individual doing the actual touching and likely does not share this intent. Under the revised definition, however, there is no ambiguity as to whether the actor's conduct suffices because the complainant has engaged in the required touching "at the direction of" the actor with the desire to sexually abuse the complainant.

Second, the revised definition of "sexual contact" requires penetration with the "desire to" sexually abuse, etc. The current definition of "sexual contact" requires that the defendant act "with an intent" to abuse, etc.[14] The meaning of "intent" in the current statute is undefined and it is unclear as to whether the meaning is more similar to the RCC § 22E-206 definition of "purpose" as "conscious[] desire" or "intent" as "practically certain." Resolving this ambiguity, the revised definition of "sexual contact" requires that the defendant act "with the desire to" sexually abuse, etc. The reference to "desire" tracks the higher culpable mental state in the RCC definition of "purpose." In addition, "intent" is a defined culpable mental state in RCC § 22E-206, and per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, applies to every element that comes after it unless a different culpable mental state or strict liability is specified. If "intent" is included in an RCC offense through the definition of "sexual act" or "sexual contact," that would complicate the interpretation of culpable mental states in that offense. This change improves the clarity of the revised definition.

The commentaries to specific RCC offenses using the revised definition may discuss further the effect of the revised definition on current District law for that specific offense.

[14] D.C. Code § 22-3001(9).

"Significant bodily injury" means a bodily injury that, to prevent long-term physical damage or to abate severe pain, requires hospitalization or immediate medical treatment beyond what a layperson can personally administer, and, in addition, the following injuries constitute at least a significant bodily injury: a fracture of a bone; a laceration that is at least one inch in length and at least one quarter of an inch in depth; a burn of at least second degree severity; a brief loss of consciousness; a traumatic brain injury; and a contusion, petechia, or other bodily injury to the neck or head sustained during strangulation or suffocation.

Explanatory Note. "Significant bodily injury" is the intermediate level of three levels of bodily injury defined in the RCC. The definition incorporates the definition of "bodily injury," also defined in RCC § 22E-701. The injury must require hospitalization or immediate medical treatment beyond what a layperson can personally administer and the hospitalization or immediate medical treatment must be necessary to either prevent long-term physical damage or to abate severe pain. Regardless whether the requirements in the first clause of the definition are proven, the injuries specified in the last clause of the definition constitute at least "significant bodily injury," such as a fracture of a bone or a concussion. The reference to "neck or head" in "contusion, petechia, or other bodily injury to the neck or head sustained during strangulation or suffocation" is intended to include the neck and eyes. There is no requirement that the bodily injury to the head or neck be caused by the strangulation or suffocation. Any contusion, petechia, or other bodily injury to the head or neck that the complainant sustains during the time in which strangulation or suffocation occurs is sufficient.[1]

The RCC definition of "significant bodily injury" replaces the current statutory definition of "significant bodily injury" in D.C. Code § 22-404(b),[2] applicable to the felony assault with significant bodily injury offense, and an undefined reference to "significant bodily injury" in the assault on a police officer[3] statute. The term is also defined in other Title 22 statutes.[4] The RCC definition of "significant bodily injury" is used in the RCC definition of "serious bodily injury"[5] and in the revised offenses of robbery,[6] assault,[7]

[1] For example, if the complainant bumps his or her head in an attempt to get free from the strangulation or suffocation, resulting in a contusion to his or her head, that contusion during strangulation or suffocation is sufficient to establish significant bodily injury.

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "significant bodily injury" makes three clear changes to the statutory definition of "significant bodily injury" in D.C. Code § 22-404(b).[12]

First, the revised definition of "significant bodily injury" requires "immediate medical treatment beyond what a layperson can personally administer." The current definition of "significant bodily injury" merely requires "immediate medical attention"[13] for this prong of the definition. However, District case law has construed medical "attention" in the current statutory definition to mean medical "treatment,"[14] and has held that the treatment must be "to prevent long-term physical damage or to abate severe pain,"[15] and be "beyond what a layperson can personally administer."[16] By codifying these requirements, the revised definition adopts the position of the DCCA that determining (internal quotation marks omitted); In re D.P., 122 A.3d 903, 911 (D.C. 2015) ("As interpreted by this court, immediate medical attention refers to treatment; in other words, the attention required . . . is not satisfied by mere diagnosis." (internal quotation marks omitted).

[15] See, e.g., Belt v. United States, 149 A.3d 1048, 1055 (D.C. 2016) ("In other words, there are two independent bases for a fact finder to conclude that a victim has suffered a significant bodily injury: (1) where the injury requires medical treatment to prevent "long-term physical damage" or "potentially permanent injuries"; or (2) where the injury requires medical treatment to abate the victim's "severe" pain."); Wilson v. United States, 140 A.3d 1212, 1218 (D.C. 2016) ("However bad the injuries, may seem, the government's combined evidence fails to show that immediate medical attention was required to prevent longterm [sic] physical damage and other potentially permanent injuries or abate pain that is severe instead of lesser, short-term hurts." (internal quotation marks omitted).
[16] See, e.g., Quintanilla v. United States, 62 A.3d 1261, 1265 (D.C. 2013) ("And we may infer, accordingly, that everyday remedies such as ice packs, bandages, and self-administered over-the-counter medications, are not sufficiently medical to qualify under the statute, whether administered by a medical professional or with self-help. United States*, 112 A.3d 906, 910 (D.C. 2015) ("The focus here is not, however, whether [the complaining witness] needed to remove the glass to prevent long-term damage, but whether a medical professional was required to remove the glass because [the complaining witness] could not have safely removed it himself—for example, with tweezers or another self-administered remedy.").

whether an injury is sufficient to constitute a "significant bodily injury" is an objective[17] inquiry as to the nature of the injury. Assessment of the nature of the injury can be a difficult factual issue for a jury or fact finder,[18] and in some cases expert medical testimony may be required to prove a significant bodily injury.[19] Whether a person wants to receive medical care[20] and whether medical care occurs[21] are not dispositive as to whether an injury "requires" medical care under either current law or the RCC. This change improves the clarity, completeness, and consistency of the revised definition.

Second, "hospitalization" in the revised definition of "significant bodily injury" must be necessary to "prevent long-term physical damage or to abate severe pain." The current definition of "significant bodily injury" does not have any additional requirements for hospitalization beyond "requires hospitalization."[22] DCCA case law has speculated that the reference to "hospitalization" in the current definition may be intended to cover "latent" injuries that are not immediately apparent.[23] DCCA case law has also said that the requirements for an injury that requires "hospitalization" may be different from an injury that requires "immediate medical attention,"[24] the other prong of the current definition of [24] See, e.g., Quintanilla v. United States, 62 A.3d 1261, 1264 n.17 ("One can conceive of injuries (for example, a head injury that may or may not have resulted in a concussion) where immediate medical 'attention' in the form of monitoring or even testing is required, but where no 'treatment' is ultimately necessary to preserve or improve the victim's health. On the other hand, situations can surely arise when immediate then prolonged monitoring, coupled with testing, will eventuate in treatment. The question as to where the line is drawn between monitoring or testing and treatment in these fluid situations, however, is likely to

"significant bodily injury." This case law suggests that hospitalization for merely diagnostic purposes, and not treatment, may be sufficient to prove a significant bodily injury.[25] However, in each of the DCCA cases where hospitalization for diagnostic testing constituted "significant bodily injury," the complaining witness sustained an injury.[26] Consequently, neither the current definition nor existing case law provides a clear standard to be used to determine when "hospitalization" satisfies the current definition of "significant bodily injury." In contrast, the RCC definition of "significant bodily injury" specifies the standard for an injury that requires hospitalization at any point in time is whether the hospitalization is required to "prevent long-term physical damage or to abate severe pain." This is the same standard the DCCA has applied to injuries requiring "immediate medical attention" in the current definition of "significant bodily injury" and precludes finding a "significant bodily injury" where there is hospitalization for merely diagnostic purposes. This change improves the clarity, completeness, and consistency of the revised definition.

Third, the RCC definition of "significant bodily injury" provides a bright-line list of specific types of injuries that per se (inherently) constitute at least a "significant bodily [26] Blair v. United States, 114 A.3d 960, 980 (D.C. 2015) ("While not every blow to the head in the course of an assault necessarily constitutes significant bodily injury, we conclude that where, as here, the defendant repeatedly struck the victim's head, requiring testing or monitoring to diagnose possible internal head injuries, and also caused injuries all over the victim's body, the assault is sufficiently egregious to constitute significant bodily injury. Because the testimony and photographic evidence in this case showed that appellant 'kept banging [the complainant's] head against the ground' with the result that she felt disoriented; that the hospital emergency room physician ordered a CAT scan and X-ray of her head and neck to determine whether she sustained internal injuries; and that C.H. sustained multiple abrasions and bruising all over her body, including trauma around her eye, we hold that the evidence was sufficient to allow a reasonable jury to conclude beyond a reasonable doubt that [the complainant's] injuries were significant and thus to support appellant's conviction of felony assault.") injury." The current definition of "significant bodily injury" doesn't have such a list and DCCA case law does not provide specific injuries that constitute "significant bodily injury." In contrast, the RCC definition of "significant bodily injury" provides a bright-line list of per se injuries. Whether or not the listed injuries could also meet the standards described in the first clause of the RCC definition of "significant bodily injury" or also provide a basis for liability under the standard for the RCC definition of "serious bodily injury,"[27] proof of the listed injuries suffices to establish at least "significant bodily injury." Specifically listing per se significant injuries clarifies the current state of law, fills possible gaps in District law,[28] and may improve the consistency of adjudication.

The listed injuries in part reflect current District case law, which has generally held that concussions[29] and lacerations requiring stitches[30] are sufficient proof of significant bodily injury. The other injuries listed in the definition may frequently be the subject of criminal prosecutions but their status as significant bodily injuries has not been clearly (or at all) established in District case law. No District case law addresses severity of burns, but second degree burns are typically recognized as requiring medical treatment.[31] Loss of consciousness is currently a part of the statutory definition of "serious bodily injury" for sexual abuse offenses,[32] however DCCA case law has questioned, without resolving, [27] For example, a laceration that is one inch in length and one quarter inch in depth would be a per se significant bodily injury, but may also be a serious bodily injury if it results in protracted and obvious disfigurement.

[28] Current District case law appears to exclude from the definition of significant bodily injury latent injuries that, although requiring medical treatment, do not require admittance to a hospital. Quintanilla v. United States, 62 A.3d 1261, 1264 n.17 (D.C. 2013) ("[T]here is no provision in the statute for latent injuries that do not require hospitalization, even if they do ultimately require medical attention. It follows that, for injuries not requiring immediate medical attention, the injury will not be significant unless it does eventually require hospitalization."); Teneyck v. United States, 112 A.3d 906, 909 n.4 ("'[H]ospitalization' under the statute requires more than being admitted for outpatient care."); However, latent injuries (such as a concussion) that are per se significant bodily injuries listed in the second clause of the RCC definition would be covered, even without proof of admittance to a hospital.

[29] See Brown v. United States, 146 A.3d 110, 114-15 (finding the evidence sufficient for "significant bodily injury" even though the complaining witness did not go to the hospital until five days after the attack when the complaining witness sustained repeated blows to his head and leg and the complaining witness was diagnosed with a concussion).

[30] See, e.g., Rollerson v. United States, 127 A.3d 1220, 1232 (D.C. 2015) (Upholding finding of significant bodily injury based on medical treatment that included nine stiches for "gashes to her face" going down to the "white meat."); In re R.S., 6 A.3d 854, 859 (D.C. 2010)(Upholding finding of significant bodily injury based on medical treatment that included four to six inches); Flores v. United States, 93 A.3d 1237, 1269 n. 39 (D.C. 2014) ("We question whether the government presented evidence that [the complainant] suffered serious bodily injury at all. The government presented evidence that [the complainant] briefly lost consciousness following the attack, that the head injuries he incurred did not cause substantial pain, and that, although he sought medical care, he fully recovered from these injuries without medical intervention. This appears to fall well below the "high threshold of injury" . . . we have set to prove aggravated assault.") (internal citations omitted).

[34] For example, a concussion. See https://www.cdc.gov/headsup/basics/concussion_whatis.html (last visited Dec. 1, 2017).

[35] In one case, the DCCA upheld a conviction for felony assault based on injuries that chiefly, though not solely, consisted of head trauma which was subjected to diagnostic testing but apparently was not specifically diagnosed as a concussion. See Blair v. United States, 114 A.3d 960, 980 (D.C. 2015) ("While not every blow to the head in the course of an assault necessarily constitutes significant bodily injury, we conclude that where, as here, the defendant repeatedly struck the victim's head, requiring testing or monitoring to diagnose possible internal head injuries, and also caused injuries all over the victim's body, the assault is sufficiently egregious to constitute significant bodily injury.") (internal citations omitted). The RCC definition of significant bodily injury calls the Blair ruling into question to the extent that there may not have been sufficient evidence that the injury caused by the defendant was a traumatic brain injury or that the injury otherwise required, to prevent long-term physical damage or to abate severe pain, hospitalization or immediate medical treatment beyond what a layperson can personally administer. The DCCA avoided reliance on the need for a medical diagnosis in a subsequent case involving head trauma. Brown v. United States, 146 A.3d 110, 116 (D.C. 2016) ("At the hospital, [the complaining witness] did not receive mere diagnosis, but was instructed [by the doctor] about what he needed to do to avert worsened or prolonged head pain or other symptoms. Thus [the complaining witness's] injury was one that, to preserve his well-being, necessitated that he be taken to the hospital shortly after the injury was inflicted."). To the extent the Brown court relied upon the doctor's diagnosis of a traumatic brain injury of the need for medical advice to avoid longer term damage, the decision is consistent with the RCC definition of "significant bodily injury."

seriousness of such injuries, particularly in light of research indicating such injuries are often linked to more serious patterns of violence.[36]

In addition to the above-discussed clear substantive changes to the current statutory definition of "significant bodily injury" in D.C. Code § 22-404(b),[37] the revised definition makes one possible substantive change. The revised definition of "significant bodily injury" requires that the injury be a "bodily injury," defined in RCC § 22E-701 as "physical pain, physical injury, illness, or any impairment of physical condition." The current definition of "significant bodily injury" requires an "injury." There is no DCCA case law interpreting "injury" in the current definition. The RCC definition incorporates the defined term of "bodily injury" into the revised definition to clarify that a "significant bodily injury" always constitutes a bodily injury."

As applied to certain RCC offenses against persons, the revised definition of "significant bodily injury" may change current District law. For example, the RCC offenses for criminal abuse and criminal neglect of minors, vulnerable adults, and elderly persons prohibit either recklessly causing significant bodily injury to the complainant[38] or recklessly creating, or failing to mitigate or remedy, a substantial risk that the complainant would experience significant bodily injury.[39] However, the current equivalent offenses in Title 22 either do not include such harm or risk of harm, or it is unclear whether the equivalent offenses in Title 22 do. For example, the current first degree child cruelty statute prohibits, in part, "tortures,"[40] "beats,"[41] and "maltreats,"[42] and second degree child cruelty prohibits, in part, "maltreats."[43] The current statute does not define these terms and there is no DCCA case law determining the required amount of physical harm.[44] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute specifies the minimal degree of physical harm required for each grade of the offense, including a gradation for "significant bodily injury." Similarly, the current abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute grades, in part, based on whether "serious bodily injury"[45] or "permanent bodily harm"[46] resulted. The statute does not define any of these terms and there is no DCCA case law interpreting "serious bodily injury" or "permanent bodily harm" for this offense. The RCC offense codifies a gradation for causing "significant bodily injury," improving the clarity and completeness of the offense.

The commentaries to relevant RCC offenses against persons discuss in detail the effect of the RCC definition of "significant bodily injury" on current District law.

"Significant emotional distress" means substantial, ongoing mental suffering that may require medical or other professional treatment or counseling, and must rise significantly above the level of uneasiness, nervousness, unhappiness, or similar feeling, that is commonly experienced in day to day living.

Explanatory Note. The RCC defines "significant emotional distress" to mean substantial, ongoing mental suffering. Significant emotional distress does not include suffering minor inconveniences. The word "ongoing" makes clear that significant emotional distress must be continuous or continual in nature. Significant emotional distress is trepidation that outlasts the interaction. The degree of mental anguish must be something markedly greater than the level of uneasiness, nervousness, unhappiness or the like which commonly experienced in day to day living, reaching a level that would possibly lead to seeking professional treatment.[1] The RCC definition of "significant emotional distress" replaces the definition of "emotional distress" in D.C. Code § 22-3132(4).[2] The RCC definition of "significant emotional distress" is used in the revised offenses of stalking[3] and electronic stalking.[4]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "significant emotional distress" clarifies, but does not substantively change, District law. The current statute uses the phrases "emotional distress" and "seriously alarmed, disturbed, or frightened" but does not define them. Case law has explained that both phrases should be understood as mental harms that rise significantly above that which is commonly experienced in day to day living.[5] Emotional distress is "high," "markedly greater than the level of uneasiness, nervousness, unhappiness or the like," and "reaching a level that would possibly lead to seeking professional treatment."[6] The revised code adds a definition of "significant emotional distress" to more clearly state this case law. This change applies consistent, clearly articulated definitions and improves the clarity of the revised offenses.

"Simulated" means feigned or pretended in a way that realistically duplicates the appearance of actual conduct.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "simulated" applies to specific types of sexual conduct in the RCC obscenity offenses such as a simulated "sexual act" or "simulated" masturbation. In this context, the definition of "simulated" is intended to include highly explicit depictions where it is unclear due to lighting, etc., if the prohibited conduct is actually occurring,[1] not other portrayals that are clearly staged. The definition excludes highly suggestive sex scenes like one would find in a movie. This definition is similar to another jurisdiction's definition[2] and is supported by Supreme Court case law.[3]

The RCC definition of "simulated" is new; the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code (although undefined references to "simulated" are in some current Title 22 offenses[4]). The RCC definition of "simulated" is used in the revised offenses of distribution of an obscene image,[5] distribution of an obscene image to a minor,[6] creating or trafficking an obscene image of a minor,[7] possession of an obscene image of a minor,[8] arranging a live sexual performance of a minor,[9] and attending or viewing a live sexual performance of a minor.[10]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "simulated" is new and does not itself substantively change current District law.

[1] For example, a simulated sexual act may clearly show male genitalia, female genitalia, and movement between two actors but, due to the angle of the camera, not show whether there was penetration.

[3] In United States v. Williams, the Supreme Court stated that a federal statute that prohibited pandering or soliciting "an obscene visual depiction of a minor engaging in sexually explicit conduct" or "a visual depiction of an actual minor engaging in sexually explicit conduct," "precisely tracks the material held constitutionally proscribable in Ferber and Miller: obscene material depicting (actual or virtual) children engaged in sexually explicit conduct, and any other material depicting actual children engaged in sexually explicit conduct." United States v. Williams, 553 U.S. 285, 294 (2008). In dicta, the Court discussed the scope of "simulated sexual intercourse" in the statute's definition of "sexually explicit conduct":

> 'Sexually explicit conduct' connotes actual depiction of the sex act rather than merely the suggestion that it is occurring. And 'simulated' sexual intercourse is not sexual intercourse that is merely suggested, but rather sexual intercourse that is explicitly portrayed, even though (through camera tricks or otherwise) it may not actually have occurred. The portrayal must cause a reasonable viewer to believe that the actors actually engaged in that conduct on camera. Critically . . . [the statute's] requirement of a 'visual depiction of an actual minor' makes clear that, although the sexual intercourse may be simulated, it must involve actual children (unless it is obscene). This . . . eliminates any possibility that virtual child pornography or sex between youthful-looking adult actors might be covered by the term "simulated sexual intercourse. Williams, 553 U.S. at 296–97.

The commentaries to specific RCC offenses using the revised definition may discuss further the effect of the revised definition on current District law for that specific offense.

"Sound recording" means a material object in which sounds, other than those accompanying a motion picture or other audiovisual recording, are fixed by any method now existing or later developed, from which the sounds can be perceived, reproduced, or otherwise communicated, either directly or with the aid of a machine or device.

Explanatory Note. "Sound recordings" is currently defined in D.C. Code § 22-3214.01(a)(3)[1] for the current deceptive labeling statute. The RCC definition of "sound recording" replaces the current definition of "sound recordings" in D.C. Code § 22-3214.01(a)(3) and the definition of "phonorecords" in the current commercial piracy statute.[2] The RCC definition of "sound recording" is used in the revised offenses of unlawful creation or possession of a recording[3] and unlawful labeling of a recording,[4] as well as in the revised identity theft civil provisions.[5]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "sound recording" is substantively identical to the definition of "sound recording"[6] in the current deceptive labeling statute.

Code § 22-3214.01(a)(3) ("'Sound recordings' means material objects in which sounds, other than those accompanying a motion picture or other audiovisual work, are fixed by any method now known or later developed, and from which the sounds can be perceived, reproduced, or otherwise communicated, either directly or with the aid of a machine or device.").

[2] D.C. Code § 22-3214(a)(3) ("'Phonorecords means material objects in which sounds, other than those accompanying a motion picture or other audiovisual work, are fixed by any method now known or later developed, and from which the sounds can be perceived, reproduced, or otherwise communicated, either directly or with the aid of a machine or device. The term "phonorecords" includes the material object in which the sounds are first fixed.

"Speech" means oral or written language, symbols, or gestures.

Explanatory Note. Oral language means spoken words or sounds. Written language means inscribed words or letters. Symbols include images, icons, and props. Gestures means physical movements that communicate an idea. "Speech" is narrower than "communication."

The RCC definition of "speech" is new; the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code (although similar language is used in the current disorderly conduct statute[1]). The RCC definition of "speech" is used in the revised defense for defense of self or another person[2] and in the revised offense of disorderly conduct.[3]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "speech" is new and does not substantively change District law.

The current disorderly conduct statute does not use the word "speech," but does distinguish between "language," "gestures," and "conduct." Case law has not addressed the meanings of these terms. The revised code adds a definition of "speech" to be used universally throughout the RCC. This change applies consistent, clearly articulated definitions and improves the clarity of the revised offenses.

"Strangulation or suffocation" means a restriction of normal breathing or circulation of the blood by applying pressure on the throat or neck or by blocking the nose or mouth.

Explanatory Note. "Strangulation or suffocation" is not statutorily defined in Title 22 of the current D.C. Code. The RCC definition is used in the RCC definition of "significant bodily injury."[1]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "strangulation or suffocation" is new to District law.

"Strict liability" or "strictly liable" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-205.

Explanatory Note. The definition of "strict liability" is addressed in the Commentary accompanying RCC § 22E-205. The RCC definition of "strict liability" or "strictly liable" is used in the revised provision for rules of interpretation applicable to culpable mental states.[1]

"Stun gun" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 7-2501.01.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "stun gun" is new; the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code. The RCC definition of "stun gun" is used in the revised definition of "dangerous weapon"[1] and in the revised offense of possession of a stun gun.[2]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "stun gun" is new and does not itself substantively change existing District law.

"Transportation worker" means:

(A) A person who is licensed to operate, and is operating, a publicly or privately owned or operated commercial vehicle for the carriage of 6 or more passengers, including any Metrobus, Metrorail, Metroaccess, or DC Circulator vehicle or other bus, trolley, or van operating within the District of Columbia;

(B) Any Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority employee who is assigned to supervise a Metrorail station from a kiosk at that station within the District of Columbia; and

(C) A person who is licensed to operate, and is operating, a taxicab within the District of Columbia; and

(D) A person who is licensed to operate, and is operating within the District of Columbia, a personal motor vehicle to provide private vehicle-for-hire service in contract with a private vehicle-for-hire company as defined in D.C. Code § 50-301.03(16B).

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "transportation worker" is new, the term is not currently defined in Title 22 of the D.C. Code (although there is a penalty enhancement[1] with similarly defined terms for certain crimes committed against a "Metrorail station manager" or a "transit operator," as well as a penalty enhancement[2] for certain crimes committed against a taxicab driver. The RCC definition of "transportation worker" replaces the penalty enhancement and defined terms[3] for certain crimes committed against a "Metrorail station manager" or a "transit operator," as well as the penalty enhancement[4] for certain crimes committed against a taxicab driver. The RCC definition of "transportation worker" is used in the RCC definition of a "protected person"[5] and in the revised offense of criminal restraint.[6]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "transportation worker" makes one clear chang to the statutory language of the defined terms[7] in the current penalty enhancement for certain crimes committed against a "Metrorail station manager" or a "transit operator," as well as the penalty enhancement[8] for certain crimes committed against a taxicab driver.

First, subparagraph (D) of the definition of "transportation worker" codifies the requirements for a private vehicle-for-hire operator in contract with a private vehicle-for-hire company, as defined by D.C. Code § 50-301.03(16B).[9] The current penalty enhancement for certain crimes committed against a "Metrorail station manager" or a "transit operator," as well as the penalty enhancement[10] for certain crimes committed against a taxicab driver, do not include drivers of private vehicle-for-hire. Including this category of complainant in the RCC definition of "transportation worker" fills a gap in current District law, particularly given the ubiquity of private vehicle-for-hire services.

Finally, the RCC definition of "transportation worker" makes two clarificatory changes to the current definition that do not substantively change District law.

First, subparagraph (B) of the RCC definition of "transportation worker" is substantively identical to the definition of a "Metrorail station manager"[11] in the current penalty enhancement[12] for crimes committed against this category of complainant. However, subparagraph (B) does not require, as does current D.C. Code § 22-3751.01, that the Metrorail station manager be "on duty." Instead the definition of "protected person" in RCC § 22E-701 includes a transportation worker "in the course of official duties." This is a clarificatory change that is consistent with other categories of complainants in the RCC definition of "protected person" that require the complainant to be "in the course of official duties."

Second, subparagraph (A) of the RCC definition of "transportation worker" is substantively identical to the definitions of "mass transit vehicle"[13] and "transit operator"[14] in the current penalty enhancement[15] for these complainants and subparagraph (C) is Code § 22-3751.01 (b)(2) (defining "Metrorail station manager" as "any Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority employee who is assigned to supervise a Metrorail station from a kiosk at that station," and "transit operator" as a person who is licensed to operate a mass transit vehicle.").

substantively identical to the penalty enhancement[16] for crimes committed against a taxicab driver.[17] However, unlike the current penalty enhancements, subparagraph (A) does not require that the transit operator be "authorized" to operate the mass transit vehicle "at the time of the offense," and subparagraph (C) does not require that the taxicab driver be licensed and operating a taxicab "at the time of the offense." Instead, the definition of "protected person" in RCC § 22E-701 includes a transportation worker "in the course of his or her official duties" and the protected person gradations are codified directly into RCC offenses against persons. These are clarificatory changes that are consistent with other categories of complainants in the RCC definition of "protected person" that require the complainant to be "in the course of official duties."

As applied to certain RCC offenses against persons, the RCC definition of "transportation worker" may substantively change current District law. For example, the RCC's robbery and assault statutes provide more severe penalties for harms inflicted on protected persons, including transportation workers. While a penalty enhancement for robbery and assault already applies under current District law to commercial vehicle operators,[18] specified WMATA employees,[19] and taxicab drivers,[20] such penalty enhancements do not apply to private vehicle-for-hire operators. Consequently, subparagraph (D) effectively changes District law as applied to the RCC robbery and assault statutes, through their reference to "protected persons" and "transportation workers." Inclusion of these drivers in the same category as other transportation workers improves the proportionality of the revised offenses against persons and removes a gap in current District law. The commentaries to relevant RCC offenses against persons discuss in detail the effect of the RCC definition of "transportation worker" on current District law.

"Undue influence" means mental, emotional, or physical coercion that overcomes the free will or judgment of a person and causes the person to act in a manner that is inconsistent with the person's financial, emotional, mental, or physical well-being.

Explanatory Note. This term specifies certain wrongful coercive means of overcoming the free will of a person. "Undue influence" must cause the person to act in a manner inconsistent with his or her financial, emotional, mental, or physical well-being. The RCC definition of "undue influence" is used in the revised offenses of incest[1] and financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult or elderly person.[2]

Relation to Current District Law. This definition changes current District law by not requiring that the other person is a vulnerable adult or elderly person. Under this change, a person can use undue influence against any other person, regardless of age or vulnerable status.[3] The definition of "undue influence" is otherwise taken verbatim from D.C. Code § 22-933.01, and is intended to have the same meaning as under current law.

As applied to the RCC incest statute (RCC § 22E-1308), the revised definition of "undue influence" changes current District law, which is discussed further in the commentary to the RCC incest offense.

[3] Although the term "undue influence" does not require that the other person is an elderly person or vulnerable adult, specific offenses may separately require that the complainant is an elderly person or vulnerable adult.

"Value" means:

(A) The fair market value of property at the time and place of the offense; or

(B) If the fair market value cannot be ascertained:

(i) For property other than a written instrument, the cost to replace the property within a reasonable time after the offense;

(ii) For a written instrument constituting evidence of debt, such as a check, draft, or promissory note, the amount due or collectible thereon, that figure ordinarily being the face amount of the indebtedness less any portion that has been satisfied; and

(iii) For any other written instrument that creates, releases, discharges, or otherwise affects any valuable legal right, privilege, or obligation, the greatest amount of economic loss that the owner of the instrument might reasonably suffer by virtue of the loss of the written instrument.

(C) Notwithstanding subparagraphs (A) and (B) of this paragraph, the value of a payment card alone is $10.00 and the value of an unendorsed check alone is $10.00.

Explanatory Note. Subparagraph (A) of the RCC definition of "value" states that the "value" of property is its "fair market value," a defined term per RCC § 22E-701 that means the price which a purchaser who is willing but not obligated to buy would pay an owner who is willing but not obligated to sell, considering all the uses to which the property is adapted and might reasonably be applied. Moreover, the "value" is based on the fair market value at the time and place of the offense.

Subparagraph (B) provides alternative methods of determining "value" for written instruments and other property when the fair market value cannot be ascertained. These are rare situations when there is no evidence as to fair market value.[1]

[1] See State v. Ohms, 309 Mont. 263, 267 (2002) (interpreting the definition of "value," which required that replacement value be considered only when the market value "cannot be satisfactorily ascertained," as meaning "if the State is unable to present evidence of the stolen item's market value, it must establish that the market value of the stolen item cannot be ascertained before it resorts to the alternative of establishing value by proof of replacement value alone."); State v. Foster, 762 S.W.2d 51, 53 (Mo. Ct. App. 1988) (stating that "cost of replacement was not an authorized manner of proof" because "the state offered no evidence of the value of the items taken at the time and place of the crime" and "there is no basis for finding that the items could not have been appraised, or that evidence of their value at the time of the crime could not be satisfactorily ascertained" when the definition of "value" was "the market value of the property at the time and place of the crime, or if such cannot be satisfactorily ascertained, the cost of replacement of the property within a reasonable time after the crime."); Washington v. State, 2013 Ark. App. 148, 3 (not reported in S.W.3d) ("Replacement value equals 'value' under the theft-of-property statute only if the market value cannot be ascertained. . . . [h]ere, there was evidence of market value…").

Sub-subparagraph (B)(i) specifies that, for property other than written instruments, a defined term per RCC § 22E-701, when fair market value cannot be ascertained, "value" is the cost to replace the property within a reasonable time after the offense.[2]

Sub-subparagraphs (B)(ii) and (B)(iii) clarify the methods of valuation for written instruments, a defined term in RCC 22E-701, when fair market value cannot be ascertained.[3] Sub-subparagraph (B)(ii) applies to written instruments that are "evidence of debt," such as checks, a defined term in RCC § 22E-701, drafts, or promissory notes. The "value" of such a written instrument is the amount due or collectible thereon, that figure ordinarily being the face amount of the indebtedness less any portion that has been satisfied.[4] Sub-subparagraph (B)(iii) applies to written instruments other than evidence of debt "that create[s], release[s], discharge[s], or otherwise affect[s] any other valuable legal right, privilege, or obligation."[5] The "value" of such written instruments is "the greatest amount of economic loss which the owner of the instrument might reasonably suffer by virtue of the loss of the written instrument." "Owner" is a defined term per RCC § 22E-701 meaning a person holding an interest in property with which the actor is not privileged to interfere without consent.

[2] The facts of State v. Ohms, 309 Mont. 263 (2002) provide an example. The property at issue was a stolen masonry saw and the felony threshold for value was $1,000. Ohms, 309 Mont. at 264. At trial, the owner testified that he had purchased the used saw approximately nine years earlier for $400. Id. at 266. He also testified that after the purchase he had the motor rebuilt for $600. Id. An expert testified that an entirely new unit would be priced at $3,924. The definition of "value" in Montana allows evidence of replacement value only if market value "cannot be satisfactorily ascertained." Id. The court held that the state could not use replacement value because the state did not first establish that the market value of the property could not be ascertained. Id. at 267.
Washington v. State, 2013 Ark. App. 148, 3 (not reported in S.W.3d) ("Replacement value equals 'value' under the theft-of-property statute only if the market value cannot be ascertained… [h]ere, there was evidence of market value . . . .").

[3] Examples of written instruments whose fair market value can be reasonably ascertained include some public and corporate bonds and securities.

[4] For example, if a check is made out to an individual in the amount of $1,000 the value of that check normally is $1,000, the face amount of indebtedness. However, in one jurisdiction, the court used such an "ordinarily" caveat in a similar definition of "value" to determine that the value of a forged check was not the face amount of indebtedness. See State v. Skorpen, 57 Wash.App. 144, 149 (1990) ("The State argues that the value of the check 'shall be deemed the amount due or collectible thereon or thereby, that figure ordinarily being the face amount . . .' . In order to avoid rendering part of this phrase superfluous, it must be construed so as to recognize the possibility of situations in which the amount due or collectible on a written instrument is not its face amount.").

[5] For example, relying on such language, a case in New York held that two automobile registrations were "of value" because, in part, "the complainant herein has had his privilege to drive his vehicle suspended by the theft of its registration certificates. These certificates give rise at least to prosecution for theft of the piece of paper upon which proof of compliance with New York vehicle laws is indicated."). People v. Saunders, 82 Misc. 2d 542, 371 N.Y.S.2d 352 (Crim. Ct. 1975).

Subparagraph (C) provides that, notwithstanding subparagraphs (A) and (B), the "value" of a "payment card" alone is $10.00 and the "value" of a check that has not been endorsed, i.e. a blank check unsigned on the front by the drawer, alone is $10.00. "Payment card" and "check" are defined terms in RCC § 22E-701. These fixed valuations only apply to the payment cards and blank checks themselves, not the actor's use, if any, of the payment cards or checks to obtain or attempt to obtain property.[6]

"Value" is currently defined in D.C. Code § 22-3001(7),[7] applicable to provisions in Chapter 32, Theft, Fraud, Stolen Property, Forgery, and Extortion offenses and provisions. The RCC definition of "value" is used in five revised definitions[8] and thirteen revised offenses,[9] as well as in the revised aggregation to determine property offense grades provision.[10]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "value" makes one clear change to the statutory definition of "value" in in D.C. Code § 22-3001(7).[11]

The RCC definition of "value" provides a set value for a payment card of $1.00 and an unendorsed check at $1.00, per subparagraph (C). Under the current D.C. Code definition of "value," the "value" of a payment card or check is the amount of property "that has been or can be obtained through its use, or the amount promised or paid by the [6] For example, theft of a purse containing three payment cards and a checkbook containing 25 unendorsed checks yields a set valuation of $28.00 that can be used for determining the gradation of theft of the purse—without requiring proof of available credit for each card or amount of funds available for the check at the time of the offense. However, if the defendant should then use a stolen payment card or check to obtain cash, goods, or property, the defendant may have additional liability for payment card fraud (RCC § 22E-2202) or check fraud (RCC § 22E-2203). If the defendant tries to, but does not actually obtain the property, there may be liability for attempted payment card fraud or check fraud under the RCC general attempt provision (RCC § 22E-301).

[7] D.C. Code § 22-3201(7) ("'Value' with respect to a credit card, check, or other written instrument means the amount of money, credit, debt, or other tangible or intangible property or services that has been or can be obtained through its use, or the amount promised or paid by the credit card, check, or other written instrument.").

[8] "Commercial sex act" (RCC § 22E-701); "debt bondage" (RCC § 22E-701); "deprive" (RCC § 22E-701); "labor" (RCC § 22E-701); "property" (RCC § 22E-701).

[9] Robbery (RCC § 22E-1201); Theft (RCC § 22E-2101); Fraud (RCC § 22E-2201); Payment card fraud (RCC § 22E-2202); Forgery (RCC § 22E-2204); Identity theft (RCC § 22E-2205); Financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult or elderly person (RCC § 22E-2208); Trademark counterfeiting (RCC § 22E-2210); Extortion (RCC § 22E-2301); Possession of stolen property (RCC § 22E-2401); Trafficking of stolen property (RCC § 22E-2402); Alteration of a motor vehicle identification number (RCC § 22E-2403); Trafficking of a controlled substance (RCC § 48-904.01b).

[11] D.C. Code § 22-3201(7).

credit card [or] check."[12] There is no case law on the meaning of this phrase.[13] In contrast, the RCC definition of "value" provides a nominal set value for a payment card or an unendorsed check. A fixed amount provides a fairer and more efficient means of calculating the value of an unused payment card or blank check. The revised definition dispenses with proof of the amount of credit or funds available to a given card or bank account at the time of the property crime. Doing so also avoids disparate valuation of the value of credit cards and checks based on the owner's available credit or size of the owner's bank account.[14] The provision instead strikes a balance between the greater, but unrealized, harm that the owner of the card or check could suffer if the stolen card or check was used, with the relatively minor, actual, inconvenience to the owner of losing the card or check. It also punishes more harshly a defendant who takes multiple cards or checks, as opposed to a defendant that takes only one card or check. This change improves the proportionality of the revised definition.

The RCC definition of "value" is generally consistent with the limited District case law interpreting the term "value" outside of the statutory definition in § 22-3001(7). Subparagraph (A) of the revised definition provides that, generally, the fair market value of property shall determine its "value." This codifies District case law for theft and theft-related offenses that establishes that "value" means "fair market value,"[15] as well as District case law recognizing that "fair market value" must be determined at the time[16] and place[17]

[12] D.C. Code 22-3201(7) ("'Value' with respect to a credit card, check, or other written instrument means the amount of money, credit, debt, or other tangible or intangible property or services that has been or can be obtained through its use, or the amount promised or paid by the credit card, check, or other written instrument.").

[13] There is limited case law on the value of a credit card under the District's pre-1982 Theft Act laws. In In re V.L.M., a receiving stolen property case, the DCCA stated that a "currently usable credit card, was of obvious monetary value to its owner, and indeed, to anyone else who might attempt to use it to obtain gasoline on credit." In re V.L.M., 340 A.2d 818, 820 (D.C. 1975). Beyond this statement, there is no indication in In re V.L.M. how the DCCA valued the credit card. The trial court found that the credit card had no value in excess of $100, but the trial court's reasoning, and whether the DCCA approved of this method of valuation, is unclear. To the extent that In re V.L.M. supports a method of valuation for credit cards different from the standard in the revised definition of "value," the revised definition of "value" is a change in law.

[14] For example, theft of a purse with two payment cards connected to accounts of $300 each would, if aggregated, provide a basis for theft of $600 under current law—graded as fourth degree theft in the RCC or a 180 day misdemeanor under current law. A purse with the same number of cards but with credit limits of $15,000 each would, if aggregated, provide a basis for theft of $30,000—graded as third degree theft in the RCC or a 10 year felony under current law.

[15] See, e.g., Foreman v. United States, 988 A.2d 505, 507 (D.C. 2010);

[16] See, e.g., Jeffcoat v. United States, 551 A.2d 1301, 1303 (D.C. 1988) ("The value of property is determined at the time the crime through which it is acquired occurs.");.

[17] See Long v. United States, 156 A.3d 698 (D.C. 2017) (stating in a receiving stolen property case that "[p]roperty value . . . is its market value at the time and place stolen, if

of the offense. In addition, this part of the revised definition of "value" reflects current District practice.[18] Subparagraph (B) of the revised definition provides a number of alternate means of determining the value of written instruments and other property in the rare case when fair market value cannot be ascertained. The limited DCCA case law on "value" does not provide a clear rule for instances when fair market value cannot be ascertained, although several cases refer generally to the "value" of an object as its "useful, functional purpose."[19] The provisions in subparagraph (B) appear to be consistent with the application of this "useful, functional purpose" standard, and are not intended to change the application of such a flexible standard for establishing whether an item has some minimal value. The revised definition of "value" fills a gap in the existing statutory definition about valuation when fair market value cannot be readily ascertained.

It should be noted that the revised definition of "value" does not affect long-standing District case law on the evidentiary requirements for proving "value." Some of this case law predates the Theft and White Collar Crimes Act of 1982, which significantly revised the District's theft and theft-related offenses.[20] To the extent that this case law is still good law, the revised definition of "value" does not change it—except as to payment cards and unendorsed checks. Nor does the revised definition of "value" change any first United States, 374 A.2d 581, 586 n.9 (D.C. 1977))). Note, however, that several cases referring to the "useful functional purpose" standard of value appear to be primarily concerned with establishing that the object has some minimal value for a lowest grade of liability. See, e.g., Jenkins v. United States, 374 A.2d 581, 586 n. 9 (D.C.1977) (broken window has some value); Paige v. United States, 183 A.2d 759 (D.C.Mun.App.1962) (vent fastener for auto window had some value); Wills v. United States, 147 A.3d 761, 775 n. 12 (D.C. 2016) (keys had some value). The revised definition of value in RCC 22E-2001 does not affect such cases' determination that the objects at issue had some value.

"Vehicle identification number" means a number or symbol that is originally inscribed or affixed by the manufacturer to a motor vehicle or motor vehicle part for identification.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "vehicle identification number" is taken verbatim from the current altering or removing motor vehicle identification numbers statute in D.C. Code § 22-3233(c)(1),[1] and is intended to have the same meaning as under current law. The RCC definition of "vehicle identification number" replaces the definition of "identification number" in D.C. Code § 22-3233(c)(1). The RCC definition of "vehicle identification number" is used in the revised offense of alteration of a motor vehicle identification number.[2]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "vehicle identification number" does not change current District law.

"Vulnerable adult" means a person who is 18 years of age or older and has one or more physical or mental limitations that substantially impairs the person's ability to independently provide for their daily needs or safeguard their person, property, or legal interests.

Explanatory Note. The RCC definition of "vulnerable adult" specifies the requirements for proving a person is a "vulnerable adult" in the revised offenses against persons. Under this definition, the mental or physical limitation must substantially impair that person's ability to independently provide for his or her daily needs or safeguard his or her person, property, or legal interests. Minor impairments, e.g. imperfect vision that can be remedied with prescription glasses, will not suffice.

The term "vulnerable adult" is currently statutorily defined in D.C. Code § 22-932(5)[1] for offenses and provisions concerning abuse and neglect of vulnerable adults. The RCC definition of "vulnerable adult" is used in the revised definition of "protected person,"[2] in the revised offenses of sexual assault,[3] criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person,[4] criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person,[5] and financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult or elderly person,[6] and in the revised financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult or elderly person civil provisions.[7]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC definition of "vulnerable adult" is identical to the current definition of "vulnerable adult" in D.C. Code § 22-932.

The RCC "vulnerable adult" definition does not itself change current District law, but may result in changes of law as applied to particular offenses. For example, the RCC robbery and assault gradations are based in part on whether the victim was a "protected person,"[8] and a "vulnerable adult" is defined as one kind of "protected person."[9] Consequently, the RCC provides enhanced penalties for assaults and robberies of vulnerable adults whereas, under current law, committing robbery or assault against a vulnerable adult does not change the grade of either offense, or otherwise authorize more severe penalties. Inclusion of vulnerable adults in the same category as seniors, minors, and others improves the proportionality of the revised offenses against persons and removes a gap in current District law.

(E) Commercial paper or document, or any other commercial instrument containing written or printed matter or the equivalent; or

(F) Other instrument commonly called a security or so defined by an Act of Congress or a provision of the District of Columbia Official Code.

Explanatory Note. "Written instrument" is currently defined in D.C. Code § 22-3241(a)(3)[1] for the forgery offense. The RCC definition of "written instrument" replaces the current definition of "written instrument" in D.C. Code § 22-3241(a)(3). The RCC definition is used in the revised definitions of "check"[2] and "value,"[3] as well as in the revised offense of forgery.[4]

Relation to Current District Law. The revised definition of "written instrument" is consistent with current District law. The revised definition differs slightly by explicitly including "a will, contract, deed, or any other document purporting to have legal or evidentiary significance." However, including these documents in the definition of "written instrument" does not change current law, as the list of documents in the definition of "written instrument" in the current D.C. Code is also non-exhaustive.

COMMENTARY:
SUBTITLE II. OFFENSES AGAINST PERSONS

RCC § 22E-1101. Murder.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the first degree and second degree murder offenses for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The revised first degree murder offense criminalizes purposely, with premeditation and deliberation, causing the death of another person. The RCC's murder statute replaces the current first degree and second degree murder statutes,[1] the special form of first degree murder by obstruction of a railroad, D.C. Code § 22-2102, and the special form of first degree murder of a law enforcement officer, D.C. Code § 22-2106. The revised first degree murder statute also replaces penalty provisions and penalty enhancements authorized under §§ 21-2104, 22-2104.01 and 24-403.01(b-2). An actor who knowingly causes the death of another under aggravating circumstances is subject to the enhanced penalty provision under subsection (c). In addition, insofar as they are applicable to current first degree murder offense, the revised first degree murder statute also partly replaces the protection of District public officials statute[2] and six penalty enhancements: the enhancement for committing an offense while armed;[3] the enhancement for senior citizens;[4] the enhancement for citizen patrols;[5] the enhancement for minors;[6] the enhancement for taxicab drivers;[7] and the enhancement for transit operators and Metrorail station managers.[8]

The revised second degree murder offense specifically criminalizes three forms of murder: 1) knowingly causing the death of another person; 2) recklessly, under circumstances manifesting extreme indifference to human life, causing the death of another person (commonly known as "depraved heart murder"), or 3) negligently causing the death of another person in the course of, and in furtherance of, certain[9] serious crimes (commonly known as "felony murder"). The RCC's second degree murder statute replaces several types of murder criminalized under the current first degree and second degree murder statutes.[10] In addition, the revised second degree murder statute replaces penalties authorized under §§ 22-2104.01 and 24-403.01(b-2). An actor who commits second degree murder under aggravating circumstances is subject to the enhanced penalty provision under subsection (c). In addition, insofar as they are applicable to the current second degree murder statute, the revised second degree murder statute also partly replaces the protection of District public officials statute[11] and six penalty enhancements: the enhancement for committing an offense while armed;[12] the enhancement for senior citizens;[13] the enhancement for citizen patrols;[14] the enhancement for minors;[15] the enhancement for taxicab drivers;[16] and the enhancement for transit operators and Metrorail station managers.[17]

[1] D.C. Code § 22-2101, 2103. Under current law, first degree murder criminalizes three types of murder: (1) purposely causing the death of another with premeditation and deliberation; (2) purposely causing the death of another while committing or attempting to commit any felony; or (3) causing the death of another, with or without purpose, while committing or attempting to commit first degree sexual abuse, first degree child sexual abuse, first degree cruelty to children, mayhem, robbery, kidnaping, burglary while armed with or using a dangerous weapon, or any felony involving a controlled substance. Currently, second degree murder criminalizes three different versions of murder: (1) knowingly causing the death of another without premeditation and deliberation; (2) causing the death of another with intent to cause serious bodily injury; and (3) causing the death of another with extreme recklessness, also known as acting with a "depraved heart." The RCC first degree murder offense replaces: purposely causing the death of another with premeditation and deliberation form of murder.

This re-organization of murder offenses clarifies and improves the consistency and penalty proportionality of the revised offenses.

Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that an actor commits first degree murder if he or she purposely, with premeditation and deliberation, causes the death of another person. The paragraph specifies that a "purposely" culpable mental state applies, which requires that the actor consciously desired to cause the death of another person. The means of causing death, whether by obstruction of a railway[18] or otherwise, are irrelevant. In addition, paragraph (a)(1) requires that the person acted with premeditation and deliberation, terminology that is incorporated in the revised offense and is defined by current D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) case law. Premeditation requires "giv[ing] thought before acting to the idea of taking a human life and [reaching] a definite decision to kill[.]"[19] Such premeditation "may be instantaneous, as quick as thought itself"[20] and only requires that the accused formed the intent prior to committing the act. Deliberation requires that

[10] Under current law, first degree murder criminalizes three types of murder: (1) causing the death of another with premeditation and deliberation; (2) purposely causing the death of another while committing or attempting to commit any felony; or (3) causing the death of another, with or without purpose, while committing or attempting to commit one of eight specified felonies. Currently, second degree murder criminalizes three different versions of murder: (1) knowingly causing the death of another without premeditation and deliberation; (2) causing the death of another with intent to cause serious bodily injury; and (3) causing the death of another with extreme recklessness, also known as acting with a "depraved heart." The RCC second degree murder statute replaces: (1) causing the death of another, with or without purpose, while committing or attempting to commit a specified felony; (2) causing the death of another with intent to cause serious bodily injury; and (3) causing the death of another with extreme recklessness, also known as acting with a "depraved heart."

the accused acted with "consideration and reflection upon the preconceived design to kill, turning it over in the mind, giving it a second thought."[21]

Subsection (b) specifies three forms of second degree murder. Paragraph (b)(1) specifies that an actor commits second degree murder if the actor knowingly causes the death of another person. Paragraph (b)(1) specifies that the culpable mental state "knowingly" applies, a term defined at RCC § 22E-206 to mean that the actor must have been aware or believed to a practical certainty that he or she would cause the death of another person.

Paragraph (b)(2) specifies that an actor commits second degree murder if the actor recklessly, with extreme indifference to human life, causes the death of another person. This paragraph requires a "reckless" culpable mental state, a term defined at RCC § 22E-206, which here means that the actor consciously disregarded a substantial risk of causing death of another, and the risk is of such a nature and degree that, considering the nature of and motivation for the actor's conduct and the circumstances the actor is aware of, its disregard is a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct. However, recklessness alone is insufficient. The actor must also act "with extreme indifference to human life." This language is intended to codify current DCCA case law defining what is commonly known as "depraved heart murder."[22] In contrast to the "substantial" risks required for ordinary recklessness, depraved heart murder requires that the actor consciously disregarded an "extreme risk of causing death or serious bodily injury."[23] For example, the DCCA has recognized there to be an extreme indifference to human life when a person caused the death of another by: driving at speeds in excess of 90 miles per hour, and turning onto a crowded onramp in an effort to escape police[24]; firing ten bullets towards an area where people were gathered[25]; and providing a weapon to another person, knowing that person would use it to injure a third person.[26] Although it is not possible to specifically define the degree and nature of risk that is "extreme," it need not be more likely than not that death or serious bodily injury would occur.[27] The "extreme indifference" language in paragraph (b)(2) codifies DCCA case law that recognizes those types of unintentional homicides that warrant criminalization as second degree murder.

United States*, 485 A.2d 596 (D.C. 1984) (defendant guilty of depraved heart murder when he led police on a high speed chase, drove at speeds of up to 90 miles per hour, turned onto a congested ramp and caused a fatal car crash).

[26] Perez v. United States, 968 A.2d 39, 102 (D.C. 2009) (note that the defendant was guilty of second degree murder on an accomplice theory).

[27] For example, if an actor kills another person by playing Russian roulette, this may constitute an extreme risk of death or serious bodily injury, even though there was a 1 in 6 chance of causing death or serious bodily injury.

Although consciously disregarding an extreme risk of death or serious bodily injury is necessary for depraved heart murder liability, it is not necessarily sufficient. There may be some instances in which a person causes the death of another person by consciously disregarding an extreme risk of death or serious bodily injury that do not constitute extreme indifference to human life. Whether an actor engages in conduct with extreme indifference to human life depends not only on the degree and nature of the risk consciously disregarded, but also on other factors that relate to the actor's culpability.

Specifically, the same factors that determine whether an actor's conscious disregard of a substantial risk is a "gross deviation" as required for ordinary recklessness[28] also bear on the determination of whether an actor's conscious disregard of an extreme risk of death or serious bodily injury manifests extreme indifference to human life. These factors are: (1) the extent to which the actor's disregard of the risk was intended to further any legitimate social objectives[29]; and (2) any individual or situational factors beyond the actor's control[30] that precluded his or her ability to exercise a reasonable level of concern for legally protected interests. In cases where these factors negate a finding that the actor exhibited extreme indifference to human life, a fact finder may nonetheless find that the actor behaved recklessly, provided that the actor's conduct was a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct.

Paragraph (b)(3) specifies that an actor commits second degree murder if the actor negligently causes the death of another person, other than an accomplice,[31] while committing or attempting to commit any of the enumerated felonies listed in subparagraphs (b)(3)(A)-(H). In addition, the actor must have committed the lethal act.[32] A person may not be convicted under paragraph (b)(3) for lethal acts committed by another person, including a fellow participant in the predicate felony, an intended victim of the predicate felony, or other third party. The statute specifies that a culpable mental state of "negligently" applies, a term defined at RCC § 22E-206 that here means that the actor should have been aware of a substantial risk that death would result from his or her conduct, and considering the motivation for the person's conduct and the circumstances the person is aware of, the person's failure to perceive the risk is a gross deviation from the care a reasonable person would take.[33] The negligently culpable mental state does

[28] See Commentary to RCC § 22E-206.

[29] For example, consider a person who causes a fatal car crash by driving at extremely high speeds as he rushes his child, who has suffered a painful compound fracture, to a hospital. The actor's intent to seek medical care and to alleviate his child's pain may weigh against finding that he acted with extreme indifference to human life.

[30] For example, consider a person who is habitually abused by her husband, who drives at extremely high speeds under threat of further abuse (insufficient to afford a duress defense) from her husband if she slows down. If that person then causes a fatal car crash, her emotional state and external coercion from her husband may weigh against finding that she acted with extreme indifference to human life.

[31] For example, if in the course of an armed robbery, the accused accidentally fires his gun, striking and killing his accomplice who was acting as a lookout, felony murder liability would not apply.

[32] For example, if during a robbery, police arrive at the scene and in an ensuing shootout the police fatally shoot a bystander, there would be no felony murder liability. However, this rule does not limit liability under any other form of homicide. If the person committing the robbery cause the death of the bystander in a manner that constituted recklessness with extreme indifference to human life, he may still be convicted of murder under a depraved heart theory, as specified in paragraph (b)(2).

not, however, apply to the enumerated felonies in paragraph (b)(3). The defined term "in fact" indicates that there is no additional culpable mental state requirement for the enumerated felonies in paragraph (b)(3); each has its own culpable mental state requirements which must be proven.

It is not sufficient that a death happened to occur during the commission or attempted commission of the felony. A "mere coincidence in time" between the underlying felony and death is insufficient for felony murder liability.[34] There also must be "some causal connection between the homicide and the underlying felony."[35] The death must have been caused by an act "in furtherance" of the underlying felony.[36] The revised statute codifies this case law by requiring that the death be "in the course of and in furtherance of committing, or attempting to commit" an enumerated offense.[37]

Subsection (c) specifies rules for imputing a conscious disregard of the risk required to prove that the person acted with extreme indifference to human life. Under the principles of liability governing intoxication under RCC § 22E-209, when an offense requires recklessness as to a result or circumstance, that culpable mental state may be imputed even if the person lacked actual awareness of a substantial risk due to his or her self-induced intoxication.[38] However, as discussed above, extreme indifference to human life in paragraph (b)(2) of the RCC murder statute requires that the person consciously disregarded an extreme risk of death or serious bodily injury, a greater degree of risk than is required for recklessness alone. While RCC § 22E-209 does not authorize fact finders to impute awareness of an extreme risk, this subsection specifies that a person shall be deemed to have been aware of an extreme risk required to prove that the person acted with extreme indifference to human life when the person was unaware of that risk due to self-induced intoxication, but would have been aware of the risk had the person been sober. The term "self-induced intoxication" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-209,[39] and the definition specifies certain culpable mental states that must be proven. The use of "in fact" in subsection (c) indicates that no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to the fact that the actor was unaware of the risk, but would have been aware of the risk had the actor been sober.

Even when a person's conscious disregard of an extreme risk of death or serious bodily injury is imputed under this subsection, in some instances the person may still not have acted with extreme indifference to human life. It is possible, though unlikely, that a person's self-induced intoxication is non-culpable, and weighs against finding that the person acted with extreme indifference to human life.[40] In these cases, although the awareness of risk may be imputed, the person could still be acquitted of second degree murder. However, finding that the person did not act with extreme indifference to human life does not preclude finding that the person acted recklessly as required for involuntary manslaughter[41], provided that his or her conduct was gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct.

[36] It is not required that the death itself facilitated commission or attempted commission of the predicate felony. However, the conduct constituting the lethal act must have facilitated commission or attempted commission of the predicate felony. For example, if during a robbery a defendant fires a gun in order to frighten the robbery victim, and accidentally hits and kills a bystander, felony murder liability is appropriate so long as the act of firing the gun facilitated the robbery.

[37] Causing death of another is in furtherance of the predicate felony if it facilitated commission or attempted commission of the felony, or avoiding apprehension or detection of the felony. E.g., Lovette v. State, 636 So. 2d 1304, 1307 (Fla. 1994) ("These killings lessened the immediate detection of the robbery and apprehension of the perpetrators and, thus, furthered that robbery.").

Subsection (d) establishes the penalties for first and second degree murder. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Paragraph (d)(3) provides enhanced penalties for both first and second degree murder. If the government proves the presence of at least one aggravating factor listed under paragraph (d)(3), the penalty classification for first degree murder and second degree murder may be increased in severity by one penalty class. These penalty enhancements may be applied in addition to any penalty enhancements authorized by RCC Chapter 6.

Subparagraph (d)(3)(A) specifies that recklessness as to whether the decedent is a protected person is an aggravating circumstance. Recklessness is defined at RCC § 22E-206, and requires that the actor was aware of a substantial risk that the deceased was a protected person, and that the risk is of such a nature and degree that, considering the nature of and motivation for the person's conduct and the circumstances the person is [40] This is perhaps clearest where a person's self-induced intoxication is pathological—i.e. "grossly excessive in degree, given the amount of the intoxicant, to which the actor does not know he is susceptible." Model Penal Code § 2.08(5)(c). The following hypothetical is illustrative. X consumes a single alcoholic beverage at an office holiday party, and immediately thereafter departs to the metro. While waiting for the train, X begins to experience an extremely high level of intoxication—unbeknownst to X, the drink has interacted with an allergy medication she is taking, thereby producing a level of intoxication ten times greater than what X normally experiences from that amount of alcohol. As a result, X has a difficult time standing straight, and ends up stumbling into another train-goer, V, who falls onto the tracks just as the train is approaching. If X is subsequently charged with depraved heart murder on these facts, her self-induced state of intoxication—when viewed in light of the surrounding circumstances— may weigh against finding that she manifested extreme indifference to human life. It may be true that X, but for her intoxicated state, would have been more careful/aware of V's proximity. Nevertheless, X is only liable for depraved heart murder under the RCC if X's conduct manifested an extreme indifference to human life.

It is also possible, under narrow circumstances, for a person's self-induced intoxication to weigh in favor of finding the person's conduct not a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct or care, even when it is not pathological. This is reflected in the situation of X, who consumes an extremely large amount of alcohol by herself on the second level of her two-story home. Soon thereafter, X's sister, V, makes an unannounced visit to X's home, lets herself in, and then announces that she's going to walk up to the second story to have a conversation with X. A few moments later, X stumbles into V at the top of the stairs, unaware of V's proximity, thereby causing V to fall to her death. If X is charged with depraved heart murder, under current law evidence of her voluntary intoxication could not be presented to negate the culpable mental state required for second degree murder. Wheeler v. United States, 832 A.2d 1271, 1273 (D.C. 2003) (quoting Bishop v. United States, 71 App. D.C. 132, 107 F.2d 297 (D.C. Cir. 1939)). In the RCC, however, evidence of the actor's self-induced intoxication could be present in the case and considered by the jury to presume awareness of the risk but also to negate finding that she acted with extreme indifference to human life.

aware of, its disregard is a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct. The term "protected person" is defined in RCC § 22E-701.

Subparagraph (d)(3)(B) specifies that causing the death of another "with the purpose" of harming the decedent because of his or her status as a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or district official is an aggravating circumstance. This aggravating circumstance requires that the accused acted with "purpose," a term defined at RCC § 22E-206, which means that the actor must consciously desire to harm that person because of his or her status as a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or District official.[42] Harm may include, but does not require bodily injury. Harm should be construed more broadly to include causing an array of adverse outcomes.[43] "Law enforcement officer," "public safety employee," and "District official" are all defined terms in RCC § 22E-701. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with the purpose" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. Here, it is not necessary to prove that the complainant was a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or District official, only that the actor consciously desired to cause the death of a person of such a status.

Subparagraph (d)(3)(C) specifies that murder committed with intent to avoid or prevent a lawful arrest or effect an escape from "official custody" is an aggravating circumstance. "Official custody" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "full submission after an arrest or substantial physical restraint after an arrest." This aggravating circumstance requires that the accused acted with "intent" a term defined at RCC § 22E-206, which means that the actor must consciously desire or be practically certain that the actor will avoid or prevent a lawful arrest, or escape from "official custody," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. Here, it is not necessary to prove that the actor actually avoided or prevented a lawful arrest or effected an escape from "official custody," only that the actor consciously desired or was practically certain the actor would avoid or prevent lawful arrest, or effect an escape from "official custody."

Subparagraph (d)(3)(D) specifies that murder committed for hire is an aggravating circumstance. This aggravating circumstance is satisfied if the actor received anything of pecuniary value from another person in exchange for causing the death. This subparagraph also specifies that the culpable mental state required for this aggravating circumstance is "knowingly," a term defined under RCC § 22E-206 to mean that the actor must have been practically certain that he or she would receive anything of value in exchange for causing the death of another.

[42] While the RCC § 22E-701 definitions of "law enforcement officer" and "public safety employee" refer to some persons only when on-duty (e.g., a campus officer), this provision on committing the offense with the purpose of harming the complainant because of their status as a law enforcement officer or public safety employee applies to committing the offense against an off-duty person based on their on-duty role. For example, a defendant who murders an off-duty police officer in retaliation for the officer arresting the defendant's friend would constitute committing murder with the purpose of harming the decedent due to his status as a law enforcement officer.

[43] For example, if a person fires several shots above a police officer's head with the purpose of frightening the officer, and accidentally hits and kills the officer, the aggravating factor under (c)(3)(B) may apply, even if the person did not have the purpose of causing bodily injury.

Subparagraph (d)(3)(E) specifies that the infliction of extreme physical pain or mental suffering for a prolonged period of time immediately prior to the decedent's death is an aggravating circumstance.[44] This subparagraph also specifies that the culpable mental state required for this aggravating circumstance is "knowingly," a term defined under RCC § 22E-206 to mean that the actor must have been practically certain that his or her conduct would cause extreme physical pain or mental suffering for a prolonged period of time prior to the decedent's death.

Subparagraph (d)(3)(F) specifies that mutilating or desecrating the decedent's body is an aggravating circumstance.[45] This subsection also specifies that the culpable mental state required for this aggravating circumstance is "knowingly," a term defined under RCC § 22E-206 to mean that the actor must be practically certain that he or she mutilated or desecrated the body after death.

Subparagraph (d)(3)(G) specifies that substantial planning is an aggravating circumstance. Substantial planning requires more than mere premeditation and deliberation. The term "substantial planning" is intended to have the same meaning as under current law.[46] Although substantial planning does not require an intricate plot, the accused must have formed the intent to kill a substantial amount of time before committing the murder.[47] This subparagraph uses the term "in fact," which specifies that no culpable mental state applies to this aggravating circumstance.

Subparagraph (d)(3)(H) specifies that committing a murder by shooting from a vehicle that is being driven at the time of the shooting is an aggravating circumstance. This aggravating factor requires that the murder was committed by shooting from a car that is being driven, either by the shooter or a third party. This aggravating factor does not include shootings committed from a vehicle that is not being operated or driven at the time of the shooting. This subparagraph also specifies that the culpable mental state required for this aggravating circumstance is "knowingly," a term defined under RCC § 22E-206 to mean that the actor must be practically certain that he or she committed the murder by shooting from a vehicle being drive at the time.

Subparagraph (d)(3)(I) specifies that committing a murder with the purpose of harming the decedent because he was or had been a witness in any criminal investigation or judicial proceeding, or the decedent was capable of providing or had provided assistance in any criminal investigation or judicial proceeding is an aggravating circumstance. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with the purpose" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. Here, it is not necessary to prove that [44] For example, murders preceded by keeping the victim tied up for a prolonged period of time, knowing that his or her death was forthcoming or starving the person to death, may satisfy this aggravating circumstance.

[45] For example, a defendant who cuts off body parts, disfigures body parts, or who uses the deceased's body for sexual gratification may satisfy this aggravating circumstance.

[47] For example, if days before a murder, the defendant plans out how he will ambush the victim, and chooses a weapon for the purpose of carrying out the murder, the substantial planning circumstance would be satisfied.

the complainant had actually been a witness or provided assistance in a criminal investigation or judicial proceeding, only that the actor consciously desired to harm a person who was or had been a witness, or who was capable of providing, or had provided, information in any criminal investigation or judicial proceeding.

Subsection (e) provides for a bifurcated proceeding when a person is charged with penalty enhancements under subparagraphs (d)(3)(E) or (d)(3)(F). In the first stage of the proceeding, the fact finder shall only consider evidence relevant to determining whether the accused committed either first or second degree murder. Evidence that is relevant to determining whether aggravating factors under subparagraphs (d)(3)(E) or (d)(3)(F) are not admissible at this stage, unless it is relevant to determining whether the accused committed either first or second degree murder. In the second stage of the proceeding, the fact finder may consider evidence relevant to determining whether aggravating factors under subparagraphs (d)(3)(E) or (d)(3)(F). This bifurcated procedure limits the admissibility of unfairly prejudicial evidence during the first stage. This subsection also specifies that the same jury or fact finder will serve at both stages of the proceeding.

Subsection (f) defines defenses applicable to first and second degree murder. Paragraph (f)(1) provides that in addition to any other defenses otherwise applicable to the accused's conduct, the presence of mitigating circumstances is a defense to prosecution for first degree murder, or second degree depraved heart murder. This paragraph provides a non-exhaustive definition of mitigating circumstances.[48]

Subparagraph (f)(1)(A) first defines mitigating circumstances as acting under the influence of extreme emotional disturbance for which there was a reasonable cause. "Extreme emotional disturbance" refers to emotions such as "rage," "fear or any violent and intense emotion sufficient to dethrone reason."[49] Subparagraph (e)(1)(A) further specifies that the reasonableness of the cause of the disturbance shall be determined from the viewpoint of a reasonable person in the actor's situation under the circumstances as the actor believed them to be. The "actor's situation" includes some of the actor's personal traits, such as physical disabilities[50], or temporary emotional states,[51] which should be taken into account in determining reasonableness. However, the actor's idiosyncratic values or moral judgments are irrelevant.[52] Subparagraph (e)(1)(A) also specifies that reasonableness shall be determined from the accused's situation "as the actor believed them to be." This language clarifies that the actor's factual beliefs, even if inaccurate, must be taken into account in determining whether the cause of the extreme [48] Other circumstances that are not explicitly listed in paragraph (e)(1) may constitute mitigating circumstances. However, subparagraph (e)(1)(C) is drafted broadly to include nearly any circumstance that would constitute a mitigating circumstance.

[49] See Commentary to MPC § 210.3 at 60.

[50] For example, circumstances that may reasonably cause extreme emotional disturbance for a blind or paralyzed person may not be reasonable for an able-bodied person.

[51] For example, circumstances that may reasonably cause extreme emotional disturbance for a person suffering from extreme grief may not be reasonable for a person under a neutral emotional state.

[52] For example, if a defendant reacts to a minor verbal insult with homicidal rage and kills a person who insulted him, whether the minor insult was a reasonable cause for the extreme emotional disturbance depends on the community's values, not the defendant's individual values as to the proper response to minor insults. However, if the insults were of such a severe nature that the community's values would deem them a reasonable cause of the extreme emotional disturbance, mitigation would be satisfied.

emotional disturbance was reasonable.[53] The fact finder must determine in each case whether the provoking circumstance was a reasonable cause of the extreme emotional disturbance, such that "the actor's loss of self-control can be understood in terms that arouse sympathy in the ordinary citizen."[54]

Subparagraph (f)(1)(B) defines mitigating circumstances to include acting under an unreasonable belief that the use of deadly force was necessary to prevent imminent death or serious bodily injury under the circumstances. This form of mitigation may arise in the context of imperfect self-defense or the defense of others.[55] A person is justified in using deadly force if he reasonably believes he, or another person, is in imminent danger of serious bodily harm or death, and that the use of deadly force was necessary to prevent the infliction of that harm.[56] Use of deadly force with such a reasonable belief is a complete defense to liability.[57] If the actor genuinely believes these circumstances exist, but that belief in either circumstance is unreasonable, subparagraph (e)(1)(B) clarifies that the actor is not guilty of murder, but is guilty of voluntary manslaughter.[58]

Subparagraph (f)(1)(C) further defines mitigating circumstances to broadly include any other legally-recognized partial defense to murder. For example, an unreasonable belief in any circumstance that would provide a legal justification for the use of lethal force, apart from self-defense or defense of others, may constitute a mitigating circumstance.[59]

Paragraph (f)(2) specifies the effect of the mitigation defense in a murder prosecution. If evidence of mitigation has been presented at trial and the government fails to meet its burden of proving that mitigating circumstance were absent, but proves [53] For example, a classic heat of passion fact pattern involves a person discovering his or her spouse having sexual relations with another person. An actor who genuinely, but falsely, believes that his or her spouse is having an affair may still be deemed to have acted under an extreme emotional disturbance for which there was a reasonable cause.

[57] See RCC § 22E-4XX [forthcoming] Defense of Person.

[58] If an actor uses lethal force reasonably believing that the decedent was threatening an imminent use of deadly force, but the belief that use of lethal force was necessary to repel the attack was unreasonable because it was obvious that the person could have easily retreated with no risk to his safety, an imperfect self-defense claim would be available to mitigate the offense from murder to manslaughter. In addition, belief that the use of lethal force was necessary may be unreasonable if the actor used excessive force. For example, if the actor genuinely believed that the decedent was threatening an imminent use of deadly force, but non-lethal force would have been sufficient to repel the attack, an imperfect self-defense claim would be available to mitigate the offense from murder to manslaughter. See, Dorsey v. United States, 935 A.2d 288, 293 (D.C. 2007).

[59] For example, a court may find that the use of deadly force is justified to defend against an attempted sexual assault, even absent the fear of serious bodily injury or death. See, Evans v. United States, 277 F.2d 354, 356 (D.C. Cir. 1960) (reversing conviction for second degree murder when trial court did not allow evidence of decedent's intoxication when defendant claimed she was "defending herself from a sexual assault.").

all other elements of murder, then the accused is not guilty of murder but is guilty of voluntary manslaughter.[60]

Subsection (g) provides that a person cannot be held liable as an accomplice to felony murder, as defined in paragraph (b)(3).[61] This subsection does not limit application of any other form of homicide liability.[62]

Subsection (h) specifies that, while a person may be convicted of second degree murder under paragraph (b)(3) and a predicate felony listed in subparagraphs (b)(3)(A) - (b)(3)(H), the convictions for second degree murder and the predicate felony merge when arising from the same act or course of conduct. The court must follow the procedures in RCC § 22E-214 (b) and (c) to effect such a merger. However, convictions for a predicate felony listed in subparagraphs (b)(3)(A) - (b)(3)(H) and for first degree murder, or second degree murder under paragraphs (b)(1) or (b)(2), do not merge under subsection (h). Subject to the general merger rules provided in RCC § 22E-214, multiple convictions for a predicate felony listed in subparagraphs (b)(3)(A) - (b)(3)(H) and for first degree murder, or second degree murder under paragraphs (b)(1) or (b)(2) are permitted and, as usual, sentences may run concurrently or consecutively as prescribed by the sentencing judge.

Subsection (i) cross references definitions found elsewhere in the revised criminal code.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised murder statute changes current District law for first and second degree murder in eighteen main ways.

First, under the revised murder statute, felony murder is graded as second degree murder. Under the current first degree murder statute, a person may be convicted if he or she unintentionally causes the death of another while committing or attempting to commit a specified felony.[63] Unintentional felony murder is currently punished more severely than an intentional, but non-premeditated killing (which currently constitutes second degree murder), subjecting the defendant to a life sentence if the government can prove that at least one aggravating circumstance was present.[64] Moreover, aggravating circumstances that enhances penalties for first degree felony murder include that the killing occurred while the accused was committing or attempting to commit [60] The mitigation provision is also not intended to change current DCCA case law which states that if evidence of mitigation is presented in a murder trial, the defendant is entitled to a jury instruction as to voluntary manslaughter. Price v. United States, 602 A.2d 641, 645 (D.C. 1992).

[61] For example, if A is a getaway driver for B who robs a store, and during the course of the robbery B negligently kills the store clerk, A cannot be held liable as an accomplice to the felony murder committed by B.

[62] For example, if A is a getaway driver for B, who robs a store and intentionally kills the store clerk, A could be liable as an accomplice to B's intentional murder, provided the requirements of accomplice liability are satisfied.

[63] These specified felonies are: first degree sexual abuse, first degree child sexual abuse, first degree cruelty to children, mayhem, robbery, kidnapping, first degree burglary while armed, or a felony involving a controlled substance. D.C. Code § 22-2101.

[64] Absent any aggravating circumstances, a non-premeditated intentional murder is subject to a maximum sentence of 40 years, whereas felony murder is subject to a 60 year maximum sentence and a 30 year mandatory minimum. D.C. Code § 22-2104.

"kidnapping,"[65] or "a robbery, arson, rape, or a sexual offense,"[66] and the DCCA has held that the predicate felony for felony murder can also serve as an aggravating circumstance.[67] Consequently, under current law, an unintentional homicide that occurs during a robbery, arson, sexual offense, or kidnapping is subject to a more severe maximum sentence than even a premeditated, purposeful killing (which currently constitutes first degree murder absent aggravating circumstances). By contrast, under the RCC, unintentionally causing the death of another while committing an enumerated felony constitutes second degree murder. This change improves the proportionality of penalties under the RCC by treating killings committed with a lower culpable mental state less severely.

Second, the revised murder statute eliminates as a distinct form of first degree murder purposely causing the death of another while "perpetrating or attempting to perpetrate an offense punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary."[68] The DCCA has held that an "offense punishable by imprisonment in the penitentiary refers to any felony.[69] Under the RCC, the grading with respect to general felony conduct is simplified, such that purposely causing the death of another person with premeditation and deliberation is first degree murder, while purposeful killing without premeditation or deliberation will still be covered by the second degree murder offense. This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised criminal code.

Third, the revised first degree murder statute eliminates as a distinct form of murder D.C. Code § 22-2102, which requires that the accused "maliciously places an obstruction upon a railroad or street railroad . . . and thereby occasions the death of another."[70] In contrast, the RCC treats killings caused by obstructing railroads the same as any other killings, with charges dependent on the accused's culpable mental state, and the presence of aggravating or mitigating circumstances. The fact that a killing occurs by means of obstructing a railroad no longer, by itself, renders the killing first degree murder. This change improves the proportionality of the revised homicide statutes by ensuring that the accused's culpable mental state remains the primary grading factor, instead of the specific means of placing obstructions upon a railroad or street railroad.

Fourth, the revised second degree murder statute changes the specified felonies that may serve as a predicate offense for "felony murder" in five ways.[71] The current felony murder predicates include: (1) all conduct constituting "robbery," currently an ungraded offense; (2) first degree child cruelty; (3) any "felony involving a controlled substance;"[72] (4) mayhem; and (5) "any housebreaking while armed with or using a dangerous weapon," although it is unclear which specific crimes constitute such "housebreaking."[73] By contrast, the RCC clarifies, and in several respects reduces, the conduct that is a predicate for felony murder. First, the revised statute states that first and second degree robbery are predicates for felony murder, but does not include the RCC's third degree robbery as a predicate offense, or pickpocketing-type conduct that is treated as theft from a person[74] in the RCC. Eliminating such conduct as predicates for felony murder improves the statute's proportionality because such conduct does not involve infliction of significant bodily injury or the use of a weapon, and lacks the inherent dangerousness of first and second degree robbery.[75] Second, the revised second degree murder offense includes the RCC's first degree criminal abuse of a minor offense, but only when the actor knowingly caused serious bodily injury. Under the current D.C. Code, first degree child cruelty is included as predicate offense for felony murder, but appears to require only recklessness and harms less than serious bodily injury.[76] As first degree criminal abuse of a minor in RCC § 22E-1501(a) requires recklessness as to serious bodily injury, simply making RCC § 22E-1501(a) a predicate to felony murder would effectively provide murder liability for recklessly causing death. Requiring that the actor knowingly causes serious bodily injury in order for first degree criminal abuse of a minor to serve as a predicate offense improves the proportionality of the statute. Third, the revised second degree murder offense does not include felonies involving a controlled substance as predicates for felony murder. Omitting controlled substance offenses from the enumerated offenses improves the proportionality of the felony murder rule, as controlled substance offenses do not present the same inherent, direct risk of physical [73] Under current law, burglary is divided into two grades, both of which appear to be included in the felony murder statutory reference to "housebreaking." The original 1901 Code codified the offense now known as burglary, but called it "housebreaking." The original "housebreaking" offense only had one grade, and criminalized entry of any building with intent to commit a crime therein. In 1940, Congress amended the first degree murder statute and included an enumerated list of felonies, which included housebreaking, for felony murder. See H.R. Rep. Doc. No. 76-1821, at 1 (1940) (Conf. Rep). In 1967, Congress relabeled "housebreaking" as "second degree burglary," and created first degree burglary, which required that the burglar entered an occupied dwelling. However, the DCCA has held that only the current first degree burglary offense may serve as a predicate to non-purposeful felony murder. Robinson v. United States, 100 A.3d 95, 109 (D.C. 2014).

[70] D.C. Code § 22-2101. The statute also includes displacing or injuring "anything appertaining" to a railroad or street railroad, or "any other act with intent to endanger the passage of any locomotive or car[.]"
[71] In addition to felony murder under the revised second degree murder statute, the revised aggravated arson statute provides an alternate means of criminalizing certain homicides. The revised aggravated arson offense criminalizes committing arson when the defendant knows the building is a dwelling, with recklessness as to the dwelling being occupied, and in fact, death or serious bodily injury results.

[74] Under the RCC, pick pocketing or sudden snatching of property that does not involve threats or physical force, when the property is not taken from the other person's hands or arms, are not criminalized under the robbery statute, but instead are treated as theft from a person, RCC §§ 22E-1201, 22E-2101.

[75] Third degree robbery requires that the defendant took property from the immediate actual possession of another by means of either: 1) causing bodily injury to any one present; 2) communicating that any person will immediately cause bodily injury, a sexual act, a sexual contact, confinement, or death; 3) applying physical force that moves or immobilizes another; or 4) by removing property from the arms or hands of the complainant.

[76] See D.C. Code § 22–1101(a) ("A person commits the crime of cruelty to children in the first degree if that person intentionally, knowingly, or recklessly tortures, beats, or otherwise willfully maltreats a child under 18 years of age or engages in conduct which creates a grave risk of bodily injury to a child, and thereby causes bodily injury.").

harm to others as compared to the other enumerated felonies.[77] Lastly, the revised second degree murder offense replaces the phrase "any housebreaking while possessing a dangerous weapon" with "enhanced first degree burglary." Under current law, only first degree burglary while armed may serve as a predicate offense,[78] and the current first degree burglary offense requires that the accused entered an occupied dwelling. This largely corresponds to the RCC's enhanced first degree burglary offense, with only minor changes to current law.[79] These changes to the enumerated predicate offenses improve the clarity of the code.

Fifth, the revised second degree murder offense requires that, for felony murder, the accused must have caused the death of another while acting "in furtherance" of the predicate felony. The current statute does not specify that the accused cause the death of another "in furtherance" of the underlying felony, and the DCCA has held that "[t]here is no requirement in the law . . . that the government prove the killing was done in furtherance of the felony in order to convict the actual killer of felony murder."[80] However, while there is no "in furtherance" requirement under current law,[81] the DCCA has held that "[m]ere temporal and locational coincidence"[82] between the underlying felony and the death are not enough. There must have been an "actual legal relation between the killing and the crime . . . [such] that the killing can be said to have occurred as a part of the perpetration of the crime."[83] By contrast, the revised statute, through use of the "in furtherance" phrase, requires that the accused's conduct that caused the death of another in some way facilitated the commission or attempted commission of the offense, including avoiding apprehension or detection.[84] Practically, this change in law [77] If in the course of committing a controlled substance offense, a defendant intentionally causes the death of another, or intentionally causes serious bodily injury that causes death of another, he or she may still be convicted of first or second degree murder.

[78] Robinson v. United States, 100 A.3d 95, 109 (D.C. 2014) (Because robbery is one of the felonies enumerated in the felony murder statute, D.C. Code § 22–2101 (2012 Repl.), and second-degree burglary is not, the government is required to prove an intent to kill in order to convict a defendant of felony murder with the underlying felony of second-degree burglary, but is not required to prove that intent for robbery.).

[79] The RCC's first degree burglary statute differs from the current first degree burglary offense in three main ways. The RCC's first degree burglary statute requires that the defendant enter a dwelling: (1) knowing that he or she lacked the effective consent of the owner; (2) knowing the building was a dwelling, and (3) the dwelling was, in fact, occupied by someone who is not a participant in the crime. The current first degree burglary statute does not specifically require that the defendant knew the building was a dwelling, that the defendant lacked effective consent to enter, or that the occupant be a non-participant in the crime.

[81] However, the DCCA has clearly held that when one party to the underlying felony causes the death of another, an aider and abettor to the underlying felony may only be convicted of felony murder if the "killing takes place in furtherance of the underlying felony." Butler v. United States, 614 A.2d 875 (D.C. 1992).

[82] Johnson v. United States, 671 A.2d 428, 433 (D.C. 1995).

[83] Id. 433 (emphasis original).

[84] Courts in other states have disagreed about the meaning of "in furtherance" language that is common in felony murder statutes. Some courts have held that "in furtherance" requires that the act that caused the death must have advanced or facilitated commission of the underlying crime. E.g., State v. Arias, 641 P.2d 1285, 1287 (Ariz. 1982); Auman v. People, 109 P.3d 647, 656 (Colo. 2005) (the death must occur either "in the course of" or "in furtherance of" immediate flight, so that a defendant commits felony murder only if a may have little impact, as most cases in which the actor causes the death of another as "part of perpetration of the crime," he or she would also have been acting in furtherance of the crime. However, this change improves the proportionality of the offense insofar as a person whose risk-creating behavior is not in furtherance of the felony is not as culpable as a person who otherwise negligently kills someone in the course of committing a specified felony.[85]

Sixth, applying the general culpability principles for self-induced intoxication in RCC § 22E-209 allows a defendant to claim that due to intoxication, he or she did not form the awareness of risk required to act "recklessly, with extreme indifference to human life." However, subsection (c) allows a fact finder to impute awareness of the risk required to prove that the defendant acted with extreme indifference to human life, when the lack of awareness was due to self-induced intoxication. Although self-induced intoxication is generally culpable, and weighs in favor of finding that the person acted with extreme indifference to human life, it is possible, however unlikely, that self-induced intoxication reduces the blameworthiness, and negates finding that the person acted with extreme indifference to human life.[86]

The current murder statutes are silent as to the effect of self-induced intoxication, but the DCCA has held that, although evidence of self-induced intoxication may negate a finding that the defendant acted with premeditation as required for first degree murder, it "may not reduce murder to voluntary manslaughter, nor permit an acquittal of [second degree] murder."[87] The DCCA further clarified that evidence of voluntary intoxication "is not admissible to disprove [the element of] malice' integral to the crime of murder."[88] By contrast, although subsection (c) allows for imputation of the awareness of risk, in some rare cases, a defendant's self-induced intoxication may still negate finding that he or she acted with extreme indifference to human life, as required for second degree murder. This change improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

death is caused during a participant's immediate flight or while a person is acting to promote immediate flight from the predicate"). However, other states have interpreted "in furtherance" to require only a "logical nexus" between the underlying crime and death, to "exclude those deaths which are so far outside the ambit of the plan of the felony and its execution as to be unrelated to them." State v. Young, 469 A.2d 1189, 1192–93 (Conn. 1983); see also, Noble v. State, 516 S.W.3d 727, 731 (Ark. 2017) (rejecting appellant's argument that "in furtherance" requires that lethal act facilitated the underlying crime, but noting that a burglary committed with intent to kill cannot serve as a predicate offense to felony murder when the defendant completes the murder, because the murder was not committed in furtherance of the burglary); People v. Henderson, 35 N.E.3d 840, 845 (N.Y. 2015) ("[Appellant] asserts that the statutory language "in furtherance of" requires that the death be caused in order to advance or promote the underlying felony. We have not interpreted "in furtherance of" so narrowly."). The RCC tracks the former approach, requiring the death to have advanced or facilitated the commission of the underlying crime.

[85] For example, if in the course of committing a kidnapping, the defendant binds and gags the victim to prevent him from escaping, and the defendant suffocates as a result, felony murder liability would be appropriate. If however, the defendant leaves the kidnapping victim to go on an unrelated errand, and while doing so causes the death of another by driving negligently, felony murder liability would not be appropriate.

In addition, to the extent that the self-induced intoxication provision changes current law with respect to any of the predicate offenses for felony murder, the provision also changes current law as to felony murder.[89] If self-induced intoxication negates the requisite culpable mental state required for a predicate offense, there can be no felony murder liability based on that offense.[90] These changes improve the clarity, completeness, and proportionality of the revised offense.

Seventh, the penalty enhancements under paragraph (d)(3) omit as an aggravating circumstance that the murder was committed in the course of kidnapping or abduction, or attempt to kidnap or abduct. The current first degree murder statute is subject to a penalty enhancement where it is proven that the murder was committed in the course of a kidnapping, abduction, or attempted kidnapping or abduction.[91] By contrast, the penalty enhancement under subsection (d) omits this aggravating circumstance as unnecessary. In any case in which a person commits murder while committing or attempting to commit kidnapping, the person may be convicted and separately sentenced for kidnapping or attempted kidnapping[92], which substantially increases the maximum allowable punishment beyond a murder not committed in the course of a kidnapping or attempted kidnapping. Eliminating this aggravating circumstance reduces unnecessary overlap between offenses,[93] and improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised statute by preventing both an enhanced penalty for the murder and a separate conviction and sentence for the kidnapping offense.

Eighth, the penalty enhancements under paragraph (d)(3) omit as an aggravating circumstance that the murder was committed while committing or attempting to commit a robbery, arson, rape, or sexual offense. The current first degree murder statute is subject to a penalty enhancement where it is proven that the murder was committed "while committing or attempting to commit a robbery, arson, rape, or sexual offense."[94] The terms "rape" and "sexual offense" are undefined by the current statute, and there is no case law on point.[95] By contrast, the penalty enhancement under subsection (d) omits this

[89] For example, the revised arson statute changes current law by allowing evidence of the defendant's voluntary intoxication to be introduced to negate the culpable mental state required for first or second degree arson. See Commentary to RCC § 22E-2501.

[90] For example, if a defendant is charged with felony murder predicated on first or second degree arson, evidence of voluntary intoxication may be introduced to negate the requisite culpable mental state for first or second degree arson. If the defendant failed to form the requisite mental state for arson, then by extension the defendant cannot be found guilty of felony murder predicated on arson.

[92] An exception is if the person commits felony murder predicated on kidnapping. In this case the convictions for second degree murder and the underlying kidnapping would merge.

[93] It is unclear whether under current District law, a defendant may be sentenced under the kidnapping aggravating circumstance and be separately convicted and sentenced for the kidnapping itself. It is possible that when kidnapping is used as an aggravating circumstance to enhance the maximum penalty for murder, the conviction for kidnaping merges with the murder conviction. If so, there is no overlap issue. No case law exists on point.

[94] D.C. Code § 22-2104.01(b)(8).

[95] Arguably, "rape, or sexual offense" at least includes first, second, and third degree sexual abuse, child sexual abuse, and some other offenses currently described in Chapter 30 of Title 22 of the D.C. Code. However, many other offenses are included in the definition of a "registration offense" for purposes of the District's sex offender registry. D.C. Code § 22-4001(8). It is unclear whether these constitute a "sexual aggravating circumstance as unnecessary. Even with the omission of this aggravating circumstance, the accused may still be separately convicted and sentenced for the robbery, arson, rape, or other sexual offense, which substantially increases the maximum allowable punishment beyond a murder not committed in the course of robbery, arson, rape, or another sexual offense. Eliminating this aggravating circumstance reduces unnecessary overlap between offenses,[96] and improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised statute by preventing both an enhanced penalty for the murder and a separate conviction and sentence for the other felony offense.

Ninth, the penalty enhancements under paragraph (d)(3) omit as an aggravating circumstance that there was more than one first degree murder arising out of one incident. The current first degree murder statute is subject to a penalty enhancement when there was more than one offense of murder in the first degree arising out of one "incident."[97] The term "incident" is not defined by the statute, and there is no case law on point. By contrast, the penalty enhancement under subsection (d) omits this aggravating circumstance as unnecessary. In any case in which the accused commits more than one murder, that person may be convicted and sentenced for multiple counts of murder, which allows for punishment proportionate to the conduct.[98] Eliminating this aggravating circumstance reduces unnecessary overlap between offenses,[99] and improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised statute by preventing both enhanced penalty for each murder and a separate conviction and sentence for the additional murders.

Tenth, the penalty enhancements under paragraph (d)(3) omit as an aggravating circumstance that the murder was a drive-by or random shooting. The current first degree murder statute is subject to a penalty enhancement when the murder "involved a drive-by or random shooting."[100] There is no District case law on the meaning of "random." By contrast, the penalty enhancement under subsection (d) omits this aggravating circumstance because the circumstance is vague and drive-by or random shootings are not sufficiently distinguishable from other murders to justify a more severe sentence. It is unclear both what connection would suffice to establish that a murder offense" for purposes of the current first degree murder aggravating circumstance. District case law has not established the scope of this language.

[96] It is unclear whether under current District law, a defendant may be sentenced under this aggravating circumstance and be separately convicted and sentenced for robbery, arson, rape, or other sexual offense. It is possible that when robbery, arson, rape, or other sexual offense is used as an aggravating circumstance to enhance the maximum penalty for murder, the conviction for robbery, arson, rape, or other sexual offense merges with the murder conviction. If so, there is no overlap issue. No case law exists on point.

[97] D.C. Code § 22-2104.1(b)(6).

[98] Other jurisdictions began enumerating aggravating circumstances to murder to authorize the death penalty in accordance with the Supreme Court's holding in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972). The circumstances were necessary to distinguish between cases that warranted imposition of the death penalty as opposed to life imprisonment. However, the District does not impose the death penalty and there is no need for an aggravating circumstance when the defendant can already receive a proportionate term of imprisonment.

[99] It is unclear whether under current District law, a defendant may be sentenced under this aggravating circumstance and be separately convicted and sentenced for any other first degree murders that arise out of the same incident. It is possible that when another first degree murder is used as an aggravating circumstance to enhance the maximum penalty, the murder convictions merge. If so, there is no overlap issue. No case law exists on point.

[100] D.C. Code §§ 22-2104.1(b)(5), 24-403.01 (b-2)(2)(E).

"involved" a drive-by or random shooting, and what the meaning of "random" is in this context[101]. In addition, murders committing by random or drive-by shootings do not categorically inflict greater suffering on the victim, nor are they significantly more culpable than murders committed by other means.[102] Eliminating this aggravating circumstance improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised statute by preventing enhanced penalties for murders that are not categorically more heinous or culpable than other types of murder.

Eleventh, the penalty enhancements under paragraph (d)(3) omit as an aggravating circumstance that the murder was committed because of the victim's race, color, religion, national origin, sexual orientation, or gender identity or expression. The current first degree murder statute is subject to a penalty enhancement when the murder was "committed because of the victim's race, color, religion, national origin, sexual orientation, or gender identity or expression[.]"[103] A separate bias-related crime penalty enhancement in current D.C. Code § 22-3703 increases the maximum punishment for any murder by one and a half times when the murder "demonstrates an accused's prejudice based on the actual or perceived race, color, religion, national origin, …sexual orientation, gender identity or expression…."[104] By contrast, the penalty enhancements under subsection (d) omit this aggravating circumstance as unnecessary because bias motivated murders will be subject to a general penalty enhancement under RCC § 22E-607. Omitting this aggravating circumstance reduces unnecessary overlap between statutes[105] and improves the proportionality of the offense by precluding bias motivations from enhancing penalties twice, both as an aggravating circumstance and under the separate bias enhancement.

Twelfth, the penalty enhancements under paragraph (d)(3) omit as an aggravating circumstance that the accused had previously been convicted of murder, manslaughter, or other enumerated violent offenses. The current first degree murder statute is subject to a penalty enhancement when the accused had previously been convicted of certain violent offenses.[106] Separate repeat offender penalty enhancements in current D.C. Code §§ 22-

[101] For example, it is unclear whether the aggravator for "random" killing would include any shooting of a firearm in the general direction of an unknown person (assuming the unknown identity of the victim is the critical aspect for determining randomness), whether the lack of a specific motive or reason for shooting a firearm in the general direction of an unknown person is required (assuming the lack of a clear victim-selection mechanism is the critical aspect of randomness), or whether a non-purposeful, unintentional, culpable mental state as to the victim is required (assuming that lack of knowing or purposeful action is the critical aspect of randomness).

[102] One possible rationale for punishing murders committed by drive-by or random shootings more severely is that these types of murders are less likely to result in apprehension and conviction. Therefore, to achieve sufficient deterrent effect, more severe punishment is needed. However, there are any number of factors that could make it significantly more difficulty to apprehend and convict a perpetrator that are not included as aggravating circumstances.

[105] It is unclear whether under current District law, a defendant may be sentenced under both the current bias-related crime statute D.C. Code § 22-3703, and the bias motivated aggravating circumstance. It is possible that only one statute may apply to a particular murder, and there is no overlap issue. No case law exists on point.

[106] D.C. Code § 22-2104.01(b)(12) (these offenses are: "murder, (B) manslaughter, (C) any attempt, solicitation, or conspiracy to commit murder, (D) assault with intent to kill, (E) assault with intent to 1804 and 22-1804a potentially increases the maximum punishment for any murder committed by a person with one or two prior convictions for certain offenses (including those currently as aggravating circumstances for first degree murder.)[107] By contrast, the penalty enhancement under subsection (d) omits this aggravating circumstance as unnecessary. The general penalty enhancement for recidivist conduct under RCC § 22E-606 provides for enhanced penalties.[108] Omitting this aggravating circumstance reduces unnecessary overlap between criminal statutes[109] and improves the proportionality of the offense by precluding prior convictions from enhancing penalties twice, both as an aggravating circumstance and under the separate recidivist enhancement.

Thirteenth, the penalty enhancements under paragraph (d)(3) include as an aggravating circumstance that the murder was committed for the purpose of harming the victim because of the victim's status as a law enforcement officer or public safety employee, or District official. Harm may include, but does not require bodily injury. Harm should be construed more broadly to include causing an array of adverse outcomes.[110] Under current law, an accused who knowingly causes the death of a law enforcement officer or public safety employee, with knowledge or reason to know that the victim was an on-duty law enforcement officer or public safety employee, or "on account of performance"[111] of the officer's or employee's official duties is guilty of a separate murder of a law enforcement officer offense. A separate penalty enhancement in current D.C. Code § 22-3602 increases the maximum punishment for any murder by one and a half times when the murder is of "a member of a citizen patrol ("member") while that member is participating in a citizen patrol, or because of the member's participation in a citizen patrol."[112] A separate offense criminalizes harming District officials or employees and their family members.[113] By contrast, penalty enhancements under subsection (d) include as an aggravating circumstance that the murder was committed with the purpose of harming the victim because of the victim's status as a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or District official. Inclusion of this this aggravating circumstance replaces the murder of a law enforcement officer offense that exists under current law.[114] Use of the RCC's "law enforcement officer" definition also changes current law by including certain types of officers that are not included under the current murder of a law enforcement officer statute.[115] This aggravating circumstance covers only a subset of District employees—District officials—and does not include citizen patrol members, consistent with other provisions in the RCC.[116] Including this aggravating circumstance, and eliminating the separate murder of a law enforcement officer, reduces unnecessary overlap between criminal statutes and improves the clarity and consistency of the revised code.

[108] The repeat offender penalty enhancement under RCC § 22E-606 requires that the actor committed a prior felony within ten years of commission of the second felony. In contrast, the repeat offender enhancement for murder under D.C. Code § 22-2104.01 does not require that the murder be committed within ten years of the prior felony.

[109] It is unclear whether under current District law, a defendant may be sentenced under both the general recidivist enhancement, and this aggravating circumstance based on the same prior conviction. It is possible that only one statute may apply to a particular murder, and if so there is no overlap issue. No case law exists on point.

[110] For example, if a person fires several shots above a District official's head with the purpose of frightening the official, and accidentally hits and kills the official, the aggravating factor under (c)(3)(B) may apply, even if the person did not have the purpose of causing bodily injury.

Fourteenth, the penalty enhancements under paragraph (d)(3) include as an aggravating circumstance that the accused was reckless as to the victim's status as a "protected person," a term defined under RCC § 22E-701, which includes "a law enforcement officer, while in the course of official duties", "public safety employee, while in the course of official duties," "transportation worker, while in the course of official duties," or a "District official, while in the course of official duties." Under current law, the aggravating circumstances that authorize a life sentence for murder do not include the victim's status as an on duty law enforcement officer, public safety employee, transportation worker, District official or employee, or citizen patrol member. However, separate statutes authorize enhanced penalties based on the victim's status as a specified transportation worker,[117] or status as a citizen patrol member.[118] Separate statutes also criminalize murder of a law enforcement officer engaged in official duties,[119] and harming District officials or employees and their family members as separate offenses.[120] By contrast, the penalty enhancements under subsection (d) include as an aggravating circumstance that the victim was a "protected person."[121] This term is defined to include persons vulnerable due to youth or old age, a specified transportation worker, or a law enforcement officer engaged in official duties, and replaces the current D.C. Code's separate penalty enhancements, and the murder of a law enforcement officer offense. Under the revised term, a victim's status as a member of a "citizen patrol" no longer is sufficient for an enhanced murder penalty. Including recklessness as to victim being a protected person as an aggravating circumstance, and eliminating the separate penalty enhancements, and the separate murder of a law enforcement officer improves the clarity and consistency of the revised code.

Fifteenth, the penalty enhancements under paragraph (d)(3), through use of the term "protected person," change the range of victims' ages that qualify as an aggravating circumstance. Under current law, three separate statutory provisions authorize heightened penalties for murder based on the age of the victim. Both first and second degree murder are punishable by a lifetime sentence if the victim was less than 12 years old or more than 60 years old.[122] Separate statutes allow for penalty enhancements of one and one half times the maximum authorized punishment for murder if the victim was 65 years of age or older[123], or less than 18 years of age if the perpetrator was at least 18 years of age and at least two years older than the victim.[124] By contrast, the penalty enhancements under subsection (d), through use of the term "protected person," include as aggravating circumstances that the victim was less than 18 years old—if the actor is at least 18 years old and at least 4 years older than the complainant—or the victim was 65 years or older—when the actor is under the age of 65 and at least 10 years younger than the complainant.[125] This aggravating circumstance replaces both the age based aggravating circumstances under current law, and the separate statutory penalty enhancements based on the victim's age, insofar as they apply to murder. This change in law improves the consistency of the current and revised code.

Sixteenth, the revised murder statute does not provide enhanced penalties for committing murder while armed with a dangerous weapon. Under current law, murder is subject to heightened penalties if the accused committed the offense "while armed" or "having readily available" a dangerous weapon.[126] In contrast, under the revised statute, committing murder while armed does not increase the severity of penalties. As a practical matter, nearly all murders involve a dangerous weapon, and raising the gradation of murder in all instances using a dangerous weapon would increase liability significantly compared to the current murder statute. Moreover, as a practical matter, it is unclear whether the current code's separate weapon enhancement significantly affect sentences for murder. This change improves the proportionality of the revised code, as murder while armed does not inflict greater harm than unarmed murder, and therefore does not warrant heightened penalty.

Seventeenth, the penalty enhancements under paragraph (d)(3) do not require separate written notice and a separate hearing as is required under D.C. Code § 22-2104.01(a), or a separate written notice prior as is required under § 22-403.01(b-2)(A). Under current law, § 22-2104(a) requires that the government notify the accused in writing at least 30 days prior to trial if intends to seek a sentence of life imprisonment without release.[127] When the government alleges that aggravating circumstances enumerated under § 22-2104.01 were present, a separate sentencing proceeding must be held "as soon as practicable after the trial has been completed to determine whether to impose a sentence of more than 60 years[.]"[128] Following the hearing, if the sentencing court wishes to impose a sentence greater than 60 years, a finding in writing must state whether, beyond a reasonable doubt, one or more aggravating circumstances exist.[129] In addition, if the government intends to rely on the aggravating circumstances listed under § 24-403.01(b-2) it must file an indictment or information at least thirty days prior to trial or a guilty plea that states in "writing one or more aggravating circumstances to be relied upon."[130] D.C. Code §24-403.01(b-2) does not specify whether a separate sentencing hearing must be held. By contrast, the revised murder statute eliminates the special requirements under D.C. Code § 22-2104.01(a), (c) and § 24-403.01(b-2)(A) that relate to sentences for murder.[131] Under the revised murder statute, proof of at least one aggravating circumstance is still an element which must be alleged in the indictment[132] and proven beyond a reasonable doubt at trial.[133] The factfinder is not required to separately produce a written finding that at least one aggravating circumstance was proven beyond a reasonable doubt, however, nor is the hearing described in current law required.[134] However, eliminating the statutory notice and hearing requirements applicable to the current District murder statutes does not change applicable Sixth Amendment law which, since the District adopted its statutory notice requirements, has expanded to require proof beyond a reasonable doubt of facts that subject a person to a higher statutory penalty.[135] This change improves the clarity of the criminal code.

The revised murder statute does not specifically address the effect of an appellate determination that the burden of proof was not met with respect to an aggravating circumstance that was the basis for the conviction. Current D.C. Code § 22-2104.01(d) provides that if a trial court is reversed on appeal due to "an error only in the separate sentencing procedure, any new proceeding before the trial court shall only pertain to the issue of sentencing."[136] However, this provision is unnecessary as the revised murder statute does not require any separate sentencing proceeding. If a conviction for murder with a sentencing enhancement is reversed on appeal on grounds that only relate to one of the aggravating circumstances, the appellate court may order entry of judgment as to first degree or second degree murder.[137]

[137] Under the RCC, first and second degree murder are lesser included offenses of those respective degrees of murder that are subject to a sentencing enhancement under the elements test set forth in Byrd v. United States, 598 A.2d 386 (D.C.1991) (en banc). The sentencing enhancement can only apply if the elements of first or second degree murder have been proven. The revised murder statute does not change current District law that allows an appellate court to order entry of judgment as to a lesser included offense if conviction of a greater offense is reversed on grounds that only pertain to elements unique to the greater offense. Gathy v. United States, 754 A.2d 912, 919 (D.C. 2000).

Eighteenth, the revised murder statute bars accomplice liability for felony murder.[138] Under current District case law, "[a]ccomplices also are liable for felony murder if the killing . . . [is] a natural and probable consequence of acts done in the perpetration of the felony."[139] In contrast, under the revised murder statute, a person may not be convicted as an accomplice to felony murder as defined in paragraph (b)(3). Absent this rule, an accomplice to the predicate felony who does not intend or know that anyone will be killed, could be convicted as an accomplice to murder based on a killing perpetrated by a co-felon. This change improves the proportionality of the revised offense by matching the actor's liability to the actor's true degree of culpability.

Beyond these eighteen changes to current District law, ten other aspects of the revised murder statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised murder statute recognizes that acting under an "extreme emotional disturbance for which there is a reasonable cause" constitutes a mitigating circumstance, and serves as a partial defense to murder. Although current District murder statutes make no mention of mitigating circumstances, the DCCA has held that a person commits voluntary manslaughter when he or she causes the death of another with a mental state that would constitute murder, except for the presence of mitigating circumstances.[140] The DCCA has not clearly defined what constitutes a "mitigating [138] At least one state bars application of felony murder when the defendant did not commit the lethal act. E.g., Cal. Penal Code § 189 (e) ("A participant in the perpetration or attempted perpetration of a felony listed in subdivision (a) in which a death occurs is liable for murder only if one of the following is proven: (1) The person was the actual killer. (2) The person was not the actual killer, but, with the intent to kill, aided, abetted, counseled, commanded, induced, solicited, requested, or assisted the actual killer in the commission of murder in the first degree. (3) The person was a major participant in the underlying felony and acted with reckless indifference to human life, as described in subdivision (d) of Section 190.2."). Other states provide affirmative defenses in cases where the defendant did not commit the lethal act; Wash. Rev. Code Ann. § 9A.32.030 ("Except that in any prosecution under [for felony murder] in which the defendant was not the only participant in the underlying crime, if established by the defendant by a preponderance of the evidence, it is a defense that the defendant: (i) Did not commit the homicidal act or in any way solicit, request, command, importune, cause, or aid the commission thereof; and (ii) Was not armed with a deadly weapon, or any instrument, article, or substance readily capable of causing death or serious physical injury; and (iii) Had no reasonable grounds to believe that any other participant was armed with such a weapon, instrument, article, or substance; and (iv) Had no reasonable grounds to believe that any other participant intended to engage in conduct likely to result in death or serious physical injury."). California's murder statute includes two exceptions to the rule that felony murder requires that the defendant was the "actual killer." Felony murder liability may apply if the defendant either 1) had intent to kill, aided and abetted the actual killer in the commission of the murder; or 2) was a "major participant in the underlying felony and acted with reckless indifference to human life." The revised murder statute does not include these exceptions to the general rule that felony murder requires that the accused must commit the lethal act. However, a defendant in either of these cases could still be liable for murder under alternate theories. If a defendant acts with intent to kill, and aids and abets another person in committing the lethal act, the defendant may still be liable for murder as an accomplice under the rules set forth in RCC § 22E-210. Alternatively, if a defendant who acts with extreme indifference to human life may still be liable for second degree murder under a depraved heart theory.

If the government fails to meet this burden, but proves all other elements of murder, the defendant may only be found guilty of voluntary manslaughter.

circumstance," but has held that mitigating circumstances include an accused "act[ing] in the heat of passion caused by adequate provocation."[141] Under common law, cases interpreting what constituted adequate provocation came to recognize "fixed categories of conduct"[142] that "the law recognized as sufficiently provocative to mitigate"[143] murder to the lesser offense of manslaughter.[144]

In contrast, the RCC's murder statute states that acting under "extreme emotional disturbance" is a mitigating circumstance, thereby adopting the modern approach to provocation, which is more flexible in determining which circumstances are sufficient to mitigate murder to manslaughter.[145] This modern approach "does not provide specific categories of acceptable or unacceptable provocatory conduct."[146] Instead of being limited to the "fixed categories" that have been previously recognized by courts, the modern approach more generally inquires whether the "provocation is that which would cause . . . a reasonable man . . . to become so aroused as to kill another"[147] such that "the actor's loss of self-control can be understood in terms that arouse sympathy in the ordinary citizen."[148] Consistent with this modern approach, under subsection (f) of the revised murder statute, it is possible to mitigate homicides from murder to manslaughter even under circumstances that have not been traditionally recognized at common law.[149]

One notable change from the common law of provocation is that an "extreme emotional disturbance" need not have been caused wholly or in part by the decedent in order to be adequate.[150] For example, consider a case in which the accused discovers that his neighbor has killed the accused's spouse, and in a fit of rage, the accused kills a third person who attempted to protect the neighbor. Under the traditional common law approach, since the third party was not responsible for provoking the accused, mitigation [149] For example, at common law, and under current DCCA case law, mere words alone are inadequate provocation. See Brown, 584 A.2d at 540 (D.C. 1990); D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 4-202; Lafave, Wayne. 2 Subst. Crim. L. § 15.2 (3d ed.). However, under the "extreme emotional disturbance" formulation, it is at least possible that mere words, if sufficiently provocative, could constitute a reasonable cause for an extreme emotional disturbance.

[150] Commentary to MPC § 210.3 at 49.

would be unavailable. Under the "extreme emotional disturbance" rule however, it is at least possible that the homicide could be mitigated downwards to manslaughter. Despite its differences, the modern approach in many ways is similar to the common law approach. Under both approaches, the accused must have acted with an emotional state that would cause a person to become so "aroused as to kill another"[151] or that would "naturally induce a reasonable man in the passion of the moment to lose self-control and commit the act on impulse and without reflection."[152] Further, under both approaches, the reasonableness of the accused's reaction to the provoking circumstance is determined from the accused's view of the facts.[153]

It is unclear whether adopting the modern "extreme emotional disturbance" approach changes current District law.[154] Although the DCCA has long used the traditional "adequate provocation" formulation[155], the Court has also noted that while under the common law, "there grew up a process of pigeon-holing provocative conduct . . . [o]ur own law of provocation in the District of Columbia began with a general formulation similar to the modern view[.]"[156] Instead of being bound by common law precedent defining specific fact patterns that constitute adequate provocation, the District may already embrace the more flexible modern approach that "does not provide specific categories of acceptable or unacceptable provocatory conduct."[157] Ultimately the DCCA has not fully reconciled its "recognition (or non-recognition) of the Model Penal Code"[158] approach to provocation, and so it is unclear how adopting the modern approach changes current law.[159]

The RCC revised murder statute's adoption of the "extreme emotional disturbance" language improves the proportionality of the criminal code by allowing courts to recognize mitigating circumstance that may not have long-standing common law precedent, but nonetheless meaningfully reduce the accused's culpability. This flexibility allows courts to mitigate murder to first degree manslaughter to reflect the accused's reduced culpability when appropriate.

Second, the revised murder statute recognizes that "acting with an unreasonable belief that the use of deadly force was necessary to prevent a person from unlawfully causing death or serious bodily injury" constitutes a mitigating circumstance. Under this language, the actor need not have believed that the decedent would unlawfully cause death or serious bodily injury.[160] There is no DCCA case law on point as to whether mitigation applies if the actor believed that the use of lethal force was necessary to prevent someone other than the decedent from causing death or serious bodily injury.[161] The revised statute clarifies that mitigation applies in these circumstances.

Third, the revised murder offense may change current District law by explicitly including any other legally-recognized partial defenses, apart from imperfect self-defense, or defense of others, as a mitigating circumstance.[162] While the District's murder statutes are silent as to the relevance or definition of mitigating circumstances, DCCA case law has recognized that mitigating circumstances may be found in situations besides imperfect self-defense or defense of others.[163] However, the DCCA has not specified when the use of deadly force is justified in other circumstances,[164] and whether mitigation would be available for mistakes as to those justifications. By contrast, the RCC specifically recognizes that any other legally-recognized partial defense which substantially diminishes either the accused's culpability or the wrongfulness of the accused's conduct constitute mitigating circumstances. For example, if lethal force may be justified under certain circumstances, even absent the fear of death or serious bodily harm, then an unreasonable belief that those circumstances existed could constitute a mitigating circumstance.[165] The RCC's recognition of mitigation in situations besides imperfect self-defense or defense of others clarifies the revised murder statutes while leaving to courts the precise contours of such mitigating circumstances. Explicitly recognizing these partial defenses as mitigating circumstances improves the proportionality of the offense, by allowing courts to recognize mitigation when appropriate to reflect the accused's reduced culpability.

[160] For example, if A shoots at B, unreasonably believing that B is threatening to kill A, but misses and hits bystander C, the offense could be mitigated from murder to voluntary manslaughter.

[161] Commentators have long recognized that "if the circumstances of the killing are such that it would have been manslaughter had the blow fallen on and killed the intended victim, it will also result in manslaughter if a third person is killed." Homicide by Unlawful Act Aimed at Another, 18 A.L.R. 917 (Originally published in 1922). It does not appear that the DCCA has squarely addressed whether perfect self defense applies when an actor reasonably believes that the use of lethal force is necessary to prevent a person from causing death or serious injury, and accidentally kills a bystander. See, Commonwealth v. Fowlin, 710 A.2d 1130, 1131 (Pa. 1998) (holding that defendant who shot assailant in self defense, and also struck innocent bystander may not be held criminally liable for injuries to the bystander).

[163] Comber, 584 A.2d at 41 ("mitigation may also be found in other circumstances, such as "when excessive force is used in self-defense or in defense of another and '[a] killing [is] committed in the mistaken belief that one may be in mortal danger.'"). It is possible that mitigation exists in some cases in which a person uses lethal force to prevent significant, but not serious, bodily injury.

[164] But see, Evans v. United States, 277 F.2d 354, 356 (D.C. Cir. 1960) (reversing conviction for second degree murder when trial court did not allow evidence of decedent's intoxication when defendant claimed she was "defending herself from a sexual assault.").

[165] For example, it is unclear if a person may use lethal force to prevent a sexual assault, absent fear of death or serious bodily harm. However, if repelling sexual assault justifies the use of lethal force, then a genuine but unreasonable belief that lethal force was necessary to repel a sexual assault could constitute a mitigating circumstance. See generally, Christine R. Essique, The Use of Deadly Force by Women Against Rape in Michigan: Justifiable Homicide?, 37 Wayne L. Rev. 1969 (1991).

Fourth, in the revised second degree murder offense, felony murder requires that the accused negligently cause the death of another. While the current statute is clear that intent to cause death is not required, DCCA case law has not clearly stated whether strict liability as to death is sufficient. Some case law suggests no culpable mental state is necessary,[166] while at least one en banc decision suggests that a mental state of negligence is required.[167] The RCC second degree murder statute clarifies this ambiguity by requiring negligence as to causing death of another. To the extent that requiring negligence may change current District case law, this change would improve the proportionality of the statute by ensuring a person who was not even negligent as to the death of another could not be punished for murder.[168] A person who was not even negligent as to death does not share the relatively high culpability that justifies murder liability for unintentionally causing the death of another while committing a specified felony.

Fifth, under the revised second degree murder offense, felony murder liability does not exist if the person killed was an accomplice to the predicate felony.[169] Current statutory language and DCCA case law do not clarify whether a person can be convicted of felony murder when the decedent was an accomplice to the predicate felony.[170] The RCC second degree murder statute resolves this ambiguity under current law, and, to the extent it may change law, improves the proportionality of the offense. Under the revised offense, felony murder would provide greater punishment only for victims of the predicate offense or other innocent bystanders who are killed during the commission or attempted commission of an enumerated felony. When the decedent was an accomplice to the underlying offense, he or she assumed the risk in taking part in an inherently [166] For example, the DCCA has held that "[t]he government need not establish that the killing was intended or even foreseeable." Bonhart v. United States, 691 A.2d 160, 162 (D.C. 1997). Notably, however, it appears that in every instance where the DCCA has applied this principle, the accused does indeed appear to have acted negligently as to the death of the victim.

[167] The en banc court in Wilson-Bey stated that the felony murder doctrine applies "in the case of a reasonably foreseeable killing, without a showing that the defendant intended to kill the decedent, if the homicide was committed in the course of one of several enumerated felonies." Wilson-Bey v. United States, 903 A.2d 818, 838 (D.C. 2006). Other statements in the Wilson-Bey decision strongly suggest that "reasonably foreseeable" is the practical equivalent of criminal negligence. The opinion quotes the Model Penal Code, "To say that the accomplice is liable if the offense . . . is 'reasonably foreseeable' or the 'probable consequence' of another crime is to make him liable for negligence, even though more is required in order to convict the principal actor. This is both incongruous and unjust."

[168] Even if this revision constitutes a change to current law, the practical effect of this change likely would be slight. Negligently causing death of another requires that the defendant failed to regard a substantial risk of death, and that the defendant's conduct was a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of care. Even if strict liability suffices, felony murder still requires that the defendant committed or attempted to commit an inherently dangerous felony. These enumerated felonies will very often create a substantial risk of death, and constitute a gross deviation. Fact patterns in which a defendant commits or attempts to commit an enumerated felony, and proximately causes the death of another, but do not also satisfy the requirements of negligence are unlikely to occur.

[169] For example, if in the course of committing an armed robbery, the defendant's gun accidentally fires and fatally wounds his accomplice who was acting as a lookout, the defendant could not be convicted of felony murder based on the accomplice's death.

[170] Numerous other jurisdictions do not apply the felony murder doctrine when the decedent was an accomplice or participant in the underlying felony. Alaska Stat. Ann. § 11.41.110; N.J. Stat. Ann. § 2C:11-3; N.Y. Penal Law § 125.25; Or. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 163.115; Wash. Rev. Code Ann. § 9A.32.030.

dangerous felony, and the negligent death of such a person does not warrant as severe a punishment.

Sixth, under the revised second degree murder statute, felony murder requires that the lethal act be committed by the accused.[171] Current statutory language and DCCA case law do not clarify whether a person can be convicted of felony murder when someone other than the accused committed the lethal act, although case law suggests that a person may not be convicted as a principal to felony murder if that person did not actually commit the lethal act.[172] The revised second degree murder offense resolves this ambiguity under current law by requiring the actor commit the lethal act for felony murder liability. It is disproportionately severe to punish a person for murder when another person commits the lethal act (assuming the person does not satisfy the requirements for accomplice liability with respect to a form of murder that requires a greater degree of culpability).[173] This change improves the proportionality of the revised statutes.

Seventh, the revised second degree murder offense does not criminalize unintentionally causing the death of another while committing or attempting to commit a felony that is not specified in the statute. Although the current first degree murder statute's felony murder provisions do not specifically provide for such liability, the DCCA has stated that it is unclear if second degree murder liability applies to a non-purposeful killing that occurs during the commission of a non-enumerated felony.[174] The revised second degree murder statute resolves this ambiguity by clarifying that unintentionally causing the death of another person while committing or attempting to [171] For example, if in the course of robbery, the intended robbery victim lawfully defends himself by firing shots at the robber and accidentally hits and kills a bystander, the robber himself cannot be convicted of felony murder based on the death of that bystander. Further, if the use of force by the intended robbery victim was unlawful, the robber's liability for that unlawful use of force is governed by RCC § 22E-1201. However, this limitation of the felony murder rule does not preclude murder liability anytime a non-participant's voluntary act contributes to the death of another. See Bonhart v. United States, 691 A.2d 160 (D.C. 1997) (affirming felony murder conviction when defendant committed arson, and victim ran back into burning building to rescue his property).

[172] Lee v. United States, 699 A.2d 373, 384 (D.C. 1997) ("Since he was not the actual triggerman, he must be deemed an aider and abettor in order to be convicted.").

[173] Three states have gone further and entirely abolished the felony murder rule. Hawaii and Kentucky have abolished the felony murder rule by statute. Haw. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 707-701; Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 507.020. The Michigan Supreme Court abolished the doctrine. People v. Aaron, 299 N.W.2d 304, 326 (Mich. 1980) ("We believe that it is no longer acceptable to equate the intent to commit a felony with the intent to kill, intent to do great bodily harm, or wanton and willful disregard of the likelihood that the natural tendency of a person's behavior is to cause death or great bodily harm."). In addition, other states that have retained the felony murder rule require a higher degree of culpability than required under the RCC. For example, New Hampshire's first degree murder offense requires that the defendant knowingly caused the death of another while committing or enumerated felony. N.H. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 630:1-a. Alternatively, New Hampshire's second degree murder statute creates a presumption that the defendant acted recklessly with extreme indifference to human life if "the actor causes death by the use of a deadly weapon in the commission of, or in an attempt to commit, or in immediate flight after committing or attempting to commit any class A felony." N.H. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 630:1-b.

[174] In Comber v. United States, the DCCA noted that "[w]hat remains unclear in the District of Columbia is the status of one who commits a non-purposeful killing in the course of a [felony not enumerated in the first degree murder statute]."[174] commit any unspecified felony is not criminalized as murder under the RCC.[175] To the extent that it may change current law, eliminating second degree murder liability for non-purposeful felony murder predicated on any felony offense also improves the proportionality of the RCC. Punishing unintentionally causing death of another while committing or attempting to commit any felony as murder, regardless of the inherent dangerousness of the felony would be disproportionately severe.[176]

Eighth, the enhanced penalty provisions recognize as aggravating circumstances that that the accused knowingly subjected the decedent to extreme physical pain or mental suffering prior to the victim's death, or mutilated or desecrated the decedent's body. Under current law, first degree murder is subject to enhanced penalties if the murder "was especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel."[177] The phrase "especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel" (EHAC) is not statutorily defined and case law is unclear as to its meaning.[178] The DCCA has held that a murder may be EHAC if it involves inflicting substantial physical pain or mental anguish prior to death,[179] but substantial physical or mental suffering may not be necessary. The Court has recognized that EHAC does "not focus exclusively upon the sensations of the victim before death."[180] For example, the DCCA has recognized that a murder involving mutilation of body parts, regardless of whether this inflicted additional suffering on the victim, can render a murder EHAC.[181] The DCCA also has stated that a murder may be EHAC if the killing is unprovoked,[182] if the accused did not deny his role in the killing,[183] if the murder involved a violation of trust,[184] if the accused's motive for the murder was to avoid returning to prison,[185] or if the murder was committed "for the fun of it."[186] However, although the DCCA has [175] Depending on the facts of the case, such an unintentional killing may be prosecuted as manslaughter or negligent homicide.

[176] This is especially true given the modern expansion of the criminal code. The felony murder rule originates in English common law, and developed at a time when English law only recognized a small number of inherently dangerous felonies. recognized these circumstances as relevant to determining whether a murder is EHAC, the DCCA has never held that these circumstances alone render a murder EHAC. In these cases, the murder also involved infliction of substantial physical or mental suffering, or both.[187]

The RCC enhanced penalty provision more clearly identifies murders involving extreme and prolonged physical or mental suffering prior to death, or mutilation or desecration of the body, as subject to heightened penalties. Other circumstances referenced in DCCA descriptions of EHAC that do not involve substantial physical or mental suffering, or mutilation or desecration of the body do not increase penalties for murder unless they satisfy another enumerated aggravating circumstance. Specifying that inflicting extreme physical pain or mental suffering, or mutilating or desecrating the body are aggravating circumstances improves the clarity of the code, and, to the extent it may change current law, helps to ensure proportionate penalties. The current EHAC formulation is vague, and creates the possibility of arbitrariness in sentencing. As the DCCA has noted, all murders "are to some degree heinous, atrocious, and cruel"[188] and the difficulty in distinguishing those murders that are especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel can lead to arbitrary and disproportionate results.[189] By omitting the vague EHAC formulation, the enhanced penalty provision improves penalty proportionality by more clearly defining the class of murders that warrant heightened punishment.

Ninth, through reference to the term "protected person," the RCC enhanced penalty provision applies recklessness as to whether the decedent is a law enforcement officer or public safety employee engaged in the course of his or her official duties. The current murder of a law enforcement statute[190] criminalizes intentionally causing the death of another "with knowledge or reason to know that the victim is a law enforcement officer or public safety employee" while that officer or employee is "engaged in . . . performance of such officer's or employee's official duties[.]"[191] Although the DCCA has clearly held that actual knowledge that the victim was a law enforcement officer or public safety employee is not required[192], the DCCA has not further specified the mental state as to whether the officer or employee was engaged in performance of official duties. RCC subparagraph (c)(3)(A) of the revised murder statute resolves this ambiguity and requires that the accused caused the death of another with recklessness as to whether the decedent was a law enforcement officer or public safety employee in the course of his or her official duties. Specifying a recklessness mental state improves the clarity of the criminal code by resolving this ambiguity under current District law, and is consistent with the culpable mental state requirement for other offenses in the RCC based on the decedent being a protected person.[193]

Tenth, through the definition of "protected person" the revised statute recognizes as an aggravating circumstance that the accused was reckless as to the victim being a "vulnerable adult." Under current law, it is an aggravating circumstance to first degree murder (but not second degree) that the victim is a "especially vulnerable due to age or a mental or physical infirmity."[194] Similarly, it is an aggravating circumstance to second degree murder (but not first degree) that the victim is "vulnerable because of mental or physical infirmity."[195] No current statute, nor DCCA case law, however, clarifies what types of mental or physical infirmities are required to be proven per this language. The relevant statutes are silent and there is no case law on what, if any, culpable mental state is required as to these circumstances under current District law. However, in the RCC murder statutes the penalty enhancements under subsection (c) include as an aggravating circumstance to both first and second degree murder that the victim a "vulnerable adult."[196] This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the RCC, by reflecting the special status these individuals have elsewhere in current District law,[197] and by making enhancement for murder consistent with enhancements for RCC offenses.[198]

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change District law.

First, the revised statute eliminates as a distinct form of first degree murder causing the death of another by means of poison. Current District statutory language states that a person commits first degree murder if he or she "kills another purposely . . . by means of poison[.]." This statutory language is superfluous. Virtually any purposeful murder by means of poison would involve premeditation and deliberation. This change improves the clarity of the revised first degree murder statute.

Second, the revised statute eliminates any statutory reference to the accused being "of sound memory and discretion." Current District statutory language states that "[w]hoever, being of sound memory and discretion" kills another with the requisite mens rea is "guilty of murder in the first degree."[199] Yet, under current law, it is not an element of first degree murder that the accused was "of sound memory and discretion."[200] Rather, the words "of sound memory and discretion" only refers to the basic requirement of legal sanity.[201] Under the RCC this statutory language is superfluous. The accused's sanity remains a general defense to all crimes, not just first degree murder. This change improves the clarity of the revised murder statute.

Third, the revised second degree murder offense explicitly codifies causing the death of another knowingly, or recklessly with extreme indifference to human life (commonly called "depraved heart murder"). The current second degree murder statute only defines the offense as killing another person "with malice aforethought."[202] However, the DCCA has recognized that "malice aforethought" is a common law term of art that encompasses multiple distinct mental states, including intentionally causing the death of another, and depraved heart malice.[203] The revised statute abandons this archaic legal term of art and instead specifies that causing the death of another knowingly, or recklessly with extreme indifference to human life constitutes second degree murder. This language is not intended to change any current DCCA case law with respect to "depraved heart murder."

Fourth, the revised second degree murder offense does not specifically criminalize acting with intent to cause serious bodily harm, and thereby causing the death of another. Under current District case law, a person commits second degree murder if he causes the death of another without intent to cause death, but with intent to cause "serious bodily harm."[204] However, under the revised second degree murder offense, causing death by engaging in conduct with intent to commit serious bodily injury is still criminalized as second degree murder because it constitutes depraved heart murder under paragraph (b)(2). The current second degree murder statute's reference to acting with intent to cause serious bodily harm and thereby killing a person is superfluous to the revised second degree murder offense and its elimination clarifies the statute.

Fifth, the revised second degree murder statute includes first degree assault as a predicate offense for felony murder. The current first degree murder statute includes

The formulation of murder requiring that the defendant be of "sound memory and discretion" dates at least as far back as 17th century England. Michael H. American courts dating back to the 19th century have interpreted the words "sound memory and discretion" as referring to the basic requirement of legal sanity. E.g., Davis v. United States, 160 U.S. 469, 484 (1895) ("All this is implied in the accepted definition of murder, for it is of the very essence of that heinous crime that it be committed by a person of 'sound memory and discretion[.]' . . . "mayhem" as a predicate offense for felony murder. The RCC's first degree assault statute is analogous to "mayhem" under the D.C. Code. Replacing "mayhem" with first degree assault as a predicate offense for felony murder is not intended to change current District law.

Sixth, subsection (h) of the revised murder statute specifies that convictions for felony second degree murder under paragraph (b)(3) and a predicate felony listed under subparagraphs (b)(3)(A) – (b)(3)(H) merge. This clarification is consistent with current District law.[205] Subsection (h) does not otherwise address merger. Subject to the general merger provision in RCC § 22E-214, an actor may be convicted of another type of murder (e.g. first degree or second degree under paragraph (b)(1) or (b)(2)) and a predicate felony listed under subparagraphs (b)(3)(A) – (b)(3)(H) arising from a single act or course of conduct.

RCC § 22E-1102. Manslaughter.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the voluntary and involuntary manslaughter offenses for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). A person commits voluntary manslaughter if he or she causes the death of another in a manner that would otherwise constitute murder, but for the presence of mitigating circumstances. Intentionally causing the death of another person, killing another person recklessly with extreme indifference to human life, or negligently in the course of and in furtherance of specified felonies constitutes voluntary manslaughter where there are mitigating circumstances. Purposely causing the death of another would also constitute voluntary manslaughter where there are mitigating circumstances. However, the presence of mitigating circumstances is not a required element of voluntary manslaughter, and in a voluntary manslaughter prosecution the government is not required to prove that mitigating circumstances were present. Rather, the presence of mitigating circumstances is a defense to murder that, if proven, lowers the charge to manslaughter.

The RCC voluntary manslaughter offense replaces, in part, the current manslaughter statute, D.C. Code §22-2105. A person commits involuntary manslaughter if he or she, at a minimum, recklessly causes the death of another person. The RCC involuntary manslaughter offense replaces, in part, the current manslaughter statute, D.C. Code §22-2105. Specifically, the RCC involuntary manslaughter offense replaces the two types of involuntary manslaughter recognized under current District case law: criminal negligence manslaughter,[1] and misdemeanor manslaughter.[2] Insofar as they are applicable to current manslaughter offenses, the revised manslaughter statute also partly replaces the protection of District public officials statute[3] and six penalty enhancements: the enhancement for committing an offense while armed;[4] the enhancement for senior citizens;[5] the enhancement for citizen patrols;[6] the enhancement for minors;[7] the enhancement for taxicab drivers;[8] and the enhancement for transit operators and Metrorail station managers.[9]

Subsection (a) specifies three forms of voluntary manslaughter. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that an actor commits voluntary manslaughter if the actor knowingly causes the death of another person. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that the culpable mental state "knowingly" applies, a term defined at RCC § 22E-206 to mean that the accused must have been aware or believed to a practical certainty that he or she would cause the death of another person.

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies that a person commits voluntary manslaughter if that person recklessly, with extreme indifference for human life, causes the death of another. This subsection requires a "reckless" culpable mental state, a term defined at RCC § 22E-

206, which here requires that the accused consciously disregards a substantial risk of causing death of another, and the risk is of such a nature and degree that, considering the nature of and motivation for the person's conduct and the circumstances the person is aware of, its disregard is a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct. However, recklessness alone is insufficient. The accused must also act "with extreme indifference to human life." This form of voluntary manslaughter is identical to the "depraved heart"[10] version of second degree murder,[11] although the presence of a mitigating circumstance is a defense to this form of second degree murder. In contrast to the "substantial" risks required for ordinary recklessness, depraved heart murder (and voluntary manslaughter) requires that the accused consciously disregarded an "extreme risk of causing death or serious bodily injury."[12] For example, the DCCA has recognized there to be extreme indifference to human life when a person caused the death of another by: driving at speeds in excess of 90 miles per hour, and turning onto a crowded onramp in an effort to escape police[13]; firing ten bullets towards an area where people were gathered[14]; and providing a weapon to another person, knowing that person would use it to injure a third person.[15] Although it is not possible to specifically define the degree and nature of risk that is "extreme," the "extreme indifference" language in subsection (b)(1) codifies DCCA case law that recognizes those types of unintentional homicides that warrant criminalization as second degree murder.

Although consciously disregarding an extreme risk of death or serious bodily injury is necessary for this form of voluntary manslaughter, it is not necessarily sufficient. There may be some instances in which a person causes the death of another person by consciously disregarding an extreme risk of death or serious bodily injury that do not constitute extreme indifference to human life. Whether an actor engages in conduct with extreme indifference to human life depends not only on the degree and nature of the risk consciously disregarded, but also on other factors that relate to the actor's culpability.

Specifically, the same factors that determine whether an actor's conscious disregard of a substantial risk is "a gross deviation" as required for ordinary recklessness[16] also bear on the determination of whether an actor's conscious disregard of an extreme risk of death or serious bodily injury manifests extreme indifference to human life. These factors are: (1) the extent to which the actor's disregard of the risk was intended to further any legitimate social objectives[17]; and (2) any individual or situational factors beyond the actor's control[18] that precluded his or her ability to exercise a reasonable level of concern for legally protected interests. In cases where these factors negate a finding that the actor exhibited extreme indifference to human life, a fact finder may nonetheless find that the actor behaved recklessly, provided that the actor's conduct was a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct.

Paragraph (a)(3) specifies that a person commits voluntary manslaughter if he or she negligently causes the death of another person, other than an accomplice,[19] while committing or attempting to commit one of the enumerated felonies. This form of voluntary manslaughter is identical to the felony murder version of second degree murder,[20] although the presence of mitigating circumstances is a defense to this form of murder. The statute specifies that a culpable mental state of "negligently" applies, a term defined at RCC § 22E-206 that here means that the actor should have been aware of a substantial risk that death would result from his or her conduct, and the risk is of such a nature and degree, that, considering the nature of and motivation for the person's conduct and the circumstances the person is aware of, the person's failure to perceive that risk is a gross deviation from the standard of care a reasonable person would take.[21] The negligently culpable mental state does not, however, apply to the enumerated felonies in subparagraphs (a)(3)(A)-(H). The defined term "in fact" indicates that there is no additional culpable mental state requirement for the enumerated felonies in paragraph (a)(3); each has its own culpable mental state requirements which must be proven. Also, it is not sufficient that a death happened to occur during the commission or attempted commission of the felony. The "mere coincidence in time" between the underlying felony and death is insufficient for felony murder liability.[22] There also must be "some causal connection between the homicide and the underlying felony."[23] The death must have been caused by an act "in furtherance" of the underlying felony.[24] The revised statute codifies this case law by requiring that the death be "in the course of and in

[17] For example, consider a person who causes a fatal car crash by driving at extremely high speeds as he rushes his child, who has suffered a painful compound fracture, to a hospital. The actor's intent to seek medical care and to alleviate his child's pain may weigh against finding that he acted with extreme indifference to human life.

[18] For example, consider a person who is habitually abused by her husband, who drives at extremely high speeds under threat of further abuse (insufficient to afford a duress defense) from her husband if she slows down. If that person then causes a fatal car crash, her emotional state and external coercion from her husband may weigh against finding that she acted with extreme indifference to human life.

[19] For example, if in the course of an armed robbery, the accused accidentally fires his gun, striking and killing his accomplice who was acting as a lookout, there would be no felony murder liability.

[20] See Commentary to RCC § 22E-1101.

[24] It is not required that the death itself facilitated commission or attempted commission of the predicate felony. Rather the lethal act must have facilitated commission or attempted commission of the predicate felony. For example, if during a robbery a defendant fires a gun in order to frighten the robbery victim, and accidentally hits and kills a bystander, felony murder liability is appropriate so long as the act of firing the gun facilitated the robbery.

furtherance of committing, or attempting to commit" an enumerated offense.[25] In addition, the lethal act must have been committed by the accused.[26] A person may not be convicted under paragraph (b)(3) for lethal acts committed by another person.

Subsection (b) specifies that a person commits involuntary manslaughter if he or she recklessly causes the death of another. The culpable mental state of recklessness, a term defined at RCC § 22E-206, requires that the accused was consciously aware of a substantial risk of causing death, and that the risk is of such a nature and degree that, considering the nature of and motivation for the person's conduct and the circumstances the person is aware of, its disregard is a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct.[27]

Subsection (c) specifies rules for imputing a conscious disregard of the risk required to prove that the person acted with extreme indifference to human life. Under the principles of liability governing intoxication under RCC § 22E-209, when an offense requires recklessness as to a result or circumstance, that culpable mental state may be imputed even if the person lacked actual awareness of a substantial risk due to his or her self-induced intoxication.[28] However, as discussed above, extreme indifference to human life in paragraph (a)(1) of the RCC murder statute requires that the person consciously disregarded an extreme risk of death or serious bodily injury, a greater degree of risk than is required for recklessness alone. While RCC § 22E-209 does not authorize fact finders to impute awareness of an extreme risk, this subsection specifies that a person shall be deemed to have been aware of an extreme risk required to prove that the person acted with extreme indifference to human life when the person was unaware of that risk due to self-induced intoxication, but would have been aware of the risk had the person been sober. The term "self-induced intoxication" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-209,[29] and the definition specifies certain culpable mental states that must be proven. The use of "in fact" in subsection (c) indicates that no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to the fact that the actor was unaware of the risk, but would have been aware of the risk had the actor been sober.

Even when a person's conscious disregard of an extreme risk of death or serious bodily injury is imputed under this subsection, in some instances the person may still not have acted with extreme indifference to human life. It is possible, though unlikely, that a [25] Causing death of another is in furtherance of the predicate felony if it facilitated commission or attempted commission of the felony, or avoiding apprehension or detection of the felony. E.g., Craig v. State, 14 S.W.3d 893, 899 (Ark. 2000) ("appellant should not have been charged with first-degree felony murder because he did not kill Jake McKinnon in the course of and in furtherance of committing or attempting to avoid apprehension for an independent felony"); Lovette v. State, 636 So. 2d 1304, 1307 (Fla. 1994) ("These killings lessened the immediate detection of the robbery and apprehension of the perpetrators and, thus, furthered that robbery.").

[26] For example, if during a robbery, police arrive at the scene and in an ensuing shootout the police fatally shoot a bystander, there would be no felony murder liability. However, this rule does not limit liability under any other form of homicide. If the person committing the robbery cause the death of the bystander in a manner that constituted recklessness with extreme indifference to human life, he may still be convicted of murder under a depraved heart theory, as specified in paragraph (b)(2).

[27] See Commentary to RCC § 22E-206.

[28] Imputation of recklessness under RCC § 22E-209 also requires that the person was negligent as to the result or circumstance.

[29] For further discussion of these terms, see Commentary to RCC § 22E-209.

person's self-induced intoxication is non-culpable, and weighs against finding that the person acted with extreme indifference to human life.[30] In these cases, although the awareness of risk may be imputed, the person could still be acquitted of voluntary manslaughter. However, finding that the person did not act with extreme indifference to human life does not preclude finding that the person acted recklessly as required for involuntary manslaughter[31], provided that his or her conduct was a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct.

Subsection (d) establishes the penalties for voluntary and involuntary manslaughter. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Paragraph (d)(3) provides enhanced penalties for both voluntary and involuntary manslaughter. If the government proves the presence of at least one aggravating factor listed under paragraph (d)(3), the penalty classification for voluntary and involuntary manslaughter may be increased in severity by one penalty class. These penalty

[30] This is perhaps clearest where a person's self-induced intoxication is pathological—i.e. "grossly excessive in degree, given the amount of the intoxicant, to which the actor does not know he is susceptible." Model Penal Code § 2.08(5)(c). The following hypothetical is illustrative. X consumes a single alcoholic beverage at an office holiday party, and immediately thereafter departs to the metro. While waiting for the train, X begins to experience an extremely high level of intoxication—unbeknownst to X, the drink has interacted with an allergy medication she is taking, thereby producing a level of intoxication ten times greater than what X normally experiences from that amount of alcohol. As a result, X has a difficult time standing straight, and ends up stumbling in another train-goer, V, who X fatally knocks onto the tracks just as the train is approaching. If X is subsequently charged with voluntary manslaughter on these facts, her self-induced state of intoxication—when viewed in light of the surrounding circumstances— may weigh against finding that she manifested extreme indifference to human life. It may be true that X, but for her intoxicated state, would have been more careful/aware of V's proximity. Nevertheless, X is only liable for voluntary manslaughter under the RCC if X's conduct manifested an extreme indifference to human life.

It is also possible, under narrow circumstances, for a person's self-induced intoxication to weigh in favor of finding the person's conduct was not a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct or care, even when it is not pathological. This is reflected in the situation of X, who consumes an extremely large amount of alcohol by herself on the second level of her two-story home. Soon thereafter, X's sister, V, makes an unannounced visit to X's home, lets herself in, and then announces that she's going to walk up to the second story to have a conversation with X. A few moments later, X stumbles into V at the top of the stairs, unaware of V's proximity, thereby causing V to fall to her death. If X is charged with voluntary manslaughter, under current law evidence of her self-induced intoxication could not be presented to negate the culpable mental state. Wheeler v. United States, 832 A.2d 1271, 1273 (D.C. 2003) (quoting Bishop v. United States, 71 App.D.C. 132, 107 F.2d 297 (D.C. Cir. 1939)). For example, the government's affirmative case might focus on the fact that an ordinary, reasonable (presumably sober) person in X's position would have possessed the subjective awareness required to establish extreme indifference to human life—whereas X might have difficulty persuading the factfinder that she lacked this subjective awareness without being able to point to her voluntarily intoxicated state. See, e.g., Larry Alexander, The Supreme Court, Dr. Jekyll, and the Due Process of Proof, 1996 Sup. Ct. Rev. 191, 200 (1996) (arguing that such an approach, in effect, creates a permissive, but unrebuttable presumption of mens rea in situations of self-induced intoxication); Sanford H. Kadish, Fifty Years of Criminal Law: An Opinionated Review, 87 Cal. L. Rev.943, 955 (1999) (arguing that "retain[ing] a mens rea requirement in the definition of the crime, but keep[ing] the defendant from introducing evidence to rebut its presence would, in effect, "rid[] the law of a culpability requirement").

enhancements may apply in addition to any penalty enhancements authorized by RCC Chapter 6.[32]

Subparagraph (d)(3)(A) specifies that recklessness as to whether the decedent is a protected person is an aggravating circumstance. Recklessness is defined at RCC § 22E-206, and requires that the accused was aware of a substantial risk that the decedent was a protected person, and that the risk is of such a nature and degree that, considering the nature of and motivation for the person's conduct and the circumstances the person is aware of, its disregard is a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct. The term "protected person" is defined in RCC § 22E-701.

Subparagraph (d)(3)(B) specifies that causing the death of another with the purpose of harming the decedent because of his or her status as a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or district official is an aggravating circumstance. This aggravating circumstance requires that the accused acted with "purpose" a term defined at RCC § 22E-206, which means that the actor must consciously desire to harm that person because of his or her status as a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or District official.[33] Harm may include, but does not require bodily injury. Harm should be construed more broadly to include causing an array of adverse outcomes.[34] "Law enforcement officer," "public safety employee," and "District official" are all defined terms in RCC § 22E-701. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with the purpose" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. Here, it is not necessary to prove that the complainant who was harmed was a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or District official, only that the actor consciously desired to harm a person of such a status.

Subsection (e) provides that a person cannot be held liable as an accomplice to felony murder, as defined in paragraph (a)(3).[35] This subsection does not limit application of any other form of homicide liability.[36]

Subsection (f) specifies that, while a person may be convicted of voluntary manslaughter under paragraph (a)(3) and a predicate felony listed in subparagraphs

[32] If general penalty enhancements under RCC §22E-606 or §22E-607 apply to this offense, the penalty for RCC §22E-606 and §22E-607 shall be based on the classification of the relevant unenhanced gradation of this offense.

[33] While the RCC § 22E-701 definitions of "law enforcement officer" and "public safety employee" refer to some persons only when on-duty (e.g., a campus officer), this provision on committing the offense with the purpose of harming the complainant because of their status as a law enforcement officer or public safety employee applies to committing the offense against an off-duty person based on their on-duty role. For example, a defendant who kills an off-duty police officer in retaliation for the officer arresting the defendant's friend would constitute committing manslaughter with the purpose of harming the decedent due to his status as a law enforcement officer.

[34] For example, if a person fires several shots above a police officer's head with the purpose of frightening the officer, and accidentally hits and kills the officer, the aggravating factor under (c)(3)(B) may apply, even if the person did not have the purpose of causing bodily injury.

[35] For example, if A is a getaway driver for B who robs a store, and during the course of the robbery B negligently kills the store clerk, A cannot be held liable as an accomplice to manslaughter committed by B.

[36] For example, if A is a getaway driver for B, who robs a store and intentionally kills the store clerk, A could be liable as an accomplice to B's intentional homicide, provided the requirements of accomplice liability are satisfied.

(a)(3)(A) - (a)(3)(H), the convictions for voluntary manslaughter and the predicate felony merge when arising from the same act or course of conduct. The court must follow the procedures in RCC § 22E-214 (b) and (c) to effect such a merger. However, convictions for a predicate felony listed in subparagraphs (a)(3)(A) - (a)(3)(H) and for involuntary manslaughter or voluntary manslaughter under paragraphs (a)(1) or (a)(2), do not merge under subsection (f). Subject to the general merger rules provided in RCC § 22E-214, multiple convictions for a predicate felony listed in subparagraphs (a)(3)(A) - (a)(3)(H) and for involuntary manslaughter or voluntary manslaughter under paragraphs (a)(1) or (a)(2) are permitted and, as usual, sentences may run concurrently or consecutively as prescribed by the sentencing judge.

Subsection (g) cross references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised manslaughter statute changes current law in six main ways, three of which track changes in the RCC murder statutes.[37]

First, the revised involuntary manslaughter offense replaces the "misdemeanor manslaughter" type of manslaughter liability with a requirement that requires that the accused recklessly caused the death of another. The current District manslaughter statute, D.C. Code §22-2105, does not distinguish degrees of manslaughter or otherwise specify the elements of the offense, including the culpable mental state required. However, the DCCA has held that one way a person commits involuntary manslaughter is if he or she causes the death of another person while committing or attempting to commit any offense that is "dangerous in and of itself,"[38] which requires that the offense creates "an inherent danger of physical injury[.]"[39] The DCCA has further required that the offense be committed "in a way which is dangerous under the particular circumstances of the case,"[40] meaning "the manner of its commission entails a reasonably foreseeable risk of appreciable injury."[41] In practice, this form of involuntary manslaughter in the current D.C. Code is called "misdemeanor manslaughter." By contrast, under the revised manslaughter statute there is no requirement that the accused committed or attempted to commit any other "dangerous" offense, only that the accused recklessly caused the death of another. Recklessness is defined under RCC § 22E-206, and requires that the accused [37] Under current law and the RCC, causing the death of another in a manner that constitutes murder also constitutes voluntary manslaughter, a lesser-included offense. Consequently, some RCC changes in the scope of murder liability accordingly change the scope of voluntary manslaughter.

[38] Walker, 380 A.2d at 1391.
[39] Comber, 584 A.2d at 50.
[40] Id. at 51. This additional restriction was adopted to avoid injustice in cases where the underlying offense is inherently dangerous in the abstract, but can be committed in non-violent ways. For example, simple assault may generally be deemed "dangerous in and of itself," but under current law a person can commit simple assault by making non-violent but unwanted physical contact with another person. Such a non-violent assault would not be committed "in a way which is dangerous under the particular circumstances of the case," and death resulting from a non-violent simple assault would not constitute misdemeanor manslaughter.
[41] Donaldson v. United States, 856 A.2d 1068, 1076 (D.C. 2004) (citing Comber, 584 A.2d at 49 n. 33). This requirement is intended to prevent injustice when "death freakishly results" from conduct that constitutes an inherently dangerous offense, such as simple assault, that can be committed in ways that do not create a foreseeable risk of appreciably injury. Comber, A.2d at 50.

consciously disregarded a substantial risk of death, and that the risk is of such a nature and degree that, considering the nature of and motivation for the person's conduct and the circumstances the person is aware of, its disregard is a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the criminal code by codifying a culpable mental state requirement using defined terms, and improves the proportionality of the homicide statutes by creating an intermediate offense between negligent and depraved heart killings.

Second, the revised involuntary manslaughter offense eliminates the "criminal negligence" type of involuntary manslaughter liability. The current District manslaughter statute, D.C. Code §22-2105, does not distinguish degrees of manslaughter or otherwise specify the elements of the offense, including the culpable mental state required. However, the DCCA, relying on common law precedent, has held that a second way a person commits involuntary manslaughter is if that person causes the death of another by engaging in conduct that creates an "extreme risk of death . . . under circumstances in which the actor should have been aware of the risk."[42] The DCCA has explained that "the only difference between risk-creating activity sufficient to sustain a 'depraved heart' murder conviction and [an involuntary manslaughter] conviction 'lies in the quality of [the actor's] awareness of the risk.'"[43] Whereas depraved heart murder requires that the accused consciously disregard the risk, negligent manslaughter only requires that the accused should have been aware of the risk.[44] By contrast, the revised manslaughter statute requires that the accused consciously disregarded a substantial, though not necessarily extreme, risk of death. In addition, the risk must be of such a nature and degree that, considering the nature of and motivation for the person's conduct and the circumstances the person is aware of, its disregard is a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct. However, it is not required that the accused acted with extreme indifference to human life. Negligently causing the death of another continues to be criminalized as negligent homicide, per RCC § 22E-1103. This change improves the proportionality of the revised homicide statutes by more finely grading the offense. Actors who are genuinely unaware of the risk they create, even extreme risks, are less culpable than those who are consciously aware of the risk they create.

Third, applying the general culpability principles for self-induced intoxication in RCC § 22E-209 allows a defendant to claim that due to intoxication, he or she did not form the awareness of risk required to act "recklessly, with extreme indifference to human life." However, subsection (c) allows a fact finder to impute awareness of the risk required to prove that the defendant acted with extreme indifference to human life, when the lack of awareness was due to self-induced intoxication. Although self-induced intoxication is generally culpable, and weighs in favor of finding that the person acted with extreme indifference to human life, it is possible, however unlikely, that self-induced intoxication reduces the blameworthiness, and negates finding that the person acted with extreme indifference to human life.[45]

Although the current manslaughter statute is silent as to the effect of self-induced intoxication, the DCCA has held that voluntary intoxication "is not a defense to voluntary manslaughter."[46] By contrast, although subsection (c) allows for imputation of the awareness of risk, in some rare cases, a defendant's self-induced intoxication may still negate finding that he or she acted with extreme indifference to human life, as required for voluntary manslaughter. This change improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

Fourth, the revised manslaughter statute includes multiple penalty enhancements based on the status of the decedent. The current District manslaughter statute, D.C. Code § 22-2105, does not itself provide for any enhanced penalties. However, various separate statutes in the current D.C. Code authorize enhanced penalties for manslaughter based on the victim's status, as a minor,[47] as an elderly adult[48], as a specified transportation worker,[49] or as a citizen patrol member.[50] A separate protection of District public officials offense also criminalizes harming a District official, or family member, while official is engaged in official duties, or on account of those duties.[51] By contrast, the RCC manslaughter offense incorporates penalty enhancements based on the status of the decedent. If a person commits voluntary or involuntary manslaughter, and was either reckless as to the victim being a "protected person," or had purpose to harm the victim because of the victim's status as a public safety employee or District official, the penalty classification for either offense may be increased by one penalty class. The term "protected person" is defined under RCC § 22E-701, and differs in scope in various respects from current law.[52] For example, a victim's status as a member of a "citizen patrol" no longer is sufficient for an enhanced manslaughter penalty. Because the various types of victim-specific enhancements applicable to manslaughter are all included in the penalty enhancement provision, it is not possible to "stack" enhancements based on the status of the victim. This improves the revised penalty's proportionality by ensuring the main offense elements and gradations are the primary determinants of penalties rather than stacked enhancements. Incorporating these various enhancements, and the offense for harming a District employee or official, into a single penalty enhancement provision also reduces unnecessary overlap and improves the clarity of the code.

Fifth, through the definition of "protected person," the revised manslaughter statute provides heightened penalties if the accused was reckless as to the decedent being a law enforcement officer or public safety employee engaged in the course of official duties,[53] or had purpose to harm the decedent because of the decedent's status as a law enforcement officer or public safety employee. Currently, there is no separate manslaughter of a law enforcement officer offense, or any separate statute that provides for enhanced penalties for manslaughter of a law enforcement officer or public safety employee. By contrast, the revised manslaughter statute provides for more severe penalties than first degree manslaughter when the victim was a law enforcement officer or public safety employee. This change improves the proportionality and consistency of the criminal code by ensuring that punishment is proportionate when manslaughter is committed against a law enforcement officer or public safety employee in a manner consistent with aggravating factors applied to other offenses against persons in the RCC.

Sixth, the revised manslaughter statute does not provide enhanced penalties for committing manslaughter while armed with a dangerous weapon. Under current law, manslaughter is subject to heightened penalties if the accused committed the offense "while armed" or "having readily available" a dangerous weapon.[54] In contrast, under the revised statute, committing manslaughter while armed does not increase the severity of penalties. This change improves the proportionality of the revised code, as manslaughter while armed does not inflict greater harm than unarmed manslaughter, and therefore does not warrant heightened penalty.

Beyond these six changes to current District law, nine other aspects of the revised manslaughter statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised manslaughter statute specifically includes felony murder as a form of voluntary manslaughter. The current District manslaughter statute, D.C. Code §22-2105, does not distinguish degrees of manslaughter or otherwise specify the elements of the offense, including the culpable mental state required. Moreover, the DCCA has not clarified whether the current manslaughter offense includes felony murder. In Comber v. United States, the DCCA stated that "in all voluntary manslaughters, the perpetrator acts with the state of mind which, but for the presence of legally recognized mitigating circumstances, would constitute malice aforethought, as the phrase has been defined for the purposes of second-degree murder."[55] In defining malice-aforethought for the purposes of second degree murder, the DCCA noted that first degree murder liability attaches when the defendant accidentally kills another while committing a specified felony, but does not further clarify whether felony murder malice is included within the voluntary manslaughter offense.[56] In a later case, the DCCA noted that "this court has never explicitly recognized voluntary manslaughter to be a lesser-included-offense of first-degree felony murder" and declined to decide the issue in that case.[57] The RCC resolves this ambiguity by defining voluntary manslaughter to include felony murder. In doing so, the manslaughter statute also incorporates all changes to felony murder included in the revised second degree murder statute.

[57] West v. United States, 499 A.2d 860, 864 (D.C. 1985).

Second, the revised manslaughter statute incorporates the revised second degree murder statute's changes to felony murder liability by requiring that the accused cause the death of another while acting "in furtherance" of the predicate felony.[58] Under current law felony murder does not require that the killing be "in furtherance" of the predicate felony, and the DCCA has held that "[t]here is no requirement in the law . . . that the government prove the killing was done in furtherance of the felony in order to convict the actual killer of felony murder."[59] However, while there is no "in furtherance" requirement under current law,[60] the DCCA has held that "[m]ere temporal and locational coincidence"[61] between the underlying felony and the death are not enough. There must have been an "actual legal relation between the killing and the crime . . . [such] that the killing can be said to have occurred as a part of the perpetration of the crime."[62] By contrast, the revised manslaughter statute, through use of the "in furtherance" phrase, requires that the accused's conduct that caused the death of another in some way facilitated the commission or attempted commission of the offense, including avoiding apprehension or detection of the offense or attempted offense.[63] Practically, this change in law may have little impact, as most cases in which the accused causes the death of another as "part of perpetration of the crime," he or she would also have been acting in furtherance of the crime. However, this change improves the proportionality of the offense insofar as a person whose risk-creating behavior is not in furtherance of the felony is not as culpable as a person who otherwise negligently kills someone in the course of committing a specified felony.[64] This change to the revised statute also

[58] See Commentary to RCC § 22E-1101.
[59] Butler v. United States, 614 A.2d 875, 887 (D.C. 1992).
[60] However, the DCCA has clearly held that when one party to the underlying felony causes the death of another, an aider and abettor to the underlying felony may only be convicted of felony murder if the "killing takes place in furtherance of the underlying felony." Butler v. United States, 614 A.2d 875 (D.C. 1992).
[61] Johnson v. United States, 671 A.2d 428, 433 (D.C. 1995).
[62] Id. 433 (emphasis original).
[63] Courts in other states have disagreed about the meaning of "in furtherance" language that is common in felony murder statutes. Some courts have held that "in furtherance" requires that the act that caused the death must have advanced or facilitated commission of the underlying crime. State v. Arias, 131 Ariz. 441, 443, 641 P.2d 1285, 1287 (1982); Auman v. People, 109 P.3d 647, 656 (Colo. 2005) (the death must occur either "in the course of" or "in furtherance of" immediate flight, so that a defendant commits felony murder only if a death is caused during a participant's immediate flight or while a person is acting to promote immediate flight from the predicate"). However, other states have interpreted "in furtherance" to only require a "logical nexus" between the underlying crime and death, to "exclude those deaths which are so far outside the ambit of the plan of the felony and its execution as to be unrelated to them." State v. Young, 469 A.2d 1189, 1192–93 (Conn. 1983); see also, Noble v. State, 516 S.W.3d 727, 731 (Ark. 2017) (rejecting appellant's argument that "in furtherance" requires that lethal act facilitated the underlying crime, but noting that a burglary committed with intent to kill cannot serve as a predicate offense to felony murder when the defendant completes the murder, because the murder was not committed in furtherance of the burglary); People v. Henderson, 35 N.E.3d 840, 845 (N.Y. 2015) ("[Appellant] asserts that the statutory language "in furtherance of" requires that the death be caused in order to advance or promote the underlying felony. We have not interpreted "in furtherance of" so narrowly."). The RCC tracks the former approach, requiring the death to have advanced or facilitated the commission of the underlying crime.
[64] For example, if in the course of committing a kidnapping, the defendant binds and gags the victim to prevent him from escaping, and the defendant suffocates as a result, felony murder liability would be appropriate. If however, the defendant leaves the kidnapping victim to go on an unrelated errand, and maintains the revised manslaughter offense as a lesser-included offense of the revised murder offenses.

Third, the revised manslaughter statute incorporates the revised second degree murder statute's requirement for felony murder that the actor commit the lethal act. Current statutory language and DCCA case law do not clarify whether a person can be convicted of felony murder when someone other than the accused committed the lethal act, although case law suggests that a person may not be convicted as a principal to felony murder if that person did not actually commit the lethal act.[65] The revised manslaughter resolves this ambiguity and improves the proportionality of the offense insofar as it is disproportionately severe to punish a person for manslaughter when another person commits the lethal act.[66]

Fourth, the revised manslaughter statute incorporates the revised second degree murder statute's five changes to the specified felonies that can serve as a predicate to felony murder.[67] The current felony murder predicates include: (1) all conduct constituting "robbery," currently an ungraded offense; (2) first degree child cruelty; (3) any "felony involving a controlled substance;"[68] (4) mayhem; and (5) "any housebreaking while armed with or using a dangerous weapon," although it is unclear which specific crimes constitute such "housebreaking."[69] By contrast, the revised manslaughter statute changes current law by clarifying or limiting these predicate crimes while doing so causes the death of another by driving negligently, felony murder liability would not be appropriate.

[65] Lee v. United States, 699 A.2d 373, 384 (D.C. 1997) ("Since he was not the actual triggerman, he must be deemed an aider and abettor in order to be convicted.").

[66] Three states have gone further and entirely abolished the felony murder rule. Hawaii and Kentucky have abolished the felony murder rule by statute. Haw. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 707-701; Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 507.020. The Michigan Supreme Court abolished the doctrine. People v. Aaron, 299 N.W.2d 304, 326 (Mich. 1980) ("We believe that it is no longer acceptable to equate the intent to commit a felony with the intent to kill, intent to do great bodily harm, or wanton and willful disregard of the likelihood that the natural tendency of a person's behavior is to cause death or great bodily harm."). In addition, other states that have retained the felony murder rule require a higher degree of culpability than required under the RCC. For example, New Hampshire's first degree murder offense requires that the defendant knowingly caused the death of another while committing or enumerated felony. N.H. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 630:1-a. Alternatively, New Hampshire's second degree murder statute creates a presumption that the defendant acted recklessly with extreme indifference to human life if "the actor causes death by the use of a deadly weapon in the commission of, or in an attempt to commit, or in immediate flight after committing or attempting to commit any class A felony." N.H. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 630:1-b.

[67] See Commentary to RCC § 22E-1101.

[69] Under current law, burglary is divided into two grades, both of which appear to be included in the felony murder statutory reference to "housebreaking." The original 1901 Code codified the offense now known as burglary, but called it "housebreaking." The original "housebreaking" offense only had one grade, and criminalized entry of any building with intent to commit a crime therein. In 1940, Congress amended the first degree murder statute and included an enumerated list of felonies, which included housebreaking, for felony murder. See H.R. Rep. Doc. No. 76-1821, at 1 (1940) (Conf. Rep). In 1967, Congress relabeled "housebreaking" as "second degree burglary," and created first degree burglary, which required that the burglar entered an occupied dwelling. However, the DCCA has held that only the current first degree burglary offense may serve as a predicate to non-purposeful felony murder. Robinson v. United States, 100 A.3d 95, 109 (D.C. 2014).

to match liability as described in the revised second degree murder statute.[70] This change to the manslaughter offense improves the proportionality and consistency of the criminal code, by ensuring that the punishment is proportionate to the accused's culpability, and maintaining manslaughter as a lesser-included offense of murder offenses.

Fifth, the revised manslaughter statute incorporates the murder statute's bar on accomplice liability for felony murder. Under current District case law, "[a]ccomplices also are liable for felony murder if the killing . . . [is] a natural and probable consequence of acts done in the perpetration of the felony."[71] However, since it is unclear whether under current law voluntary manslaughter includes felony murder, it is unclear whether barring accomplice liability for the "felony murder" version of voluntary manslaughter changes current law.

Four other changes to felony murder liability provided in the revised second degree murder offense may constitute substantive changes to the current law of manslaughter: 1) requiring a negligence mental state as to causing death for felony murder; 2) barring felony murder liability when the decedent was an accomplice to the underlying felony; 3) requiring that the actor committed the lethal act; and 4) barring accomplice liability for voluntary manslaughter under paragraph (a)(3). These four changes limit the scope of felony murder to ensure that the doctrine is only applied when warranted by the accused's culpability, and when innocent bystanders are killed.[72] To the extent that these revisions change the scope of felony murder, they also change the scope of voluntary manslaughter. These possible changes to current law improve the proportionality and consistency of the criminal code. They ensure that the punishment is proportionate to the accused's culpability and maintaining manslaughter as a lesser-included offense of murder offenses.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

RCC § 22E-1103. Negligent Homicide.

Explanatory Note. This subsection establishes the negligent homicide offense for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). This offense criminalizes negligently causing the death of another person. The revised offense replaces the current negligent homicide statute in D.C. Code § 50-2203.01, the criminal negligence version of involuntary manslaughter offense recognized under current District case law, and, in relevant part, the misdemeanor manslaughter version of involuntary manslaughter offense recognized under current District case law.

Subsection (a) specifies that a person commits negligent homicide if he or she negligently causes the death of another person. The section specifies a culpable mental state of "negligence" a term defined in RCC § 22E-206 to mean that the accused should have been aware of a substantial risk of death, and that the risk is of such a nature and degree that, considering the nature of and motivation for the person's conduct and the circumstances the person is aware of, its failure to perceive the risk is a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of care.[1]

Subsection (b) specifies the penalties for negligent homicide. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (c) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised negligent homicide statute changes current District law in three main ways.

First, the revised negligent homicide offense requires that the accused acted with criminal negligence, as defined under RCC § 22E-206, rather than the civil standard of negligence required in tort actions. The District's current negligent homicide statute requires that the accused operate a vehicle in a "careless, reckless, or negligent manner[.]"[2] The D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) has interpreted this language to require that the accused operated a vehicle without "that degree of care that a person of ordinary prudence would exercise under the same or similar circumstances . . . It is a failure to exercise ordinary care."[3] This standard is borrowed directly from civil tort cases.[4] Although the DCCA does not always clearly define the test,[5] in accordance with general

United States*, 249 A.2d 514, 514-15 (D.C. 1969) ("In prosecutions for negligent homicide, the Government must prove three elements: (1) the death of a human being, (2) by instrumentality of a motor vehicle, (3) operated at an immoderate speed or in a careless reckless, or negligent manner, but not willfully or wantonly.").

Instr. § 4-214 (noting that the instruction defining negligence was "based primarily on instructions found in the Standardized Civil Jury Instructions for the District of Columbia").

[5] At times, District courts simply assert that conduct was "negligent" without actually discussing the relevant standard of care, and whether the defendant deviated from it. E.g., Sanderson v. United States, 125 A.2d 70, 73 (D.C. 1956) ("Defendant admitted that he did not see the lady pedestrian until he was even principles of tort law, the standard of care is determined by weighing the degree of risk and severity of potential harm against the benefit of the risk-creating activity (or, the cost of abstaining from or preventing the risk-creating activity).[6]

By contrast, the revised negligent homicide statute requires criminal negligence under the RCC, a more exacting standard than civil law negligence. Whereas tort negligence requires that the accused failed "to exercise ordinary care . . . that a person of ordinary prudence would exercise under the same or similar circumstances,"[7] negligence under the RCC requires that the person's conduct constituted a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of care.[8] The RCC's definition of negligence also requires that the accused created a "substantial" risk, whereas tort negligence has no substantial risk requirement.[9] The revised negligent homicide statute's use of the RCC definition of criminal "negligence" improves the clarity and consistency of the homicide statutes by using a codified, standardized culpable mental state definition used in other offenses. The revised statute's use of the RCC definition of criminal "negligence" also improves the proportionality of the revised homicide statutes by requiring at least a culpable mental state of criminal negligence for felony liability.[10]

Second, the revised negligent homicide offense is not limited to deaths caused by operation of a motor vehicle. The current negligent homicide offense only applies if the accused causes the death of another "by operation of any vehicle in a careless, reckless, with the south curb-line of P Street, when she was 3 to 5 feet away, and that he could not account for his failure to see her sooner. This was clearly negligence.").

[6] See D.C. v. Walker, 689 A.2d 40, 45 (D.C. 1997) (stating that to determine if officer's pursuing fleeing suspect acted negligently, court should inquire "whether the need to apprehend [the fleeing suspect's car] was outweighed by the foreseeable hazards of the pursuit."); see generally, Restatement (Second) of Torts § 282 (1965). The DCCA also has stated "a fundamental legal principle to which this court has adhered . . . [is that] the greater the danger, the greater the care which must be exercised." Pannu v. Jacobson, 909 A.2d 178, 198 (D.C. 2006) (internal quotations omitted).

[7] Butts, 822 A.2d at 416.

[8] Commentary to RCC § 22E-206.

[9] RCC § 22E-206. A defendant who causes the death of another by creating a very slight risk of death cannot be guilty of the revised negligent homicide, even if his risk-creating activity is of very little or no social value. The substantial risk requirement however overlaps significantly with the gross deviation requirement in the definition of negligence. It is unlikely a person's conduct can grossly deviate from the ordinary standard of care without also creating a sufficiently substantial risk of death.

[10] Requiring more than civil negligence for felony crimes is a norm of American criminal law has deep roots, dating back to English common law. See Morissette v. United States, 342 U.S. 246, 251-52 (1952) ("A relation between some mental element and punishment for a harmful act is almost as instinctive as the child's familiar exculpatory 'But I didn't mean to,' and has afforded the rational basis for a tardy and unfinished substitution of deterrence and reformation in place of retaliation and vengeance as the motivation for public prosecution. Unqualified acceptance of this doctrine by English common law in the Eighteenth Century was indicated by Blackstone's sweeping statement that to constitute any crime there must first be a 'vicious will.' Common-law commentators of the Nineteenth Century early pronounced the same principle, although a few exceptions not relevant to our present problem came to be recognized."). Similarly, the DCCA has recently relied on "the principle that neither simple negligence nor naivete ordinarily forms the basis of felony liability." Owens v. United States, 90 A.3d 1118, 1121 (D.C. 2014) (citing DiGiovanni v. United States, 580 A.2d 123, 126 (D.C. 1990) (J. Steadman, concurring)). However, using civil negligence as a basis for criminal liability is not unheard of, nor does applying simple negligence necessarily violate Due Process. See State v. Hazelwood, 946 P.2d 875, 878-79 (Alaska 1997) ("there must be some level of mental culpability on the part of the defendant. However, this principle does not preclude a civil negligence standard.").

or negligent manner[.]"[11] By contrast, the revised negligent homicide offense criminalizes negligently causing the death of another regardless of whether a vehicle was involved. This change improves the proportionality of the revised negligent homicide offense insofar as negligently causing the death of another by operation of a motor vehicle is not more culpable than negligently causing the death of another by other means.

Third, revised negligent homicide offense requires a lower culpable mental state than that required under the current "criminal negligence" form of involuntary manslaughter. The current "criminal negligence" form of involuntary manslaughter requires that the accused causes the death of another by engaging in conduct that creates an "extreme risk of death . . . under circumstances in which the actor should have been aware of the risk."[12] The DCCA has explained that "the only difference between risk-creating activity sufficient to sustain a 'depraved heart' murder conviction and [an involuntary manslaughter] conviction 'lies in the quality of [the actor's] awareness of the risk.'"[13] Whereas depraved heart murder requires that the accused consciously disregard the risk, negligent manslaughter only requires that the accused should have been aware of the risk.[14] By contrast, the revised negligent homicide uses a less exacting standard than the current involuntary homicide case law indicates, and does not require that the accused created an extreme risk of death. Any conduct that would have satisfied the "criminal negligence" form of involuntary manslaughter would satisfy the revised negligent homicide offense. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the criminal code by codifying a culpable mental state requirement using defined terms, and improves the proportionality of the homicide statutes by creating an intermediate grade that requires less culpability than reckless manslaughter, but more than negligence required in tort law.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

RCC § 22E-1201. Robbery.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the robbery offense and penalty gradations for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The offense criminalizes taking, or exercising control over property that another person possesses on their person or has within their immediate physical control by means of causing bodily injury, use of physical force that moves or immobilizes another person, or threatening to immediately kill, kidnap, inflict bodily injury, or commit a sexual act, or by taking property from the person's hands or arms. The penalty gradations are based on the severity of bodily injury caused, the value of the property taken, and whether the property involved was a motor vehicle. Taking or exercising control over property from the person or from the immediate physical control of another without bodily injury, threats, or overpowering physical force is no longer criminalized as robbery in the RCC, but as a form of theft. The revised robbery statute replaces the District's current robbery statute,[1] carjacking statute,[2] and associated penalty provisions.[3] Insofar as they are applicable to current robbery and carjacking offenses, the revised robbery offense also replaces the protection of District public officials statute[4] and seven penalty enhancements: the enhancement for committing an offense while armed;[5] the enhancement for senior citizens;[6] the enhancement for citizen patrols;[7] the enhancement for minors;[8] the enhancement for taxicab drivers;[9] and the enhancement for transit operators and Metrorail station managers;[10] and aggravating circumstances to impose a sentence in excess of 30 years for armed carjacking.[11]

Subsection (a) specifies the elements of first degree robbery. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that the defendant must take, or exercise control over property of another.[12] The term "property of another" is defined under RCC § 22E-701 as property that a person has an interest in that the accused is not privileged to interfere with, regardless of whether the accused also has an interest in that property.[13] Paragraph (a)(1) also specifies that the [12] The conduct described by the phrase "takes, or exercises control over" is the same as the conduct described by identical language in the RCC § 22E-2102 theft and other property offenses.

[13] Generally, this element bars robbery liability if a person uses force or threats to take his or her own property. A person who uses force to take his own property could potentially be found guilty of criminal threats or assault, though a defense of property could be available depending on the facts of the case. See, Gatlin v. United States, 833 A.2d 995, 1008 (D.C. 2003) ("It is well settled that a person may use as much force as is reasonably necessary to eject a trespasser from his property, and that if he uses more force than culpable mental state for (a)(1) is knowledge, a term defined at RCC § 22E-206 to mean that the accused must have been aware to a practical certainty that he would take or exercise control over property. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that a "knowingly" mental state applies to the "property of another" element, requiring that the actor was practically certain that the actor was taking or exercising control over property, and that the property is "property of another."

Paragraph (a)(1) also specifies that the actor must take or exercise control over property within the complainant's "immediate physical control[.]" The phrase "immediate physical control" is intended to follow current District case law defining "immediate actual" possession. Property is within a person's "immediate physical control" when the property is in an "area within which the victim can reasonably be expected to exercise some physical control over the property."[14] Property also is in a person's immediate physical control when that person is able to exercise control over it at the time of the alleged crime, even it is located far enough from that person that he or she cannot exercise physical control over it,[15] or if the property is intangible and is therefore not located in any specific place.[16] Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that a "knowingly" mental state applies to this element, requiring that the actor was aware to a practical certainty that the property was within the complainant's immediate physical control.

Paragraph (a)(2) requires that the actor takes property by one of the means specified in subparagraphs (a)(2)(A)-(D). The alternatives listed under (a)(2)(A)-(D) must play a causal role in the taking, or exercise of control over the property. Temporally, it is not required that when the defendant caused bodily injury, made threats, or used force, he or she had already formed an intent to take or exercise control over property.[17] The causal relationship is satisfied if the use of force or threats to repel an immediate attempt by the owner to re-obtain property taken by the accused,[18] or to keep is necessary, he is guilty of assault."). However, robbery liability may still apply if a person uses force or threats to take property that he jointly owns.

[14] Sutton v. United States, 988 A.2d 478, 485 (D.C. 2010).

[15] For example, if a person is able to immediately transfer an object by calling from her phone, that object may be within her immediate physical control, even though the object is located farther away than would permit for physical control.

[16] For example, if a person is able to immediately transfer electronic funds from his phone, those electronic funds may be within his immediate physical control, even though the funds are intangible and in no specific location.

[17] For example, a person who causes bodily injury with no intent to take or exercise control over property, but then realizes that the bodily injury creates an opportunity to take or exercise control over property—and does so or attempts to do so—could still be convicted of robbery. See, Gray v. United States, 155 A.3d 377 (D.C. 2017).

TORCIA, WHARTON'S CRIMINAL LAW § 463, at 39-40 (15th ed. 1996) ("A thief who finds it necessary to use force or threatened force after a taking of property in order to retain possession may in legal contemplation be viewed as one who never had the requisite dominion and control of the property to qualify as a 'possessor.' Hence, it may be reasoned, the thief has not 'taken' possession of the property until his use of force or threatened force has effectively cut off any immediate resistance to his 'possession.' "); but see, Lafave, Wayne. § 20.3.Robbery, 3 Subst. Crim. L. § 20.3 (2d ed.) property permanently after the other person consented to an initial temporary taking.[19] Per the rule of interpretation under RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" mental state from paragraph (a)(1) also applies to this element. The actor must be practically certain that the means listed in subparagraphs (a)(2)(A)-(D) play a causal role in taking or exercising control over property.[20]

Subparagraph (a)(2)(A) specifies that robbery includes taking property by causing bodily injury to the complainant or anyone else physically present. "Bodily injury" is a term defined under RCC § 22E-701, and requires "physical pain, illness, or any impairment of physical condition." Per the rule of interpretation under RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" mental state from paragraph (a)(1) also applies to this element. The actor must be practically certain that the actor is causing bodily injury.

Subparagraph (a)(2)(B) specifies that robbery includes taking property by communicating, explicitly or implicitly, that the actor immediately will cause another person to suffer a bodily injury, sexual act, sexual contact, confinement, or death. The communication may be verbal or non-verbal.[21] The communication must be about immediate harm; communication of harm that will occur farther into the future do not constitute robbery.[22] No precise words are necessary to convey a threat; it may be bluntly spoken, or done by innuendo or suggestion.[23] The verb "communicates" is intended to be broadly construed, encompassing all speech[24] and other messages,[25] that are received and understood by another person. Per the rule of interpretation under RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" mental state from paragraph (a)(1) also applies to this element. The actor must be practically certain that he or she is explicitly or implicitly communicating a threat that the complainant will suffer bodily injury, a sexual contact, confinement, or death.

Subparagraph (a)(2)(C) specifies that robbery includes taking property by applying physical force that moves or immobilizes another person present. This form of robbery does not require that the force cause bodily injury, but includes shoves or grasps that move or immobilize the complainant. Incidental touching or jostling is insufficient [20] See, Gray v. United States, 155 A.3d 377 (D.C. 2017) (robbery requires a "conscious of the connection between his assaultive conduct and theft").

[21] For example, a raised fist may implicitly communicate that the actor will punch the complainant unless the complainant hands over property.

[22] Obtaining property by threats of non-immediate harm may constitute extortion under RCC § 22E-2301.

[23] Griffin v. United States, 861 A.2d 610, 616 (D.C. 2004) (citing Clark v. United States, 755 A.2d 1026, 1030 (D.C. 2000)).

[24] The term "speech" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and means oral or written language, symbols, or gestures.

[25] A person may communicate through non-verbal conduct such as displaying a weapon. See State v. Murphy, 545 N.W.2d 909, 915 (Minn. 1996) ("Many physical acts considered in context communicate a terroristic threat. We may find our examples in the case law, such as drawing a finger across one's throat or discharging a firearm over the telephone; in the movies, such as boiling a rabbit on the stove in the tranquil setting of former paramour's new family home, or placing a severed horse's head in a bed; or as here, depositing dead animals at a residence or planting a fake bomb. Life is replete with such examples, and whatever the source, the principle is the same: physical acts communicate a threat that its originator will act according to its tenor." (Internal quotations omitted.)).

to satisfy this element.[26] Per the rule of interpretation under RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" mental state from paragraph (a)(1) also applies to this element. The actor must be practically certain that he or she is applying force that moves or immobilizes another person.

Subparagraph (a)(2)(D) specifies that robbery includes removing property from the hands or arms of the complainant. Under this form of robbery, no bodily injury, physical force, or threats are required. However, this element is not satisfied if the property is taken from the complainant's immediate possession, but not from the complainant's hands or arms.[27] Per the rule of interpretation under RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" mental state from paragraph (a)(1) also applies to this element. The actor must be practically certain that he or she is taking property from the complainant's hands or arms.

Paragraph (a)(3) requires that the actor acted "with intent to" deprive the owner of property.[28] "Deprive" is a defined term meaning that the other person is unlikely to recover the property, or that it will be withheld permanently or long enough to lose a substantial portion of its value or benefit. "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the defendant was practically certain that he or she would "deprive" the other person of the property. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that such a deprivation actually occurred, only that the defendant believed to a practical certainty that a deprivation would result.

Paragraph (a)(4) requires that in the course of committing the robbery, the actor recklessly causes serious bodily injury to another person, other than an accomplice. "Reckless" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206, which here means that the actor consciously disregarded a substantial risk of causing serious bodily injury. The term "serious bodily injury" is defined in RCC § 22-701 as an injury "that involves: a substantial risk of death; protracted and obvious disfigurement; or protracted loss or impairment of the function of a bodily member or organ." Although the defendant must knowingly use physical force, cause bodily injury, or make threats, recklessness as to causing serious bodily injury suffices.[29]

Subsection (b) specifies three alternate means of committing second degree robbery. First, the actor must satisfy the elements under paragraphs (b)(1), (b)(2), and (b)(3). The elements under paragraphs (b)(1)-(b)(3) are identical to those under (a)(1), (a)(2), and (a)(3) discussed above. In addition to the elements under paragraphs (b)(1)-(b)(3), the actor must satisfy the elements under paragraph (b)(4). Under subparagraph (b)(4)(A) a person commits second degree robbery when, in the course of committing the [26] For example, if a pickpocket takes another person's wallet, and incidentally jostles the person, this element is not satisfied.

[27] For example, taking a person's wallet from his pocket does not satisfy this element.

[28] The culpable mental state described by the phrase "With intent to deprive that person of the property" is the same as the culpable mental state described by identical language in the RCC § 22E-2102 theft and other property offenses.

[29] For example, if a defendant commits robbery by intentionally shoving a person, which inadvertently causes the person to fall down a flight of stairs and suffer serious bodily injury, the defendant may be convicted of first degree robbery even if the defendant did not intend to cause serious bodily injury.

robbery, the actor recklessly causes significant bodily injury to someone physically present, other than an accomplice. "Significant bodily injury" is a term defined under RCC § 22E-701, as an injury that "to prevent long-term physical damage or to abate severe pain, requires hospitalization or immediate medical treatment beyond what a layperson can personally administer."[30] The actor must have knowingly using physical force, causing bodily injury, or communicated harm. However, it is sufficient if the actor was merely reckless as to causing significant bodily injury.[31] This requires that the actor consciously disregarded a substantial risk of causing significant bodily injury.

Subparagraph (b)(4)(B) specifies two additional means of committing second degree robbery, based on whether the property is a motor vehicle and the value of the property. Under sub-subparagraph (b)(4)(B)(i), a person commits second degree robbery when the property taken is a motor vehicle. The term "motor vehicle" is defined in RCC § 22E-701. Under sub-subparagraph (b)(4)(B)(ii), a person commits second degree robbery if the property has a value of $5,000 or more. Subparagraph (b)(3)(B) uses the term "in fact," which specifies that strict liability applies to sub-subparagraphs (b)(3)(B)(i) and (ii); there is no culpable mental state as to whether the property is a motor vehicle, or to the property's value.

Subsection (c) specifies the elements of third degree robbery. The elements of third degree robbery, which are specified in paragraphs (c)(1) and (c)(2) are identical to paragraphs (a)(1) and (a)(2) discussed above.

Subsection (d) provides an affirmative defense to robbery if the defendant reasonably believes[32] that the owner of the property, which may not necessarily be the person from whom the property was taken, gives effective consent to the actor taking or exercising control over the property. Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[33] RCC § 22E-201 specifies the burden of proof and production for all affirmative defenses in the RCC. Under RCC § 22E-201, the actor bears the burden of proving the elements of the defense by a preponderance of the evidence. Even if the defense applies and there is no liability

[30] In addition, "significant bodily injury" also includes: "a fracture of a bone; a laceration that is at least one inch in length and at least one quarter inch in depth; a burn of at least second degree severity; a temporary loss of consciousness; a traumatic brain injury; and a contusion or other bodily injury to the neck or head caused by strangulation or suffocation." RCC §22E-701.

[31] For example, the culpable mental state requirements as to subparagraph (b)(3)(A) may be satisfied when the actor knowingly causes bodily injury by shoving a person to the ground, and in doing so accidentally breaks the person's arm. Although the actor did not intend to break the person's arm, the actor was reckless as to that degree of injury, second degree robbery liability may apply.

[32] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist.

[33] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

under this section, depending on the facts of the case a defendant may still be liable for assault,[34] offensive physical contact[35], or criminal threats.[36]

Subsection (e) specifies relevant penalties for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Paragraph (e)(4) provides two penalty enhancements for first degree robbery. If the government proves the presence of at least one element listed under paragraph (e)(4), the penalty classification for first degree robbery may be increased in severity by one penalty class. These penalty enhancements may apply in addition to any penalty enhancements authorized by RCC Chapter 6.[37]

Subparagraph (e)(4)(A) specifies as a penalty enhancement that the actor was reckless as to whether the complainant is a protected person. Reckless is defined at RCC § 22E-206, and requires that the actor was aware of a substantial risk that the complainant was a protected person, and that the risk is of such a nature and degree that, considering the nature of and motivation for the actor's conduct and the circumstances the actor is aware of, its disregard is a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct. The term "protected person" is defined in RCC § 22E-701.

Subparagraph (e)(4)(B) specifies as a penalty enhancement that the actor committed robbery by using or displaying a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon. This requires that the actor consciously disregarded a substantial risk of displaying or using a dangerous weapon[38] or imitation weapon.[39] The words "displaying or using" should be broadly construed to include making a weapon known by sight, sound, or touch.[40] The terms "dangerous weapon" and "imitation dangerous weapon" are defined under RCC § 22E-701. The word "by" requires that the weapon or imitation weapon must have facilitated the robbery. This enhancement does not apply if the actor merely possessed a weapon or imitation weapon in manner that did not facilitate the robbery. Subparagraph (e)(4)(B) uses the term "in fact," which specifies that strict liability applies, and there is no culpable mental state as to whether the item used in the robbery was a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon. This penalty enhancement requires that the actor used or displayed the weapon or imitation weapon, but does not require that the weapon actually caused injury to the complainant.

[35] RCC § 22E-1205.
[36] RCC § 22E-1204.
[37] If general penalty enhancements under RCC §22E-606 or §22E-607 apply to this offense, the penalty for RCC § 22E-606 and § 22E-607 shall be based on the classification of the relevant unenhanced gradation of this offense.
[38] Under subsection (F) of the RCC definition of "dangerous weapon," an "imitation dangerous weapon" can qualify as a "dangerous weapon" if the manner of its actual, attempted, or threatened use is likely to cause death or serious bodily injury to a person. If, for example, a defendant beats a complainant with a fake gun, that fake gun may constitute a "dangerous weapon" if the manner of its actual use is likely to cause death or serious bodily injury.
[39] In many cases, the actor may knowingly or purposely use or display a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon. Under RCC § 22E-206, either of these culpable mental states satisfies the recklessness requirement for this element.
[40] For example, displaying or using rearranging one's coat to provide a momentary glimpse of part of a knife; holding a sharp object to someone's back; audibly cocking a firearm; or shooting a firearm in the air.

Paragraph (e)(5) provides two penalty enhancements for second and third degree robbery that are the same as under paragraph (e)(4), except that there are more severe penalties for committing the robbery by inflicting a bodily injury or significant bodily injury by recklessly displaying or using what, in fact, is a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon. To receive the higher (two penalty class) enhancement the dangerous weapon must directly or indirectly[41] cause the bodily injury or significant bodily injury to the complainant. If the government proves the presence of at least one element listed under paragraph (e)(5)(A), the penalty classification for second and third degree robbery may be increased in severity by one penalty class. If the government proves the presence of the element listed under paragraph (e)(5)(B), the penalty classification for second and third degree robbery may be increased in severity by two penalty classes. The increased penalty reflects the greater risk of more serious injury when actually using a dangerous weapon against another person.[42] These penalty enhancements may apply in addition to any penalty enhancements authorized by RCC Chapter 6. [43]

Subsection (f) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised robbery statute changes current District law in six main ways.

First, the revised robbery offense does not criminalize non-violent pickpocketing or taking or exercising control over property without the use of bodily injury, overpowering physical force, or threats to cause bodily injury or to engage in a sexual act or sexual contact, or by taking property from a person's hands or arms. The current robbery and carjacking statutes criminalize all pickpocketing and other takings of property from the person or from the immediate physical control of another by sudden or stealthy seizure, or snatching, even when the complainant did not know the property was taken (and so was not menaced, let alone injured).[44] By contrast, under the RCC, such [41] For example, if a defendant displays a gun during a robbery and the gun's display causes a complainant to step back, trip, fall, and suffer an injury from the fall, the weapon penalty enhancement would be satisfied even though there was no gunshot.

[42] Similarly, a more severe penalty enhancement is provided for assault by recklessly displaying or using what, in fact, is a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon. RCC § 22E-1202(h)(6).

[43] If general penalty enhancements under RCC §22E-606 or §22E-607 apply to this offense, the penalty for RCC §22E-606 and §22E-607 shall be based on the classification of the relevant unenhanced gradation of this offense.

[44] Spencer v. United States, 73 App. D.C. 98 (D.C. Cir. 1940) (affirming robbery conviction when defendant took cash from person's pants, which were resting on a chair at the foot of a bed that defendant was using at the time); Ulmer v. United States, 649 A.2d 295, 298 (D.C. 1994). Unlike the clear case law on robbery, whether current District law on carjacking extends liability to takings that occur without a criminal menace or use of force is not firmly established in District case law. However, the statutory language regarding "sudden or stealthy seizure, or snatching" that requires no use of force or criminal menace is identical in the current robbery and carjacking statutes. And, in at least one case, the DCCA, ruling on other issues, appears to have upheld a carjacking conviction on facts that involved a sudden and stealthy seizure with no apparent criminal menace, use of physical force, or bodily injury. See Young v. United States, 111 A.3d 13, 14 (D.C. 2015) (affirming multiple convictions for carjacking, first degree theft, and unauthorized use of a motor vehicle based on the defendant's taking a car with keys in it while the owner was standing nearby).

non-violent pickpocketing from the person are criminalized as theft[45] instead of robbery, unless the property is taken from the person's hands or arms. Taking an object from the person or from the immediate physical control of another person without his or her knowledge,[46] or with only minor touching that does not cause bodily injury or physical force merits less severe punishment than takings that involve physical harm. This change improves the proportionality of the robbery statute.

Second, the revised robbery statute divides the offense into three penalty grades based on the severity of injury caused during the robbery, and on the value and type of property taken. The current robbery statute consists of a single grade that does not distinguish between crimes in which the defendant went entirely unnoticed by the complainant (e.g., pickpocketing) and those where the defendant inflicted serious bodily injury. By contrast, the revised statute provides three penalty grades, chiefly determined by the severity of injury caused during the robbery. The revised robbery statute largely follows existing District law in conceptualizing robbery as a composite offense involving a theft from a person and an assault. All grades of the revised robbery statute require that the defendant took or exercised control over property from the person or from the immediate physical control of another by causing bodily injury, threatening to immediately kill, kidnap, inflict bodily injury, or commit a sexual act, or using overpowering physical force. The chief variation in the three grades of robbery correspond to the main distinctions under the current and revised assault statute — threats, movement, confinement, and bodily injury; significant bodily injury; and serious bodily injury. The taking of a motor vehicle, accounting for the current carjacking offense, or property value is also integrated into the revised robbery gradations. The revised robbery offense's new grading scheme creates consistency with the revised

In a 2017 case, in response to an argument in the dissent, the DCCA rejected the proposition that any taking from the person of another person is robbery instead of theft because "[s]uch a principle would completely nullify the 'by force or violence' element of robbery." Gray v. United States, 155 A.3d 377, 386 (D.C. 2017); see also id. at 386 n.18 (recognizing that "there are passages in opinions . . . that, divorced from context, could be read as supporting the broad proposition advanced by the dissent" that any theft from a person or from his or her immediate possession constitutes a robbery, but stating that "[w]e are unaware of any opinion binding on us that actually holds that this is the case."). However, this discussion about the limits of sudden or stealthy seizure or snatching under the current robbery statute is dicta. The jury was not instructed on sudden or stealthy seizure or snatching, id. at 382 & n. 13, and this provision of the current robbery statute was not addressed in the court's holding. The issue in Gray was whether the trial court erred in refusing to instruct the jury on the lesser included offense of second degree theft. Id. at 382. The court stated that "[o]ur earlier opinions glossed 'by force or violence' as 'using force or violence' or 'accomplished by force of by putting the victim in fear' . . . suggesting that we understood the statute to require proof of some sort of purposeful employment or at least knowing exploitation of force or violence." Id. at 384 (internal citations omitted). The DCCA held that the trial court did err because, under the "unusual" facts of the case, "the jury rationally could have doubted that [appellant] assaulted the women intending to effectuate the theft or that, in taking [complainant's] money, [appellant] was conscious of any fear (and lowered resistance) [complainant] might have experienced from the assaults." Id. at 383.

[45] See D.C. Code § 22E-2101.

[46] The DCCA has defined "immediate actual possession" under the robbery statute "refers to the area within which the victim can reasonably be expected to exercise some physical control over the property." Sutton v. United States, 988 A.2d 478, 485 (D.C. 2010). See also, Beaner v. United States, 845 A.2d 525, 532-33 (D.C. 2004) (holding that the term "immediate actual possession," as used in the carjacking statute was borrowed from the robbery statute, includes a car that was several feet from the owner when it was taken).

assault offenses, and improves the proportionality of punishment by matching more severe penalties to those robberies that inflict greater harms.

Third, the revised robbery statute includes a penalty enhancement for using or displaying a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon, and replaces the enhanced penalties authorized under current D.C. Code § 22-4502, when committing robbery "while armed" or "having readily available" a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon. Current D.C. Code § 22-4502 provides enhanced penalties for committing robbery (and other specified offenses) "when armed with or having readily available any pistol or other firearm (or imitation thereof) or other dangerous or deadly weapon".[47] Existing District case law on D.C. Code § 22-4502 holds that the penalty enhancements are authorized if the defendant either had "actual physical possession of [a weapon]";[48] or if the weapon was merely in "close proximity or easily accessible during the commission of the underlying [offense],"[49] provided that the defendant also constructively possessed the weapon.[50] There is no further requirement under current law that the defendant actually used the weapon or caused any injury.[51] By contrast, in the RCC robbery offense the defendant must actually "use or display" a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon to receive the penalty enhancement. Where the actor inflicts a bodily injury or significant bodily injury by "use or display" of a dangerous weapon, the revised statute provides a more serious (two class) penalty enhancement than when the use or display of the dangerous weapon is otherwise involved in the offense.[52] Merely being armed with or having readily available, a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon would not be sufficient for the penalty enhancement under the revised statute.[53] Including an enhancement for using or displaying a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon improves the proportionality of punishment both by matching more severe penalties to those robberies in which a weapon is actually displayed or used, and tailoring the effects of the weapon enhancement instead of relying on a separate statute that generally enhances multiple offenses and levels of robbery with the same penalty.

[49] Clyburn v. United States, 48 A.3d 147, 154 (D.C. 2012) (reversing sentencing enhancement under D.C. Code § 22-4502 when rifle was located in a different room from where defendant committed the underlying offense); cf. Guishard v. United States, 669 A.2d 1306, 1310 (D.C. 1995) (affirming sentencing enhancement under D.C. Code § 22-4502 when firearm was in a dresser drawer in the same room as the underlying offense).

[50] Cox v. United States, 999 A.2d 63, 69 (D.C. 2010) ("to have a weapon 'readily available,' one must at a minimum have constructive possession of it. To prove constructive possession, the prosecution was required to show that Cox knew the pistol was present in the car, and that he had not merely the ability, but also the intent to exercise dominion or control over it.").

[51] See, Morton v. United States, 620 A.2d 1338, 1340 (D.C. 1993) (affirming sentencing enhancement under D.C. Code § 22-4502 when firearm was within arm's length, but no evidence that the firearm was ever used to further any crime).

[52] For example, committing the robbery by brandishing a dangerous weapon (but not using it to inflict a bodily injury or significant bodily injury) results in only a one-class enhancement.

[53] Note that per the revised possession of a dangerous weapon during a crime offense, RCC § 22E-4104, the revised criminal code will still provide for additional punishments when committing a robbery while possessing, but not using or displaying, a dangerous weapon.

Fourth, the revised robbery statute's penalty enhancement based on the complainant's status as a "protected person," creates new penalty enhancements for harms to several groups of persons, reduces penalty enhancements for some persons, and creates more proportionate penalties for harms to other groups of persons. Current District statutes provide additional liability for robbery committed against certain groups of persons. The District's protection of District public officials statute penalizes various actions, including robberies, against a District official or employee while in the course of their duties or on account of those duties, or actions against a family member of a District official or employee.[54] The District also has penalty enhancements for robbery or carjacking of: minors;[55] senior citizens;[56] taxicab drivers;[57] and transit operators and Metrorail station managers.[58] Robbery and assault with intent to rob a member of a citizen patrol[59] are also subject to enhanced penalties.

In contrast with current law, the RCC robbery statute, through its reference "protected person," extends a new penalty enhancement to groups recognized elsewhere in the current D.C. Code as meriting special treatment: non-District government law enforcement and public safety employees in the course of their duties;[60] operators of private-vehicles-for hire in the course of their duties;[61] vulnerable adults.[62] Unlike current law, the RCC robbery statute, however, does not provide a penalty enhancement for: persons robbed because of their participation in a citizen patrol (but not while on duty);[63] persons robbed because of their status as District employees who do not qualify as District officials (but not while on duty);[64] and persons robbed because of their familial relationship to a District official or employee;[65] persons under the age of 18 (unless the defendant is 18 years of age or older, and at least 4 years older than the complainant);[66] or persons more than 65 years of age when the defendant is less than 10 years younger than

Where a robbery "intimidates, impedes, interferes" or has other statutorily specified results on a District official or employee, the defendant may be subject to D.C. Code § 22-851(b). In addition, since robbery requires taking property, any person who commits a robbery of a District official, employee, or family member of a District official or employee, may be subject to D.C. Code § 22-851 (c) or (d).

[61] While taxicab drivers are currently the subject of a separate enhancement in § 22-3751, the enhancement was enacted in 2001, well before the ubiquity of private vehicles-for-hire. The Council recently amended certain laws applicable to taxicabs and taxicab drivers to include private vehicles-for-hire. Vehicle-for-Hire Accessibility Amendment Act of 2016.

[62] Current D.C. Code §§ 22-933 and 22-936 make it a separate offense to assault a "vulnerable adult," with penalties depending on the severity of the injury.

[64] D.C. Code § 22-851.

[65] D.C. Code § 22-851.

[66] D.C. Code § 22-3611 authorizes heightened penalties for robbery when the complainant is under the age of 18, and the actor is at least 2 years older than the complainant.

the complainant.[67] The RCC robbery statute also applies the penalty enhancements across multiple gradations, rather than the one robbery and one carjacking gradation in current law, creating a more proportionate application of all these penalty enhancements.[68] The RCC robbery statute also limits the stacking of multiple penalty enhancements based on the categories in the definition of "protected person" and stacking of penalty enhancements for a protected person and the display or use of a weapon.[69]

Collectively, these changes provide a consistent enhanced penalty for robbing "protected persons," removing gaps in the current patchwork of separate enhancements, clarifying the law, and improving the proportionality of offenses. Extending enhanced protection for robbing individuals such as operators of private vehicles-for-hire, "vulnerable adults," and on-duty law enforcement officers and public safety employees who are not-District employees further reduces unnecessary gaps and improves the proportionality of the statutes.

Fifth, the revised robbery offense provides distinct liability for carjacking in its gradations and requires a person to act knowingly with respect to taking or exercising control over a motor vehicle. Under current law carjacking is a legally distinct offense and only requires that the person acts "recklessly" with respect to the taking or exercise of control over the motor vehicle. However, there is no clear basis for requiring a lower culpable mental state for carjacking as compared to robbery generally, and it is not clear from legislative history that the Council intended such a difference.[70] By contrast, requiring a knowing culpable mental state is consistent with the current D.C. Court of Appeal's (DCCA) requirement of knowledge as to the lack of effective consent in the District's unauthorized use of a motor vehicle (UUV) statute[71] and in the revised UUV statute. Requiring a knowing culpable mental state also makes the revised robbery

[67] D.C. Code § 22-3601 authorizes heightened penalties for robbery when the complainant is 65 years of age or older, but does not require that the defendant be at least 10 years younger than the complainant.

[68] The District's current penalty enhancements for minors, senior citizens, taxicab drivers, transit operators, and citizen patrol members increase the maximum term of imprisonment by 1 ½ times the amount otherwise authorized. Robbery currently has a 2-15 year imprisonment penalty (3-22.5 years with one enhancement) and carjacking has a 7-21 year imprisonment penalty (10.5-31.5 years with one enhancement).

[69] Current District statutory law does not address the stacking of such enhancements, and case law has not addressed the stacking of enhancements based on the categories covered in the RCC definition of protected person. However, convictions have been upheld applying both a "while armed" enhancement under D.C. Code § 22-4502 and an enhancement based on the victim's status as a senior or minor.

[70] The legislative history of the current carjacking statute does not discuss why a recklessly mental state was adopted. The committee report makes no mention of recklessness, and actually states that the statute "[d]efines the offenses of carjacking and armed carjacking as the knowing and/or forceful taking from another the possession of that person's motor vehicle." Committee Report to the Carjacking Prevetion Act of 1993, Bill 10-16 at 3. Moreover, the DCCA has recognized that the carjacking statute "eases the government's burden of proving traditional robbery . . . [by requiring] only that the taking be performed 'recklessly'". Pixley v. United States, 692 A.2d 438, 440 (D.C. 1997). However, there are no published cases in which a carjacking conviction was premised on a defendant recklessly taking a motor vehicle.

[71] Moore v. United States, 757 A.2d 78, 82 (D.C. 2000) (stating as an element "at the time the appellant took, used, operated or removed the vehicle he knew he that he did so without the consent of the owner.") (citations omitted); Mitchell v. United States, 985 A.2d 1136 (D.C. 2009); Jackson v. United States, 600 A.2d 90, 93 (D.C. 1991) ("[T]here is a fourth element of the offense which requires the government to prove at the time the defendant used the vehicle, he knew he did so without the consent of the owner." (emphasis in original).

offense consistent with the revised theft statute and other property offenses, which generally require that the defendant act knowingly with respect to the elements of the offense.[72] Including carjacking as a form of robbery also improves the proportionality of punishment by prohibiting convictions for both robbery and carjacking based on a single act or course of conduct.[73] In addition, including carjacking by using or displaying a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon as a gradation of robbery also replaces the portion of current D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b-2) that authorizes heightened penalties for committing carjacking while armed.[74] Replacing this portion of the current statute improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised offense.

Sixth, the revised robbery statute punishes attempted robbery the same as most other criminal attempts.[75] Current District law provides a specific penalty for attempted robbery, apart from the general penalty for attempted crimes.[76] There is no clear rationale for such special attempt penalties in robbery as compared to other offenses. In contrast, under the revised robbery statute, the general part's attempt provisions[77] will establish penalties for attempted robbery (including robbery of a motor vehicle) consistent with other offenses. This change improves the consistency of the revised robbery statute with other offenses.

Beyond these six changes to current District law, seven other aspects of the revised robbery statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised robbery statute requires that the defendant knowingly takes or exercises control over property. The current robbery statute does not specify a culpable mental state for this element and no case law exists directly on point. However, the DCCA has stated that robbery requires a "felonious taking,"[78] suggesting that a culpable mental state similar to that of theft should be applied. As a "knowing" culpable mental state applies to the revised theft statute,[79] an identical culpable mental state is provided for robbery. Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[80] Requiring a knowing culpable mental state also makes the revised robbery statute consistent with offenses like theft, which generally require that the defendant act knowingly with respect to the elements of the offense.[81]

[75] To clarify, attempted robbery is distinguished from completed robbery that involves an attempted theft. Completed robbery still requires that the defendant actually used physical force, caused bodily injury, or committed criminal menace. Attempted robbery does not necessarily require that the defendant actually satisfied any of those elements.

Second, the revised robbery statute requires that the property be "of another." The current statute does not explicitly require that the property taken be "of another." However, as noted above, the DCCA has held that the current robbery statute incorporates the elements of "larceny,"[82] which requires that property be of another.[83] Moreover, DCCA case law and current District practice suggests that carjacking liability similarly requires the property to be of another.[84] Requiring that the property be "of another" would codify this element suggested in District case law, and would bar a robbery conviction in cases in which the defendant took his or her own property.[85] This change clarifies existing law and improves penalty proportionality by limiting the more severe robbery penalties to conduct that involves an illegal taking, exercise of control, or attempted taking or exercise of control over another's property.

Third, the revised robbery statute's penalty enhancements incorporate statutory provisions that increase penalties based on the complainant's age, the status of the complainant as a vulnerable adult, a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, District official or transportation worker acting in the course of his or her duties, requiring recklessness as to the complainant's status. The current robbery statute does not itself provide for any additional penalties based on the status of the victim. However, multiple separate statutory provisions apply to robbery in existing law, and are captured by the language in the revised robbery statute.[86] The language of these statutes is silent as to the culpable mental state, and there is virtually no case law construing these statutory enhancements.[87] However, while none of the statutes specify a culpable mental state, it is notable that D.C. Code § 22-3601 and D.C. Code § 22-3602 have affirmative defenses that exculpate where the defendant "reasonably believed" the victim was not a United States*, 692 A.2d 438 (D.C. 1997) (making no distinction between robbery and carjacking on the issue of actual ownership; thus, implying that a defendant could not be guilty of carjacking if he was the lawful owner of the motor vehicle).").

[85] Depending on the facts, prosecutions for criminal menace or assault nonetheless may be warranted where a person takes back one's own property by criminal menace, overpowering physical force, or bodily injury.

Code § 22-3751.01, Enhanced penalties for offenses committed against transit operators and Metrorail station managers; and D.C. Code § 22-851, Protection of District public officials.

[87] There is no case law regarding the mental state as to the status of the victim under D.C. Code §§ 22-3601; 22-3611; 22-3751.01; 22-851.

senior or minor. Such affirmative defenses suggest that strict liability does not apply, at least to those penalty enhancements, and suggest that some subjective awareness is necessary. Accordingly, the revised robbery statute requires a reckless culpable mental state as to the relevant circumstances of age, occupation, etc. This change clarifies the requisite culpable mental state requirements.

Fourth, the revised robbery statute can be satisfied if the defendant "takes or exercises control over" property. In contrast, the current robbery statute requires that the defendant "takes" property, but does not use the words "exercise control over" property. However, it is not clear that these words substantively alter the scope of the offense. The DCCA has held that robbery incorporates the elements of larceny, and both the revised and current theft statutes include "taking" and "exercising control over" property.[88] Including "exercises control over" in the revised robbery statute would ensure that various means of conduct constituting theft would suffice for robbery even if there was no "taking."[89] Including "exercises control over" also is consistent with current law with respect to carjacking. The DCCA has stated that a person may be convicted of carjacking "by burning the vehicle (or, perhaps stripping it) without taking, using, operating or removing it from its location."[90] The revised robbery statute more clearly and consistently tracks the theft-type conduct recognized in current law.

Fifth, the revised robbery statute requires that the defendant knowingly caused bodily injury; communicated that the actor will immediately cause a person to suffer bodily injury, a sexual act, sexual contact, confinement, or death; moved or immobilized another person; or took property from the hands or arms of the complainant. If a defendant is only reckless as to these elements, he or she cannot be convicted of robbery, even if he or she recklessly caused force or injury that facilitates taking property. The current District robbery and carjacking statutes are silent as to what, if any culpable mental state applies to such conduct, and District case law has not clarified the issue.[91] The lack of clarity on this issue is perhaps not surprising, given that the current robbery offense only requires that the defendant took property from the from the person or from the immediate physical control of a person, and provides that the force requirement can be satisfied by moving the property to the slightest degree. Under current law, a defendant who injures another, and then intentionally takes property from that person's immediate possession would be guilty of robbery, regardless of whether he caused the injury knowingly or recklessly.[92] Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[93] Requiring a knowing culpable mental state also makes the revised robbery statute consistent with offenses like theft, which generally require that the defendant act knowingly with respect to the elements of the offense.[94]

[89] For example, if a defendant used threat of force to compel a person to relinquish property and give it to a third person, the defendant could still be convicted of robbery even though he himself did not take the property.

Sixth, under the revised robbery statute the defendant not only must have taken or exercised control over property, by causing bodily injury, communicating threats, or by applying physical force—the defendant also must know that the bodily injury, communication, or physical force in some way facilitated taking or exercising control over the property. The current robbery and carjacking statutes are silent as to what culpability may be required as to whether the use of force, etc. facilitated taking or exercising control over the property. Current District case law holds that a person can commit robbery if he or she "takes advantage of a situation which he created by use of force," and that "it is hard to see how that is done without some awareness of the opportunity being exploited."[95] The DCCA does not specify, however, what degree of awareness is required under the current robbery statute. The revised statute requires knowledge, which is consistent with the DCCA's current holding, and reflects longstanding recognition that the conduct constituting a case generally must be known by the defendant.[96]

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

[93] See Elonis, 135 S. Ct.at 2009 ("[O]ur cases have explained that a defendant generally must 'know the facts that make his conduct fit the definition of the offense,' even if he does not know that those facts give rise to a crime. (Internal citation omitted)").

Ct. at 2009 ("[O]ur cases have explained that a defendant generally must 'know the facts that make his conduct fit the definition of the offense,' even if he does not know that those facts give rise to a crime. The causal relationship between the use of overpowering force, bodily injury, or menace and the taking or exercising control over property is at the heart of robbery as a composite offense comprised of assault and theft-type conduct.

RCC § 22E-1202. Assault.

Explanatory Note. The RCC assault offense proscribes a broad range of conduct in which there is bodily harm. The penalty gradations are primarily based on the degree of bodily harm, with enhancements for harms to special categories of persons or harms caused by displaying or using a dangerous weapon. The revised assault offense replaces[1] eighteen distinct offenses in the current D.C. Code: assault with intent to kill,[2] assault with intent to commit first degree sexual abuse,[3] assault with intent to commit second degree sexual abuse,[4] assault with intent to commit child sexual abuse,[5] and assault with intent to commit robbery;[6] willfully poisoning any well, spring, or cistern of water;[7] assault with intent to commit mayhem;[8] assault with a dangerous weapon;[9] assault with intent to commit any other felony;[10] simple assault;[11] assault with significant bodily injury;[12] aggravated assault;[13] assault on a public vehicle inspection officer[14] and aggravated assault on a public vehicle inspection officer;[15] assault on a law enforcement officer[16] and assault with significant bodily injury to a law enforcement officer;[17] mayhem[18] and malicious disfigurement.[19] Insofar as they are applicable to current assault-type offenses, the revised assault offense also replaces the protection of District public officials statute,[20] certain minimum statutory penalties for assault-type offenses,[21]

[1] As is discussed in this commentary, "assault" in current District law includes a broad range of conduct that does not require "bodily injury" like the RCC assault statute does. Numerous other RCC offenses, such as the RCC offensive physical contact offense (RCC § 22E-1205) criminalize this conduct and should also be considered to replace many of these current D.C. Code "assault" offenses although they are generally not discussed in this commentary.

Subsection (a) specifies the two types of prohibited conduct for first degree assault, the highest grade of the revised assault offense. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies one type of prohibited conduct—causing serious and permanent disfigurement to the complainant. Paragraph (a)(2) specifies the second type of prohibited conduct—destroying, amputating, or permanently disabling a member or organ of the complainant's body. Subsection (a) specifies a culpable mental state of "purposely." Per the rules of construction in RCC § 22E-207, the "purposely" culpable mental state in subsection (a) applies to the elements in paragraph (a)(1) and paragraph (a)(2). "Purposely" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means that the accused must consciously desire that he or she causes serious and permanent disfigurement to the complainant or destroys, amputates, or permanently disables a member or organ of the complainant's body.

Subsection (b) specifies the prohibited conduct for second degree assault—causing "serious bodily injury" to the complainant. "Serious bodily injury" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means injury involving a substantial risk of death, or protracted and obvious disfigurement, or protracted unconsciousness, or protracted loss or impairment of the function of a bodily member or organ. Subsection (b) specifies a culpable mental state of "recklessly, with extreme indifference to human life." A "recklessly" culpable mental state is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means that the accused consciously disregarded a substantial risk of causing serious bodily injury to the complainant, and the risk is of such a nature and degree that, considering the nature of and motivation for the person's conduct and the circumstances the person is aware of, its disregard is a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct. However, recklessness alone is insufficient for the culpable mental state of "recklessly, with extreme difference to human life," that is required in subsection (b). The accused must also act "with extreme indifference to human life." This language is intended to codify the same standard used in current D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) case law defining what is commonly known as "depraved heart murder."[28] In contrast to the United States*, 584 A.2d 26, 39 (D.C. 1990) (en banc) (noting that examples of depraved heart murder include firing a bullet into a room occupied, as the defendant knows, by several people; starting a fire at the front door of an occupied dwelling; shooting into . . . a moving automobile, necessarily occupied by human beings . . . .; playing a game of 'Russian roulette' with another person [.]"); Jennings v. United States, 993 A.2d 1077, 1078 (D.C. 2010) (depraved heart murder when defendant fired a gun at across a street towards a group of people, hitting and killing one of them); Powell v. United States, 485 A.2d 596 (D.C. 1984)

"substantial" risks required for ordinary recklessness, the depraved heart murder standard requires that the accused consciously disregarded an "extreme risk of causing serious bodily injury."[29] For example, the DCCA has recognized extreme indifference to human life when a person caused the death of another by driving at speeds in excess of 90 miles per hour, and turning onto a crowded onramp in an effort to escape police[30]; firing ten bullets towards an area where people were gathered[31]; and providing a weapon to another person, knowing that person would use it to injure a third person.[32] Although it is not possible to specifically define the degree and nature of risk that is "extreme," the "extreme indifference" language codifies all DCCA case law regarding "depraved heart" murder, which is also applicable to the current aggravated assault statute.

Subsection (c) specifies the prohibited conduct for third degree assault—causing "significant bodily injury" to the complainant. "Significant bodily injury" is the intermediate level of bodily injury in the RCC and is defined in RCC § 22E-701 as an injury that requires hospitalization or immediate medical treatment, or is a specific type of injury, such as a fracture of a bone. Subsection (c) specifies a culpable mental state of "recklessly," defined in RCC § 22E-206 to here mean being aware of a substantial risk that the accused will cause significant bodily injury to the complainant.

Subsection (d) specifies the prohibited conduct for fourth degree assault—causing "bodily injury" to the complainant. "Bodily injury" is the lowest level of bodily injury in the RCC and is defined in RCC § 22E-701 to require "physical pain, physical injury, illness, or impairment of physical condition." Subsection (d) specifies a culpable mental state of "recklessly," defined in RCC § 22E-206 to here mean being aware of a substantial risk that the accused will cause bodily injury to the complainant.

Subsection (e) codifies an exclusion from liability for the offense. The general provision in RCC § 22E-201 establishes the burdens of proof and production for all exclusions from liability in the RCC. An actor does not commit an offense under the revised assault statute when, in fact, the actor's conduct is specifically permitted by a District statute or regulation. Subsection (e) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element, here that the actor's conduct is specifically permitted by a District statute or regulation. For example, Title 22, Health, of the current D.C. Municipal Regulations, has regulations that will satisfy the exclusion from liability.[33]

[33] For example, D.C. Mun. Regs. tit. 22-B, § 602.4 states:

> Any minor who is examined, treated, hospitalized, or receives health services under this chapter may give legal consent, and no person who administers the health services shall be liable civilly or criminally for assault, battery, or assault and battery; or any other civil legal charge, except for negligence or intentional harm in the diagnosis and treatment rendered to the minor and for violations of the D.C. Mental Health Information Act of 1978.

Subsection (f) codifies two defenses for the assault statute. The general provision in RCC § 22E-201 establishes the requirements for the burden of production and the burden of proof for all defenses in the RCC.

Paragraph (f)(1) codifies a defense for first degree (subsection (a)) and second degree (subsection (b)) of the revised assault statute—causing serious and permanent disfigurement to the complainant, destroying, amputating, or permanently disabling the complainant, and causing "serious bodily injury" to the complainant, as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701.

Paragraph (f)(1) uses the phrase "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element. Per the rules of construction in RCC § 22E-207, the term "in fact" applies to all requirements of the defense in paragraph (f)(1) and its subparagraphs and sub-subparagraphs, and there is no culpable mental state requirement for these requirements.

There are several requirements for the defense. First, per subparagraph (f)(1)(A), the injury must be caused by a "lawful cosmetic or medical procedure." The "lawful" requirement applies both to a cosmetic procedure and a medical procedure. As specified by use of "in fact" in paragraph (f)(1), no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to the fact that the injury is part of a lawful cosmetic or medical procedure. A medical procedure is an activity directed at or performed on an individual with the object of improving health, treating disease or injury, or making a diagnosis. Experimental medical procedures are included in this definition if they are otherwise legal under District or federal law. Cosmetic procedures that are legal[34] also are within the scope of the defense. Unlike the effective consent defense to third degree and fourth degree of the revised assault statute under paragraph (f)(2), the defense under paragraph (f)(1) applies to serious injuries, such as permanent disfigurement, and injuries that entail a substantial risk of death or otherwise satisfy the RCC definition of "serious bodily injury" in RCC § 22E-701,[35] as long as they are part of a lawful cosmetic or medical procedure.

Subparagraph (f)(1)(B) requires that the actor is not "a person with legal authority over the complainant," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701. As specified by use of "in fact" in paragraph (f)(1), no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to the fact that the actor is not "a person with legal authority over the complainant." When the complainant is under 18 years of age, RCC § 22E-701 defines a "person with legal authority over the complainant" as "a parent, or a person acting in the place of a parent under civil law, who is responsible for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant, or someone acting with the effective consent of such a parent or such a person." "Person acting in the place of a parent under civil law" and "effective consent" also are defined terms in RCC § 22E-701. When the complainant is an "incapacitated individual," RCC § 22E-701 defines a "person with legal authority over the complainant" as "a court-appointed guardian to the complainant, or someone acting [34] See, e.g., D.C. Code § 47–2853.81. Scope of practice for cosmetologists.

[35] RCC § 22E-701 defines "serious bodily injury" as "a bodily injury or significant bodily injury that involves: (A) A substantial risk of death; (B) Protracted and obvious disfigurement; (C) Protracted loss or impairment of the function of a bodily member or organ; or (D) Protracted loss of consciousness."

with the effective consent of such a guardian." RCC § 22E-701 further defines "incapacitated individual."

The effect of subparagraph (f)(1)(B) is that an actor who is "a person with legal authority over the complainant," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701, does not have this effective consent defense[36] to first degree or second degree assault. However, such an actor may have a defense under either the parental or guardian defenses in RCC § 22E-408, which provide expansive defenses for specified parents and guardians and those acting with the effective consent of such a parent or guardian.[37]

Subparagraph (f)(1)(C) and its sub-subparagraphs specify the individuals from whom an actor must receive "effective consent" in order for the defense to apply. Each sub-subparagraph will be discussed separately, but general principles that apply to each sub-subparagraph will be discussed first.

Subparagraph (f)(1)(C) requires that the actor "reasonably believes"[38] that the specified individuals in the following sub-subparagraphs—either the complainant or a "person with legal authority over the complainant" acting consistent with that authority—give "effective consent" to the actor to cause the injury. "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception." The RCC definition of "effective consent" incorporates the RCC definition of "consent," which requires some indication (by word or action) of agreement given by a person generally competent to do so. In addition, the RCC definition of "consent" excludes consent from a person that "[b]ecause of youth, mental disability, or intoxication, is unable to make a reasonable judgment as to the nature or harmfulness of the conduct to constitute the offense or to the result thereof." Thus, although subparagraph (f)(1)(C) and its sub-subparagraphs permit complainants under the age of 18 years to give effective consent in certain situations, the defendant's belief that a very young person gave "consent" may not be reasonable, and the defense would not apply.

The "in fact" specified in paragraph (f)(1) applies to subparagraph (f)(1)(C) and the requirements in the following sub-subparagraphs. No culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to subparagraph (f)(1)(C) or the following sub-subparagraphs. It is not necessary to prove that the actor desired or was practically certain that the actor had the effective consent of one of the specified persons. However, the actor must subjectively believe, and that belief must be reasonable, that the actor has the required effective consent. [39] Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[40] There is no effective [36] The defense under paragraph (f)(1) is not available to an actor that is a "person with legal authority over the complainant" and there is no general effective consent defense in the RCC.

[37] These defenses have different requirements than the effective consent defense in paragraph (f)(1). For example, both the parental and guardian defenses in RCC § 22E-408 require that the actor's conduct be reasonable.

There is also no defense under subparagraph (f)(1)(C) when the actor makes an unreasonable mistake as to the fact that a person acting with legal authority over the complainant is acting consistent with their authority.

Subparagraph (f)(1)(C) further requires that the actor "reasonably believes" that the complainant and the actor meet various age requirements in the following sub-subparagraphs. As is discussed above, due to the "in fact" specified in paragraph (f)(1), no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to subparagraph (f)(1)(C) or the following sub-subparagraphs. However, the actor must subjectively believe, and that belief must be reasonable,[41] that the actor and the complainant satisfy the age requirements in the sub-subparagraphs under subparagraph (f)(1)(C). There is no effective consent defense under subparagraph (f)(1)(C) when the actor makes an unreasonable mistake as to the required age of the complainant or required age of the actor.

Finally, subparagraph (f)(1)(C) requires that the actor "reasonably believes" that the complainant or a "person with legal authority over the complainant acting consistent with that authority" gives effective consent to cause the injury. As is discussed above, due to the "in fact" specified in paragraph (f)(1), no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to subparagraph (f)(1)(C) or the following sub-subparagraphs. situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

subparagraph (f)(1)(C) when the actor makes an unreasonable mistake as to the type of injury to which effective consent is given.[43]

Having discussed the general principles that apply to the defense requirements in subparagraph (f)(1)(C) and its sub-subparagraphs, each sub-subparagraph will now be discussed.

Under subparagraph (f)(1)(C) and sub-subparagraph (f)(1)(C)(i), the actor must reasonably believe that the complainant is 18 years of age or older and that the complainant, or a "person with legal authority over the complainant" acting consistent with that authority, gives "effective consent" to the actor to cause the injury. As is discussed above, "effective consent" and "person with legal authority over the complainant" are defined terms in RCC § 22E-701. The provision in sub-subparagraph (f)(1)(C)(i) for a "person with legal authority over the complainant acting consistent with that authority" giving effective consent to the actor is intended to cover guardians of incompetent adults giving effective consent to the actor.

Second, and in the alternative, under subparagraph (f)(1)(C) and sub-subparagraph (f)(1)(C)(ii), the actor must reasonably believe that the complainant is under 18 years of age, the actor is 18 years of age or older, and that a "person with legal authority over the complainant" gives "effective consent" to the actor to cause the injury. Given the seriousness of the injury under subsections (a) and (b) of the revised assault statute, an actor over the age of 18 years must have the consent of a parent or other "person with legal authority over the complainant" before causing the injury to a minor complainant.

Finally, and in the alternative, under subparagraph (f)(1)(C) and sub-subparagraph (f)(1)(C)(iii), the actor must reasonably believe that the complainant is under 18 years of age, the actor is under 18 years of age, and the complainant gives "effective consent" to the actor to cause the injury. An actor that is under the age of 18 years will generally not perform any lawful cosmetic or medical procedures on another minor, but there may be extraordinary or unusual situations such as emergency first aid or administration of an over-the-counter skin treatment where the requirements of the defense are met.

Paragraph (f)(2) codifies a defense for third degree (subsection (c)) and fourth degree (subsection (d)) of the revised assault statute—causing "significant bodily injury" or "bodily injury" to the complainant, as those terms are defined in RCC § 22E-701.

Paragraph (f)(2) uses the phrase "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element. Per the rules of construction in RCC § 22E-207, the term "in fact" applies to all requirements of the defense in paragraph (f)(2) and its subparagraphs and sub-subparagraphs, and there is no culpable mental state requirement for these requirements.

[43] For example, if, as part of a lawful medical procedure, the complainant gives effective consent to the actor to cause "bodily injury," and the actor unreasonably believes that the complainant gives effective consent to cause "serious bodily injury," the effective consent defense does not apply, and the actor is still guilty of second degree of the revised assault statute. However, the inverse is also true. If, as part of a lawful medical procedure, the complainant gives effective consent to the actor to cause "bodily injury," and the actor reasonably believes that the complainant gives effective consent to "serious bodily injury," the effective consent defense does apply, and the actor is not guilty of second degree of the revised assault statute.

There are several requirements to the defense. The requirement in subparagraph (f)(2)(A) that the actor is not "a person with legal authority over the complainant," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701, is identical to the requirement in subparagraph (f)(1)(B), discussed above.

Subparagraph (f)(2)(B) and its sub-subparagraphs specify the individuals from whom an actor must receive "effective consent" in order for the defense to apply. Each sub-subparagraph will be discussed separately, but general principles that apply to each sub-subparagraph will be discussed first.

Subparagraph (f)(2)(B) requires that the actor "reasonably believes"[44] that the specified individuals in the following sub-subparagraphs—either the complainant or a "person with legal authority over the complainant" acting consistent with that authority—give "effective consent" to the actor to cause the injury. "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 and is defined to incorporate the RCC definition of "consent." These terms, and their applicability to the defense in paragraph (f)(1) for first degree and second degree assault, are discussed above. This discussion also applies to the defense to third degree and fourth degree assault under subparagraph (f)(2)(B).

The "in fact" specified in paragraph (f)(2) applies to subparagraph (f)(2)(B) and the requirements in the following sub-subparagraphs. No culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to subparagraph (f)(2)(B) or the following sub-subparagraphs. It is not necessary to prove that the actor desired or was practically certain that the actor had the effective consent of one of the specified persons. However, the actor must subjectively believe, and that belief must be reasonable, that the actor has the required effective consent. Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[45] There is no effective consent defense under subparagraph (f)(2)(B) when the actor makes an unreasonable mistake as to the effective consent of the complainant or of the person acting with legal authority over the complainant. There is also no defense under subparagraph (f)(2)(B) when the actor makes an unreasonable mistake as to the fact that a person acting with legal authority over the complainant is acting consistent with their authority.

Subparagraph (f)(2)(B) further requires that the actor "reasonably believes"[46] that the complainant and the actor meet various age requirements in the following sub-subparagraphs. As is discussed above, due to the "in fact" specified in paragraph (f)(2), no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to subparagraph (f)(2)(B) or the following sub-subparagraphs. However, the actor must subjectively believe, and that belief must be reasonable[47] that the actor and the complainant satisfy the age requirements in the sub-subparagraphs under subparagraph (f)(2)(B). There is no effective consent defense under subparagraph (f)(2)(B) when the actor makes an unreasonable mistake as to the required age of the complainant, the required age of the actor, or any required age gap.

Finally, subparagraph (f)(2)(B) requires that the actor "reasonably believes"[48] that the complainant or a "person with legal authority over the complainant acting consistent with that authority" gives effective consent to cause the injury. As is discussed above, due to the "in fact" specified in paragraph (f)(2), no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to subparagraph (f)(2)(B) or the following sub-subparagraphs. Having discussed the general principles that apply to the defense requirements in subparagraph (f)(2)(B) and its sub-subparagraphs, each sub-subparagraph will now be discussed.

Under subparagraph (f)(2)(B) and sub-subparagraph (f)(2)(B)(i), the actor must reasonably believe that the complainant is 18 years of age or older and that the complainant, or a "person with legal authority over the complainant" acting consistent with that authority, gives "effective consent" to the actor to either cause the injury, or to engage in a lawful sport, occupation, or other concerted activity.[50] As is discussed above, "effective consent" and "person with legal authority over the complainant" are defined terms in RCC § 22E-701. The provision in sub-subparagraph (f)(2)(B)(i) for a "person with legal authority over the complainant acting consistent with that authority" giving effective consent to the actor is intended to cover guardians of incompetent adults giving effective consent to the actor. If the injury occurs during a lawful sport, occupation, or other concerted activity, the defense is applicable when the actor's infliction of the injury is a reasonably foreseeable hazard of that activity. As specified by the "in fact" in paragraph (f)(2), no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to the requirement that the actor's infliction of the injury is a reasonably foreseeable hazard of a permissible activity. This is an objective determination and the defense does not apply if the infliction of the injury is not a reasonably foreseeable hazard.

Second, and in the alternative, under subparagraph (f)(2)(B) and sub-subparagraph (f)(2)(B)(ii), the actor must reasonably believe that the complainant is under 18 years of age and the actor is 18 years of age or older and more than four years older than the complainant (sub-sub-subparagraph (f)(2)(B)(ii)(I)). In addition, the actor must reasonably believe that a "person with legal authority over the complainant" gives "effective consent" to the actor to either cause the injury, or to engage in a lawful sport, occupation, or other concerted activity,[51] where the actor's infliction of the injury is a reasonably foreseeable hazard of that activity. The above discussion of "engage in a lawful sport, occupation . . ." for sub-subparagraph (f)(2)(B)(i) applies here to sub-sub-subparagraph (f)(2)(B)(ii)(II).

Finally, and in the alternative, under subparagraph (f)(2)(B) and sub-subparagraph (f)(2)(B)(iii), the actor must reasonably believe that the complainant is under 18 years of age, and that the actor is either under years of age or over 18 years of age and not more than four years older (sub-sub-subparagraph (f)(2)(B)(iii)(I)). Subparagraph (f)(2)(B) and sub-sub-subparagraph (f)(2)(B)(iii)(II) further require that the actor must reasonably believe that the complainant gives "effective consent" to the actor to cause the injury, or to engage in a lawful sport, occupation, or other concerted activity,[52] where the actor's infliction of the injury is a reasonably foreseeable hazard of that activity. The above discussion of "engage in a lawful sport, occupation . . ." for sub-subparagraph (f)(2)(B)(i) applies here to sub-sub-subparagraph (f)(2)(B)(iii)(II).

Subsection (g) specifies rules for imputing a conscious disregard of the risk required to prove that the person acted with extreme indifference to human life. Under the principles of liability governing intoxication under RCC § 22E-209, when an offense requires recklessness as to a result or circumstance, that culpable mental state may be imputed even if the person lacked actual awareness of a substantial risk due to his or her self-induced intoxication.[53] However, as discussed above, extreme indifference to human life in subsection (b) requires that the person consciously disregarded an extreme risk of death or serious bodily injury, a greater degree of risk than is required for recklessness alone. While RCC § 22E-209 does not authorize fact finders to impute awareness of an extreme risk, this subsection specifies that a person shall be deemed to have been aware of an extreme risk required to prove that the person acted with extreme indifference to human life when the person was unaware of that risk due to self-induced intoxication, but would have been aware of the risk had the person been sober. The term "self-induced intoxication" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-209,[54] and the definition specifies certain culpable mental states that must be proven. The use of "in fact" in subsection (g) indicates that no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to the fact that the actor was unaware of the risk, but would have been aware of the risk had the actor been sober.

Even when a person's conscious disregard of an extreme risk of death or serious bodily injury is imputed under this subsection, in some instances the person may still not have acted with extreme indifference to human life. It is possible, though unlikely, that a person's self-induced intoxication is non-culpable, and negates finding that the person acted with extreme indifference to human life.[55] In these cases, although the awareness of risk may be imputed, the person could still be acquitted under subsection (b). However, finding that the person did not act with extreme indifference to human life does not preclude finding that the person acted recklessly as required for other forms of assault, provided that his or her conduct was a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct.

Subsection (h) specifies relevant penalties for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Paragraph (h)(5) codifies several penalty enhancements for second degree of the revised assault statute. If any of the specified enhancements apply, the penalty classification for second degree assault is increased by one class.

[54] For further discussion of these terms, see Commentary to RCC § 22E-209.

[55] This is perhaps clearest where a person's self-induced intoxication is pathological—i.e. "grossly excessive in degree, given the amount of the intoxicant, to which the actor does not know he is susceptible." Model Penal Code § 2.08(5)(c). The following hypothetical is illustrative. X consumes a single alcoholic beverage at an office holiday party, and immediately thereafter departs to the metro. While waiting for the train, X begins to experience an extremely high level of intoxication—unbeknownst to X, the drink has interacted with an allergy medication she is taking, thereby producing a level of intoxication ten times greater than what X normally experiences from that amount of alcohol. As a result, X has a difficult time standing straight, and ends up stumbling in another train-goer, V, who X knocks onto the tracks just as the train is approaching, resulting in serious bodily injury. If X is subsequently charged with second degree assault on these facts, her self-induced state of intoxication—when viewed in light of the surrounding circumstances— may weigh against finding that she manifested extreme indifference to human life. It may be true that X, but for her intoxicated state, would have been more careful/aware of V's proximity. Nevertheless, X is only liable for second degree assault under the RCC if X's conduct manifested an extreme indifference to human life.

It is also possible, under narrow circumstances, for a person's self-induced intoxication weigh in favor of finding the person's conduct was not a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct or care even when it is not pathological. This is reflected in the situation of X, who consumes an extremely large amount of alcohol by herself on the second level of her two-story home. Soon thereafter, X's sister, V, makes an unannounced visit to X's home, lets herself in, and then announces that she's going to walk up to the second story to have a conversation with X. A few moments later, X stumbles into V at the top of the stairs, unaware of V's proximity, thereby causing V to fall and suffer serious bodily injury. If X is charged with second degree assault, it is unclear under current law whether evidence of her self-induced intoxication could be presented to negate the culpable mental state required for second degree assault.

Subparagraph (h)(5)(A) codifies a penalty enhancement for second degree of the revised assault statute if the actor commits the offense and is reckless as to the fact that the complainant is a "protected person." "Protected person" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that includes individuals such as a law enforcement officer in the course of his or her duties. "Reckless," a term defined at RCC § 22E-206, here means the accused must be aware of a substantial risk that the complainant is a "protected person" as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701.

Subparagraph (h)(5)(B) codifies a penalty enhancement for second degree of the revised assault statute if the actor commits the offense by displaying or using what, in fact, is a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon. The words "displaying or using" should be broadly construed to include making a weapon known by sight, sound, or touch.[56] The imitation dangerous weapon or dangerous weapon must directly or indirectly[57] cause the required serious bodily injury. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "reckless" culpable mental state in subparagraph (h)(5)(A) applies to the elements in subparagraph (h)(5)(B) until "in fact" is specified. "Recklessly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means being aware of a substantial risk that the accused committed the offense by displaying or using an object. "In fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element, here whether the item displayed or used is a "dangerous weapon" or "imitation dangerous weapon" as those terms are defined in RCC § 22E-701.

Subparagraph (h)(5)(C) codifies a penalty enhancement if the actor commits the offense with the "purpose" of harming the complainant because of his or her status as a "law enforcement officer," "public safety employee," or "District official" as those terms are defined in RCC § 22E-701. "Purpose" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means that the actor must consciously desire to harm the complainant because of his or her status as a "law enforcement officer," "public safety employee," or "District official."[58] Harm may include, but does not require bodily injury. Harm should be construed more broadly to include causing an array of adverse outcomes. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "has the purpose" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. Here, it is not necessary to prove that the complainant who was harmed was a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or District official, only that the actor believed to a practical certainty that the complainant that he or she would harm a person of such a status.

The penalty enhancements for third degree and fourth degree of the revised assault statute will be discussed in detail, but first a note regarding the gradation scheme.

[56] For example, assuming the other elements of the offense are proven, the following conduct may be sufficient: rearranging one's coat to provide a momentary glimpse of part of a knife; holding a sharp object to someone's back; audibly cocking a firearm; or shooting a firearm in the air.

[58] While the RCC § 22E-701 definitions of "law enforcement officer" and "public safety employee" refer to some persons only when on-duty (e.g., a campus officer), this provision on committing the offense with the purpose of harming the complainant because of their status as a law enforcement officer or public safety employee applies to committing the offense against an off-duty person based on their on-duty role.

Third degree and fourth degree of the revised assault statute are subject to the same penalty enhancements with the same penalty increases as second degree assault with one exception. The display or use of a dangerous weapon to commit third degree assault receives a penalty increase of two classes, and in fourth degree assault, a penalty increase of three classes. This is in contrast to second degree assault where the display or use of a dangerous weapon receives a penalty increase of one class. The different penalty increases in third degree and fourth degree account for the discrepancy between a low-level actual harm and a potentially very serious harm that might have occurred through use of the dangerous weapon. This discrepancy is greatest for the lowest gradation of the offense, fourth degree assault, which requires only bodily injury," and third degree assault, which requires "significant bodily injury." This approach is consistent with current District law.[59] When the offense is committed by the display or use of an imitation dangerous weapon, however, second degree, third degree, and fourth degree of the revised statute consistently receive a penalty increase of one class because there is a lower likelihood of serious harm.

Paragraph (h)(6) codifies several penalty enhancements for third degree of the revised assault statute. Per subparagraph (h)(6)(A), the penalty classification of third degree assault is increased by one class if the penalty enhancements in sub-subparagraphs (h)(6)(A)(i) through (h)(6)(A)(iii) apply. The penalty enhancements in sub-subparagraphs (h)(6)(A)(i) through (h)(6)(A)(iii) are the same as the penalty enhancements in subparagraphs (h)(5)(A) through (h)(5)(C), discussed above, except that sub-subparagraph (h)(6)(A)(ii) is limited to an "imitation dangerous weapon."

Subparagraph (h)(6)(B) specifies that the penalty classification for third degree assault is increased by two classes if the actor commits the offense by recklessly displaying or using what, in fact, is a dangerous weapon. The words "displaying or using" should be broadly construed to include making a weapon known by sight, sound, or touch.[60] The dangerous weapon[61] must directly or indirectly[62] cause the required significant bodily injury. "Recklessly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means being aware of a substantial risk that the accused committed the offense by displaying or using an object. "In fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element, here

Code § 22–402, Assault with intent to commit mayhem or with dangerous weapon (providing up to a ten year penalty for assault with a dangerous weapon, regardless of the resulting harm, a penalty equal to that for actually inflicting serious bodily injury under the current D.C. Code aggravated assault statute, D.C. Code § 22-404.01).

[60] For example, assuming the other elements of the offense are proven, the following conduct may be sufficient: rearranging one's coat to provide a momentary glimpse of part of a knife; holding a sharp object to someone's back; audibly cocking a firearm; or shooting a firearm in the air.

[61] Under subsection (F) of the RCC definition of "dangerous weapon," an "imitation dangerous weapon" can qualify as a "dangerous weapon" if the manner of its actual, attempted, or threatened use is likely to cause death or serious bodily injury to a person. If, for example, a defendant beats a complainant with a fake gun, that fake gun may constitute a "dangerous weapon" if the manner of its actual use is likely to cause death or serious bodily injury.

whether the item displayed or used is a "dangerous weapon" as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701.

Paragraph (h)(7) codifies several penalty enhancements for fourth degree of the revised assault statute. Per subparagraph (h)(7)(A), the penalty classification of fourth degree assault is increased by one class if the penalty enhancements in sub-subparagraphs (h)(7)(A)(i) through (h)(7)(A)(iii) apply. The penalty enhancements in sub-subparagraphs (h)(7)(A)(i) through (h)(7)(A)(iii) are the same as the penalty enhancements in subparagraph (h)(5)(A) and (h)(5)(C), discussed above, except that sub-subparagraph (h)(6)(A)(ii) is limited to an "imitation dangerous weapon."

Subparagraph (h)(7)(B) specifies that the penalty classification for fourth degree assault is increased by three classes if the actor recklessly commits the offense by displaying or using what, in fact, is a dangerous weapon. The words "displaying or using" should be broadly construed to include making a weapon known by sight, sound, or touch.[63] The dangerous weapon[64] must directly or indirectly[65] cause the required bodily injury. "Recklessly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means being aware of a substantial risk that the accused committed the offense by displaying or using an object. "In fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element, here whether the item displayed or used is a "dangerous weapon" as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701.

Subsection (i) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised assault statute clearly changes current District law in fourteen main ways.

First, the revised assault statute does not criminalize as a completed offense conduct that falls short of inflicting "bodily injury," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701. Under current District law, an assault[66] includes: 1) intent-to-frighten assaults that do not result in physical contact with the complainant's body;[67] 2) non-violent sexual [63] For example, assuming the other elements of the offense are proven, the following conduct may be sufficient: rearranging one's coat to provide a momentary glimpse of part of a knife; holding a sharp object to someone's back; audibly cocking a firearm; or shooting a firearm in the air.

[64] Under subsection (F) of the RCC definition of "dangerous weapon," an "imitation dangerous weapon" can qualify as a "dangerous weapon" if the manner of its actual, attempted, or threatened use is likely to cause death or serious bodily injury to a person. If, for example, a defendant beats a complainant with a fake gun, that fake gun may constitute a "dangerous weapon" if the manner of its actual use is likely to cause death or serious bodily injury.

[65] For example, if a defendant displays a gun and the gun's display causes a complainant to step back, trip, fall, and suffer bodily injury from the fall, the weapon penalty enhancement would be satisfied even though there was no gunshot.

[66] D.C. Code § 22-404(a)(1) ("Whoever unlawfully assaults . . . another . . . shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or be imprisoned not more than 180 days, or both.").

[67] See, e.g., Joiner-Die v. United States, 899 A.2d 762, 765 (D.C. 2006) ("To establish intent-to-frighten assault, the government must prove: (1) that the defendant committed a threatening act that reasonably would create in another person the fear of immediate injury; (2) that, when he/she committed the act, the defendant had the apparent present ability to injure that person; and (3) that the defendant committed the act voluntarily, on purpose, and not by accident or mistake."). The DCCA has made it clear that in intent-to frighten assaults, the accused must have the intent to cause fear in the complaining witness. See, e.g., Sousa v. United States, 400 A.2d 1036, 1044 (D.C. 1979) ("Our attention is focused "upon the menacing touching[68] that causes no pain or impairment to the complainant's body; and 3) any completed battery where the accused inflicts an unwanted touching on the complainant that causes no pain or impairment to the complainant's body.[69] However, a recent DCCA case that is in active litigation may ultimately call into question whether an unwanted touching on the complainant that causes no pain or impairment is sufficient.[70] In contrast, the revised assault statute is limited to causing three types of bodily injury—"serious bodily injury," "significant bodily injury," and "bodily injury"—as those terms are defined in RCC § 22E-701—as well as serious and permanent disfigurement and injuries. Depending on the facts of a case, conduct that falls short of inflicting "bodily injury" may be criminalized as attempted assault under the general attempt provision (RCC § 22E-301) or other RCC offenses such as offensive physical contact (RCC § 22E-1205),[71] criminal threats (RCC § 22E-1204), or weapons offenses. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statutes.

conduct of the accused and his purposeful design either to engender fear in or do violence to his victim."); Robinson v. United States, 506 A.2d 572, 574 (D.C. 1986) ("Intent-to-frighten assault, on the other hand, requires proof that the defendant intended either to cause injury or to create apprehension in the victim by engaging in some threatening conduct; an actual battery need not be attempted.") (citing W. LaFave & A. Scott, Handbook on Criminal Law § 82, at 610–612 (1972)).

[68] "Where the assault involves a nonviolent sexual touching the court has held that there is an assault . . . because 'the sexual nature [of the conduct] suppl[ies] the element of violence or threat of violence.'" Matter of A.B., 556 A.2d 645, 646 (D.C. 1989) (quoting *Goudy v. The DCCA has stated that the elements of non-violent sexual touching assault are: 1) That the defendant committed a sexual touching on another person; 2) That when the defendant committed the touching, s/he acted voluntarily, on purpose and not by mistake or accident; and 3) That the other person did not consent to being touched by the defendant in that matter. Mungo v. United States, 772 A.2d 240, 246 (D.C. 2001) (quoting Criminal Jury Instructions for the District of Columbia, No. 4.06(C) (4th ed.1993)); see also Augustin v. United States, No. 17-CF-906, 2020 WL 6325889 (D.C. Oct. 29, 2020). "Touching another's body in a place that would cause fear, shame, humiliation or mental anguish in a person of reasonable sensibility, if done without consent, constitutes sexual touching." Mungo v. United States, 772 A.2d 240, 246 (D.C. 2001) (citations omitted). "The government need not prove that the victim actually suffered anger, fear, or humiliation." Mungo, 772 A.2d at 246 (citations omitted).

[69] See, e.g., Mahaise v. United States, 722 A.2d 29, 30 (D.C. 1988) ("A battery is any unconsented touching of another person. Since an assault is simply an attempted battery, every completed battery necessarily includes an assault. Appellant's statement that he removed the phone from the complainant's hand and then took her cigarette from her other hand and extinguished it is thus an admission, at least prima facie, of two separate assaultive acts".") (citing Ray v. United States, 575 A.2d 1196, 1199 (D.C. 1990); Dunn v. United States, 976 A.2d 217, 218-19, 220, 221 (D.C. 2009) (stating that the injury resulting from an assault "may be extremely slight," requiring "no physical pain, no bruises, no breaking of the skin, no loss of blood, no medical treatment" and finding the evidence sufficient for assault when appellant "shoved" the complainant because the contact was "offensive.").

[70] A panel of the DCCA recently ruled (in an opinion since vacated pending an en banc ruling) that unwanted touchings do not necessarily constitute "force or violence" necessary for assault liability. Perez Hernandez v. United States, 207 A.3d 594, 604 (D.C.), vacated, 207 A.3d 605 (D.C. 2019).

[71] The RCC offensive physical contact statute generally criminalizes offensive physical contacts that fall short of inflicting "bodily injury." Offensive physical contact that satisfies the RCC offensive physical contact offense may be sexual in nature. However, depending on the facts of the case, other offenses in the RCC may provide more serious liability for offensive touching that is sexual in nature such as other RCC Chapter 12 offenses, RCC weapons offenses, or RCC sex offenses in Chapter 13. The RCC abolishes common law non-violent sexual touching assault that is currently recognized in DCCA case law. See, e.g., Augustin v. United States, No. 17-CF-906, 2020 WL 6325889 (D.C. Oct. 29, 2020).

Second, the RCC no longer criminalizes as separate offenses assault with intent to kill, assault with intent to commit first degree sexual abuse, assault with intent to commit second degree sexual abuse, assault with intent to commit child sexual abuse, assault with intent to commit robbery, assault with intent to commit mayhem, and assault with intent to commit any other felony. Current District law criminalizes this conduct as separate offenses[72] collectively referred to as the "assault with intent to" or "AWI" offenses. In contrast, in the RCC, liability for the conduct criminalized by the current AWI offenses is provided through application of the general attempt statute in RCC § 22E-301 to the completed offenses.[73] The actus reus[74] and the required culpable mental state[75] of an attempt in the RCC provide for liability that is at least as expansive as that afforded by the current AWI offenses. This change improves the clarity of the revised assault statute, eliminates unnecessary overlap between the AWI offenses and general attempt liability [72] D.C. Code §§ 22-401 (assault with intent to kill, assault with intent to commit first degree sexual abuse, assault with intent to commit second degree sexual abuse, assault with intent to commit child sexual abuse, assault with intent to commit robbery); 22-402 (assault with intent to commit mayhem); 22-403 (assault with intent to commit any other felony).

[73] For example, rather than having a separate offense of assault with intent to kill, as is codified in current D.C. Code § 22-401, the RCC criminalizes that conduct as an attempt to commit an offense such as murder or aggravated assault. The District's varied AWI offenses, enacted in 1901, were originally "created to allow a court to impose a more appropriate penalty for an assaultive act that results from an unsuccessful attempt to commit a felony or some other proscribed end." Perry v. United States, 36 A.3d 799, 809 (D.C. 2011). However, as provided in RCC § 22E-301(c) and described in the accompanying commentary, the penalty for general attempts in the RCC differs from existing law.

[74] The actus reus of some criminal attempts and the comparable AWI offense will not always be the same. For example, both case law and commentary indicate that, as a matter of current and historical practice, one can indeed be convicted of an attempt to commit an offense against the person, such as mayhem, without having necessarily committed a simple assault. Compare, R. Perkins, Criminal Law 578 (2d ed. 1969) with Hardy v. State, 301 Md. 124, 129, 482 A.2d 474, 477 (1984). However, factually, any conduct which falls within the scope of an AWI offense also necessarily constitutes an attempt to commit the target of that AWI offense.

[75] Under current District law, both AWI offenses and criminal attempts require proof of a "specific intent" to commit the target offense. For District authority on the specific intent requirement in the context of AWI offenses, see Nixon v. United States, 730 A.2d 145, 148 (D.C. 1999); Riddick v. United States, 806 A.2d 631, 639 (D.C. 2002); Di Snowden v. United States, 52 A.3d 858, 868 (D.C. 2012); Robinson v. United States, 50 A.3d 508, 533 (D.C. 2012). For District authority on the specific intent requirement in the context of criminal attempts, see Judge Beckwith's concurring opinion in Jones v. United States, 124 A.3d 127, 132–34 (D.C. 2015) (discussing, among other cases, Sellers v. United States, 131 A.2d 300 (D.C.1957); Wormsley v. United States, 526 A.2d 1373 (D.C. 1987); and Fogle v. United States, 336 A.2d 833, 835 (D.C. 1975)).
Notably, the DCCA has never clearly defined the meaning of the phrase "specific intent"—indeed, as one DCCA judge has observed, the phrase itself is little more than a "rote incantation[]" of "dubious value" which obscures "the different mens rea elements of a wide array of criminal offenses." Buchanan v. United States, 32 A.3d 990, 1000 (D.C. 2011) (Ruiz, J. concurring). Ambiguities aside, however, it seems relatively clear from District authority in the context of both AWI and attempt offenses that, first, the mens rea applicable to both categories of offenses—the intent to commit the ulterior or target offense—is the same. Compare D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 4.110-12 (jury instructions on AWI offenses) with D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 7.101 (jury instruction on criminal attempts). And second, it seems clear that this mens rea roughly translates to acting purposely or knowingly. See Second Draft of Report No. 2, Recommendations for Chapter 2 of the Revised Criminal Code—Basic Requirements of Offense Liability, pgs. 5-8 (May 5, 2017); First Draft of Report No. 7, Recommendations for Chapter 3 of the Revised Criminal Code—Definition of a Criminal Attempt, pgs. 8-11 (June 7, 2017).

for assault-type offenses, and improves the proportionality of the revised statutes by applying a consistent attempt penalty.

Third, the revised assault statute replaces the separate common law offenses of mayhem and malicious disfigurement. The D.C. Code currently specifies penalties for the crimes of mayhem and malicious disfigurement,[76] although the elements of these offenses are established wholly by case law. The DCCA has said that malicious disfigurement requires proof that a person caused a permanent disfigurement[77] and mayhem requires proof that someone caused a permanently disabling injury.[78] Both offenses require a mental state of malice[79] and proof of the absence of mitigating circumstances,[80] although the DCCA has said that malicious disfigurement requires a specific intent to injure that mayhem does not.[81] Yet, while such requirements are similar to, and for some fact patterns more demanding than, the current aggravated assault statute,[82] mayhem and malicious disfigurement have the same ten-year maximum penalty (internal citations omitted).

[80] Burton v. United States, 818 A.2d 198, 200 (D.C. 2003) (approving a jury instruction for malicious disfigurement that, instead of using the term "malice," listed the requirements of the mental state, including that "there were no mitigating circumstances."); see also Brown v. United States, 584 A.2d 537, 539 (D.C. 1990) ("In other non-homicide areas of the law," including malicious disfigurement, "we have defined malice as intentional conduct done without provocation, justification, or excuse . . . Therefore, provocation would be a defense to charges in these areas of the law as well.") (citations and quotations omitted); D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. §§ 4.104 and 4.105 (requiring as an element of mayhem and of malicious disfigurement that "there were no mitigating circumstances.").

[81] See, e.g., Edwards v. United States, 583 A.2d 661, 668 ("The elements of malicious disfigurement are . . . (3) that the defendant specifically intended to disfigure the victim."); Perkins v. United States, 446 A.2d 19, 23 (D.C. 1982) ("We conclude that the crime of malicious disfigurement requires proof of specific intent . . .").

[82] Unlike mayhem and malicious disfigurement, the current aggravated assault offense in D.C. Code § 22-404.01 does not require proof of the absence of mitigating circumstances. D.C. Code § 22-404.01(a)(1), as the current aggravated assault statute. In contrast, the revised assault statute has two new gradations in paragraph (a)(1) and paragraph (a)(2) that require purposeful, permanent injuries. These new gradations cover conduct currently prohibited by mayhem and malicious disfigurement. The culpable mental state of "malice" no longer applies to conduct currently prohibited by mayhem and maliciously disfiguring, nor does the special mitigating circumstances defense[83] that accompanies malice. Conduct currently prohibited by mayhem and malicious disfigurement that does not satisfy the purposely culpable mental state or required injuries in paragraph (a)(1) or paragraph (a)(2) of the revised assault offense is covered by second degree assault. This change clarifies and reduces unnecessary overlap in the current D.C. Code.

Fourth, the RCC does not codify a separate assault with a dangerous weapon (ADW) offense. Under current D.C. Code § 22-402, ADW is a separate offense with a ten-year maximum penalty.[84] ADW prohibits engaging in any conduct that constitutes a simple assault, including intent-to-frighten assaults and offensive physical contact, "with" a dangerous weapon.[85] In contrast, the revised assault statute has specific penalty enhancements for causing different types of bodily injury "by displaying or using" a

(a)(2) (subsection (a)(1) requiring "knowingly or purposely causes serious bodily injury to another person" and subsection (a)(2) requiring "under circumstances manifesting extreme indifference to human life . . . intentionally or knowingly engages in conduct which creates a grave risk of serious bodily injury to another person, and thereby causes serious bodily injury."). In addition, while mayhem and malicious disfigurement require permanent injuries, "serious bodily injury" in the current aggravated assault statute, as defined in DCCA case law, requires only "protracted and obvious disfigurement." See, e.g., Jackson v. United States, 940 A.2d 981, 986 (D.C. 2008) (stating that the definition of "serious bodily injury" as interpreted by the DCCA includes "protracted and obvious disfigurement.").

[83] Burton v. United States, 818 A.2d 198, 200 (D.C. 2003) (approving a jury instruction for malicious disfigurement that, instead of using the term "malice," listed the requirements of the mental state, including that "there were no mitigating circumstances."); see also Brown v. United States, 584 A.2d 537, 539 (D.C. 1990) ("In other non-homicide areas of the law," including malicious disfigurement, "we have defined malice as intentional conduct done without provocation, justification, or excuse . . . Therefore, provocation would be a defense to charges in these areas of the law as well.") (citations and quotations omitted); D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. §§ 4.104 and 4.105 (requiring as an element of mayhem and of malicious disfigurement that "there were no mitigating circumstances.").

[84] D.C. Code § 22-402 ("Every person convicted of an assault with intent to commit mayhem, or of an assault with a dangerous weapon, shall be sentenced to imprisonment for not more than 10 years. In addition to any other penalty provided under this section, a person may be fined an amount not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01.").
The more stringent 10-year maximum penalty, as opposed to 180 days for simple assault in D.C. Code § 22-404(a)(1), is "imposed as 'a practical recognition of the additional risks posed by use of the weapon.'" Williamson v. United States, 445 A.2d 975, 979 (D.C. 1982) (quoting Parker v. United States, 359 F.2d 1009, 1012 (D.C. Cir. 1966)).

[85] The current ADW statute merely requires "an assault with a dangerous weapon," D.C. Code § 22-402, and DCCA case law establishes that the ADW statute requires "the common law crime of simple assault, plus the fact that the assault is committed with a dangerous weapon." Perry v. United States, 36 A.3d 799, 811 (D.C. 2011). Thus, the broad range of conduct included under "assault" is subject to a weapons enhancement under the current ADW statute. See, e.g., Frye v. United States, 926 A.2d 1085, 1094 (D.C. 2005) (finding that the evidence was sufficient for ADW when "appellant intended to and did try to injure or frighten [the complaining witness] by using his van as a weapon in a manner likely to cause [the complaining witness] to have a car accident" and listing as an element of ADW that there "was an attempt, with force or violence, to injure another person, or a menacing threat, which may or may not be accompanied by a specific intent to injure.").

"dangerous weapon" or "imitation dangerous weapon," as those terms are defined in RCC § 22E-701. The dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon must, directly or indirectly cause the resulting bodily injury.[86] The use or display of a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon that falls short of causing the required types of bodily injury is no longer criminalized as assault. Instead, such threatening acts or offensive physical contact are prohibited by the criminal threats statute and its weapon enhancement (RCC § 22E-1204).[87] In addition, the use or display of objects that the complaining witness incorrectly perceives to be a "dangerous weapon" or "imitation dangerous weapon" as those terms are defined in RCC § 22E-701, no longer receives an assault enhanced penalty as they do under current District law.[88] Excluding these objects does not change District case law holding that circumstantial evidence may be sufficient to establish that a deadly or dangerous weapon was used.[89] This change reduces unnecessary overlap in the current D.C. Code between multiple means of enhancing assaults committed with a weapon and improves the proportionality of the revised offense.[90] [86] If an individual merely possesses a dangerous weapon during an assault, or uses or displays such a weapon, but the weapon does not cause the required bodily injury, the individual may still be subject to liability for possessing a dangerous weapon in furtherance of an assault per RCC § 22E-4104) or other RCC weapons offenses. The same analysis would apply for an imitation firearm under RCC § 22E-4104, but not any other kind of "imitation dangerous weapon." A defendant may not, however, be convicted of both a gradation of assault based on the use of a dangerous weapon and RCC § 22E-4104. In addition, depending on the facts of a given case, the display of a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon may be sufficient to establish liability for an attempt to commit a gradation of the revised assault statute requiring the harm be caused by "displaying or using" a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon, or possibly another RCC Chapter 12 offense.

[87] The RCC offensive physical contact statute (RCC § 22E-1205) does not provide a gradation for engaging in offensive physical contact with a dangerous weapon, but likely fact patterns would almost certainly constitute criminal threats.

[88] Current District case law establishes that "any object which the victim perceives to have the apparent ability to produce great bodily harm can be considered a dangerous weapon," Paris v. United States, 515 A.2d 199, 204 (D.C. 1986), and that "an imitation or blank pistol used in an assault by pointing it at another is a 'dangerous weapon' in that it is likely to produce great bodily harm." See, e.g., Harris v. United States, 333 A.2d 397, 400 (D.C. 1975). Under the revised assault statute, the use or display of such an object receives an enhanced penalty only if it causes the required bodily injury and satisfies the definitions of "dangerous weapon" or "imitation dangerous weapon."

[89] See, e.g., In re M.M.S., 691 A.2d 136, 138 (D.C. 1997) ("Finally, without direct evidence, the government may prove the existence of a weapon by adequate circumstantial evidence.").

[90] Under current District law, simple assault involving the use of a deadly or dangerous weapon may be enhanced by three different, largely overlapping, provisions. First, the assault may be charged as ADW under D.C. Code § 22-402, which is a felony with a ten year maximum prison sentence. Second, ADW is subject to further enhancement under D.C. Code § 22-4502 as a "crime of violence" if the offense is committed "when armed with or having readily available" any dangerous weapon. D.C. Code § 22-4502(a). ADW is not subject to the "while armed" enhancement under D.C. Code § 22-4501(a)(1), but the recidivist "while armed" enhancement does apply under D.C. Code § 22-4501(a)(2). McCall v. United States, 449 A.2d 1095, 1096 (D.C. 1982). Finally, if, while committing the assault, a person possessed a "pistol, machine gun, shotgun, rifle, or any other firearm or imitation firearm," he or she is guilty of the additional offense of possession of a firearm during a crime of violence (PFCOV). PFCOV is a felony with a maximum term of imprisonment of 15 years and a mandatory minimum term of imprisonment of five years. Despite the substantial overlap in prohibited conduct, the offenses of ADW and PFCOV do not merge. Freeman v. United States, 600 A.2d 1070, 1070 (D.C. 1991).

Fifth, the revised assault statute is no longer subject to a separate penalty enhancement for committing assault-type crimes "while armed" or "having readily available" a dangerous weapon. Current D.C. Code § 22-4502 provides severe, additional penalties for committing, attempting, soliciting, or conspiring to commit an array of assault-type offenses[91] "while armed" with or "having readily available" a dangerous weapon.[92] In contrast, the revised assault statute requires an individual to cause the injury "by displaying or using" a "dangerous weapon" or "imitation dangerous weapon," as those terms are defined in RCC § 22E-701, resulting in several changes to current District law. First, merely being armed with or having the weapon readily available is not sufficient for an enhanced assault penalty.[93] The use or display of a

The RCC removes the overlap between these multiple means of enhancing an armed assault and grades the offense according to the role of the weapon in the offense. In the RCC, the use or display of a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon, including a "firearm" or "imitation firearm," as those terms are defined in RCC § 22E-701, that causes the required bodily injury receives a single enhancement in the revised assault statute. If an individual merely possesses a dangerous weapon during an assault, or uses such a weapon, but the weapon does not cause the required bodily injury, the individual may still be subject to liability for possessing a dangerous weapon in furtherance of an assault per RCC § 22E-4104) or other RCC weapons offenses. The same analysis would apply for an "imitation firearm" under RCC § 22E-4104, but not any other kind of "imitation dangerous weapon." A defendant may not, however, be convicted of both a gradation of assault based on the use of a dangerous weapon and RCC § 22E-4104. In addition, depending on the facts of a given case, the display of a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon may be sufficient to establish liability for an attempt to commit assault, either with an assault weapons enhancement or without, or possibly another RCC Chapter 12 offense.

[91] Assault-type offenses subject to the enhancement in D.C. Code § 22-4502 include: aggravated assault, the collective "assault with intent to" offenses, felony assault on a police officer, assault with a dangerous weapon, malicious disfigurement, and mayhem.

[92] For a first offense of committing specified crimes of violence "while armed with or having readily available" a dangerous weapon, the defendant "may" receive a maximum term of imprisonment of up to 30 years. D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(1). If the defendant committed the offense "while armed with any pistol or firearm," however, he or she "shall" receive a five year "mandatory-minimum" term of imprisonment of not less than 5 years. D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(1). If the current conviction is for committing a specified crime of violence "while armed with or having readily available" a dangerous weapon and the defendant has at least one prior conviction for an armed crime of violence, the defendant "shall" be sentenced to "not less than 5 years" imprisonment and not more than 30 years. D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(2). If the current conviction is for committing a specified crime of violence "while armed with any pistol or firearm" and the defendant has the required prior conviction for an armed crime of violence, the defendant "shall" be "imprisoned for a mandatory-minimum term of not less than 10 years." D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(2). First degree murder, second degree murder, first degree sexual abuse, and first degree child sexual abuse "shall" receive the same minimum and mandatory minimum sentences as other crimes of violence committed "while armed with or having readily available" a dangerous weapon, except that the maximum term of imprisonment "shall" be life without parole as authorized elsewhere in the current District code. D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(3).

[93] The dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon must, directly or indirectly cause the resulting bodily injury. If an individual merely possesses a dangerous weapon during an assault, or uses or displays such a weapon, but the weapon does not cause the required bodily injury, the individual may still be subject to liability for possessing a dangerous weapon in furtherance of an assault per RCC § 22E-4104) or other RCC weapons offenses. The same analysis would apply for an imitation firearm under RCC § 22E-4104, but not any other kind of "imitation dangerous weapon." A defendant may not, however, be convicted of both a gradation of assault based on the use of a dangerous weapon and RCC § 22E-4104. In addition, depending on the facts of a given case, the display of a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon may be sufficient to establish liability for an attempt to commit a gradation of the revised assault statute dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon that falls short of causing the required types of bodily injury is no longer criminalized as assault.[94] Second, through the definitions of "dangerous weapon" and "imitation dangerous weapon" in RCC § 22E-701, the use or display of objects that the complaining witness incorrectly perceives to be a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon, no longer receives an enhanced penalty as they do under current District law.[95] Excluding these objects does not change District case law holding that circumstantial evidence may be sufficient to establish that a dangerous weapon was used.[96] Third, because the revised assault statute has specific penalty enhancements for the display or use of a dangerous weapon, it is no longer possible to enhance an assault with both a weapon enhancement and an enhancement based on the identity of the complainant,[97] or to double-stack different weapon penalties and offenses.[98] Fourth, the revised assault statute caps the maximum penalty for an requiring the harm be caused by "displaying or using" a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon, or possibly another RCC Chapter 12 offense.

[94] Instead, such threatening acts or offensive physical contact are prohibited by the criminal threats statute and its weapon enhancement (RCC § 22E-1204). The RCC offensive physical contact statute (RCC § 22E-1205) does not provide a gradation for engaging in offensive physical contact with a dangerous weapon, but likely fact patterns would almost certainly constitute criminal threats.

[95] Current District case law establishes that "any object which the victim perceives to have the apparent ability to produce great bodily harm can be considered a dangerous weapon," Paris v. United States, 515 A.2d 199, 204 (D.C. 1986), and the current "while armed" enhancement specifically includes imitation firearms. D.C. Code § 22-4502(a). Under the revised assault statute, the use or display of such an object receives an enhanced penalty only if it causes the required bodily injury and satisfies the definitions of "dangerous weapon" or "imitation dangerous weapon."

[96] See, e.g., In re M.M.S., 691 A.2d 136, 138 (D.C. 1997) ("Finally, without direct evidence, the government may prove the existence of a weapon by adequate circumstantial evidence.").

[97] There are several penalty enhancements under current District law based upon the age or work status of the complaining witness. See, e.g., D.C. Code §§ 22-3601 (enhancement for specified crimes committed against senior citizens); 22-3611 (enhancement for specified crimes committed against minors); 22-3751 (enhancement for specified crimes committed against taxicab drives); 22-3751.01 (enhancement for specified crimes committed against a transit operator or Metrorail station manager). Nothing in current District law appears to prohibit enhancing an assault with one or more of these separate enhancements based on age or work status, in addition to the weapon enhancement in current D.C. Code § 22-4502. Indeed, the facts as discussed in several DCCA cases indicate that such stacking does occur with the weapon enhancement and senior citizen enhancement. See, e.g., McClain v. United States, 871 A.2d 1185 (D.C. 2005) (determining "whether the trial court committed plain error when it instructed the jury regarding to lesser-included offenses of the crime of armed robbery of a senior citizen," charged under the enhancements in now D.C. Code §§ 22-4502 and 22-3601).

[98] Under current District law, certain crimes are considered "crimes of violence" and are subject to enhanced penalties under several overlapping provisions. First, crimes of violence are subject to enhancement under D.C. Code § 22-4502 if a person commits them "when armed with or having readily available" any dangerous weapon. D.C. Code § 22-402(a). A person so convicted with no prior convictions for certain armed crimes may be subjected to a significantly increased maximum term of imprisonment and "shall" receive a mandatory minimum prison sentence of five years if he or she committed the offense "while armed with any pistol or firearm." D.C. Code § 22-4501(a)(1). If the person has one or more prior convictions for armed offenses, he or she "shall" be subject to an increased maximum prison sentence as well as mandatory minimum sentences. D.C. Code § 22-4501(a)(2). ADW is a crime of violence, but it may not receive the "while armed" enhancement under D.C. Code § 22-4501(a)(1) because "the use of a dangerous weapon is already included as an element" of the offense. Gathy v. United States, 754 A.2d 912, 916 n.5 (D.C. 2000). ADW is subject to enhancement, however, under the recidivist while armed provision in D.C. Code § 22-4501(a)(2). McCall v. United States, 449 A.2d 1095, 1096 (D.C.

enhancement based on the display or use of a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon to never be greater than the most egregious type of physical harm that the revised assault statute prohibits—the purposeful infliction of a permanently disabling injury in paragraphs (a)(1) and (a)(2) of the revised assault statute. This change clarifies and reduces unnecessary overlap between multiple means of enhancing assaults committed with a weapon and improves the proportionality of the revised statute.[99]

Sixth, the revised assault statute's enhanced penalties for causing specified types of "bodily injury" to a law enforcement officer (LEO) partially replace[100] the separate assault on a police officer (APO) offenses. Under current District law, a simple assault against a LEO "on account of, or while that law enforcement officer is engaged in the 1982). Second, crimes of violence are subject to the additional, separate offense of possession of a firearm during a crime of violence (PFCOV) if a person possessed a "pistol, machine gun, shotgun, rifle, or any other firearm or imitation firearm" while committing the offense. PFCOV is a felony with a maximum term of imprisonment of 15 years and a mandatory minimum term of imprisonment of five years. Despite the substantial overlap in prohibited conduct, offenses enhanced with the "while armed" enhancement and PFCOV do not merge. See Little v. United States, 613 A.2d 880, 881 (D.C. 1992) (holding that a conviction for assault with intent to kill while armed does not merge with a conviction for PFCOV due to the holding in Thomas v. United States, 602 A2.d 647 (D.C. 1992)). Depending on the weapon at issue and the facts of a given case, additional offenses that may be charged include carrying dangerous weapons (D.C. Code § 22-4504) and possession of prohibited weapons (D.C. Code § 22-4514).

[99] Under current District law, simple assault involving the use of a deadly or dangerous weapon may be enhanced by three different, largely overlapping, provisions. First, the assault may be charged as ADW under D.C. Code § 22-402, which is a felony with a ten year maximum prison sentence. Second, ADW is subject to further enhancement under D.C. Code § 22-4502 as a "crime of violence" if the offense is committed "when armed with or having readily available" any dangerous weapon. D.C. Code § 22-4502(a). ADW is not subject to the "while armed" enhancement under D.C. Code § 22-4501(a)(1), but the recidivist "while armed" enhancement does apply under D.C. Code § 22-4501(a)(2). McCall v. United States, 449 A.2d 1095, 1096 (D.C. 1982). Finally, if, while committing the assault, a person possessed a "pistol, machine gun, shotgun, rifle, or any other firearm or imitation firearm," he or she is guilty of the additional offense of possession of a firearm during a crime of violence (PFCOV). PFCOV is a felony with a maximum term of imprisonment of 15 years and a mandatory minimum term of imprisonment of five years. Despite the substantial overlap in prohibited conduct, the offenses of ADW and PFCOV do not merge. Freeman v. United States, 600 A.2d 1070, 1070 (D.C. 1991).
The RCC removes the overlap between these multiple means of enhancing an armed assault and grades the offense according to the role of the weapon in the offense. In the RCC, the use or display of a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon, including a "firearm" or "imitation firearm," as those terms are defined in RCC § 22E-701, that causes the required bodily injury receives a single enhancement in the revised assault statute. If an individual merely possesses a dangerous weapon during an assault, or uses such a weapon, but the weapon does not cause the required bodily injury, the individual may still be subject to liability for possessing a dangerous weapon in furtherance of an assault per RCC § 22E-4104) or other RCC weapons offenses. The same analysis would apply for an "imitation firearm" under RCC § 22E-4104, but not any other kind of "imitation dangerous weapon." A defendant may not, however, be convicted of both a gradation of assault based on the use of a dangerous weapon and RCC § 22E-4104. In addition, depending on the facts of a given case, the display of a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon may be sufficient to establish liability for an attempt to commit assault, either with an assault weapons enhancement or without, or possibly another RCC Chapter 12 offense.

[100] As is discussed earlier in this commentary, "assault" in current District law includes a broad range of conduct that does not require "bodily injury" like the RCC assault statute does. Numerous other RCC offenses criminalize this conduct and should also be considered to replace the separate APO offenses even though they are generally not discussed in this entry.

performance of his or her official duties"[101] is a misdemeanor, with a maximum term of imprisonment of 6 months,[102] and an assault that causes "significant bodily injury" or "a violent act that creates a grave risk of causing significant bodily injury" carries a maximum penalty of ten years imprisonment.[103] In contrast, the revised assault statute provides enhanced penalties for injuries to LEOs for serious bodily injury, significant bodily injury, and bodily injury.

Codifying the LEO enhancement in the revised assault statute results in several changes to current District law. First, the LEO enhancement in the revised assault statute is limited to assaults that cause specified types of "bodily injury."[104] Conduct that fails to satisfy the revised assault statute, as well as "a violent act that creates a grave risk of significant bodily injury," may be criminalized elsewhere in the RCC.[105] Second, the revised assault statute provides substantial penalty enhancements for inflicting "serious bodily injury" on a LEO[106] and for causing "bodily injury" to a LEO,[107] both of which are absent in current District law. Third, the enhanced gradations of the revised assault offense require recklessness as to whether the LEO is a "protected person," rather than

[103] D.C. Code § 22-405(c).

[104] Limiting enhanced penalties for assaulting a LEO to causing specified physical injury is consistent with recent District legislation that amended the APO statute. Prior to June 30, 2016, in addition to an assault, the APO statute prohibited "resist[ing], oppos[ing], imped[ing], intimidate[ingt], or interfer[ing] with a law enforcement officer" in the course of his or her official duties or on account of those duties. D.C. Code § 22-405(b), (c) (repl.). On January 28, 2016, the Office of the District of Columbia Auditor issued a report titled "The Durability of Police Reform: The Metropolitan Police Department and Use of Force, 2008-2015," available at http://www.dcauditor.org/sites/default/files/Full%20Report_2.pdf (Office of the District of Columbia Auditor Report). The report recommended that the APO misdemeanor statute "be amended so that the elements of the offense require an actual assault rather than mere resistance or interference with a [Metropolitan Police Department] officer." Office of the District of Columbia Auditor Report at 107.
The Neighborhood Engagement Achieves Results Amendment Act of 2016 ("NEAR Act") amended the current APO statute by limiting it to "assault[s]" and created a new statute for resisting arrest (D.C. Code § 22-405.01). The Committee Report for this legislation cited the Office of the District of Columbia Auditor Report. Committee on the Judiciary, Report on Bill 21-0360, the "Neighborhood Engagement Achieves Results Amendment Act of 2016) (January 27, 2016).

[105] As is discussed elsewhere in this commentary, physical contacts that do not meet the revised definition of "bodily injury" in the RCC assault statute may be criminalized under other RCC offenses, such as the RCC offensive physical contact offense (RCC § 22E-1205), or sex offenses under RCC Chapter 13. Some of these offenses have identical provisions for a "protected person" and harming a complainant because of the complainant's status as a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or District official.

[106] It is unclear why the current APO statute does not enhance an assault that causes "serious bodily injury" when it does enhance an assault that causes "significant bodily injury." The limited legislative history for the current APO statute does not address the matter and the lack of an enhancement for "serious bodily injury" is inconsistent with other current penalty enhancements that apply enhanced penalties to aggravated assaults committed against complainants with a special status. See, e.g., D.C. Code §§ 22-3611(a), (c)(2) 23-1331(4) (penalty enhancement for crimes committed against minors applying to all "crime[s] of violence," which includes aggravated assault); 22-3751, 22-3751.01, 22-3752 (penalty enhancement for crimes committed against taxicab drivers, transit operators, and Metrorail station managers applying to aggravated assault).

negligence.[108] A culpable mental state of recklessness makes the enhanced LEO gradations of the revised assault statute consistent with the other enhancements in the revised offense that are based on the complainant's status. Fourth, the revised definition of "law enforcement officer" in RCC § 22E-701 changes the scope of the enhanced penalties in the revised assault statute as compared to the current APO statute,[109] particularly for certain members of fire departments, investigators, and code inspectors.[110] The commentary to RCC § 22E-701 discusses the revised definition of "law enforcement officer" in detail. Lastly, the revised assault statute does not enhance assaults against family members of LEOs due to their relation to a LEO, which is part of the repeal of the general provision prohibiting targeting family members of District officials and employees in D.C. Code § 22-851.[111] Collectively, these changes replace the APO offenses in current law with enhanced penalties in the gradations of the revised assault statute, improve the clarity of existing statutes, and generally provide for consistent treatment of LEOs and other specially protected complainants. The changes reduce unnecessary gaps and overlap between offenses, and improve the proportionality of the statutes as well.

Seventh, the revised assault statute's enhanced penalties for causing specified types of "bodily injury" partially replace[112] the current offenses of assault and aggravated [108] The current APO statute does not specify a culpable mental state for the fact that the complainant is a LEO in the course of his or her official duties. D.C. Code § 22-405(b), (c). However, DCCA case law suggests that a culpable mental state akin to negligence applies to this element. See, e.g., Scott. v. United States, 975 A.2d 831, 836 (D.C. 2009) ("To convict [appellant] of APO, the government was required to prove that . . . the defendant either knew or should have known [the complaining witness] was a police officer engaged in official duties."); In re J.S., 19 A.3d 328, 330 (D.C. 2011) ("Generally, to prove APO the government must show 'the elements of simple assault . . . plus the additional element that the defendant knew or should have known the victim was a police officer.'") (quoting Petway v. United States, 420 A.2d 1211, 1213 (D.C. 1980)).

[109] D.C. Code § 22-405(a) (defining "law enforcement officer.").

[110] It should be noted that while the RCC definition of "law enforcement officer" no longer includes these categories of complainants, they remain covered by the revised definition of "public safety employee," also defined in RCC § 22E-701. As such, they still receive enhanced protection as a category of "protected person" and as a category of complainant when the assault is committed with the purpose of harming the complainant due to the complainant's status.

[111] Current D.C. Code § 22-851(d) prohibits committing specified crimes, including "assault[s]" and "injur[ies]" against any "family member" of a District "official or employee" on account of the District official or employee's performance of official duties. "Family member" is defined as "an individual to whom the official or employee of the District of Columbia is related by blood, legal custody, marriage, domestic partnership, having a child in common, the sharing of a mutual residence, or the maintenance of a romantic relationship not necessarily including a sexual relationship" and District "official or employee" is defined as "a person who currently holds or formerly held a paid or unpaid position in the legislative, executive, or judicial branch of government of the District of Columbia, including boards and commissions." D.C. Code § 22-851(a), (d). Many law enforcement officers, as "LEO" is defined in the current APO statute, are District employees and therefore D.C. Code § 22-851 criminalizes targeting their families because of their relation to a LEO. However, there is no provision in current law prohibiting assaults with such motives against family members of other, non-District employees who fall within the definition of a "law enforcement officer."

[112] As is discussed earlier in this commentary, "assault" in current District law includes a broad range of conduct that does not require "bodily injury" like the RCC assault statute does. Numerous other RCC offenses criminalize this conduct and should also be considered to replace the separate assault and assault on a public vehicle inspection officer. Under current District law, "assault[ing]" a "public vehicle inspection officer" or "imped[ing], intimidate[ing], or interfer[ing] with" that officer while that officer "is engaged in or on account of the performance of his or her official duties" is a misdemeanor with a maximum term of imprisonment of 180 days.[113] If the accused causes "serious bodily injury," the offense is a felony with a maximum penalty of ten years imprisonment.[114] In contrast, in the revised assault statute, assaults against a "vehicle inspection officer"[115] receive enhanced penalties, but are no longer separate offenses. A "vehicle inspection" officer is included in the definition of "protected person" in RCC § 22E-701 as a "public safety employee," also defined in RCC § 22E-701. Since they are included in the definition of "public safety employee," vehicle inspection officers are also included in the assault penalty enhancements for having the purpose of harming the complainant due to the complainant's status. However, the conduct that receives an enhanced penalty is narrowed to causing bodily injury, significant bodily injury, or causing serious bodily injury. Conduct that falls short of these requirements may receive an enhanced penalty elsewhere in the RCC,[116] but conduct that consists merely of "imped[ing], intimidat[ing], or interfer[ing] with" a public vehicle inspection officer does not.

Replacing the offenses of assault and aggravated assault on a public vehicle inspection officer with the revised assault statute results in several additional changes to aggravated assault on a public vehicle inspection officer offenses even though they are generally not discussed in this entry.

[113] D.C. Code § 22-404.02.

[114] D.C. Code § 22-404.03(a)(1), (a)(2) (subsection (a)(1) requires "knowingly or purposely causes serious bodily injury to the public vehicle inspection officer" and subsection (a)(2) requires "under circumstances manifesting extreme indifference to human life . . . intentionally or knowingly engages in conduct which creates a grave risk of serious bodily injury to another person, and thereby causes serious bodily injury."). The term "serious bodily injury" is not statutorily defined and it is unclear whether the DCCA would apply the definition of "serious bodily injury" from the sexual abuse statutes to the offenses like it has with aggravated assault.

[115] Although the assault on a public vehicle inspection officer offenses in D.C. Code §§ 22-404.02 and 22-404.03 state that the term "public vehicle inspection officer shall have the same meaning as provided in § 50-303(19)," the term "public vehicle inspection officer" no longer exists in Title 50 of the D.C. Code. The definition of "public vehicle inspection officer" was repealed with the passage of the Vehicle-For-Hire Innovation Amendment Act of 2014 ("VFHIAA") (Mar. 10, 2015, D.C. Law 20-197, § 2(a), 61 DCR 12430). However, the VFHIAA included a substantially similar, new definition for a "vehicle inspection officer" and that RCC uses that term instead. D.C. Code § 50-301.03(30B) ("'Vehicle inspection officer' means a District employee trained in the laws, rules, and regulations governing public and private vehicle-for-hire service to ensure the proper provision of service and to support safety through street enforcement efforts, including traffic stops of public and private vehicles-for-hire, pursuant to protocol prescribed under this act and by regulation."). The VFHIAA legislative history does not appear to include reference to the assault on a public vehicle inspection officer offenses in D.C. Code §§ 22-404.02 and 22-404.03 or discuss how those offenses might be affected by the elimination of the term "public vehicle inspection officer."

[116] As is discussed elsewhere in this commentary, physical contacts that do not meet the revised definition of "bodily injury" in the RCC assault statute may be criminalized under other RCC offenses, such as the RCC offensive physical contact offense (RCC § 22E-1205), or sex offenses under RCC Chapter 13. Some of these offenses have identical provisions for a "protected person" and harming a complainant because of the complainant's status as a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or District official.

District law. First, under the revised assault statute, unlike current law,[117] there is no longer an automatic civil penalty of loss of a license to operate public vehicles-for-hire upon conviction of assault of a vehicle inspection officer. Second, the revised assault statute does not enhance assaults against family members of vehicle inspection officers because of their relation to the public vehicle inspection officers, which is part of the repeal of the general provision regarding targeting family members of District officials and employees in D.C. Code § 22-851.[118] Third, the revised assault statute does not bar justification and excuse defenses to resistance to a public vehicle inspection officer's civil enforcement authority.[119] This change clarifies the revised assault statute and reduces unnecessary overlap with other provisions that specially penalize assaults on District officials.

Eighth, the RCC definition of "protected person," discussed in the commentary to RCC § 22E-701, results in several changes to the scope of enhanced assault conduct. First, through the definition of "protected person," assaults against complainants under the age of 18 years or against complainants 65 years of age or older receive enhanced penalties in the revised assault offense, but only if certain age requirements are met. Current District law enhances various assault offenses against complainants under the age of 18 years if there is at least a two year age gap between the complainant and an actor that is 18 years of age or older,[120] and against all complainants 65 years of age or older.[121]

[117] D.C. Code §§ 22-404.02(b)(2), 22-404.03(b)(2) (stating that upon conviction for assault or aggravated assault of a public vehicle inspection officer, an individual "shall" "have his or her license or licenses for operating a public vehicle-for-hire, as required by the Commission pursuant to subchapter I of Chapter 3 of Title 50, revoked without further administrative action by the Commission.").

[118] Current D.C. Code § 22-851(d) prohibits committing specified crimes, including "assault[s]" and "injur[ies]" against any "family member" of a District "official or employee" on account of the District official or employee's performance of official duties. "Family member" is defined as "an individual to whom the official or employee of the District of Columbia is related by blood, legal custody, marriage, domestic partnership, having a child in common, the sharing of a mutual residence, or the maintenance of a romantic relationship not necessarily including a sexual relationship" and District "official or employee" is defined as "a person who currently holds or formerly held a paid or unpaid position in the legislative, executive, or judicial branch of government of the District of Columbia, including boards and commissions." D.C. Code § 22-851(a), (d). Vehicle inspection officers, as defined in D.C. Code § 50-301.03(30B), are District employees and therefore D.C. Code § 22-851 criminalizes targeting their families because of their relationship.

[119] The current assault on a public vehicle inspection officer statutes bar justification and excuse defenses to resistance to a public vehicle inspection officer's civil enforcement authority. D.C. Code §§ 22-404.02(c), 22-404.03(c) ("It is neither justifiable nor excusable for a person to use force to resist the civil enforcement authority exercised by an individual believed to be a public vehicle inspection officer, whether or not such enforcement action is lawful."). The RCC assault statute deletes this provision and bar to self-defense against a public vehicle inspection officer, and instead relies on the provision in RCC § 22E-403(b)(3). RCC § 22E-403(b)(3) provides an exception to defense of self or others when "The actor is reckless as to the fact that they are protecting themselves or another from lawful conduct." RCC § 22E-403(b)(3) allows an actor who otherwise meets the requirements for self-defense to use force to oppose a public vehicle inspection officer's use of force that either is not lawful or when the actor is not reckless as to the lawfulness. The RCC continues to bar a claim of self-defense whenever an actor is reckless as to the public vehicle inspection officer's conduct being lawful.

[120] D.C. Code § 22-3611(a) ("Any adult, being at least 2 years older than a minor, who commits a crime of violence against that minor may be punished by a fine of up to 1 ½ times the maximum fine otherwise authorized for the offense and may be imprisoned for a term of up to 1 ½ times the maximum term of imprisonment otherwise authorized for the offense, or both."); 22-3611(c)(1), (c)(3) (defining "adult" as "a

In contrast, the "protected person" gradations of the revised assault statute require at least a four year age gap between a complainant under 18 years of age and an actor that is 18 years of age or older, and require that the actor be under 65 years of age and at least 10 years younger than a complainant that is 65 years of age or older. With respect to minors, these age requirements are consistent with other offenses in current District law[122] and the age gap for seniors,[123] while new to District law, reserve the enhanced penalties for predatory behavior. Second, assaults against a driver of a private vehicle-for-hire, a "vulnerable adult," and a "public safety employee" receive new enhanced penalties in the revised assault statute through the definition of a "protected person." A driver of a private vehicle-for-hire does not receive any enhanced penalties under current District law, and a vulnerable adult[124] or "public safety employee"[125] receives enhanced penalties in a few non-assault offenses. In contrast, the "protected person" gradations of the revised assault statute recognize the prevalence of drivers of private vehicles-for-hire and the special status elsewhere under current District law for vulnerable adults and public safety employees. Third, assault offenses against a "citizen patrol member"[126] or a "District employee" no longer receive enhanced penalties in the revised assault offenses as they do under current District law.[127] The breadth of these current enhancements is inconsistent as compared to other penalty enhancements in current District law.

The RCC definition of "protected person" also makes broader changes to the revised assault statute. First, the "protected person" penalty enhancement applies to each type of "bodily injury" in the revised assault statute, whereas the various penalty person 18 years of age or older at the time of the offense" and a "minor" as "a person under 18 years of age at the time of the offense.").

[121] D.C. Code § 22-3601(a) ("Any person who commits any offense listed in subsection (b) of this section against an individual who is 65 years of age or older, at the time of the offense, may be punished by a fine of up to 1 1/2 times the maximum fine otherwise authorized for the offense and may be imprisoned for a term of up to 1 1/2 times the maximum term of imprisonment otherwise authorized for the offense, or both.").

[122] Many of the District's offenses against complainants under the age of 18 years require at least a four year age gap between the actor and the complainant. See, e.g., D.C. Code §§ 22-3008, 22-3009, 22-3001(3) (child sexual abuse statutes and defining "child" as "a person who has not yet attained the age of 16 years."); 22-3010, 22-3001(3) (enticing a child statute and defining "child" as "a person who has not yet attained the age of 16 years."); 22-3010.02 (arranging for a sexual contact with a real or fictitious child and defining "child" as "a person who has not yet attained the age of 16 years."); 22-811(a), (f)(1), (f)(2) (contributing to the delinquency of a minor statute and defining "adult" as "a person 18 years of age or older at the time of the offense" and "minor" as "a person under 18 years of age at the time of the offense.").

[123] None of the District's offenses targeting harms against complainants that are over the age of 65 years require any age gap between the actor and the complainant. See D.C. Code §§ 22-932, 22-933, 22-933.01, 22-934. However, requiring at least a ten year age gap between an actor that is under the age of 65 years and a complainant that is at least 65 years of age is consistent with requiring an age gap in the offenses against complainants that are under 18 years of age. The 10 year age gap recognizes that both the complainant and the actor are adults, as opposed to teenagers.

enhancements in current District law apply inconsistently to simple assault,[128] the "assault with intent to" offenses,[129] and the various felony assault offenses,[130] resulting in disproportionate penalties for similar conduct. Second, the revised assault statute applies a mental state of "recklessness" to whether the complainant is a "protected person." None of the separate penalty enhancements under current District law specify a culpable mental state, but the penalty enhancements for senior citizens[131] and minors[132] have affirmative defenses for a reasonable mistake of age. The "reckless" culpable mental state in the protected person penalty enhancements preserves the substance of these affirmative defenses[133] and establishes a consistent culpable mental state requirement for

[128] Only one of the separate penalty enhancements under current District law applies to simple assault—the enhancement for crimes against citizen patrol members. D.C. Code § 22-3602(c). Assaulting or injury a District "official or employee" also receives an enhanced penalty under the protection of District public officials statute. D.C. Code § 22-851(c).

[129] Of the separate penalty enhancements under current District law, only the separate enhancements for crimes against senior citizens and crimes against minors apply to all the AWI offenses. D.C. Code §§ 22-3601(b); 22-3611(c)(2). No AWI offenses are covered in the separate enhancements for crimes against taxicab drives or crimes against transit operators and Metrorail station managers. D.C. Code § 22-3752. The separate enhancement for crimes against citizen patrol members, D.C. Code § 22-3602, only applies to assault with intent to commit "forcible rape," which is an offense that no longer exists after the District's sexual abuse laws were revised in 1995. D.C. Code § 22-4801 (repl.). It is unclear whether assault with intent to commit an offense such as first degree sexual abuse would be covered by the enhancement. The protection of District public officials statute does not specifically mention AWI offenses, but does include "assault[s]" and "injure[s]." D.C. Code § 22-851(c).

[130] All the separate penalty enhancements under current District law apply to aggravated assault and ADW, D.C. Code §§ 22-3601(b); 22-3602(c); 22-3611(b)(2); 22-3752, but they do not consistently apply to other felony assault offenses. For example, only the separate enhancement for crimes against minors applies to assault with significant bodily injury. D.C. Code § 22-3611(c)(2). The separate penalty enhancements also apply inconsistently to malicious disfigurement and mayhem, with the citizen patrol enhancement applying only to mayhem, D.C. Code § 22-3602, and the other penalty enhancements applying to both offenses. D.C. Code §§ 22-3601(b); 22-3611(b)(2); 22-3752. The protection of District public officials statute does not specifically mention any felony assault offenses or mayhem or disfigurement, but does include "assault[s]" and "injure[s]." D.C. Code § 22-851(c).

The separate enhancements are also inconsistent in whether they apply to attempts, conspiracies, or solicitations to commit the specified offenses, or some combination thereof. D.C. Code §§ 22-3601 (senior citizen enhancement applying to attempt or conspiracy); 22-3602 (citizen patrol enhancement applying to conspiracy); 22-3611 (crimes against minors enhancement applying to attempt, conspiracy, or solicitation); 22-3752 (statute enumerating offenses for enhancement for taxicab drivers, transit operators, and Metrorail station managers applying to attempt and conspiracy).

[131] D.C. Code § 22-3601(c) ("It is an affirmative defense that the accused knew or reasonably believed the victim was not 65 years old or older at the time of the offense, or could not have known or determined the age of the victim because of the manner in which the offense was committed. This defense shall be established by a preponderance of the evidence.").

[132] D.C. Code § 22-3611(b) ("It is an affirmative defense that the accused reasonably believed that the victim was not a minor at the time of the offense. This defense shall be established by a preponderance of the evidence.").

[133] The current enhancement for crimes against senior citizens makes it a defense that "the accused knew or reasonably believed the victim was not 65 years old or older at the time of the offense, or could not have known or determined the age of the victim because of the manner in which the offense was committed." D.C. Code § 22-3601(c). Similarly, the current enhancement for crimes against minors has an affirmative defense that "the accused reasonably believed that the victim was not a minor at the time of the offense." D.C. Code § 22-3611(b). In the RCC, it must be proven that an actor was reckless that the complainant was 65 years or older or under 18 years of age. The actor must consciously disregard a substantial risk that each category of complainant in the RCC definition of "protected person." Finally, the RCC assault statute prohibits the stacking of multiple penalty enhancements based on the categories in the definition of "protected person" and stacking of penalty enhancements for a protected person and the use of a weapon.[134]

Collectively, these changes provide a consistent enhanced penalty for assaulting the categories of individuals included in the definition of "protected person," removing gaps in the current patchwork of separate enhancements, clarifying the law, and improving the proportionality of offenses.

Ninth, the revised assault statute enhances the penalty for assaults committed against LEOs, public safety employees, or District officials when the assault is committed with the "purpose of harming the complainant because of the complainant's status" as a LEO, public safety employee, or District official. Current District law has separate penalty enhancements or enhanced penalties for committing assault-type offenses because of the complainant's status as a LEO,[135] a member of a citizen patrol,[136] a District "official or employee,"[137] or a "family member" of a District "official or a circumstance (here the fact that the complainant is over 65 or under 18) exists; and the risk must be of such a nature and degree that, considering the nature of and motivation of the person's conduct (here, assaulting the complainant) and the circumstances the person is aware of, the person's conscious disregard is a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct. Per RCC § 22E-206, a reasonable mistake as to the complainant's age would negate the recklessness required for an age-based gradation enhancement for assault. See RCC § 22E-208(b)(3) and accompanying commentary, providing that a reasonable mistake as to a circumstance element negates the existence of recklessness as to that element.

However, given the inherent difficulty in judging the age of another person, an actor who assesses a person's age based on appearance alone likely would be reckless as to the person being over 65 or under 18 if the actor judges a person to be very close in age to the 65 and 18 year old thresholds. For example, if an actor assessed the complainant's age to be in their early 60s based on appearance alone, the actor is likely aware of a substantial risk that the complainant is actually 65 years or older. Whether the actor's disregard of such risk is a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct will depend on why the risk was ignored. For example, an assault based on the actor's allegedly knocking down and harming a complainant, reckless that they were 67 year old might reach different conclusions as to the deviation from the standard of conduct depending on whether the actor was running to a hospital to see a family member versus an actor who was running to the front of a line to see a sports star. Ultimately it is up to the factfinder to determine whether an actor's alleged mistake as to age of the complainant is reasonable given the facts of the case.

[134] Current District statutory law does not prevent stacking of such enhancements, and case law has not addressed the stacking of enhancements based on the categories covered in the RCC definition of protected person. However, convictions have been upheld applying both a "while armed" enhancement under D.C. Code § 22-4502 and an enhancement based on the victim's status as a senior or minor.

[135] D.C. Code § 22-405(b), (c) (prohibiting assaulting a LEO, assaulting a LEO with significant bodily injury, or committing a "violent act that creates a grave risk of causing significant bodily injury" to the LEO "on account of . . . the performance of his or her official duties.").

[136] D.C. Code § 22-3602(b) (prohibiting committing specified offenses against a member of a citizen patrol "because of the member's participation in a citizen patrol."); 22-3602(a) (defining "citizen patrol" as "a group of residents of the District of Columbia organized for the purpose of providing additional security surveillance for certain District of Columbia neighborhoods with the goal of crime prevention. The term shall include, but is not limited to, Orange Hat Patrols, Red Hat Patrols, Blue Hat Patrols, or Neighborhood Watch Associations.").

[137] Current D.C. Code § 22-851(c) prohibits committing specified crimes, including "assault[s]" and "injur[ies]" against any District "official or employee," broadly defined as "a person who currently holds or employee."[138] Current District law also enhances the penalty for the murder of a "public safety employee"[139] on account of the complainant's status. In contrast, the revised assault statute limits this type of enhanced penalty to a "law enforcement officer" and a "District official," and extends it to a "public safety employee," resulting in several changes to current District law. First, as is discussed in the commentary to RCC § 22E-701, the revised definitions of "law enforcement officer," "District official," and "public safety employee" change the scope of the revised enhancements as compared to current District law. Second, assaults committed against a citizen patrol member, a District "employee," or the "family member" of a District "official or employee" because of the complainant's status no longer receive an enhanced penalty. These provisions raise a number of difficult definitional issues[140] and current sentencing practices in the District indicate that these penalty enhancements rarely, if ever, are necessary to proportionate sentences. Third, the enhancement applies consistently to each type of "bodily injury" in the revised assault statute, whereas the various penalty enhancements in current District law apply inconsistently to simple assault,[141] the "assault with intent to" offenses,[142] and formerly held a paid or unpaid position in the legislative, executive, or judicial branch of government of the District of Columbia, including boards and commissions." D.C. Code § 22-851(c), (a)(2).

[138] Current D.C. Code § 22-851(d) prohibits committing specified crimes, including "assault[s]" and "injur[ies]" against any "family member" of a District "official or employee." "Family member" is defined as "an individual to whom the official or employee of the District of Columbia is related by blood, legal custody, marriage, domestic partnership, having a child in common, the sharing of a mutual residence, or the maintenance of a romantic relationship not necessarily including a sexual relationship" and District "official or employee" is defined as "a person who currently holds or formerly held a paid or unpaid position in the legislative, executive, or judicial branch of government of the District of Columbia, including boards and commissions." D.C. Code § 22-851(a), (d).

[139] D.C. Code § 22-2106(a) ("Whoever, with deliberate and premeditated malice, and with knowledge or reason to know that the victim is a law enforcement officer or public safety employee, kills any law enforcement officer or public safety employee engaged in, or on account of, the performance of such officer's or employee's official duties . . . .").

[140] For example, the enhancement for District employees in D.C. Code § 22-851(b) states that it applies "while the official or employee is engaged in the performance of his or her duties or on account of the performance of those duties." However, District case law has held, in construing other statutes, that a law enforcement officer may be considered always on duty, Mattis v. United States, 995 A.2d 223, 225 (D.C. 2010). There follows an ambiguity whether any assault of a law enforcement officer is subject to heightened liability—regardless whether the assault was part of a domestic dispute or the officer was off-duty and not known to the assailant as an officer. The RCC, instead, through a separate reference to law enforcement officers as protected persons, provides heightened penalties where an officer is assaulted while in the performance of his or her duties.

[141] Only one of the separate penalty enhancements under current District law applies to simple assault—the enhancement for crimes against citizen patrol members. D.C. Code § 22-3602(c). Assaulting or injury a District "official or employee" also receives an enhanced penalty under the protection of District public officials statute. D.C. Code § 22-851(c).

[142] Of the separate penalty enhancements under current District law, only the separate enhancements for crimes against senior citizens and crimes against minors apply to all the AWI offenses. D.C. Code §§ 22-3601(b); 22-3611(c)(2). No AWI offenses are covered in the separate enhancements for crimes against taxicab drives or crimes against transit operators and Metrorail station managers. D.C. Code § 22-3752. The separate enhancement for crimes against citizen patrol members, D.C. Code § 22-3602, only applies to assault with intent to commit "forcible rape," which is an offense that no longer exists after the District's sexual abuse laws were revised in 1995. D.C. Code § 22-4801 (repl.). It is unclear whether assault with intent to commit an offense such as first degree sexual abuse would be covered by the enhancement. The

the various felony assault offenses,[143] resulting in disproportionate penalties for similar conduct. Codifying enhanced protection for assaulting individuals based on their status as LEOs, public safety employees, or District officials clarifies the law and improves the proportionality of offenses.

Tenth, the revised assault statute eliminates the separate assault offense of "willfully poisoning any well, spring, or cistern of water."[144] Current D.C. Code § 22-401 contains a provision that appears to separately criminalize such poisoning of a water supply, regardless of whether the poisoning results in injury to a person or there was intent to injure a person. No case law exists interpreting this provision. In contrast, the revised assault statute does not criminalize such poisoning except insofar as such conduct may constitute an attempted assault. Another District felony currently criminalizes such a poisoning,[145] and, depending on the facts of the case such poisoning may constitute attempted murder under RCC § 22E-1101, or an attempted assault. This change improves the proportionality of District offenses by punishing such conduct consistent with other inchoate attempts to harm persons.

Eleventh, under the revised assault statute, the general culpability principles for self-induced intoxication in RCC § 22E-209 allow a defendant to claim he or she did not act "recklessly, under circumstances manifesting extreme indifference to human life," or "purposely" due to his or her self-induced intoxication. Under subsection (f), a factfinder may impute awareness of the risk required to prove the defendant acted with extreme indifference to human life. The current assault statute is silent as to the effect of intoxication. However, District case law appears to have established that assault is a general intent offense,[146] which would preclude a defendant from receiving a jury protection of District public officials statute does not specifically mention AWI offenses, but does include "assault[s]" and "injure[s]." D.C. Code § 22-851(c).

[143] All the separate penalty enhancements under current District law apply to aggravated assault and ADW, D.C. Code §§ 22-3601(b); 22-3602(c); 22-3611(b)(2); 22-3752, but they do not consistently apply to other felony assault offenses. For example, only the separate enhancement for crimes against minors applies to assault with significant bodily injury. D.C. Code § 22-3611(c)(2). The separate penalty enhancements also apply inconsistently to malicious disfigurement and mayhem, with the citizen patrol enhancement applying only to mayhem, D.C. Code § 22-3602, and the other penalty enhancements applying to both offenses. D.C. Code §§ 22-3601(b); 22-3611(b)(2); 22-3752. The protection of District public officials statute does not specifically mention any felony assault offenses or mayhem or disfigurement, but does include "assault[s]" and "injure[s]." D.C. Code § 22-851(c).

The separate enhancements are also inconsistent in whether they apply to attempts, conspiracies, or solicitations to commit the specified offenses, or some combination thereof. D.C. Code §§ 22-3601 (senior citizen enhancement applying to attempt or conspiracy); 22-3602 (citizen patrol enhancement applying to conspiracy); 22-3611 (crimes against minors enhancement applying to attempt, conspiracy, or solicitation); 22-3752 (statute enumerating offenses for taxicab drivers, transit operators, and Metrorail station managers applying to attempt and conspiracy).

[144] D.C. Code § 22-401.

[145] Current District law has an offense for maliciously polluting water. D.C. Code § 22-3318 ("Every person who maliciously commits any act by reason of which the supply of water, or any part thereof, to the City of Washington, becomes impure, filthy, or unfit for use, shall be fined not less than $500 and not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, or imprisoned at hard labor not more than 3 years nor less than 1 year.").

[146] For District case law establishing that assault is a general intent crime, see, for example, Smith v. United States, 593 A.2d 205, 206–07 (D.C. 1991) and Perry v. United States, 36 A.3d 799, 823 (D.C. 2011). For District case law indicating that a voluntary intoxication defense may not be raised to an assault charge, see instruction on whether intoxication prevented the defendant from forming the necessary culpable mental state requirement for the crime.[147] This DCCA case law would also likely mean that a defendant would be precluded from directly raising—though not necessarily presenting evidence in support of[148]—the claim that, due to his or her self-induced intoxicated state, the defendant did not act "recklessly, under circumstances manifesting extreme indifference to human life," or "purposely" as required for more serious forms of assault.[149] By contrast, under the revised assault offense, a defendant would both have a basis for, and will be able to raise and present relevant and admissible evidence in support of, a claim that voluntary intoxication prevented the defendant from forming the culpable mental states of "recklessly, under circumstances manifesting extreme indifference to human life," or "purposely" as required to prove some types of assaults. Likewise, where appropriate, the defendant would be entitled to an instruction, which clarifies that a not guilty verdict is necessary if the defendant's intoxicated state precludes the government from meeting its burden of proof with respect to the culpable mental state of "recklessly, under circumstances manifesting extreme indifference to human life," or "purposely" at issue in assault.[150] However, subsection (h) allows a fact finder to impute awareness of the risk required to prove that the defendant acted with extreme indifference to human life, when the lack of awareness was due to self-induced intoxication. But in some rare cases, a defendant's self-induced intoxication may still negate finding that he or she acted with extreme indifference to human life, as required for second degree murder. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the offense.

Twelfth, due to the revised definition of "serious bodily injury" in RCC § 22E-701, second degree assault of the revised assault statute no longer specifically include rendering a complainant "unconscious," causing "extreme physical pain," or impairment of a "mental faculty." The current aggravated assault statute prohibits "serious bodily injury."[151] While there is no statutory definition of the term's meaning, the definition of

On the other hand, if the government has proved beyond a reasonable doubt that [name of defendant] could and did form the intent to [^], along with every other element of the offense, then you must find him/her guilty of the offense of [^] .").

[148] Whether intoxication evidence may be presented when it cannot negate intent is less clear. Compare Carter v. United States, 531 A.2d 956, 963 (D.C. 1987) with Cooper v. United States, 680 A.2d 1370, 1372 (D.C. 1996); Parker v. United States, 359 F.2d 1009, 1012–13 (D.C. Cir. 1966)); see also Buchanan, 32 A.3d at 996 (Ruiz, J., concurring) (discussing Parker).

[149] This is so, moreover, notwithstanding the fact that the defendant, due to his or her self-induced intoxicated state, may not have actually possessed the knowledge required for any element of offensive physical context.

[150] These results are a product of the logical relevance principle set forth in RCC § 22E-209(a) and the fact that knowledge and intent is a mental state susceptible to negation by self-induced intoxication. See RCC § 22E-209(b).

"serious bodily injury" under DCCA case law for aggravated assault includes "unconsciousness, extreme physical pain . . . or protracted loss or impairment of the function of a . . . mental faculty."[152] As discussed in the commentary to the revised definition in RCC § 22E-701, these provisions in the current definition are difficult to measure and may include within the definition physical harms that fall short of the high standard the definition requires. In contrast, the revised definition of "serious bodily injury," and the revised second degree assault offenses, are limited to a substantial risk of death, protracted and obvious disfigurement, protracted loss or impairment of the function of a bodily member or organ, or protracted loss of consciousness. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised offenses.

Thirteenth, the revised assault statute replaces certain minimum statutory penalties for assault with intent to commit first degree sexual abuse, second degree sexual abuse, or child sexual abuse[153] and assault with a dangerous weapon on a police officer.[154] These minimum statutory penalties require specified prior convictions, and it is unclear how the general recidivist statutes in the current D.C. Code apply, if at all, to these provisions.[155] There is no clear rationale for such special sentencing provisions in these offenses as compared to other offenses. In contrast, the revised assault statute is subject to a single recidivist penalty enhancement in RCC § 22E-606 that applies to all offenses in the RCC. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense.

Fourteenth, the revised assault statute deletes the limitation on justification and excuse defenses that is in the current D.C. Code assault on a police officer (APO) statute. The current D.C. Code APO statute states "[i]t is neither justifiable nor excusable cause for a person to use force to resist an arrest when such an arrest is made by an individual he or she has reason to believe is a law enforcement officer, whether or not such arrest is lawful."[156] This provision is a categorical bar to self-defense against the use of force that is not excessive by a law enforcement officer (LEO).[157] In contrast, the RCC assault statute deletes this provision and bar to self-defense against a law enforcement officer, and instead relies on the provision in RCC § 22E-403(b)(3). RCC § 22E-403(b)(3)

[152] The DCCA has adopted for the aggravated assault offense the definition of "serious bodily injury" currently codified for the sexual abuse offenses in D.C. Code § 22-3001. Nixon v. United States, 730 A.2d 145, 150 (D.C. 1999).

[153] D.C. Code § 24-403.01(e) ("The sentence imposed under this section on a person who was over 18 years of age at the time of the offense and was convicted of assault with intent to commit first or second degree sexual abuse or child sexual abuse in violation of § 22-401…shall be not less than 2 years if the violation occurs after the person has been convicted in the District of Columbia or elsewhere of a crime of violence as defined in § 22-4501, providing for the control of dangerous weapons in the District of Columbia.").

[154] D.C. Code § 24-403.01(f) ("The sentence imposed under this section shall not be less than 1 year for a person who was over 18 years of age at the time of the offense and was convicted of: (1) Assault with a dangerous weapon on a police officer in violation of § 22-405, occurring after the person has been convicted of a violation of that section or of a felony, either in the District of Columbia or in another jurisdiction.").

[156] D.C. Code § 22-405(d).

[157] Current D.C. Code § 22-405 and § 22-405.01 provide that it is: "neither justifiable nor excusable cause for a person to use force to resist an arrest when such an arrest is made by an individual he or she has reason to believe is a law enforcement officer, whether or not such arrest is lawful."

provides an exception to defense of self or others when "The actor is reckless as to the fact that they are protecting themselves or another from lawful conduct." RCC § 22E-403(b)(3) allows an actor who otherwise meets the requirements for self-defense to use force to oppose a law enforcement officer's use of force that either is not lawful or when the actor is not reckless as to the lawfulness. The RCC continues to bar a claim of self-defense whenever an actor is reckless as to the law enforcement officer's conduct being lawful. By eliminating the special bar on self-defense against an unlawful arrest, the RCC effectively reverts to the common law rule regarding defense against a law enforcement officer which existed in the District until Congress passed a new statute with a new policy in 1970.[158] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Beyond these fourteen changes to current District law, four other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised assault statute requires a culpable mental state of recklessness for the lower-level gradations of assault, third degree and fourth degree. The current D.C. Code is silent as to the culpable mental states required for simple assault,[159] but the current felony assault with significant bodily injury statute requires recklessness.[160] Current District case law suggests that recklessness may suffice for simple assault.[161] However, the DCCA has recently declined to state that recklessness, versus a higher culpable mental state, is sufficient,[162] and, in the context of intent-to-frighten assault, has [158] As explained by the DCCA in McDonald v. United States, "The legislative history indicates that Congress intended to adopt 'the modern rule' in recognition that it is no longer necessary for a citizen to resist what he suspects may be an illegal arrest since criminal procedural rights (such as prompt presentment, Fed. R. Crim. Proc. 5(b) & (c)) as well as civil remedies under the Civil Rights Act of 1871, 42 U.S.C. § 1983) are readily available. H.R.Rep. No. 907 at 71–72." McDonald v. United States, 496 A.2d 274, 276 (D.C. 1985).

[161] Simple assault is a lesser included offense of offenses such as ADW, assault with significant bodily injury, and aggravated assault. See Williams v. United States, 106 A.3d 1063, 1065 & n.5 (D.C. 2015) (referring to simple assault as a lesser included offense of ADW); Woods v. United States, 65 A.3d 667, 668 (D.C. 2013) (referring to simple assault as a lesser included offense of assault with significant bodily injury); McCloud v. United States, 781 A.2d 744, 746 (D.C. 2001) (referring to simple assault as a lesser included of aggravated assault). The lesser included offense relationship between simple assault and ADW and simple assault and aggravated assault suggests that recklessness should suffice for simple assault because proof of recklessness or extreme recklessness satisfies these greater offenses. See Vines v. United States, 70 A.3d 1170, 1180 (D.C. 2013), as amended (Sept. 19, 2013) ("[I]t is clear that a conviction for ADW can be sustained by proof of reckless conduct alone."); 22-404.01(a)(2) (aggravated assault statute requiring "under circumstances manifesting extreme indifference to human life, that person intentionally or knowingly engages in conduct which creates a grave risk of serious bodily injury to another person and thereby causes serious bodily injury.").

[162] Recently, the DCCA explicitly declined to decide whether assault requires recklessness or a higher culpable mental state like intent to injure, stating "[e]ven if the greater proof was necessary, the jury could permissibly infer such intent from [appellant's] extremely reckless conduct, which posed a high risk of injury to those around him. Vines v. United States, 70 A.3d 1170, 1181 (D.C. 2013), as amended (Sept. 19, 2013).

suggested that a higher culpable mental state than recklessness is required.[163] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised assault statute clearly establishes that recklessness is sufficient for specified gradations. This is consistent with prevailing District case law (including District case law on voluntary intoxication[164]), and is consistent with current District statutes. This change improves the clarity of the law.

Second, through the definition of "bodily injury" in RCC § 22E-701, the revised assault statute clarifies the minimal harm that is required. Current District assault statutes do not address whether they cover any infliction of pain or causing illness or impairment of physical condition. District case law has established that any non-consensual touching, even without pain, is simple assault,[165] although a recent DCCA case that is in active litigation may ultimately call into question whether this is sufficient.[166] However, whether recklessly causing illness or impairment of someone's physical condition constitutes simple assault under current law is not established. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised assault statute requires "bodily injury," defined in RCC § 22E-701 as "physical pain, physical injury, illness, or impairment of physical condition," to clarify the minimal harm that is required. Use of the defined term "bodily injury" clarifies that not only physical contacts that result in pain are criminal under the [163] Powell v. United States, 238 A.3d 954, 959 (D.C. 2020) ("Our additional concern is whether the evidence proved that appellant had the mens rea required for intent-to-frighten assault: a 'purposeful design ... to engender fear' or 'create apprehension.') (quoting Parks v. United States, 627 A.2d 1, 5 (D.C. 1993); id. at 959 ("For similar reasons, we conclude that the evidence was insufficient for conviction even if we assume arguendo that the mens rea for intent-to-frighten assault can be satisfied by evidence of recklessness.").

[164] Under District law, voluntary intoxication cannot constitute a defense to a "general intent" crime. Kyle v. United States, 759 A.2d 192, 199-200 (D.C. 2000). In accordance with this rule, assault appears to be a general intent crime, to which an intoxication defense may not be raised. Parker v. United States, 359 F.2d 1009, 1013 n.4 (D.C. Cir. 1966) ("It seems clear that, regardless of the definition, voluntary intoxication is no defense to simple assault.") (citing McGee v. State, 4 Ala. App. 54, 58 So. 1008 (1912), and State v. Truitt, 21 Del. 466, 62 A. 790 (1904)); see, e.g., Smith v. United States, 593 A.2d 205, 206–07 (D.C. 1991) (observing that assault is a general intent crime); Perry v. United States, 36 A.3d 799, 823 (D.C. 2011) (same); see also Buchanan v. United States, 32 A.3d 990, 996-98 (D.C. 2011) (Ruiz, J. concurring) (discussing the relationship between the law of intoxication and assault's status as a general intent crime). The RCC does not recognize the distinction between general and specific intent crimes for purposes of the law of intoxication; instead, it employs an imputation approach under which the culpable mental state of recklessness, as defined under RCC § 22E-206(c), may be imputed—notwithstanding the absence of awareness of a substantial risk—based upon the self-induced intoxication of the actor. See RCC § 209(c). Under this new approach, application of a recklessness (or negligence) culpable mental state to a revised offense roughly approximates District law governing general intent crimes. See First Draft of Report No. 3, Recommendations for Chapter 2 of the Revised Criminal Code—Mistake, Deliberate Ignorance, and Intoxication, at 27-31 (March 13, 2017).

[165] See, e.g., Mahaise v. United States, 722 A.2d 29, 30 (D.C. 1988) ("A battery is any unconsented touching of another person. Since an assault is simply an attempted battery, every completed battery necessarily includes an assault. Appellant's statement that he removed the phone from the complainant's hand and then took her cigarette from her other hand and extinguished it is thus an admission, at least prima facie, of two separate assaultive acts.") (citing Ray v. United States, 575 A.2d 1196, 1199 (D.C. 1990).

[166] A panel of the DCCA recently ruled (in an opinion since vacated pending an en banc ruling) that unwanted touchings do not necessarily constitute "force or violence" necessary for assault liability. Perez Hernandez v. United States, 207 A.3d 594, 604 (D.C.), vacated, 207 A.3d 605 (D.C. 2019).

RCC assault statute, but also potentially painless harms such as sickness[167] or impaired physical conditions.[168] As is discussed elsewhere in this commentary, physical contacts that do not meet the revised definition of "bodily injury" may be criminalized under other RCC offenses, such as the RCC offensive physical contact offense (RCC § 22E-1205), or sex offenses under RCC Chapter 13. This change improves the clarity of the revised statute and may remove a possible gap in liability.

Third, the revised assault statute codifies an effective consent defense, discussed extensively in the explanatory note to the offense. The District's current assault statutes do not address whether consent of the complainant is a defense to liability, nor do District statutes otherwise codify general defenses to criminal conduct. Longstanding case law of the United States Court of Appeals District of Columbia Circuit (D.C. Cir.) in Guarro v. United States has recognized that consent is a defense to assault, at least in the case of a nonviolent sexual touching.[169] A recent DCCA opinion in Woods v. United States, however, held that consent of the complainant is not a defense to assault in a public place that causes significant bodily injury, but explicitly declined to rule on the effect of consent in other circumstances.[170] Another court ruling is pending regarding the elements of assault that may expand upon the requirement of lack of consent.[171] To resolve this ambiguity, the revised assault statute effective consent defense clarifies when the actor's reasonable belief that the complainant or a "person with legal authority over the complainant," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701, has given "effective consent" is a defense. The revised statute's effective consent defenses specifically addresses situations where the person giving effective consent is an adult or under 18 years of age. This change improves the clarity of the law and, to the extent it may result in a change, improves the proportionality of the offense by ensuring that consensual and legal activities are not criminalized.

Fourth, the revised assault statute codifies an exclusion from liability for conduct that is specifically permitted by a District statute or regulation. The District's current assault statutes do not address whether conduct that is specifically permitted under another District law or regulation can result in criminal liability for assault. The [167] Recklessly engaging in nonconsensual physical contact that transmits a disease to another person may suffice for assault liability. However, particular care should be given to the gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct requirement in the RCC definition of recklessness. For example, a sneezy office worker who disregards a substantial risk that he will transmit a cold virus to others by working in proximity to them would not ordinarily satisfy the requirement of bodily injury, whereas, a sneezy surgeon who disregards a substantial risk that she will transmit a cold virus to a patient undergoing a procedure and having a compromised immune system may satisfy the requirement of bodily injury for assault liability. Note, however, that effective consent may be a defense in any of these examples, under the effective consent defenses in subsection (f) of the revised statute.

[168] For example, a person who surreptitiously adds alcohol to another's drink, consciously disregarding a substantial risk that the alcohol will alter the drinker's physical condition, such as their sense of balance, may satisfy the requirement of bodily injury for assault liability if the "gross deviation from the standard of conduct" requirement in the definition of "recklessness," per RCC § 22E-206, is met.

[169] 237 F.2d 578, 581 (1956) ("Nevertheless the evidence in the instant case cannot support a conviction for assault unless it appears that there was no actual or apparent consent. Generally where there is consent, there is no assault. 1 Wharton, Criminal Law §§ 180, 751 (12th ed. 1932).").

[170] Woods v. U.S., 65 A.3d 667, 672 (D.C. 2013).

exclusion resolves any apparent conflict within District laws. For example, Title 22, Health, of the current D.C. Municipal Regulations, has regulations that specifically refer to immunity from assault liability that clearly will satisfy this exclusion from liability.[172] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, the revised assault statute codifies the culpable mental state in the District's current aggravated assault statute as "recklessly, with extreme indifference to human life". The District's current aggravated assault statute lists two different culpable mental states: "knowingly or purposely causes serious bodily injury" in D.C. Code § 22-404(a)(1) and "under circumstances manifesting extreme indifference to human life . . . intentionally or knowingly engages in conduct which creates a grave risk of serious bodily injury to another person and thereby causes serious bodily injury" in D.C. Code § 22-404(a)(2). The DCCA, however, has stated that "[i]n order to give effect to the [aggravated assault] statute as a whole, subsection (a)(2) must be read as requiring a different type of mental element—gross recklessness."[173] The DCCA has also stated that the lower culpable mental state in the current aggravated assault statute "can be proven by evidence of 'conscious disregard of an extreme risk of death or serious bodily injury'"[174] and that it is "substantively indistinguishable from the minimum state of mind required for conviction of second-degree murder,"[175] in that it, too, requires "'extreme recklessness' regarding risk of death or serious bodily injury.'"[176] In the RCC it is only necessary to specify the latter culpable mental state because the higher culpable mental states "knowingly" or "purposely" satisfy the lower culpable mental state under RCC § 22E-206. This revision clarifies without changing[177] existing law on the "gross recklessness" standard in the current aggravated assault statute.

[172] For example, D.C. Mun. Regs. tit. 22-B, § 602.4 states:

> Any minor who is examined, treated, hospitalized, or receives health services under this chapter may give legal consent, and no person who administers the health services shall be liable civilly or criminally for assault, battery, or assault and battery; or any other civil legal charge, except for negligence or intentional harm in the diagnosis and treatment rendered to the minor and for violations of the D.C. Mental Health Information Act of 1978.

[173] Perry, 36 A.3d at 817. The DCCA further explained that this mental state is "shown by 'intentionally or knowingly' engaging in conduct that, in fact, 'creates a grave risk of serious bodily injury,' and "doing so 'under circumstances manifesting extreme indifference to human life.'" Id.

[177] See, e.g., Perry v. United States, 36 A.3d 799, 817, 818 (stating that the required mental state in subsection (a)(2) of the aggravated assault statute (D.C. Code § 22-404.01) was "gross recklessness" and that this mental state was "substantively indistinguishable" from the required mental state for second degree murder); In re D.P., 122 A.3d 903, 908-910 (holding that evidence was insufficient to prove depraved heart malice as required for aggravated assault under D.C. Code § 22-404.01(a)(2) when

Second, the revised assault statute, by the use of the phrase, "in fact," clarifies that no culpable mental state is required as to whether the object displayed or used to cause the specified types of bodily injury is a "dangerous weapon" or "imitation dangerous weapon," as those terms are defined in RCC § 22E-701. As is discussed above as a substantive change to current District law, the revised assault statute's weapons penalty enhancements replace the current offense of assault with a dangerous weapon (ADW), as well as the separate penalty enhancement for committing certain assault offenses "when armed with or having readily available" a deadly or dangerous weapon.[178] The current ADW statute is silent as to what culpable mental state applies to whether the object at issue is a dangerous weapon.[179] However, District case law provides that whether an object qualifies as a "dangerous weapon" hinges upon a purely objective analysis of the nature of the object rather than on the accused's understanding of the object.[180] District case law for the "while armed" enhancement in D.C. Code § 22-4502 similarly supports applying strict liability to whether the object at issue is a dangerous weapon.[181] Applying strict liability to statutory elements that do not distinguish innocent from criminal appellant was unarmed, engaged in assaultive conduct for approximately fourteen seconds on a public bus, and ceased the assault when the complainant was no longer fighting back); Vaughn v. United States, 93 A.3d 1237, 1268, 1270 (D.C. 2014) (deeming the enhanced recklessness of aggravated assault to "set [such] a high bar" that a jury instruction which suggested the mens rea of the offense was only was one of normal recklessness—i.e. the "awareness of and disregard [of a risk]" at issue in felony assault—constituted plain error that was prejudicial, "affect[ed] the integrity of th[e] proceeding," and "impugn[ed] the public reputation of judicial proceedings in general.").

It should be noted that the revised second degree murder statute in RCC § 22E-1101(b) also requires the culpable mental state of "recklessly, under circumstances manifesting extreme indifference to human life," which will not change DCCA case law interpreting depraved heart murder. See, e.g., Comber v. United States, 584 A.2d 26, 39 (D.C.1990) (en banc) (noting that "depraved heart malice exists only where the perpetrator was subjectively aware that his or her conduct created an extreme risk of death or serious bodily injury, but engaged in that conduct nonetheless); Powell v. United States, 485 A.2d 596 (D.C.1984) (affirming second degree murder conviction on depraved heart malice theory when defendant led police in a high speed chase at speeds of up to ninety miles an hour); Perez v. United States, 968 A.2d 39, 102 (D.C. 2009) (affirming second degree murder conviction on depraved heart malice theory when defendant handed a knife to co-defendant whom he knew wanted to harm the victim, and the co-defendant used the knife to fatally wound the victim).

In addition to any other penalty provided under this section, a person may be fined an amount not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01.").

The more stringent 10-year maximum penalty, as opposed to 180 days for simple assault in D.C. Code § 22-404(a)(1), is "imposed as 'a practical recognition of the additional risks posed by use of the weapon.'" Williamson v. United States, 445 A.2d 975, 979 (D.C. 1982) (quoting Parker v. United States, 359 F.2d 1009, 1012 (D.C. Cir. 1966)).

[180] See, e.g., Perry, 36 A.3d at 812 ("This is an objective test, and has nothing to do with the actor's subjective intent to use the weapon dangerously."); Powell v. United States, 485 A.2d 596, 601 (D.C. 1984) (rejecting appellant's argument that "unless one is possessed with the specific intent to use an object offensively, it is not a dangerous weapon").

[181] See, e.g., Arthur v. United States, 602 A.2d 174, 177 (D.C. 1992) (stating "[t]his court has traditionally looked to the use to which an object was put during an assault in determining whether that object was a dangerous weapon" and citing the objective tests used to determine if an object is a dangerous weapon in ADW).

behavior is an accepted practice in American jurisprudence.[182] Notably, however, the revised assault offense requires at least recklessness as to causing specified bodily injury by the display or use of what is, in fact, a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon.[183] This change clarifies, and potentially fills a gap in, District law.

[182] Elonis v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2001, 2010, 192 L.Ed.2d 1 (2015) ("When interpreting federal criminal statutes that are silent on the required mental state, we read into the statute 'only that mens rea which is necessary to separate wrongful conduct from 'otherwise innocent conduct.'" Carter v. United States, 530 U.S. 255, 269, 120 S.Ct. 2159, 147 L.Ed.2d 203 (2000) (quoting X–Citement Video, 513 U.S., at 72, 115 S.Ct. 464).").

[183] The revised assault statute requires that the object that a person recklessly displays or uses to cause the specified "bodily injury" be, in fact, a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon. So, for example, where a person believes that he or she is causing the complainant bodily injury by displaying or using only a heavy bag, the heavy bag must, in fact, be a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon, and if it is not, there is no enhanced liability in the RCC assault statute. However, if the heavy bag contains a per se "dangerous weapon," such as a firearm (which adds to its weight), this would not suffice for the assault weapons enhancement if the actor did not know and should not have known that the heavy bag contained a firearm. One cannot conceptualize the assault as being by "displaying or using" a heavy bag, then analyze the assault with respect to a firearm which is one of the unknown contents of the bag. The causation requirement in RCC § 22E-204 may also preclude liability in such a situation to the extent that wielding a bag with an unknown firearm in it causes a bodily injury (e.g., by discharge) that is not reasonably foreseeable.

RCC § 22E-1204. Criminal Threats.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the criminal threats offense and penalty gradations for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The offense punishes efforts to inflict fear of criminal harm. The offense is graded according to the type of criminal harm the defendant threatens: an immediate death, serious bodily injury, sexual act, or confinement (first degree); a bodily injury or sexual contact (second degree) or loss or damage to property (third degree). The revised criminal threats offense replaces the misdemeanor and felony threats statutes,[1] as well as the intent-to-frighten form of simple assault[2] and the intent-to-frighten form of assault with a dangerous weapon[3] in the current D.C. Code.

Paragraphs (a)(1), (b)(1), and (c)(1) state the prohibited conduct—that the defendant communicates to another person,[4] who is not a co-conspirator or an accomplice.[5] Communication requires not only that the defendant take action to convey a message, but also that the message is received and understood by another person.[6] However, the government is not required to prove that the target of the threat is the one to whom the communication is made.[7] No precise words are necessary to convey a threat; it may be bluntly spoken, or done by innuendo or suggestion.[8] The verb "communicates" is intended to be broadly construed, encompassing all speech[9] and other messages[10] that are received and understood by another person. [3] D.C. Code § 22-402.

[4] See Ruffin v. United States, 76 A.3d 845, 855 (D.C. 2013) (holding that "the contextual features suggest that 'person' is limited to natural persons" in threats, and therefore, threatening to destroy District of Columbia government property does not constitute an offense).

[5] For example, if Conspirator A says to Conspirator B, "I am going to punch him and you are going to take his keys," the statement does not constitute a criminal threat.

[6] DCCA case law clarifies in Evans v. United States, 779 A.2d 891, 894-95 (D.C. 2001), and the RCC criminal threats statute recognizes, that for there to be a communication of a threat the recipient must be able to access or comprehend it, at the most basic level. For example, there is no communication of a threat if the content of the threat is in a language that the recipient does not comprehend.

[7] For example, assuming other elements of the offense are satisfied, it would be enough for the actor to tell a friend that the actor will kill person Z even if the friend never communicates that to person Z and the actor didn't intend the threat to reach person Z. See Beard v. U.S., 535 A.2d 1373, 1378 (D.C. 1988); U.S. v. Baish, 460 A.2d 38, 42 (D.C. 1983); Joiner v. U.S., 585 A.2d 176 (D.C. 1991).

[9] The term "speech" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and means oral or written language, symbols, or gestures.

[10] A person may communicate through non-verbal conduct such as displaying a weapon. See State v. Murphy, 545 N.W.2d 909, 915 (Minn. 1996) ("Many physical acts considered in context communicate a terroristic threat. We may find our examples in the case law, such as drawing a finger across one's throat or discharging a firearm over the telephone; in the movies, such as boiling a rabbit on the stove in the tranquil setting of former paramour's new family home, or placing a severed horse's head in a bed; or as here, depositing dead animals at a residence or planting a fake bomb. Life is replete with such examples, and whatever the source, the principle is the same: physical acts communicate a threat that its originator will act according to its tenor." (Internal quotations omitted.)).

paragraph (a)(1), requires the defendant communicate that they will immediately cause[11] a criminal harm[12] involving death, serious bodily injury, a sexual act, or confinement, to any person. Second degree criminal threats, under paragraph (b)(1), requires the defendant indicate that they will, at any time or on any condition,[13] cause[14] a criminal harm[15] involving a bodily injury or sexual contact. Third degree criminal threats, under paragraph (c)(1) requires the defendant indicate that they will, at any time or on any condition,[16] cause[17] a criminal harm[18] involving loss or damage to property. The terms "serious bodily injury," "sexual act," bodily injury," "sexual contact," and "property" are defined in RCC § 22E-701.

Paragraphs (a)(1), (b)(1), and (c)(1) also require a culpable mental state of knowledge, a term defined at RCC § 22E-206. Applied to the elements here, the accused must at least be aware to a practical certainty that their conduct communicates the threat to a complainant.[19] Whether particular words, gestures, symbols, or other conduct communicate such content is a question of fact that will often require judgment by a factfinder.[20]

Paragraphs (a)(2), (b)(2), and (c)(2) require the defendant make the communication "with intent that" it be perceived as a serious expression of an intent to [11] "Cause" includes personally engaging in criminal conduct and soliciting or allowing an accomplice or innocent instrumentality to engage in criminal conduct.

[12] The word "criminal" modifies the words that follow. The governing criminal statute must include as an element, the infliction of a bodily injury, taking of property, or damage to property. Courts should take a categorical, not a conduct-specific approach.

[13] The statute punishes both "conditional" and "unconditional" threats. See Postell v. United States, 282 A.2d 551, 553 (D.C. 1971).

[19] For example, a person who writes threatening messages in his or her own personal diary or journal, expecting that no other person will read it, does not commit criminal threats. The term "complainant" is defined in RCC § 22E-701.

[20] For example, a jury may evaluate whether the accused's gesture of drawing a finger across his throat communicated that the accused would kill the recipient of the communication. A jury may also evaluate whether texting a photograph of someone's car communicated that the accused would damage the car. See Roberts v. United States, 216 A.3d 870, 886 (D.C. 2019) (citing *Gray v. do harm.[21] "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here requires that the defendant was practically certain that his or her communication would be perceived as a serious expression of an intent to do harm. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent that" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that the communication was perceived as a serious expression of an intent to do harm, only that the actor believed to a practical certainty that it would be so perceived. Not all insulting, abusive, or violent language is threatening.[22] For example, a statement about what a person believes ought to happen, may not be intended and understood as an expression that the declarant will cause it to happen.[23] Whether a particular communication amounts to a serious expression of intent to inflict harm is a question of fact that will often require judgment by a factfinder. "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 and requires the defendant believe his or her communication is practically certain to be perceived as a serious expression of an intent to do harm.[24]

Paragraphs (a)(3), (b)(3), and (c)(3) require proof that the accused's communication is objectively threatening, under the circumstances.[25] "In fact," a defined term,[26] is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement for paragraphs (a)(3), (b)(3), and (c)(3). Rather, the only proof required with respect to this element of the offense is that the defendant's message would cause a reasonable person in the complainant's circumstances to believe that the harm would occur.[27] This is an objective standard, but it is evaluated contextually, assuming awareness of the Draskovich*, 904 N.W.2d 759, 761 (S.D. 2017) (upholding a threats conviction where a defendant told a court employee, "Well, that deserves 180 pounds of lead between the eyes,") with People v. Wood, 127 N.E.3d 1 (Ill. App. Ct. 2017) (reversing a threats conviction where a defendant expressed a "dream for revenge," stating, "There is not a day that goes by since I was sentenced at that courthouse that I have not dreamed about revenge and the utter hate I feel for the judge," and "there's not a day that goes by that I don't pray for the death and destruction upon the judge.")

[24] The criminal threats offense requires that the listener receive and understand, at the most basic level, the meaning of the defendant's speech. See Evans v. United States, 779 A.2d 891, 894-95 (D.C. 2001). For example, there is no communication of a threat if the content of the threat is in a language that the recipient does not comprehend. However, the offense does not require that the listener be certain about the intent behind the defendant's speech. So long as (1) the defendant intended that the victim perceive the threat as serious and (2) a reasonable person in the victim's circumstances would perceive the threat as serious, it is of no consequence that the listener does not actually believe that the defendant means what was said.

[25] The government must prove a conduct element and a result element: that the defendant (1) "uttered words to another person" (2) with a result that "the ordinary hearer [would] reasonably…believe that the threatened harm would take place." In re S.W., 45 A.3d 151, 155 (D.C. 2012); see also Clark v. United States, 755 A.2d 1026, 1030 (D.C. 2000) (acknowledging these two actus reus elements).

circumstances known to the parties in the case.[28] The relevant facts and circumstances in an individual case may include prior interactions between the declarant and the listener,[29] the power dynamics between the declarant and the target of the threat,[30] and the conditional nature of the threat.[31] Paragraphs (a)(3), (b)(3), and (c)(3) do not require that the defendant actually have the ability or apparent ability to carry out the threatened harm.[32] The offense also does not require proof that the defendant actually intended to eventually carry out the threat.

Subsection (d) specifies relevant penalties for each gradation of the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Paragraph (d)(4) establishes three penalty enhancements for the criminal threats offense.

Subparagraph (d)(4)(A) specifies that the classification of the offense is increased by one class when it is proven[33] that the actor was reckless as to the complainant being a protected person. The term "reckless" is defined in RCC § 22E-206 and the terms "actor," "complainant," and "protected person" are defined in RCC § 22E-701.

Subparagraph (d)(4)(B) specifies that the classification of the offense is increased by one class when it is proven[34] that the actor uses or displays a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon in the course of making the communication. The terms "dangerous weapon" and "imitation dangerous weapon" are defined in RCC § 22E-701. "'Displaying or using" should be broadly construed to include making a weapon known by sight, sound, or touch,[35] but does not include displaying an image of a weapon. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the culpable mental state "recklessly" from subparagraph (d)(4)(A) applies to whether the person made the communication by using a weapon. That is, the person must consciously disregard a substantial risk that the communication is being made through such a display or use and the conduct must be a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct. "In fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement for a [28] High v. United States, 128 A.3d 1017, 1021 (D.C. 2015).

[29] For example, a complainant who testifies, "I knew that the defendant would not ever actually try to hit me," has not suffered a criminal threat, even if the defendant intended the puffery to be taken seriously.

[30] See, e.g., High v. United States, 128 A.3d 1017 (D.C. 2015) (concluding that an ordinary hearer, in the circumstances of an on-duty law enforcement officer, would not reasonably fear imminent or future harm or injury based on the defendant's expression of exasperation or resignation, "Take that gun and badge off and I'll f you up.").

[31] A threat on a condition that victim believes will never occur does not amount to a criminal threat. Postell v. United States, 282 A.2d 551, 553 (D.C. 1971). Additionally, a statement that a person will defend themselves or another person from criminal harm does not amount to a criminal threat. Consider, for example, a parent who warns, "If you touch my child, you are going to regret it!"

[32] Consider, for example, Person A sends multiple messages to Person B threatening to "beat him up." Person B is unafraid because he has been specially trained as a fighter. Person A, nevertheless, may have committed criminal threats against Person B.

[33] RCC § 22E-605 requires that penalty enhancements be charged and proven beyond a reasonable doubt.

[34] RCC § 22E-605 requires that penalty enhancements be charged and proven beyond a reasonable doubt.

[35] For example, assuming the other elements of the offense are proven, the following conduct may be sufficient for first degree liability: rearranging one's coat to provide a momentary glimpse of part of a knife; holding a sharp object to someone's back; audibly cocking a firearm; or shooting a firearm in the air.

given element, here whether the item displayed or used is a "dangerous weapon" or "imitation dangerous weapon" as those terms are defined in RCC § 22E-701.

Subparagraph (d)(4)(C) specifies that the classification of the offense is increased by one class when it is proven[36] that the actor had the purpose of harming the complainant because of the complainant's status as a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or District official. The terms "law enforcement officer," "public safety employee," and "District official" are defined in RCC § 22E-701.[37] This aggravating circumstance requires that the accused acted with "purpose," a term defined at RCC § 22E-206, which means that the actor must consciously desire to harm that person because of his or her status as a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or District official. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with the purpose" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. Here, it is not necessary to prove that the complainant was a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or District official, only that the actor consciously desired to cause the death of a person of such a status.

Subsection (d) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised criminal threats statute clearly changes current District law in four main ways.

First, the revised criminal threats statute establishes three gradations based on the nature of the threatened harm. Under current District law, a felony threats offense punishes threats to kidnap, injure, or damage property, [38] whereas a misdemeanor threats offense punishes infliction of bodily harm only.[39] Consequently, although there are two penalty gradations under current law, the gradations do not limit liability for less severe threats.[40]

The current District assault statutes are silent as to the type of conduct that may constitute an "intent-to-frighten" form of assault. However, District case law holds that intent-to-frighten assault covers a defendant's "conduct as could induce in the victim a [36] RCC § 22E-605 requires that penalty enhancements be charged and proven beyond a reasonable doubt.

[37] While the RCC § 22E-701 definitions of "law enforcement officer" and "public safety employee" refer to some persons only when on-duty (e.g., a campus officer), this provision on committing the offense with the purpose of harming the complainant because of their status as a law enforcement officer or public safety employee applies to committing the offense against an off-duty person based on their on-duty role.

[38] Neither current statutes nor case law define the precise meaning of terms like "injure," or "do bodily harm," and it is unclear if the phrases are equivalent to the harm described in case law for simple assault. D.C. Code § 22-404. See Mungo v. United States, 772 A.2d 240, 245 (D.C. 2001) ("[A]ssault is defined as the unlawful use of force causing injury to another…"). The DCCA has further held that "assault" includes "non-violent sexual touching assault as a distinct type of assault." Id. And in fact, even non-sexual but "offensive" touchings can constitute assault. Ray v. United States, 575 A.2d 1196, 1199 (D.C. 1990). In at least one case, the DCCA has upheld a threats conviction where the threat consisted of saying, "I'm going to smack the s out of you." Jones v. United States, 124 A.3d 127, 131 (D.C. 2015). It's unclear whether slapping a person would constitute simple assault qua inflicting bodily harm, or simple assault qua engaging in an offensive touching.

[40] The current statutory structure provides no lesser-included offenses for threats of kidnapping or threats to property.

well-founded apprehension of peril."[41] District case law concerning intent-to-frighten assault has upheld convictions for placing a person in fear of "immediate injury."[42] However, there is no District case law deciding whether placing someone in fear of an offensive physical contact, the lowest level of assault recognized under current District law,[43] suffices for intent-to-frighten assault liability.[44] Current District threats statutes refer to a few types of conduct: to "kidnap," "injure the person of another," "physically damage the property of any person," or "do bodily harm."[45] Neither the current statutes nor case law define the precise meaning of terms like "injure" or "do bodily harm," and it is unclear whether the phrases are equivalent to the harm described in case law for simple assault.[46]

In contrast, the RCC criminal threats statute specifies the relevant harms that may be the basis for prosecution and grades according to the severity of the harm threatened. First degree liability requires a threat to immediately inflict death, serious bodily injury, a sexual act,[47] or confinement.[48] Second degree liability requires a threat to cause a bodily injury or a sexual contact.[49] Third degree liability requires a threat to cause property loss or damage. The revised statute also provides a penalty enhancement for threats committed with a weapon, against a protected person,[50] or targeting a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or District official.[51] This change narrows the scope of the offense by excluding non-sexual, merely offensive physical contacts (that fall short of

For purposes of instructing juries, the pattern jury instructions provide, "Injury means any physical injury, however small, including a touching offensive to a person of reasonable sensibility." [44] The holding in Ray is directed mainly at the attempted-battery form of simple assault. Ray, 575 at 1199. It is only by logical inference (admittedly, a small inference) that one can conclude that intent-to-frighten assault includes threatened offensive contact. But the Redbook does include the possibility of an intent-to-frighten assault premised on a threatened offensive contact. D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 4.100. Notably, neither the Redbook nor any DCCA case law seems to address the possibility that intent-to-frighten assault can be based on a threatened non-violent sexual touching.

[46] D.C. Code § 22-404. See Mungo v. United States, 772 A.2d 240, 245 (D.C. 2001) ("[A]ssault is defined as the unlawful use of force causing injury to another…"). The DCCA has further held that "assault" includes "non-violent sexual touching assault as a distinct type of assault." Id. And in fact, even non-sexual but "offensive" touching can constitute assault. Ray, 575 A.2d at 1199. In at least one case, the DCCA has upheld a threats conviction where the threat consisted of saying, "I'm going to smack the s out of you." Jones v. United States, 124 A.3d 127, 131 (D.C. 2015). It is unclear whether slapping a person would constitute simple assault qua inflicting bodily harm, or simple assault qua engaging in an offensive touching.

[47] "Serious bodily injury" and "sexual act" are defined in RCC § 22E-701.

[48] The revised statute's use of "criminal harm involving…confinement" provides an ordinary language approach to specifying the harm commonly involved in kidnapping.

[49] "Bodily injury" and "sexual contact" are defined in RCC § 22E-701.

[50] "Protected person" is defined in RCC § 22E-701.

[51] "Law enforcement officer," "public safety employee," and "District official" are defined in RCC § 22E-701.

inflicting bodily injury),[52] but broadens the offense to include kidnapping conduct that does not involve a bodily harm.[53] This change also brings the criminal threats offense into conformity with the approach to penalty gradations used through most of the current D.C. Code and the RCC[54] and improves the proportionality of the revised offense. This change reduces an unnecessary gap in liability, and improves the clarity, consistency and proportionality of the revised offense.

Second, the revised criminal threats statute uses the word "communicates," which includes all verbal and non-verbal conduct that conveys a message, expanding the means by which a threat may be issued. The current District threats statutes are silent as to the type of conduct that may convey a threat, simply referring to a person who "threatens"[55] or issues a "threat."[56] The current District assault statutes are silent as to the type of conduct that may constitute an "intent-to-frighten" form of assault. However, District case law holds that "mere words do not constitute an assault."[57] Under common law, non-verbal conduct is required for intent-to-frighten assault,[58] although case law does not specify what conduct is required. The current District threats statutes are silent as to the type of conduct that may convey a threat, simply referring to a person who "threatens"[59] or issues a "threat."[60] However, in at least one case, District of Columbia Court of Appeals ("DCCA") has stated that a threat "requires words to be communicated to another person" in contrast with intent-to-frighten assault which "requires threatening conduct."[61] Case law describes an element of threats as having "uttered words,"[62] which [52] As noted above, there is no District case law on point as to whether placing someone in fear of an offensive physical contact, the lowest level of assault recognized under current District law, would suffice for intent-to-frighten assault liability. However, to the extent that an attempted offensive physical contact, even when actually inflicted, is the least or nearly the least severe form of offense against person in the RCC, a criminal threat that places another person in fear of an offensive physical contact would be less severe than even an attempted offensive physical contact.

[53] For example, a form of kidnapping that involves no physical contact, such as locking the door to a room someone is in, has been held to not constitute an assault. Patterson v. Pillans, 43 App. D.C. 505, 506-07 (C.C.D.C. 1915).

[54] Virtually all criminal offenses that have penalty gradations in the current D.C. Code, or in the RCC, are structured such that the more severe penalty is for more harmful conduct that is a subset of the broader set of conduct covered by the less severe gradation. The District's current threats statutes reverse the usual approach to statutory drafting, making the least harmful conduct a subset of the broader set of conduct covered by the more severe gradation. Interestingly, the DCCA has noted that the legislative history behind the District's felony threats offense is somewhat muddled, and actually suggests that the offense was intended to cover extortionate conduct, not merely threatening conduct in the abstract. See United States v. Young, 376 A.2d 809, 814-16 (D.C. 1977) (discussing legislative history). The relatively harsh penalty associated with felony threats has been explained by reference to this history. Id.

[58] One of the District's oldest cases, from the very first volume of Cranch's Reports, turns on this issue. In United States v. Myers, the defendant "doubled his fist and ran it towards the witness, saying, 'If you say so again, I will knock you down.'" 1 Cranch C.C. 310, 310 (D.C. 1806). The guilty verdict was upheld.

However, although no reported threats case before the DCCA appear to have been based on gestures alone, symbolic or non-verbal threats have been considered by that Court in the broader context of threatening conduct.

has been explicitly construed to cover not only oral but written threats.[63] In contrast, the RCC criminal threats statute punishes threatening words (written or oral), gestures, and symbols,[64] as well as conduct. Assuming other elements of the offense are proven, the social harm at issue—the intentional infliction of fear upon a person—occurs whether the message is conveyed verbally or non-verbally.[65] This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense.

Third, the revised statute does not expressly authorize the issuance of a bond to keep the peace for one year. Current D.C. Code § 22-407 specifies that a person who commits threats to do bodily harm "may be required to give bond to keep the peace for a period not exceeding 1 year." The RCC specifies a maximum term of imprisonment and a maximum fine for each revised offense, but it does not address what, if any, terms of probation may be appropriate or desirable for a given offense. Nor does it limit a period of probation or a condition of probation to a term of one year. A court may, in its discretion, suspend the imposition of a period of incarceration and place an offender on supervised or unsupervised probation on the condition that the person not reoffend for up to five years, under D.C. Code § 16-710(b). This change improves the consistency of the revised offenses.

Fourth, the RCC criminal threats offense eliminates liability based on an "intent to injure." The current District assault statutes are silent as to the types of intent that may constitute an "intent-to-frighten" form of assault. However, District case law has indicated that, in addition to an intent to scare a victim, intent-to-frighten assault liability also may exist where there is an intent to cause bodily injury to the victim.[66] This "intent to cause injury" form of intent-to-frighten assault appears to be distinct from criminal liability for an attempted battery form of simple assault in District case law.[67] In contrast,

Life is replete with such examples, and whatever the source, the principle is the same: physical acts communicate a threat that its originator will act according to its tenor." ("attempt to cause a physical injury, which may consist of any act tending to such corporal injury, accompanied with such circumstances as denote at the time an intention, coupled with the present ability, of using actual violence against the person.").

the RCC criminal threats offense requires only that the defendant intend that communication be perceived as a threat. A person who engages in conduct with an intent to inflict bodily injury may be liable under the RCC assault statute.[68] This new division of criminal liability between the revised assault and revised criminal threats statutes may limit punishment for some conduct currently recognized as a completed form of intent-to-frighten assault to an attempted assault in the revised statute.[69] The change clarifies the revised offenses of assault and criminal threats and eliminates unnecessary overlap in current District law between attempted battery forms of assault and intent-to-frighten forms of assault.

Beyond these four changes, six other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised criminal threats statute clarifies that the defendant must act with intent—i.e. must believe to a practical certainty—that his or her communication will be perceived as a serious expression that the defendant would cause a criminal harm. The District's current threats statutes are silent as to the offense's requisite culpable mental states, and recent DCCA case law has addressed but not entirely resolved the culpable mental state as to whether the communication will be understood as a threat. In 2017, an en banc DCCA decision, Carrell v. United States, held that something more than negligence, but less than purpose, is necessary.[70] The DCCA, following recent Supreme Court precedent,[71] said that acting with intent that the communication be perceived as a threat is sufficient for liability, but did not decide whether recklessness is also sufficient and acknowledged that it was leaving the law unsettled.[72] Current District case law has often indicated that recklessness may suffice for such assaults,[73] however, in some

[69] I.e. to the extent that intent-to-frighten assault in current DCCA case law recognizes liability for an intent to cause bodily harm without an intent to frighten, there is no corresponding liability for a completed offense in the revised criminal threats statute—even though liability would exist in the revised assault statute.

[71] Elonis v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2001 (2015).

[72] 165 A.3d 314, 323-24 (D.C. 2017) ("[W]e decline to decide whether a lesser threshold mens rea for the second element of the crime of threats—recklessness—would suffice.").

[73] Simple assault is a lesser included offense of offenses such as ADW, assault with significant bodily injury, and aggravated assault. See Williams, 106 A.3d at 1065 & n.5 (referring to simple assault as a lesser included offense of ADW); Woods v. United States, 65 A.3d 667, 668 (D.C. 2013) (referring to simple assault as a lesser included offense of assault with significant bodily injury); McCloud v. United States, 781 A.2d 744, 746 (D.C. 2001) (referring to simple assault as a lesser included of aggravated assault). The lesser included offense relationship between simple assault and ADW and simple assault and aggravated assault suggests that recklessness should suffice for simple assault because proof of recklessness or extreme recklessness satisfies these greater offenses. See Vines v. United States, 70 A.3d 1170, 1180 (D.C. 2013), as amended (Sept. 19, 2013) ("[I]t is clear that a conviction for ADW can be sustained by proof of reckless conduct alone."); D.C. Code § 22-404.01(a)(2) (aggravated assault statute requiring "under circumstances manifesting extreme indifference to human life, that person intentionally or knowingly engages in conduct which creates a grave risk of serious bodily injury to another person and thereby causes serious bodily injury.").

instances a higher level of intent has been required,[74] and the DCCA recently declined to hold that recklessness is sufficient.[75] To resolve this ambiguity, the revised statute clarifies that the defendant must act with intent, not mere recklessness, as to whether the communication is perceived as a threat. Applying an intent culpable mental state requirement (an inchoate form of a knowledge requirement, as defined in the RCC[76]) to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[77] Requiring an intent culpable mental state in the revised threats offense also appears to be consistent with existing District practice.[78] These changes improve the clarity and consistency of the offense.

Second, the revised criminal threats statute includes an "objective element" in paragraphs (a)(3), (b)(3), and (c)(3), subject to strict liability.[79] The District's current threats statutes are silent as to whether the communication must be one that would cause a reasonable recipient to believe that the threatened harm would take place. However, longstanding District case law requires proof that that the "ordinary hearer would reasonably believe that threatened harm would take place."[80] Case law further specifies that this reference to an "ordinary hearer" takes into account all the context-specific factual circumstances of the case.[81] The DCCA's recent en banc opinion in Carrell

United States*, 32 A.3d 990, 998 (D.C. 2011) (Ruiz, J., concurring) ("At the same time that we have labeled assault a general intent crime, however, we have also articulated additional showings of intent which would seem to go above and beyond the ordinary conception of general intent merely to do the act constituting the assault."); Powell v. United States, 238 A.3d 954, 959 (D.C. 2020) ("Our additional concern is whether the evidence proved that appellant had the mens rea required for intent-to-frighten assault: a 'purposeful design ... to engender fear' or 'create apprehension.') [75] Recently, the DCCA explicitly declined to decide whether assault requires recklessness or a higher culpable mental state like intent to injure, stating "[e]ven if the greater proof was necessary, the jury could permissibly infer such intent from [appellant's] extremely reckless conduct, which posed a high risk of injury to those around him. *Vines v. [78] See D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 4.130 (applying knowledge). The DCCA also noted that "the United States Attorney's Office [ ] disclaims reliance on recklessness…and states that it does not intend to prosecute future threats cases on a recklessness theory." Carrell v. United States, 165 A.3d 314, 325 (D.C. 2017). Of course, other parties, including the Office of the Attorney General, may rely on the threats statute as well.

[81] The DCCA has noted that "the factfinder must weigh not just the words uttered, but also the complete context in which they were used." Gray v. United States, 100 A.3d at 136. For example, words that on their face are innocuous or ambiguous can become threatening in the circumstances of the threat; the opposite is true, as well. See Clark v. United States, 755 A.2d at 1031; In re S.W., 45 A.3d 151, 157 (D.C. 2012) ("Even when words are threatening on their face, careful attention must be paid to the context in which those statements are made to determine if the words may be objectively perceived as threatening."). The DCCA has noted that words "often acquire significant meaning from context, facial expression, tone, stress, posture, inflection, and like manifestations of the speaker…" Id.

reaffirmed that there must be proof of this "objective element,"[82] while adding the additional requirement "that the defendant acted with the purpose to threaten or with knowledge that his words would be perceived as a threat."[83] However, the Carrell decision did not fully specify the relationship between the objective standard and the defendant's culpable mental state of knowledge that his communication be a threat.[84] The District's current assault statutes are silent as to whether the communication must be one that would cause a reasonable recipient to believe that the threatened harm would take place. However, District case law on intent-to-frighten assault requires that the defendant had the "apparent present ability to injure" the complainant.[85] The DCCA further qualified that a reasonable person test is to be used to determine such an ability.[86] In contrast, the RCC criminal threats offense specifies that while the defendant must act with intent that the communication be perceived as a threat,[87] the objective elements in paragraphs (a)(3) and (b)(3) are additional, separate elements,[88] independent of the defendant's own awareness of the threatening nature of the message. The RCC's use of "in fact" with the objective requirement in the threats statutes clarifies the state of the law and appears to be consistent with District practice[89] and the recent DCCA ruling in Carrell. This change improves the clarity of the law and is consistent with prevailing District law on criminal threats.

Fourth, the revised criminal threats statute specifies that the defendant must know that the communication conveys that the defendant will cause a criminal harm, and have intent that the communication be perceived as a serious expression that the actor would cause the harm. The District's current threats statutes are silent as to whether the harm that is threatened is criminal, and case law has not directly addressed the issue. However, a knowledge requirement as to the nature of the communication as a threat is consistent with the DCCA's recent en banc opinion in Carrell.[90] Moreover, in other contexts, District case law has recognized that consent may be a valid general defense to harms that otherwise would be criminal, [91] and that a parent or other person in a custodial [84] For example, the opinion does not address whether, in addition to believing to a practical certainty that the communication would be perceived as a threat, the defendant must also believe that a "reasonable recipient" would believe that the harm would take place.

[88] Even though paragraphs (a)(3) and (b)(3) provide for an objective assessment, the factfinder may take into account, among other factors, the subjective reactions of the recipients of the communication. See Gray, 100 A.3d at 134-35 ("[W]hether an ordinary hearer would understand words to be in the nature of a threat of serious bodily harm is a highly context-sensitive question.").

[90] Carrell v. United States, 165 A.3d 314, 323-24 (D.C. 2017) (rejecting an analysis of the threats statute in terms of "specific" or "general" intent and requiring proof of knowledge, or at least some subjective intent, on the part of the defendant as to whether his or her communication would be perceived as a threat).
[91] See Guarro v. United States, 237 F.2d 578, 581 (1956) ("Nevertheless the evidence in the instant case cannot support a conviction for assault unless it appears that there was no actual or apparent consent. Generally where there is consent, there is no assault. 1 Wharton, Criminal Law §§ 180, 751 (12th ed. 1932).").

relationship is not liable for committing some harms that are in fulfillment of the duties of that relationship.[92] The RCC criminal threats statute clarifies that the actor must know and have intent that the harm he or she communicates to another is a criminal harm. The requirement that the harm be "criminal" clarifies that there is no liability for a communication of a harm to which there is an effective consent[93] or other general defense, or other harms that do not rise to the level of criminality. Moreover, District practice[94] has long recognized the general existence of a consent defense that is consistent with the RCC criminal threat requirement that the harm be criminal. This change improves the clarity of the law and, to the extent it may result in a change, improves the proportionality of the offense by ensuring that consensual and legal activities are not criminalized.

Fifth, the RCC first degree criminal threats offense explicitly addresses threatening by displaying or using imitation dangerous weapons. The current District assault with a dangerous weapon statute is silent as to whether the offense may be completed using an imitation weapon.[95] The DCCA has held that imitation firearms are within the scope of the assault with a dangerous weapon statute[96] but has not yet explicitly addressed non-firearm imitation weapons (e.g., fake knives).[97] The current District threats statutes do not include the use of dangerous weapon as an element.[98] In contrast, the RCC criminal threats offense explicitly includes all imitation dangerous weapons, a term defined in RCC § 22E-701. Assuming other elements of the offense are proven, the social harm at issue—the immediate, intentional infliction of fear upon a person—occurs whether the weapon is real or an imitation that a reasonable person would believe is real. This change improves the clarity of the statute and may fill a gap in existing law.

Sixth, the RCC criminal threats offense replaces penalty enhancements based on the victim's status as a minor, a senior citizen, a transportation worker, a District official or employee, or a citizen patrol member. Under current District statutes, certain penalty [93] For example, but for the requirement that the harm be "criminal," a surgeon describing the procedure he is intends to carry out on a patient would appear to be liable under the plain language of the statute. Similarly, threats made as part of sports, acting, sexual interactions, and other activity not forbidden by law would appear to fall within the scope of the criminal threat offense.

Only apparent ability through the eyes of the victim is required. See United States v. Cooper, 462 F.2d 1343, 1344 (5th Cir. 1972) (assault with dangerous weapon, i.e. imitation bomb); *Bass v. enhancements apply to simple assault (including intent-to-frighten assault)[99] and assault with a deadly weapon.[100] By contrast, under the RCC, it must be proven that the person was reckless as to the complainant being a "protected person" as defined in the RCC[101] or target the complainant based on their status as a "law enforcement officer," "public safety employee," or "District official," as defined in the RCC.[102] This change simplifies current law and improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offenses.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, the revised offense clarifies that a threat to harm a third party is sufficient for criminal liability. The current District threats statutes are silent on this matter. However, DCCA case law has long recognized that threats to harm a third party, other than the recipient of the communication, are sufficient for liability if other elements of the offense are met.[103] This does not appear to have been addressed in District assault case law.[104] Additionally, although the current statutes do not explicitly note that the offenses only apply to natural persons, the revised statute incorporates current DCCA case law holding that business and government entities are not protected by the threats statutes.[105]

Second, the revised criminal threats statute specifies that the offense is complete only when the message is communicated to another person. Thus, a person is not guilty of a completed criminal threat if the communication does not reach a person other than [99] The enhancements are: D.C. Code § 22-851 (District official, employee or the family member thereof) and D.C. Code § 22-3602 (citizen patrol member). Note that there is also a slightly greater penalty for simple assault of a law enforcement officer (6 months versus 180 days) per D.C. Code § 22-405.

[100] The enhancements are: D.C. Code § 22-3611 (minor); D.C. Code § 22-3601 (senior citizen); D.C. Code §§ 22-3751, 22-3751.01, 22-3752 (transportation worker); D.C. Code § 22-851 (District official, employee or the family member thereof); or D.C. Code § 22-3602 (citizen patrol member).

United States*, 308 A.2d 785, 786 (D.C. 1973) ("It is obvious that this statute does not expressly require that the threats be communicated directly to the threatened individual."); see also Beard v. United States, 535 A.2d 1373, 1378 (D.C. 1988) ("The crime was complete as soon as the threat was communicated to a third party, regardless of whether the intended victim ever knew of the plot.").

[104] The Redbook, however, includes an instruction on the same element with an alternative including threats to someone other than the recipient. D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 4.100 ("S/he intended to cause injury or to create fear in [name of complainant] [another person]…"). However, there is case law holding that there cannot be more than one ADW conviction for directing a threat at a group of people. See, e.g., Smith v. United States, 295 A.2d 60, 61 (D.C.1972) (holding, where the defendant patted his pocket and told two men he had a gun, that "a single threat directed to more than one person constitutes but a single unit of prosecution"); United States v. Alexander, 471 F.2d 923, 932–34 (D.C.Cir.1972) (holding, in case where defendant pointed his gun at a group of four individuals, that "where by a single act or course of action a defendant has put in fear different members of a group towards which the action is collectively directed, he is guilty of but one offense") Graure v. United States, 18 A.3d 743, 763 (D.C. 2011). The RCC criminal threats statute does not change this law regarding the appropriate unit of prosecution.

[105] See Ruffin v. United States, 76 A.3d 845, 855 (D.C. 2013) (holding that "the contextual features suggest that 'person' is limited to natural persons" in threats, and therefore, threatening to destroy District of Columbia government property does not constitute an offense).

the defendant. This requirement is well established in District case law.[106] Of course, a failed attempt to deliver a message to another person could constitute attempted criminal threats, as could a message that is transmitted but "garbled and not understood."[107] This, too, is well established in District case law.[108]

Third, under the revised criminal threats statute, the general culpability principles for self-induced intoxication in RCC § 22E-209 allow a defendant to claim he or she did not act "knowingly" or with "intent" due to his or her self-induced intoxication. The current threats statutes are silent as to the availability of an intoxication defense, and case law has not addressed the matter since the DCCA's recent en banc opinion in Carrell found that knowledge or some subjective intent is required for liability.[109] Under the RCC criminal threats statute, a defendant will be able to raise and present relevant and admissible evidence in support of a claim of that voluntary intoxication prevented the defendant from forming the knowledge or intent required to prove a criminal threat. Likewise, where appropriate, a defendant will be entitled to an instruction on intoxication.[110]

Fourth, the revised criminal threats offense clarifies that the defendant need not threaten to carry out the harm himself. The District's current threats statutes do not address whether a threat to have another person harm someone is sufficient for liability.[111] At least one case suggests that it is sufficient for liability that a defendant communicates that another person will harm the victim,[112] but there is no case law directly on point. The District's current simple assault and assault with a deadly weapon statutes do not address whether a threat to have another person harm someone is sufficient for liability.[113] In contrast, paragraphs (a)(2) and (b)(2) of the revised statute prohibit threats that "the actor will cause a criminal harm." This includes causing the [108] Id. ("[I]f a threat fortuitously goes unheard, the person who utters it is guilty of an attempt, not the completed offense.").

[109] Id. at 324.

[110] These results are a product of the logical relevance principle set forth in RCC § 22E-209(a) and the fact that knowledge and intent is a mental state susceptible to negation by self-induced intoxication. See RCC § 22E-209(b).

[111] Arguably, however, the current statutory language suggests that the utterer of the threat must directly inflict the harm. See, e.g., D.C. Code § 22-1810: "Whoever threatens within the District of Columbia to kidnap any person or to injure the person of another or physically damage the property of any person or of another person, in whole or in part…"

[112] In Clark v. United States, the defendant was convicted of threats when, after his arrest, he told a police officer, "You won't work here again, wait until I tell the boys, they will take care of you." 755 A.2d 1026, 1028 (D.C. 2000), abrogated on other grounds by Carrell v. United States, 165 A.3d 314, 324 (D.C. 2017). Although the legal question was not presented, the DCCA upheld the defendant's conviction, despite the fact that the defendant's communication indicated "the boys" (and not the defendant) would harm the victim. See also Aboye v. United States, 121 A.3d 1245, 1251-52 (D.C. 2015) (defendant's conviction for threats upheld on basis that he said to victims, "I'm going to kill you with my dog. I'm going to have my dog kill you.").

[113] This may reflect the fact that, as noted above, current District intent-to-frighten assault liability is only based on conduct (not words) and it presumably is more difficult to indicate to a stranger through gestures alone how an accomplice will accomplish the harm. In the RCC criminal threats statute, by contrast, the requisite communication may be oral or by any means.

harm personally, remotely, through an accomplice, through an innocent instrumentality, or otherwise. This change improves the clarity of the revised offense.

Fifth, the revised criminal threats statutes clarifies that there is no gradation distinction based on whether harm did or did not result from the defendant's communication. Current District law provides more severe penalties for causing assaults that result in more severe physical harms—for example, the felony assault statute punishes anyone who "unlawfully assaults…[and] causes significant bodily injury to another," thus creating the offense of "felony assault."[114] Consequently, it may be possible under current District law for a person whose conduct amounts to an intent-to-frighten form of assault to be liable for felony punishment if that frightening conduct results in significant or serious bodily injury. No DCCA case law has addressed such felony-level liability based on intent-to-frighten conduct versus battery. The fact patterns that would give rise to such liability are unlikely,[115] though arguably possible.[116] District threats statutes do not grade on the basis of the infliction of a bodily harm.[117] While the revised statute does not grade based on whether there are any resulting physical harms, conduct that causes such a harm may be punishable under the RCC assault statute.[118]

Sixth, the first degree criminal threats offense requires that the harm threatened must be immediate. The current District simple assault and assault with a dangerous weapon statutes are silent as to immediacy. However, District case law on intent-to-frighten assault and assault with a dangerous weapon implicitly require it, particularly through requirements that the defendant have the "apparent present ability to injure" the complainant.[119] As noted above, the DCCA held "that at the time of the assault the surrounding circumstances must connote the intention and present ability to do immediate violence."[120] Although the District's threats statutes are silent on the matter, District case law has affirmed liability for threats regardless of physical presence or the immediacy of harm.[121] The revised criminal threats statute clarifies these immediacy and physical presence requirements in existing law.

[115] The pattern jury instructions acknowledge the possibility of intent-to-frighten conduct triggering a felony assault charge and includes an instruction. See D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 4.102. But the Commentary states frankly that "it is unlikely that [felony assault] will be based on facts indicating only threatening acts…"

[116] For example, a person who intentionally menaces a person who is using a knife for carving might cause that person to cut themselves badly, requiring stitches. However, while such fact patterns may be unusual, the more relevant point may be that such fact patterns also could be prosecuted under a battery-type assault theory in current District law and the RCC assault statute. The person who recklessly engages in conduct of any kind that results in a significant bodily injury is liable for assault.

[118] RCC § 22E-1202. Under the revised assault statute, the means of causing the harms specified in the gradations is irrelevant. For example, a person who satisfies the requirements of recklessly causing bodily injury to another is liable whether the predicate conduct was threatening someone with a gesture, punching them with a fist, or poking them with a fork.

RCC § 22E-1205. Offensive Physical Contact.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the offensive physical contact offense and penalty for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The offense proscribes conduct in which the accused knowingly causes offensive physical contact to the complainant. Offensive physical contact includes behavior that does not rise to the level of causing bodily injury as the revised assault offense[1] requires. The penalty gradations are primarily based on the type of offensive physical contact, with enhancements for harms to special categories of persons. The offensive physical contact offense partially replaces[2] sixteen distinct offenses in the current D.C. Code: assault with intent to kill,[3] assault with intent to commit first degree sexual abuse,[4] assault with intent to commit second degree sexual abuse,[5] assault with intent to commit child sexual abuse,[6] and assault with intent to commit robbery;[7] willfully poisoning any well, spring, or cistern of water;[8] assault with intent to commit mayhem;[9] assault with a dangerous weapon;[10] assault with intent to commit any other felony;[11] simple assault;[12] assault with significant bodily injury;[13] aggravated assault;[14] assault on a public vehicle inspection officer[15] and aggravated assault on a public vehicle inspection officer;[16] assault on a law enforcement officer[17] and assault with significant bodily injury to a law enforcement officer.[18] Insofar as they are applicable to current assault-type offenses, the revised offensive physical contact offense also replaces the protection of District public officials statute,[19] certain minimum statutory penalties for assault-type offenses,[20] and five penalty enhancements: the

[2] As is discussed in this commentary, "assault" in current District law includes a broad range of conduct that does not require "bodily injury" like the RCC assault statute does. Numerous other RCC offenses, such as the RCC offensive physical contact offense (RCC § 22E-1205) criminalize this conduct and should also be considered to replace many of these current D.C. Code "assault" offenses although they are generally not discussed in this commentary.

Paragraph (a)(1) specifies the prohibited conduct for first degree offensive physical contact, the most serious gradation of the offense—causing the complainant to come into physical contact with bodily fluid or excrement. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that the required culpable mental state is "knowingly." Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the culpable mental state "knowingly" in paragraph (a)(1) applies to each element in paragraph (a)(1). "Knowingly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the accused must be practically certain that he or she will cause physical contact between the complainant and bodily fluid or excrement.

Paragraph (a)(2) further requires that the accused act "with intent that" the physical contact be offensive to the complainant. "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 meaning here that the accused was practically certain that the physical contact was offensive to the complainant. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent that" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that the physical contact actually offended the complainant, only that the actor believed to a practical certainty that it would do so. Paragraph (a)(3) requires that a reasonable person in the situation of the complainant would regard the physical contact as offensive. "In fact," a defined term in § 22E-207, here is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to whether a reasonable person in the situation of the complainant would regard the physical contact as offensive.

Subsection (b) establishes the prohibited conduct for second degree offensive physical contact, the lowest gradation of the offense. Paragraph (b)(1) specifies the prohibited conduct—causing the complainant to come into physical contact with any person[26] or any object or substance. Paragraph (b)(1) specifies that the required culpable mental state is "knowingly." Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the culpable mental state "knowingly" in paragraph (c)(1) applies to each element in paragraph (c)(1). "Knowingly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the accused must be practically certain that he or she will cause the complainant to come into physical contact with any person or any object or substance. The requirements in paragraph (b)(2) and (b)(3) are identical to the requirements in paragraphs (a)(2) and (a)(3).

[26] "Any person" includes the actor or the complainant. For example, if the actor pushes the complainant and does not cause "bodily injury" as required by the RCC assault statute (RCC § 22E-1202), that would constitute causing the complainant to come into physical contact with "any person." Similarly, if the actor causes the complainant to hit or touch themselves—for example, pushing the complainant's hand into the complainant's face—and it does not cause "bodily injury" as required by the RCC assault statute (RCC § 22E-1202),that would constitute causing the complainant to come into physical contact with "any person."

Subsection (c) codifies an exclusion from liability for the offense. The general provision in RCC § 22E-201 establishes the burdens of proof and production for all exclusions from liability in the RCC. An actor does not commit an offense under the revised offensive physical contact statute when, in fact, the actor's conduct is specifically permitted by a District statute or regulation. Subsection (c) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element, here that the actor's conduct is specifically permitted by a District statute or regulation. For example, Title 22, Health, of the current D.C. Municipal Regulations, has regulations that will satisfy the exclusion from liability.[27]

Subsection (d) codifies a defense for the revised offensive physical contact statute. The general provision in RCC § 22E-201 establishes the requirements for the burden of production and the burden of proof for all defenses in the RCC.

Paragraph (d)(1) uses the phrase "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element. Per the rules of construction in RCC § 22E-207, the term "in fact" applies to all requirements of the defense in paragraph (d)(1) and its subparagraphs and sub-subparagraphs, and there is no culpable mental state requirement for these requirements.

There are several requirements for the defense. Paragraph (d)(1) requires that the actor is not "a person with legal authority over the complainant," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701. As specified by use of "in fact" in subsection (d), no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to the fact that the actor is not "a person with legal authority over the complainant." When the complainant is under 18 years of age, RCC § 22E-701 defines a "person with legal authority over the complainant" as "a parent, or a person acting in the place of a parent under civil law, who is responsible for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant, or someone acting with the effective consent of such a parent or such a person." "Person acting in the place of a parent under civil law" and "effective consent" also are defined terms in RCC § 22E-701. When the complainant is an "incapacitated individual," RCC § 22E-701 defines a "person with legal authority over the complainant" as "a court-appointed guardian to the complainant, or someone acting with the effective consent of such a guardian." RCC § 22E-701 further defines "incapacitated individual."

The effect of paragraph (d)(1) is that an actor who is "a person with legal authority over the complainant," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701, does not have this effective consent defense[28] to the revised offensive physical contact statute.

[27] For example, D.C. Mun. Regs. tit. 22-B, § 602.4 states:

> Any minor who is examined, treated, hospitalized, or receives health services under this chapter may give legal consent, and no person who administers the health services shall be liable civilly or criminally for assault, battery, or assault and battery; or any other civil legal charge, except for negligence or intentional harm in the diagnosis and treatment rendered to the minor and for violations of the D.C. Mental Health Information Act of 1978.

[28] The defense under subsection (d) is not available to an actor that is a "person with legal authority over the complainant" and there is no general effective consent defense in the RCC.

However, such an actor may have a defense under either the parental or guardian defenses in RCC § 22E-408, which provide expansive defenses for specified parents and guardians and those acting with the effective consent of such a parent or guardian.[29]

Paragraph (d)(2) and its subparagraphs specify the individuals from whom an actor must receive "effective consent" in order for the defense to apply. Each subparagraph will be discussed separately, but general principles that apply to each subparagraph will be discussed first.

Paragraph (d)(2) requires that the actor "reasonably believes"[30] that the specified individuals in the following subparagraphs—either the complainant or a "person with legal authority over the complainant" acting consistent with that authority—give "effective consent" to the actor to cause the physical contact. "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception." The RCC definition of "effective consent" incorporates the RCC definition of "consent," which requires some indication (by word or action) of agreement given by a person generally competent to do so. In addition, the RCC definition of "consent" excludes consent from a person that "[b]ecause of youth, mental disability, or intoxication, is unable to make a reasonable judgment as to the nature or harmfulness of the conduct to constitute the offense or to the result thereof." Thus, although subparagraph (d)(2) and its subparagraphs permit complainants under the age of 18 years to give effective consent in certain situations, the defendant's belief that a very young person gave "consent" may not be reasonable and, in such a case, the defense would not apply.

The "in fact" specified in subsection (d) applies to paragraph (d)(2) and the requirements in the following subparagraphs. No culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to paragraph (d)(2) or the following subparagraphs. It is not necessary to prove that the actor desired or was practically certain that the actor had the effective consent of one of the specified persons. However, the actor must subjectively believe, and that belief must be reasonable, that the actor has the required effective consent.[31] Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[32] There is no effective consent defense under paragraph (d)(2) when the actor makes an unreasonable mistake as to the effective

[29] These defenses have different requirements than the effective consent defense in subsection (d). For example, both the parental and guardian defenses in RCC § 22E-408 require that the actor's conduct be reasonable.

[30] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist.

If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. consent of the complainant or of the person acting with legal authority over the complainant. There is also no defense under paragraph (d)(2) when the actor makes an unreasonable mistake as to the fact that a person acting with legal authority over the complainant is acting consistent with their authority.

Paragraph (d)(2) further requires that the actor "reasonably believes" that the complainant and the actor meet various age requirements in the following subparagraphs. As is discussed above, due to the "in fact" specified in subsection (d), no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to paragraph (d)(2) or the following subparagraphs. However, the actor must subjectively believe, and that belief must be reasonable,[33] that the actor and the complainant satisfy the age requirements in the subparagraphs under paragraph (d)(2). There is no effective consent defense under paragraph (d)(2) when the actor makes an unreasonable mistake as to the required age of the complainant or required age of the actor.

Finally, paragraph (d)(2) requires that the actor "reasonably believes" that the complainant or a "person with legal authority over the complainant acting consistent with that authority" gives effective consent to cause the injury. As is discussed above, due to the "in fact" specified in subsection (d), no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to paragraph (d)(2) or the following subparagraphs. However, the actor must subjectively believe, and that belief must be reasonable,[34] that there is effective consent to cause the physical contact. There is no effective consent defense under paragraph (d)(2) when the actor makes an unreasonable mistake as to the type of physical contact to which effective consent is given.[35]

Having discussed the general principles that apply to the defense requirements in paragraph (d)(2) and its subparagraphs, each subparagraph will now be discussed.

[35] For example, if, the complainant gives effective consent to the actor to push the complainant then instead throws urine at the complainant, the effective consent does not apply, and the actor is still guilty of first degree offensive physical contact.

Under paragraph (d)(2) and subparagraph (d)(2)(A), the actor must reasonably believe that the complainant is 18 years of age or older and that the complainant, or a "person with legal authority over the complainant" acting consistent with that authority, gives "effective consent" to the actor to either cause the physical contact, or to engage in a lawful sport, occupation, or other concerted activity.[36] As is discussed above, "effective consent" and "person with legal authority over the complainant" are defined terms in RCC § 22E-701. The provision in subparagraph (d)(2)(A) for a "person with legal authority over the complainant acting consistent with that authority" giving effective consent to the actor is intended to cover guardians of incompetent adults giving effective consent to the actor. Sub-subparagraph (d)(2)(A)(ii), in the alternative, requires that, if the physical contact occurs during a lawful sport, occupation, or other concerted activity, the defense is applicable when the actor's infliction of the physical contact is a reasonably foreseeable hazard of that activity. As specified by the "in fact" in subsection (d), no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to the requirement that the actor's infliction of the physical contact is a reasonably foreseeable hazard of a permissible activity. This is an objective determination and the defense does not apply if the infliction of the physical contact is not a reasonably foreseeable hazard.

Second, and in the alternative, under subparagraph (d)(2)(B), the actor must reasonably believe that the complainant is under 18 years of age and the actor is 18 years of age or older and more than four years older than the complainant (subparagraph (d)(2)(B)(i)). In addition, the actor must reasonably believe that a "person with legal authority over the complainant" gives "effective consent" to the actor to either cause the physical contact, or to engage in a lawful sport, occupation, or other concerted activity,[37] where the actor's infliction of the physical contact is a reasonably foreseeable hazard of that activity. The above discussion of "engage in a lawful sport, occupation . . ." for sub-subparagraph (d)(2)(A)(ii) applies here to sub-subparagraph (d)(2)(B)(ii)(II).

Finally, and in the alternative, under paragraph (d)(2) and subparagraph (d)(2)(C), the actor must reasonably believe that the complainant is under 18 years of age, and that the actor is either under years of age or over 18 years of age and not more than four years older (sub-subparagraph (d)(2)(C)(i)). Paragraph (d)(2) and subparagraph (d)(2)(C)(ii) further require that the actor must reasonably believe that the complainant gives "effective consent" to the actor to cause the physical contact, or to engage in a lawful sport, occupation, or other concerted activity,[38] where the actor's infliction of the physical contact is a reasonably foreseeable hazard of that activity. The above discussion of "engage in a lawful sport, occupation . . ." for sub-subparagraph (d)(2)(A)(ii) applies here to sub-subparagraph (d)(2)(C)(ii)(II).

Subsection (e) specifies relevant penalties for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.] Paragraph (e)(3) codifies a penalty enhancement for either gradation of the revised physical contact offense. If either of the specified enhancements apply, the penalty classification for the offense is increased by one class.

The first penalty enhancement is in subparagraph (e)(3)(A). The actor must commit the offense "reckless" as to the fact that the complainant is a "protected person" as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701, such as being a law enforcement officer in the course of his or her duties. "Reckless," a term defined at RCC § 22E-206, here means the accused must consciously disregard a substantial risk that the complainant is a "protected person" as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701.

The second penalty enhancement is in subparagraph (e)(3)(B). The actor must commit the offense with the "purpose" of harming the complainant because of his or her status as a "law enforcement officer," "public safety employee," or "District official" as those terms are defined in RCC § 22E-701.[39] "Purpose" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means that the actor must consciously desire to harm the complainant because of his or her status as a "law enforcement officer," "public safety employee," or "District official."[40] Harm may include, but does not require bodily injury. Harm should be construed more broadly to include causing an array of adverse outcomes. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "has the purpose" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. Here, it is not necessary to prove that the complainant who was harmed was a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or District official, only that the actor believed to a practical certainty that the complainant that he or she would harm a person of such a status.

Subsection (f) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised offensive physical contact statute clearly changes current District law in ten main ways.

First, the RCC offensive physical contact offense punishes as a separate offense, with a distinct name, low-level conduct that is part of assaultive conduct in current law. Current District assault statutes are silent as to whether offensive physical contacts are sufficient for liability,[41] but DCCA case law establishes that a simple assault includes: 1) non-violent sexual touching[42] that causes no pain or impairment to the complainant's

[39] While the RCC § 22E-701 definitions of "law enforcement officer" and "public safety employee" refer to some persons only when on-duty (e.g., a campus officer), this provision on committing the offense with the purpose of harming the complainant because of their status as a law enforcement officer or public safety employee applies to committing the offense against an off-duty person based on their on-duty role.

[40] For example, a defendant who commits aggravated assault an off-duty police officer in retaliation for the officer arresting the defendant's friend would constitute committing aggravated assault with the purpose of harming the complainant due to his status as a law enforcement officer.

[41] D.C. Code § 22-404(a)(1) ("Whoever unlawfully assaults . . . another . . . shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or be imprisoned not more than 180 days, or both.").

[42] "Where the assault involves a nonviolent sexual touching the court has held that there is an assault . . . because 'the sexual nature [of the conduct] suppl[ies] the element of violence or threat of violence.'"

body; and 2) any completed battery where the accused inflicts an unwanted touching on the complainant that causes no pain or impairment to the complainant's body.[43] However, a recent DCCA case that is in active litigation may ultimately call into question whether an unwanted touching on the complainant that causes no pain or impairment is sufficient.[44] In contrast, in the RCC, the revised assault statute (RCC § 22E-1202) is limited to causing three types of bodily injury—"serious bodily injury," "significant bodily injury," and "bodily injury"—as those terms are defined in RCC § 22E-701—as well as serious and permanent disfigurement and injuries. The RCC offensive physical contact statute generally criminalizes offensive physical contacts that fall short of inflicting "bodily injury." Offensive physical contact that satisfies the RCC offensive physical contact offense may be sexual in nature. However, depending on the facts of the case, other offenses in the RCC may provide more serious liability for offensive touching that is sexual in nature such as other RCC Chapter 12 offenses, RCC weapons offenses, or RCC sex offenses in Chapter 13. The RCC abolishes common law non-violent sexual touching assault that is currently recognized in DCCA case law.[45] This change improves the organization and proportionality of the District's current law on assaults, by distinguishing harms of different severity.

Second, the RCC offensive physical contact statute is not subject to a penalty enhancement for the involvement of a dangerous weapon. The District's current assault with a dangerous weapon (ADW) statute is a separate offense with a ten-year maximum penalty.[46] Although the statute is silent as to what level of conduct suffices as a predicate

The DCCA has stated that the elements of non-violent sexual touching assault are: 1) That the defendant committed a sexual touching on another person; 2) That when the defendant committed the touching, s/he acted voluntarily, on purpose and not by mistake or accident; and 3) That the other person did not consent to being touched by the defendant in that matter. *Mungo v. Since an assault is simply an attempted battery, every completed battery necessarily includes an assault. Appellant's statement that he removed the phone from the complainant's hand and then took her cigarette from her other hand and extinguished it is thus an admission, at least prima facie, of two separate assaultive acts".") [46] D.C. Code § 22-402 ("Every person convicted of an assault with intent to commit mayhem, or of an assault with a dangerous weapon, shall be sentenced to imprisonment for not more than 10 years. In for liability, District case law specifies that engaging in any conduct that constitutes a simple assault is sufficient.[47] In contrast, the RCC offensive physical contact offense does not have an enhancement for the use of a "dangerous weapon" or "imitation dangerous weapon," as those terms are defined in RCC § 22E-70. The use or display of a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon during conduct that satisfies the RCC offensive physical contact offense may be criminalized as attempted assault under the RCC general attempt provision (RCC § 22E-301) or the criminal threats statute and its weapon enhancement (RCC § 22E-1204). In addition, simple possession of a dangerous weapon during offensive physical contact may also entail liability for an RCC weapons offense.[48] This change improves the law's clarity and proportionality by distinguishing harms of different severity.

Third, the conduct in the RCC offensive physical contact offense no longer is a predicate for liability when an assault occurs with intent to commit another crime. Current District law recognizes as separate offenses assault with intent to kill,[49] assault with intent to commit first degree sexual abuse,[50] assault with intent to commit second degree sexual abuse,[51] assault with intent to commit child sexual abuse,[52] assault with intent to commit robbery,[53] assault with intent to commit mayhem,[54] and assault with intent to commit any other felony,[55] collectively referred to as the "assault with intent to" or "AWI" offenses. Current District case law generally indicates that conduct constituting a simple assault, with the appropriate intent, is sufficient for liability for the AWI offenses[56]—and insofar as the conduct in the RCC offensive physical contact offense constitutes simple assault in current law, such conduct also would be a predicate addition to any other penalty provided under this section, a person may be fined an amount not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01.").

The more stringent 10-year maximum penalty, as opposed to 180 days for simple assault in D.C. Code § 22-404(a)(1), is "imposed as 'a practical recognition of the additional risks posed by use of the weapon.'" Williamson v. United States, 445 A.2d 975, 979 (D.C. 1982) (quoting Parker v. United States, 359 F.2d 1009, 1012 (D.C. Cir. 1966)).

However, as this commentary noted elsewhere, a recent DCCA case that is in active litigation may ultimately call into question whether an unwanted touching on the complainant that causes no pain or impairment is sufficient. If an individual merely possesses a dangerous weapon during offensive physical contact, the individual may still be subject to liability for possessing a dangerous weapon in furtherance of offensive physical contact per RCC § 22E-4104) or other RCC weapons offenses.

[48] If an individual merely possesses a dangerous weapon during offensive physical contact, the individual may still be subject to liability for possessing a dangerous weapon in furtherance of offensive physical contact per RCC § 22E-4104) or other RCC weapons offenses. The same analysis would apply for an imitation firearm under RCC § 22E-4104, but not any other kind of "imitation dangerous weapon."

for liability under existing AWI offenses. In contrast, in the RCC, the AWI offenses no longer exist and liability for the conduct criminalized by the AWI offenses is provided through application of the general attempt statute in RCC § 22E-301 to the completed offenses.[57] The RCC general attempt provision provides for liability that is at least as expansive as that afforded by AWI offenses.[58] The change improves the clarity of the revised offensive physical contact statute, and eliminates unnecessary overlap between the AWI offenses and general attempt liability for assault-type offenses.

Fourth, under the revised offensive physical contact statute the general culpability principles for self-induced intoxication in RCC § 22E-209 allow a defendant to claim he or she did not act "knowingly" or with "intent" due to his or her self-induced intoxication. The current assault statute from which the offense of offensive physical contact is derived is silent as to the effect of intoxication. However, District law seems to have established that assault is a general intent offense,[59] which would preclude a defendant from receiving a jury instruction on whether intoxication prevented the defendant from forming the necessary culpable mental state requirement for the crime.[60] This DCCA case law would also likely mean that a defendant would be precluded from directly raising—though not necessarily presenting evidence in support of[61]—the claim that, due to his or her self-induced intoxicated state, the defendant did not possess the knowledge or intent required for any element of offensive physical contact.[62] In contrast, under the revised offensive physical contact offense, a defendant would both have a basis for, and will be able to raise and present relevant and admissible evidence in support of, a claim that voluntary intoxication prevented the defendant from forming the knowledge or intent required to prove offensive physical contact. Likewise, where appropriate, the defendant would be entitled to an instruction, which clarifies that a not guilty verdict is [57] For example, rather than having a separate offense of assault with intent to kill, as is codified in current D.C. Code § 22-401, the RCC criminalizes that conduct as an attempt to commit an offense such as murder or aggravated assault.

[58] For more details, see Commentary to the revised assault statute (RCC § 22E-1202).

[59] For District case law establishing that assault is a general intent crime, see, for example, Smith v. United States, 593 A.2d 205, 206–07 (D.C. 1991) and Perry v. United States, 36 A.3d 799, 823 (D.C. 2011). For District case law indicating that a voluntary intoxication defense may not be raised to an assault charge, see Parker v. United States, 359 F.2d 1009, 1013 n.4 (D.C. Cir. 1966) ("It seems clear that, regardless of the definition, voluntary intoxication is no defense to simple assault.") (citing McGee v. State, 4 Ala. App. 54, 58 So. 1008 (1912), and State v. Truitt, 21 Del. 466, 62 A. 790 (1904)). See also Buchanan v. United States, 32 A.3d 990, 996-98 (D.C. 2011) (Ruiz, J. concurring) (discussing the relationship between the law of intoxication and assault's status as a general intent crime).

[60] See D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 9.404 ("If evidence of intoxication gives you a reasonable doubt about whether [name of defendant] could or did form the intent to [^] , then you must find him/her not guilty of the offense of [^] . On the other hand, if the government has proved beyond a reasonable doubt that [name of defendant] could and did form the intent to [^], along with every other element of the offense, then you must find him/her guilty of the offense of [^] .").

[61] Whether intoxication evidence may be presented when it cannot negate intent is less clear. Compare Carter v. United States, 531 A.2d 956, 963 (D.C. 1987) with Cooper v. United States, 680 A.2d 1370, 1372 (D.C. 1996); Parker v. United States, 359 F.2d 1009, 1012–13 (D.C. Cir. 1966)); see also Buchanan, 32 A.3d at 996 (Ruiz, J., concurring) (discussing Parker).

[62] This is so, moreover, notwithstanding the fact that the defendant, due to his or her self-induced intoxicated state, may not have actually possessed the knowledge required for any element of offensive physical context.

necessary if the defendant's intoxicated state precludes the government from meeting its burden of proof with respect to the culpable mental state of knowledge or intent at issue in offensive physical contact.[63] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the offense.

Fifth, to the extent that certain statutory minimum penalties[64] apply to the current assault statute and related assault offenses, the RCC offensive physical contact offense partially replaces them. The statute is silent as to whether the penalties are intended to apply to low-level assaultive conduct and there is no DCCA case law on the issue. In contrast, in the RCC, low-level assaultive conduct is no longer subject to these statutory minimum penalties. For the RCC offensive physical contact offense specifically, offensive physical contacts that fall short of "bodily injury" required in the revised assault statute are no longer subject to these penalties.[65] This change improves the proportionality of the revised offense.[66]

Sixth, the revised offensive physical contact statute's enhanced penalties for harming a law enforcement officer (LEO) partially replace[67] the separate assault on a police officer (APO) offenses. Under current District law, a simple assault against a LEO "on account of, or while that law enforcement officer is engaged in the performance of his or her official duties"[68] is a misdemeanor, with a maximum term of imprisonment of 6 months,[69] and an assault that causes "significant bodily injury" or "a violent act that [63] These results are a product of the logical relevance principle set forth in RCC § 22E-209(a) and the fact that knowledge and intent is a mental state susceptible to negation by self-induced intoxication. See RCC § 22E-209(b).

[64] D.C. Code §§ 24-403.01(e) ("The sentence imposed under this section on a person who was over 18 years of age at the time of the offense and was convicted of assault with intent to commit first or second degree sexual abuse or child sexual abuse in violation of § 22-401…shall be not less than 2 years if the violation occurs after the person has been convicted in the District of Columbia or elsewhere of a crime of violence as defined in § 22-4501, providing for the control of dangerous weapons in the District of Columbia."); D.C. Code § 24-403.01(f) ("The sentence imposed under this section shall not be less than 1 year for a person who was over 18 years of age at the time of the offense and was convicted of: (1) Assault with a dangerous weapon on a police officer in violation of § 22-405, occurring after the person has been convicted of a violation of that section or of a felony, either in the District of Columbia or in another jurisdiction.").

[65] As discussed in this commentary, in addition to unwanted touchings that do not cause pain or impairment to the complainant, current District law generally includes in assault: 1) non-violent sexual touching that causes no pain or impairment to the complainant's body; and 2) intent-to-frighten assaults that do not result in physical contact with the complainant's body. In the RCC, this conduct is no longer covered by the revised assault statute, but may be covered by attempted assault under the general attempt provision (RCC § 22E-301), or by criminal threats (RCC § 22E-1204), or second degree nonconsensual sexual conduct (RCC § 22E-1307(b)). As with the RCC offensive physical contact offense, criminal threats (RCC § 22E-1204), and second degree nonconsensual sexual conduct (RCC § 22E-1307(b)) are no longer subject to these statutory minimums, which is discussed further in the commentaries to these RCC statutes.

[66] For further discussion of how these enhancements and provisions apply to the District's current assault statutes, see the commentary to the revised assault statute (RCC § 22E-1202).

[67] As is discussed earlier in this commentary, "assault" in current District law includes a broad range of conduct that does not require "bodily injury" like the RCC assault statute does. The RCC offensive physical contact offense is one RCC offense that criminalizes this conduct. However, other RCC offenses may also criminalize this conduct and should also be considered to replace the separate APO offenses even though they are generally not discussed in this entry.

creates a grave risk of causing significant bodily injury" carries a maximum penalty of ten years imprisonment.[70] In contrast, the revised offensive physical contact statute provides enhanced penalties for offensive physical contact with LEOs that falls short of the "bodily injury" requirements in the RCC assault statute (RCC § 22E-1202).[71]

Codifying the LEO enhancement in the revised offensive physical contact statute results in several changes to current District law. First, the enhanced gradations of the revised offensive physical contact offense require recklessness as to whether the LEO is a "protected person," rather than negligence.[72] A culpable mental state of recklessness makes the enhanced LEO gradations of the revised offensive physical contact statute consistent with the other enhancements in the revised offense that are based on the complainant's status. Fourth, the revised definition of "law enforcement officer" in RCC § 22E-701 changes the scope of the enhanced penalties in the revised offensive physical contact statute as compared to the current APO statute,[73] particularly for certain members of fire departments, investigators, and code inspectors.[74] The commentary to RCC § 22E-701 discusses the revised definition of "law enforcement officer" in detail. Third, the revised offensive physical contact statute does not enhance offensive physical contact against family members of LEOs due to their relation to a LEO, which is part of the repeal of the general provision prohibiting targeting family members of District officials

[71] Codifying enhanced penalties for causing offensive physical contact with a LEO is consistent with recent District legislation that amended the APO statute. Prior to June 30, 2016, in addition to an assault, the APO statute prohibited "resist[ing], oppos[ing], imped[ing], intimidate[ingt], or interfer[ing] with a law enforcement officer" in the course of his or her official duties or on account of those duties. D.C. Code § 22-405(b), (c) (repl.). On January 28, 2016, the Office of the District of Columbia Auditor issued a report titled "The Durability of Police Reform: The Metropolitan Police Department and Use of Force, 2008-2015," available at http://www.dcauditor.org/sites/default/files/Full%20Report_2.pdf (Office of the District of Columbia Auditor Report). The report recommended that the APO misdemeanor statute "be amended so that the elements of the offense require an actual assault rather than mere resistance or interference with a [Metropolitan Police Department] officer." Office of the District of Columbia Auditor Report at 107.
The Neighborhood Engagement Achieves Results Amendment Act of 2016 ("NEAR Act") amended the current APO statute by limiting it to "assault[s]" and created a new statute for resisting arrest (D.C. Code § 22-405.01). The Committee Report for this legislation cited the Office of the District of Columbia Auditor Report. Committee on the Judiciary, Report on Bill 21-0360, the "Neighborhood Engagement Achieves Results Amendment Act of 2016) (January 27, 2016).

[72] The current APO statute does not specify a culpable mental state for the fact that the complainant is a LEO in the course of his or her official duties. D.C. Code § 22-405(b), (c). However, DCCA case law suggests that a culpable mental state akin to negligence applies to this element. See, e.g., Scott. v. United States, 975 A.2d 831, 836 (D.C. 2009) ("To convict [appellant] of APO, the government was required to prove that . . . the defendant either knew or should have known [the complaining witness] was a police officer engaged in official duties."); In re J.S., 19 A.3d 328, 330 (D.C. 2011) ("Generally, to prove APO the government must show 'the elements of simple assault . . . plus the additional element that the defendant knew or should have known the victim was a police officer.'") (quoting Petway v. United States, 420 A.2d 1211, 1213 (D.C. 1980)).

[73] D.C. Code § 22-405(a) (defining "law enforcement officer.").

[74] It should be noted that while the RCC definition of "law enforcement officer" no longer includes these categories of complainants, they remain covered by the revised definition of "public safety employee," also defined in RCC § 22E-701. As such, they still receive enhanced protection as a category of "protected person" and as a category of complainant when the assault is committed with the purpose of harming the complainant due to the complainant's status.

and employees in D.C. Code § 22-851.[75] Collectively, these changes partially replace the APO offenses in current law with enhanced penalties in the gradations of the revised offensive physical contact statute, improve the clarity of existing statutes, and generally provide for consistent treatment of LEOs and other specially protected complainants. The changes reduce unnecessary gaps and overlap between offenses, and improve the proportionality of the statutes as well.

Seventh, the revised offensive physical contact statute partially replaces[76] the current offenses of assault and aggravated assault on a public vehicle inspection officer. Under current District law, "assault[ing]" a "public vehicle inspection officer" or "imped[ing], intimidate[ing], or interfer[ing] with" that officer while that officer "is engaged in or on account of the performance of his or her official duties" is a misdemeanor with a maximum term of imprisonment of 180 days.[77] If the accused causes "serious bodily injury," the offense is a felony with a maximum penalty of ten years imprisonment.[78] In contrast, in the revised offensive physical contact statute, offensive physical contact against a "vehicle inspection officer"[79] receives enhanced

[75] Current D.C. Code § 22-851(d) prohibits committing specified crimes, including "assault[s]" and "injur[ies]" against any "family member" of a District "official or employee" on account of the District official or employee's performance of official duties. "Family member" is defined as "an individual to whom the official or employee of the District of Columbia is related by blood, legal custody, marriage, domestic partnership, having a child in common, the sharing of a mutual residence, or the maintenance of a romantic relationship not necessarily including a sexual relationship" and District "official or employee" is defined as "a person who currently holds or formerly held a paid or unpaid position in the legislative, executive, or judicial branch of government of the District of Columbia, including boards and commissions." D.C. Code § 22-851(a), (d). Many law enforcement officers, as "LEO" is defined in the current APO statute, are District employees and therefore D.C. Code § 22-851 criminalizes targeting their families because of their relation to a LEO. However, there is no provision in current law prohibiting assaults with such motives against family members of other, non-District employees who fall within the definition of a "law enforcement officer."

[76] As is discussed earlier in this commentary, "assault" in current District law includes a broad range of conduct that does not require "bodily injury" like the RCC assault statute does. The RCC offensive physical contact offense is one RCC offense that criminalizes this conduct. However, other RCC offenses may also criminalize this conduct and should also be considered to replace the separate assault and aggravated assault on a public vehicle inspection officer offenses even though they are generally not discussed in this entry.

[77] D.C. Code § 22-404.02.

[78] D.C. Code § 22-404.03(a)(1), (a)(2) (subsection (a)(1) requires "knowingly or purposely causes serious bodily injury to the public vehicle inspection officer" and subsection (a)(2) requires "under circumstances manifesting extreme indifference to human life . . . intentionally or knowingly engages in conduct which creates a grave risk of serious bodily injury to another person, and thereby causes serious bodily injury."). The term "serious bodily injury" is not statutorily defined and it is unclear whether the DCCA would apply the definition of "serious bodily injury" from the sexual abuse statutes to the offenses like it has with aggravated assault.

[79] Although the assault on a public vehicle inspection officer offenses in D.C. Code §§ 22-404.02 and 22-404.03 state that the term "public vehicle inspection officer shall have the same meaning as provided in § 50-303(19)," the term "public vehicle inspection officer" no longer exists in Title 50 of the D.C. Code. The definition of "public vehicle inspection officer" was repealed with the passage of the Vehicle-For-Hire Innovation Amendment Act of 2014 ("VFHIAA") (Mar. 10, 2015, D.C. Law 20-197, § 2(a), 61 DCR 12430). However, the VFHIAA included a substantially similar, new definition for a "vehicle inspection officer" and that RCC uses that term instead. D.C. Code § 50-301.03(30B) ("'Vehicle inspection officer' means a District employee trained in the laws, rules, and regulations governing public and private vehicle-penalties, but is no longer a separate offense. A "vehicle inspection" officer is included in the definition of "protected person" in RCC § 22E-701 as a "public safety employee," also defined in RCC § 22E-701. Since they are included in the definition of "public safety employee," vehicle inspection officers are also included in the offensive physical contact penalty enhancements for having the purpose of harming the complainant due to the complainant's status. Conduct that falls short of offensive physical contact may receive an enhanced penalty elsewhere in the RCC,[80] but conduct that consists merely of "imped[ing], intimidat[ing], or interfer[ing] with" a public vehicle inspection officer does not.

Replacing the offenses of assault and aggravated assault on a public vehicle inspection officer with the revised offensive physical contact statute results in several additional changes to District law. First, under the revised offensive physical contact statute, unlike current law,[81] there is no longer an automatic civil penalty of loss of a license to operate public vehicles-for-hire upon conviction of offensive physical contact of a vehicle inspection officer. Second, the revised offensive physical contact statute does not enhance offensive physical contact against family members of vehicle inspection officers because of their relation to the public vehicle inspection officers, which is part of the repeal of the general provision regarding targeting family members of District officials and employees in D.C. Code § 22-851.[82] Third, the revised offensive physical contact statute does not bar justification and excuse defenses to resistance to a public vehicle inspection officer's civil enforcement authority.[83] This change clarifies the for-hire service to ensure the proper provision of service and to support safety through street enforcement efforts, including traffic stops of public and private vehicles-for-hire, pursuant to protocol prescribed under this act and by regulation."). The VFHIAA legislative history does not appear to include reference to the assault on a public vehicle inspection officer offenses in D.C. Code §§ 22-404.02 and 22-404.03 or discuss how those offenses might be affected by the elimination of the term "public vehicle inspection officer."

[80] Depending on the facts of the case, intent-to-frighten assaults and incomplete batteries against vehicle inspection officers may be punishable under the revised criminal threats statute (RCC § 22E-1204), which has a "protected person" penalty enhancement, or attempted assault or attempted physical contact under the RCC general attempt provision in RCC § 22E-301.

[81] D.C. Code §§ 22-404.02(b)(2), 22-404.03(b)(2) (stating that upon conviction for assault or aggravated assault of a public vehicle inspection officer, an individual "shall" "have his or her license or licenses for operating a public vehicle-for-hire, as required by the Commission pursuant to subchapter I of Chapter 3 of Title 50, revoked without further administrative action by the Commission.").

[82] Current D.C. Code § 22-851(d) prohibits committing specified crimes, including "assault[s]" and "injur[ies]" against any "family member" of a District "official or employee" on account of the District official or employee's performance of official duties. "Family member" is defined as "an individual to whom the official or employee of the District of Columbia is related by blood, legal custody, marriage, domestic partnership, having a child in common, the sharing of a mutual residence, or the maintenance of a romantic relationship not necessarily including a sexual relationship" and District "official or employee" is defined as "a person who currently holds or formerly held a paid or unpaid position in the legislative, executive, or judicial branch of government of the District of Columbia, including boards and commissions." D.C. Code § 22-851(a), (d). Vehicle inspection officers, as defined in D.C. Code § 50-301.03(30B), are District employees and therefore D.C. Code § 22-851 criminalizes targeting their families because of their relationship.

[83] The current assault on a public vehicle inspection officer statutes bar justification and excuse defenses to resistance to a public vehicle inspection officer's civil enforcement authority. D.C. Code §§ 22-404.02(c), 22-404.03(c) ("It is neither justifiable nor excusable for a person to use force to resist the civil enforcement authority exercised by an individual believed to be a public vehicle inspection officer, whether or not such revised offensive physical contact statute and reduces unnecessary overlap with other provisions that specially penalize assaults on District officials.

Eighth, the RCC definition of "protected person," discussed in the commentary to RCC § 22E-701, results in several changes to the scope of enhanced offensive physical contact. First, through the definition of "protected person," offensive physical contact against complainants under the age of 18 years or against complainants 65 years of age or older receive enhanced penalties in the revised offensive physical contact offense, but only if certain age requirements are met. Current District law enhances various assault offenses against complainants under the age of 18 years if there is at least a two year age gap between the complainant and an actor that is 18 years of age or older,[84] and against all complainants 65 years of age or older.[85] In contrast, the "protected person" penalty enhancement in the revised offensive physical contact statute requires at least a four year age gap between a complainant under 18 years of age and an actor that is 18 years of age or older, and require that the actor be under the age of 65 years and at least 10 years younger than a complainant that is 65 years of age or older. With respect to minors, these age requirements are consistent with other offenses in current District law[86] and the age gap for seniors,[87] while new to District law, reserve the enhanced penalties for predatory enforcement action is lawful."). The RCC assault statute deletes this provision and bar to self-defense against a public vehicle inspection officer, and instead relies on the provision in RCC § 22E-403(b)(3). RCC § 22E-403(b)(3) provides an exception to defense of self or others when "The actor is reckless as to the fact that they are protecting themselves or another from lawful conduct." RCC § 22E-403(b)(3) allows an actor who otherwise meets the requirements for self-defense to use force to oppose a public vehicle inspection officer's use of force that either is not lawful or when the actor is not reckless as to the lawfulness. The RCC continues to bar a claim of self-defense whenever an actor is reckless as to the public vehicle inspection officer's conduct being lawful.

[84] D.C. Code § 22-3611(a) ("Any adult, being at least 2 years older than a minor, who commits a crime of violence against that minor may be punished by a fine of up to 1 ½ times the maximum fine otherwise authorized for the offense and may be imprisoned for a term of up to 1 ½ times the maximum term of imprisonment otherwise authorized for the offense, or both."); 22-3611(c)(1), (c)(3) (defining "adult" as "a person 18 years of age or older at the time of the offense" and a "minor" as "a person under 18 years of age at the time of the offense.").

[85] D.C. Code § 22-3601(a) ("Any person who commits any offense listed in subsection (b) of this section against an individual who is 65 years of age or older, at the time of the offense, may be punished by a fine of up to 1 1/2 times the maximum fine otherwise authorized for the offense and may be imprisoned for a term of up to 1 1/2 times the maximum term of imprisonment otherwise authorized for the offense, or both.").

[86] Many of the District's offenses against complainants under the age of 18 years require at least a four year age gap between the actor and the complainant. See, e.g., D.C. Code §§ 22-3008, 22-3009, 22-3001(3) (child sexual abuse statutes and defining "child" as "a person who has not yet attained the age of 16 years."); 22-3010, 22-3001(3) (enticing a child statute and defining "child" as "a person who has not yet attained the age of 16 years."); 22-3010.02 (arranging for a sexual contact with a real or fictitious child and defining "child" as "a person who has not yet attained the age of 16 years."); 22-811(a), (f)(1), (f)(2) (contributing to the delinquency of a minor statute and defining "adult" as "a person 18 years of age or older at the time of the offense" and "minor" as "a person under 18 years of age at the time of the offense.").

[87] None of the District's offenses targeting harms against complainants that are over the age of 65 years require any age gap between the actor and the complainant. See D.C. Code §§ 22-932, 22-933, 22-933.01, 22-934. However, requiring at least a ten year age gap between the actor and a complainant that is 65 years of age is consistent with requiring an age gap in the offenses against complainants that are under 18 years behavior. Second, offensive physical contact against a driver of a private vehicle-for-hire, a "vulnerable adult," and a "public safety employee" receive new enhanced penalties in the revised offensive physical contact statute through the definition of a "protected person." A driver of a private vehicle-for-hire does not receive any enhanced penalties under current District law, and a vulnerable adult[88] or "public safety employee"[89] receives enhanced penalties in a few non-assault offenses. In contrast, the "protected person" penalty enhancement in the revised offensive physical contact statute recognize the prevalence of drivers of private vehicles-for-hire and the special status elsewhere under current District law for vulnerable adults and public safety employees. Third, offensive physical contact against a "citizen patrol member"[90] or a "District employee" no longer receive enhanced penalties in the revised offensive physical contact offense as they do under current District law.[91] The breadth of these current enhancements is inconsistent as compared to other penalty enhancements in current District law.

The RCC definition of "protected person" also makes broader changes to the revised offensive physical contact statute. First, the "protected person" penalty enhancement applies to each type of offensive physical contact, whereas the various penalty enhancements in current District law apply inconsistently to simple assault,[92] the "assault with intent to" offenses,[93] and the various felony assault offenses,[94] resulting in of age. The 10 year age gap recognizes that both the complainant and the actor are adults, as opposed to teenagers.

[92] Only one of the separate penalty enhancements under current District law applies to simple assault—the enhancement for crimes against citizen patrol members. D.C. Code § 22-3602(c). Assaulting or injury a District "official or employee" also receives an enhanced penalty under the protection of District public officials statute. D.C. Code § 22-851(c).

[93] Of the separate penalty enhancements under current District law, only the separate enhancements for crimes against senior citizens and crimes against minors apply to all the AWI offenses. D.C. Code §§ 22-3601(b); 22-3611(c)(2). No AWI offenses are covered in the separate enhancements for crimes against taxicab drives or crimes against transit operators and Metrorail station managers. D.C. Code § 22-3752. The separate enhancement for crimes against citizen patrol members, D.C. Code § 22-3602, only applies to assault with intent to commit "forcible rape," which is an offense that no longer exists after the District's sexual abuse laws were revised in 1995. D.C. Code § 22-4801 (repl.). It is unclear whether assault with intent to commit an offense such as first degree sexual abuse would be covered by the enhancement. The protection of District public officials statute does not specifically mention AWI offenses, but does include "assault[s]" and "injure[s]." D.C. Code § 22-851(c).

[94] All the separate penalty enhancements under current District law apply to aggravated assault and ADW, D.C. Code §§ 22-3601(b); 22-3602(c); 22-3611(b)(2); 22-3752, but they do not consistently apply to other felony assault offenses. For example, only the separate enhancement for crimes against minors applies to assault with significant bodily injury. D.C. Code § 22-3611(c)(2). The separate penalty enhancements also apply inconsistently to malicious disfigurement and mayhem, with the citizen patrol enhancement applying only to mayhem, D.C. Code § 22-3602, and the other penalty enhancements applying to both offenses. D.C. Code §§ 22-3601(b); 22-3611(b)(2); 22-3752. The protection of District public officials statute does not specifically mention any felony assault offenses or mayhem or disfigurement, but does include "assault[s]" and "injure[s]." D.C. Code § 22-851(c).

disproportionate penalties for similar conduct. Second, the revised offensive physical contact statute applies a mental state of "recklessness" to whether the complainant is a "protected person." None of the separate penalty enhancements under current District law specify a culpable mental state, but the penalty enhancements for senior citizens[95] and minors[96] have affirmative defenses for a reasonable mistake of age. The "reckless" culpable mental state in the protected person penalty enhancement preserves the substance of these affirmative defenses[97] and establishes a consistent culpable mental state requirement for each category of complainant in the RCC definition of "protected person." Finally, the RCC offensive physical contact statute prohibits the stacking of multiple penalty enhancements based on the categories in the definition of "protected person" and stacking of penalty enhancements for a protected person and the use of a weapon.[98]

The separate enhancements are also inconsistent in whether they apply to attempts, conspiracies, or solicitations to commit the specified offenses, or some combination thereof. D.C. Code §§ 22-3601 (senior citizen enhancement applying to attempt or conspiracy); 22-3602 (citizen patrol enhancement applying to conspiracy); 22-3611 (crimes against minors enhancement applying to attempt, conspiracy, or solicitation); 22-3752 (statute enumerating offenses for enhancement for taxicab drivers, transit operators, and Metrorail station managers applying to attempt and conspiracy).

[95] D.C. Code § 22-3601(c) ("It is an affirmative defense that the accused knew or reasonably believed the victim was not 65 years old or older at the time of the offense, or could not have known or determined the age of the victim because of the manner in which the offense was committed. This defense shall be established by a preponderance of the evidence.").

[96] D.C. Code § 22-3611(b) ("It is an affirmative defense that the accused reasonably believed that the victim was not a minor at the time of the offense. This defense shall be established by a preponderance of the evidence.").

[97] The current enhancement for crimes against senior citizens makes it a defense that "the accused knew or reasonably believed the victim was not 65 years old or older at the time of the offense, or could not have known or determined the age of the victim because of the manner in which the offense was committed." D.C. Code § 22-3601(c). Similarly, the current enhancement for crimes against minors has an affirmative defense that "the accused reasonably believed that the victim was not a minor at the time of the offense." D.C. Code § 22-3611(b). In the RCC, it must be proven that an actor was reckless that the complainant was 65 years or older or under 18 years of age. The actor must consciously disregard a substantial risk that a circumstance (here the fact that the complainant is over 65 or under 18) exists. Per RCC § 22E-206, a reasonable mistake as to the complainant's age would negate the recklessness required for an age-based gradation enhancement for assault. See RCC § 22E-208(b)(3) and accompanying commentary, providing that a reasonable mistake as to a circumstance element negates the existence of recklessness as to that element. However, given the inherent difficulty in judging the age of another person, an actor who assesses a person's age based on appearance alone likely would be reckless as to the person being over 65 or under 18 if the actor judges a person to be very close in age to the 65 and 18 year old thresholds. For example, if an actor assessed the complainant's age to be in their early 60s based on appearance alone, the actor is likely aware of a substantial risk that the complainant is actually 65 years or older. Whether the actor's disregard of such risk is a gross deviation from the standard of conduct will depend on why the risk was ignored. For example, an assault based on the actor's allegedly knocking down and harming a complainant, reckless that they were 67 year old might reach different conclusions as to the deviation from the standard of conduct depending on whether the actor was running to a hospital to see a family member versus an actor who was running to the front of a line to see a sports star. Ultimately it is up to the factfinder to determine whether an actor's alleged mistake as to age of the complainant is reasonable given the facts of the case.

[98] Current District statutory law does not prevent stacking of such enhancements, and case law has not addressed the stacking of enhancements based on the categories covered in the RCC definition of protected

Collectively, these changes provide a consistent enhanced penalty for offensive physical contact against categories of individuals included in the definition of "protected person," removing gaps in the current patchwork of separate enhancements, clarifying the law, and improving the proportionality of offenses.

Ninth, the revised offensive physical contact statute enhances the penalty for offensive physical contact committed against LEOs, public safety employees, or District officials when the assault is committed with the "purpose of harming the complainant because of the complainant's status." Current District law has separate penalty enhancements or enhanced penalties for committing assault-type offenses because of the complainant's status as a LEO,[99] a member of a citizen patrol,[100] a District "official or employee,"[101] or a "family member" of a District "official or employee."[102] Current District law also enhances the penalty for the murder of a "public safety employee"[103] on account of the complainant's status. In contrast, the revised offensive physical contact statute limits this type of enhanced penalty to a "law enforcement officer" and a "District official," and extends it to a "public safety employee," resulting in several changes to current District law. First, as is discussed in the commentary to RCC § 22E-§ 22E-701, the revised definitions of "law enforcement officer," "District official," and "public safety employee" change the scope of the revised enhancements as compared to current District law. Second, offensive physical contact committed against a citizen patrol member, a District "employee," or the "family member" of a District "official or employee" because of the complainant's status no longer receive an enhanced penalty.

person. However, convictions have been upheld applying both a "while armed" enhancement under D.C. Code § 22-4502 and an enhancement based on the victim's status as a senior or minor.

[99] D.C. Code § 22-405(b), (c) (prohibiting assaulting a LEO, assaulting a LEO with significant bodily injury, or committing a "violent act that creates a grave risk of causing significant bodily injury" to the LEO "on account of . . . the performance of his or her official duties.").

[100] D.C. Code § 22-3602(b) (prohibiting committing specified offenses against a member of a citizen patrol "because of the member's participation in a citizen patrol."); 22-3602(a) (defining "citizen patrol" as "a group of residents of the District of Columbia organized for the purpose of providing additional security surveillance for certain District of Columbia neighborhoods with the goal of crime prevention. The term shall include, but is not limited to, Orange Hat Patrols, Red Hat Patrols, Blue Hat Patrols, or Neighborhood Watch Associations.").

[101] Current D.C. Code § 22-851(c) prohibits committing specified crimes, including "assault[s]" and "injur[ies]" against any District "official or employee," broadly defined as "a person who currently holds or formerly held a paid or unpaid position in the legislative, executive, or judicial branch of government of the District of Columbia, including boards and commissions." D.C. Code § 22-851(c), (a)(2).

[102] Current D.C. Code § 22-851(d) prohibits committing specified crimes, including "assault[s]" and "injur[ies]" against any "family member" of a District "official or employee." "Family member" is defined as "an individual to whom the official or employee of the District of Columbia is related by blood, legal custody, marriage, domestic partnership, having a child in common, the sharing of a mutual residence, or the maintenance of a romantic relationship not necessarily including a sexual relationship" and District "official or employee" is defined as "a person who currently holds or formerly held a paid or unpaid position in the legislative, executive, or judicial branch of government of the District of Columbia, including boards and commissions." D.C. Code § 22-851(a), (d).

[103] D.C. Code § 22-2106(a) ("Whoever, with deliberate and premeditated malice, and with knowledge or reason to know that the victim is a law enforcement officer or public safety employee, kills any law enforcement officer or public safety employee engaged in, or on account of, the performance of such officer's or employee's official duties . . . .").

These provisions raise a number of difficult definitional issues[104] and current sentencing practices in the District indicate that these penalty enhancements rarely, if ever, are necessary to proportionate sentences. Third, the enhancement applies consistently to offensive physical contact, whereas the various penalty enhancements in current District law apply inconsistently to simple assault,[105] the "assault with intent to" offenses,[106] and the various felony assault offenses,[107] resulting in disproportionate penalties for similar conduct. Codifying enhanced protection for assaulting individuals based on their status as LEOs, public safety employees, or District officials clarifies the law and improves the proportionality of offenses.

Tenth, the revised offensive physical contact statute deletes the limitation on justification and excuse defenses that is in the current D.C. Code assault on a police

[104] For example, the enhancement for District employees in D.C. Code § 22-851(b) states that it applies "while the official or employee is engaged in the performance of his or her duties or on account of the performance of those duties." However, District case law has held, in construing other statutes, that a law enforcement officer may be considered always on duty, Mattis v. United States, 995 A.2d 223, 225 (D.C. 2010). There follows an ambiguity whether any offensive physical contact of a law enforcement officer is subject to heightened liability—regardless whether the offensive physical contact was part of a domestic dispute or the officer was off-duty and not known to the assailant as an officer. The RCC, instead, through a separate reference to law enforcement officers as protected persons, provides heightened penalties where an officer is subjected to offensive physical contact while in the performance of his or her duties.

[105] Only one of the separate penalty enhancements under current District law applies to simple assault—the enhancement for crimes against citizen patrol members. D.C. Code § 22-3602(c). Assaulting or injury a District "official or employee" also receives an enhanced penalty under the protection of District public officials statute. D.C. Code § 22-851(c).

[106] Of the separate penalty enhancements under current District law, only the separate enhancements for crimes against senior citizens and crimes against minors apply to all the AWI offenses. D.C. Code §§ 22-3601(b); 22-3611(c)(2). No AWI offenses are covered in the separate enhancements for crimes against taxicab drives or crimes against transit operators and Metrorail station managers. D.C. Code § 22-3752. The separate enhancement for crimes against citizen patrol members, D.C. Code § 22-3602, only applies to assault with intent to commit "forcible rape," which is an offense that no longer exists after the District's sexual abuse laws were revised in 1995. D.C. Code § 22-4801 (repl.). It is unclear whether assault with intent to commit an offense such as first degree sexual abuse would be covered by the enhancement. The protection of District public officials statute does not specifically mention AWI offenses, but does include "assault[s]" and "injure[s]." D.C. Code § 22-851(c).

[107] All the separate penalty enhancements under current District law apply to aggravated assault and ADW, D.C. Code §§ 22-3601(b); 22-3602(c); 22-3611(b)(2); 22-3752, but they do not consistently apply to other felony assault offenses. For example, only the separate enhancement for crimes against minors applies to assault with significant bodily injury. D.C. Code § 22-3611(c)(2). The separate penalty enhancements also apply inconsistently to malicious disfigurement and mayhem, with the citizen patrol enhancement applying only to mayhem, D.C. Code § 22-3602, and the other penalty enhancements applying to both offenses. D.C. Code §§ 22-3601(b); 22-3611(b)(2); 22-3752. The protection of District public officials statute does not specifically mention any felony assault offenses or mayhem or disfigurement, but does include "assault[s]" and "injure[s]." D.C. Code § 22-851(c).

The separate enhancements are also inconsistent in whether they apply to attempts, conspiracies, or solicitations to commit the specified offenses, or some combination thereof. D.C. Code §§ 22-3601 (senior citizen enhancement applying to attempt or conspiracy); 22-3602 (citizen patrol enhancement applying to conspiracy); 22-3611 (crimes against minors enhancement applying to attempt, conspiracy, or solicitation); 22-3752 (statute enumerating offenses for taxicab drivers, transit operators, and Metrorail station managers applying to attempt and conspiracy).

officer (APO) statute.[108] The current D.C. Code APO statute states "[i]t is neither justifiable nor excusable cause for a person to use force to resist an arrest when such an arrest is made by an individual he or she has reason to believe is a law enforcement officer, whether or not such arrest is lawful."[109] This provision is a categorical bar to self-defense against the use of force that is not excessive by a law enforcement officer (LEO).[110] In contrast, the RCC offensive physical conctact statute deletes this provision and bar to self-defense against a law enforcement officer, and instead relies on the provision in RCC § 22E-403(b)(3). RCC § 22E-403(b)(3) provides an exception to defense of self or others when "The actor is reckless as to the fact that they are protecting themselves or another from lawful conduct." RCC § 22E-403(b)(3) allows an actor who otherwise meets the requirements for self-defense to use force to oppose a law enforcement officer's use of force that either is not lawful or when the actor is not reckless as to the lawfulness. The RCC continues to bar a claim of self-defense whenever an actor is reckless as to the law enforcement officer's conduct being lawful. By eliminating the special bar on self-defense against an unlawful arrest, the RCC effectively reverts to the common law rule regarding defense against a law enforcement officer which existed in the District until Congress passed a new statute with a new policy in 1970.[111] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Beyond these ten changes to current District law, four other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the RCC offensive physical contact statute limits liability to contacts that are intended to be, and objectively are, "offensive." Current District assault statutes are silent as to whether physical contacts that are merely offensive to another person are sufficient for liability.[112] DCCA case law generally establishes that a simple assault includes any completed battery where the accused inflicts an unwanted touching on the complainant,[113] but contains conflicting statements as to whether there is any requirement

---

[108] As is discussed earlier in this commentary, "assault" in current District law includes a broad range of conduct that does not require "bodily injury" like the RCC assault statute does. Thus, the limitation on justification and excuse defenses in the current D.C. Code APO statute would apply to conduct that is criminalized as offensive physical contact in the RCC.

[109] D.C. Code § 22-405(d).

[110] Current D.C. Code § 22-405 and § 22-405.01 provide that it is: "neither justifiable nor excusable cause for a person to use force to resist an arrest when such an arrest is made by an individual he or she has reason to believe is a law enforcement officer, whether or not such arrest is lawful."

[111] As explained by the DCCA in McDonald v. United States, "The legislative history indicates that Congress intended to adopt 'the modern rule' in recognition that it is no longer necessary for a citizen to resist what he suspects may be an illegal arrest since criminal procedural rights (such as prompt presentment, Fed. R. Crim. Proc. 5(b) & (c)) as well as civil remedies under the Civil Rights Act of 1871, 42 U.S.C. § 1983) are readily available. H.R.Rep. No. 907 at 71–72." McDonald v. United States, 496 A.2d 274, 276 (D.C. 1985).

[112] D.C. Code § 22-404(a)(1) ("Whoever unlawfully assaults . . . another . . . shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or be imprisoned not more than 180 days, or both.").

[113] See, e.g., Mahaise v. United States, 722 A.2d 29, 30 (D.C. 1988) ("A battery is any unconsented touching of another person. Since an assault is simply an attempted battery, every completed battery necessarily includes an assault. Appellant's statement that he removed the phone from the complainant's hand and then took her cigarette from her other hand and extinguished it is thus an admission, at least that the battery be objectively "offensive."[114] In addition, under DCCA case law, a simple assault consisting of conduct undertaken with intent to frighten another person has been held to require proof that the defendant's conduct would induce fear in "a person of reasonable sensibility."[115] Following this case law, District practice appears to require that for assault liability, physical contact must be "offensive to a person of reasonable sensibility."[116] Resolving this ambiguity, the RCC offensive physical contact statute clearly establishes that the contact in question must be "offensive" as evaluated from the perspective of a reasonable person in the complainant's position, and that the accused must have at least believed to a practical certainty that the contact was "offensive." This change improves the clarity of the law by specifying the requisite culpable mental state, and improves the proportionality of the statute by excluding conduct that is ordinarily considered non-criminal.[117]

Second, the RCC offensive physical contact statute requires a culpable mental state of "knowingly" as to causing the physical contact and the fact that bodily fluid or excrement is used, and "intent" as to the offensive nature of the contact. The current D.C. Code is silent as to the culpable mental states required for simple assault.[118] Current

United States*, 976 A.2d 217, 218-19, 220, 221 (D.C. 2009) (stating that the injury resulting from an assault "may be extremely slight," requiring "no physical pain, no bruises, no breaking of the skin, no loss of blood, no medical treatment" and finding the evidence sufficient for assault when appellant "shoved" the complainant because the contact was "offensive."). However, a panel of the DCCA recently ruled (in an opinion since vacated pending an en banc ruling) that unwanted touchings do not necessarily constitute "force or violence" necessary for assault liability. Perez Hernandez v. United States, 207 A.3d 594, 604 (D.C.), vacated, 207 A.3d 605 (D.C. 2019).

[114] Compare, e.g., Mahaise v. United States, 722 A.2d 29, 30 (D.C. 1988) ("A battery is any unconsented touching of another person. Since an assault is simply an attempted battery, every completed battery necessarily includes an assault. United States, 575 A.2d 1196, 1198–99 (D.C. 1990) ("What we distill from these cases, particularly Harris, is that an assault conviction will be upheld when the assaultive act is merely offensive, even though it causes or threatens no actual physical harm to the victim.") and Comber v. United States, 584 A.2d 26, 50 (D.C. 1990) ("Although some misdemeanors, at least when viewed in the abstract, prohibit activity which seems inherently dangerous, they may also reach conduct which might not pose such danger. A special difficulty arises in the case of simple assault, as presented here, because that misdemeanor is designed to protect not only against physical injury, but against all forms of offensive touching…."). However, a panel of the DCCA recently ruled (in an opinion since vacated pending an en banc ruling) that unwanted touchings do not necessarily constitute "force or violence" necessary for assault liability. Perez Hernandez v. United States, 207 A.3d 594, 604 (D.C.), vacated, 207 A.3d 605 (D.C. 2019).

[115] Antony v. United States, 361 A.2d 202, 206 (D.C. 1976).

[116] D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 4.100. See also, id., cmt. 4-5 ("The instruction explains that 'injury' includes an offensive touching. [citations omitted] To ensure the jury uses an objective standard of judging "offensive," the Committee borrowed the "reasonable sensibility" standard from Anthony v. U.S., [citation omitted], where it was used in a related context.").

[117] Without requiring that a non-consensual physical contact be "offensive," even the most casual touching of another person—e.g., brushing elbows on a bus or a pat on a colleague's back—could be potentially be subject to criminal liability.

[118] D.C. Code § 22-404(a)(1).

District case law suggests that recklessness may suffice for simple assault.[119] However, the DCCA has recently declined to state that recklessness, versus a higher culpable mental state, is sufficient,[120] and, in the context of intent-to-frighten assault, has suggested that a higher culpable mental state than recklessness is required.[121] Resolving this ambiguity, the RCC offensive physical contact statute clearly establishes that knowledge is required as to causing the physical contact and the fact that bodily fluid or excrement is used, and "intent" as to the offensive quality of the contact. This change improves the clarity of the law by specifying the requisite culpable mental states, and improves the proportionality of the statute by excluding conduct that is ordinarily considered non-criminal.[122]

Third, the revised offensive physical contact statute codifies an effective consent defense, discussed extensively in the explanatory note to the offense. The District's current assault statutes do not address whether consent of the complainant is a defense to liability, nor do District statutes otherwise codify general defenses to criminal conduct. Longstanding case law of the United States Court of Appeals District of Columbia Circuit (D.C. Cir.) in Guarro v. United States has recognized that consent is a defense to assault, at least in the case of a nonviolent sexual touching.[123] A recent DCCA opinion in Woods v. United States, however, held that consent of the complainant is not a defense to assault in a public place that causes significant bodily injury, but explicitly

[119] Simple assault is a lesser included offense of offenses such as ADW, assault with significant bodily injury, and aggravated assault. See Williams v. United States, 106 A.3d 1063, 1065 & n.5 (D.C. 2015) (referring to simple assault as a lesser included offense of ADW); Woods v. United States, 65 A.3d 667, 668 (D.C. 2013) (referring to simple assault as a lesser included offense of assault with significant bodily injury); McCloud v. United States, 781 A.2d 744, 746 (D.C. 2001) (referring to simple assault as a lesser included of aggravated assault). The lesser included offense relationship between simple assault and ADW and simple assault and aggravated assault suggests that recklessness should suffice for simple assault because proof of recklessness or extreme recklessness satisfies these greater offenses. See Vines v. United States, 70 A.3d 1170, 1180 (D.C. 2013), as amended (Sept. 19, 2013) ("[I]t is clear that a conviction for ADW can be sustained by proof of reckless conduct alone."); 22-404.01(a)(2) (aggravated assault statute requiring "under circumstances manifesting extreme indifference to human life, that person intentionally or knowingly engages in conduct which creates a grave risk of serious bodily injury to another person and thereby causes serious bodily injury.").

[120] Recently, the DCCA explicitly declined to decide whether assault requires recklessness or a higher culpable mental state like intent to injure, stating "[e]ven if the greater proof was necessary, the jury could permissibly infer such intent from [appellant's] extremely reckless conduct, which posed a high risk of injury to those around him. Vines v. United States, 70 A.3d 1170, 1181 (D.C. 2013), as amended (Sept. 19, 2013).

[121] Powell v. United States, 238 A.3d 954, 959 (D.C. 2020) ("Our additional concern is whether the evidence proved that appellant had the mens rea required for intent-to-frighten assault: a 'purposeful design ... to engender fear' or 'create apprehension.') (quoting Parks v. United States, 627 A.2d 1, 5 (D.C. 1993); id. at 959 ("For similar reasons, we conclude that the evidence was insufficient for conviction even if we assume arguendo that the mens rea for intent-to-frighten assault can be satisfied by evidence of recklessness.").

[122] A culpable mental state of recklessness as to the physical contact and its offensive nature may, for instance, criminalize a person's efforts to pass through a crowded Metro car in which it is likely the person will brush against other passengers in a way they would find offensive. While such conduct may be rude, it is not ordinarily considered criminal absent some intent to cause offense by such action.

declined to rule on the effect of consent in other circumstances.[124] Another court ruling is pending regarding the elements of assault that may expand upon the requirement of lack of consent.[125] To resolve this ambiguity, the revised offensive physical contact statute effective consent defense clarifies when the actor's reasonable belief that the complainant or a "person with legal authority over the complainant," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701, has given "effective consent" is a defense. The revised statute's effective consent defenses specifically addresses situations where the person giving effective consent is an adult or under 18 years of age. This change improves the clarity of the law and, to the extent it may result in a change, improves the proportionality of the offense by ensuring that consensual and legal activities are not criminalized.

Fourth, the revised offensive physical contact statute codifies an exclusion from liability for conduct that is specifically permitted by a District statute or regulation. The District's current assault statutes do not address whether conduct that is specifically permitted under another District law or regulation can result in criminal liability for assault. The exclusion resolves any apparent conflict within District laws. For example, Title 22, Health, of the current D.C. Municipal Regulations, has regulations that specifically refer to immunity from assault liability that clearly will satisfy this exclusion from liability.[126] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

[126] For example, D.C. Mun. Regs. tit. 22-B, § 602.4 states:

> Any minor who is examined, treated, hospitalized, or receives health services under this chapter may give legal consent, and no person who administers the health services shall be liable civilly or criminally for assault, battery, or assault and battery; or any other civil legal charge, except for negligence or intentional harm in the diagnosis and treatment rendered to the minor and for violations of the D.C. Mental Health Information Act of 1978.

RCC § 22E-1301. Sexual Assault.

Explanatory Note. The RCC sexual assault offense prohibits engaging in a sexual act or sexual contact with a complainant or causing a complainant to engage in or submit to specified acts of sexual penetration or sexual touching by means of physical force, threats, nonconsensual intoxication of the complainant, or when the complainant is physically or mentally impaired. The penalty gradations are based on the nature of the sexual conduct, as well as the means by which the actor engages in the sexual act or sexual contact with the complainant or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to the sexual conduct. The revised sexual assault offense replaces four distinct offenses in the current D.C. Code: first degree sexual abuse,[1] second degree sexual abuse,[2] third degree sexual abuse,[3] and fourth degree sexual abuse.[4] The revised sexual assault offense also replaces in relevant part four distinct provisions for the sexual abuse offenses in the current D.C. Code: the consent defense,[5] the attempt statute,[6] the limitation on prosecutorial immunity,[7] and the aggravating sentencing factors.[8] Insofar as they are applicable to first degree through fourth degree sexual abuse, the revised sexual assault offense also replaces the penalty enhancement for committing an offense "while armed,"[9] the penalty enhancement for committing an offense against minors,[10] the penalty enhancement for committing an offense against senior citizens,[11] certain minimum statutory penalties,[12] and the heightened penalties and aggravating circumstances in D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b-2).

Subsection (a) specifies the various types of prohibited conduct in first degree sexual assault, the highest gradation of the revised sexual assault offense. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies part of the prohibited conduct—engaging in a "sexual act" with the complainant or causing the complainant to engage in or submit to a "sexual act." "Sexual act" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that specifies types of sexual penetration or contact between the mouth and certain body parts. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies a culpable mental state of "knowingly," a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means that the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she will engage in a sexual act with the complainant or cause the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act.

Paragraph (a)(2) and subparagraphs (a)(2)(A), (a)(2)(B), and (a)(2)(C) specify the prohibited means by which the actor must engage in a sexual act with the complainant or cause the complainant to engage in or submit to the sexual act. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" culpable mental state in paragraph (a)(1) applies to paragraph (a)(2) and each type of prohibited conduct in subparagraphs (a)(2)(A), (a)(2)(B), and (a)(2)(C). Per the definition in RCC § 22E-206, "knowingly" here means that the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she engages in a sexual with the complainant in a prohibited manner or that he or she causes the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act in a prohibited manner.

For paragraph (a)(2) and subparagraph (a)(2)(A), the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she engages in a sexual act with the complainant or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act "by causing bodily injury" to the complainant, or "by using physical force that moves or immobilizes" the complainant. "Bodily injury" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 as "physical pain, physical injury, illness, or impairment of physical condition." The bodily injury, movement, or immobilization must cause the sexual act.[13]

Paragraph (a)(2), subparagraph (a)(2)(B), and sub-subparagraphs (a)(2)(B)(i) and (a)(2)(B)(ii) specify the prohibited threats for first degree of the revised sexual assault statute. Subparagraph (a)(2)(B) and sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(B)(i) require that the actor "communicat[e]" to the complainant, explicitly or implicitly, that the actor will cause the complainant to suffer bodily injury, confinement, or death. The verb "communicates" is intended to be broadly construed, encompassing all speech[14] and other messages,[15] which includes gestures or other conduct,[16] that are received and understood by another person.

[13] For example, if, in a consensual adult sexual encounter, the actor tells the sexual partner that the sex may hurt, and the sex does hurt the sexual partner, or cause a tear or bruise, the actor may have caused "bodily injury," as defined in RCC § 22E-701, but the bodily injury did not cause the sexual act and there is no liability for sexual assault. However, consensual sexual activity can transform into non-consensual criminal activity at any time. If, in the course of sexual activity, the actor inflicts bodily injury or moves or immobilizes the complainant without effective consent and thereby causes the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act, there would be liability for sexual assault even though the encounter began as consensual.

[14] The term "speech" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and means oral or written language, symbols, or gestures.

[15] A person may communicate through non-verbal conduct such as displaying a weapon. See State v. Murphy, 545 N.W.2d 909, 915 (Minn. 1996) ("Many physical acts considered in context communicate a terroristic threat. We may find our examples in the case law, such as drawing a finger across one's throat or discharging a firearm over the telephone; in the movies, such as boiling a rabbit on the stove in the tranquil setting of former paramour's new family home, or placing a severed horse's head in a bed; or as here, depositing dead animals at a residence or planting a fake bomb. Life is replete with such examples, and whatever the source, the principle is the same: physical acts communicate a threat that its originator will act according to its tenor." (Internal quotations omitted.)).

[16] For example, if a person consistently beats people who refuse to comply with his demands, this pattern of conduct may constitute a coercive threat when that person makes similar demands of others. In addition ongoing infliction of harm may constitute communication, if it communicates that harm will continue in the future.

"Bodily injury" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 as "physical pain, physical injury, illness, or impairment of physical condition." Given the "knowingly" culpable mental state in paragraph (a)(1), discussed above, the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she causes the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act by communicating, explicitly or implicitly, that the actor will cause the complainant to suffer a bodily injury, confinement, or death.

Paragraph (a)(2), subparagraph (a)(2)(B), and sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(B)(ii) require that the actor communicate to the complainant, explicitly or implicitly, that the actor will cause a third party to suffer bodily injury, a sexual act, a sexual contact, confinement, or death. "Bodily injury," "sexual act," and "sexual contact" are defined terms in RCC § 22E-701. Given the "knowingly" culpable mental state in paragraph (a)(1), discussed above, the actor must be "practically certain" that the actor causes the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act by communicating, explicitly or implicitly, that the actor will cause a third party to suffer a bodily injury, sexual act, sexual contact, confinement, or death. The verb "communicates" is intended to be broadly construed, encompassing all speech[17] and other messages,[18] which includes gestures or other conduct,[19] that are received and understood by another person.

For paragraph (a)(2) and subparagraph (a)(2)(C), the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she engages in a sexual act or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act by administering or causing to be administered to the complainant an intoxicant or other substance without the complainant's "effective consent." "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception." In addition, the actor must administer the intoxicant or other substance "with intent" to impair the complainant's ability to express willingness or unwillingness to engage in the sexual act (sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(C)(i)). "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor was practically certain that administering the intoxicant or other substance would impair the complainant's willingness or unwillingness to engage in the sexual act. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that the drug or intoxicant impaired the complainant's ability to express willingness or unwillingness to engage in the sexual act, only that the defendant believed to a practical certainty that it would. However, sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(C)(ii) does require that the intoxicant or other substance have a specified effect on the complainant. The intoxicant or other substance must, "in fact," render the complainant asleep, unconscious, substantially paralyzed, or passing in and out of consciousness (sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(C)(ii)(I)), "substantially incapable of appraising the nature of the sexual act" (sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(C)(ii)(II)), or "substantially incapable of communicating willingness or unwillingness" to engage in the sexual act (sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(C)(ii)(III)). "In fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element, here the required effect of the intoxicant or other substance on the complainant.

Subsection (b) specifies the various types of prohibited conduct in second degree sexual assault. Like first degree sexual assault, second degree sexual assault requires the actor to "knowingly" engage in a "sexual act" with the complainant or cause the complainant to engage in or submit to a "sexual act," but the prohibited means of doing so differ. Paragraph (b)(1) specifies a culpable mental state of "knowingly," a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means that the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she engages in a sexual act or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" culpable mental state in paragraph (b)(1) applies to each of the prohibited means of engaging in a sexual act with the complainant or causing the complainant to engage or submit to the "sexual act" in paragraph (b)(2), subparagraph (b)(2)(A), subparagraph (b)(2)(B), and sub-subparagraphs (b)(2)(B)(i), (b)(2)(B)(ii), and (b)(2)(B)(iii). Per the definition in RCC § 22E-206, "knowingly" here means that the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she engages in a sexual act or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act in the prohibited manner. For paragraph (b)(2) and subparagraph (b)(2)(A), the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she engages in a sexual act with the complainant or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to the sexual act by making an explicit or implicit "coercive threat." "Coercive threat" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that prohibits "communicat[ing]" specified harms such as accusing someone of a criminal offense, as well as sufficiently serious harms that would cause a reasonable person to comply. The verb "communicates" is intended to be broadly construed, encompassing all speech[20] and other messages,[21] which includes gestures or other conduct,[22] that are received and understood by another person.

(Internal quotations omitted.)).

[22] For example, if a person consistently beats people who refuse to comply with his demands, this pattern of conduct may constitute a coercive threat when that person makes similar demands of others. In addition ongoing infliction of harm may constitute communication, if it communicates that harm will continue in the future.

Under paragraph (b)(2), subparagraph (b)(2)(B), and sub-subparagraph (b)(2)(B)(i), the actor must be "practically certain" that the complainant is asleep, unconscious, or passing in and out of consciousness. Under paragraph (b)(2), subparagraph (b)(2)(B), and sub-subparagraph (b)(2)(B)(ii), the actor must be "practically certain" that the complainant is "incapable of appraising the nature of the sexual act" or of understanding the right to give or withhold consent to the sexual act. In addition, the actor must be "practically certain" that the complainant's inability is either due to a drug, intoxicant, or other substance, or, due to an intellectual, developmental, or mental disability or mental illness when the actor has no similarly serious disability or illness.

Under paragraph (b)(2), subparagraph (b)(2)(B), and sub-subparagraph (b)(2)(B)(iii), the actor must be "practically certain" that the complainant is incapable of communicating[23] willingness or unwillingness to engage in the sexual act. Sub-subparagraph (b)(2)(B)(iii) includes paralyzed individuals who are able to appraise the nature of the sexual act or of understanding the right to give or withhold consent to the sexual act under sub-subparagraph (b)(2)(B)(ii), but are unable to communicate willingness or unwillingness. Under paragraph (b)(2), subparagraph (b)(2)(B), and sub-subparagraph (b)(2)(B)(iv), the actor must be "practically certain" that the complainant is "substantially paralyzed." Sub-subparagraph (b)(2)(B)(iv) includes paralyzed individuals who are able to appraise the nature of the sexual act or of understanding the right to give or withhold consent to the sexual act under sub-subparagraph (b)(2)(B)(ii) and are able to communicate willingness or unwillingness under sub-subparagraph (b)(2)(B)(iii), but are otherwise paralyzed.

Subsection (c) specifies the various types of prohibited conduct in third degree sexual assault. Paragraph (c)(1) specifies part of the prohibited conduct—engaging in a "sexual contact" with the complainant or causing the complainant to engage in or submit to a "sexual contact." "Sexual contact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means touching specified body parts, such as genitalia, of any person with the desire to sexually abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, arouse, or gratify any person. Paragraph (c)(1) specifies a culpable mental state of "knowingly," a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means that the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she engages in a sexual contact with the complainant or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to sexual contact. Paragraph (c)(2) and subparagraphs (c)(2)(A), (c)(2)(B), and (c)(2)(C) specify the prohibited the means by which the actor must engage in a sexual contact with the complainant or cause the complainant to engage in or submit to the sexual contact. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" culpable mental state in paragraph (c)(1) applies to each type of prohibited conduct in paragraph (c)(2) and subparagraphs (c)(2)(A), (c)(2)(B), and (c)(2)(C). Per the definition in RCC § 22E-206, "knowingly" here means that the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she engages in a sexual contact with the complainant or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to sexual contact in a prohibited manner. The prohibited means are the same as they are for first degree sexual assault.

Subsection (d) specifies the various types of prohibited conduct in fourth degree sexual assault. Like third degree sexual assault, fourth degree sexual assault requires the actor to "knowingly" engage in a "sexual contact" with the complainant or cause the complainant to engage in or submit to "sexual contact," but the prohibited means of doing so differ. Paragraph (d)(1) specifies a culpable mental state of "knowingly," a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means that the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she engages in a sexual contact with the complainant or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual contact. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" culpable mental state in paragraph (d)(1) applies to each of the prohibited means of engaging in a sexual contact with the complainant or causing the complainant to engage or submit to the sexual contact in paragraph (d)(2), subparagraph (d)(2)(A), subparagraph (d)(2)(B), and sub-subparagraphs (d)(2)(B)(i), (d)(2)(B)(ii), and (d)(2)(B)(iii). Per the definition in RCC § 22E-206, "knowingly" here means that the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she engages in a sexual contact or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to sexual contact in the prohibited manner. The prohibited means are the same as they are for second degree sexual assault.

Subsection (e) codifies a defense to the revised sexual assault offense. The general provision in RCC § 22E-201 establishes the burdens of proof and production for all defenses in the RCC. Under RCC § 22E-201, if there is any evidence of the defense at trial, the government must prove the absence of all elements of the defense beyond a reasonable doubt.

The defense applies to subparagraphs (a)(2)(A), (a)(2)(B), (b)(2)(A), (b)(2)(B), (c)(2)(A), (c)(2)(B), (d)(2)(A), and (d)(2)(B) of the offense—all prohibited conduct in the revised sexual assault statute except involuntary intoxication in first degree and third degree (subparagraphs (a)(2)(C) and (c)(2)(C)), which require the lack of effective consent as an element. The defense in subsection (e) requires that the actor reasonably believes[24] that the complainant gives "effective consent," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701, to the actor to engage in the conduct constituting the offense. Subsection (e) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, "in fact" applies to every element of the defense in subsection (e), and no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to the defense. For example, it is not necessary to prove that the actor desired or was practically certain that the actor had the effective consent of the complainant. However, the actor must subjectively believe, and that belief must be reasonable, that the actor has the required effective consent. Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[25] There is no effective consent defense

[24] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist.

[25] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care when the actor makes an unreasonable mistake as to the effective consent of the complainant.

While the defense extends to incapacitated and intoxicated complainants in second degree and fourth degree sexual assault (subparagraphs (b(2)(B) and (d)(2)(B)), in practice such complainants will generally not be able to give "effective consent," as defined in RCC § 22E-701, and the defense will usually not apply.[26] The RCC definition of "effective consent" requires "consent," defined in RCC § 22E-701, which precludes consent given by a person who is legally unable or, because of youth, mental disability, or intoxication, is unable to make a reasonable judgment as to the nature or harmfulness of the conduct constituting the offense or to the result thereof. Whether the actor reasonably believes that person, particularly a young person, is able to consent to conduct that otherwise satisfies the RCC sexual assault statute is a fact-specific inquiry. In addition, even if the sexual assault effective consent defense does apply, there may still be liability under another RCC sex offense, such as sexual abuse of a minor (RCC § 22E-1302).[27]

In addition, even if the effective consent defense precludes liability for sexual assault, an actor may have liability under an RCC offense against persons or an RCC weapons offense if the actor's conduct goes beyond the complainant's effective consent or if the resulting harm is one that cannot be consented to in the RCC. For example, if the complainant gives effective consent to being slapped during sex, but in doing so the actor causes the complainant serious bodily injury, there would be no liability for sexual assault, but there may be liability under the RCC assault statute (RCC § 22E-1202), depending on the actor's culpable mental state. Similarly, if the complainant gives effective consent to the actor choking the complainant during sex and in doing so the actor causes death, there would be no liability for sexual assault, but there may be liability for an RCC homicide offense, depending on the actor's culpable mental state.

Subsection (f) specifies relevant penalties for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subparagraph (f)(5) codifies several penalty enhancements for the revised sexual assault offense and specifies that if one or more of the penalty enhancements applies, the penalty classification for the offense is increased by one class. Subparagraph (f)(5)(A) that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

[26] However, in some situations under subparagraphs (b)(2)(B) and (d)(2)(B), the defense will apply, and there is no liability for sexual assault. For example, if the actor reasonably believes that the complainant gives the actor effective consent to engage in a sexual contact at a later time, after the complainant takes an intoxicant or when the complainant is asleep, the effective consent eliminates liability for sexual assault.

[27] For example, consider a situation where during sexual intercourse a 20 year old actor reasonably believes that a 15 year old complainant gives valid effective consent to the actor to slap the complainant. The effective consent defense applies to first degree sexual assault, and there would be no liability for first degree sexual assault. However, the actor still would be guilty of second degree of the RCC sexual abuse of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1302), unless the reasonable mistake of age affirmative defense to the RCC sexual abuse of a minor offense applied.

codifies a penalty enhancement for recklessly causing the sexual act or sexual contact by displaying or using what, in fact, is a "dangerous weapon" or "imitation dangerous weapon." "Displaying or using" a weapon "should be broadly construed to include making a weapon known by sight, sound, or touch. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the culpable mental state of recklessly applies to both causing the sexual act or sexual contact and causing the sexual act or sexual contact by displaying or using an object. "Recklessly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means that the actor is aware of a substantial risk that he or she caused the sexual conduct by displaying or using an object. "In fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to whether the object is a "dangerous weapon" or "imitation dangerous weapon" as those terms are defined in RCC § 22E-701.

Subparagraph (f)(5)(B) codifies a penalty enhancement if the actor "knowingly" acted with one or more accomplices that were physically present at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact. "Knowingly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she acted with one or more accomplices that were physically present at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact.

Subparagraph (f)(5)(C) codifies a penalty enhancement if the actor "recklessly" caused "serious bodily injury" to the complainant immediately before, during, or immediately after the sexual act or sexual contact. "Recklessly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means that the actor is aware of a substantial risk that he or she caused "serious bodily injury" to the complainant immediately before, during, or immediately after the sexual act or sexual contact "Serious bodily injury" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means injury involving a substantial risk of death, or protracted and obvious disfigurement, or protracted loss or impairment of the function of a bodily member or organ, or protracted unconsciousness.

Subparagraph (f)(5)(D) and sub-subparagraphs (f)(5)(D)(i), (f)(5)(D)(ii), (f)(5)(D)(iii), (f)(5)(D)(iv), and (f)(5)(D)(v) codify penalty enhancements based on the age of the complainant or whether the complainant is a "vulnerable adult." These penalty enhancements use the phrase "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state for a given element, and the culpable mental state of "reckless." "Reckless" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that means the actor was aware of a substantial risk of a given element.

For the penalty enhancement in sub-subparagraph (f)(5)(D)(i), the complainant must be under the age of 12 years and the actor must be at least four years older the complainant. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "in fact" specified in sub-subparagraph (f)(5)(D)(i) applies to every element in that sub-subparagraph and there is no culpable mental state requirement for either the age of the complainant or the required age gap. For the penalty enhancement in sub-subparagraphs (f)(5)(D)(ii), the actor must be "reckless" as to the fact that the complainant is under 16 years of age and, "in fact," the actor must be at least four years older than the complainant. The actor must be aware of a substantial risk that the complainant was under the age of 16 years, but there is no mental state requirement for the required age gap. For the penalty enhancement in sub-subparagraphs (f)(5)(D)(iii), the actor must be "reckless" as to the fact that the complainant is under 18 years of age and the fact that the actor is in a "position of trust with or authority over" the complainant, and, "in fact," the actor must be at least four years older than the complainant. "Position of trust with or authority over" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that includes individuals such as parents, siblings, school employees, and coaches. The actor must be aware of a substantial risk that the complainant is under the age of 18 years and that the actor is in a "position of trust with or authority over" the complainant, but there is no mental state requirement for the required age gap. For the penalty enhancement in sub-subparagraph (f)(5)(D)(iv), the actor must be "reckless" as to the fact that the complainant is 65 years of age or older and, "in fact," the actor must be under the age of 65 years and at least ten years younger than the complainant. The actor must be aware of a substantial risk that the complainant was 65 years of age or older, but there is no culpable mental state requirement for the required age of the complainant or the age gap. Finally, the penalty enhancement in sub-subparagraph (f)(5)(D)(v) requires that the actor be "reckless" as to the fact that the complainant was a "vulnerable adult." The actor must be aware of a substantial risk that the complainant was a "vulnerable adult" as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701.

Subsection (g) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised sexual assault statute clearly changes current District law in fourteen main ways.

First, first degree and third degree of the revised sexual assault statute prohibit threats of "bodily injury," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701. The current D.C. Code first degree[28] and third degree[29] sexual abuse statutes prohibit threats of "bodily injury," currently defined for the sexual abuse statutes as an "injury involving loss or impairment of the function of a bodily member, organ, or mental faculty, or physical disfigurement, disease, sickness, or injury involving significant pain."[30] There is no DCCA case law interpreting the definition of "bodily injury" for the current D.C. Code sexual abuse statutes. In contrast, first degree and third degree of the revised sexual assault statute prohibit threats of "bodily injury," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701—"physical pain, physical injury, illness, or impairment of physical condition." The RCC definition of "bodily injury" leads to two changes to the scope of prohibited threats in first degree and third degree of the RCC sexual assault as compared to current D.C. Code first degree and third degree sexual abuse.[31] First, first degree and third degree of [28] D.C. Code § 22-3002(a)(2) ("(a) A person shall be imprisoned for any term of years or for life, and in addition, may be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, if that person engages in or causes another person to engage in or submit to a sexual act in the following manner: . . . (2) By threatening or placing that other person in reasonable fear that any person will be subjected to death, bodily injury, or kidnapping.").

[29] D.C. Code § 22-3004(2) ("A person shall be imprisoned for not more than 10 years and may be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, if that person engages in or causes sexual contact with or by another person in the following manner: . . . (2) By threatening or placing that other person in reasonable fear that any person will be subjected to death, bodily injury, or kidnapping.").

[30] D.C. Code § 22-3001(2).

[31] The RCC definition of "bodily injury" makes two additional changes to the current D.C. Code definition of "bodily injury." First, the RCC definition of "bodily injury" requires either "physical injury" or "impairment of physical condition." The current D.C. Code definition of "bodily injury" includes "loss or impairment of the function of a bodily member [or] organ" or "physical disfigurement." It is unclear what level of physical harm is required and there is no DCCA case law on this issue. However, the current D.C. Code sexual abuse statutes define "serious bodily injury" as "bodily injury that involves . . . protracted and the revised sexual assault statute no longer include threats of impairment of a "mental faculty," unless the threatened harms otherwise satisfy the RCC definition of "bodily injury." It is unclear whether "mental faculty" in the current D.C. Code definition of "bodily injury" refers to the physical condition of the brain or more generally to psychological distress. Second, first degree and third degree of the revised sexual assault statute include threats of any physical pain, as opposed to threats of "an injury involving significant pain," as required by the current D.C. Code definition of "bodily injury." It is difficult, if not impossible, to assess whether a threat is a threat of "significant physical pain," as opposed to a threat of any physical pain. In the RCC sex assault offense, a threat of "bodily injury" that involves any physical pain must still satisfy the causation requirement and the "knowingly" culpable mental state—i.e. the threat must cause the complainant to engage in the sexual act and the actor must be "practically certain" of this fact. This change improves the clarity, completeness, and consistency of the revised statutes.

Second, as applied to first degree and third degree of the revised sexual assault statute, the general culpability principles for self-induced intoxication in RCC § 22E-209 allow an actor to claim that he or she did not act "knowingly" or "with intent" due to his or her self-induced intoxication. The current D.C. Code first degree and third degree sexual abuse statutes do not specify any culpable mental states. DCCA case law has determined that first degree sexual abuse is a "general intent" crime for purposes of an intoxication defense,[32] and similar logic would appear to apply to third degree sexual abuse. This case law precludes an actor from receiving a jury instruction on whether intoxication prevented the actor from forming the necessary culpable mental state requirement for the crime.[33] This DCCA case law would also likely mean that an actor would be precluded from directly raising—though not necessarily presenting evidence in support of[34]—the claim that, due to his or her self-induced intoxicated state, the actor did not possess any knowledge or intent required for any element of first degree or third obvious disfigurement, or protracted loss or impairment of the function of a bodily member, organ, or mental faculty," D.C. Code § 22-3001(7), which suggests that "bodily injury" is limited to comparatively less serious harms. It is unclear if this revision changes the scope of threats of "bodily injury" in first degree and third degree of the RCC sexual assault statute as compared to first degree and third degree of the current D.C. Code sexual abuse statutes.

Second, the current D.C. Code sexual offense definition of "bodily injury" includes "disease" or "sickness," which the RCC definition simplifies by referring to "illness." This is a clarificatory change that does not change the scope of threats of "bodily injury" in the RCC sexual assault statute as compared to first degree and third degree of the current D.C. Code sexual abuse statutes.

[32] Kyle v. United States, 759 A.2d 192, 199 (D.CD. 2000) ("Voluntary intoxication, however, is not a defense to a general intent crime such as first degree sexual abuse.").

[33] See D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 9.404 ("If evidence of intoxication gives you a reasonable doubt about whether [name of defendant] could or did form the intent to [^] , then you must find him/her not guilty of the offense of [^] . On the other hand, if the government has proved beyond a reasonable doubt that [name of defendant] could and did form the intent to [^], along with every other element of the offense, then you must find him/her guilty of the offense of [^] .").

degree sexual abuse.[35] In contrast, under the revised sexual assault statute, an actor would both have a basis for, and would be able to raise and present relevant and admissible evidence in support of, a claim that voluntary intoxication prevented the actor from forming the knowledge or intent required to prove the offense. Likewise, where appropriate, the actor would be entitled to an instruction which clarifies that a not guilty verdict is necessary if the actor's intoxicated state precludes the government from meeting its burden of proof with respect to the culpable mental state of knowledge or intent at issue the revised sexual assault statute.[36] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the offense.

Third, second degree and fourth degree of the RCC sexual assault statute specify as a discrete basis of liability that the complainant's incapacitation is due to "an intellectual, developmental, or mental disability or mental illness," which excludes age as the sole cause of a complainant's inability. The current D.C. Code second degree and fourth degree sexual abuse statutes include complainants that are "incapable of appraising the nature of" the sexual conduct.[37] The language is not statutorily defined, but the DCCA has held that the current fourth degree sexual abuse statute categorically merges into the current second degree child sexual abuse statute,[38] in part because "once the government proves in a sexual assault case that the defendant was four or more years older than the [complainant under the age of 16 years], there is a conclusive presumption that the defendant knew or should have known that the [complainant under the age of 16 years] was incapable of appraising the nature of the sexual conduct."[39] However, such a conclusive presumption categorically convicts defendants of sexual assault that are themselves under the age of 16 years even if they, due to their young age, are also incapable of appraising the nature of the sexual activity. This is inconsistent with the protected status of persons under the age of 16 years in the current D.C. Code sexual abuse statutes. In contrast, in the RCC, a defendant cannot be found guilty of second degree or fourth degree sexual assault based solely on the complainant's age[40] and there is no longer a conclusive presumption that a complainant under the age of 16 years is [35] This is so, moreover, notwithstanding the fact that the defendant, due to his or her self-induced intoxicated state, may not have actually possessed the knowledge required for any element of offensive physical context.

[36] These results are a product of the logical relevance principle set forth in RCC § 22E-209(a) and the fact that knowledge and intent is a mental state susceptible to negation by self-induced intoxication. See RCC § 22E-209(b).

[37] D.C. Code §§ 22-3003(2)(A); 22-3005(2)(A).

Therefore, appellant's fourth-degree sexual abuse adjudications merge into his second-degree child sexual abuse adjudications.").

[39] In re M.S., 171 A.3d 155, 165-166 (D.C. 2017).

[40] A complainant's young age may be relevant in assessing whether the complainant has an intellectual, developmental, or mental disability or mental illness that makes the complainant incapable of appraising the nature of the sexual act or sexual contact or of understanding the right to give or withhold consent to the sexual act or sexual contact. In addition, although this commentary focuses on the young age of a complainant, the age of an older complainant may not be the sole basis of determining whether that complainant is incapable of appraising the nature of the sexual conduct or of understanding the right to give or withhold consent to the sexual conduct. It may, however, be relevant in determining whether an older complainant has an intellectual, developmental, or mental disability or mental illness and otherwise meets the requirements of this provision.

incapable of appraising the nature of the sexual activity when the defendant is at least four years older.[41] Age remains the basis of liability for the RCC sexual abuse of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1302), which would entirely overlap with the second and fourth degree sexual assault statutes without this change, and age may form the basis of liability for the RCC nonconsensual sexual conduct statute (RCC § 22E-1307). This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised sexual assault and sexual abuse of a minor statutes, and reduces unnecessary overlap.

Fourth, the revised sexual assault statute specifies one set of offense-specific penalty enhancements that is capped at a penalty increase of one class. Some or all of the current D.C. Code sex offenses[42] are subject to general penalty enhancements based on the age of the complainant,[43] a general "while armed" penalty enhancement in D.C. Code § 22-4502,[44] as well as the enhancements in the current sex offense aggravators in D.C.

[41] However, a defendant of any age that engages in sexual activity with a complainant under the age of 18 years may still have liability under other provisions of the RCC sexual assault statute.

[42] The relevant sex offense statutes addressed in RCC Chapter 13 are: First degree through fourth degree sexual abuse (D.C. Code §§ 22-3002 through 22-3005), misdemeanor sexual abuse (D.C. Code § 22-3006), child sexual abuse (D.C. Code §§ 22-3008 and 22-3009), sexual abuse of a minor (D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.01 and 22-3009.02), sexual abuse of a secondary education student (D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.03 and 22-3009.04), misdemeanor sexual abuse of a child or minor (D.C. Code § 22-3010.01), sexual abuse of a ward (D.C. Code §§ 22-3013 and 22-3014), sexual abuse of a patient or client (D.C. Code §§ 22-3015 and 22-3016), enticing a minor (D.C. Code § 22-3010), and arranging for sexual contact with a real or fictitious child (D.C. Code § 22-3010.01).

[43] Current District law has a general penalty enhancement for committing specified crimes against complainants under the age of 18 years and a general penalty enhancement for committing specified crimes against complainants that are 65 years of age or older. The penalty enhancement for crimes committed against complainants under the age of 18 years applies to child sexual abuse and first degree, second degree, or third degree sexual abuse, and authorizes a possible term of imprisonment of 1 ½ times the maximum term of imprisonment otherwise authorized. D.C. Code §§ 22-3611(a), (c). The penalty enhancement for crimes committed against complainants that are 65 years of age or older authorizes a possible term of imprisonment of 1 ½ times the maximum term of imprisonment otherwise authorized and applies to first degree, second degree, and third degree sexual abuse. D.C. Code § 22-3601(a), (c).

[44] The current "while armed" enhancement prohibits committing, attempting, soliciting, or conspiring to commit specified offenses, including child sexual abuse and first degree, second degree, and third degree sexual abuse, "while armed" with or "having readily available" any "pistol, or other firearm (or imitation thereof) or other dangerous or deadly weapon." For a first offense of committing specified crimes of violence "while armed with or having readily available" a dangerous weapon, the defendant "may" receive a maximum term of imprisonment of up to 30 years. D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(1). If the defendant committed the offense "while armed with any pistol or firearm," however, he or she "shall" receive a five year "mandatory-minimum" term of imprisonment of not less than 5 years. D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(1). If the current conviction is for committing a specified crime of violence "while armed with or having readily available" a dangerous weapon and the defendant has at least one prior conviction for an armed crime of violence, the defendant "shall" be sentenced to "not less than 5 years" imprisonment and not more than 30 years. D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(2). If the current conviction is for committing a specified crime of violence "while armed with any pistol or firearm" and the defendant has the required prior conviction for an armed crime of violence, the defendant "shall" be "imprisoned for a mandatory-minimum term of not less than 10 years." D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(2). First degree murder, second degree murder, first degree sexual abuse, and first degree child sexual abuse "shall" receive the same minimum and mandatory minimum sentences as other crimes of violence committed "while armed with or having readily available" a dangerous weapon, except that the maximum term of imprisonment "shall" be life without parole as authorized elsewhere in the current District code. D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(3).

Code § 22-3020.[45] The D.C. Code is silent as to whether or how these different penalty enhancements can be stacked, although case law suggests stacking at least some penalty enhancements is permitted.[46] In contrast, the revised sexual assault statute specifies a single set of enhancements, including age-based and weapon enhancements, that is capped at a penalty increase of one class.[47] Because the revised statute incorporates multiple enhancements in the offense, the statute clarifies that it is not possible to enhance a sexual assault with, for example, both a weapon enhancement and an enhancement based on the identity of the complainant, or to double-stack different weapon penalties[48] and offenses. In addition, the scope of the revised weapons aggravator is slightly narrower than the current "while armed" enhancement as it pertains to mere possession[49] and excludes objects the complainant incorrectly perceives as being a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon.[50] Consolidating the multiple penalty enhancements improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised sexual assault offense.

[45] The current sexual abuse aggravators apply to all the sex offenses. D.C. Code § 22-3020(a) ("Any person who is found guilty of an offense under this subchapter may receive a penalty up to 1 1/2 times the maximum penalty prescribed for the particular offense, and may receive a sentence of more than 30 years up to, and including life imprisonment without possibility of release for first degree sexual abuse or first degree child sexual abuse, if any of the following aggravating circumstances exists: (1) The victim was under the age of 12 years at the time of the offense; (2) The victim was under the age of 18 years at the time of the offense and the actor had a significant relationship to the victim; (3) The victim sustained serious bodily injury as a result of the offense; (4) The defendant was aided or abetted by 1 or more accomplices; (5) The defendant is or has been found guilty of committing sex offenses against 2 or more victims, whether in the same or other proceedings by a court of the District of Columbia, any state, or the United States or its territories; or (6) The defendant was armed with, or had readily available, a pistol or other firearm (or imitation thereof) or other dangerous or deadly weapon.").

[46] For example, the facts as discussed in several DCCA cases on offenses against persons other than sexual abuse indicate that such stacking does occur with the weapon enhancement and senior citizen enhancement. See, e.g., McClain v. United States, 871 A.2d 1185 (D.C. 2005) (determining "whether the trial court committed plain error when it instructed the jury regarding to lesser-included offenses of the crime of armed robbery of a senior citizen," charged under the enhancements in now D.C. Code §§ 22-4502 and 22-3601).

[47] Note, however, that subtitle I of the RCC specifies certain penalty enhancements (e.g., hate crime) that may apply in addition to the penalty enhancements specified in the revised sexual assault offense.

[48] In addition to the "while armed" enhancement in D.C. Code § 22-4502(a) applicable to child sexual abuse and first degree, second degree, and third degree sexual abuse, the current sex offense aggravators include an aggravator if "the defendant was armed with, or had readily available, a pistol or other firearm (or imitation thereof) or other dangerous or deadly weapon." D.C. D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(6).

[49] The current "while armed" enhancement applies if the actor merely has "readily available" a dangerous weapon. D.C. Code § 22-4502(a). Having a dangerous weapon "readily available" is insufficient for the revised weapon aggravator in the sexual assault statute. However, possessing a dangerous weapon or a firearm during sexual assault, without using or displaying it, may have liability under the revised possession of a dangerous weapon during a crime of violence statute (RCC § 22E-4104) or other RCC weapons offenses.

[50] The current "while armed" enhancement in D.C. Code § 22-4502 includes the use of objects that the complaining witness incorrectly perceives to be a dangerous or deadly weapon. See, e.g., Paris v. United States, 515 A.2d 199, 204 (D.C. 1986) ("In this jurisdiction, any object which the victim perceives to have the apparent ability to produce great bodily harm can be considered a dangerous weapon."). The definitions of "dangerous weapon" and "imitation dangerous weapon" in RCC § 22E-701 exclude these objects.

Fifth, the revised sexual assault penalty enhancements require at least a four year age gap between the actor and the complainant when the complainant is under the age of 12 years, and, by the use of the phrase "in fact," require strict liability for the age gap. The current D.C. Code sex offense aggravators include an aggravator for when the "victim was under the age of 12 at the time of the offense."[51] The aggravator does not require an age gap between the complainant and the actor, unlike the current child sexual abuse statutes, which require at least a four year age gap between the actor and a person under the age of 16.[52] In contrast, the revised penalty enhancement requires at least a four year age gap between the actor and a complainant under the age of 12 years. A four year age gap ensures that the enhancement is reserved for predatory behavior targeting very young complainants. An actor with less than a four year age gap that commits a sexual assault against a complainant under the age of 12 years continues to face criminal liability, but the penalty would not be enhanced. The revised enhancement also uses the phrase "in fact" to require strict liability for the age gap, which is consistent with strict liability for the age gap in the other revised age-based penalty enhancements and the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1302). These changes improve the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised sex assault offense.

Sixth, the revised sexual assault statute codifies a penalty enhancement for the actor recklessly disregarding the fact that the complainant was under the age of 16 years when the actor, in fact, was at least four years older. The current D.C. Code sex offense aggravators include a penalty aggravator for when "the victim was under the age of 12 years"[53] and when "the victim was under the age of 18 years at the time of the offense and the actor had a significant relationship to the victim."[54] There is no aggravator for a complainant under the age of 16 years. However, the current D.C. Code first degree and second degree sexual abuse of a child statutes punish sexual acts and sexual contacts when the complainant was under the age of 16 years and the actor was at least four years older.[55] In contrast, the revised sexual assault statute codifies a penalty enhancement for an actor recklessly disregarding the fact that the complainant is under the age of 16 years when the actor is at least four years older than the complainant. A four year age gap ensures that the enhancement is reserved for predatory behavior targeting young complainants. An actor with less than a four year age gap that commits sexual assault against a complainant under the age of 16 years continues to face criminal liability, but the penalty would not be enhanced. The "recklessly" culpable mental state for the complainant's age is consistent with this element in the other revised age-based penalty enhancements. Using "in fact" to require strict liability for the age gap is consistent with the age gap in the other revised age-based penalty enhancements and the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1302). These changes improve the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised sex assault offense.

Seventh, the revised sexual assault penalty enhancements require at least a four year age gap between the actor and a complainant under the age of 18 years when the actor is in a position of trust with our authority over the complainant, and, by use of the phrase "in fact," require strict liability for the age gap. The current D.C. Code sex offense aggravators include an aggravator for when the "victim was under the age of 18 years at the time of the offense and the actor had a significant relationship to the victim."[56] The current aggravator does not specify any culpable mental states and there is no DCCA case law on this issue. In contrast, the revised penalty enhancement requires at least a four year age gap between the actor and the complainant and, by use of the phrase "in fact," specifies that there is no culpable mental state for this element. A four year age gap ensures that the revised enhancement is reserved for predatory behavior targeting complainants under the age of 18 years. Strict liability for the age gap is consistent with the age gap in the other age-based penalty enhancements and the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1302). This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised sexual assault offense.

Eighth, the current D.C. Code penalty enhancement for crimes committed against minors no longer applies to the revised sexual assault statute. Current D.C. Code § 22-3611 codifies a general penalty enhancement for specified crimes, including first degree, second degree, and third degree sexual abuse, when the actor is 18 years of age or older, the complainant is under 18 years of age, and the actor is at least two years older than the complainant.[57] In contrast, the revised sexual assault statute limits the age-based penalty enhancements when the complainant is a minor to situations that mirror the requirements for liability in the RCC sexual abuse of minor statute (RCC § 22E-1302): 1) the complainant is under the age of 12 years and the actor is at least four year older; 2) the complainant is under the age of 16 years and the actor is at least four years older; and 3) the complainant is under the age of 18 years and the actor is at least four years older, and in a position of trust with or authority over the complainant. This change improves the consistency of the RCC sexual assault and sexual abuse of a minor statutes and improves the proportionality of the penalties.

Ninth, the revised sexual assault statute codifies a penalty enhancement for the actor recklessly disregarding the fact that the complainant is 65 years of age or older when the actor is, in fact, under the age of 65 years and at least 10 years younger than the complainant. Current D.C. Code § 22-3601 provides a general penalty enhancement for any actor, regardless of age, committing specified crimes against complainants 65 years of age or older, including first degree, second degree, or third degree sexual abuse.[58] The penalty enhancement does not specify any culpable mental states, but there is an affirmative defense if the actor "knew or reasonably believed the victim was not 65 years old or older at the time of the offense, or could not have known or determined the age of the victim because of the manner in which the offense was committed."[59] There is no DCCA case law on this issue. In contrast, the revised sexual assault statute codifies a penalty enhancement for an actor that was reckless as to the fact that the complainant was 65 years of age or older when the actor, in fact, is under the age of 65 years and at least 10 years younger than the complainant. The revised penalty enhancement applies to all gradations of the revised sexual assault statute, including fourth degree sexual assault. The "reckless" culpable mental state preserves the substance of the current affirmative defense for the senior citizen enhancement[60] and is consistent with the culpable mental states in several of the other revised age-based penalty enhancements. Requiring at least a ten year age gap between the actor and the complainant reserves the enhancement for predatory behavior targeting the elderly, rather than violence between elderly persons. Strict liability for the age of the actor is consistent with several of the other age-based penalty enhancements and the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1302). The revised penalty enhancement improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense.

Tenth, the revised sexual assault statute codifies a penalty enhancement for the actor recklessly disregarding the fact that the complainant is a "vulnerable adult." The current D.C. Code sexual abuse statutes do not have specific offenses or enhanced penalties for complainants that are "vulnerable adult[s]," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701, although some current District statutes prohibit the abuse[61] or neglect[62] of a "vulnerable adult" without specifically addressing sexual violence against these complainants. In contrast, the revised sexual assault statutes codify a penalty enhancement for an actor recklessly disregarding the fact that the complainant was a vulnerable adult, as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701. The "recklessly" culpable mental state matches the culpable mental state required for several of the other sexual assault penalty enhancements. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute.

Eleventh, the revised sexual assault penalty enhancement for weapons requires that the actor "recklessly" caused the sexual act or sexual contact by "displaying" or "using" an object that, in fact, is a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon. The current weapons aggravator for the current sex offense statutes requires that the "defendant was armed with, or had readily available, a pistol or other firearm (or imitation thereof) or other dangerous or deadly weapon."[63] No culpable mental state is specified, and there is no DCCA case law interpreting the current weapons aggravator.[64]

[60] In the RCC, an actor that knew or reasonably believed that the complainant was not 65 years or older or an actor that could not have known or determined the age of the complainant, as is required in the current affirmative defense, would not satisfy the culpable mental state of recklessness as to the age of the complaining witness. The accused would not consciously disregard a substantial that the complainant was 65 years of age or older. See RCC § 22E-208(b)(3) and accompanying commentary, providing that a reasonable mistake as to a circumstance element negates the existence of recklessness as to that element.

[64] However, there is DCCA case law interpreting the repealed armed rape offense that may inform how the DCCA would interpret the current armed aggravator. The previous armed rape offense required that the defendant commit rape "when armed with or [when] having readily available any . . . dangerous or deadly

In addition to the sex offense weapons aggravator, current D.C. Code § 22-4502 provides severe, additional penalties for committing, attempting, soliciting, or conspiring to commit first degree, second degree, and third degree sexual abuse[65] "while armed" or "having readily available" a dangerous weapon.[66] In contrast, the revised sexual assault penalty enhancement requires that the actor "recklessly" caused the sexual act or sexual contact "by displaying" or "using" an object that, in fact, is a dangerous weapon or imitation weapon.[67] The revised enhancement is narrower than the current D.C. Code sex offense aggravator because it requires the use or display of the weapon, and also requires that the use or display of the weapon caused the sexual activity. An actor that is merely "armed with" or "had readily available" a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon may still face liability under the RCC weapons offenses as well as liability for second degree or fourth degree of the revised sexual assault statute for a "coercive threat." The "recklessly" culpable mental state is consistent with weapons gradations in other RCC offenses against persons. The revised enhancement includes imitation dangerous weapons because in the context of sexual assault, an imitation dangerous weapon can be as coercive as a real dangerous weapon. This change improves the proportionality of the revised sexual assault statute.

Twelfth, the revised sexual assault penalty enhancement for causing serious bodily injury, due to the revised definition of "serious bodily injury," no longer includes weapon," which is the same language in the current armed aggravator. Johnson v. United States, 613 A.2d 888, 897 (D.C. 1992) (quoting D.C. Code § 22-3202(a) (1989 & 1991 Suppl.)). In Johnson v. United States, the appellant did not actually use the dangerous weapon during the sexual assault, but used the dangerous weapon prior to the sexual assault to injure the complainant and the weapon was present in the room at the time of the sexual assault. Johnson v. United States, 613 A.2d 888, 891, 898 (D.C. 1992). The DCCA held that "the government satisfied its burden of proving the 'armed' element by demonstrating that the coercive element of the sexual assault arose directly from appellant's use of a dangerous weapon." Johnson, 613 A.2d at 898. Although the armed rape offense has been repealed, Johnson may support requiring a causation element in the current armed aggravator for the sexual abuse statutes because of the identical "while armed" language.

[66] For a first offense of committing specified crimes of violence "while armed with or having readily available" a dangerous weapon, the defendant "may" receive a maximum term of imprisonment of up to 30 years. D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(1). If the defendant committed the offense "while armed with any pistol or firearm," however, he or she "shall" receive a five year "mandatory-minimum" term of imprisonment of not less than 5 years. D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(1). If the current conviction is for committing a specified crime of violence "while armed with or having readily available" a dangerous weapon and the defendant has at least one prior conviction for an armed crime of violence, the defendant "shall" be sentenced to "not less than 5 years" imprisonment and not more than 30 years. D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(2). If the current conviction is for committing a specified crime of violence "while armed with any pistol or firearm" and the defendant has the required prior conviction for an armed crime of violence, the defendant "shall" be "imprisoned for a mandatory-minimum term of not less than 10 years." D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(2). First degree murder, second degree murder, first degree sexual abuse, and first degree child sexual abuse "shall" receive the same minimum and mandatory minimum sentences as other crimes of violence committed "while armed with or having readily available" a dangerous weapon, except that the maximum term of imprisonment "shall" be life without parole as authorized elsewhere in the current District code. D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(3).

[67] The current sexual abuse weapons aggravators refers to "a pistol or any other firearm (or imitation thereof). D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(6). The revised enhancement does not, however, because the revised definitions of "dangerous weapon" and "imitation dangerous weapon" in RCC § 22E-701 specifically include firearms and imitation firearms.

rendering a complainant "unconscious," causing "extreme physical pain," or impairment of a "mental faculty." The current D.C. Code sex offense aggravator for causing serious bodily injury[68] incorporates the current D.C. Code definition of "serious bodily injury" for the sex offenses, which includes "unconsciousness, extreme physical pain . . . or protracted loss or impairment of the function of a . . . mental faculty."[69] As is discussed in the commentary to the revised definition of "serious bodily injury" in RCC § 22E-701, these provisions in the current definition are difficult to measure and may include within the definition physical harms that otherwise fall short of the high standard the definition requires. In contrast, the revised definition of "serious bodily injury," and the revised penalty enhancement using that term, are limited to a substantial risk of death, protracted and obvious disfigurement, protracted loss or impairment of the function of a bodily member or organ, or a protracted loss of consciousness. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised sex offenses.

Thirteenth, first degree sexual assault[70] is no longer subject to the heightened penalties and aggravating circumstances in current D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b-2). Current D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b-2) establishes heightened penalties for first degree sexual abuse and first degree sexual abuse while armed if specified procedural requirements are met[71] and "one or more aggravating circumstances exist beyond a reasonable doubt."[72] In

[68] D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(3).

[69] D.C. Code § 22-3001(7).

[70] As will be discussed, current D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b-2) authorizes enhanced penalties for first degree sexual abuse and first degree sexual abuse while armed, and the RCC replaces those enhanced penalties. In the RCC, however, there is no longer a sexual assault "while armed" offense. Depending on the facts of the case, the equivalent offense would be first degree sexual assault with a weapons enhancement under subsection (g) of the revised sexual assault statute or first degree sexual assault with additional liability under RCC §§ 22E-4104, possession of a dangerous weapon during a crime. For clarity, the commentary for this entry refers only to first degree sexual assault when discussing the relevant RCC statute, even though the various forms of liability for first degree sexual assault committed with the use or presence of a weapon are also affected by the revision.

[71] D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b-2) ("(1) The court may impose a sentence in excess of 60 years for first degree murder or first degree murder while armed, 40 years for second degree murder or second degree murder while armed, or 30 years for armed carjacking, first degree sexual abuse, first degree sexual abuse while armed, first degree child sexual abuse or first degree child sexual abuse while armed, only if: (A) Thirty-days prior to trial or the entry of a plea of guilty, the prosecutor files an indictment or information with the clerk of the court and a copy of such indictment or information is served on the person or counsel for the person, stating in writing one or more aggravating circumstances to be relied upon; and (B) One or more aggravating circumstances exist beyond a reasonable doubt.").

[72] The aggravating circumstances that apply to first degree sexual abuse are unclear. D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b-2)(2) establishes that the "[a]ggravating circumstances for first degree sexual abuse . . . are set forth in § 22-3020," but the statute also codifies an additional set of aggravating circumstances that apply to "all offenses." It is unclear whether first degree sexual abuse is included in "all offenses" and is subject to the additional set of aggravating circumstances, or if "all offenses" is limited to the offenses for which D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b-2) authorizes an enhanced penalty that do not have offense-specific aggravating circumstances. The aggravating circumstances that apply for first degree sexual abuse while armed are similarly unclear. D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b-2)(2) does not specify whether first degree sexual abuse while armed is included in the reference to first degree sexual abuse and the aggravating circumstances in D.C. Code § 22-3020, or if it is subject only to the additional set of aggravating circumstances for "all offenses." Regardless, the revised sexual assault statute replaces the aggravating circumstances in D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b-2) insofar as they are applicable to first degree sexual abuse and first degree sexual abuse while contrast, the revised sexual assault statute is subject to a single set of aggravators in subsection (f) of the revised statute, as well as the general enhancements in the RCC for repeat offenders (RCC § 22E-606), hate crimes (RCC § 22E-607), and pretrial release (RCC § 22E-608). As a result, the general aggravating circumstances in D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b-2) no longer apply to first degree sexual assault, although several of them are covered by other provisions in the RCC.[73] The special procedures in D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b-2) to give notice to a defendant are unnecessary because aggravating circumstances must be charged in the criminal indictment per Supreme Court case law decided after passage of the District statute.[74] This revision improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised sexual assault statute.

Fourteenth, the revised sexual assault statute replaces certain minimum statutory penalties for first degree sexual abuse, second degree sexual abuse, and child sexual abuse in D.C. Code § 24-403.01(e).[75] These minimum statutory penalties require armed. The revised sexual assault statute also replaces the aggravating circumstances in D.C. Code § 22-3020, which is discussed elsewhere in this commentary as a substantive change in law.

[73] The general aggravating circumstances in D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b-2)(2) are: "(A) The offense was committed because of the victim's race, color, religion, national origin, sexual orientation, or gender identity or expression (as defined in § 2-1401.02(12A); (B) The offense was committed because the victim was or had been a witness in any criminal investigation or judicial proceeding or was capable of providing or had provided assistance in any criminal investigation or judicial proceeding; (C) The offense was committed for the purpose of avoiding or preventing a lawful arrest or effecting an escape from custody; (D) The offense was especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel; (E) The offense involved a drive-by or random shooting; (F) The offense was committed after substantial planning; (G) The victim was less than 12 years old or more than 60 years old or vulnerable because of mental or physical infirmity; [and] (H) Except where death or serious bodily injury is an element of the offense, the victim sustained serious bodily injury as a result of the offense." D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b-2)(2).

In the RCC, none of these aggravating circumstances apply to the revised first degree sexual assault offense. However, the offense is subject to several penalty enhancements that are substantially similar to several of the aggravating circumstances—the general penalty enhancement for hate crimes in RCC § 22E-607, the sexual assault penalty enhancement for recklessly disregarding that the complainant was a "vulnerable adult" (RCC § 22E-1301), and the sexual assault penalty enhancement for recklessly causing serious bodily injury to the complainant (RCC § 22E-1301). In addition, the revised sexual assault statute continues to enhance penalties for complainants under the age of 12 years (RCC § 22E-1301) and for an elderly complainant (RCC § 22E-1301), but has additional requirements for these enhancements that differ from D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b-2)(2).

The remaining aggravators in D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b-2)(2) appear better suited for the homicide offenses that are subject to enhanced penalties in the statute: "(B) The offense was serious because the victim was or had been a witness in any criminal investigation or judicial proceeding or was capable of providing or had provided assistance in any criminal investigation or judicial proceeding; (C) The offense was committed for the purpose of avoiding or preventing a lawful arrest or effecting an escape from custody; (D) The offense was especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel; (E) The offense involved a drive-by or random shooting; (F) The offense was committed after substantial planning." To the extent that these aggravators would apply to the revised first degree sexual assault offense, other offenses in the RCC may cover the conduct, such as [RCC §§ 22E-XXX obstruction of justice] or are more appropriate for consideration at sentencing.

[74] The D.C. Council approved D.C. Code § 24-403(b-2) well before Apprendi v. New Jersey, 530 U.S. 466, 490 (2000) was decided, and the statute became law shortly before Apprendi was decided. D.C. Code § 24-403(b-2) was approved on August 2, 2000, and became effective on June 8, 2001. The Sentencing Reform Amendment Act of 2000, 2000 District of Columbia Laws 13-302 (Act 13–406). Apprendi was decided on June 26, 2000. Apprendi v. New Jersey, 530 U.S. 466 (2000).

specified prior convictions, and it is unclear how the general recidivist statutes in the current D.C. Code[76] apply, if at all, to these provisions. In contrast, the revised sexual assault statute is subject to a single recidivist penalty enhancement in RCC § 22E-606 that applies to all offenses in the RCC. There is no clear rationale for such special sentencing provisions in these offenses as compared to other offenses. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense.

Beyond these fourteen changes to current District law, twenty-one other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised sexual assault statute consistently requires that the actor engages in a sexual act or sexual contact with the complainant or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to" the sexual act or sexual contact. While all of the current D.C. Code sexual abuse statutes require that the actor "engages in" the sexual conduct, they vary in whether there is liability if the actor "causes" the complainant to "engage in" the sexual conduct or "causes" the complainant to "submit to" the sexual conduct.[77] This variation creates different plain language readings of the current D.C. Code sexual abuse statutes and suggests that the current offenses vary in scope as to the prohibited conduct and liability for involvement of a third party. There is no case law on point. However, DCCA case law addressing similar language in the District's current misdemeanor sexual abuse statute suggests that the DCCA may not construe such language variations as legally significant.[78] In addition to case law, District practice does not appear to follow abuse in violation of § 22-3002, § 22-3003, or § 22-3008 through § 22-3010, shall not be less than 7 years if the violation occurs after the person has been convicted in the District of Columbia or elsewhere of a crime of violence, as so defined.").

[77] First degree sexual abuse, second degree sexual abuse, and sexual abuse of a ward codify "engages in" the sexual conduct, "causes" the complainant to "engage in" the sexual conduct, and "causes" the complainant to "submit to" the sexual conduct. D.C. Code §§ 22-3002 and 22-3003; 22-3013 and 22-3014. Third and fourth degree sexual abuse, child sexual abuse, sexual abuse of a minor, and sexual abuse of a secondary education student are limited to "engages in" the sexual conduct and "causes" the complainant to "engage in" the sexual conduct. D.C. Code §§ 22-3004 and 22-3005; 22-3008 and 22-3009; 22-3009.01 and 22-3009.02. Misdemeanor sexual abuse and sexual abuse of a patient or client require only "engages in." D.C. Code §§ 22-3006; 22-3015 and 22-3016.

[78] In Pinckney v. United States, the DCCA held that the misdemeanor sexual abuse statute includes "conduct where a person uses another to touch intimate parts of the person's own body" even though the plain language of the statute requires "engages in a sexual act or sexual contact with another person." Pinckney v. United States, 906 A.2d 301, 303, 306 (D.C. 2006) (quoting Council of the District of Columbia, Report of the Committee on the Judiciary, Bill 10-87, the "Anti-Sexual Abuse Act of 1994 at 1). The DCCA declined "an interpretation that would exclude such an obvious means of offensive touching," in part because the legislature intended to "'strengthen the District's laws against sexual abuse and make them more inclusive, flexible and reflective of the broad range of abusive conduct which does in fact occur.'" Id. (quoting Council of the District of Columbia, Report of the Committee on the Judiciary, Bill 10-87, the "Anti-Sexual Abuse Act of 1994 at 1). The DCCA stated that its interpretation of the misdemeanor sexual abuse statute "as applying to the facts of this case does not require appellant to have caused the victim to engage in or submit to sexual contact" because the appellant engaged in the prohibited sexual contact by his own actions." Id. However, the DCCA's reliance on the legislative intent of the Anti-Sexual Abuse Act suggests that it would broadly interpret any variations in the language of the current sexual abuse statutes.

the variations in statutory language.[79] Instead of these variations in language, the revised sex offenses and the revised definitions of "sexual act" and "sexual contact" consistently require that the actor "engages in" or "causes" the complainant to "engage in" or "submit to" the sexual conduct. Differentiating liability based on whether an actor themselves commits the sexual conduct in question, or whether the actor causes the complainant to engage in or submit to the sexual conduct, may lead to disproportionate outcomes. This change improves the consistency, clarity, and proportionality of the revised offenses, and reduces unnecessary gaps in liability.

Second, the revised sexual assault statute prohibits using physical force that "moves" or "immobilizes" the complainant. The current D.C. Code first degree[80] and third degree[81] sexual abuse statutes prohibit the use of "force" against the complainant, currently defined to include "the use of such physical strength or violence as is sufficient to overcome, [or] restrain . . . a person"[82] and "the use of a threat of harm sufficient to coerce or compel submission by the victim."[83] It is unclear whether "force" includes the use of physical force that moves, but does not injure, the complainant, such as a shove. There is no DCCA case law interpreting the current D.C. Code definition of "force." Resolving this ambiguity, the revised sexual assault statute prohibits the use of physical force that "moves" or "immobilizes" the complainant. The term "overcomes" in the current D.C. Code definition of "force" may erroneously imply that the complainant must be actively opposing the use of force. Instead, "moves" in first and third degree of the revised sexual assault statute covers forceful conduct such as pushing. The term "restrains" in the current D.C. Code definition of "force" may erroneously imply that non-physical control is included. First degree and third degree of the revised sexual assault statute cover conduct such as a hug or hold, instead, by the word "immobilizes." As a whole, "moves" and "immobilizes" clarify that first degree and third degree of the revised sexual assault statute prohibit certain use of physical force that falls short of causing "bodily injury," as defined in RCC § 22E-701.[84] It is consistent and proportionate to include this forceful conduct in first degree and third degree of the revised sexual assault statute. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute, and removes a possible gap in liability.

Third, first degree and third degree of the revised sexual assault statute prohibit the actor threatening to harm the complainant or a third party, and exclude the actor threatening to harm himself or herself. The current D.C. Code first degree[85] and third degree[86] sexual abuse statutes prohibit the actor threatening to subject "any person" to death, bodily injury, or kidnapping. It is unclear whether "any person" would include the actor threatening to harm himself or herself and there is no DCCA case law on this issue. In addition, the current D.C. Code first degree[87] and third degree[88] sexual abuse statutes prohibit the use of "force" against the complainant, currently defined to include "the use of a threat of harm sufficient to coerce or compel submission by the victim"[89] It is unclear whether this provision in the definition of "force" would include the actor threatening to harm himself or herself and there is no DCCA case law on this issue. Resolving this ambiguity, first degree and third degree of the revised sexual assault statute limit threats of the actor harming the complainant or a third party. An actor that threatens to harm himself or herself may have liability for second degree or fourth degree sexual assault for an explicit or implicit coercive threat provided the other requirements of the offense are met. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

[79] The jury instructions for third degree, fourth degree, child sexual abuse, and sexual abuse of a minor include that the actor "caused" the complainant "to engage in or submit to" a sexual act or sexual contact, even though the statutory language for those offenses does not include "causes" the complainant to "submit to." Compare D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. §§ 4.400 (general sexual abuse); 4.401 (child sexual abuse); 4.402 (sexual abuse of a minor) D.C. Code §§ 22-3003 and 22-3004 (third degree and fourth degree sexual abuse statutes); 22-3008 and 22-3009 (first degree and second degree child sexual abuse statutes); 22-3009.01 and 22-3009.02 (first degree and second degree sexual abuse of a minor statutes).

Fourth, first degree and third degree of the revised sexual assault statute prohibit threatening to inflict a "sexual act" or "sexual contact" against a third party. The current D.C. Code first degree[90] and third degree[91] sexual abuse statutes prohibit threats of death, bodily injury, or kidnapping. The current D.C. Code definition of "bodily injury" for the sexual abuse statutes is "injury involving loss or impairment of the function of a bodily member, organ, or mental faculty, or physical disfigurement, disease, sickness, or injury involving significant pain."[92] It is unclear whether the current D.C. Code definition of "bodily injury" includes threats of sexual penetration or sexual touching, and there is no DCCA case law interpreting this definition. In addition, the current D.C. Code first degree[93] and third degree[94] sexual abuse statutes prohibit the use of "force" against the complainant, currently defined to include "the use of a threat of harm sufficient to coerce or compel submission by the victim"[95] It is unclear whether this provision in the definition of "force" would include the actor threatening to inflict a "sexual act" or "sexual contact" against a third party. Resolving this ambiguity, first degree and third degree of the revised sexual assault statute prohibit threats to inflict a "sexual act" or "sexual contact," as those terms are defined in RCC § 22E-701, against a third party. A sexual act or sexual contact is a serious harm that may fall outside the current D.C. Code and RCC[96] definitions of "bodily injury" and should be included in first degree and third degree of the revised statute.[97] First degree and third degree of the RCC sexual assault statute limit threats of a "sexual act" or "sexual contact" to a third party consistent with the other requirements of the revised sexual assault statute.[98] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute, and may remove a possible gap in liability.

Fifth, first and third degree of the revised sexual assault statute prohibit causing the complainant to engage in or submit to sexual activity "by" causing the nonconsensual intoxication of the complainant. The current D.C. Code first degree[99] and third degree[100] sexual abuse statutes prohibit a sexual act or sexual contact "after" the actor involuntarily intoxicates the complainant. There is no DCCA case law interpreting the current intoxication provision. It is unclear whether a causal connection is required between the sexual conduct and the involuntary intoxication of the complainant, although the legislative history suggests that such a causation requirement may have been intended.[101] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised sexual assault statute clarifies that involuntary intoxication of the complainant must be causally related (a "but for" condition) to the sexual conduct. The causation requirement, in addition to the culpable mental states in the revised intoxication provision discussed elsewhere in this commentary, ensures that the intoxication provision applies only to actors that knowingly cause a sexual act or sexual contact by administering an intoxicant or causing an intoxicant to be administered.[102] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised sexual assault offense.

Sixth, the intoxication provision in first and third degree of the revised sexual assault statute specifies the required effect of the intoxicant. The intoxication provision in the current D.C. Code first degree and third degree sexual abuse requires that the intoxicant "substantially impairs the ability of that other person to appraise or control his or her conduct."[103] This language is not further statutorily defined and there is no DCCA case law interpreting it. The language is similar to one basis of liability in the current D.C. Code second degree and fourth degree sexual abuse statutes for sexual conduct with a complainant that is "incapable of appraising the nature of the conduct,"[104] but the current D.C. Code intoxication provision does not mirror the other types of incapacitation referenced in second degree and fourth degree sexual abuse—"incapable of declining participation in" the sexual act or sexual contact[105] and "incapable of communicating unwillingness to engage in" the sexual act or sexual contact.[106] Resolving these ambiguities, the revised intoxication provision in first and third degree of the revised sexual assault statute makes two changes to the current intoxication provision to clarify its scope. First, the revised intoxication provision specifies that an intoxicant that renders the complainant "[a]sleep, unconscious, substantially paralyzed, or passing in and out of consciousness" is sufficient. These conditions mirror the required physical incapacitation in second degree and fourth degree of the revised sexual assault statute and satisfy the current intoxication provision's requirement that the intoxicant "substantially impairs the ability" of the complainant to "appraise or control his or her conduct." Second, the revised intoxicant includes an intoxicant that renders the complainant "[s]ubstantially incapable of appraising the nature of" the sexual act or sexual contact or "[s]ubstantially incapable of communicating willingness or unwillingness to engage in" the sexual act or sexual contact. This language is similar to the language in second degree and fourth degree of the revised sexual assault statute and establishes other types of incapacitation that may not fall within the conditions specified elsewhere in the intoxication provision, e.g., asleep, unconscious, etc. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute and removes possible gaps in liability.

[98] As is discussed elsewhere in this commentary, threats of the actor engaging in self-harm, or, in this case, a sexual act or sexual contact, are included in second degree and fourth degree of the revised sexual assault statute as a "coercive threat," if the other requirements of the offense are met. Including threats to inflict a sexual act or sexual contact against the complainant in first degree and third degree of the revised sexual assault statute may, by nature of the offense, elevate every sexual assault into first degree or third degree, which is inconsistent with the current D.C. Code sexual abuse statutes and the RCC sexual assault statute, which distinguish the gradations, in part, based on the type of threat.

[101] Council of the District of Columbia, Report of the Committee of the Judiciary, Bill 10-87, The "Anti-Sexual Abuse Act of 1994" at 14-15 ("Where the offender covertly administers drugs or intoxicants to the victim with the specific intent to engage in the sexual act . . . the use of force element under the existing rape statute cannot be established because there is no proof that the act was 'against the will' of the victim.").

[102] The revised intoxication provision ensures the proper scope of liability when the actor does not directly administer the intoxicant to the complainant, such as when the actor sets out a generally available bowl of punch that is spiked with alcohol. In such a situation, the actor may be "practically certain" that the complainant will consume the punch, satisfying the "knowingly" culpable mental state for administering or causing to be administered an intoxicant to the complainant without the complainant's consent. However, there is only liability for first degree or third degree sexual assault if the actor is "practically certain" that the sexual activity occurs as a result of administering the intoxicant. In addition, there can be no liability for first degree or third degree sexual assault unless the actor set out the punch bowl "with intent to impair the complainant's ability to express unwillingness." If an actor fails to satisfy the requirements of the revised intoxication provision, there may still be liability under second degree or fourth degree of the revised sexual assault statute for engaging in sexual activity with an impaired complainant.

Seventh, first degree and third degree of the RCC sexual assault statute delete "after rendering [the complainant] unconscious" as a discrete form of liability. The current D.C. Code first degree[107] and third degree[108] sexual abuse statutes prohibit a sexual act or sexual contact "after" the actor "render[s] that other person unconscious."[109] There is no DCCA case law interpreting this provision. It is unclear whether a causal connection is required between the actor rendering the complainant unconscious and the sexual conduct. Requiring a causal connection would render the provision surplusage because the current first degree and third degree sexual abuse statutes separately prohibit "[b]y" using force against the complainant,[110] which would include rendering the complainant unconscious.[111] Without a causal connection, however, the provision overlaps with second degree and fourth degree sexual abuse, which prohibit a sexual act or sexual contact with an incapacitated complainant.[112] Resolving this ambiguity, first degree and third degree of the RCC sexual assault statute include engaging in or causing a complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act "by causing bodily injury to the complainant." The RCC definition of "bodily injury" in RCC § 22E-701 would extend to unconsciousness ("physical pain, physical injury, illness, or impairment of physical condition."). If the actor renders the complainant unconscious and then later decides to sexually assault the complainant, without the causal connection that first degree and third degree require, there is liability in second degree and fourth degree sexual assault for engaging in a sexual act or sexual contact with an "unconscious" complainant. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Eighth, first degree and third degree of the revised sexual assault offense require a "knowingly" culpable mental state as to the sexual act or sexual contact being accomplished by causing bodily injury, a specified use of physical force, specified threats, or involuntary intoxication of the complainant. The current D.C. Code first degree[113] and third degree[114] sexual abuse statutes do not specify any culpable mental states. DCCA case law has determined that first degree sexual abuse is a "general intent" crime for purposes of an intoxication defense,[115] and similarly logic would appear to apply to third degree sexual abuse. However, it is unclear what general intent means in terms of required culpable mental states.[116] Resolving this ambiguity, first degree and third degree of the revised sexual assault statute require a "knowingly" culpable mental state as to the sexual act or sexual contact being accomplished by the specified use of physical force, specified threats, or involuntary intoxication of the complainant. Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[117] A "knowingly" culpable mental state is consistent with current District law for threats[118] and the RCC criminal threats statute (RCC § 22E-1204) and also may clarify that second degree and fourth degree sexual assault are lesser included offenses, which is an unresolved issued in current DCCA case law.[119] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised offense.

Ninth, second degree and fourth degree of the revised sexual assault statute require a "knowingly" culpable mental state as to the sexual act or sexual contact being accomplished by "a coercive threat" or with a physically or mentally impaired complainant. The current D.C. Code second degree[120] and fourth degree[121] sexual abuse statutes do not specify any culpable mental states. However, DCCA case law appears to have required specific intent for second degree sexual abuse in one recent case,[122] and the DCCA also has been clear that the statutory definition of "sexual contact" requires specific intent.[123] Resolving this ambiguity, second degree and fourth degree of the revised sexual assault statute require a "knowingly" culpable mental state. Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[124] A "knowingly" culpable mental state is consistent with current District law for threats[125] and the RCC criminal threats statute (RCC § 22E-1204) and may also clarify that second degree and fourth degree sexual assault are lesser included offenses of

The DCCA compared subsections (A) and (B) of the current definition of "sexual act" in D.C. Code § 22-3001(8) and noted that they do not require a specific intent "to abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, or arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person" like the current definition of "sexual contact" in D.C. Code § 22-3001(9) does. The DCCA further noted that "[i]n general, a crime can only be a lesser-included offense of another if its required proof contains some, but not all, of the elements of the greater offense," but "the gravamen of whether a crime is the lesser-included offense of another is legislative intent. Id. (internal quotation omitted).

Although In re E.H. is specific to child sexual abuse, all the current sexual abuse offenses that require a "sexual act" and "sexual contact" have the same issue—the current definition of "sexual contact" has a specific intent requirement that two subsections of the definition of "sexual act" do not. It seems as though the DCCA would find that this specific intent requirement precludes second degree and fourth degree sexual abuse from being lesser included offenses of first degree and third degree sexual abuse in some instances. In the revised sexual assault statute, all gradations require a "knowingly" culpable mental state and the revised definition of "sexual act" in RCC § 22E-701 requires the same "intent to sexually degrade, arouse, or gratify any person" that the revised definition of "sexual contact" does. Second degree and fourth degree sexual assault are lesser included offenses of first degree and third degree sexual assault in the RCC.

first degree and third degree, which is an unresolved issue in current DCCA case law.[126] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised offense.

Tenth, the revised first degree and third degree sexual assault statutes no longer include the "use of a threat of harm sufficient to coerce or compel submission by the victim." The current D.C. Code first degree[127] and third degree[128] sexual abuse offenses prohibit the use of "force" against the complainant, and the current definition of "force" includes "the use of a threat of harm sufficient to coerce or compel submission by the victim."[129] The DCCA has never interpreted the threats part of the current definition of "force." However, inclusion of any type of threat in the current D.C. Code first and third degree sexual abuse statutes appears to render moot the overall statutory framework in the current felony sexual abuse statutes, which purports to differentiate threats by the severity of harm involved.[130] Resolving this ambiguity, first degree and third degree of the revised sexual assault are limited to specified threats against the complainant and specified threats against a third party. Any other threat may lead to liability under second degree and fourth degree of the revised sexual assault statute as a "coercive threat." This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Eleventh, first degree and third degree of the revised sexual assault statute no longer include "the use or threatened use of a weapon" as a discrete basis of liability. The current D.C. Code definition of "force" in the sexual abuse statutes prohibits "the use or threatened use of a weapon,"[131] but "weapon" is not defined statutorily and there is no DCCA case law interpreting the term. It is unclear how a "weapon" in the current D.C. Code definition of "force" differs from a "deadly or dangerous weapon" in the current sexual abuse aggravators.[132] Resolving this ambiguity, the RCC sexual assault statute deletes "the use or threatened use of a weapon" as a discrete basis of liability. The use or threatened use of a weapon is sufficient for first degree or third degree of the revised sexual assault statute if it causes bodily injury to the complainant, accompanies physical force that moves or immobilizes the complainant, or if it constitutes a specified threat, provided the other requirements of the offense are met. If the use or threatened use of a weapon does not satisfy the requirements for liability for first degree or third degree sexual assault, there may be liability for second degree or fourth degree sexual assault for an explicit or implicit coercive threat (subparagraphs (b)(2)(A) and (d)(2)(A)), provided the other requirements of the offense are met. This change improves the clarity of the revised statute.

Twelfth, the intoxication provision in first degree and third degree of the revised sexual assault statute specifies several culpable mental states. The intoxication provision in current D.C. Code first degree and third sexual abuse does not specify any culpable mental states,[133] although the legislative history references a specific intent to engage in the sexual activity.[134] DCCA case law has determined that first degree sexual abuse is a "general intent" crime for purposes of an intoxication defense,[135] and similar logic would appear to apply to third degree sexual abuse. It is unclear what general intent means in terms of required culpable mental states, but the DCCA has defined "general intent" in different ways, including that a "defendant cannot possess the requisite general intent to commit a crime without 'be[ing] aware of all those facts which make his or her conduct criminal.'"[136] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised intoxication provision specifies several culpable mental states. First, a "knowingly" culpable mental state applies to administering or causing to be administered an intoxicant, doing so without the complainant's "effective consent," and the fact that the substance is an intoxicant. The "knowingly" culpable mental state also applies to the required causation between administering the intoxicant and the sexual conduct. Second, the actor must act "with intent to impair the complainant's ability to express willingness or unwillingness" to engage in the sexual act or sexual contact. Finally, the revised intoxication provision, by the use of "in fact," requires strict liability for the effects of the intoxicant because administering an intoxicant without the complainant's "effective consent" is an assault. Requiring, at a minimum, a knowing culpable mental state for the elements of an offense that make otherwise legal conduct illegal is a generally accepted legal principle.[137] However, an actor may be held strictly liable for elements of an offense that aggravate what is already illegal conduct.[138] If an actor fails to satisfy any of the culpable mental states in the revised intoxication provision, there may still be liability for sexual activity with an intoxicated or incapacitated complainant in second degree or fourth degree of the revised sexual assault statute. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised sexual assault statute.[139]

Thirteenth, second degree and fourth degree of the revised sexual assault statute prohibit sexual assault by making a "coercive threat," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701. The current D.C. Code second degree and fourth degree sexual abuse statutes prohibit a sexual act or sexual contact by "threatening or placing that other person in reasonable fear (other than by threatening or placing that other person in reasonable fear that any person will be subjected to death, bodily injury, or kidnapping)."[140] There is no apparent statutory limit to the type of threats or fear, and the legislative history generally notes that the offenses "encompass other types of coercion."[141] The DCCA has sustained convictions for second degree sexual abuse for placing a complainant in reasonable fear of arrest[142] and reasonable fear of being fired from employment.[143] Instead of a general reference to threats, second degree and fourth degree of the revised sexual assault statute prohibit making a "coercive threat," a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that is used consistently in the RCC. The RCC definition specifies certain common types of coercive threats, but also has a broad catch-all provision for threats of a harm that is "sufficiently serious, under all the surrounding circumstances, to compel a reasonable person of the same background and in the same circumstances as the complainant to comply." This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised offense.

In this instance, administering an intoxicant without consent and with the specified intent is already sufficient to impose assault or attempted assault liability.

[139] The revised intoxication provision ensures the proper scope of liability when the actor does not directly administer the intoxicant to the complainant, such as when the actor sets out a generally available bowl of punch that is spiked with alcohol. In such a situation, the actor may be "practically certain" that the complainant will consume the punch, satisfying the "knowingly" culpable mental state for administering or causing to be administered an intoxicant to the complainant without the complainant's consent. However, there is only liability for first degree or third degree sexual assault if the actor is "practically certain" that the sexual activity occurs as a result of administering the intoxicant. In addition, there can be no liability for first degree or third degree sexual assault unless the actor set out the punch bowl "with intent to impair the complainant's ability to express unwillingness." If an actor fails to satisfy the requirements of the revised intoxication provision, there may still be liability under second degree or fourth degree of the revised sexual assault statute for engaging in sexual activity with an impaired complainant.

In the legislation as introduced, what is now fourth degree sexual abuse was a lower gradation for a sexual contact. Id. at 7.

Fourteenth, the revised sexual assault statute codifies an effective consent defense to several provisions in the revised statute and, under RCC § 22-201, assigns the government the burden of disproving the defense beyond a reasonable doubt. The current D.C. Code consent defense to the general sexual abuse statutes simply states that "[c]onsent by the victim is a defense to a prosecution" for first degree through fourth degree sexual abuse, and misdemeanor sexual abuse.[144] The statutory definition of "consent"[145] for the sexual abuse statutes further specifies that such consent must be "freely given," but the meaning of this language is unclear and there is no DCCA case law interpreting it.

Under District law, the consent defense to the general sexual abuse statutes was originally an affirmative defense that required the defendant to prove consent by a preponderance of the evidence. However, in 2009,[146] the preponderance requirement was struck due to concerns that it was creating confusion and impermissibly shifting the government's burden of proof on the issue of force. Since the deletion of the preponderance requirement, limited DCCA case law indicates that the consent defense is used to prove the lack of force and the DCCA appears to have approved a jury instruction that requires the government to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the complainant did not voluntarily consent to the sexual activity.[147]

With respect to limitations on the current consent defense, the DCCA, relying on various indications of legislative intent, has held that the consent defense is not available when the defendant is an adult at least four years older than a complainant under 16 years of age.[148] Although a complainant under the age of 16 years cannot consent to sexual activity with a defendant that is at least four years older, it is unclear whether the DCCA would also categorically hold that such a complainant could not consent to the use of force in that sexual activity. Although there is no case law is on point, case law on the District's assault statute[149] and dicta in one sexual abuse case[150] suggest that a person may not be able to consent to more severe harms.

Rather, the government had to 'prove beyond a reasonable doubt that [T.C.] and [S.T.] did not voluntarily consent to the sexual acts or contacts.' Defense counsel specifically requested that the court issue such a jury instruction.").

The revised sexual assault effective consent defense is generally consistent with DCCA case law interpreting the current D.C. Code consent defense. It requires that the actor reasonably believe[151] that the complainant gives effective consent to the actor to engage in the conduct constituting the offense—which would include the use of force, as well as when consent is the absence of force—as well as the sexual act or sexual contact. The RCC sexual assault defense extends the defense to include the use of threats, as well as to incapacitated or intoxicated complainants in second degree and fourth degree. As the explanatory note discusses, however, the defense may rarely be available in second degree and fourth degree due to the RCC definitions of "effective consent" and "consent." The RCC definition of "effective consent" is generally consistent with the current D.C. Code definition of "consent" and is discussed in the commentary to the definition in RCC § 22E-701. Under RCC § 22E-201, the government must prove the absence of the defense beyond a reasonable doubt, which is consistent with limited DCCA case law.

The RCC sexual assault effective consent defense does not place any limitations on the type or severity of conduct to which a complainant can consent. In the context of [148] The DCCA has held that in a prosecution under the current general sexual abuse statutes, if the complainant is a "child" under the age of 16 years "an adult defendant who is at least four years older than the complainant may not assert a 'consent' defense. In such a case, the child's consent is not valid." Davis v. United States, 873 A.2d 1101, 1106 (D.C. 2005). "Child" is defined in D.C. Code § 22-3001 as "a person who has not yet attained the age of 16 years." D.C. Code § 22-3001(3). "Adult" is not statutorily defined in the current sex offenses, and the DCCA does not provide a definition in Davis.

Davis was decided when the consent defense was an affirmative defense, but that is immaterial to the court's decision. The court's reasoning was based, in part on current D.C. Code § 22-3011, which states that consent is not a defense to the child sexual abuse statutes, and D.C. Code § 22-3011 remains law. Davis, 873 A.2d at 1105 & n.8 (stating that "Section 22–3011 preserves the longstanding rule that a child is legally incapable of consenting to sexual conduct with an adult" and that "By adopting the four-year age differential as an element of the child sexual abuse provisions, it appears that the ASAA does modify the traditional rule so as to allow bona fide consent of a child victim to be a potential defense where the defendant is less than four years older than the child.").

In addition, the principle in Davis is recognized in other DCCA case law. See, e.g., In re M.S., 171 A.3d 155, 163 (D.C. 2017) ("Our holding in Davis that the [the current D.C. Code sexual abuse statutes] retain[] the conclusive presumption that children cannot consent to sexual contact, at least where the defendant is at least four years older than the child, is also a helpful guide for our analysis here.").

[149] The DCCA recently held that consent of the complainant is not a defense to assault in a public place that causes significant bodily injury, but explicitly declined to rule on the effect of consent in other circumstances. Woods v. U.S., 65 A.3d 667, 672 (D.C. 2013).

[150] Hatch, 35 A.3d at 1120 (noting that "consenting at gunpoint is "an absurd proposition").

[151] It is an unusual scenario where an actor actually has effective consent but mistakenly believes he or she does not, and commits a crime. However, in such a situation, there may be attempt liability for attempted sexual assault under the RCC general provision for attempt in RCC § 22E-301, which includes that the actor "would have come dangerously close to completing that offense if the situation was as the [actor] perceived it to be."

sexual activity in the RCC, a complainant can consent to conduct, such as temporary asphyxiation, that creates a risk of, or actually causes, significant bodily injury, serious bodily injury, or death. Similarly, a complainant can consent to conduct that involves the use of a dangerous weapon because objects used in a sexual context may otherwise constitute a "dangerous weapon" as defined in RCC § 22E-701. However, an actor may have liability under an RCC offense against persons or an RCC weapons offense if the actor's conduct goes beyond the complainant's effective consent or if the resulting harm is one that cannot be consented to in the RCC.[152]

The RCC sexual assault defense also does not have any age requirements. The RCC sexual assault statute allows an effective consent defense to the use of force when the complainant is under 16 years of age and the actor is at least four years older. However, in practice, the definitions of "consent" and "effective consent" in RCC § 22E-701 may preclude a defendant from reasonably believing that a young complainant consents to conduct that otherwise satisfies the RCC sexual assault statute While the RCC provides no bright-line as to what age may render a youth unable to give consent under this provision, the flexible standard would allow for sex assault (not just sexual abuse) charges in some cases. In addition, even if the defense is successful and there is no liability for forceful sexual assault, there would still be liability for RCC sexual abuse of a minor,[153] which does not require force, and relies on the ages and relationship between the parties to impose liability.[154]

Lastly, the RCC effective consent defense deletes now unnecessary language "prosecuted alone or in conjunction with charges under § 22-3018 [attempt statute for sex offenses] or §§ 22-401 [assault with intent to commit specified offenses] and 22-403 [assault with intent to commit specified offenses]."[155] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised sexual assault statute.

Fifteenth, the revised sexual assault penalty enhancements require that accomplices be "physically present at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact." The [152] For example, if the complainant gives effective consent to being slapped during sex, but in doing so the actor causes the complainant serious bodily injury, there would be no liability for sexual assault, but there may be liability under the RCC assault statute (RCC § 22E-1202) if the other elements of that offense are met and there is no other applicable defense. Similarly, if the complainant gives effective consent to the actor choking the complainant during sex but in doing so the actor causes death, there would be no liability for sexual assault, but there may be liability for an RCC homicide offense if the other elements of that offense are met and there is no other applicable defense.

[153] For example, if a 20 year old actor has sex with a 15 year old complainant and the complainant gives effective consent to being tied up during sex, there is no liability for sexual assault, but there would be liability for second degree sexual abuse of a minor.

[154] A similar analysis applies to second and fourth degree sexual assault. As is discussed elsewhere in this commentary as a change in law, age is no longer sufficient as the sole basis of incapacitation in second degree and fourth degree of the RCC sexual assault. However, a young complainant could otherwise satisfy the incapacitation requirements of second degree and fourth degree sexual assault, and the consent defense would apply. In the case of a complainant that is under 16 years of age and an actor that is at least four years older, there would still be liability under the RCC sexual abuse of a minor statute, to which consent is not a defense.

[155] D.C. Code § 22-3007. The RCC sex offenses no longer have their own assault statute and liability for the conduct criminalized by the AWI offenses is provided through application of the general attempt statute in RCC § 22E-301 to the completed offenses. See Commentary to RCC § 22E-1202 (revised assault statute).

accomplice aggravator for the current D.C. Code sexual abuse statutes requires that the "defendant was aided or abetted by 1 or more accomplices."[156] There is no DCCA case law interpreting this aggravator.[157] It is unclear whether the aggravator would apply if an accomplice was not physically present. It is also unclear if the required aiding and abetting is limited to the sexual act or sexual contact, or encompasses the totality of the actor's conduct leading to the sexual act or sexual contact. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised sexual assault penalty enhancement requires that the accomplices must be "physically present at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact." Accomplices that are physically present at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact potentially increase the danger and effects of the offense in a way that other, physically absent accomplices do not. Limiting the enhancement to accomplices that are present at the time of the offense improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

Sixteenth, the revised sexual assault penalty enhancement requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state for the actor acting with one or more accomplices. The accomplice aggravator for the current D.C. Code sex offenses requires that the "defendant was aided or abetted by 1 or more accomplices."[158] The current statute does not specify any culpable mental states and there is no DCCA case law for this issue. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised sexual assault penalty enhancement requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state for acting with "one or more accomplices that are physically present at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact."[159] The "knowingly" culpable mental state improves the clarity and consistency of the revised sexual assault statute.

Seventeenth, the revised sexual assault statute is subject to the RCC general provision enhancement for repeat offenders. The current D.C. Code sex offense aggravators include an aggravator if the "defendant is or has been found guilty of committing sex offenses against 2 or more victims, whether in the same or other proceedings by a court of the District of Columbia, any state, or the United States or its territories."[160] The plain language of the enhancement is unclear[161] and there is no case law clarifying the issue. In addition, current District law has general recidivist penalty enhancements applicable to sex offenses.[162] It is unclear how the multiple recidivist

[157] However, current District law generally extends aider and abettor liability to accomplices who are not present at the time of the offense. See, e.g., Kelly v. United States, 639 A.2d 86, 91 (D.C. 1994) (upholding aider and abettor liability where "the jury could reasonably have found that appellant had participated in planning the robbery," and served as getaway driver, but was not physically present during the robbery) (collecting District case law).

[158] D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(4).

[159] The revised penalty enhancement no longer uses the words "aided or abetted" that are in the current enhancement because they are surplusage. The revised penalty enhancement also no longer specifies that "[i]t is not necessary that the accomplices have been convicted for an increased punishment (or enhanced penalty) to apply" as the current penalty enhancement specifies in D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(6).

[160] D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(5). In addition to the specific sexual abuse aggravator, current District law has general penalty enhancements for prior convictions. D.C. Code §§ 22-1805; 22-1805a. It is unclear how the multiple recidivist penalty enhancements apply to the sex offenses, and there is no DCCA case law.

[161] One possible interpretation is that priors will only be counted if they are against different complainants. Another interpretation, not precluded by the plain language, is that for a prior to count, it must involve two or more victims—although this interpretation would exclude many prior sex offenses.

enhancements apply to the sex offenses, and there is no case law. Resolving these ambiguities, the revised sexual assault statute is subject to the RCC general recidivist penalty enhancement (RCC § 22E-606), consistent with other RCC offenses. By eliminating overlapping recidivist penalty enhancements, the RCC improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised sexual assault statutes.

Eighteenth, by use of the phrase "in fact," the revised sexual assault penalty enhancements apply strict liability to the age of a complainant when the complainant is under 12 years or age. The current D.C. Code sex offense aggravators include when the "victim was under the age of 12 at the time of the offense."[163] The statute does not specify any culpable mental states and there is no DCCA case law on this issue. However, the current D.C. Code child sexual abuse statutes require strict liability for the age of the complainant.[164] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised penalty enhancement, by use of the phrase "in fact," applies strict liability to the age of a complainant under the age of 12 years. Strict liability for these ages and age gaps is consistent with the strict liability requirement in first degree and third degree of the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1302) for the age of a complainant that is under the age of 12 years.[165] This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Nineteenth, the revised sexual assault penalty enhancements require that the actor "recklessly disregard" the fact that the complainant was under the age of 18 years and that the actor was in a "position of trust with or authority over the complainant." One of the current D.C. Code sex offense aggravators applies when "the victim was under the age of 18 years at the time of the offense and the actor had a significant relationship to the victim."[166] The current D.C. Code sex offense aggravators statute does not specify any culpable mental states and there is no DCCA case law on this issue. However, the current D.C. Code sexual abuse of a minor statutes require strict liability for the age of the complainant.[167] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised penalty enhancement requires that the actor was reckless as to the fact that the complainant was under the age of 18 years, and the fact that the actor is in a "position of trust with or authority over" the complainant. The RCC definition of "position of trust with or authority over" may differ in scope from the current definition of "significant relationship" and is discussed further in the commentary to RCC § 22E-701. Given that the RCC definition of a "position of trust with or authority over" the complainant includes positions where the actor may not have any prior knowledge or interaction with the complainant, and that sixteen and [164] D.C. Code §§ 22-3011(a) ("Neither mistake of age nor consent is a defense to a prosecution under §§ 22-3008 to 22-3010.01, prosecuted alone or in conjunction with charges under § 22-3018 or § 22-403."); 22-3012 ("In a prosecution under §§ 22-3008 to 22-3010, prosecuted alone or in conjunction with charges under § 22-3018 or § 22-403, the government need not prove that the defendant knew the child's age or the age difference between himself or herself and the child.").

[165] The revised sexual abuse of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1302) does not have an affirmative defense for mistake of age for complainants under the age of 12 years, unlike the remaining gradations for complainants under the age of 16 years and under the age of 18 years.
[166] D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(2).
[167] D.C. Code §§ 22-3011(a) ("Neither mistake of age nor consent is a defense to a prosecution under §§ 22-3008 to 22-3010.01, prosecuted alone or in conjunction with charges under § 22-3018 or § 22-403.").

seventeen year olds generally are able to consent to sexual encounters under current law and the RCC, requiring some degree of subjective awareness as to the special relationship is appropriate. An actor who is not at least reckless as to being in a position of trust with or authority over the complainant would still be subject to liability for sexual assault, but not this penalty enhancement. These changes improve the consistency and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Twentieth, the revised serious bodily injury penalty enhancement requires a "recklessly" culpable mental state and requires that the defendant cause serious bodily injury "immediately before, during, or immediately after" the sexual act or sexual contact. The current sex offense aggravators include when the "victim sustained serious bodily injury as a result of the offense."[168] The current D.C. Code sex offense aggravators statute does not specify any culpable mental states and the scope of "as a result of the offense" is unclear.[169] There is no DCCA case law for these issues. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised penalty enhancement requires a "recklessly" culpable mental state for causing serious bodily injury immediately before, during, or immediately after the sexual act or sexual contact. The "recklessly" culpable mental state consistent with several gradations of the revised assault statute (RCC § 22E-1202). An actor who is not at least reckless as to causing serious bodily injury would still be subject to liability for sexual assault, but not this penalty enhancement. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense.

Twenty-first, there is liability in second degree and fourth degree of the revised sexual assault statute for a sexual act or sexual contact with a mentally incapacitated complainant only if the actor doesn't also have a similarly serious mental disability or illness. The current D.C. Code second degree and fourth degree sexual abuse statutes prohibit a sexual act or sexual contact with a complainant that is: 1) "incapable of appraising the nature of the conduct";[170] 2) incapable of declining participation in" the sexual act or sexual contact;[171] or 3) "incapable of communicating unwillingness to engage in" the sexual act or sexual contact.[172] The language is not statutorily defined, and there is no DCCA case law interpreting these provisions when the defendant has a similar disability or illness as the complainant. Resolving this ambiguity, second degree and fourth degree of the revised sexual assault statute establish liability for a sexual act or sexual contact with an incapacitated complainant only if the actor doesn't also have a "similarly serious" disability or illness as the complainant. There may still be liability under other provisions of the RCC sexual assault statute or the RCC nonconsensual sexual conduct statute (RCC § 22E-1307). This change improves the consistency of the revised statute.

[169] It is unclear whether "the offense" refers to the sexual act or sexual contact, or the totality of the defendant's actions leading to the sexual act or sexual contact. It is also unclear how to determine whether an injury is a "result" of the sexual act or sexual contact, particularly if a significant period of time passes between the incident and the development or discovery of the serious bodily injury.

[170] D.C. Code §§ 22-3003(2)(A); 22-3005(2)(A).

[171] D.C. Code §§ 22-3003(2)(B); 22-3005(2)(B).

[172] D.C. Code §§ 22-3003(2)(C); 22-3005(2)(C).

First, the RCC sexual assault statute deletes "as is sufficient" from the current D.C. Code definition of "force." The current D.C. Code definition of "force" requires "the use of such physical strength or violence as is sufficient to overcome, restrain, or injure a person."[173] It is unclear whether "as is sufficient" means the force must actually overcome, restrain, or injure the complainant, or whether the force must be sufficient to overcome, restrain, or injure a "reasonable" or "average" person, regardless of the effect on the complainant. However, independent of the current definition of "force," the current D.C. Code first degree and third degree sexual abuse statutes require that the defendant's use of force actually cause the complainant to engage in a sexual act or sexual contact.[174] Given this causation requirement, first degree and third degree of the revised sexual assault statute no not use this "as is sufficient" language. First degree and third degree of the revised sexual assault statute require that the actor cause bodily injury to the complainant, or use physical force that actually moves or immobilizes the complainant. This change improves the clarity of the revised statute.

Second, the RCC sexual assault statute prohibits "causing bodily injury" to the complainant by any means. The current D.C. Code first degree and third degree sexual abuse statutes prohibit the use of "force" against the complainant[175] and "force" is defined to include "the use of such physical strength or violence as is sufficient to . . . injure a person."[176] It is unclear whether the definition requires that the actor's body injure the complainant—such as hitting the complainant—or if indirect means of causing injury are sufficient—like firing a gun or dropping an object on the complainant. However, the current D.C. Code definition of "force" also includes "the use or threatened use of a weapon"[177] and "the use of a threat of harm sufficient to coerce or compel submission by the victim,"[178] which include indirect ways of causing injury within the definition of "force." The revised statute focuses on whether the actor caused "bodily injury" instead of how. This change improves the clarity of the revised statute.

Third, the revised sexual assault statute relies on the general attempt statute to define what conduct constitutes an attempt and the appropriate penalty. Current D.C.

[173] D.C. Code § 22-3001(5) (defining "force" as "the use or threatened use of a weapon; the use of such physical strength or violence as is sufficient to overcome, restrain, or injure a person; or the use of a threat of harm sufficient to coerce or compel submission by the victim.").

[174] D.C. Code §§ 22-3002(a)(1) (first degree sexual abuse statute stating "if that person engages in or causes another person to engage in or submit to a sexual act in the following manner: (1) By using force against that other person."); 22-3004(1) (third degree sexual abuse statute stating "if that person engages in or causes sexual contact with or by another person in the following manner: (1) By using force against that other person.").

Code §§ 22-3002(a)(1) ("(a) A person shall be imprisoned for any term of years or for life, and in addition, may be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, if that person engages in or causes another person to engage in or submit to a sexual act in the following manner: (1) By using force against that other person."); 22-3004(1) ("A person shall be imprisoned for not more than 10 years and may be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, if that person engages in or causes sexual contact with or by another person in the following manner: (1) By using force against that other person.").

Code § 22-3018 provides a separate attempt statute applicable to all current sexual offenses. Under the statute, if the maximum term of imprisonment for the underlying offense is life, an attempt has a maximum term of imprisonment of 15 years.[179] Otherwise the maximum term of imprisonment is "not more than 1/2 of the maximum prison sentence authorized for the offense."[180] These attempt penalties differ from the attempt penalties established under D.C. Code § 22-1803, the current general attempt statute.[181] In the revised sexual assault statute, the RCC General Part's attempt provisions (RCC § 22E-301) establish the requirements to prove an attempt and applicable penalties for sexual assault, consistent with other offenses. While a separate attempt statute for sex offenses may be justified in the current D.C. Code given the generally lower penalties available through the general attempt statute in D.C. Code § 22-1803, the penalties in the RCC general attempt provision provide penalties at ½ the maximum imprisonment sentence, as in current D.C. Code § 22-3018. Elimination of a separate attempt statute for sex offenses, consequently, has no substantive effect on available penalties. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of revised statutes.

Fourth, the revised sexual assault statute no longer uses the phrase "threatening." Current D.C. Code first degree through fourth degree sexual abuse prohibit "threatening" specified harms.[182] Instead of "threaten," first degree and third degree of the revised sexual assault statute prohibit "communicating" specified harms, explicitly or implicitly, and second degree and fourth degree prohibit making, explicitly or implicitly, a "coercive threat," defined in RCC § 22E-701 to require a "communication." Using the term "communication" instead of "threat" or "threatens" clarifies that proof of the RCC criminal threats offense is not required and that a specified communication is sufficient for liability when it causes the complainant to engage in or submit to the sexual act or sexual contact. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statutes.

Fifth, the revised sexual assault statute no longer uses the phrase "placing . . . in reasonable fear." Current D.C. Code first degree through fourth degree sexual abuse

[179] D.C. Code § 22-3018 ("Any person who attempts to commit an offense under this subchapter shall be imprisoned for a term of years not to exceed 15 years where the maximum prison term authorized for the offense is life or for not more than 1/2 of the maximum prison sentence authorized for the offense and, in addition, may be fined an amount not to exceed 1/2 of the maximum fine authorized for the offense.").

[180] D.C. Code § 22-3018 ("Any person who attempts to commit an offense under this subchapter shall be imprisoned for a term of years not to exceed 15 years where the maximum prison term authorized for the offense is life or for not more than 1/2 of the maximum prison sentence authorized for the offense and, in addition, may be fined an amount not to exceed 1/2 of the maximum fine authorized for the offense.").

[181] D.C. Code § 22-1803 establishes general attempt penalties for offenses that do not otherwise have an attempt penalty specified. "Whoever shall attempt to commit any crime, which attempt is not otherwise made punishable by chapter 19 of An Act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901 (31 Stat. 1321), shall be punished by a fine not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or by imprisonment for not more than 180 days, or both. Except, whoever shall attempt to commit a crime of violence as defined in § 23-1331 shall be punished by a fine not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or by imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both." D.C. Code § 22-1803. Under this general attempt penalty statute, first degree sexual abuse, second degree sexual abuse, and third degree sexual abuse are "crimes of violence" and would have a maximum term of imprisonment of five years. Fourth degree sexual abuse is not "crime of violence," however, and would have a maximum term of imprisonment of 180 days.

prohibit "threatening or placing the other person in reasonable fear."[183] DCCA case law has interpreted "placing the other person in reasonable fear" as covering implicit threats.[184] First degree and third degree of the revised sexual assault statute prohibit "communicating" specified harms, explicitly or implicitly, and second degree and fourth degree prohibit making, explicitly or implicitly, a "coercive threat," defined in RCC § 22E-701 to require a "communication." The revised sexual assault statute omits "placing in . . . reasonable fear" and specifically prohibits both explicit and implicit communications of specified harms. This change improves the clarity of the revised statute.

Sixth, the revised intoxication provision in first degree and third degree sexual assault specifically includes "causes [an intoxicant] to be administered." The intoxication provision in the current D.C. Code first degree and third degree sexual abuse statutes prohibits "administering" an intoxicant.[185] It is unclear from the statute whether the defendant has to personally administer the intoxicant and there is no DCCA case law on point. For clarification, the revised intoxication provision includes the actor personally administering or causing the intoxicant to be administered. This change clarifies the revised statutes.

Seventh, first degree and third degree of the revised sexual assault statute provide liability for sexual conduct caused by administering an intoxicant without "effective consent." The intoxication prong in the current D.C. Code first degree and third degree sexual abuse statutes prohibits administering an intoxicant to the complainant by "force or threat of force, or without the knowledge or permission" of the complainant.[186] "Force" is statutorily defined in the current sex offenses,[187] but the other terms in the current intoxication provision are not. There is no DCCA case law on the intoxication provision. For clarification, the revised intoxication provision in first degree and third degree of the revised sexual assault statute requires the intoxicant to be administered "without the complainant's effective consent." The definition of "effective consent" in RCC § 22E-701 appears to include conduct that constitutes "force or threat of force"[188] or "without the knowledge or permission"[189] in the current intoxication provision and is a [184] See, e.g., Way v. United States, 982 A.2d 1135, 1137 (D.C. 2009) (finding the evidence sufficient for second degree sexual abuse that the complainant "engaged in sexual acts with appellant only because she had a reasonable fear of being arrested" and that "the jury could reasonably conclude that appellant intentionally obtained sex from [the complainant] by intimidating her with the unspoken threat of arrest.").

[185] The intoxication provision in the current first degree sexual abuse and third degree sexual abuse statutes is "After administering to that other person by force or threat of force, or without the knowledge or permission of that other person, a drug, intoxicant, or other similar substance that substantially impairs the ability of that other person to appraise or control his or her conduct." D.C. Code §§ 22-3002(a)(4); 22-3004(4).

[188] "Effective consent" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 as "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception."

[189] "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception. If an actor obtains a complainant's consent to consume an intoxicant by lying about the presence of an intoxicant or without telling the term that is used consistently throughout the RCC. This change clarifies the revised statutes.

Eighth, second degree and fourth degree sexual assault specify as a basis for liability that a complainant's inability to appraise the nature of the sexual act or sexual contact or give or withhold consent is due to "a drug, intoxicant, or other substance." The current D.C. Code second degree and fourth degree sexual abuse statutes include complainants that are "incapable of appraising the nature of" the sexual conduct.[190] This language is not statutorily defined, and there is no DCCA case law on point. However, the DCCA has stated in dicta that "incapable of appraising the nature of the conduct" for "an adult victim . . . might involve proof of the victim's intoxication or general mental incapacity."[191] This change improves the clarity consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Ninth, sub-subparagraphs (b)(2)(B)(ii) and (d)(2)(B)(ii) of second degree and fourth degree of the revised sexual assault statute include a complainant that is incapable of "understanding the right to give or withhold consent to" the sexual act or sexual contact. The current D.C. Code second degree and fourth degree sexual abuse statutes include complainants that are "incapable of appraising the nature of the conduct,"[192] as well as "incapable of declining participation in that [sexual act or sexual contact]."[193] The language is not statutorily defined and there is no DCCA case law that interprets the meaning of "the nature of the conduct" or "declining participation." The revised language clarifies that understanding the right to give or withhold consent is a crucial part of sexual conduct and a complainant's mental inability to understand this right can be a basis for liability in second degree and fourth degree of the RCC sexual assault statute. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Tenth, second and fourth degree of the revised sexual assault statute specifically include a complainant that is "[a]sleep, unconscious, or passing in and out of consciousness." The current D.C. Code second degree and fourth degree sexual abuse statutes prohibit a sexual act or sexual contact with a complainant that is "incapable of declining participation in" the sexual act or sexual contact.[194] This language is not statutorily defined further and there is no DCCA case law. The revised language clearly specifies situations when a complainant would satisfy these requirements. This change improves the clarity of the revised statute.

Eleventh, by the use of the phrase "in fact," the revised weapon penalty enhancement for the sexual assault statute applies strict liability to the fact that the object is a "dangerous weapon" or "imitation dangerous weapon." The current D.C. Code sex offense aggravators include that the "defendant was armed with, or had readily available, a pistol or other firearm (or imitation thereof) or other dangerous or deadly weapon."[195] The sex offense aggravators statute does not specify any culpable mental states. There is no DCCA case law regarding the aggravator, but DCCA case law for assault with a dangerous weapon[196] and the "while armed" enhancement in D.C. Code § 22-4502[197] support applying strict liability to the fact that the object is a "dangerous weapon" or "imitation dangerous weapon." For clarification, the revised weapons enhancement uses the phrase "in fact" to establish that strict liability applies to this element. Strict liability for this element is also consistent with the weapons gradations in other RCC offenses against persons. This change clarifies the revised statutes.

Twelfth, the revised sexual assault penalty enhancements consistently refer to the "sexual act or sexual contact" as opposed to "the offense." Several of the current D.C. Code sexual abuse aggravators refer to "at the time of the offense"[198] or "as a result of the offense."[199] The revised penalty enhancements consistently refer to the sexual act or sexual contact, improving the clarity of the revised statute.

Thirteenth, second degree and fourth degree of the revised sexual assault statute include a complainant that is incapable of communicating "willingness or unwillingness to engage in" the sexual act or sexual contact and a complainant that is "substantially paralyzed." The current D.C. Code second degree[200] and fourth degree[201] sexual abuse statutes include complainants that are "[i]ncapable of communicating unwillingness to engage in" the sexual act or sexual contact. This language is not statutorily defined, and there is no DCCA case law on point. The revised language clarifies that the relevant determination is whether the complainant is incapable of communicating in the context of sexual activity, not whether the complainant specifically unable to decline sexual activity, physically resist, or otherwise communicate unwillingness, and includes complainants that are substantially paralyzed. This change improves the clarity of the revised statutes.

Fourteenth, first degree and third degree of the revised sexual assault statute prohibit threats of "confinement" as opposed to threats of "kidnapping." The current

D.C. Code first degree[202] and third degree[203] sexual abuse statutes require threats of "kidnapping" and it is unclear whether this refers to and incorporates the elements of the current kidnapping statute in D.C. Code § 22-2001. The RCC kidnapping offense (RCC § 22E-1401), however, requires confinement with intent to inflict an additional harm on the complainant, and narrows the scope. The word "confinement" more clearly communicates that threats of confinement are sufficient for first degree and third degree of the revised sexual assault statute, without reference to the specific elements of the RCC kidnapping offense. This change improves the clarity of the revised statutes.

RCC § 22E-1302. Sexual Abuse of a Minor.

Explanatory Note. The RCC sexual abuse of a minor offense prohibits specified acts of sexual penetration or sexual touching when the complainant is under the age of 18 years. The penalty gradations are primarily based on the nature of the sexual conduct, as well as the age of the complainant. The revised sexual abuse of a minor offense replaces four distinct offenses in the current D.C. Code: first degree sexual abuse of a child,[1] second degree sexual abuse of a child,[2] first degree sexual abuse of a minor,[3] and second degree sexual abuse of a minor.[4] The revised sexual abuse of a minor offense also replaces in relevant part five distinct provisions for the sexual abuse offenses: the marriage and domestic partnership defense,[5] the state of mind proof requirement,[6] the attempt statute,[7] the limitation on prosecutorial immunity,[8] and the aggravating sentencing factors.[9] Insofar as they are applicable to sexual abuse of a child and sexual abuse of a minor, the revised sexual abuse of a minor offense also replaces the enhancement for committing offenses while armed,[10] the enhancement for committing offenses against minors,[11] certain minimum statutory penalties,[12] and the heightened penalties and aggravating circumstances in D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b-2).

First degree sexual abuse of a minor (subsection (a)), second degree sexual abuse of a minor (subsection (b)), and third degree sexual abuse of a minor (subsection (c)), each require that the actor engage in a "sexual act" with the complainant or cause the complainant to engage in or submit to a "sexual act." "Sexual act" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that specifies types of sexual penetration or contact between the mouth and certain body parts.

Paragraph (a)(1) specifies the prohibited conduct for first degree sexual abuse of a minor—engaging in a "sexual act" with the complainant or causing the complainant to engage in or submit to a "sexual act." Paragraph (a)(1) specifies a culpable mental state of "knowingly" for this conduct. "Knowingly," a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 means here that the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she engages in a "sexual act" with the complainant or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to a "sexual act." Paragraph (a)(2) uses the phrase "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, "in fact" applies to the elements in subparagraph (a)(2)(A) and subparagraph (a)(2)(B). Subparagraph (a)(2)(A) specifies that the complainant must be under 12 years of age and subparagraph (a)(2)(B) specifies that the actor must be at least four years older than the complainant. There is no culpable mental state required for either the age of the complainant or the age gap.

Paragraph (b)(1) specifies the prohibited conduct for second degree sexual abuse of a minor—engaging in a "sexual act" with the complainant or causing the complainant to engage in or submit to a "sexual act." Paragraph (b)(1) specifies a culpable mental state of "knowingly" for this conduct. "Knowingly," a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 means here that the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she engages in a "sexual act" with the complainant or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to a "sexual act." Paragraph (b)(2) uses the phrase "in fact," a defined term that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, "in fact" applies to the elements in subparagraph (b)(2)(A) and subparagraph (b)(2)(B). Subparagraph (b)(2)(A) specifies that the complainant must be under 16 years of age and subparagraph (b)(2)(B) specifies that the actor must be at least four years older than the complainant. There is no culpable mental state required for either the age of the complainant or the age gap.

Paragraph (c)(1) specifies the prohibited conduct for third degree sexual abuse of a minor—engaging in a "sexual act" with the complainant or causing the complainant to engage in or submit to a "sexual act." Paragraph (c)(1) specifies a culpable mental state of "knowingly" for this conduct. "Knowingly," a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 means here that the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she engages in a "sexual act" with the complainant or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to a "sexual act." Paragraph (c)(2) requires that the actor be in a "position of trust with or authority over the" the complainant. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" culpable mental state in paragraph (c)(1) applies to this element. "Knowingly," a defined term in RCC § 22E-206, here requires that the actor be "practically certain" that he or she is in a position of trust with or authority over" the complainant. "Position of trust with or authority over" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that includes individuals such as parents, siblings, school employees, and coaches. Paragraph (c)(3) uses the phrase "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, "in fact" applies to the elements in subparagraph (c)(3)(A) and subparagraph (c)(3)(B). Subparagraph (c)(3)(A) specifies that the complainant must be under 18 years of age and subparagraph (c)(3)(B) specifies that the actor must be 18 years of age or older and at least four years older than the complainant. There is no culpable mental state required for the age of the complainant, the age of the actor, or the age gap.

Fourth degree sexual abuse of a minor (subsection (d)), fifth degree sexual abuse of a minor (subsection (e)), and sixth degree sexual abuse of a minor (subsection (f)), are identical to first degree sexual abuse of a minor, second degree sexual abuse of a minor, and third degree sexual abuse of a minor except that they require that the actor engage in a "sexual contact" with the complainant or cause the complainant to engage in or submit to "sexual contact" instead of "sexual act." "Sexual contact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means touching the specified body parts, such as genitalia, of any person with the desire to sexually abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, arouse, or gratify any person. Paragraph (d)(1), paragraph (e)(1), and paragraph (f)(1) each specify a culpable mental state of "knowingly" for engaging in a "sexual contact" with the complainant or causing the complainant to engage in or submit to "sexual contact." "Knowingly," a defined term in RCC § 22E-206, means here that the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she engages in a "sexual contact" with the complainant or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to "sexual contact." The requirements for the complainant and the actor in fourth degree sexual abuse of a minor (paragraph (d)(2), subparagraph (d)(2)(A), subparagraph (d)(2)(B)) are the same as the requirements in first degree sexual abuse of a minor (paragraph (a)(2), subparagraph (a)(2)(A), subparagraph (a)(2)(B)). The requirements for the complainant and the actor in fifth degree sexual abuse of a minor (paragraph (e)(2), subparagraph (e)(2)(A), subparagraph (e)(2)(B)) are the same as the requirements in second degree sexual abuse of a minor (paragraph (b)(2), subparagraph (b)(2)(A), subparagraph (b)(2)(B)). The requirements for the complainant and the actor in sixth degree sexual abuse of a minor (paragraph (f)(2)), paragraph (f)(3), subparagraph (f)(3)(A), subparagraph (f)(3)(B)) are the same as the requirements in third degree sexual abuse of a minor paragraph (c)(2)), paragraph (c)(3), subparagraph (c)(3)(A), subparagraph (c)(3)(B)).

Subsection (g) codifies three affirmative defenses for the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute. The general provision in RCC § 22E-201 establishes the requirements for the burden of production and the burden of proof for all affirmative defenses in the RCC.

Paragraph (g)(1) establishes an affirmative defense for conduct involving only the actor and the complainant that the actor and the complainant are, "in fact," in a marriage or "domestic partnership" at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact. "Domestic partnership" is defined in RCC § 22E-701. "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element, here that the actor and the complainant are in a marriage or domestic partnership at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact.

Paragraph (g)(2) codifies an affirmative defense for a reasonable mistake of age for second degree sexual abuse of a minor (subsection (b)) and fifth degree sexual abuse of a minor (subsection (e)). There are several requirements for the affirmative defense. Per subparagraph (g)(2)(A), the actor must reasonably believe[13] that the complainant is 16 years of age or older at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact. Paragraph (g)(2) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element. Per the rule of construction in RCC § 22E-207, the "in fact" specified in paragraph (g)(2) applies to subparagraph (g)(2)(A), and no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to subparagraph (g)(2)(A). However, the actor must subjectively believe, and that belief must be reasonable, that the actor has the required effective consent. Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[14] Subparagraph (g)(2)(B) requires that the actor's reasonable belief be based on an oral or written statement that the complainant made to the actor about the complainant's age. Subparagraph (g)(2)(C) requires that the complainant is 14 years of age or older at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact. Per the rule of construction in RCC § 22E-207, the "in fact" specified in paragraph (g)(2) applies to subparagraph (g)(2)(B) and subparagraph (g)(2)(C) and no culpable mental state applies to the elements in these subparagraphs—that the actor's reasonable belief is based on the required statement and that the complainant is 14 years of age or older at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact.

Paragraph (g)(3) codifies an affirmative defense for a reasonable mistake of age for third degree sexual abuse of a minor (subsection (c)) and sixth degree sexual abuse of a minor (subsection (f)). There are several requirements for the affirmative defense. Per subparagraph (g)(3)(A), the actor must reasonably believe[15] that the complainant is 18 years of age or older at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact. Paragraph (g)(3) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element. Per the rule of construction in RCC § 22E-207, the "in fact" specified in paragraph (g)(3) applies to subparagraph (g)(3)(A), and no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to subparagraph (g)(3)(A). However, the actor must subjectively believe, and that belief must be reasonable, that the actor has the required effective consent. Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[16] Subparagraph (g)(3)(B) requires that the actor's reasonable belief be based on an oral or written statement that the complainant made to the actor about the complainant's age. Subparagraph (g)(3)(C) requires that the complainant is 16 years of age or older at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact. Per the rule of construction in RCC § 22E-207, the "in fact" specified in paragraph (g)(3) applies to subparagraph (g)(3)(B) and subparagraph (g)(3)(C) and no culpable mental state applies to the elements in these subparagraphs—that the actor's reasonable belief is based on the required statement and that the complainant is 16 years of age or older at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact.

There is no affirmative defense for reasonable mistake of age for first degree sexual abuse of a minor (subsection (a)) or fourth degree sexual abuse of a minor (subsection (d)) when the complainant is under the age of 12 years.

Paragraph (h)(1) through paragraph (h)(6) specify relevant penalties for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Paragraph (h)(7) codifies several penalty enhancements for first degree, second degree, fourth degree, and fifth degree of the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute. If any of the specified enhancements apply, the penalty classification for that gradation is increased by one class. Subparagraph (h)(7)(A) codifies a penalty enhancement for recklessly causing the sexual act or sexual contact by displaying or using an object that, in fact, is a "dangerous weapon" or "imitation dangerous weapon." "Displaying or using" a weapon "should be broadly construed to include making a weapon known by sight, sound, or touch. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the culpable mental state of recklessly applies to both causing the sexual act or sexual contact and causing the sexual act or sexual contact by displaying or using an object. "Recklessly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means that the actor is aware of a substantial risk that he or she caused the sexual conduct by displaying or using an object. "In fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to whether the object is a "dangerous weapon" or "imitation dangerous weapon" as those terms are defined in RCC § 22E-701.

Subparagraph (h)(7)(B) codifies a penalty enhancement if the actor "knowingly" acted with one or more accomplices that were physically present at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact. "Knowingly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she acted with one or more accomplices that were physically present at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact. Subparagraph (h)(7)(C) codifies a penalty enhancement if the actor "recklessly" caused "serious bodily injury" to the complainant immediately before, during, or immediately after the sexual act or sexual contact. "Recklessly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means that the actor is aware of a substantial risk that he or she caused "serious bodily injury" to the complainant immediately before, during, or immediately after the sexual act or sexual contact "Serious bodily injury" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means injury involving a substantial risk of death, or protracted and obvious disfigurement, or protracted loss or impairment of the function of a bodily member or organ, or protracted unconsciousness. Subparagraph (h)(7)(D) codifies a penalty enhancement if the actor knows at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact that the actor is in a "position of trust with or authority over the complainant." "Knowingly," a defined term in RCC § 22E-206, here requires that the actor be "practically certain" that he or she is in a position of trust with or authority over" the complainant. "Position of trust with or authority over" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that includes individuals such as parents, siblings, school employees, and coaches.

Paragraph (h)(8) codifies several penalty enhancements for third degree and sixth degree of the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute. If any of the specified enhancements apply, the penalty classification for that gradation is increased by one class. The penalty gradations in subparagraph (h)(8)(A), (h)(8)(B), and (h)(8)(C) are the same as the penalty gradations discussed above in subparagraph (h)(7)(A), (h)(7)(B), and (h)(7)(C).

Subsection (i) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised sexual abuse of a minor statute clearly changes current District law in eight main ways.

First, the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute provides separate gradations for a complainant under the age of 12 years when the actor is at least four years older than the complainant. The current D.C. Code child sexual abuse statutes only require that the complainant be under the age of 16 years when the actor is at least four years older.[17] The current D.C. Code sex offense aggravators provide a penalty enhancement for when the complainant was "under the age of 12 years at the time of the offense."[18] In contrast, first degree and fourth degree of the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute provide gradations for a complainant under the age of 12 years when the actor is at least four years older. A more serious gradation for harming a complainant under the age of 12 years is consistent with the current penalty enhancement for complainants of such an age. The four year age gap matches the age gap in the current D.C. Code child sexual abuse statutes[19] and the other gradations of the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute.

Second, third degree and sixth degree of the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute require that the actor be at least four years older than the complainant and, by use of the phrase "in fact," require strict liability for this age gap. The current D.C. Code sexual abuse of a minor statutes require that the complainant be under the age of 18 years and that the actor be 18 years of age or older and in a "significant relationship" with the complainant.[20] Unlike the current child sexual abuse statutes, which require at least a [18] D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(1) ("Any person who is found guilty of an offense under this subchapter may receive a penalty up to 1 1/2 times the maximum penalty prescribed for the particular offense, and may receive a sentence of more than 30 years up to, and including life imprisonment without possibility of release for first degree sexual abuse or first degree child sexual abuse, if any of the following aggravating circumstances exists: (1) The victim was under the age of 12 years at the time of the offense."). First degree child sexual abuse has a maximum term of imprisonment of 30 years. D.C. Code §§ 22-3008 (first degree child sexual abuse); 22-3001(3) (defining "child" as a "person who has not yet attained the age of 16 years."). A person convicted of first degree child sexual abuse when the child is under 12 years of age "may" face a maximum term of imprisonment of 45 years or life imprisonment without the possibility of release. Second degree child sexual abuse has a maximum term of imprisonment of 10 years. D.C. Code §§ 22-3009 (second degree child sexual abuse); 22-3001(3) (defining "child" as a "person who has not yet attained the age of 16 years."). A person convicted of second degree child sexual abuse when the child is under 12 years of age "may" face a maximum term of imprisonment of 15 years.

[19] D.C. Code §§ 22-3008 (first degree child sexual abuse); 22-3009 (second degree child sexual abuse); 22-3001(3) (defining "child" as a "person who has not yet attained the age of 16 years.").

four year age gap between the actor and the complainant,[21] the current D.C. Code sexual abuse of a minor statutes do not have a required age gap. In contrast, third degree and sixth degree of the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute require at least a four year age gap between the actor and complainant and, by use of the phrase "in fact," require strict liability for this age gap. The current definition of "significant relationship"[22] and the revised definition of "position of trust with or authority over" (RCC § 22E-701) include a broad range of custodial and non-custodial relationships, and without an age gap between the complainant and the actor, otherwise consensual sexual conduct between individuals close in age would be criminal.[23] While the special relationship between the actor and the complainant may be sufficient to make such consensual sexual conduct criminal, in some contexts, the Council has recognized that consensual sexual activity between persons close in age should not be criminal.[24] Strict liability for the age gap matches the current D.C. Code sexual abuse of a child statutes,[25] the other gradations of the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1302), and the revised sexually suggestive

[22] D.C. Code § 22-3001(10) ("'Significant relationship' includes: (A) A parent, sibling, aunt, uncle, or grandparent, whether related by blood, marriage, domestic partnership, or adoption; (B) A legal or de facto guardian or any person, more than 4 years older than the victim, who resides intermittently or permanently in the same dwelling as the victim; (C) The person or the spouse, domestic partner, or paramour of the person who is charged with any duty or responsibility for the health, welfare, or supervision of the victim at the time of the act; and (D) Any employee or volunteer of a school, church, synagogue, mosque, or other religious institution, or an educational, social, recreational, athletic, musical, charitable, or youth facility, organization, or program, including a teacher, coach, counselor, clergy, youth leader, chorus director, bus driver, administrator, or support staff, or any other person in a position of trust with or authority over a child or a minor.").

[23] For example, a 19 year old camp counselor who, with consent and in the context of a dating relationship, touches the buttocks of a 17 year old with "intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, or arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person" may be guilty of second degree sexual abuse of a minor under current District law.

[24] For example, current D.C. Code § 22-3011 provides that marriage or domestic partnership between the actor and the complainant is a defense to charges under the District's current child sexual abuse, sexual abuse of a minor, sexually suggestive conduct with a minor, and enticing statutes and corresponding RCC § 22E-1302 provides that marriage is a defense to the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute. Also, in the original Anti-Sexual Abuse Act of 1994, the Council of the District of Columbia inserted the four year age gap requirement in the current child sexual abuse statutes "recognizing, but not condoning the sexual curiousity [sic] which exists among young persons of similar ages." Council of the District of Columbia, Report of the Committee on the Judiciary, Bill 10-87, the "Anti-Sexual Abuse Act of 1994 at 15. The current sexual abuse of a minor statutes were enacted in 2007. Omnibus Public Safety Amendment Act of 2006, 2006 District of Columbia Laws 16-306 (Act 16-482).

conduct with a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1304). This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised sexual assault of a minor offense.

Third, the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute provides an affirmative defense for a reasonable mistake of age in certain circumstances when the complainant is under the age of 16 years or under the age of 18 years. Current D.C. Code § 22-3012 establishes strict liability for the age of the complainant in the current child sexual abuse statutes[26] (complainant under the age of 16 years) and current D.C. Code § 22-3011 establishes strict liability for the age of the complainant in the current sexual abuse of a minor statutes[27] (complainant under the age of 18 years). In contrast, the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute codifies an affirmative defense to the equivalent gradations in the revised statute—second degree, third degree, fifth degree, and sixth degree sexual abuse of a minor. The accused must reasonably believe that the complainant was 16 years of age or older or 18 years of age or older at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact. The belief must be based on an oral or written statement that the complainant made to the actor about the complainant's age,[28] and the complainant must be 14 or 16 years of age or older at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact. This change removes liability for an otherwise consensual sexual act or sexual contact between two people where the actor makes a reasonable mistake as to the complainant's age that is limited to one or two years and supported by the complainant's own representation as to their age. Applying strict liability to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is strongly disfavored by courts[29] and legal experts[30] for any non-regulatory crimes,

The current child sexual abuse statutes are codified at D.C. Code § 22-3008 and D.C. Code § 22-3009, and fall within the specified range of statutes.

[27] D.C. Code § 22-3011 states that "mistake of age" is not a defense "to a prosecution under §§ 22-3008 to 22-3010.01. D.C. Code § 22-3011(a). The current sexual abuse of a minor statutes are codified at D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.01 and 22-3009.02 and fall within the specified range of statutes. The current sexual abuse of a minor statutes were enacted in 2007 and D.C. Code § 22-3011 was amended in 2007 to include them. Omnibus Public Safety Amendment Act of 2006, 2006 District of Columbia Laws 16-306 (Act 16-482).

[28] The statement does not need to be a statement that the complainant is a specific, numerical age. The RCC reasonable mistake of age requires that the statement be "about" the complainant's age and statements such as "I'm old enough to drink," "I got into this bar, didn't I?" when carding is required for entry, or "I'm old enough to vote" would be sufficient for this requirement, although the other requirements of the defense must still be met. Showing a fake or altered written document of age, such as a fake driver's license, would also be a written statement "about" the complainant's age. Whether the complainant's statement is oral or written, however, the actor's belief as to age must still be proven reasonable.

It is inefficacious because conduct unaccompanied by an awareness of the factors making it criminal does not mark the actor as one who needs to be subjected to punishment in order to deter him or others from although "statutory rape" laws are often an exception.[31] Requiring, at a minimum, a knowing culpable mental state for the elements of an offense that make otherwise legal conduct illegal is a generally accepted legal principle.[32] However, recklessness has been upheld in some cases as a minimal basis for punishing morally culpable crime.[33] An affirmative defense requiring reasonableness is akin to requiring recklessness,[34] but places the initial burden of proof on the accused. The RCC general provision in RCC § 22E-201 establishes the burdens of production and proof for all affirmative defenses in the RCC. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised sexual abuse of a minor offense.

Fourth, the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute specifies one set of offense-specific penalty enhancements that is capped at a penalty increase of one class. Current D.C. Code § 22-3020 specifies aggravators that apply to all of the current sex offense statutes,[35] D.C. Code § 22-3611 provides a separate penalty enhancement for committing child sexual abuse against complainants under the age of 18 years,[36] and D.C. Code § 22-4502 provides separate penalty enhancements for committing child sexual abuse against complainants when "armed with" or having "readily available" a deadly or dangerous behaving similarly in the future, nor does it single him out as a socially dangerous individual who needs to be incapacitated or reformed. It is unjust because the actor is subjected to the stigma of a criminal conviction without being morally blameworthy. [35] The relevant sex offense statutes addressed in RCC Chapter 13 are: First degree through fourth degree sexual abuse (D.C. Code §§ 22-3002 through 22-3005), misdemeanor sexual abuse (D.C. Code § 22-3006), child sexual abuse (D.C. Code §§ 22-3008 and 22-3009), sexual abuse of a minor (D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.01 and 22-3009.02), sexual abuse of a secondary education student (D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.03 and 22-3009.04), misdemeanor sexual abuse of a child or minor (D.C. Code § 22-3010.01), sexual abuse of a ward (D.C. Code §§ 22-3013 and 22-3014), sexual abuse of a patient or client (D.C. Code §§ 22-3015 and 22-3016), enticing a minor (D.C. Code § 22-3010), and arranging for sexual contact with a real or fictitious child (D.C. Code § 22-3010.01). Two of the six possible aggravators are age-based. D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(1) (victim under 12 years of age); D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(2) (victim under 18 years of age and in a "significant relationship" with actor). Three of the six possible aggravators concern circumstances indicating the presence of greater force, fraud, or coercion. D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(3) (victim sustained "serious bodily injury."); D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(4) (accomplices aided the crime); D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(6) (defendant was armed with a deadly or dangerous weapon). The remaining aggravator, D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(5) concerns repeat offenders.

weapon.[37] Current District statutes are silent as to whether or how these different penalty enhancements can each be applied to an offense, although DCCA case law suggests that the age-based sex offense aggravators and separate penalty enhancement may not apply to certain sex offenses because they overlap with elements of the offense.[38] In contrast, the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute specifies a single set of enhancements that is capped at a penalty increase of one class.[39] The penalty enhancements are generally identical to the penalty enhancements in the RCC sexual assault statute, the main difference being the RCC sexual abuse of a minor statute excludes or limits the applicability of the penalty enhancements that overlap with the requirements of the RCC sexual abuse of a minor offense.[40] The RCC sexual abuse of a minor penalty enhancements result in several changes in law. First, the RCC sexual abuse of a minor statute is no longer subject to the current sex offense aggravators that overlap with the age requirements of the offense, or the current penalty enhancement in D.C. Code § 22-3611 for committing child sexual abuse against complainants under the age of 18 years.

[37] D.C. Code § 22-4502.

[38] DCCA case law in the context of the District's current assault with a dangerous weapon offense (ADW) suggests that the age-based sex offense aggravators and age-based penalty enhancements may not be applied to the current sexual abuse of a child statutes, sexual abuse of a minor statutes, misdemeanor sexual abuse of a child or minor statute, or enticing statute because they overlap with elements of these offenses. The DCCA has held that ADW may not be enhanced with the current "while armed" enhancement in D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(1) because each provision requires the use of a "dangerous weapon." McCall v. United States, 449 A.2d 1095, 1096 (D.C. 1982) ("The government concedes that [current D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(1)] may not apply to ADW since [ADW] provides for enhancement and is a more specific and lenient provision."); see also Gathy v. United States, 754 A.2d 912, 916 n.5 (D.C. 2000) ("In McCall we held that section [current D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(1)] could not be applied to a charge of ADW because the use of 'a dangerous weapon' is already included as an element of that offense, so that 'ADW while armed'-i.e. assault with a dangerous weapon while armed with a dangerous weapon-would be redundant.").

[39] Note, however, that subtitle I of the RCC specifies certain penalty enhancements (e.g., hate crime) that may apply in addition to the penalty enhancements specified in the revised sexual abuse of a minor offense.

[40] The RCC sexual abuse of a minor statute codifies the following penalty enhancements from the RCC sexual assault penalty enhancements: 1) causing the sexual act or sexual contact by displaying or using a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon; 2) acting with one or more accomplices that are physically present at the sexual act or sexual contact; and 3) causing serious bodily injury immediately before, during, or immediately after the sexual act or sexual contact. These penalty enhancements apply to any gradation of the RCC sexual abuse of a minor offense. In the alternative, for first degree, second degree, fourth degree, and fifth degree of the RCC sexual abuse of a minor offense, the RCC sexual abuse of a minor statute codifies as a penalty enhancement that the actor knows that he or she is in a "position of trust with or authority" over the complainant. The requirements for liability in first degree, second degree, fourth degree, and fifth degree of the RCC sexual abuse of a minor statute encompass the additional requirements for this enhancement in the RCC sexual assault statute—that the complainant is under the age of 18 years and the actor is at least four years older. The enhancement in the RCC sexual abuse of a minor statute requires a knowledge culpable mental state for the fact that the actor is in a position of trust with or authority over the complainant, as opposed to recklessness in the sexual assault penalty enhancement, because the RCC sexual abuse of a minor statute criminalizes otherwise consensual sexual conduct on the basis of the age of the parties. Third degree and sixth degree of the RCC sexual abuse of a minor statute also requires a knowledge culpable mental state for liability for this element.
The RCC sexual abuse of a minor statute also does not codify the RCC sexual assault penalty enhancements for a complainant that is an 65 years of age or older or for a complainant that is a "vulnerable adult," as that term is defined in RCC § 22-701, because these enhancements are inapplicable to the RCC sexual abuse of a minor statute.

Second, because the revised statute incorporates multiple enhancements in the offense, the statute clarifies that it is not possible to enhance sexual abuse of a minor with, for example, both a weapon enhancement and an enhancement based on the identity of the complainant, or to double-stack different weapon penalties[41] and offenses. Third, the scope of the revised weapons aggravator is slightly narrower than the current "while armed" enhancement as it pertains to mere possession[42] and excludes objects the complainant incorrectly perceives as being a dangerous weapon.[43] This change improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

Fifth, first degree and second degree of the RCC sexual abuse of a minor statute[44] are no longer subject to the heightened penalties and aggravating circumstances in current D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b-2). Current D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b-2) establishes heightened penalties for first degree sexual abuse of a child and first degree sexual abuse of a child while armed if specified procedural requirements are met[45] and "one or more aggravating

[41] In addition to the "while armed" enhancement in D.C. Code § 22-4502(a) applicable to child sexual abuse and first degree, second degree, and third degree sexual abuse, the current sex offense aggravators include an aggravator if "the defendant was armed with, or had readily available, a pistol or other firearm (or imitation thereof) or other dangerous or deadly weapon." D.C. D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(6).

[42] The current "while armed" enhancement applies if the actor merely has "readily available" a dangerous weapon. D.C. Code § 22-4502(a). Having a dangerous weapon "readily available" is insufficient for the revised weapon aggravator in the sexual assault abuse of a minor statute. However, possessing a dangerous weapon or a firearm during sexual abuse of a minor, without using or displaying it, may have liability under the revised possession of a dangerous weapon during a crime of violence statute (RCC § 22E-4104) or other RCC weapons offenses.

[43] The current "while armed" enhancement in D.C. Code § 22-4502 includes the use of objects that the complaining witness incorrectly perceives to be a dangerous or deadly weapon. See, e.g., Paris v. United States, 515 A.2d 199, 204 (D.C. 1986) ("In this jurisdiction, any object which the victim perceives to have the apparent ability to produce great bodily harm can be considered a dangerous weapon."). The definitions of "dangerous weapon" and "imitation dangerous weapon" in RCC § 22E-701 exclude these objects.

[44] As will be discussed, current D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b-2) authorizes enhanced penalties for first degree sexual abuse of a child and first degree sexual abuse of a child while armed, and the RCC replaces those enhanced penalties. In the RCC, however, there is no longer a first degree sexual abuse of a child "while armed" offense. First, in the RCC, the equivalent offenses to first degree sexual abuse of a child are first degree and second degree sexual abuse of a minor. Second, the RCC no longer has a "while armed" version of child sexual abuse. Depending on the facts of the case, the equivalent offense would be first degree or second degree sexual abuse of a minor with the weapons enhancement under subsection (h) of the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute or first degree or second degree sexual abuse of a minor with additional liability under the revised possession of a dangerous weapon during a crime of violence statute (RCC § 22E-4104) or other RCC weapons offenses. For clarity, the commentary for this entry refers only to first degree sexual abuse of a minor and second degree sexual abuse of a minor when discussing the relevant RCC statutes, even though the various forms of liability for committing these offenses with the use or presence of a weapon are also affected by the revision.

[45] D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b-2) ("(1) The court may impose a sentence in excess of 60 years for first degree murder or first degree murder while armed, 40 years for second degree murder or second degree murder while armed, or 30 years for armed carjacking, first degree sexual abuse, first degree sexual abuse while armed, first degree child sexual abuse or first degree child sexual abuse while armed, only if: (A) Thirty-days prior to trial or the entry of a plea of guilty, the prosecutor files an indictment or information with the clerk of the court and a copy of such indictment or information is served on the person or counsel for the person, stating in writing one or more aggravating circumstances to be relied upon; and (B) One or more aggravating circumstances exist beyond a reasonable doubt.").

circumstances exist beyond a reasonable doubt."[46] In contrast, the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute is subject to a single set of aggravators for the revised statute, as well as the general enhancements in the RCC for repeat offenders (RCC § 22E-606), hate crimes (RCC § 22E-607), and pretrial release (RCC § 22E-608). As a result of this revision, the general aggravating circumstances in D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b-2) no longer apply to first degree sexual abuse of a minor and second degree sexual abuse of a minor, although several of them are covered by other provisions in the RCC.[47] The special procedures in D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b-2) to give notice to a defendant are unnecessary because aggravating circumstances must be charged in the criminal indictment per [46] The aggravating circumstances that apply to first degree sexual abuse of a child are unclear. D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b-2)(2) establishes that the "[a]ggravating circumstances for first degree child sexual abuse . . . are set forth in § 22-3020," but the statute also codifies an additional set of aggravating circumstances that apply to "all offenses." It is unclear whether first degree sexual abuse of a child is included in "all offenses" and is subject to the additional set of aggravating circumstances, or if "all offenses" is limited to the offenses for which D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b-2) authorizes an enhanced penalty that do not have offense-specific aggravating circumstances. The aggravating circumstances that apply for first degree sexual abuse of a child while armed are similarly unclear. D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b-2)(2) does not specify whether first degree sexual abuse of a child while armed is included in the reference to first degree sexual abuse of a child and the aggravating circumstances in D.C. Code § 22-3020, or if it is subject only to the additional set of aggravating circumstances for "all offenses." Regardless, the revised sexual assault statute replaces the aggravating circumstances in D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b-2) insofar as they are applicable to first degree sexual abuse of a child and first degree sexual abuse of a child while armed. The revised sexual assault statute also replaces the aggravating circumstances in D.C. Code § 22-3020, which is discussed elsewhere in this commentary as a substantive change in law.

[47] The general aggravating circumstances in D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b-2)(2) are: "(A) The offense was committed because of the victim's race, color, religion, national origin, sexual orientation, or gender identity or expression (as defined in § 2-1401.02(12A); (B) The offense was committed because the victim was or had been a witness in any criminal investigation or judicial proceeding or was capable of providing or had provided assistance in any criminal investigation or judicial proceeding; (C) The offense was committed for the purpose of avoiding or preventing a lawful arrest or effecting an escape from custody; (D) The offense was especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel; (E) The offense involved a drive-by or random shooting; (F) The offense was committed after substantial planning; (G) The victim was less than 12 years old or more than 60 years old or vulnerable because of mental or physical infirmity; [and] (H) Except where death or serious bodily injury is an element of the offense, the victim sustained serious bodily injury as a result of the offense." D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b-2)(2).

In the RCC, none of these aggravating circumstances apply to first degree or second degree of the revised sexual abuse of a minor offense. However, first degree or second degree of the revised sexual abuse of a minor offense is subject to two penalty enhancements that are substantially similar to two of the aggravating circumstances—the general penalty enhancement for hate crimes in RCC § 22E-607 and the sexual abuse of a minor penalty enhancement for recklessly causing serious bodily injury to the complainant (sub-subparagraph (h)(7)(A)(iii)). In addition, first degree and second degree sexual abuse of a minor already grade the offense based on the complainant being under 12 years of age.

The remaining aggravators in D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b-2)(2) appear better suited for the homicide offenses that are subject to enhanced penalties in the statute: "(B) The offense was committed because the victim was or had been a witness in any criminal investigation or judicial proceeding or was capable of providing or had provided assistance in any criminal investigation or judicial proceeding; (C) The offense was committed for the purpose of avoiding or preventing a lawful arrest or effecting an escape from custody; (D) The offense was especially heinous, atrocious, or cruel; (E) The offense involved a drive-by or random shooting; (F) The offense was committed after substantial planning." To the extent that these aggravators would apply to first degree and second degree sexual abuse of a minor, other offenses in the RCC may cover the conduct, such as [RCC §§ 22E-XXX obstruction of justice] or are more appropriate for consideration at sentencing.

Supreme Court case law decided after passage of the District statute.[48] This revision improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised sexual assault of a minor statute.

Sixth, the revised sexual assault statute replaces certain minimum statutory penalties for child sexual abuse in D.C. Code § 24-403.01(e).[49] These minimum statutory penalties require specified prior convictions, and it is unclear how the general recidivist statutes in the current D.C. Code[50] apply, if at all, to these provisions. There is no clear rationale for such special sentencing provisions in these offenses as compared to other offenses. In contrast, the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute is subject to a single recidivist penalty enhancement in RCC § 22E-606 that applies to all offenses in the RCC. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense.

Seventh, the revised sexual abuse of a minor penalty enhancement for weapons requires that the actor "recklessly" caused the sexual act or sexual contact by "displaying" or "using" an object that, in fact, is a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon. The current weapons aggravator for the current D.C. Code sex offense statutes requires that the "defendant was armed with, or had readily available, a pistol or other firearm (or imitation thereof) or other dangerous or deadly weapon."[51] No culpable mental state is specified, and there is no DCCA case law interpreting the current weapons aggravator.[52] In addition to the sex offense weapons aggravator, current D.C. Code § 22-4502 provides severe, additional penalties for committing, attempting, soliciting, or conspiring to commit first degree, second degree, and third degree sexual abuse[53] "while armed" or "having readily available" a dangerous weapon.[54] In contrast,

[52] However, there is DCCA case law interpreting the repealed armed rape offense that may inform how the DCCA would interpret the current armed aggravator. The previous armed rape offense required that the defendant commit rape "when armed with or [when] having readily available any . . . dangerous or deadly weapon," which is the same language in the current armed aggravator. Johnson v. United States, 613 A.2d 888, 897 (D.C. 1992) (quoting D.C. Code § 22-3202(a) (1989 & 1991 Suppl.)). In Johnson v. United States, the appellant did not actually use the dangerous weapon during the sexual assault, but used the dangerous weapon prior to the sexual assault to injure the complainant and the weapon was present in the room at the time of the sexual assault. Johnson v. United States, 613 A.2d 888, 891, 898 (D.C. 1992). The DCCA held that "the government satisfied its burden of proving the 'armed' element by demonstrating that the coercive element of the sexual assault arose directly from appellant's use of a dangerous weapon." Johnson, 613 A.2d at 898. Although the armed rape offense has been repealed, Johnson may support requiring a causation element in the current armed aggravator for the sexual abuse statutes because of the identical "while armed" language.

the revised sexual abuse of a minor penalty enhancement requires that the actor "recklessly" caused the sexual act or sexual contact "by displaying" or "using" an object that, in fact, is a dangerous weapon or imitation weapon.[55] The revised enhancement is narrower than the current D.C. Code sex offense aggravator because it requires the use or display of the weapon, and also requires that the use or display of the weapon caused the sexual activity. An actor that is merely "armed with" or "had readily available" a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon may still face liability under the RCC weapons offenses as well as liability for second degree or fourth degree of the revised sexual assault statute for a "coercive threat." The "recklessly" culpable mental state is consistent with weapons gradations in other RCC offenses against persons. The revised enhancement includes imitation dangerous weapons because in the context of sexual assault, an imitation dangerous weapon can be as coercive as a real dangerous weapon. This change improves the proportionality of the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute.

Eighth, the revised sexual abuse of a minor penalty enhancement for causing serious bodily injury, due to the revised definition of "serious bodily injury," no longer includes rendering a complainant "unconscious," causing "extreme physical pain," or impairment of a "mental faculty." The current D.C. Code sex offense aggravator for causing serious bodily injury[56] incorporates the current definition of "serious bodily injury" for the sex offenses, which includes "unconsciousness, extreme physical pain . . . or protracted loss or impairment of the function of a . . . mental faculty."[57] As is discussed in the commentary to the revised definition of "serious bodily injury" in RCC § 22E-701, these provisions in the current definition are difficult to measure and may include within the definition physical harms that otherwise fall short of the high standard the definition requires. In contrast, the revised definition of "serious bodily injury," and the revised penalty enhancement using that term, are limited to a substantial risk of death, protracted and obvious disfigurement, protracted loss or impairment of the function of a [54] For a first offense of committing specified crimes of violence "while armed with or having readily available" a dangerous weapon, the defendant "may" receive a maximum term of imprisonment of up to 30 years. D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(1). If the defendant committed the offense "while armed with any pistol or firearm," however, he or she "shall" receive a five year "mandatory-minimum" term of imprisonment of not less than 5 years. D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(1). If the current conviction is for committing a specified crime of violence "while armed with or having readily available" a dangerous weapon and the defendant has at least one prior conviction for an armed crime of violence, the defendant "shall" be sentenced to "not less than 5 years" imprisonment and not more than 30 years. D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(2). If the current conviction is for committing a specified crime of violence "while armed with any pistol or firearm" and the defendant has the required prior conviction for an armed crime of violence, the defendant "shall" be "imprisoned for a mandatory-minimum term of not less than 10 years." D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(2). First degree murder, second degree murder, first degree sexual abuse, and first degree child sexual abuse "shall" receive the same minimum and mandatory minimum sentences as other crimes of violence committed "while armed with or having readily available" a dangerous weapon, except that the maximum term of imprisonment "shall" be life without parole as authorized elsewhere in the current District code. D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(3).

[55] The current sexual abuse weapons aggravators refers to "a pistol or any other firearm (or imitation thereof). D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(6). The revised enhancement does not, however, because the revised definitions of "dangerous weapon" and "imitation dangerous weapon" in RCC § 22E-701 specifically include firearms and imitation firearms.

bodily member or organ, or a protracted loss of consciousness. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised sex offenses.

Beyond these eight changes to current District law, eight other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute consistently requires that the actor engages in a sexual act or sexual contact with the complainant or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to" the sexual act or sexual contact. While all of the current D.C. Code sexual abuse statutes require that the actor "engages in" the sexual conduct, they vary in whether there is liability if the actor "causes" the complainant to "engage in" the sexual conduct or "causes" the complainant to "submit to" the sexual conduct.[58] This variation creates different plain language readings of the current sexual abuse statutes and suggests that the current offenses vary in scope as to the prohibited conduct and liability for involvement of a third party. There is no case law on point. However, DCCA case law addressing similar language in the District's current misdemeanor sexual abuse statute suggests that the DCCA may not construe such language variations as legally significant.[59] In addition to case law, District practice does not appear to follow the variations in statutory language.[60] Instead of these variations in language, the revised sex offenses and the revised definitions of "sexual act" and "sexual [58] First degree sexual abuse, second degree sexual abuse, and sexual abuse of a ward codify "engages in" the sexual conduct, "causes" the complainant to "engage in" the sexual conduct, and "causes" the complainant to "submit to" the sexual conduct. D.C. Code §§ 22-3002 and 22-3003; 22-3013 and 22-3014. Third and fourth degree sexual abuse, child sexual abuse, sexual abuse of a minor, and sexual abuse of a secondary education student are limited to "engages in" the sexual conduct and "causes" the complainant to "engage in" the sexual conduct. D.C. Code §§ 22-3004 and 22-3005; 22-3008 and 22-3009; 22-3009.01 and 22-3009.02. Misdemeanor sexual abuse and sexual abuse of a patient or client require only "engages in." D.C. Code §§ 22-3006; 22-3015 and 22-3016.

[59] In Pinckney v. United States, the DCCA held that the misdemeanor sexual abuse statute includes "conduct where a person uses another to touch intimate parts of the person's own body" even though the plain language of the statute requires "engages in a sexual act or sexual contact with another person." Pinckney v. United States, 906 A.2d 301, 303, 306 (D.C. 2006) (quoting Council of the District of Columbia, Report of the Committee on the Judiciary, Bill 10-87, the "Anti-Sexual Abuse Act of 1994 at 1). The DCCA declined "an interpretation that would exclude such an obvious means of offensive touching," in part because the legislature intended to "'strengthen the District's laws against sexual abuse and make them more inclusive, flexible and reflective of the broad range of abusive conduct which does in fact occur.'" Id. (quoting Council of the District of Columbia, Report of the Committee on the Judiciary, Bill 10-87, the "Anti-Sexual Abuse Act of 1994 at 1). The DCCA stated that its interpretation of the misdemeanor sexual abuse statute "as applying to the facts of this case does not require appellant to have caused the victim to engage in or submit to sexual contact" because the appellant engaged in the prohibited sexual contact by his own actions." Id. However, the DCCA's reliance on the legislative intent of the Anti-Sexual Abuse Act suggests that it would broadly interpret any variations in the language of the current sexual abuse statutes.

[60] The jury instructions for third degree, fourth degree, child sexual abuse, and sexual abuse of a minor include that the actor "caused" the complainant "to engage in or submit to" a sexual act or sexual contact, even though the statutory language for those offenses does not include "causes" the complainant to "submit to." Compare D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. §§ 4.400 (general sexual abuse); 4.401 (child sexual abuse); 4.402 (sexual abuse of a minor) D.C. Code §§ 22-3003 and 22-3004 (third degree and fourth degree sexual abuse statutes); 22-3008 and 22-3009 (first degree and second degree child sexual abuse statutes); 22-3009.01 and 22-3009.02 (first degree and second degree sexual abuse of a minor statutes).

contact" consistently require that the actor "engages in" or "causes" the complainant to "engage in" or "submit to" the sexual conduct. Differentiating liability based on whether an actor themselves commits the sexual conduct in question, or whether the actor causes the complainant to engage in or submit to the sexual conduct, may lead to disproportionate outcomes. This change improves the consistency, clarity, and proportionality of the revised offenses, and reduces unnecessary gaps in liability.

Second, the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state for engaging in a sexual act or sexual contact with the complainant or causing the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act or sexual contact. The current D.C. Code child sexual abuse statutes[61] and sexual abuse of a minor statutes[62] do not specify any culpable mental state for engaging in or submitting to a sexual act or sexual contact. Due to the statutory definition of "sexual contact,"[63] the second degree gradations of these offenses require an "intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, or arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person," although the DCCA has sustained a conviction for second degree child sexual abuse when the jury instructions required that the actor "knowingly" touched the complainant and erroneously omitted the additional intent requirement.[64] There is no DCCA case law regarding commission of a "sexual act" in the current child sexual abuse statutes or the sexual abuse of a minor statutes.[65] The revised sexual abuse of a minor statute resolves these ambiguities by requiring a "knowingly" culpable mental state in each gradation for engaging in a sexual act or sexual contact with the complainant causing the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act or sexual contact. Requiring, at a minimum, a knowing culpable mental state for the elements of an offense that make otherwise legal conduct illegal is a generally accepted legal principle.[66] Requiring a "knowingly" culpable mental state may also clarify that the gradations that require "sexual contact" are lesser included offenses of the gradations that require a "sexual act," an issue which has been litigated in current DCCA case law, but remains unresolved.[67] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statutes.

United States*, 948 A.2d 554, 558, 561 (D.C. 2008) (affirming appellant's conviction for second degree child sexual abuse when the jury instructions required that the appellant "knowingly" touched the complainant and omitted the "intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, or arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person" requirement because "no rational jury could have found that appellant touched [the complainants] in a way consistent with the trial court's jury instruction . . . without also finding the requisite intent.").

[65] The DCCA case law has characterized the current first and third degree sexual abuse statutes, which concern a sexual act, as "general intent" crimes. However, it is not clear what specific culpable mental state must be proven for such "general intent" crimes—e.g., knowledge or recklessness. See commentary to RCC § 22E-1301, Sexual assault, above, for further discussion.

The court declined to address

Third, third degree and sixth degree of the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute require a "knowingly" culpable mental state for the element that actor was in a "position of trust with or authority over" the complainant. The current D.C. Code sexual abuse of a minor statutes require that the actor be "in a significant relationship with a minor,"[68] but they do not specify what, if any, culpable mental states apply, and there is no DCCA case law on point. Third degree and sixth degree of the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute resolve this ambiguity by requiring a "knowingly" culpable mental state for the fact that the actor is in a "position of trust with or authority over" the complainant. Requiring, at a minimum, a knowing culpable mental state for the elements of an offense that make otherwise legal conduct illegal is a generally accepted legal principle,[69] although recklessness has been upheld in some cases as a minimal basis for punishing morally culpable crime.[70] Given the heightened responsibility that comes with being a person in a position of trust with or authority over a complainant, as well as the expansive scope of the definition, a "knowingly" culpable mental state is proportionate. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statutes.

Fourth, due to the RCC definition of "position of trust with or authority over" in RCC § 22E-701, the scope of third degree and sixth degree of the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute and the penalty enhancement for being in a "position of trust with or authority over" may differ as compared to the current D.C. Code sexual abuse of a minor statutes. The current D.C. Code sexual abuse of a minor statutes[71] require that the actor be in a "significant relationship" with the complainant and the fact that the actor was in a "significant relationship" with the complainant is included in the current sex offense aggravators.[72] "Significant relationship" is defined in D.C. Code § 22-3001[73] as

The DCCA further noted that "[i]n general, a crime can only be a lesser-included offense of another if its required proof contains some, but not all, of the elements of the greater offense" and "the gravamen of whether a crime is the lesser-included offense of another is legislative intent. Id. (internal quotation omitted).

"includ[ing]" the specified individuals as well as "any other person in a position of trust with or authority over" the complainant."[74] There is no DCCA case law interpreting the current definition of "significant relationship." The RCC definition of "position of trust with or authority over" is close-ended, but defines "position of trust with or authority over as "mean[ing]" specified individuals or "a person responsible under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant." The revised definition provides a broad, flexible, objective standard for determining who is in a position of trust with or authority over another person. The RCC definition of "position of trust with or authority over" is discussed in detail in the commentary to RCC § 22E-701. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statutes.

Fifth, the revised sexual abuse of a minor penalty enhancements require that accomplices be "physically present at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact." The current accomplice aggravator for the D.C. Code sexual abuse statutes requires that the "defendant was aided or abetted by 1 or more accomplices."[75] There is no DCCA case law interpreting this aggravator.[76] It is unclear whether the aggravator would apply if an accomplice was not physically present. It is also unclear if the required aiding and abetting is limited to the sexual act or sexual contact, or encompasses the totality of the actor's conduct leading to the sexual act or sexual contact. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised sexual abuse of a minor penalty enhancement requires that the accomplices must be "physically present at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact." Accomplices that are physically present at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact potentially increase the danger and effects of the offense in a way that other, physically absent accomplices do not. Limiting the enhancement to accomplices that are present at the time of the offense improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

Sixth, the revised sexual abuse of a minor penalty enhancement requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state for the actor acting with one or more accomplices. The current accomplice aggravator for the D.C. Code sex offenses requires that the "defendant was aided or abetted by 1 or more accomplices."[77] The current statute does not specify any culpable mental states and there is no DCCA case law for this issue. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised sexual abuse of a minor penalty enhancement requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state for acting with "one or more accomplices person who is charged with any duty or responsibility for the health, welfare, or supervision of the victim at the time of the act; and (D) Any employee or volunteer of a school, church, synagogue, mosque, or other religious institution, or an educational, social, recreational, athletic, musical, charitable, or youth facility, organization, or program, including a teacher, coach, counselor, clergy, youth leader, chorus director, bus driver, administrator, or support staff, or any other person in a position of trust with or authority over a child or a minor.").

[74] D.C. Code § 22-3001(10).

[75] D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(4).

[76] However, current District law generally extends aider and abettor liability to accomplices who are not present at the time of the offense. See, e.g., Kelly v. United States, 639 A.2d 86, 91 (D.C. 1994) (upholding aider and abettor liability where "the jury could reasonably have found that appellant had participated in planning the robbery," and served as getaway driver, but was not physically present during the robbery) (collecting District case law).

[77] D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(4).

that are physically present at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact."[78] The "knowingly" culpable mental state improves the clarity and consistency of the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute.

Seventh, the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute is subject to the RCC general provision enhancement for repeat offenders. The current D.C. Code sex offense aggravators include an aggravator if the "defendant is or has been found guilty of committing sex offenses against 2 or more victims, whether in the same or other proceedings by a court of the District of Columbia, any state, or the United States or its territories."[79] The plain language of the enhancement is unclear[80] and there is no case law clarifying the issue. In addition, current District law has general recidivist penalty enhancements applicable to sex offenses.[81] It is unclear how the multiple recidivist enhancements apply to the sex offenses, and there is no case law. Resolving these ambiguities, the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute is subject to the RCC general recidivist penalty enhancement (RCC § 22E-606). By eliminating overlapping recidivist penalty enhancements, the RCC improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised sexual abuse of a minor statutes.

Eighth, the revised serious bodily injury penalty enhancement requires a "recklessly" culpable mental state and requires that the defendant cause serious bodily injury "immediately before, during, or immediately after" the sexual act or sexual contact. The current D.C. Code sex offense aggravators include when the "victim sustained serious bodily injury as a result of the offense."[82] The current D.C. Code sex offense aggravators statute does not specify any culpable mental states and the scope of "as a result of the offense" is unclear.[83] There is no DCCA case law for these issues. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised penalty enhancement requires a "recklessly" culpable mental state for causing serious bodily injury immediately before, during, or immediately after the sexual act or sexual contact. The "recklessly" culpable mental state is consistent with several gradations of the revised assault statute (RCC § 22E-1202). An actor who is not at least reckless as to causing serious bodily injury would still be subject to liability for sexual abuse of a minor, but not this penalty enhancement. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense.

[78] The revised penalty enhancement no longer uses the words "aided or abetted" that are in the current enhancement because they are surplusage. The revised penalty enhancement also no longer specifies that "[i]t is not necessary that the accomplices have been convicted for an increased punishment (or enhanced penalty) to apply" as the current penalty enhancement specifies in D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(6).

[79] D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(5). In addition to the specific sexual abuse aggravator, current District law has general penalty enhancements for prior convictions. D.C. Code §§ 22-1805; 22-1805a. It is unclear how the multiple recidivist penalty enhancements apply to the sex offenses, and there is no DCCA case law.

[80] One possible interpretation is that priors will only be counted if they are against different complainants. Another interpretation, not precluded by the plain language, is that for a prior to count, it must involve two or more victims—although this interpretation would exclude many prior sex offenses.

[82] D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(3).

[83] It is unclear whether "the offense" refers to the sexual act or sexual contact, or the totality of the defendant's actions leading to the sexual act or sexual contact. It is also unclear how to determine whether an injury is a "result" of the sexual act or sexual contact, particularly if a significant period of time passes between the incident and the development or discovery of the serious bodily injury.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute categorizes all persons under the age of 18 as "minors" and defines revised offenses in terms of the specific ages of complainants. The D.C. Code currently contains two sets of offenses for sexual abuse of complainants under the age of 18—child sexual abuse, for complainants under the age of 16 years,[84] and sexual abuse of a minor, for complainants under the age of 18 years.[85] For clarification, the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute no longer distinguishes separate offenses for complainants who are a "child" or "minor" and instead organizes all offenses against minors as gradations of one "sexual abuse of a minor" statute. The text of the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute also specifies the numerical ages of relevant classes of complainants rather than using "child" or "minor" terminology. Referring to a teenager as a "child" may be misleading and leads to inconsistency with other District offenses that have different definitions of "child."[86] These changes improve the clarity and consistency of the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute.

Second, the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute, by use of the phrase "in fact," clarifies that no culpable mental state is required as to the age of the complainant, the actor's own age, or the required age gap. Neither the current D.C. Code sexual abuse of a child statutes[87] nor the current D.C. Code sexual abuse of a minor statutes[88] specify culpable mental states as to the ages of the parties or the gap in their ages. However, current D.C. Code § 22-3012 states that for child sexual abuse, the government "need not prove that the defendant knew the child's age or the age difference between himself or herself and the child"[89] and current D.C. Code § 22-3011 establishes that "mistake of age" is not a defense to prosecution under the child sexual abuse and sexual abuse of a minor statutes.[90] DCCA case law further suggests that no culpable mental state

[84] D.C. Code §§ 22-3008 (first degree child sexual abuse); 22-3009 (second degree child sexual abuse); 22-3001(3) (defining "child" as a "person who has not yet attained the age of 16 years.").
[85] D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.01 (first degree sexual abuse of a minor); 22-3009.02 (second degree sexual abuse of a minor); 22-3001(5A) (defining "minor" as a "person who has not yet attained the age of 18 years").
[86] For example, the current child cruelty statute considers a person under the age of 18 years to be a "child" (D.C. Code § 22-1101(a)), but the current contributing to the delinquency of a minor statute considers a person under the age 18 to be a "minor" (D.C. Code § 22-811(f)(2)).
[87] D.C. Code §§ 22-3008 (first degree child sexual abuse); 22-3009 (second degree child sexual abuse); 22-3001(3) (defining "child" as a "person who has not yet attained the age of 16 years.").
[88] D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.01 (first degree sexual abuse of a minor); 22-3009.02 (second degree sexual abuse of a minor); 22-3001(5A) (defining "minor" as a "person who has not yet attained the age of 18 years.").
[89] D.C. Code § 22-3012 ("In a prosecution under §§ 22-3008 to 22-3010, prosecuted alone or in conjunction with charges under § 22-3018 or § 22-403, the government need not prove that the defendant knew the child's age or the age difference between himself or herself and the child."). The current child sexual abuse statutes are codified at D.C. Code § 22-3008 and D.C. Code § 22-3009, and fall within the specified range of statutes.
[90] D.C. Code § 22-3011 states that "mistake of age" is not a defense "to a prosecution under §§ 22-3008 to 22-3010.01. D.C. Code § 22-3011(a). The current sexual abuse of a minor statutes are codified at D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.01 and 22-3009.02 and fall within the specified range of statutes. The current sexual abuse of a minor statutes were enacted in 2007 and D.C. Code § 22-3011 was amended in 2007 to include them. Omnibus Public Safety Amendment Act of 2006, 2006 District of Columbia Laws 16-306 (Act 16-482).

whatsoever is required as to the age of the complainant or the age gap with the actor.[91] The revised sexual abuse of a minor statute, by use of the phrase "in fact," establishes strict liability as to the age of the complainant, the age of the actor, or the relevant age gap. Codifying the strict liability requirement improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Third, the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute relies on the general attempt statute to define what conduct constitutes an attempt and the appropriate penalty. Current D.C. Code § 22-3018 provides a separate attempt statute applicable to all current sexual offenses.[92] Under the statute, if the maximum term of imprisonment for the underlying offense is life, an attempt has a maximum term of imprisonment of 15 years.[93] Otherwise the maximum term of imprisonment is "not more than 1/2 of the maximum prison sentence authorized for the offense."[94] These attempt penalties differ from the attempt penalties established under D.C. Code § 22-1803, the current general attempt statute.[95] In the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute, the RCC General Part's attempt provisions (RCC § 22E-301) establish the requirements to prove an attempt and applicable penalties for sexual assault, consistent with other offenses. While a separate attempt statute for sex offenses may be justified in the current D.C. Code given the generally lower penalties available through the general attempt statute in D.C. Code § 22-1803, the penalties in the RCC general attempt provision provide penalties at ½ the maximum imprisonment [91] See, e.g., Green v. United States, 948 A.2d 554, 558 (D.C. 2008) (affirming appellant's conviction for second degree child sexual abuse when the jury instruction apparently required no culpable mental state as to the complainant's age).

[92] The relevant sex offense statutes addressed in RCC Chapter 13 are: First degree through fourth degree sexual abuse (D.C. Code §§ 22-3002 through 22-3005), misdemeanor sexual abuse (D.C. Code § 22-3006), child sexual abuse (D.C. Code §§ 22-3008 and 22-3009), sexual abuse of a minor (D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.01 and 22-3009.02), sexual abuse of a secondary education student (D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.03 and 22-3009.04), misdemeanor sexual abuse of a child or minor (D.C. Code § 22-3010.01), sexual abuse of a ward (D.C. Code §§ 22-3013 and 22-3014), sexual abuse of a patient or client (D.C. Code §§ 22-3015 and 22-3016), enticing a minor (D.C. Code § 22-3010), and arranging for sexual contact with a real or fictitious child (D.C. Code § 22-3010.01).

[93] D.C. Code § 22-3018 ("Any person who attempts to commit an offense under this subchapter shall be imprisoned for a term of years not to exceed 15 years where the maximum prison term authorized for the offense is life or for not more than 1/2 of the maximum prison sentence authorized for the offense and, in addition, may be fined an amount not to exceed 1/2 of the maximum fine authorized for the offense.").

[94] D.C. Code § 22-3018 ("Any person who attempts to commit an offense under this subchapter shall be imprisoned for a term of years not to exceed 15 years where the maximum prison term authorized for the offense is life or for not more than 1/2 of the maximum prison sentence authorized for the offense and, in addition, may be fined an amount not to exceed 1/2 of the maximum fine authorized for the offense.").

[95] D.C. Code § 22-1803 establishes general attempt penalties for offenses that do not otherwise have an attempt penalty specified. "Whoever shall attempt to commit any crime, which attempt is not otherwise made punishable by chapter 19 of An Act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901 (31 Stat. 1321), shall be punished by a fine not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or by imprisonment for not more than 180 days, or both. Except, whoever shall attempt to commit a crime of violence as defined in § 23-1331 shall be punished by a fine not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or by imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both." D.C. Code § 22-1803. Under this general attempt penalty statute, first degree sexual abuse of a child and second degree sexual abuse of a child are "crimes of violence" and would have a maximum term of imprisonment of five years. First degree and second degree sexual abuse of a minor are not "crimes of violence," however, and would have a maximum term of imprisonment of 180 days.

sentence. Elimination of a separate attempt statute for sex offenses, consequently, has no substantive effect on available penalties. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised sexual abuse of a minor offense.

Fourth, the marriage and domestic partnership defense in the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute does not refer to other offenses. The current D.C. Code marriage or domestic partnership defense states that marriage or domestic partnership is a defense to sexual abuse of a minor "prosecuted alone or in conjunction with § 22-3018 [sex offense attempt statute] or § 22-403 [assault with intent to commit certain offenses]."[96] There is no DCCA case law interpreting this provision. The language is not included in the current jury instruction for the marriage or domestic partnership defense.[97] The marriage or domestic partnership defense in the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute applies only to prosecution for the revised sexual abuse of a minor offense. In the RCC, the revised sex offenses no longer have their own attempt statute, and there are no longer separate "assault with intent to" offenses, or "AWI" offenses. Similarly, the revised assault statutes in the RCC no longer include separate "assault with intent to" crimes and instead provide liability through application of the general attempt statute in RCC § 22E-301 to the completed offenses.[98] Deleting the "prosecuted alone or in conjunction with language" improves the clarity of the revised sexual abuse of a minor offense.

Fifth, the marriage and domestic partnership defense in the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute makes two clarificatory changes to the current defense.[99] First, the revised marriage and domestic partnership defense replaces "at the time of the offense" with "at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact." Referring to marriage or domestic partnership at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute. Second, the revised marriage and domestic partnership statute, by use of the phrase "in fact," applies strict liability to the element that the actor and the complainant are in a marriage or domestic partnership at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact. The current marriage or domestic partnership statute does not specify a culpable mental state for this requirement, and doing so improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Sixth, the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute does not codify a separate provision stating that consent is not a defense. The current D.C. Code sexual abuse statutes specify that "consent is not a defense" for the current sexual abuse of a child statutes and current sexual abuse of a minor statutes.[100] However, nothing in the RCC

[96] D.C. Code § 22-3011(b). The "prosecuted alone or in conjunction with" language appears in two other statutes in addition to D.C. Code § 22-3011. D.C. Code § 22-3007, which codifies defenses for first degree through fourth degree sexual abuse and misdemeanor sexual abuse, and D.C. Code § 22-3017, which codifies defenses for sexual abuse of a ward and sexual abuse of a patient or client. The "prosecuted alone or in conjunction with" language in these statutes consistently refers to D.C. Code § 22-3018, which is the current attempt statute for the sexual abuse offenses, but inconsistently refers to D.C. Code § 22-401, which prohibits assault with intent to commit specified offenses, including first degree sexual abuse, second degree sexual abuse, or child sexual abuse, and D.C. Code § 22-403 which prohibits assault with intent to commit "any other offense which may be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary."

[97] D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 9.700.

[98] See Commentary to RCC § 22E-1202 (revised assault statute).

[99] D.C. Code § 22-30011(b).

[100] D.C. Code § 22-3011(a) ("Neither mistake of age nor consent is a defense to a prosecution under §§ 22-3008 to 22-3010.01, prosecuted alone or in conjunction with charges under § 22-3018 or § 22-403."). The sexual abuse of a minor statute suggests that consent is a defense. Codifying a provision that explicitly states consent is not a defense is potentially confusing for other RCC offenses which do not take this approach of stating defenses that do not apply. Deleting the current prohibition on consent as a defense is not intended to change current District law.

Seventh, by the use of the phrase "in fact," the revised weapon penalty enhancement for the sexual abuse of a minor statute applies strict liability to the fact that the object is a "dangerous weapon" or "imitation dangerous weapon." The current D.C. Code sex offense aggravators include that the "defendant was armed with, or had readily available, a pistol or other firearm (or imitation thereof) or other dangerous or deadly weapon."[101] The current D.C. Code sex offense aggravators statute does not specify any culpable mental states. There is no DCCA case law regarding the aggravator, but DCCA case law for assault with a dangerous weapon[102] and the "while armed" enhancement in D.C. Code § 22-4502103 support applying strict liability to the fact that the object is a "dangerous weapon" or "imitation dangerous weapon." For clarification, the revised weapons enhancement uses the phrase "in fact" to establish that strict liability applies to this element. Strict liability for this element is also consistent with the weapons gradations in other RCC offenses against persons. This change clarifies the revised statutes.

Eighth, the revised sexual abuse of a minor penalty enhancements consistently refer to the "sexual act or sexual contact" as opposed to "the offense." Several of the current sexual abuse aggravators refer to "at the time of the offense"[104] or "as a result of the offense."[105] The revised penalty enhancements consistently refer to the sexual act or sexual contact, improving the clarity of the revised statute.

RCC § 22E-1303. Sexual Abuse by Exploitation.

Explanatory Note. The RCC sexual abuse by exploitation offense prohibits specified acts of sexual penetration or sexual touching with several populations of vulnerable individuals. The penalty gradations are based on the nature of the sexual conduct. The revised sexual abuse by exploitation offense replaces six distinct offenses in the current D.C. Code: first degree sexual abuse of a secondary education student,[1] second degree sexual abuse of a secondary education student,[2] first degree sexual abuse of a ward,[3] second degree sexual abuse of a ward,[4] first degree sexual abuse of a patient or client,[5] and second degree sexual abuse of a patient or client.[6] The RCC sexual abuse by exploitation offense also replaces in relevant part four distinct provisions for the sexual abuse offenses: the marriage and domestic partnership defense,[7] the attempt statute,[8] the limitation on prosecutorial immunity,[9] and the aggravating sentencing factors.[10]

Paragraph (a)(1) specifies the prohibited conduct for first degree sexual abuse by exploitation—engaging in a "sexual act" with the complainant or causing the complainant to engage in or submit to a "sexual act." Paragraph (a)(1) specifies a culpable mental state of "knowingly" for this conduct. "Knowingly," a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 means here that the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she would engage in a "sexual act" with the complainant or cause the complainant to engage in or submit to a "sexual act." "Sexual act" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that specifies types of sexual penetration or contact between the mouth and certain body parts.

Subparagraph (a)(2)(A) through subparagraph (a)(2)(E) specify the prohibited situations for an actor to engage in a "sexual act" with the complainant or cause the complainant to engage in or submit to the "sexual act."

Subparagraph (a)(2)(A) specifies the first prohibited situation—the actor must be "a coach, not including a coach who is a secondary school student; a teacher, counselor, principal, administrator, nurse, or security officer at a secondary school" and "working as an employee, contractor, or volunteer." Per the rule of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" culpable mental state in paragraph (a)(1) applies to these elements in subparagraph (a)(2)(A). "Knowingly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she is "a coach, not including a coach who is a secondary school student; a teacher, counselor, principal, administrator, nurse, or security officer at a secondary school, working as an employee, contractor, or volunteer."

Sub-subparagraphs (a)(2)(A)(i) and its sub-subparagraphs specify several requirements for the complainant for this first type of prohibited situation. First, sub-subparagraphs (a)(2)(A)(i), (a)(2)(A)(i)(I), and (a)(2)(A)(i)(II) require that the complainant must either be "an enrolled student in the same secondary school" as the actor (sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(A)(i)(I)) or receive educational services or attend educational programming at the same secondary school as the actor (sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(A)(i)(II)).[11] Per the rule of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "recklessly disregards" culpable mental state in subparagraph (a)(2)(A) applies to the requirements for the complainant in sub-subparagraphs (a)(2)(A)(i), (a)(2)(A)(i)(I), and (a)(2)(A)(i)(II). "Recklessly disregards" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means that the actor is aware of a substantial risk that the complainant is an enrolled student in the same secondary school or receives educational services or attends educational programming at the same secondary school. Sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(A)(ii) specifies a final requirement for the complainant—that he or she is under the age of 20 years. Per the rule of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "recklessly disregards" culpable mental state in subparagraph (a)(2)(A) applies to this requirement and here means the actor is aware of a substantial risk that the complainant is under the age of 20 years.

Subparagraph (a)(2)(B) specifies the second prohibited situation—the actor must falsely represent that he or she is someone else with whom the complainant is in a romantic, dating, or sexual relationship. The "romantic, dating, or sexual relationship" language tracks the language in the District's current definition of "intimate partner violence"[12] and is intended to have the same meaning. Subparagraph (a)(2)(B) specifies a culpable mental state of "knowingly," a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here requires that the actor be "practically certain" that the actor falsely represents that the actor is someone else with whom the actor is in a romantic, dating, or sexual relationship.

Subparagraph (a)(2)(C) specifies the third prohibited situation—the actor is, or purports to be, a "healthcare provider," a "health professional," or a "religious leader described in D.C. Code § 14-309." The terms "healthcare provider" and "health professional" are defined terms in RCC § 22E-701, and include massage therapists, psychologists, and addiction counselors. A "religious leader described in D.C. Code § 14-309" is a "priest, clergyman, rabbi, or other duly licensed, ordained, or consecrated minister of a religion authorized to perform a marriage ceremony in the District of Columbia or duly accredited practitioner of Christian Science,"[13] regardless of whether the religious leader hears confessions or receives other communications. Per the rule of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" culpable mental state in subparagraph (a)(2)(B) applies to the elements in subparagraph (a)(2)(C), and per the definition of [11] Educational services and programming may include, for example, sports practices, music lessons, or a required class.

[12] D.C. Code § 16-1001(7) ("'Intimate partner violence' means an act punishable as a criminal offense that is committed or threatened to be committed by an offender upon a person: (A) To whom the offender is or was married; (B) With whom the offender is or was in a domestic partnership; or (C) With whom the offender is or was in a romantic, dating, or sexual relationship.").

[13] D.C. Code § 14-309.

"knowingly" in RCC § 22E-206, the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she is, or purports to be, a "healthcare provider," "heath professional," or "a religious leader described in D.C. Code § 14-309."

Sub-subparagraphs (a)(2)(C)(i) through (a)(2)(C)(iii) specify additional requirements for an actor that is, or purports to be, a healthcare provider, heath professional, or a specified religious leader. Sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(C)(i) requires that the actor falsely represents that the sexual act is done for a bona fide medical, therapeutic, or professional purpose. Sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(C)(ii) requires that the actor commit the sexual act during a consultation, examination, treatment, therapy, or other provision of professional services. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" culpable mental state in subparagraph (a)(2)(B) applies to all the elements in sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(C)(i) and sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(C)(ii). Per the definition of "knowingly" in RCC § 22E-206, the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she falsely represents that the sexual act is done for a bona fide professional purpose or that he or she commits the sexual act during a consultation, examination, treatment, therapy, or other provision of professional services.

Sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(C)(iii) requires that the actor commit the sexual act while the complainant is a patient or client of the actor. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" culpable mental state in subparagraph (a)(2)(B) applies to these elements. "Knowingly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means that the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she commits the sexual act while the complainant is a patient or client of the actor. Sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(C)(iii) further requires that the actor "recklessly disregard" that the mental, emotional, or physical condition of the complainant is such that the complainant is impaired from declining participation in the sexual act. "Recklessly disregards" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means that the actor must be aware of a substantial risk that the mental, emotional, or physical condition of the complainant is such that the complainant is impaired from declining participation in the sexual act.

Subparagraph (a)(2)(D) specifies the fourth prohibited situation—the actor must "knowingly" work as "an employee, contractor, or volunteer at or for" a specified institution, such as a hospital or correctional facility. "Correctional facility" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701. "Knowingly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means that the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she works as "an employee, contractor, or volunteer at or for" a specified institution, such as a hospital or treatment facility.

Sub-subparagraphs (a)(2)(D)(ii)(I) through (a)(2)(D)(ii)(III) specify requirements for the complainant. The complainant must be a ward, patient, client, or prisoner at a specified institution (sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(D)(ii)(I)), awaiting admission to a specified institution (sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(D)(ii)(I)(II)), or in transport to or from a specified institution (sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(D)(ii)(III)). Sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(D)(ii) specifies a culpable mental state of "recklessly disregards," which, per the rule of interpretation in in RCC § 22E-207, applies to all the requirements in sub-subparagraphs (a)(2)(D)(ii)(I) through (a)(2)(D)(ii)(III). "Recklessly disregard" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means that the actor must be aware of a substantial risk that the complainant is: 1) a ward, patient, client, or prisoner at that institution; 2) awaiting admission to that institution; or 3) in transport to or from that institution.

Subparagraph (a)(2)(E) specifies the final prohibited situation—the actor works as a "law enforcement officer," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701. Subparagraph (a)(2)(E) specifies a culpable mental state of "knowingly" for this element. "Knowingly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means that the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she is a "law enforcement officer," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701. Subparagraph (a)(2)(E) further requires that the actor is "reckless" as to the fact that the complainant is in "official custody," a specified type of detention, or on probation or parole, as required in sub-subparagraphs (a)(2)(E)(i) through (a)(2)(E)(iii). "Official custody" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "full submission after an arrest or substantial physical restraint after an arrest." "Reckless" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means that the actor must be aware of a substantial risk that the complainant is in "official custody," a specified type of detention, or on probation or parole.

Subsection (b) specifies the required conduct for second degree sexual abuse by exploitation. The prohibited conduct is the same as first degree sexual abuse by exploitation except it requires a "sexual contact" instead of a "sexual act." "Sexual contact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means touching the specified body parts, such as genitalia, of any person with the desire to sexually abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, arouse, or gratify any person.

Subsection (c) codifies an affirmative defense for the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute. The general provision in RCC § 22E-201 establishes the requirements for the burden of production and the burden of proof for all affirmative defenses in the RCC. Subsection (c) establishes an affirmative defense that the actor and the complainant were in a marriage or "domestic partnership" at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact. "Domestic partnership" is defined in RCC § 22E-701. "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element, here that the actor and the complainant are, "in fact," in a marriage or domestic partnership at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact.

Subsection (d) specifies relevant penalties for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.] Paragraph (d)(3) states that a person shall not be subject to prosecution for violation of the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation offense and an abuse of government power penalty enhancement in RCC § 22E-610 for the same conduct.

Subsection (e) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised sexual abuse by exploitation statute clearly changes current District law in four main ways.

First, the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute limits liability to an actor who is "a healthcare provider, a health professional, or a religious leader described in D.C. Code § 14-309," or purports to be such. The current D.C. Code first and second degree sexual abuse of a patient or client statutes apply to any person who "purports to provide, in any manner, professional services of a medical, therapeutic, or counseling (whether legal, spiritual, or otherwise) nature" or is "otherwise in a professional relationship of trust" with the complainant.[14] There is no DCCA case law more clearly specifying included professions. "Professional relationship of trust" is not defined in the D.C. Code and there is no DCCA case law interpreting the phrase. In contrast, the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute limits the offense to actors that are "a healthcare provider, a health professional, or a religious leader described in D.C. Code § 14-309," or actors that purport to be such. "Healthcare provider" and "health professional" are defined terms in RCC § 22E-701 and the D.C. Code,[15] referring to a wide array of medical and related professions, including massage therapists and addiction counselors. A "religious leader described in D.C. Code § 14-309" is a "priest, clergyman, rabbi, or other duly licensed, ordained, or consecrated minister of a religion authorized to perform a marriage ceremony in the District of Columbia or duly accredited practitioner of Christian Science,"[16] regardless of whether the religious leader hears confessions or receives other communications. This provision is intended to be interpreted broadly to include Christian and non-Christian religious officials. Complainants in a healthcare or spiritual setting are especially vulnerable to the conduct prohibited in the RCC sexual exploitation of an adult offense. Sexual activity in other professional settings[17] can be addressed by professional censure or civil liability. This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute.

Second, the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute no longer prohibits "the actor falsely represents that he or she is licensed as a particular kind of professional." The current D.C. Code first and second degree sexual abuse of a patient or client statutes prohibit an actor from "represent[ing] falsely that he or she is licensed as a particular type of professional."[18] There is no DCCA case law interpreting this provision. Other provisions in the current sexual abuse of a patient or client statutes prohibit committing a sexual act or sexual contact during the "provision of professional services," when the actor "represents falsely that the sexual… [act or contact] is for a bona fide professional purpose," or when the actor "knows or has reason to know that the patient or client is impaired from declining participation."[19] In contrast, the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute does not specifically criminalize sexual conduct when the actor falsely represented that he or she is licensed as a particular kind of professional. The RCC sexual abuse by exploitation offense continues to penalize sexual conduct when falsely representing the conduct is for a medical, professional, or therapeutic purpose, during the provision of professional services, or when the actor disregards the possibility that the complainant is impaired. Apart from such circumstances, criminal punishment for lying about the status of one's professional licensing may be reprehensible but is not directly related to the sexual conduct. This change improves the proportionality of the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute.

[19] D.C. Code §§ 22-3015 and 22-3016.

Third, only the general penalty enhancements in subtitle I of the RCC apply to the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute. Current D.C. Code § 22-3020 specifies aggravators that apply to all of the current sex offense statutes.[20] In contrast, the revised sexual abuse by exploitation statute is subject to only the general penalty enhancements specified in subtitle I of the RCC. The current sex offense aggravators in D.C. Code § 22-3020[21] are not necessary in the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute because the offense is limited to sexual conduct that occurs without the use of force, threats, or coercion. Limiting the penalty enhancements in RCC subtitle I to the RCC sexual exploitation of an adult offense improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised sex offenses.

Fourth, the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute completely specifies persons of authority in a secondary school that are subject to the revised statute and limits liability to situations where the student has a substantial link to the secondary school where the actor works. The current D.C. Code first and second degree sexual abuse of a secondary education student statutes prohibit "[a]ny teacher, counselor, principal, coach, or other person of authority in a secondary level school" from engaging in sexual conduct with a "student under the age of 20 years enrolled in that school or school system."[22] The statute does not define the term "person of authority" and there is no case law on point. In contrast, the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute limits the liable persons at a secondary school to "a coach, not including a coach who is a secondary school student; a teacher, counselor, principal, administrator, nurse, or security officer at a secondary school" and requires either that the complainant is enrolled at the same secondary school as the actor, or receives educational services or attends educational programming at the same secondary school as the actor. Categorical inclusion of all persons within a school system appears to be overbroad insofar as it would include persons who are not actually in a position to exert authority over the complainant, while limiting liability to persons within the school where the complainant is enrolled appears to be under-inclusive. The revised statute is tailored to inherently coercive roles at a secondary school where a student is enrolled or otherwise receives educational services or educational programming, including an "administrator," a "nurse," and a "security officer," which are not specified in the current statute. The revised statute requires that a "coach" is not also a secondary school student to ensure that the relationship between the actor and the complainant rises to the level of coerciveness necessary to make otherwise consensual sexual activity criminal. If the facts of a case fall outside the requirements of the revised statute, there may still be liability under second degree or fourth degree of the revised sexual assault statute (RCC § 22E-1301) for the use of a coercive threat or under third degree and sixth degree sexual abuse of a minor (RCC § 22E-1302) if the actor is in a "position of trust with or authority over" the complainant. This change improves the clarity, completeness, and proportionality of the RCC statute.

[20] The relevant sex offense statutes addressed in RCC Chapter 13 are: First degree through fourth degree sexual abuse (D.C. Code §§ 22-3002 through 22-3005), misdemeanor sexual abuse (D.C. Code § 22-3006), child sexual abuse (D.C. Code §§ 22-3008 and 22-3009), sexual abuse of a minor (D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.01 and 22-3009.02), sexual abuse of a secondary education student (D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.03 and 22-3009.04), misdemeanor sexual abuse of a child or minor (D.C. Code § 22-3010.01), sexual abuse of a ward (D.C. Code §§ 22-3013 and 22-3014), sexual abuse of a patient or client (D.C. Code §§ 22-3015 and 22-3016), enticing a minor (D.C. Code § 22-3010), and arranging for sexual contact with a real or fictitious child (D.C. Code § 22-3010.01). Two of the six possible aggravators are age-based. D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(1) (victim under 12 years of age); D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(2) (victim under 18 years of age and in a "significant relationship" with actor). Three of the six possible aggravators concern circumstances indicating the presence of greater force, fraud, or coercion. D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(3) (victim sustained "serious bodily injury."); D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(4) (accomplices aided the crime); D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(6) (defendant was armed with a deadly or dangerous weapon). The remaining aggravator, D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(5) concerns repeat offenders.

[21] However, an actor that merely possesses a dangerous weapon or a firearm while committing sexual abuse by exploitation, without using or displaying it, may face liability under the revised possession of a dangerous weapon during a crime of violence statute (RCC § 22E-4104) or other RCC weapons offenses.

Beyond these four changes to current District law, nine other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute consistently requires that the actor engages in a sexual act or sexual contact with the complainant or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to" the sexual act or sexual contact. While all of the current sexual abuse statutes require that the actor "engages in" the sexual conduct, they vary in whether there is liability if the actor "causes" the complainant to "engage in" the sexual conduct or "causes" the complainant to "submit to" the sexual conduct.[23] This variation creates different plain language readings of the current sexual abuse statutes and suggests that the current offenses vary in scope as to the prohibited conduct and liability for involvement of a third party. There is no case law on point. However, DCCA case law addressing similar language in the District's current misdemeanor sexual abuse statute suggests that the DCCA may not construe such language variations as legally significant.[24] In addition to case law, District practice does not appear to follow the variations in statutory language.[25] Instead of these variations in language, the revised sex offenses and the revised definitions of "sexual act" and "sexual contact" consistently require that the actor "engages in" or "causes" the complainant to "engage in" or "submit to" the sexual conduct. Differentiating liability based on whether an actor themselves commits the sexual conduct in question, or whether the actor causes the complainant to engage in or submit to the sexual conduct, may lead to disproportionate outcomes. This change improves the consistency, clarity, and proportionality of the revised offenses, and reduces unnecessary gaps in liability.

[23] First degree sexual abuse, second degree sexual abuse, and sexual abuse of a ward codify "engages in" the sexual conduct, "causes" the complainant to "engage in" the sexual conduct, and "causes" the complainant to "submit to" the sexual conduct. D.C. Code §§ 22-3002 and 22-3003; 22-3013 and 22-3014. Third and fourth degree sexual abuse, child sexual abuse, sexual abuse of a minor, and sexual abuse of a secondary education student are limited to "engages in" the sexual conduct and "causes" the complainant to "engage in" the sexual conduct. D.C. Code §§ 22-3004 and 22-3005; 22-3008 and 22-3009; 22-3009.01 and 22-3009.02. Misdemeanor sexual abuse and sexual abuse of a patient or client require only "engages in." D.C. Code §§ 22-3006; 22-3015 and 22-3016.

[24] In Pinckney v. United States, the DCCA held that the misdemeanor sexual abuse statute includes "conduct where a person uses another to touch intimate parts of the person's own body" even though the plain language of the statute requires "engages in a sexual act or sexual contact with another person." Pinckney v. United States, 906 A.2d 301, 303, 306 (D.C. 2006) (quoting Council of the District of Columbia, Report of the Committee on the Judiciary, Bill 10-87, the "Anti-Sexual Abuse Act of 1994 at 1). The DCCA declined "an interpretation that would exclude such an obvious means of offensive touching," in part because the legislature intended to "'strengthen the District's laws against sexual abuse and make them more inclusive, flexible and reflective of the broad range of abusive conduct which does in fact occur.'" Id. (quoting Council of the District of Columbia, Report of the Committee on the Judiciary, Bill 10-87, the "Anti-Sexual Abuse Act of 1994 at 1). The DCCA stated that its interpretation of the misdemeanor sexual abuse statute "as applying to the facts of this case does not require appellant to have caused the victim to engage in or submit to sexual contact" because the appellant engaged in the prohibited sexual contact by his own actions." Id. However, the DCCA's reliance on the legislative intent of the Anti-Sexual Abuse Act suggests that it would broadly interpret any variations in the language of the current sexual abuse statutes.

Second, the sexual abuse by exploitation statute separately prohibits a sexual act or sexual contact when the actor "falsely represents that the actor is someone else with whom the actor is in a romantic, dating, or sexual relationship." The "romantic, dating, or sexual relationship" language tracks the language in the District's current definition of "intimate partner violence"[26] and is intended to have the same meaning. The current D.C. Code sexual abuse of a patient or client statutes do not contain a provision specifically addressing false identity used to engage in sexual conduct. However, the current D.C. Code misdemeanor sexual abuse (MSA) statute[27] prohibits engaging in a sexual act or sexual contact without the "permission" of the other person. "Permission" is not defined in the current D.C. Code and it is unclear whether or how "permission" differs from the defined term "consent."[28] In addition, the DCCA has used the terms "permission" and "consent" interchangeably in discussing the current MSA statute.[29] To the extent that the current MSA statute prohibits a sexual act or sexual contact without "consent," the current D.C. Code definition of "consent" appears to exclude consent that is obtained by deception because the current definition of "consent" requires that the [25] The jury instructions for third degree, fourth degree, child sexual abuse, and sexual abuse of a minor include that the actor "caused" the complainant "to engage in or submit to" a sexual act or sexual contact, even though the statutory language for those offenses does not include "causes" the complainant to "submit to." Compare D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. §§ 4.400 (general sexual abuse); 4.401 (child sexual abuse); 4.402 (sexual abuse of a minor) D.C. Code §§ 22-3003 and 22-3004 (third degree and fourth degree sexual abuse statutes); 22-3008 and 22-3009 (first degree and second degree child sexual abuse statutes); 22-3009.01 and 22-3009.02 (first degree and second degree sexual abuse of a minor statutes).

[26] D.C. Code § 16-1001(7) ("'Intimate partner violence' means an act punishable as a criminal offense that is committed or threatened to be committed by an offender upon a person: (A) To whom the offender is or was married; (B) With whom the offender is or was in a domestic partnership; or (C) With whom the offender is or was in a romantic, dating, or sexual relationship.").

[27] D.C. Code § 22-3006.

[28] D.C. Code § 22-3001(4) ("'Consent' means words or overt actions indicating a freely given agreement to the sexual act or contact in question. Lack of verbal or physical resistance or submission by the victim, resulting from the use of force, threats, or coercion by the defendant shall not constitute consent.").

[29] See, e.g., Davis v. United States, 973 A.2d 1101, 1104, 1106 (D.C. 2005) (noting in dicta that "permission" is "not specifically defined in the [MSA] statute, but in common usage, the word is a synonym for 'consent'" and holding that "if the complainant in a misdemeanor sexual abuse (or other general sexual assault) prosecution was a child at the time of the alleged offense, an adult defendant who is at least four years older than the complainant may not assert a 'consent' defense."); Hailstock v. United States, 85 A.3d 1277, 1280, 1281, (noting that "what was required to convict [the appellant] of the offense of attempted MSA was that he took the requisite overt steps at a time when he should have known that he did not have [the complainant's] consent for the acts he contemplated.") (emphasis in original).

words or actions be "freely given."[30] There is no DCCA case law on point. Resolving this ambiguity, the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute prohibits a specific type of deception, when the actor falsely represents that he or she is someone else with whom the complainant is in a romantic, dating, or sexual relationship.[31] This particular form of deception is more serious than other forms of deception that the RCC nonconsensual sexual conduct offense (RCC § 22E-1307) may prohibit. This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute.

Third, the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state for engaging in a sexual act or sexual contact with the complainant or causing the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act or sexual contact. The current D.C. Code sexual abuse statutes that comprise the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute[32] do not specify any culpable mental state for engaging in or submitting to a sexual act or sexual contact. Due to the statutory definition of "sexual contact,"[33] the second degree gradations of these offenses require an "intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, or arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person," although the DCCA has sustained a conviction for second degree child sexual abuse when the jury instructions required that the actor "knowingly" touched the complainant and erroneously omitted the additional intent requirement.[34] There is no DCCA case law regarding commission of a "sexual act" in the current statutes that comprise the RCC sexual exploitation of an adult statute.[35] The RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute resolves these ambiguities by requiring a "knowingly" culpable mental state in each gradation for engaging in a sexual act or sexual contact with the complainant or causing the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act or sexual contact. Requiring, at a minimum, a knowing culpable mental state for the elements of an offense that make otherwise legal conduct illegal is a generally accepted legal principle.[36] Requiring a Lack of verbal or physical resistance or submission by the victim, resulting from the use of force, threats, or coercion by the defendant shall not constitute consent.").

[31] See, e.g., People v. Morales, 150 Cal. Rptr. 3d 920 (2013) (Defendant entered the dark bedroom of complainant after seeing her boyfriend leave late at night, and has sex with the complainant by pretending to be the boyfriend).

[32] As discussed elsewhere in this commentary as a clarificatory change to District law, the sexual exploitation of an adult statute codifies into one offense, with the same penalty, the current sexual abuse of a secondary education student statutes (D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.03 and 22-3009.04.), the current sexual abuse of a ward statutes (D.C. Code §§ 22-3013 and 22-3014), and the current sexual abuse of a patient or client statutes (D.C. Code §§ 22-3015 and 22-3016).

[33] D.C. Code § 22-3001(9) (defining "sexual contact.").

[34] Green v. United States, 948 A.2d 554, 558, 561 (D.C. 2008) (affirming appellant's conviction for second degree child sexual abuse when the jury instructions required that the appellant "knowingly" touched the complainant and omitted the "intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, or arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person" requirement because "no rational jury could have found that appellant touched [the complainants] in a way consistent with the trial court's jury instruction . . . without also finding the requisite intent.").

[35] The DCCA case law has characterized the current first and third degree sexual abuse statutes, which concern a sexual act, as "general intent" crimes. However, it is not clear what specific culpable mental state must be proven for such "general intent" crimes—e.g., knowledge or recklessness. See commentary to RCC 22E-1301, Sexual assault, above, for further discussion.

"knowingly" culpable mental state may also clarify that the gradations that require "sexual contact" are lesser included offenses of the gradations that require a "sexual act," an issue which has been litigated in current DCCA case law, but remains unresolved.[37] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute.

Fourth, the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute specifies that a coach, teacher, counselor, principal, administrator, nurse, or security officer at a secondary school includes employees, contractors, and volunteers. The current D.C. Code sexual abuse of a secondary education student statutes list the prohibited actors in a secondary school and do not specify if the actors must be employees, or if contractors or volunteers are sufficient.[38] There is no DCCA case law on this issue. Resolving this ambiguity, the RCC statute specifies that the actor must be "working as an employee, contractor, or volunteer," which is consistent with the requirement in subparagraphs (a)(2)(D) and (b)(2)(D) of the statute for wards, patients, clients, and prisoners, and subsection (G) of the RCC definition of "position of trust with or authority over" (RCC § 22E-701). The specified secondary school actors have positions of authority that make otherwise consensual sexual activity criminal, regardless of whether the actors are employees, contractors, or volunteers. This revision improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute and removes a possible gap in liability.

Fifth, the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute requires that in the specified institutions, such as hospitals and treatment facilities, the actor and the complainant be at the same institution. The current D.C. Code sexual abuse of a ward, patient, client, or prisoner statutes prohibit specified actors, such as hospital staff and ambulance drivers from engaging in a sexual act or sexual contact with a "ward, patient, client, or prisoner."[39] It is unclear whether a complainant must be at the same institution as the [37] In re E.H. is a child sexual abuse case, but the court's reasoning regarding the relationship between "sexual act" and "sexual contact" may be instructive for the general sexual abuse statutes. In In re E.H., the appellant was convicted of first degree child sexual abuse, but the court reversed the conviction due to insufficient evidence. In re E.H., 967 A.2d 1270, 1271, 1275 (D.C. 2009). The court declined to address whether second degree child sexual abuse is a lesser included offense of first degree child sexual abuse, but did note that "[a]t oral argument, counsel for the government agreed with appellant's counsel that second-degree sexual abuse is not a lesser-included offense of first-degree sexual abuse because, at least in two instances, to prove a "sexual act" (for first-degree) it is not necessary to show the specific intent required to prove "sexual contact" (for second-degree)." Id. at 1276 n. 9. The DCCA further noted that "[i]n general, a crime can only be a lesser-included offense of another if its required proof contains some, but not all, of the elements of the greater offense" and "the gravamen of whether a crime is the lesser-included offense of another is legislative intent. Id. (internal quotation omitted).

[39] D.C. Code §§ 22-3013; 22-3014. The text of first degree sexual abuse of a ward, patient, client, or prisoner (D.C. Code 22-3013) is:

> Any staff member, employee, contract employee, consultant, or volunteer at a hospital, treatment facility, detention or correctional facility, group home, or other institution; anyone who is an ambulance driver or attendant, a bus driver or attendant, or person who participates in the transportation of a ward, patient, client, or prisoner to and from such institutions; or any official custodian of a ward, patient, client, or prisoner, who engages in a sexual act with a ward, patient, client, or prisoner, or causes a ward, patient, client, or prisoner to engage in or submit to a sexual act shall be imprisoned for not more than 10 years or fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, or both.

actor in order to satisfy this requirement. There is no DCCA case law on this issue. Resolving this ambiguity, sub-subparagraphs (a)(2)(D)(i)(I), (a)(2)(D)(i)(II), (a)(2)(D)(i)(III), (b)(2)(D)(i)(I), (b)(2)(D)(i)(II), and (b)(2)(D)(i)(III) of the revised statute refer to "that institution"—the same institution as the actor. Limiting the statute to sexual conduct when the actor and the complainant are at the same institution tailors the statute to inherently coercive situations that make otherwise consensual sexual activity criminal. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Sixth, the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute includes complainants that are "awaiting admission" to specified institutions. The current D.C. Code sexual abuse of a ward, patient, client, or prisoner statutes prohibit specified actors, such as hospital staff and ambulance drivers from engaging in a sexual act or sexual contact with a "ward, patient, client, or prisoner."[40] There is no DCCA case law interpreting this provision and it is unclear whether it extends to a complainant that is awaiting admission to one of the specified institutions. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised statute specifically includes complainants that are "awaiting admission" to specified institutions. A complainant that is awaiting admission at a specified institution has a similar vulnerability as a ward, patient, client, or prisoner that has been admitted to such an institution. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Seventh, the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute includes an actor that is a "law enforcement officer" and recklessly disregards that the complainant is in "official custody," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701, a specified type of detention, or on probation or parole. The current D.C. Code sexual abuse of a ward, patient, client, or prisoner statutes prohibit "any official custodian of a ward, patient, client, or prisoner" from engaging in sexual activity with a "ward, patient, client, or prisoner."[41] The current D.C. Code does not define "official custodian," but does define "official custody."[42] The [40] D.C. Code §§ 22-3013; 22-3014. The text of first degree sexual abuse of a ward, patient, client, or prisoner (D.C. Code 22-3013) is:

> Any staff member, employee, contract employee, consultant, or volunteer at a hospital, treatment facility, detention or correctional facility, group home, or other institution; anyone who is an ambulance driver or attendant, a bus driver or attendant, or person who participates in the transportation of a ward, patient, client, or prisoner to and from such institutions; or any official custodian of a ward, patient, client, or prisoner, who engages in a sexual act with a ward, patient, client, or prisoner, or causes a ward, patient, client, or prisoner to engage in or submit to a sexual act shall be imprisoned for not more than 10 years or fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, or both.

The text of second degree sexual abuse of a ward, patient, client, or prisoner (D.C. Code 22-3014) is identical, differing only in requiring "sexual contact."

[42] D.C. Code § 22-3001(6) (defining "official custody" as "(A) Detention following arrest for an offense; following surrender in lieu of arrest for an offense; following a charge or conviction of an offense, or an allegation or finding of juvenile delinquency; following commitment as a material witness; following or pending civil commitment proceedings, or pending extradition, deportation, or exclusion; (B) Custody for purposes incident to any detention described in subparagraph (A) of this paragraph, including transportation, medical diagnosis or treatment, court appearance, work, and recreation; or (C) Probation or parole.").

term "official custody" was deleted from the D.C. Code sexual abuse of a ward, patient, client or prisoner statutes in 2007.[43] The legislative history does not discuss why the definition of "official custody" was left in the D.C. Code. The legislative history does state that the current D.C. Code sexual abuse of a ward, patient, client, or prisoner statutes were intended to "expand the list of individuals who are prohibited from engaging in sexual relations when the person provides care to a patient or other vulnerable population."[44] It is unclear whether the current D.C. Code definition of "official custody" is intended to apply to "official custodian" in the current D.C. Code sexual abuse of a ward, patient, client, or prisoner statutes. To the extent that it does not, deleting the definition of "official custody" narrows, rather than expands, the scope of the current D.C. Code sexual abuse of a ward, patient, client, or prisoner statutes as they pertain to individuals in the custody of law enforcement officers or on probation or parole.

Resolving this ambiguity, the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute codifies as a discrete basis of liability an actor that is a "law enforcement officer" when the complainant is in "official custody," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701, a specified type of detention, or on probation or parole. The RCC definition of "official custody"—full submission after an arrest or substantial physical restraint after an arrest—is narrower than the current D.C. Code definition. However, the revised offense incorporates the substance of the current D.C. Code definition of "official custody" with the possible exceptions of: 1) "Surrender in lieu of an arrest"; and 2) "Custody for purposes incident to any detention described in subparagraph (A) of [the definition of "official custody"], including transportation, medical diagnosis or treatment, court

[43] Omnibus Public Safety Amendment Act of 2006, 2006 District of Columbia Laws 16-306 (Act 16-482) (2006 Omnibus Act). The original D.C. Code sexual abuse of a ward, patient, client, or prisoner statutes required that the victim be in the "official custody" of certain institutions and under the "supervisory or disciplinary authority" of the defendant. The original D.C. Code first degree sexual abuse of a ward statute was:

> Whoever engages in a sexual act with another person or causes another person to engage in or submit to a sexual act when that other person:
> (1) Is in official custody, or is a ward or resident, on a permanent or temporary basis, of a hospital, treatment facility, or other institution; and
> (2) Is under the supervisory or disciplinary authority of the actor shall be imprisoned for not more than 10 years and, in addition, may be fined in an amount not to exceed $100,000.

The original D.C. Code second degree sexual abuse of a ward, patient, client, or prisoner statute was the same, differing only in penalty and requiring a "sexual contact" instead of a "sexual act."

The legislative history for the 2006 Omnibus Act stated that the "supervisory or disciplinary authority" requirement created problems "successfully prosecuting persons who take advantage of inmates, group home residents, and persons with mental retardation." See Statement of Robert J. Spagnoletti, Attorney for the District of Columbia, at the May 31, 2005 Public Hearing on B16-247 the Omnibus Public Safety Act of 2005, B16-172 the Criminal Code Reform Commission Establishment Act of 2005, and B16-130 the Criminal Code Modernization Amendment Act of 2005 at 23. The 2006 Omnibus Public Safety Amendment Act deleted the requirements of "official custody" and "supervisory or disciplinary authority." It expanded the sexual abuse of a ward statutes to their current D.C. Code versions, including adding the language, "any official custodian of a ward, patient, client, or prisoner," but did not define the term "official custodian."

appearance, work, and recreation." Subparagraphs (a)(2)(D), (b)(2)(D), (a)(2)(E), and (b)(2)(E) will provide liability for these situations when they also satisfy the requirements of the offense. Law enforcement officers have a position of authority over complainants that are in in "official custody," a specified type of detention, or on probation or parole such that otherwise consensual sexual activity is inherently coercive and criminalized. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute and removes a possible gap in liability.

Eighth, the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state for offense elements concerning the actor's own status and actions. The current D.C. Code sexual abuse statutes that comprise the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute[45] do not specify culpable mental states for the many facts regarding the actor's status or actions that must be proven for the offenses, apart from the "intent" required for "sexual contact."[46] There is no DCCA case law on point. Resolving this ambiguity, the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state for the alternative facts that constitute the offense and involve the actor's own status or actions.[47] Requiring, at a minimum, a knowing culpable mental state for the elements of an offense that make otherwise legal conduct illegal is a generally accepted legal principle.[48] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statutes.

Ninth, the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute requires a "recklessly" culpable mental state as to facts about the complainant's status. The current D.C. Code sexual abuse statutes that comprise the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute[49] do not specify culpable mental states for the many facts that must be proven for the offenses, apart from the "intent" required by the statutory definition of "sexual contact."[50] There is [45] As discussed elsewhere in this commentary as a clarificatory change to District law, the sexual exploitation of an adult statute codifies into one offense, with the same penalty, the current sexual abuse of a secondary education student statutes (D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.03 and 22-3009.04.), the current sexual abuse of a ward statutes (D.C. Code §§ 22-3013 and 22-3014), and the current sexual abuse of a patient or client statutes (D.C. Code §§ 22-3015 and 22-3016).

[46] D.C. Code § 22-3001(9).

[47] Specifically, the RCC sexual exploitation of an adult offense requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state as to the following alternative elements: the actor is a "a coach, not including a coach who is a secondary school student; a teacher, counselor, principal, administrator, nurse, or security officer at a secondary school, working as an employee, contractor, or volunteer"; the actor falsely represents to be someone else with whom the complainant is in a romantic, dating, or sexual relationship; the actor is a healthcare provider, a health professional, or a religious leader in D.C. Code § 14-309, or purports to be such; the actor falsely represents that sexual conduct is for a bona fide medical, therapeutic, or professional purpose; the actor commits the sexual act or sexual contact during a consultation, examination, treatment, therapy, or other provision of professional services; the actor commits the sexual act or sexual contact while the complainant is a patient or client of the actor; the actor "works as an employee, contractor, or volunteer at or for a hospital, treatment facility, detention or correctional facility, group home, or institution housing persons who are not free to leave at will"; and the actor "works as a law enforcement officer."

[49] As discussed elsewhere in this commentary as a clarificatory change to District law, the sexual exploitation of an adult statute codifies into one offense, with the same penalty, the current sexual abuse of a secondary education student statutes (D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.03 and 22-3009.04.), the current sexual abuse of a ward statutes (D.C. Code §§ 22-3013 and 22-3014), and the current sexual abuse of a patient or client statutes (D.C. Code §§ 22-3015 and 22-3016).

[50] D.C. Code § 22-3001(9).

no DCCA case law on point. Resolving this ambiguity, the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute requires a "recklessly" culpable mental state for the alternative facts that constitute the offense and involve the complainant's status.[51] Requiring, at a minimum, a knowing culpable mental state for the elements of an offense that make otherwise legal conduct illegal is a generally accepted legal principle.[52] However, a lower culpable mental state may be justified given the heightened power, responsibilities, and training of a person of authority in a secondary school, healthcare providers, clergy, persons who work at custodial institutions, and law enforcement officers. Recklessness has been upheld in some cases as a minimal basis for punishing morally culpable crime.[53] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statutes.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation offense combines in one offense the current D.C. Code sexual abuse of a secondary education student, sexual abuse of a ward, and sexual abuse of a patient or client offenses, with the same penalty. The current D.C. Code codifies as separate statutes sexual abuse of a secondary education student, sexual abuse of a ward, and sexual abuse of a patient or client, but these statutes all have the same penalties—a maximum term of imprisonment of 10 years for first degree, requiring a "sexual act"[54] and a maximum term of imprisonment of 5 years for second degree, requiring "sexual contact."[55] Having separate statutes for these various offenses is unnecessarily confusing given that their penalties are equivalent and all pertain to sexual conduct with vulnerable adult populations. This change improves the clarity and organization of the revised statute.

Second, the RCC second degree sexual abuse by exploitation statute requires a "sexual contact" with a secondary education student. The current D.C. Code second degree sexual abuse of a secondary education student statute prohibits engaging in "sexual conduct" with specified secondary education students under the age of 20 years

[51] Specifically, the RCC sexual exploitation of an adult offense requires a "recklessly" culpable mental state as to the following alternative elements: that the complainant is an enrolled student in the same secondary school as the actor or receives educational services or attends educational programming at the same secondary school as the actor; that the secondary education student complainant is under the age of 20 years; that the complainant is "impaired from declining participation" in sexual activity; that the complainant is a ward, patient, client, or prisoner at a specified institution; that the complainant is awaiting admission to a specified institution; that the complainant is in transport to or from a specified institution; that the complainant is in "official custody," as that term is defined in § RCC 22E-701, a specified type of detention, or on probation or parole.

[55] D.C. Code §§ 22-3014 (second degree sexual abuse of a ward); 22-3016 (second degree sexual abuse of a patient or client). Second degree sexual abuse of a secondary education student prohibits "sexual conduct" with a student under the age of 20 years enrolled in the same school or school system and is punishable by a maximum term of imprisonment of 5 years. D.C. Code § 22-3009.04. As is discussed elsewhere in this commentary, "sexual conduct" appears to be a typo for "sexual contact."

or causing specified secondary education students to engage in "sexual conduct."[56] "Sexual conduct" is not defined in the current sexual abuse statutes, nor does it appear in any other sexual abuse statute. In addition, the lower gradations of all the current sexual abuse statutes require "sexual contact."[57] There is no legislative history or DCCA case law for the current sexual abuse of a secondary education student statutes. For clarification, second degree of the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute codifies "sexual contact." This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Third, the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute relies on the general attempt statute to define what conduct constitutes an attempt and the appropriate penalty. Current D.C. Code § 22-3018 provides a separate attempt statute applicable to all current sexual offenses.[58] Under the statute, if the maximum term of imprisonment for the underlying offense is life, an attempt has a maximum term of imprisonment of 15 years.[59] Otherwise the maximum term of imprisonment is "not more than 1/2 of the maximum prison sentence authorized for the offense."[60] These attempt penalties differ from the attempt penalties established under D.C. Code § 22-1803, the current general attempt statute.[61] In the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute, the RCC General Part's attempt provisions (RCC § 22E-301) establish the requirements to prove an attempt and applicable penalties for sexual assault, consistent with other offenses. While a separate attempt statute for sex offenses may be justified in the current D.C. Code given the generally lower penalties available through the general attempt statute in D.C. Code § 22-1803, the penalties in the RCC general attempt provision provide penalties at ½ the maximum imprisonment sentence. Elimination of a separate attempt statute for sex offenses, consequently, has no substantive effect on available penalties. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute.

[61] D.C. Code § 22-1803 establishes general attempt penalties for offenses that do not otherwise have an attempt penalty specified. "Whoever shall attempt to commit any crime, which attempt is not otherwise made punishable by chapter 19 of An Act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901 (31 Stat. 1321), shall be punished by a fine not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or by imprisonment for not more than 180 days, or both. Except, whoever shall attempt to commit a crime of violence as defined in § 23-1331 shall be punished by a fine not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or by imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both." D.C. Code § 22-1803.

Fourth, the marriage and domestic partnership defense in the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute does not refer to other offenses. The current D.C. Code marriage or domestic partnership defense states that marriage or domestic partnership is a defense to sexual abuse "prosecuted alone or in conjunction with § 22-3018 [sex offense attempt statute] or § 22-403 [assault with intent to commit certain offenses]."[62] There is no DCCA case law interpreting this provision. The language is not included in the current jury instruction for the marriage or domestic partnership defense.[63] The marriage or domestic partnership defense in the revised sexual abuse by exploitation statute applies only to prosecution for the revised sexual abuse by exploitation offense. In the RCC, the revised sex offenses no longer have their own attempt statute, and there are no longer separate "assault with intent to" offenses, or "AWI" offenses. Similarly, the revised assault statutes in the RCC no longer include separate "assault with intent to" crimes and instead provide liability through application of the general attempt statute in RCC § 22E-301 to the completed offenses.[64] Deleting the "prosecuted alone or in conjunction with language" improves the clarity of the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation offense.

Fifth, the marriage and domestic partnership defense in the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute makes two clarificatory changes to the current defense.[65] First, the [62] As is discussed in this commentary as a clarificatory change to law, the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute combines into one statute several current sexual abuse statutes: sexual abuse of a secondary education student, sexual abuse of a ward, and sexual abuse of a patient or client offenses. It is unclear whether a marriage and domestic partnership defense applies to the current sexual abuse of a secondary education student statutes. The current sexual abuse of a secondary education student statutes are codified at D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.03 and 22-3009.04, which fall into the range of specified statutes for the marriage and domestic partnership defense codified at D.C. Code 22 § 3011(b): "Marriage or domestic partnership between the defendant and the child or minor at the time of the offense is a defense . . . to a prosecution under §§ 22-3008 to 22-3010.01, prosecuted alone or in conjunction with charges under § 22-3018 or § 22-403, involving only the defendant and the child or minor." The defense refers to a "child" or "minor," which appears to exclude a secondary education student, and although the sexual abuse of a secondary education student statutes fall within the specified range of offenses, the defense was never specifically amended to reflect the codification of the sexual abuse of a secondary education student statutes. However, this appears to be a drafting error.

The marriage and domestic partnership defense for the current sexual abuse of a ward statutes (D.C. Code §§ 22-3013 and 22-3014) and the current sexual abuse of a patient or client statutes (D.C. Code §§ 22-3015 and 22-3016) is codified at D.C. Code § 22-3017(b): "That the defendant and victim were married or in a domestic partnership at the time of the offense is a defense, which the defendant must prove by a preponderance of the evidence, to a prosecution under §§ 22-3013 to 22-3016, prosecuted alone or in conjunction with charges under § 22-3018."

[64] See Commentary to RCC § 22E-1202 (revised assault statute).

[65] As is discussed in this commentary as a clarificatory change to law, the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute combines into one statute several current sexual abuse statutes: sexual abuse of a secondary education student, sexual abuse of a ward, and sexual abuse of a patient or client offenses. D.C. Code § 22-3017(b) establishes a marriage or domestic partnership defense for the current sexual abuse of a revised marriage and domestic partnership defense replaces "at the time of the offense" with "at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact." Referring to marriage or domestic partnership at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute. Second, the revised marriage and domestic partnership statute, by use of the phrase "in fact," applies strict liability to the element that the actor and the complainant are in a marriage or domestic partnership at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact. The current marriage or domestic partnership statute does not specify a culpable mental state for this requirement, and doing so improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Sixth, the revised sexual abuse by exploitation statute does not codify a separate provision stating that consent is not a defense. The current sexual abuse statutes specify that "consent is not a defense" for certain sexual abuse statutes.[66] However, nothing in the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute suggests that consent is a defense. Codifying a provision that explicitly states consent is not a defense is potentially confusing for other RCC offenses which do not take this approach of stating defenses that do not apply. Deleting the current prohibition on consent as a defense is not intended to change current District law.

ward statutes (D.C. Code §§ 22-3013 and 22-3014), as well as the current sexual abuse of a patient or client statutes (D.C. Code §§ 22-3015 and 22-3016). D.C. Code § 22-3017(b) ("That the defendant and victim were married or in a domestic partnership at the time of the offense is a defense, which the defendant must prove by a preponderance of the evidence, to a prosecution under §§ 22-3013 to 22-3016, prosecuted alone or in conjunction with charges under § 22-3018.").

It is unclear whether there is a marriage or domestic partnership affirmative defense for the current sexual abuse of a secondary education student statutes, codified at D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.03 and 22-3009.04. D.C. Code § 22-3011 states that "Marriage or domestic partnership between the defendant and the child or minor at the time of the offense is a defense, which the defendant must establish by a preponderance of the evidence, to a prosecution under §§ 22-3008 to 22-3010.01, prosecuted alone or in conjunction with charges under § 22-3018 or § 22-403, involving only the defendant and the child or minor." The current sexual abuse of a secondary education student statutes fall into the range of specified statutes for the affirmative defense. However, the provision was never specifically amended to reflect the codification of the sexual abuse of a secondary education student statutes. Regardless, it would be inconsistent to exclude the sexual abuse of a secondary education student statutes from the marriage or domestic partnership affirmative defense that applies to the sexual abuse of a child and sexual abuse of a minor statutes.

[66] As is discussed in this commentary as a clarificatory change to law, the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute combines into one statute several current sexual abuse statutes: sexual abuse of a secondary education student, sexual abuse of a ward, and sexual abuse of a patient or client offenses.

It is unclear whether a provision barring consent as a defense applies to the current sexual abuse of a secondary education student statutes. The current sexual abuse of a secondary education student statutes are codified at D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.03 and 22-3009.04, which fall into the range of specified statutes for the consent prohibition codified at D.C. Code 22 § 3011(a): "Neither mistake of age nor consent is a defense to a prosecution under §§ 22-3008 to 22-3010.01, prosecuted alone or in conjunction with charges under § 22-3018 or § 22-403." Although the sexual abuse of a secondary education student statutes fall within the specified range of offenses, the provision was never specifically amended to reflect the codification of the sexual abuse of a secondary education student statutes. Regardless, it would be inconsistent to permit a consent defense for the sexual abuse of a secondary education student statutes when it is prohibited for most of the other current sexual abuse statutes.

The prohibition on consent for the current sexual abuse of a ward statutes (D.C. Code §§ 22-3013 and 22-3014) and the current sexual abuse of a patient or client statutes (D.C. Code §§ 22-3015 and 22-3016) is codified at D.C. Code § 22-3017(a): "Consent is not a defense to a prosecution under §§ 22-3013 to 22-3016, prosecuted alone or in conjunction with charges under § 22-3018."

Seventh, the revised statute specifies that an actor at a specified institution, such as a hospital, must work as "an employee, contractor, or volunteer at or for" the specified institution. The current D.C. Code sexual abuse of a ward, patient, client, or prisoner statutes include "[a]ny staff member, employee, contract employee, consultant, or volunteer at a" specified institution.[67] There is no DCCA case law interpreting this language. The RCC statute retains "employee" and "volunteer" from the current D.C. Code statutes, and replaces "contract employee" with "contractor" for clarity. The RCC statute deletes "staff member" as duplicative with an "employee" or "contractor," and deletes "contractor." It is unclear how a "consultant" differs from an "employee" or "contractor." However, to the extent that a "consultant" is not an "employee, contractor, or volunteer at or for" a specified institution, the consultant may not be in a position of authority over a complainant such that otherwise consensual sexual activity is inherently coercive and criminalized. Sexual activity between such a consultant and a complainant at an institution may be prohibited under the RCC sexual assault statute (RCC § 22E-1301) if there is a coercive threat or the complainant is incapacitated. The commentary to the RCC sexual assault statute has been updated to reflect this is a clarificatory change in law.

RCC § 22E-1304. Sexually Suggestive Conduct with a Minor.

Explanatory Note. The RCC sexually suggestive conduct with a minor offense prohibits comparatively less serious sexual conduct with certain complainants under the age of 18 years, such as touching a complainant with intent to cause the sexual arousal or sexual gratification of any person. The offense also prohibits a sexual act or sexual contact with certain complainants, making it a lesser included offense of the RCC sexual abuse of a minor statute.[1] The offense has a single penalty gradation. The revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor offense replaces the current misdemeanor sexual abuse of a child or minor statute.[2] The revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute also replaces in relevant part four distinct provisions for the sexual abuse offenses: the marriage and domestic partnership defense,[3] the attempt statute,[4] the limitation on prosecutorial immunity,[5] and the aggravating sentencing factors.[6]

Paragraph (a)(1), subparagraph (a)(1)(A), subparagraph (a)(1)(B), and sub-subparagraphs (a)(1)(B)(i) and (a)(1)(B)(ii) establish the different age and relationship requirements for the actor and the complainant in the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute. Paragraph (a)(1) requires that the actor "in fact" is at least 18 years of age and at least four years older than the complainant. "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state for a given element. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "in fact" specified in paragraph (a)(1) applies to every element that follows until a culpable mental state is specified. In paragraph (a)(1), this means that there is no culpable mental state required for the actor's age or the required four year age gap.

In addition to the requirements in paragraph (a)(1), subparagraph (a)(1)(A) and subparagraph (a)(1)(B) specify alternative age and relationship requirements for liability. Subparagraph (a)(1)(A) requires that the actor is "reckless" as to the fact that the complainant is under the age of 16 years. "Reckless" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor is aware of a substantial risk that the complainant is under the age of 16 years. In the alternative, but also in addition to the requirements in paragraph (a)(1), subparagraph (a)(1)(B) and sub-subparagraph (a)(1)(B)(i) require that the actor is "reckless" as to the fact that the complainant is under 18 years of age and paragraph (a)(1)(B) and sub-subparagraph (a)(1)(B)(ii) require that the actor "knows" that he or she is in a "position of trust with or authority over" the complainant. "Reckless" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor is aware of a substantial risk that the complainant is under the age of 18 years. "Knowingly" is a

The revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute and other RCC Chapter 13 statutes each account for liability changes based on marriage or domestic partnership in the plain language of the statutes and D.C. defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor must be practically certain that the he or she is in a "position of trust with or authority over" the complainant. "Position of trust with or authority over" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that includes individuals such as parents, siblings, school employees, and coaches.

Paragraph (a)(2), subparagraph (a)(2)(A), and sub-subparagraphs (a)(2)(A)(i) through (a)(2)(A)(iii) specify one type of prohibited conduct for the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute. The actor must "engage[] in" a "sexual act" that is visible to the complaint, a "sexual contact" that is visible to the complainant, or a "sexual or sexualized display" of the genitals, pubic area, or anus that is visible to the complainant. "Sexual act" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that specifies types of sexual penetration or contact between the mouth and certain body parts. "Sexual contact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means touching the specified body parts, such as genitalia, of any person with the desire to sexually abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, arouse, or gratify any person. Subparagraph (a)(2)(A) specifies a culpable mental state of "purposely" and per the rule of construction in RCC § 22E-207, applies to the prohibited conduct in sub-subparagraphs (a)(2)(A)(i), (a)(2)(A)(ii), and (a)(2)(A)(iii). "Purposely" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor must "consciously desire" that he or she engages in a sexual act that is visible to the complaint, a sexual contact that is visible to the complainant, or a sexual or sexualized display of the genitals, pubic area, or anus that is visible to the complainant. To the extent that conduct commonly understood as masturbation meets the RCC definitions of "sexual act" or "sexual contact," or is a sexual or sexualized display of the genitals, pubic area, or anus, that conduct falls under subparagraph (a)(2)(A) and sub-subparagraphs (a)(2)(A)(i), (a)(2)(A)(ii), and (a)(2)(A)(iii), provided the other requirements of the offense are met.

Subparagraph (a)(2)(B) and its sub-subparagraphs specify another type of prohibited conduct for the revised sexually suggestive conduct statute. Sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(B)(i)(I) prohibits "touching or kissing any person, either directly or through the clothing"[7] and sub-sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(B)(ii)(II) prohibits "removing clothing from any person." Sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(B)(i) prohibits the actor engaging in either type of conduct with the complainant or causing the complainant to engage in or submit to either type of conduct. Subparagraph (a)(2)(B) specifies a culpable mental state of "knowingly" and, per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, this "knowingly" culpable mental state applies to all elements in sub-subparagraphs (a)(2)(B)(i) and sub-subparagraphs (a)(2)(B)(i)(I) and (a)(2)(B)(i)(II). "Knowingly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she engages in with the complainant, or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to, touching or kissing any person, either directly or through the clothing, or removing clothing from any person. Sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(B)(ii) requires that the prohibited conduct under subparagraph (a)(2)(B) be done with "intent to cause the sexual arousal or sexual gratification of any person." "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor was practically certain that he or she would cause the sexual arousal or sexual gratification of any person. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that such an arousal or gratification actually occurred, just that the defendant believed to a practical certainty that such arousal or gratification would result.

Subparagraph (a)(2)(C) specifies the final type of prohibited conduct for the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute—engages in a sexual act or sexual contact with the complainant or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act or sexual contact. Subparagraph (a)(2)(C) specifies that the prohibited culpable mental state for this conduct is "knowingly." "Knowingly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she will engage in a sexual act or sexual contact with the complainant or cause the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act or sexual contact. This language establishes that the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute is a lesser included offense of the RCC sexual abuse of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1302) and is intended to have the same scope as in the RCC sexual abuse of a minor statute.

Subsection (b) establishes an affirmative defense for conduct involving only the actor and the complainant that the actor and the complainant were in a marriage or "domestic partnership" at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact. "Domestic partnership" is defined in RCC § 22E-701. "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element, here that the actor and the complainant are, "in fact," in a marriage or domestic partnership at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact. The general provision in RCC § 22E-201 establishes the requirements for the burden of production and the burden of proof for all affirmative defenses in the RCC.

Subsection (c) specifies relevant penalties for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (d) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute clearly changes current District law in nine main ways.

First, the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute replaces the prohibition on "touching one's own genitalia or that of a third person" with engaging in a "sexual act" that is visible to the complainant, a "sexual contact" that is visible to the complainant, or a specific sexualized display that is visible to the complainant. The current D.C. Code misdemeanor sexual abuse of a child or minor (MSACM) statute prohibits "engaging in" "touching one's own genitalia or that of a third person" with a child or minor.[8] The terms "touching" and "genitalia" are not statutorily defined and the only DCCA case law concerning this provision sustained an attempted MSACM conviction when the actor touched his penis "in front of" the complainant.[9] In contrast, the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute prohibits engaging in a "sexual act" that is visible to the complainant, a "sexual contact" that is visible to the complainant, or a sexualized display of the genitals, pubic area, or anus that is visible to the complainant. The scope of "touching one's own genitalia" in the current MSACM statute is unclear and if interpreted narrowly, there would be no liability under the current MSACM statute for showing genitalia, without touching it, or for touching sexual areas that are not "genitalia," such as the anus or pubic area more generally. The revised sexually suggestive conduct statute expands the offense to include a "sexual act" or "sexual contact," as those terms are defined in RCC § 22E-701, that is visible to the complainant, or a sexualized display of the genitals, pubic area, or anus that is visible to the complainant.[10] This change improves the clarity of the revised statute, its consistency with the requirement in the RCC sexual abuse of a minor statute of a sexual act or sexual contact, and removes gaps in liability.

[8] D.C. Code § 22-3010.01(b), (b)(4).

[9] Sutton v. United States, 140 A.3d 1198, 1201, 1202 (D.C. 2016) (holding that the evidence was sufficient for attempted misdemeanor sexual abuse of a child under D.C. Code § 22-3010.01 when appellant touched his penis "in front of" the complainant).

Second, the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute requires a "purposely" culpable mental state for engaging in a sexual act that is visible to the complainant, a sexual contact that is visible to the complainant, or a specific sexualized display that is visible to the complainant. The current D.C. Code MSACM statute requires "engaging in . . . touching one's own genitalia or that of a third person"[11] in a way "which is intended to cause or reasonably causes the sexual arousal or sexual gratification of any person."[12] The current D.C. Code "reasonably causes" language may mean that the offense is a general (rather than specific) intent offense,[13] or may indicate a culpable mental state similar to negligence as defined in the RCC. There is no DCCA case law interpreting this language. In contrast, the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute requires a "purposely" culpable mental state for engaging in a sexual act that is visible to the complainant, a sexual contact that is visible to the complainant, or a specific sexualized display that is visible to the complainant. A knowledge culpable mental state would criminalize adult sexual conduct in front of a minor, particularly in a small or shared living space. The "purposely" culpable mental state requires that the defendant consciously desires that the sexual act, sexual contact, or sexualized display is visible to the complainant. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute.

Third, the revised sexually suggestive conduct statute prohibits "touching or kissing any person, either directly or through the clothing" and "removing clothing from any person." The current D.C. Code MSACM statute prohibits: 1) "touching a child or minor inside his or her clothing"[14]; 2) "touching a child or minor inside or outside his or her clothing close to the genitalia, breast, or buttocks"[15]; and 3) "placing one's tongue in the mouth of the child or minor."[16] The various requirements for touching in the current statute may lead to counterintuitive liability[17] and it is unclear whether the current statute includes touching a naked child or minor, or undressing a child or minor. DCCA case law has interpreted "touching a child or minor inside or outside his or her clothing close to the genitalia, breast, or buttocks" as including incidental contact with these areas during a hug with the requisite intent.[18] In contrast, the revised sexually suggestive conduct statute prohibits "touching or kissing any person, either directly or through the clothing" and "removing clothing from any person." The revised statute simplifies the requirements for liability by removing the focus on where and how the complainant was touched or undressed and instead making the defendant's intent the deciding factor. Any touching, kissing, or removal of clothing, when done with the intent to cause the sexual arousal or sexual gratification of any person, is sufficient for liability, provided the other requirements of the offense are met.[19] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute and removes gaps in liability.

[10] To the extent that conduct commonly understood as masturbation meets the RCC definitions of "sexual act" or "sexual contact," or is a sexual or sexualized display of the genitals, pubic area, or anus, that conduct falls under subparagraph (a)(2)(A) and sub-subparagraphs (a)(2)(A)(i), (a)(2)(A)(ii), and (a)(2)(A)(iii), provided the other requirements of the offense are met.

[13] DCCA case law has characterized the current first and third degree sexual abuse statutes, which concern a sexual act, as "general intent" crimes. However, it is not clear what specific culpable mental state must be proven for such "general intent" crimes—e.g., knowledge or recklessness. See commentary to RCC 22E-1301, Sexual assault, above, for further discussion.

[17] For example, under the current misdemeanor sexual abuse of a child or minor statute, a person would not have liability for touching a minor complainant on the complainant's bare foot or licking the complainant's face with the intent to sexually arouse or gratify himself or herself.

[18] In Augustin v. United States, appellant was convicted of MSACM on the basis of "intimate" hugs with the minor complainant when, while clothed, their "upper bodies, stomachs, hips, and lower areas were all in contact." Augustin v. United States, No. 17-CF-906, 2020 WL 6325889, at *1 (D.C. 2020). Appellant testified that, while the hugs were initially "brief and causal in nature," they became "slightly longer, up to four to five seconds in duration." Id. Appellant characterized three or four of these embraces as "intense" and "intimate" and like "the kind of hugs [one] would exchange with [one's] boyfriend." Id. The opinion discusses additional facts regarding the hugs and the relationship and communication between the actor and the appellant, which the court used in assessing the actor's intent with the hugs. Id. at 1-2, 6-7.

Appellant argued that the evidence was insufficient to prove that he "touch[ed]" the complainant's breast or other specified private parts in paragraph (b)(2) of the current MSACM statute (prohibiting "[t]ouching a child or minor inside or outside his or her clothing close to the genitalia, anus, breast, or buttocks."). Id. at 3. Appellant argued that by using "touching," the legislature "must have meant to require more than merely incidental physical contact between any part of the defendant's body with the area of [a complainant's] 'genitalia, anus, breast, or buttocks.'" Id. at 4. Appellant argued that "touching" "requires an act of feeling one of those areas with one's tactile senses—i.e. generally speaking, with one's fingers, hands, genitals, or other sensory organs." Id. (emphasis in original). Appellant argued "mere hugs" do not involve such sensory touching and that the "incidental physical contact of parts of . . . bodies in [mere hugs] is not an act or sensory perception or exploration." Id.

The DCCA agreed with appellant that the current MSACM statute "does not sweepingly criminalize all hugging" but did not accept appellant's "somewhat restrictive construction" of the word "touching" in the MSACM statute. Id. at 4. Instead, the court stated that the intent requirement in the current MSACM statute ("intended to or reasonably causes the sexual arousal or sexual gratification of any person") is the "critical limiting language in the statute," as opposed to "touching." Id. at 5. The DCCA stated that the "statute does exclude ordinary hugging involving merely incidental contact with sensitive areas of the recipient's body from its purview" and that it does so "by prohibiting only such hugging as is 'intended to cause or reasonably causes' sexual arousal or sexual gratification." Id. The implication of the court's reasoning is that merely incidental contact during a hug that is intended to or reasonably causes sexual arousal or sexual gratification is sufficient for the current MSACM statute. The court found that there was sufficient evidence that the hugs were intended to derive sexual arousal or gratification, but remanded the case for the trial court to make new factual findings and render a new verdict. Id. at 7.

[19] The revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute does not change the DCCA's interpretation of the scope of "touching" in the current MSACM statute in Augustin v. United States, discussed elsewhere in this commentary.

Fourth, the revised sexually suggestive conduct statute prohibits the actor from engaging in prohibited conduct with the complainant or causing the complainant to engage in or submit to prohibited conduct. The current D.C. Code MSACM statute prohibits: 1) "touching a child or minor inside his or her clothing"[20]; 2) "touching a child or minor inside or outside his or her clothing close to the genitalia, breast, or buttocks"[21]; and 3) "placing one's tongue in the mouth of the child or minor."[22] The current statute appears limited to the actor touching the complainant and would exclude, for example, the actor causing the complainant to touch the actor or a third person. This limited liability is inconsistent with other current sexual abuse statutes, as well as the RCC sex offenses that require a "sexual act" or "sexual contact."[23] There is no DCCA case law interpreting the scope of these provisions. In contrast, the revised sexually suggestive conduct statute prohibits the actor from engaging in touching, kissing, or undressing "any person" with the complainant or the actor causing the complainant to engage in or submit to touching, kissing, or undressing "any person." This change improves the consistency of the revised statute and removes gaps in liability.

Fifth, the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute requires "intent to cause the sexual arousal or sexual gratification of any person" for the prohibited touching, kissing, or undressing. The current MSACM statute requires engaging in specified conduct "which is intended to cause or reasonably causes the sexual arousal or sexual gratification of any person."[24] There is no DCCA case law interpreting this language. In contrast, the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute requires "with intent to cause the sexual arousal or sexual gratification of any person" for the prohibited touching, kissing, or undressing. The current "reasonably causes" alternative language may be interpreted to mean that the current MSACM offense is a general (rather than specific) intent offense,[25] or may indicate a culpable mental state similar to negligence. However, using negligence as the basis for criminal liability is disfavored for elements that distinguish otherwise non-criminal from criminal conduct.[26]

[22] D.C. Code § 22-3010.01(b)(3).
[23] As is discussed in the commentaries to the RCC sex offenses, several of the current sexual abuse statutes specifically prohibit causing the complainant to "engage in" or "submit to" a sexual act or sexual contact, which includes liability for the actor penetrating or touching the complainant, as well as the actor causing the complaint to touch or penetrate the actor, the complainant, or a third party, or the actor causing the complainant to submit to being penetrated or touched by a third party. The RCC sex offenses that require a sexual act or sexual contact consistently prohibit the actor engaging in a sexual act or sexual contact with the complainant or the actor causing the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act or sexual contact.
[24] D.C. Code § 22-3010.01(b).
[25] DCCA case law has characterized the current first and third degree sexual abuse statutes, which concern a sexual act, as "general intent" crimes. However, it is not clear what specific culpable mental state must be proven for such "general intent" crimes—e.g., knowledge or recklessness. See commentary to RCC § 22E-1301, Sexual assault, above, for further discussion.

Conduct that is not intended to but "reasonably causes" sexual arousal or sexual gratification may be criminalized by the offensive physical contact offense in RCC § 22E-1205. This change improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

Sixth, the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute requires a "recklessly" culpable mental state as to the age of the complainant. Current D.C. Code § 22-3011 states that a mistake of age is not a defense to the current MSACM statute.[27] In contrast, the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute applies a "recklessly" culpable mental state to the age of complainant. Applying strict liability to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is strongly disfavored by courts[28] and legal experts[29] for any non-regulatory crimes, although "statutory rape" laws are often an exception.[30] Requiring, at a minimum, a knowing culpable mental state for the elements of an offense that make otherwise legal conduct illegal is a generally accepted legal principle.[31] However, recklessness has been upheld in some cases as a minimal basis for punishing morally culpable crime.[32] A "recklessly" culpable mental state in the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute is consistent with the culpable mental state required in other RCC sex offenses such as the revised enticing a minor into sexual conduct statute (RCC § 22E-1305) and the nonconsensual sexual conduct statute (RCC § 22E-1307). This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense.

It is inefficacious because conduct unaccompanied by an awareness of the factors making it criminal does not mark the actor as one who needs to be subjected to punishment in order to deter him or others from behaving similarly in the future, nor does it single him out as a socially dangerous individual who needs to be incapacitated or reformed. It is unjust because the actor is subjected to the stigma of a criminal conviction without being morally blameworthy. Seventh, the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute requires at least a four-year age gap between the actor and the complainant when the complainant is under the age of 18 years, and, by the use of the phrase "in fact," requires strict liability for this age gap. The current MSACM statute requires at least a four year age gap between the actor and the complainant when the complainant is under the age of 16 years,[33] but does not require any age gap when the complainant is under the age of 18 years and in a "significant relationship" with the actor.[34] In contrast, the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute requires at least a four year age gap between the actor and a complainant under the age of 18 years and, by use of the phrase "in fact," requires strict liability for this age gap. The current definition of "significant relationship"[35] and the revised definition of "position of trust with or authority over" (RCC § 22E-701) include a broad range of custodial and non-custodial relationships, and without an age gap between the complainant and the actor, otherwise consensual sexual conduct between individuals close in age would be criminal.[36] While the special relationship between the actor and complainant may be sufficient to make such consensual sexual conduct criminal, in some contexts, the Council has recognized that consensual sexual activity between persons close in age should not be criminal.[37] Strict liability for the age gap matches the current sexual abuse of a child statutes[38] and the [34] D.C. Code §§ 22-3010.01(a) (MSACM statute); 22-3001(5A) (defining "minor" as a "person who has not yet attained the age of 18 years.").

[35] D.C. Code § 22-3001(10) ("'Significant relationship' includes: (A) A parent, sibling, aunt, uncle, or grandparent, whether related by blood, marriage, domestic partnership, or adoption; (B) A legal or de facto guardian or any person, more than 4 years older than the victim, who resides intermittently or permanently in the same dwelling as the victim; (C) The person or the spouse, domestic partner, or paramour of the person who is charged with any duty or responsibility for the health, welfare, or supervision of the victim at the time of the act; and (D) Any employee or volunteer of a school, church, synagogue, mosque, or other religious institution, or an educational, social, recreational, athletic, musical, charitable, or youth facility, organization, or program, including a teacher, coach, counselor, clergy, youth leader, chorus director, bus driver, administrator, or support staff, or any other person in a position of trust with or authority over a child or a minor.").

[36] For example, a 19 year old camp counselor who, with consent and in the context of a dating relationship, touches the buttocks of a 17 year old or touches the 17 year old inside his or her clothing with intent to cause the sexual arousal or sexual gratification of any person would be guilty under the current MSACM statute.

[37] For example, current D.C. Code § 22-3011 provides that marriage or domestic partnership between the actor and the complainant is a defense to charges under the District's current child sexual abuse, sexual abuse of a minor, sexually suggestive conduct with a minor, and enticing statutes and corresponding RCC § 22E-1304 provides that marriage is a defense to the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute. Also, in the original Anti-Sexual Abuse Act of 1994, the Council of the District of Columbia inserted the four year age gap requirement in the current child sexual abuse statutes "recognizing, but not condoning the sexual curiousity [sic] which exists among young persons of similar ages." Council of the District of Columbia, Report of the Committee on the Judiciary, Bill 10-87, the "Anti-Sexual Abuse Act of 1994 at 15. The current sexual abuse of a minor statutes were enacted in 2007. Omnibus Public Safety Amendment Act of 2006, 2006 District of Columbia Laws 16-306 (Act 16-482).

[38] D.C. Code § 22-3012 ("In a prosecution under §§ 22-3008 to 22-010 . . . the government need not prove that the defendant knew the child's age or the age difference between himself or herself and the child."). revised sexual abuse of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1302) and the revised enticing a minor into sexual conduct statute (RCC § 22E-1305). This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute.

Eighth, only the general penalty enhancements in subtitle I of the RCC apply to the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute. Current D.C. Code § 22-3020 specifies aggravators that apply to all of the current sex offense statutes.[39] DCCA case law suggests that the age-based sex offense aggravators may not apply to certain sex offenses because they overlap with elements of the offense.[40] In contrast, the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute is subject to only the general penalty enhancements specified in subtitle I of the RCC. The current sex offense aggravators in D.C. Code § 22-3020[41] are not necessary in the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute because the offense is limited to sexual conduct that occurs without the use of force, threats, or coercion. Limiting the penalty enhancements in RCC subtitle I to the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised sex offenses.

Ninth, the revised sexually suggestive conduct statute is a lesser included offense of the RCC sexual abuse of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1302). The current D.C. Code MSACM statute does not appear to be a lesser included offense of the current child

[39] The relevant sex offense statutes addressed in RCC Chapter 13 are: First degree through fourth degree sexual abuse (D.C. Code §§ 22-3002 through 22-3005), misdemeanor sexual abuse (D.C. Code § 22-3006), child sexual abuse (D.C. Code §§ 22-3008 and 22-3009), sexual abuse of a minor (D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.01 and 22-3009.02), sexual abuse of a secondary education student (D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.03 and 22-3009.04), misdemeanor sexual abuse of a child or minor (D.C. Code § 22-3010.01), sexual abuse of a ward (D.C. Code §§ 22-3013 and 22-3014), sexual abuse of a patient or client (D.C. Code §§ 22-3015 and 22-3016), enticing a minor (D.C. Code § 22-3010), and arranging for sexual contact with a real or fictitious child (D.C. Code § 22-3010.01). Two of the six possible aggravators are age-based. D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(1) (victim under 12 years of age); D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(2) (victim under 18 years of age and in a "significant relationship" with actor). Three of the six possible aggravators concern circumstances indicating the presence of greater force, fraud, or coercion. D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(3) (victim sustained "serious bodily injury."); D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(4) (accomplices aided the crime); D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(6) (defendant was armed with a deadly or dangerous weapon). The remaining aggravator, D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(5) concerns repeat offenders.

[40] DCCA case law in the context of the District's current assault with a dangerous weapon offense (ADW) suggests that the age-based sex offense aggravators and age-based penalty enhancements may not be applied to the current sexual abuse of a child statutes, sexual abuse of a minor statutes, misdemeanor sexual abuse of a child or minor statute, enticing statute, or arranging for sexual conduct with a real or fictitious child statute because they overlap with elements of these offenses. The DCCA has held that ADW may not be enhanced with the current "while armed" enhancement in D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(1) because each provision requires the use of a "dangerous weapon." McCall v. United States, 449 A.2d 1095, 1096 (D.C. 1982) ("The government concedes that [current D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(1)] may not apply to ADW since [ADW] provides for enhancement and is a more specific and lenient provision."); see also Gathy v. United States, 754 A.2d 912, 916 n.5 (D.C. 2000) ("In McCall we held that section [current D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(1)] could not be applied to a charge of ADW because the use of 'a dangerous weapon' is already included as an element of that offense, so that 'ADW while armed'-i.e. assault with a dangerous weapon while armed with a dangerous weapon-would be redundant.").

[41] However, an actor that merely possesses a dangerous weapon or a firearm while committing sexually suggestive conduct with a minor, without using or displaying it, may face liability under the revised possession of a dangerous weapon during a crime of violence statute (RCC § 22E-4104) or other RCC weapons offenses.

sexual abuse statutes[42] or sexual abuse of a minor statutes[43] because it has different conduct requirements and requires that the defendant "intended to cause or reasonably causes the sexual arousal or sexual gratification of any person." There is no DCCA case law that addresses the relationship between the current MSACM statute and the current child sexual abuse statutes or sexual abuse of a minor statute. In contrast, the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute is a lesser included offense of the RCC sexual abuse of a minor statute under paragraph (a)(2)(C) if the other requirements of the offense are met. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute.

Beyond these nine changes to current District law, two other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state for the fact that the actor is in a position of trust with or authority over the complainant. The current MSACM statute requires that an actor 18 years of age or older be in a "significant relationship" with a complainant under the age of 18 years,[44] but it does not specify a culpable mental state and there is no DCCA case law on point. The revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute resolves this ambiguity by requiring a "knowingly" culpable mental state for the fact that the actor is in a "position of trust with or authority over" the complainant. Requiring, at a minimum, a knowing culpable mental state for the elements of an offense that make otherwise legal conduct illegal is a generally accepted legal principle.[45] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Second, due to the RCC definition of "position of trust with or authority over" in RCC § 22E-701, the scope of the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute may differ as compared to the current MSACM statute. The current MSACM statute requires that the actor be in a "significant relationship" with the complainant[46] and "significant relationship" is defined in D.C. Code § 22-3001.[47] The current definition of "significant relationship" is open-ended and defines "significant relationship" as [42] D.C. Code §§ 22-3008, 22-3009, 22-3001(3) (defining "child" as "a person who has not yet attained the age of 16 years.").

[43] D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.01, 22-3009.02, 22-3001(5A) (defining "minor" as "a person who has not yet attained the age of 18 years.").
[44] D.C. Code §§ 22-3010.01(a) ("Whoever . . . being 18 years of age or older and being in a significant relationship with a minor."); 22-3001(5A) (defining "minor" as a "person who has not yet attained the age of 18 years.").
[45] Elonis v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2001, 2010, 192 L.Ed.2d 1 (2015).
[47] D.C. Code § 22-3001(10) ("'Significant relationship' includes: (A) A parent, sibling, aunt, uncle, or grandparent, whether related by blood, marriage, domestic partnership, or adoption; (B) A legal or de facto guardian or any person, more than 4 years older than the victim, who resides intermittently or permanently in the same dwelling as the victim; (C) The person or the spouse, domestic partner, or paramour of the person who is charged with any duty or responsibility for the health, welfare, or supervision of the victim at the time of the act; and (D) Any employee or volunteer of a school, church, synagogue, mosque, or other religious institution, or an educational, social, recreational, athletic, musical, charitable, or youth facility, organization, or program, including a teacher, coach, counselor, clergy, youth leader, chorus director, bus driver, administrator, or support staff, or any other person in a position of trust with or authority over a child or a minor.").

"includ[ing]" the specified individuals as well as "any other person in a position of trust with or authority over" the complainant."[48] There is no DCCA case law interpreting the current definition of "significant relationship." The RCC definition of "position of trust with or authority over" is close-ended, but defines "position of trust with or authority over as "mean[ing]" specified individuals or "a person responsible under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant." The revised definition provides a broad, flexible, objective standard for determining who is in a position of trust with or authority over another person. The RCC definition of "position of trust with or authority over" is discussed in detail in the commentary to RCC § 22E-701. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statutes.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute categorizes all persons under the age of 18 as "minors" and defines revised offenses in terms of the specific ages of complainants. The D.C. Code currently contains two sets of offenses for sexual abuse of complainants under the age of 18—child sexual abuse, for complainants under the age of 16 years,[49] and sexual abuse of a minor, for complainants under the age of 18 years.[50] The current MSACM statute has the same distinction in one statute, applying to complainants under the age of 16 years[51] and complainants under the age of 18 years.[52] For clarification, the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute no longer distinguishes specifies the numerical ages of relevant classes of complainants rather than using "child" or "minor" terminology. Referring to a teenager as a "child" may be misleading and leads to inconsistency with other District offenses that have different definitions of "child."[53] These changes improve the clarity and consistency of the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute.

Second, the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute, by use of the phrase "in fact," requires no culpable mental state as to the actor's own age or the required age gap. The current MSACM statute does not specify any culpable mental states for the age of the actor or the required age gap.[54] However, current D.C. Code §

[48] D.C. Code § 22-3001(10).
[49] D.C. Code §§ 22-3008 (first degree child sexual abuse); 22-3009 (second degree child sexual abuse); 22-3001(3) (defining "child" as a "person who has not yet attained the age of 16 years.").
[50] D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.01 (first degree sexual abuse of a minor); 22-3009.02 (second degree sexual abuse of a minor); 22-3001(5A) (defining "minor" as a "person who has not yet attained the age of 18 years").
[51] D.C. Code §§ 22-3010.01(a) (MSACM statute); 22-3001(3) (defining "child" as a "person who has not yet attained the age of 16 years.").
[52] D.C. Code §§ 22-3010.01(a) (MSACM statute); 22-3001(5A) (defining "minor" as a "person who has not yet attained the age of 18 years.").
[53] For example, the current child cruelty statute considers a person under the age of 18 years to be a "child" (D.C. Code § 22-1101(a)), but the current contributing to the delinquency of a minor statute considers a person under the age 18 to be a "minor" (D.C. Code § 22-811(f)(2)).
[54] D.C. Code §§ 22-3010.01(a) (MSACM statute); 22-3001(3), (5A) (defining "child" as a "person who has not yet attained the age of 16 years" and "minor" as a "person who has not yet attained the age of 18 years.").

22-3011 states that a mistake of age is not a defense to the current MSACM statute.[55] For clarification, the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute uses the phrase "in fact," establishing strict liability as to the ages of the actor and the relevant age gap. It is generally recognized that a person may be held strictly liable for elements of an offense that do not distinguish innocent from guilty conduct.[56] Strict liability for these elements also is consistent with the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1302). This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised offense.

Third, for a complainant under the age of 16 years, the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute requires an age gap between the complainant and the actor of "at least four years." The current MSACM statute requires that an actor 18 years of age or older be "more than 4 years older" than a complainant under the age of 16 years.[57] The current child sexual abuse statutes, in contrast, are worded to require that the complainant be "at least four years older" than the complainant.[58] Consequently, there is a difference of a day in liability between the two offenses due to the different required age gaps.[59] For clarification, the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute uses the language "at least four years older," the same as in the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1302) for complainants that are under the age of 16 years. The change improves the consistency of the revised offense.

Fourth, the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute relies on the general attempt statute to define what conduct constitutes an attempt and the appropriate penalty. Current D.C. Code § 22-3018 provides a separate attempt statute applicable to all current sexual offenses.[60] Under the statute, if the maximum term of imprisonment for Code § 22-301.01 and falls within the specified range of statutes. The current MSACM statute was enacted in 2007 and D.C. Code § 22-3011 was amended in 2007 to include it. [58] D.C. Code §§ 22-3008 (first degree child sexual abuse prohibiting "[w]hoever, being at least 4 years older than a child, engages in a sexual act with that child or causes that child to engage in a sexual act."); 22-3009 (second degree child sexual abuse statute prohibiting "[w]hoever, being at least 4 years older than a child, engages in sexual contact with that child or causes that child to engage in sexual contact."); 22-3001(3) (defining "child" as a "person who has not yet attained the age of 16 years.").

[59] For a complainant that is 15 years and 364 days old, an actor that is 19 years and 364 days old would be liable under the current child sexual abuse statutes because the complainant is under 16 years of age and the actor is "at least four years older" than the complainant. However, the actor would not be liable under the current MSACM statute because, while the actor is over the age of 18, the actor is not "more than four years older" than the complainant.

[60] The relevant sex offense statutes addressed in RCC Chapter 13 are: First degree through fourth degree sexual abuse (D.C. Code §§ 22-3002 through 22-3005), misdemeanor sexual abuse (D.C. Code § 22-3006), child sexual abuse (D.C. Code §§ 22-3008 and 22-3009), sexual abuse of a minor (D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.01 and 22-3009.02), sexual abuse of a secondary education student (D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.03 and 22-3009.04), misdemeanor sexual abuse of a child or minor (D.C. Code § 22-3010.01), sexual abuse of a the underlying offense is life, an attempt has a maximum term of imprisonment of 15 years.[61] Otherwise the maximum term of imprisonment is "not more than 1/2 of the maximum prison sentence authorized for the offense."[62] These attempt penalties differ from the attempt penalties established under D.C. Code § 22-1803, the current general attempt statute.[63] In the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute, the RCC General Part's attempt provisions (RCC § 22E-301) establish the requirements to prove an attempt and applicable penalties for sexually suggestive conduct, consistent with other offenses. While a separate attempt statute for sex offenses may be justified in the current D.C. Code given the generally lower penalties available through the general attempt statute in D.C. Code § 22-1803, the penalties in the RCC general attempt provision provide penalties at ½ the maximum imprisonment sentence. Elimination of a separate attempt statute for sex offenses, consequently, has no substantive effect on available penalties. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor offense.

Fifth, the marriage and domestic partnership defense in the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute does not refer to other offenses. The current marriage or domestic partnership defense states that marriage or domestic partnership is a defense to MSACM "prosecuted alone or in conjunction with § 22-3018 [sex offense attempt statute] or § 22-403 [assault with intent to commit certain offenses]."[64] There is ward (D.C. Code §§ 22-3013 and 22-3014), sexual abuse of a patient or client (D.C. Code §§ 22-3015 and 22-3016), enticing a minor (D.C. Code § 22-3010), and arranging for sexual contact with a real or fictitious child (D.C. Code § 22-3010.01). Two of the six possible aggravators are age-based. D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(1) (victim under 12 years of age); D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(2) (victim under 18 years of age and in a "significant relationship" with actor).

[61] D.C. Code § 22-3018 ("Any person who attempts to commit an offense under this subchapter shall be imprisoned for a term of years not to exceed 15 years where the maximum prison term authorized for the offense is life or for not more than 1/2 of the maximum prison sentence authorized for the offense and, in addition, may be fined an amount not to exceed 1/2 of the maximum fine authorized for the offense.").

[62] D.C. Code § 22-3018 ("Any person who attempts to commit an offense under this subchapter shall be imprisoned for a term of years not to exceed 15 years where the maximum prison term authorized for the offense is life or for not more than 1/2 of the maximum prison sentence authorized for the offense and, in addition, may be fined an amount not to exceed 1/2 of the maximum fine authorized for the offense.").

[63] D.C. Code § 22-1803 establishes general attempt penalties for offenses that do not otherwise have an attempt penalty specified. "Whoever shall attempt to commit any crime, which attempt is not otherwise made punishable by chapter 19 of An Act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901 (31 Stat. 1321), shall be punished by a fine not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or by imprisonment for not more than 180 days, or both. Except, whoever shall attempt to commit a crime of violence as defined in § 23-1331 shall be punished by a fine not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or by imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both." D.C. Code § 22-1803. Under this general attempt penalty statute, the current MSACM statute would have a maximum term of imprisonment of 180 days, which is the same penalty as the completed offense.

[64] D.C. Code § 22-3011(b). The "prosecuted alone or in conjunction with" language appears in two other statutes in addition to D.C. Code § 22-3011. D.C. Code § 22-3007, which codifies defenses for first degree through fourth degree sexual abuse and misdemeanor sexual abuse, and D.C. Code § 22-3017, which codifies defenses for sexual abuse of a ward and sexual abuse of a patient or client. The "prosecuted alone or in conjunction with" language in these statutes consistently refers to D.C. Code § 22-3018, which is the current attempt statute for the sexual abuse offenses, but inconsistently refers to D.C. Code § 22-401, which prohibits assault with intent to commit specified offenses, including first degree sexual abuse, second degree sexual abuse, or child sexual abuse, and D.C. Code § 22-403 which prohibits assault with intent to commit "any other offense which may be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary."

no DCCA case law interpreting this provision. The language is not included in the current jury instruction for the marriage or domestic partnership defense.[65] The marriage or domestic partnership defense in the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute applies only to prosecution for the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor offense. In the RCC, the revised sex offenses no longer have their own attempt statute, and there are no longer separate "assault with intent to" offenses, or "AWI" offenses. Similarly, the revised assault statutes in the RCC no longer include separate "assault with intent to" crimes and instead provide liability through application of the general attempt statute in RCC § 22E-301 to the completed offenses.[66] Deleting the "prosecuted alone or in conjunction with language" improves the clarity of the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor offense.

Sixth, the marriage and domestic partnership defense in the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute makes two clarificatory changes to the current defense.[67] First, the revised marriage and domestic partnership defense replaces "at the time of the offense" with "at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact." Referring to marriage or domestic partnership at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute. Second, the revised marriage and domestic partnership statute, by use of the phrase "in fact," applies strict liability to the element that the actor and the complainant are in a marriage or domestic partnership at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact. The current marriage or domestic partnership statute does not specify a culpable mental state for this requirement, and doing so improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Seventh, the revised sexually suggestive conduct statute does not codify a separate provision stating that consent is not a defense. The current sexual abuse statutes specify that "consent is not a defense" for the current MSACM statute.[68] However, nothing in the RCC sexually suggestive conduct statute suggests that consent is a defense. Codifying a provision that explicitly states consent is not a defense is potentially confusing for other RCC offenses which do not take this approach of stating defenses that do not apply. Deleting the current prohibition on consent as a defense is not intended to change current District law.

The current child sexual abuse statutes and current sexual abuse of a minor statutes are codified at D.C. Code §§ 22-3008 – 22-3009.02 and fall within the specified range of statutes in D.C. Code § 22-3011(a).

RCC § 22E-1305. Enticing a Minor into Sexual Conduct.

Explanatory Note. The RCC enticing a minor offense prohibits commanding, requesting, or trying to persuade certain complainants under the age of 18 years to engage in sexual conduct. The revised enticing a minor offense replaces the current enticing a child statute[1] and the current indecent sexual proposal to a minor offense.[2] The revised enticing a minor statute also replaces in relevant part five[3] [4] [5] [6] [7]

Paragraph (a)(1) specifies the prohibited conduct—commanding, requesting, or trying to persuade the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act or sexual contact. "Commands, requests, or tries to persuade" matches the language in the RCC solicitation statute (RCC § 22E-302). "Sexual act" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that specifies types of sexual penetration or contact between the mouth and certain body parts. "Sexual contact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means touching the specified body parts, such as genitalia, of any person with the desire to sexually abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, arouse, or gratify any person. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies a culpable mental state of "knowingly" for the prohibited conduct. "Knowingly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that means the actor must be practically certain that he or she will command, request, or try to persuade the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act or sexual contact.

The RCC enticing statute generally has two bases for liability. Paragraph (a)(2), subparagraph (a)(2)(A), subparagraph (a)(2)(B), and sub-subparagraphs (a)(2)(B)(i) and (a)(2)(B)(ii) establish the requirements for the actor and the complainant when the complainant is a "real," i.e. not fictitious, person. Paragraph (a)(3), subparagraph (a)(3)(A), and subparagraph (a)(3)(B) establish the requirements for the actor and the complainant when the complainant is a fictitious person—specifically, a law enforcement officer purporting to be a person under the age of 16 years.

For a "real," i.e. not fictitious complainant, paragraph (a)(2) requires that the actor "in fact" is at least 18 years of age and at least four years older than the complainant. "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that means no culpable mental state is required for a given element. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, "in fact" applies to each element that follows the phrase until a culpable mental state is specified. In paragraph (a)(2), there is no culpable mental state requirement for the age of the actor or the required four year age gap with the complainant.

The revised enticing a minor into sexual conduct statute and other RCC Chapter 13 statutes each account for liability changes based on marriage or domestic partnership in the plain language of the statutes and D.C. Code 22-3019 is deleted as unnecessary.

When an actor satisfies the requirements of paragraph (a)(2) (at least 18 years of age and at least four years older than the complainant), there are two alternative bases for liability. First, under subparagraph (a)(2)(A), there is liability if the actor is "reckless" as to the fact that the complainant is under 16 years of age. "Reckless" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor was aware of a substantial risk that the complainant was under 16 years of age. Second, and in the alternative, there is liability if the actor is "reckless" as to the fact that the complainant is under 18 years of age (sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(B)(i)) and the actor "knows" that he or she is in a "position of trust with or authority over" the complainant (sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(B)(ii)). "Reckless" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor was aware of a substantial risk that the complainant was under 18 years of age. Knowledge is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that means the accused must be practically certain that he or she is in a "position of trust with or authority over" the complainant. "Position of trust with or authority over" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that includes individuals such as parents, siblings, school employees, and coaches.

Paragraph (a)(3) requires that the actor "in fact" is at least 18 years of age and at least four years older than the "purported age" of the complainant. "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that means no culpable mental state is required for a given element. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, "in fact" applies to each element that follows the phrase until another culpable mental state is specified. In paragraph (a)(3), there is no culpable mental state requirement for the age of the actor or the required age gap. Per subparagraph (a)(3)(A), the complainant must be a "law enforcement officer," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701, who purports to be a person under the age of 16 years. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the phrase "in fact" in paragraph (a)(3) applies to subparagraph (a)(3)(A) and there is no culpable mental state requirement for the fact that the complainant is a "law enforcement officer," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701, who purports to be a person under 16 years of age. Per subparagraph (a)(3)(B), the actor must be "reckless" as to the fact that the purported age of the complainant is under 16 years. "Reckless" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that means the actor was aware of a substantial risk that purported age of the complainant was under 16 years of age. The references to the "purported age" of the complainant in paragraph (a)(3) and subparagraph (a)(3)(B), and the reference to the law enforcement officer "purport[ing]" to be a person under 16 years of age in subparagraph (a)(3)(A) do not require the law enforcement officer to state a specific age.

Subsection (b) establishes an affirmative defense for conduct involving only the actor and the complainant that the actor and the complainant were in a marriage or "domestic partnership" at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact. "Domestic partnership" is defined in RCC § 22E-701. "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element, here that the actor and the complainant are, "in fact," in a marriage or domestic partnership at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact. The general provision in RCC § 22E-201 establishes the requirements for the burden of production and the burden of proof for all affirmative defenses in the RCC.

Subsection (c) specifies the penalty for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (d) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised enticing a minor statute clearly changes current District law in eight main ways.

First, the revised enticing statute no longer prohibits taking or attempting to take the complainant to a location for the purpose of committing a specified sex offense. The current D.C. Code enticing statute prohibits in D.C. Code § 22-3010(a)(1) "tak[ing] that child or minor to any place for the purpose of committing any offense set forth in §§ 22-3002 to 22-3006 and §§ 22-3008 to 22-3009.02,"; and in D.C. Code § 22-3010(b)(2) "attempt[ing] . . . to entice, allure, convince, or persuade any person who represents himself or herself to be a child to go to any place for the purpose of engaging in a sexual act or contact." The enticing provision in paragraph (a)(1) that prohibits taking a complainant overlaps with the current D.C. Code kidnapping statute, which has a significantly higher maximum penalty (30 years)[8] than the current enticing statute (5 years).[9] The scope of the provision in paragraph (b)(2) for attempting to entice, etc. a person that represents himself or herself to be a child to go to any place also is unclear.[10] In contrast, the RCC relies upon the RCC kidnapping offense (RCC § 22E-1401) to criminalize when the actor successfully takes the complainant to a location with the intent to commit a sex offense. When the actor attempts to entice, etc., a complainant to go to any place for the ultimate purpose of engaging in a sexual act or sexual contact provision, but is unsuccessful, that conduct is now criminalized as attempted kidnapping under the general RCC attempt statute (RCC § 22E-301). Any enticing conduct that fails to satisfy either the RCC kidnapping or RCC attempted kidnapping offenses may still result in liability for the RCC enticing offense if the defendant "command[ed], request[ed], or trie[d] to persuade the complainant" to engage in or submit to a sexual act or sexual contact. This change reduces unnecessary overlap and improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Second, the revised enticing statute requires a "reckless" culpable mental state for the age or purported age of the complainant. The current D.C. Code enticing a child statute[11] does not specify any culpable mental states and there is no DCCA case law on this issue. However, current D.C. Code § 22-3012 and current D.C. § 22-3011 establish strict liability for the age of the complainant, real or fictitious, in the current enticing statute.[12] In contrast, the revised enticing statute applies a "reckless" culpable mental

[9] D.C. Code § 22-3010(a), (b).

[10] D.C. Code § 22-3010(b)(2) states: "Whoever, being at least 4 years older than the purported age of a person who represents himself or herself to be a child, attempts . . . (2) to entice, allure, convince, or persuade any person who represents himself or herself to be a child to go to any place for the purpose of engaging in a sexual act or contact . . . ."). It is unclear if the "attempt" provision is intended to include situations where the actor engages in persuading or enticing and is ultimately unsuccessful, or where the actor is prevented from engaging in enticing the complainant at all, or if the "attempt" language is limited to providing liability in situations when the complainant is an individual falsely representing to be under the age of 16 years.

[11] D.C. Code § 22-3010.

[12] D.C. Code § 22-3012 states that "[i]n a prosecution under §§ 22-3008 to 22-3010 . . . the government need not prove that the defendant knew the child's age." D.C. Code § 22-3012. The current enticing state to the age or purported age of the complainant. Applying strict liability to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is strongly disfavored by courts[13] and legal experts[14] for any non-regulatory crimes, although "statutory rape" laws are often an exception.[15] Requiring, at a minimum, a knowing culpable mental state for the elements of an offense that make otherwise legal conduct illegal is a generally accepted legal principle.[16] However, recklessness has been upheld in some cases as a minimal basis for punishing morally culpable crime.[17] A "reckless" culpable mental state in the revised enticing statute is consistent with the culpable mental state required in parts of the sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1304), sexual abuse by exploitation statute (RCC § 22E-1303), and the nonconsensual sexual conduct statute (RCC § 22E-1307). This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense.

Third, the revised enticing statute requires that the actor be 18 years of age or older and, by use of the phrase "in fact," requires strict lability for this element. The statute is codified at D.C Code § 22-3010 and falls within the specified range of statutes, but D.C. Code § 22-3012 does not apply to the entire enticing statute. D.C. Code § 22-3012 and the enticing statute were part of the original 1994 Anti-Sexual Abuse Act. Crimes—Anti-Sexual Abuse Act, 1994 District of Columbia Laws 10-257 (Act 10-385). At that time, the enticing statute was limited to "real" complainants under the age of 16 years. The enticing statute was amended in 2007 to include "real" complainants under the age of 18 years when the actor is in a significant relationship with the complainant (D.C. Code § 22-3010(a)) and to include fictitious complainants (D.C. Code § 22-3010(b)). D.C. Code § 22-3012 was not amended in 2007, thus limiting its application to the original enticing statute, although this was likely a drafting error.

D.C. Code § 22-3011 states that "mistake of age" is not a defense "to a prosecution under §§ 22-3008 to 22-3010.01." D.C. Code § 22-3011(a). Unlike D.C. Code § 22-3012, D.C. Code § 22-3011 was amended in 2007 to expand the specified range of statutes to § 22-3010.01 (the current misdemeanor sexual abuse of a child or minor statute, also enacted in 2007). Given this amendment, it likely that the entire enticing statute is included.

'The consensus can be summarily stated: to punish conduct without reference to the actor's state of mind is both inefficacious and unjust. It is inefficacious because conduct unaccompanied by an awareness of the factors making it criminal does not mark the actor as one who needs to be subjected to punishment in order to deter him or others from behaving similarly in the future, nor does it single him out as a socially dangerous individual who needs to be incapacitated or reformed. It is unjust because the actor is subjected to the stigma of a criminal conviction without being morally blameworthy. Consequently, on either a preventive or retributive theory of criminal punishment, the criminal sanction is inappropriate in the absence of mens rea.'") (quoting Packer, Mens Rea and the Supreme Court, 1962 Sup.Ct.Rev. 107, 109).

[15] See, e.g., Joshua Dressler, Understanding Criminal Law § 12.03(b) (3d ed. 2001) ("A few non-public-welfare offenses are characterized as 'strict liability' because they do not require proof that the defendant possessed a mens rea regarding a material element of the offense. Perhaps the most common example is statutory rape, i.e. consensual intercourse by a male with an underage female.") current D.C. Code enticing statute[18] does not specify any requirements for the age of the actor. DCCA case law does not address the point. In contrast, the revised enticing statute requires that the actor be 18 years of age or older and, by use of the phrase "in fact," requires strict liability for this element. Requiring the actor to be 18 years of age or older ensures that the enticing offense is reserved for adults to who engage in predatory behavior of complainants under the age of 18 years.[19] While an actor presumably will know his or her own age, it is generally recognized that a person may be held strictly liable for elements of an offense that do not distinguish innocent from guilty conduct.[20] Requiring that the actor be 18 years of age or older and applying strict liability to this element also is consistent with this element in the revised sexually suggestive contact with a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1304), and third degree and sixth degree of the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1302). This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense.

Fourth, the revised enticing statute requires at least a four year age gap between the actor and the complainant when the complainant is under the age of 18 years, and, by the use of the phrase "in fact," requires strict liability for this age gap. The current enticing statute requires a four year age gap between the actor and a complainant under the age of 16 years,[21] but does not have an age gap requirement when the complainant is under the age of 18 years.[22] In contrast, the revised enticing statute requires at least a four year age gap between the actor and a complainant under the age of 18 years and, by use of the phrase "in fact," requires strict liability for this age gap. The current definition of "significant relationship"[23] and the revised definition of "position of trust with or [19] For example, under the revised enticing statute, a 17 year old actor would not be guilty of enticing a 12 year old complainant to engage in sexual intercourse. However, depending on the facts of the case, the 17 year old could be guilty of attempted second degree sexual abuse of a minor (RCC § 22E-1302) and if sexual intercourse actually occurs, the 17 year old actor could be guilty of second degree sexual abuse of a minor unless there was a reasonable mistake of age defense.

[22] D.C. Code §§ 22-3010(a); 22-3001(5A) (defining a "minor" as "a person who has not yet attained the age of 18 years."). The current arranging statute is limited to complainants under the age of 16 years and requires at least a four year age gap. D.C. Code §§ 22-3010.02(a); 22-3001(3) (defining "child" as a "person who has not yet attained the age of 16 years.").

[23] D.C. Code § 22-3001(10) ("'Significant relationship' includes: (A) A parent, sibling, aunt, uncle, or grandparent, whether related by blood, marriage, domestic partnership, or adoption; (B) A legal or de facto guardian or any person, more than 4 years older than the victim, who resides intermittently or permanently in the same dwelling as the victim; (C) The person or the spouse, domestic partner, or paramour of the person who is charged with any duty or responsibility for the health, welfare, or supervision of the victim at the time of the act; and (D) Any employee or volunteer of a school, church, synagogue, mosque, or other authority over" (RCC § 22E-701) include a broad range of custodial and non-custodial relationships, and without an age gap between the complainant and the actor, otherwise consensual sexual conduct between individuals close in age would be criminal.[24] While the special relationship between the actor and complainant may be sufficient to make such consensual sexual conduct criminal, in some contexts, the Council has recognized that consensual sexual activity between persons close in age should not be criminal.[25] Strict liability for the age gap matches the current sexual abuse of a child statutes[26] and third degree and sixth degree of the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1302), and the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1304). This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute.

Fifth, the revised enticing statute limits the offense to fictitious complainants that are law enforcement officers. The current D.C. Code enticing statute applies to any fictitious complainant,[27] while the closely-related statute for arranging sexual conduct with a real or fictitious child is limited to fictitious complainants that are law enforcement officers.[28] The legislative history for the current D.C. Code arranging for sexual conduct with a minor statute states that the statute was limited to law enforcement officers because otherwise the statute could "enable mischief, such as blackmail, between adults where they are acting out fantasies with no real child involved or intended to involved (the thrill such as it is, being in the salacious banter)."[29] In contrast, the revised enticing

[24] For example, a 19 year old camp counselor who, with consent and in the context of a dating relationship, texts his 17 year old girlfriend that he wants to touch her buttocks may be guilty of enticing a minor under current District law.

[25] For example, current D.C. Code § 22-3011 provides that marriage or domestic partnership between the actor and the complainant is a defense to charges under the District's current child sexual abuse, sexual abuse of a minor, sexually suggestive conduct with a minor, and enticing statutes and corresponding RCC § 22E-1305 provides that marriage is a defense to the revised enticing a minor into sexual conduct statute. Also, in the original Anti-Sexual Abuse Act of 1994, the Council of the District of Columbia inserted the four year age gap requirement in the current child sexual abuse statutes "recognizing, but not condoning the sexual curiousity [sic] which exists among young persons of similar ages." Council of the District of Columbia, Report of the Committee on the Judiciary, Bill 10-87, the "Anti-Sexual Abuse Act of 1994 at 15. The current sexual abuse of a minor statutes were enacted in 2007. Omnibus Public Safety Amendment Act of 2006, 2006 District of Columbia Laws 16-306 (Act 16-482).

[26] D.C. Code § 22-3012 ("In a prosecution under §§ 22-3008 to 22-010 . . . the government need not prove that the defendant knew the child's age or the age difference between himself or herself and the child."). The current child sexual abuse statutes are codified at D.C. Code § 22-3008 and D.C. Code § 22-3009, and fall within the specified range of statutes.

[27] D.C. Code § 22-3010(b) ("Whoever, being at least 4 years older than the purported age of a person who represents himself or herself to be a child.").

[28] D.C. Code § 22-3010.02(a) ("For the purposes of this section, arranging to engage in a sexual act or sexual contact with an individual who is fictitious shall be unlawful only if the arrangement is done by or with a law enforcement officer.").

[29] Council of the District of Columbia, Report of the Committee on Public Safety and the Judiciary, Bill 18-963, the "Criminal Code Amendment Act" at 7 (internal quotation marks omitted) (quoting written testimony of Richard Gilbert, District of Columbia Association of Criminal Defense Lawyers). statute is limited to fictitious complainants who actually are law enforcement officers. The same legislative rationales that underlie the current arranging statute's limitation to fictitious persons who are really police officers also apply to enticement-type conduct. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense.

Sixth, only the general penalty enhancements in subtitle I of the RCC apply to the revised enticing statute. Current D.C. Code § 22-3020 specifies aggravators that apply to all of the current sex offense statutes.[30] DCCA case law suggests that the age-based sex offense aggravators may not apply to certain sex offenses because they overlap with elements of the offense.[31] In contrast, the revised enticing statute is subject to only the general penalty enhancements specified in subtitle I of the RCC. The current sex offense aggravators in D.C. Code § 22-3020[32] are not necessary in the revised enticing statute because the offense is limited to sexual conduct that occurs without the use of force, threats, or coercion. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised sex offenses.

Seventh, the revised enticing statute relies on the RCC general attempt statute to define what conduct constitutes an attempt and set the punishment for an attempt. The current D.C. Code enticing statute explicitly includes an attempt in the offense definition.[33] As is discussed elsewhere in this commentary, the scope of "attempt" in the current D.C. Code enticing statute is unclear, but the current statute treats an "attempt" to

[30] The relevant sex offense statutes addressed in RCC Chapter 13 are: First degree through fourth degree sexual abuse (D.C. Code §§ 22-3002 through 22-3005), misdemeanor sexual abuse (D.C. Code § 22-3006), child sexual abuse (D.C. Code §§ 22-3008 and 22-3009), sexual abuse of a minor (D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.01 and 22-3009.02), sexual abuse of a secondary education student (D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.03 and 22-3009.04), misdemeanor sexual abuse of a child or minor (D.C. Code § 22-3010.01), sexual abuse of a ward (D.C. Code §§ 22-3013 and 22-3014), sexual abuse of a patient or client (D.C. Code §§ 22-3015 and 22-3016), enticing a minor (D.C. Code § 22-3010), and arranging for sexual contact with a real or fictitious child (D.C. Code § 22-3010.01). Two of the six possible aggravators are age-based. D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(1) (victim under 12 years of age); D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(2) (victim under 18 years of age and in a "significant relationship" with actor). Three of the six possible aggravators concern circumstances indicating the presence of greater force, fraud, or coercion. D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(3) (victim sustained "serious bodily injury."); D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(4) (accomplices aided the crime); D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(6) (defendant was armed with a deadly or dangerous weapon). The remaining aggravator, D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(5) concerns repeat offenders.

[31] DCCA case law in the context of the District's current assault with a dangerous weapon offense (ADW) suggests that the age-based sex offense aggravators and age-based penalty enhancements may not be applied to the current sexual abuse of a child statutes, sexual abuse of a minor statutes, misdemeanor sexual abuse of a child or minor statute, enticing statute, or arranging statute because they overlap with elements of these offenses. The DCCA has held that ADW may not be enhanced with the current "while armed" enhancement in D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(1) because each provision requires the use of a "dangerous weapon." McCall v. United States, 449 A.2d 1095, 1096 (D.C. 1982) ("The government concedes that [current D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(1)] may not apply to ADW since [ADW] provides for enhancement and is a more specific and lenient provision."); see also Gathy v. United States, 754 A.2d 912, 916 n.5 (D.C. 2000) ("In McCall we held that section [current D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(1)] could not be applied to a charge of ADW because the use of 'a dangerous weapon' is already included as an element of that offense, so that 'ADW while armed'-i.e. assault with a dangerous weapon while armed with a dangerous weapon-would be redundant.").

[32] However, an actor that merely possesses a dangerous weapon or a firearm while committing enticing, without using or displaying it, may face may face liability under the revised possession of a dangerous weapon during a crime of violence statute (RCC § 22E-4104) or other RCC weapons offenses.

commit enticing the same as the completed offense. The current D.C. Code enticing offense does not describe the elements necessary to prove an attempt, however, and there is no case law on point.[34] In contrast, in the RCC, an attempt to commit enticing is no longer punished the same as the completed offense. The RCC relies on the General Part's attempt provision (RCC § 22E-301) to describe the requirements to prove an attempt and set the penalty at ½ the maximum imprisonment sentence, consistent with other RCC sex offenses. This change improves the consistency and completeness of the revised sexual abuse of a minor offense.

Eighth, the revised enticing statute replaces the indecent sexual proposal to a minor offense in current D.C. Code § 22-1312 ("It is unlawful for a person to make an obscene or indecent sexual proposal to a minor."). The offense has a maximum term of imprisonment of 90 days.[35] The current D.C. Code indecent sexual proposal to a minor offense appears to overlap[36] with the prohibition in the current D.C. Code enticing a minor statute for enticing certain complainants under the age of 18 years to engage in a sexual act or sexual contact. The current D.C. Code enticing offense has a maximum term of imprisonment of five years.[37] In contrast, the revised enticing statute replaces the indecent sexual proposal to a minor offense in current D.C. Code § 22-1312. It is disproportionate to penalize the same conduct under a separate 90 day offense. To the extent that the current D.C. Code indecent sexual proposal to a minor offense does not overlap with the current D.C. Code enticing a minor offense, it may criminalize non-obscene speech to a minor in a content-based manner that raises both vagueness and First [34] In addition to the "attempt" language in the current enticing statute, the current enticing statute is subject to current D.C. Code § 22-3018, which provides an attempt penalty applicable to all current sex offenses, including enticing. D.C. Code § 22-3018 ("Any person who attempts to commit an offense under this subchapter shall be imprisoned for a term of years not to exceed 15 years where the maximum prison term authorized for the offense is life or for not more than 1/2 of the maximum prison sentence authorized for the offense and, in addition, may be fined an amount not to exceed 1/2 of the maximum fine authorized for the offense." It is unclear how the attempt statute in D.C. Code § 22-3018 applies to the current enticing statute, which includes an "attempt" in the definition of the offense.

[36] The DCCA has not interpreted the current D.C. Code indecent sexual proposal to a minor offense. However, the DCCA did interpret an earlier, substantively similar, version of the offense that prohibited making "any lewd, obscene, or indecent sexual proposal." The DCCA stated that in this earlier version, a "sexual proposal . . . connotes virtually the same conduct or speech-conduct as a sexual solicitation; the term clearly implies a personal importunity addressed to a particular individual to do some sexual act.... [G]iven the nature of the common law offense of solicitation, it is appropriate to construe the sexual proposal clause . . . as limited to solicitations to commit lewd, obscene or indecent sexual acts which if accomplished would be punishable as a crime." Pinckney v. United States, 906 A.2d 301, 307 (D.C. 2006) (quoting District of Columbia v. Garcia, 335 A.2d 217, 219 (D.C. 1975)).

It seems likely that the DCCA would similarly interpret the prohibition in current D.C. Code § 22-1312 on making "an obscene or indecent sexual proposal" to a minor as limited to solicitations to commit lewd, obscene or indecent sexual acts which if accomplished would be punishable as a crime. The earlier version of the offense differed from the current D.C. Code version of the offense only in that it: 1) included "any lewd, obscene, or indecent sexual proposal," as opposed to any "obscene or indecent sexual proposal" in the current D.C. Code offense; and 2) did not require that the proposal be "to a minor" like the current D.C. Code offense Under this interpretation, there is substantial overlap with the current D.C. Code enticing a minor statute, which prohibits soliciting certain minors to engage in a "sexual act" or "sexual contact."

Amendment issues. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Beyond these eight changes to current District law, five other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the RCC enticing statute prohibits the conduct: "commands, requests, or tries to persuade the complainant" instead of relying on references to attempts. The current D.C. Code enticing statute prohibits, in D.C. Code § 22-3010(a)(2) "attempts to seduce, entice, allure, convince, or persuade a child or minor to engage in a sexual act or contact," and in D.C. Code § 22-3010(b)(1) "attempts . . . to seduce, entice, allure, convince, or persuade any person who represents himself or herself to be a child to engage in a sexual act or contact." There is no DCCA case law interpreting this language and the scope of "attempts" to "seduce, entice, allure, convince, or persuade" is unclear.[38] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised enticing statute requires "commands, requests, or tries to persuade the complainant." With this change, the revised enticing statute uses language identical to the RCC solicitation statute (RCC § 22E-302), and the RCC enticing statute differs from solicitation liability primarily in the required culpable mental state—enticing requires "knowingly" and solicitation requires "purposely." This change rephrases "attempts to seduce, entice, allure, convince, or persuade a child or minor to engage in a sexual act or contact" in the current enticing statute as "tries to persuade" in the revised offense. To the extent the language in the current D.C. Code enticing statute prohibits an actor knowingly enticing a complainant when the actor is ultimately unsuccessful in persuading the complainant, this remains criminalized as a completed offense under the "tries to persuade" language of the revised statute. However, to the extent that the current D.C. Code enticing statute's "attempts" provision includes in the completed enticing offense conduct that is not covered by the "tries to persuade" language of the revised offense, there would remain liability for attempted enticing under the RCC attempt offense. This change reduces unnecessary overlap and improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Second, the revised enticing statute requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state for commanding, requesting, or trying to persuade. The current enticing statute does not specify any culpable mental states, and there is no DCCA case law on this issue. The revised enticing statute resolves these ambiguities by requiring a "knowingly" culpable mental state for commanding, requesting, or trying to persuade. Requiring, at a minimum, a knowing culpable mental state for the elements of an offense that make [38] Paragraph (a)(2) of the current enticing statute is for a "real," i.e. not fictitious minor, and has "attempt" language. D.C. Code § 22-3010(a)(2) ("(a) Whoever, being at least 4 years older than a child or being in a significant relationship with a minor . . . (2) seduces, entices, allures, convinces, or persuades or attempts to seduce, entice, allure, convince, or persuade a child or minor to engage in a sexual act or contact."). Paragraph (b)(1) of the current enticing statute is for a "fake" minor, i.e. an individual that "represents himself or herself to be a child," and also has "attempt" language. It is unclear if the "attempt" provisions are intended to include situations where the actor engages in persuading or enticing, but is prevented from engaging in enticing the complainant at all, or if the "attempt" language is limited to providing liability in situations when the complainant is an individual falsely representing to be under the age of 16 years.

otherwise legal conduct illegal is a generally accepted legal principle.[39] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statutes.

Third, the revised enticing statute consistently requires that the actor commands, requests, or tries to persuade the complainant "to engage in or submit to a sexual act or sexual contact." While all of the current sexual abuse statutes require that the actor "engages in" the sexual conduct, they vary in whether there is liability if the actor "causes" the complainant to "engage in" the sexual conduct or "causes" the complainant to "submit to" the sexual conduct.[40] This variation creates different plain language readings of the current sexual abuse statutes and suggests that the current offenses vary in scope as to the prohibited conduct and liability for involvement of a third party. There is no case law on point. However, DCCA case law addressing similar language in the District's current misdemeanor sexual abuse statute suggests that the DCCA may not construe such language variations as legally significant.[41] In addition to case law, District practice does not appear to follow the variations in statutory language.[42] Instead of these variations in language, the revised sex offenses consistently require that the actor "engages" in a sexual act or sexual contact with the complainant or "causes" the complainant to "engage in" or "submit to" the sexual conduct. Given the unique requirements of the revised enticing statute, it requires that the actor commands, requests, or tries to persuade the complainant "to engage in or submit to" the sexual act or sexual [40] First degree sexual abuse, second degree sexual abuse, and sexual abuse of a ward codify "engages in" the sexual conduct, "causes" the complainant to "engage in" the sexual conduct, and "causes" the complainant to "submit to" the sexual conduct. D.C. Code §§ 22-3002 and 22-3003; 22-3013 and 22-3014. Third and fourth degree sexual abuse, child sexual abuse, sexual abuse of a minor, and sexual abuse of a secondary education student are limited to "engages in" the sexual conduct and "causes" the complainant to "engage in" the sexual conduct. D.C. Code §§ 22-3004 and 22-3005; 22-3008 and 22-3009; 22-3009.01 and 22-3009.02. Misdemeanor sexual abuse and sexual abuse of a patient or client require only "engages in." D.C. Code §§ 22-3006; 22-3015 and 22-3016.

[41] In Pinckney v. United States, the DCCA held that the misdemeanor sexual abuse statute includes "conduct where a person uses another to touch intimate parts of the person's own body" even though the plain language of the statute requires "engages in a sexual act or sexual contact with another person." Pinckney v. United States, 906 A.2d 301, 303, 306 (D.C. 2006) (quoting Council of the District of Columbia, Report of the Committee on the Judiciary, Bill 10-87, the "Anti-Sexual Abuse Act of 1994 at 1). The DCCA declined "an interpretation that would exclude such an obvious means of offensive touching," in part because the legislature intended to "'strengthen the District's laws against sexual abuse and make them more inclusive, flexible and reflective of the broad range of abusive conduct which does in fact occur.'" Id. (quoting Council of the District of Columbia, Report of the Committee on the Judiciary, Bill 10-87, the "Anti-Sexual Abuse Act of 1994 at 1). The DCCA stated that its interpretation of the misdemeanor sexual abuse statute "as applying to the facts of this case does not require appellant to have caused the victim to engage in or submit to sexual contact" because the appellant engaged in the prohibited sexual contact by his own actions." Id. However, the DCCA's reliance on the legislative intent of the Anti-Sexual Abuse Act suggests that it would broadly interpret any variations in the language of the current sexual abuse statutes.

[42] The jury instructions for third degree, fourth degree, child sexual abuse, and sexual abuse of a minor include that the actor "caused" the complainant "to engage in or submit to" a sexual act or sexual contact, even though the statutory language for those offenses does not include "causes" the complainant to "submit to." Compare D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. §§ 4.400 (general sexual abuse); 4.401 (child sexual abuse); 4.402 (sexual abuse of a minor) D.C. Code §§ 22-3003 and 22-3004 (third degree and fourth degree sexual abuse statutes); 22-3008 and 22-3009 (first degree and second degree child sexual abuse statutes); 22-3009.01 and 22-3009.02 (first degree and second degree sexual abuse of a minor statutes).

contact. The language clearly establishes that the actor is liable for commanding, requesting, or trying to persuade the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act or sexual contact with the actor, with a third party, or with the complainant. Differentiating liability based on whether an actor entices the complainant to engage in the sexual conduct with the actor, or whether the actor entices the complainant to engage in or submit to the sexual conduct with the complainant or a third party, may lead to disproportionate outcomes. The revised language improves the consistency, clarity, and proportionality of the revised offenses, and reduces unnecessary gaps in liability.

Fourth, the revised enticing statute requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state for the fact that the actor is in a "position of trust with or authority over" the complainant. The current enticing statute requires that the actor be "in a significant relationship with a minor,"[43] but it does not specify a culpable mental state and there is no DCCA case law for this issue. The revised enticing statute resolves this ambiguity by requiring a "knowingly" culpable mental state for the fact that the actor is in a "position of trust with or authority over" the complainant. Requiring, at a minimum, a knowing culpable mental state for the elements of an offense that make otherwise legal conduct illegal is a generally accepted legal principle.[44] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Fifth, due to the RCC definition of "position of trust with or authority over" in RCC § 22E-701, the scope of the revised enticing statute may differ as compared to the current enticing statute. The current enticing statute requires that the actor be in a "significant relationship" with the complainant[45] and "significant relationship" is defined in D.C. Code § 22-3001.[46] The current definition of "significant relationship" is open-ended and defines "significant relationship" as "includ[ing]" the specified individuals as well as "any other person in a position of trust with or authority over" the complainant."[47] There is no DCCA case law interpreting the current definition of "significant relationship." The RCC definition of "position of trust with or authority over" is close-ended, but defines "position of trust with or authority over as "mean[ing]" specified individuals or "a person responsible under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant." The revised definition provides a broad, flexible, objective standard for determining who is in a position of trust with or authority over another person. The RCC definition of "position of trust with or authority over" is discussed in detail in the commentary to RCC § 22E-701. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statutes.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, the revised enticing statute categorizes all persons under the age of 18 as "minors" and defines revised offenses in terms of the specific ages of complainants. The D.C. Code currently contains two sets of offenses for sexual abuse of complainants under the age of 18—child sexual abuse, for complainants under the age of 16 years,[48] and sexual abuse of a minor, for complainants under the age of 18 years.[49] The current enticing statute[50] makes the same distinctions. For clarification, the revised enticing statute specifies the numerical ages of relevant classes of complainants rather than using "child" or "minor" terminology. Referring to a teenager as a "child" may be misleading and leads to inconsistency with other District offenses that have different definitions of "child."[51] These changes improve the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Second, the revised enticing statute, by use of the phrase "in fact," requires strict liability for the age gap between the actor and complainants under the age of 16 years, or the purported age gap between the actor and a complainant that is a law enforcement officer. Current D.C. Code § 22-3012 and current D.C. § 22-3011 establish strict liability for the required age gap between the actor and a complainant, real or fictitious, under the age of 16 years in the current enticing statute.[52] For clarification, the revised enticing statute uses the phrase "in fact," establishing strict liability as to the relevant age gap. It is generally recognized that a person may be held strictly liable for elements of an offense that do not distinguish innocent from guilty conduct.[53] Strict liability for the required age

[48] D.C. Code §§ 22-3008 (first degree child sexual abuse); 22-3009 (second degree child sexual abuse); 22-3001(3) (defining "child" as a "person who has not yet attained the age of 16 years.").

[49] D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.01 (first degree sexual abuse of a minor); 22-3009.02 (second degree sexual abuse of a minor); 22-3001(5A) (defining "minor" as a "person who has not yet attained the age of 18 years").

[50] D.C. Code § 22-3010.

[51] For example, the current child cruelty statute considers a person under the age of 18 years to be a "child" (D.C. Code § 22-1101(a)), but the current contributing to the delinquency of a minor statute considers a person under the age 18 to be a "minor" (D.C. Code § 22-811(f)(2)).

[52] D.C. Code § 22-3012 states that "[i]n a prosecution under §§ 22-3008 to 22-3010 . . . the government need not prove that the defendant knew the child's age." D.C. Code § 22-3012. The current enticing statute is codified at D.C Code § 22-3010 and falls within the specified range of statutes, but D.C. Code § 22-3012 does not apply to the entire enticing statute. D.C. Code § 22-3012 and the enticing statute were part of the original 1994 Anti-Sexual Abuse Act. Crimes—Anti-Sexual Abuse Act, 1994 District of Columbia Laws 10-257 (Act 10-385). At that time, the enticing statute was limited to "real" complainants under the age of 16 years. The enticing statute was amended in 2007 to include "real" complainants under the age of 18 years when the actor is in a significant relationship with the complainant (D.C. Code § 22-3010(a)) and to include fictitious complainants (D.C. Code § 22-3010(b)). D.C. Code § 22-3012 was not amended in 2007, thus limiting its application to the original enticing statute, although this was likely a drafting error. However, D.C. Code § 22-3011 states that "mistake of age" is not a defense "to a prosecution under §§ 22-3008 to 22-3010.01." D.C. Code § 22-3011(a). Unlike D.C. Code § 22-3012, D.C. Code § 22-3011 was amended in 2007 to expand the specified range of statutes to § 22-3010.01 (the current misdemeanor sexual abuse of a child or minor statute, also enacted in 2007). Given this amendment, it likely that the entire enticing statute was meant to be included in D.C. Code § 22-3011.

[53] See Elonis v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2001, 2010, 192 L.Ed.2d 1 (2015). ("When interpreting federal criminal statutes that are silent on the required mental state, we read into the statute 'only that mens rea gap also is consistent with the revised sexual abuse of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1302) and the revised sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1304). This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised offense.

Third, the marriage and domestic partnership defense in the revised enticing statute does not refer to other offenses. The current marriage or domestic partnership defense states that marriage or domestic partnership is a defense to enticing "prosecuted alone or in conjunction with § 22-3018 [sex offense attempt statute] or § 22-403 [assault with intent to commit certain offenses]."[54] There is no DCCA case law interpreting this provision. The language is not included in the current jury instruction for the marriage or domestic partnership defense.[55] The marriage or domestic partnership defense in the revised enticing statute applies only to prosecution for the revised enticing offense. In the RCC, the revised sex offenses no longer have their own attempt statute, and there are no longer separate "assault with intent to" offenses, or "AWI" offenses. Similarly, the revised assault statutes in the RCC no longer include separate "assault with intent to" crimes and instead provide liability through application of the general attempt statute in RCC § 22E-301 to the completed offenses.[56] Deleting the "prosecuted alone or in conjunction with language" improves the clarity of the revised enticing offense.

Fourth, the marriage and domestic partnership defense in the revised enticing statute makes two clarificatory changes to the current defense.[57] First, the revised marriage and domestic partnership defense replaces "at the time of the offense" with "at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact." Referring to marriage or domestic partnership at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute. Second, the revised marriage and domestic partnership statute, by use of the phrase "in fact," applies strict liability to the element that the actor and the complainant are in a marriage or domestic partnership at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact. The current marriage or domestic partnership statute does not specify a culpable mental state for this requirement, and doing so improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Fifth, the revised enticing statute does not codify a separate provision stating that consent is not a defense. The current sexual abuse statutes specify that "consent is not a which is necessary to separate wrongful conduct from 'otherwise innocent conduct.'" Carter v. United States, 530 U.S. 255, 269, 120 S.Ct. 2159, 147 L.Ed.2d 203 (2000) (quoting X–Citement Video, 513 U.S., at 72, 115 S.Ct. 464).") defense" for the current enticing statute.[58] However, nothing in the RCC enticing statute suggests that consent is a defense. Codifying a provision that explicitly states consent is not a defense is potentially confusing for other RCC offenses which do not take this approach of stating defenses that do not apply. Deleting the current prohibition on consent as a defense is not intended to change current District law.

[54] D.C. Code § 22-3011(b). The "prosecuted alone or in conjunction with" language appears in two other statutes in addition to D.C. Code § 22-3011. D.C. Code § 22-3007, which codifies defenses for first degree through fourth degree sexual abuse and misdemeanor sexual abuse, and D.C. Code § 22-3017, which codifies defenses for sexual abuse of a ward and sexual abuse of a patient or client. The "prosecuted alone or in conjunction with" language in these statutes consistently refers to D.C. Code § 22-3018, which is the current attempt statute for the sexual abuse offenses, but inconsistently refers to D.C. Code § 22-401, which prohibits assault with intent to commit specified offenses, including first degree sexual abuse, second degree sexual abuse, or child sexual abuse, and D.C. Code § 22-403 which prohibits assault with intent to commit "any other offense which may be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary."

[58] D.C. Code § 22-3011(a) ("Neither mistake of age nor consent is a defense to a prosecution under §§ 22-3008 to 22-3010.01, prosecuted alone or in conjunction with charges under § 22-3018 or § 22-403."). The current enticing statute is codified at D.C. Code §§ 22-3010 and falls within the specified range of statutes in D.C. Code § 22-3011(a).

RCC § 22E-1306. Arranging for Sexual Conduct with a Minor or Person Incapable of Consenting.

Explanatory Note. The RCC arranging for sexual conduct with a minor or person incapable of consenting offense ("revised arranging for sexual conduct" offense) prohibits an actor with a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant from knowingly giving effective consent to a third party to engage in sexual activity with the complainant in specific situations. Because of the unique duty of care such actors have, the offense extends liability beyond other RCC offenses that provide more severe penalties for criminally soliciting, attempting, or being an accomplice to a sex offense involving the complainant. The offense applies to specified complainants that are under the age of 18 years or to complainants of any age that satisfy the offense requirements for incapacitation or intoxication. The offense has a single penalty gradation. The revised arranging for sexual conduct offense replaces the current arranging for a sexual contact with a real or fictitious child statute.[1] The revised arranging for sexual conduct offense also replaces in relevant part three distinct provisions for the sexual abuse offenses: the attempt statute,[2] the limitation on prosecutorial immunity,[3] and the aggravating sentencing factors.[4]

Subsection (a) specifies the prohibited conduct for the revised arranging for sexual conduct offense. Subparagraph (a)(1)(A) specifies the first requirement for the revised offense—the actor must have a "responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant."[5] Paragraph (a)(1) specifies a culpable mental state of "knowingly." Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" culpable mental state applies to the elements in subparagraph (a)(1)(A). "Knowingly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor must be practically certain that he or she has a "responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant."

Subparagraph (a)(1)(B) and sub-subparagraphs (a)(1)(B)(i) and (a)(1)(B)(ii) specify the two alternate types of prohibited conduct for the revised offense. First, per subparagraph (a)(1)(B) and sub-subparagraph (a)(1)(B)(i), the actor must give effective consent to a third party to engage in or submit to a sexual act or sexual contact with or for[6] the complainant. "Effective consent, "sexual act," and "sexual contact" are defined terms in RCC § 22E-701. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the

The revised arranging for sexual conduct with a minor person incapable of consenting statute and other RCC Chapter 13 statutes each account for liability changes based on marriage or domestic partnership in the plain language of the statutes and D.C. Code 22-3019 is deleted as unnecessary.

[5] Such a duty of care to the complainant may arise, for example, from the actor being a parent, guardian, teacher, doctor, daycare provider, or babysitter, depending on the facts of a case.

[6] The words "or for" clarify that the offense includes the third party engaging in masturbatory conduct for the complainant.

"knowingly" culpable mental state in paragraph (a)(1) applies to the elements in subparagraph (a)(1)(B) and sub-subparagraph (a)(1)(B)(i). "Knowingly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor must be practically certain that the actor gives effective consent to a third party to engage in or submit to a sexual act or sexual contact with or for the complainant.

Subparagraph (a)(1)(B) and sub-subparagraph (a)(1)(B)(ii) specify the alternate type of prohibited conduct in the revised arranging for sexual conduct statute—the actor must give effective consent to a third party to cause the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act or sexual contact with or for[7] the third party or any other person. "Effective consent, "sexual act," and "sexual contact" are defined terms in RCC § 22E-701. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" culpable mental state in paragraph (a)(1) applies to the elements in subparagraph (a)(1)(B) and sub-subparagraph (a)(1)(B)(ii). "Knowingly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor must give effective consent to a third party to cause the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act or sexual contact with or for the third party or any other person.

Paragraph (a)(2) and its subparagraphs and sub-subparagraphs specify the various alternate requirements for the complainant in the revised arranging for sexual conduct statute. The requirements under subparagraph (a)(2)(A) and subparagraph (a)(2)(B) ensure that the complainant and the third party or the complainant and another person satisfy the age, age gap, and relationship requirements in the RCC sexual abuse of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1302).

Subparagraph (a)(2)(A) and sub-subparagraphs (a)(2)(A)(i) and (a)(2)(A)(ii) specify the requirements when the complainant is under 16 years of age. Per the rule of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "reckless" culpable mental state specified in subparagraph (a)(2)(A) applies to all the elements in sub-subparagraphs (a)(2)(A)(i) and (a)(2)(A)(ii). Under subparagraph (a)(2)(A) and sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(A)(i), the actor must be reckless as to the fact that the complainant is under 16 years of age. Under subparagraph (a)(2)(A) and sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(A)(ii), the actor must also be reckless as to the fact that the third party or any other person is at last four years older than the complainant. "Reckless" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor must be aware of a substantial risk that the complainant is under 16 years of age and that the third party or other person is at least four years older than the complainant.

Subparagraph (a)(2)(B) and its sub-subparagraphs specify requirements when the complainant is under the age of 18 years. Subparagraph (a)(2)(B), sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(B)(i), sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(B)(i)(a), and sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(B)(b) require that the complainant is under 18 years of age and that the third party or other person is at least 18 years of age and at least four years older than the complainant. Per the rule of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "reckless" culpable mental state in sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(B)(i) applies to the elements in sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(B)(i)(a) and sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(B)(i)(b). "Reckless" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor must be aware of a substantial risk that the complainant is under 18 years of age and that the third party or other person is at least 18 years of age and at least four years older than the complainant. Sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(B)(ii) further requires that the actor knows that the third party or other person is in a "position of trust with or authority over" the complainant. "Position of trust with or authority over" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that includes individuals such as parents, siblings, school employees, and coaches. "Knows" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor is practically certain that the third party or other person is in a position of trust with or authority over the complainant.

Subparagraph (a)(2)(C) and its sub-subparagraphs specify the requirements when the complainant is incapacitated. Subparagraph (a)(2)(C) and sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(C)(i) require that the actor is reckless as to the fact that the complainant is incapable of appraising the nature of the sexual act or sexual contact or of understanding the right to give or withhold consent to the sexual act or sexual contact, either due to a drug, intoxicant, or other substance, or, due to an intellectual, developmental, or mental disability or mental illness when the actor has no similarly serious disability or illness. Per the rules of construction in RCC § 22E-207, the "reckless" culpable mental state in subparagraph (a)(2)(C) applies to the elements in sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(C)(i). "Reckless" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor must be aware of a substantial risk that the complainant is the complainant is incapable of appraising the nature of the sexual act or sexual contact or of understanding the right to give or withhold consent to the sexual act or sexual contact, either due to a drug, intoxicant, or other substance, or, due to an intellectual, developmental, or mental disability or mental illness when the actor has no similarly serious disability or illness.

Subparagraph (a)(2)(C) and sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(C)(ii) require that the actor is reckless as to the fact that the complainant is incapable of communicating[8] willingness or unwillingness to engage in the sexual act or sexual contact. Sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(C)(ii) includes paralyzed individuals who are able to appraise the nature of the sexual act or sexual contact or of understanding the right to give or withhold consent under sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(C)(i), but are unable to communicate. Per the rules of construction in RCC § 22E-207, the "reckless" culpable mental state in subparagraph (a)(2)(C) applies to the elements in sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(C)(ii). "Reckless" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor must be aware of a substantial risk that the complainant is incapable of communicating willingness or unwillingness to engage in the sexual act or sexual contact.

Subsection (b) specifies relevant penalties for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (c) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised arranging for sexual conduct with a minor or person incapable of consenting statute clearly changes current District law in seven main ways.

First, the revised arranging for sexual conduct statute is limited to actors who are responsible under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant.

[8] If the complainant is unable to communicate verbally or orally, but is able to make gestures, facial expressions, or engage in other conduct, the person may be capable of communicating and this element may not be satisfied.

The current D.C. Code arranging for a sexual contact statute prohibits any person from either directly "engag[ing] in a sexual act or sexual contact with an individual…represented to be a child…" or indirectly "arrang[ing] for another person to engage in a sexual act or sexual contact" with such an individual.[9] In contrast, the revised arranging for sexual conduct statute applies only when the actor is a parent or other person with a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant and misuses their authority by giving effective consent to a third party to engage in specified sexual activity. A person who seeks to directly engage in sexual activity with a minor complainant would face more serious and proportionate liability for an attempted RCC sex offense under the RCC criminal attempt provision (RCC § 22E-301) or the RCC criminal solicitation statute (RCC § 22E-302) and, if the sexual activity takes place, liability for the completed offense. This change reduces unnecessary overlap between offenses and improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Second, the revised arranging for sexual conduct statute prohibits giving effective consent to sexual activity rather than "arrang[ing]" sexual activity with the complainant. The current D.C. Code arranging for a sexual contact statute prohibits, in relevant part, the actor "arrangi[ng] to engage in a sexual act or sexual contact with the complainant."[10] The term "arrange" is not statutorily defined and there is no DCCA case law interpreting it. In contrast, the revised arranging for sexual conduct statute requires that the actor "give[] effective consent to a third party" to engage in or cause sexual activity with the complainant. The agreement by the actor may be indicated in many ways,[11] and does not require any particular logistical arrangements or details. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Third, the revised arranging for sexual conduct statute replaces the various age requirements for a minor complainant and any third party in the current D.C. Code arranging statute with the requirements that: 1) the actor is "a person with a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant"; and 2) that the consented-to sexual activity would violate, or does violate, the RCC sexual abuse of a minor statute. The current D.C. Code arranging statute requires, in relevant part, that the complainant be under the age of 16 years,[12] but it is unclear whether a four year age gap is required between the actor and the complainant, as well as between the complainant and any third party with whom the sexual conduct is arranged.[13] There is no DCCA case law on this issue. There is also no liability in the current D.C. Code arranging statute

[10] D.C. Code § 22-3010.02(a).
[11] See RCC § 22E-701 (defining "consent" in relevant part as "a word or act that indicates explicitly or implicitly, agreement to particular conduct or a particular result").
[12] Current D.C. Code § 22-3001 defines "child" for the current D.C. Code sexual abuse statutes, including the arranging statute, as "a person who has not yet attained the age of 16 years." D.C. Code § 22-3001(3).
[13] The ambiguity arises from the multiple references to a "person" in the current arranging statute. D.C. Code § 22-3010.02(a) ("It is unlawful for a person to arrange to engage in a sexual act or sexual contact with an individual (whether real or fictitious) who is or who is represented to be a child at least 4 years younger than the person, or to arrange for another person to engage in a sexual act or sexual contact with an individual (whether real or fictitious) who is or who is represented to be a child of at least 4 years younger than the person.") (emphasis added).

when the complainant is 16 years of age or older, but under the age of 18 years, which is inconsistent with other current D.C. Code sex offenses.[14] In contrast, the revised arranging for sexual conduct statute requires that the actor is "a person with a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant" and that the consented-to sexual activity would violate the RCC sexual abuse of a minor statute. Such an actor has a heightened duty of care, which justifies the comparatively low culpable mental state of "knowingly" and the less stringent requirements for liability in the RCC arranging for sexual conduct statute as compared to the RCC general provisions for inchoate liability, such as the RCC soliciting provision (RCC § 22E-302) or accomplice liability (RCC § 22E-210). The phrase a "person with a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant" is used consistently throughout the RCC. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Fourth, the revised arranging for sexual conduct statute applies a culpable mental state of "reckless" as to the age of the complainant. The current D.C. Code arranging statute does not specify any culpable mental states[15] and there is no DCCA case law on this issue. In contrast, the revised arranging for sexual conduct statute applies a "reckless" culpable mental state to the age of the complainant. Applying strict liability to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is strongly disfavored by courts[16] and legal experts[17] for any non-regulatory crimes, although "statutory rape" laws are often an exception.[18] Requiring, at a minimum, a knowing culpable mental state for the elements of an offense that make otherwise legal conduct illegal is a generally accepted legal principle.[19] However, recklessness has been upheld in some [14] For example, the current D.C. Code, closely-related enticing a child statute includes "real" complainants under the age of 18 years when the actor is in a "significant relationship" with the complainant. D.C. Code §§ 22-3010(a); 22-3001(5A) (defining "minor" as "a person who has not yet attained the age of 18 years.").

[17] See § 5.5(c) Pros and cons of strict-liability crimes, 1 Subst. Crim. L. § 5.5(c) (3d ed.) ("For the most part, the commentators have been critical of strict-liability crimes. 'The consensus can be summarily stated: to punish conduct without reference to the actor's state of mind is both inefficacious and unjust. It is inefficacious because conduct unaccompanied by an awareness of the factors making it criminal does not mark the actor as one who needs to be subjected to punishment in order to deter him or others from behaving similarly in the future, nor does it single him out as a socially dangerous individual who needs to be incapacitated or reformed. It is unjust because the actor is subjected to the stigma of a criminal conviction without being morally blameworthy. Consequently, on either a preventive or retributive theory of criminal punishment, the criminal sanction is inappropriate in the absence of mens rea.'") (quoting Packer, Mens Rea and the Supreme Court, 1962 Sup.Ct.Rev. 107, 109).
[18] See, e.g., Joshua Dressler, Understanding Criminal Law § 12.03(b) (3d ed. 2001) ("A few non-public-welfare offenses are characterized as 'strict liability' because they do not require proof that the defendant possessed a mens rea regarding a material element of the offense. Perhaps the most common example is statutory rape, i.e. consensual intercourse by a male with an underage female.") cases as a minimal basis for punishing morally culpable crime.[20] A "reckless" culpable mental state for the age of the complainant in the revised arranging for sexual conduct statute is consistent with the culpable mental state for the age of certain complainants in the sexual abuse by exploitation statute (RCC § 22E-1303), the sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1304), and the enticing a minor into sexual conduct statute (RCC § 22E-1305). This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense.

Fifth, the revised arranging for sexual conduct statute no longer specifically applies when the "arrangement is done with or by a law enforcement officer." The current D.C. Code arranging statute states that it is unlawful for a "person" to arrange to engage in a sexual act or sexual contact "with an individual (whether real or fictitious) . . . who is represented to be a child at least 4 years younger than the person" or "to arrange for another person" to engage in a sexual act or sexual contact "with an individual (whether real or fictitious) . . . who is represented to be a child at least 4 years younger than the person."[21] This statutory language seems to limit the role of a fictitious person to the complainant, but the current statute further provides that "arranging to engage in a sexual act or sexual contact with an individual who is fictitious shall be unlawful only if the arrangement is done by or with a law enforcement officer."[22] There is no DCCA case law interpreting the provisions in the current D.C. Code arranging statute for fictitious complainants. In contrast, the revised arranging for sexual conduct statute is limited to real complainants described in paragraph (a)(2) and real actors that are responsible under civil law for them, although in instances where the circumstances are not as the actor perceives them to be there may be attempt liability.[23] The revised arranging for sexual conduct statute is limited to such an actor "knowingly" giving effective consent to a third party, who may or may not be an undercover law enforcement officer or other person. The RCC enticing a minor into sexual conduct statute (RCC § 22E-1305) specifically includes law enforcement officers that purport to be a complainant under the age of 16 years, which is proportionate given that the offense requires that the actor must entice the minor. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Sixth, the revised arranging for sexual conduct statute prohibits giving effective consent to a third party to engage in sexual activity with an incapacitated complainant or to cause an incapacitated complainant to engage in sexual activity. The current D.C. Code arranging statute is limited to certain complainants under the age of 16 years[24] and [24] D.C. Code §§ 22-3010.02(a) (" It is unlawful for a person to arrange to engage in a sexual act or sexual contact with an individual (whether real or fictitious) who is or who is represented to be a child at least 4 years younger than the person, or to arrange for another person to engage in a sexual act or sexual contact with an individual (whether real or fictitious) who is or who is represented to be a child of at least 4 years younger than the person. For the purposes of this section, arranging to engage in a sexual act or sexual contact with an individual who is fictitious shall be unlawful only if the arrangement is done by or with a law enforcement officer."); 22-3001(3) (defining "child" as "a person who has not yet attained the age of 16 years.").

there is no current D.C. Code offense that specifically prohibits arranging for sexual activity with incapacitated complainants. In contrast, the RCC arranging for sexual conduct statute prohibits giving effective consent to a third party to engage in sexual activity with an incapacitated complainant or to cause an incapacitated complainant to engage in sexual activity. The language in sub-subparagraphs (2)(C)(i) and (2)(C)(ii) of the revised statute is identical to requirements in second degree and fourth degree of the RCC sexual assault statute (RCC § 22E-1301). Without such a provision in the RCC, an actor that is civilly responsible for such an incapacitated complainant that "knowingly" gives effective consent to a third party to engage in or cause sexual activity with that incapacitated complainant would not have liability unless there were a harm or risk of harm that satisfies the RCC criminal abuse of a minor (RCC § 22E-1501), RCC criminal neglect of a minor (RCC § 22E-1502), RCC criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person (RCC § 22E-1503), or RCC criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute (RCC § 22E-1504). An actor that "purposely" engages in this conduct may have liability under an RCC inchoate offense such as solicitation (RCC § 22E-302), but providing liability in the RCC arranging statute when there is a lower culpable mental state of "knowingly" is proportionate given that the actor must have a responsibility under civil law for the complainant's health, welfare, or supervision. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute, and removes a possible gap in liability.

Seventh, only the general penalty enhancements in subtitle I of the RCC apply to the revised arranging for sexual conduct statute. Current D.C. Code § 22-3020 specifies aggravators that apply to all of the current D.C. Code sex offense statutes.[25] DCCA case law suggests that the age-based sex offense aggravators may not apply to certain sex offenses because they overlap with elements of the offense.[26] In contrast, the revised

[25] The relevant sex offense statutes addressed in RCC Chapter 13 are: First degree through fourth degree sexual abuse (D.C. Code §§ 22-3002 through 22-3005), misdemeanor sexual abuse (D.C. Code § 22-3006), child sexual abuse (D.C. Code §§ 22-3008 and 22-3009), sexual abuse of a minor (D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.01 and 22-3009.02), sexual abuse of a secondary education student (D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.03 and 22-3009.04), misdemeanor sexual abuse of a child or minor (D.C. Code § 22-3010.01), sexual abuse of a ward (D.C. Code §§ 22-3013 and 22-3014), sexual abuse of a patient or client (D.C. Code §§ 22-3015 and 22-3016), enticing a minor (D.C. Code § 22-3010), and arranging for sexual contact with a real or fictitious child (D.C. Code § 22-3010.01). Two of the six possible aggravators are age-based. D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(1) (victim under 12 years of age); D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(2) (victim under 18 years of age and in a "significant relationship" with actor). Three of the six possible aggravators concern circumstances indicating the presence of greater force, fraud, or coercion. D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(3) (victim sustained "serious bodily injury."); D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(4) (accomplices aided the crime); D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(6) (defendant was armed with a deadly or dangerous weapon). The remaining aggravator, D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(5) concerns repeat offenders.

[26] DCCA case law in the context of the District's current assault with a dangerous weapon offense (ADW) suggests that the age-based sex offense aggravators and age-based penalty enhancements may not be applied to the current sexual abuse of a child statutes, sexual abuse of a minor statutes, misdemeanor sexual abuse of a child or minor statute, enticing statute, or arranging statute because they overlap with elements of these offenses. The DCCA has held that ADW may not be enhanced with the current "while armed" enhancement in D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(1) because each provision requires the use of a "dangerous weapon." McCall v. United States, 449 A.2d 1095, 1096 (D.C. 1982) ("The government concedes that [current D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(1)] may not apply to ADW since [ADW] provides for enhancement and is a more specific and lenient provision."); see also Gathy v. United States, 754 A.2d 912, 916 n.5 (D.C.

arranging for sexual conduct statute is subject to only the general penalty enhancements specified in subtitle I of the RCC. The current sex offense aggravators in D.C. Code § 22-3020[27] are not necessary in the arranging statute because the offense is limited to sexual conduct that occurs without the use of force, threats, or coercion. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised sex offenses.

Beyond these seven changes to current District law, one other aspect of the revised statute may constitute a substantive change to current District law.

The revised arranging for sexual conduct statute requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state for the actor being a "person with a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant" and for giving effective consent to a third party to engage in sexual activity with the complainant or to cause the complainant to engage in sexual activity. The current D.C. Code arranging statute[28] does not specify any culpable mental state and there is no DCCA case law on this issue. The revised arranging for sexual conduct statute resolves this ambiguity by requiring a "knowingly" culpable mental state for the actor being a "person with a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant" and for giving the required effective consent. Requiring, at a minimum, a knowing culpable mental state for the elements of an offense that make otherwise legal conduct illegal is a generally accepted legal principle.[29] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statutes.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, the revised arranging for sexual conduct statute relies on the general attempt statute to define what conduct constitutes an attempt and the appropriate penalty. Current D.C. Code § 22-3018 provides a separate attempt statute applicable to all current sexual offenses.[30] Under the statute, if the maximum term of imprisonment for the underlying 2000) ("In McCall we held that section [current D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(1)] could not be applied to a charge of ADW because the use of 'a dangerous weapon' is already included as an element of that offense, so that 'ADW while armed'-i.e. assault with a dangerous weapon while armed with a dangerous weapon-would be redundant.").

[27] However, an actor that merely possesses a dangerous weapon or a firearm while committing the revised arranging for sexual conduct offense, without using or displaying it, may face liability under the revised possession of a dangerous weapon during a crime of violence statute (RCC § 22E-4104) or other RCC weapons offenses.

[29] Elonis v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2001, 2010, 192 L.Ed.2d 1 (2015).

[30] The relevant sex offense statutes addressed in RCC Chapter 13 are: First degree through fourth degree sexual abuse (D.C. Code §§ 22-3002 through 22-3005), misdemeanor sexual abuse (D.C. Code § 22-3006), child sexual abuse (D.C. Code §§ 22-3008 and 22-3009), sexual abuse of a minor (D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.01 and 22-3009.02), sexual abuse of a secondary education student (D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.03 and 22-3009.04), misdemeanor sexual abuse of a child or minor (D.C. Code § 22-3010.01), sexual abuse of a ward (D.C. Code §§ 22-3013 and 22-3014), sexual abuse of a patient or client (D.C. Code §§ 22-3015 and 22-3016), enticing a minor (D.C. Code § 22-3010), and arranging for sexual contact with a real or fictitious child (D.C. Code § 22-3010.01).

offense is life, an attempt has a maximum term of imprisonment of 15 years.[31] Otherwise the maximum term of imprisonment is "not more than 1/2 of the maximum prison sentence authorized for the offense."[32] These attempt penalties differ from the attempt penalties established under D.C. Code § 22-1803, the current general attempt statute.[33] In the revised arranging for sexual conduct statute, the RCC General Part's attempt provisions (RCC § 22E-301) establish the requirements to prove an attempt and applicable penalties for the arranging offense, consistent with other offenses. While a separate attempt statute for sex offenses may be justified in the current D.C. Code given the generally lower penalties available through the general attempt statute in D.C. Code § 22-1803, the penalties in the RCC general attempt provision provide penalties at ½ the maximum imprisonment sentence. Elimination of a separate attempt statute for sex offenses, consequently, has no substantive effect on available penalties. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised arranging for sexual conduct offense.

Second, the revised arranging for sexual conduct statute codifies as a discrete basis of liability giving effective consent to a third party to "cause the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act or sexual contact with or for a third party." The current D.C. Code arranging for a sexual contact statute prohibits, in relevant part, the actor "arrangi[ng] for another person to engage in a sexual act or sexual contact" with the complainant.[34] The term "arrange" is not statutorily defined and there is no DCCA case law interpreting it. The revised language is consistent with the other RCC sex offenses that prohibit causing the complainant to engage in or submit to conduct. This change improve the clarity of the revised statutes.

[31] D.C. Code § 22-3018 ("Any person who attempts to commit an offense under this subchapter shall be imprisoned for a term of years not to exceed 15 years where the maximum prison term authorized for the offense is life or for not more than 1/2 of the maximum prison sentence authorized for the offense and, in addition, may be fined an amount not to exceed 1/2 of the maximum fine authorized for the offense.").

[32] D.C. Code § 22-3018 ("Any person who attempts to commit an offense under this subchapter shall be imprisoned for a term of years not to exceed 15 years where the maximum prison term authorized for the offense is life or for not more than 1/2 of the maximum prison sentence authorized for the offense and, in addition, may be fined an amount not to exceed 1/2 of the maximum fine authorized for the offense.").

[33] D.C. Code § 22-1803 establishes general attempt penalties for offenses that do not otherwise have an attempt penalty specified. "Whoever shall attempt to commit any crime, which attempt is not otherwise made punishable by chapter 19 of An Act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901 (31 Stat. 1321), shall be punished by a fine not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or by imprisonment for not more than 180 days, or both. Except, whoever shall attempt to commit a crime of violence as defined in § 23-1331 shall be punished by a fine not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or by imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both." D.C. Code § 22-1803. Under this general attempt penalty statute, the current arranging statute would have a maximum term of imprisonment of 180 days.

[34] D.C. Code § 22-3010.02(a) ("It is unlawful for a person . . . to arrange for another person to engage in a sexual act or sexual contact with an individual (whether real or fictitious) who is or who is represented to be a child of at least 4 years younger than the person.").

RCC § 22E-1307. Nonconsensual Sexual Conduct.

Explanatory Note. The RCC nonconsensual sexual conduct offense prohibits engaging in a sexual act or sexual contact with the complainant or causing a complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act or sexual contact without the complainant's effective consent. The penalty gradations are based on the nature of the sexual conduct. The revised nonconsensual sexual conduct offense replaces the current misdemeanor sexual abuse statute.[1] The revised nonconsensual sexual conduct offense also replaces in relevant part four distinct provisions for the sexual abuse offenses: the consent defense,[2] the attempt statute,[3] the limitation on prosecutorial immunity,[4] and the aggravating sentencing factors.[5]

Subsection (a) specifies the prohibited conduct for first degree nonconsensual sexual conduct. Paragraph (a)(1) requires that the actor engage in a "sexual act" with the complainant or cause the complainant to engage in or submit to a "sexual act." "Sexual act" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that specifies types of sexual penetration or contact between the mouth and certain body parts. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies a culpable mental state of "knowingly" for this conduct. "Knowingly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor must be practically certain that his or her conduct will engage in a "sexual act" with the complainant or cause the complainant to engage in or submit to a "sexual act." Paragraph (a)(2) requires that the actor be "reckless" as to the fact that the actor lacks the complainant's "effective consent." "Recklessly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor must be aware of a substantial risk that the actor lacks the complainant's effective consent. "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception."

Subsection (b) specifies the prohibited conduct for second degree nonconsensual sexual conduct. Paragraph (b)(1) requires that the actor engage in a "sexual contact" with the complainant or cause the complainant to engage in or submit to a "sexual contact." "Sexual contact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means touching the specified body parts, such as genitalia, of any person with the desire to sexually abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, arouse, or gratify any person. Paragraph (b)(1) specifies a culpable mental state of "knowingly" for this conduct. "Knowingly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor must be practically certain that he or she engages in a "sexual contact" with the complainant or cause the complainant to engage in or submit to a "sexual contact." Paragraph (b)(2) requires that the actor be "reckless" as to the fact that the actor lacks the complainant's "effective consent." "Recklessly" is a defined term

Code § 22-3019 ("No actor is immune from prosecution under any section of this subchapter because of marriage, domestic partnership, or cohabitation with the victim; provided, that marriage or the domestic partnership of the parties may be asserted as an affirmative defense in prosecution under this subchapter where it is expressly so provided."). The revised nonconsensual sexual conduct statute and other RCC Chapter 13 statutes each account for liability changes based on marriage or domestic partnership in the plain language of the statutes and D.C. Code 22-3019 is deleted as unnecessary.

in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor must be aware of a substantial risk that the actor lacks the complainant's effective consent. "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception."

Subsection (c) excludes from liability an actor's use of deception unless it is deception as to the nature[6] of the sexual act or sexual contact. Under the exclusion, there is no liability for deception that induces[7] the complainant to consent, notwithstanding the fact that such deception may negate the complainant's effective consent as is required for liability. "Deception" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701. Subsection (c) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element, here that the actor used to deception, unless it was deception as to the nature of the sexual act or sexual contact.

Subsection (d) specifies relevant penalties for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (e) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised nonconsensual sexual conduct statute clearly changes current District law in six main ways.

First, the revised nonconsensual sexual conduct statute is comprised of two gradations, based on whether a "sexual act" or "sexual contact" was committed. The current D.C. Code misdemeanor sexual abuse (MSA) statute prohibits committing either a "sexual act" or "sexual contact" without distinction in penalty, with both types of conduct subject to the same maximum imprisonment of 180 days.[8] In contrast, first degree of the nonconsensual sexual conduct statute prohibits a "sexual act" without effective consent and second degree prohibits "sexual contact" without effective consent. Differentiating the penalties for a "sexual act" and "sexual contact" is consistent with the [6] Examples of deception as to the nature of the sexual act or sexual contact include deceptions as to the object or body part that is used to penetrate the other person and deceptions as to a person's health status (e.g., having a sexually transmitted disease). In addition, deception as to the nature of the sexual act or sexual contact includes a practice known as "stealthing," generally understood as removing a condom without the consent of the sexual partner. See, e.g., https://www.newsweek.com/what-stealthing-lawmakers-california-and-wisconsin-want-answer-be-rape-61098. In the RCC, "stealthing" is sufficient for nonconsensual sexual conduct if the other requirements of the offense are met. Similar acts may be committed despite the gender of the actor. It should be noted that in addition to liability for nonconsensual sexual conduct, deception as to the nature of the sexual act or sexual contact that results in a sexually transmitted disease may by sufficient for assault liability (RCC § 22E-1202).

In addition to the RCC nonconsensual sexual conduct offense, the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute (RCC § 22E-1303) specifically prohibits a sexual act or sexual contact when the actor falsely represents that he or she is someone else with whom the complainant is in a romantic, dating, or sexual relationship. This particular form of deception is more serious than other forms of deception that the RCC nonconsensual sexual conduct offense may prohibit.

[7] Examples of deception to induce a sexual act or sexual contact include: a false statement about one's feelings for the complainant; a false assertion that one is a celebrity; and a false promise to perform a future action in return for the sexual conduct.

[8] D.C. Code § 22-3006.

grading in other current D.C. Code and RCC sex offenses.[9] This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense.

Second, the second degree of the revised nonconsensual sexual conduct statute partially replaces non-violent sexual touching forms of assault. The District's current assault offense, D.C. Code § 22-404, does not specifically refer to nonconsensual sexual touching. However the DCCA has held that a simple assault per D.C. Code § 22-404(a)(1) includes non-violent sexual touching,[10] and that such an assault is a lesser included offense of the current MSA statute.[11] DCCA case law also suggests that a simple assault in D.C. Code § 22-404(a)(1) also likely requires a culpable mental state of recklessness.[12] In contrast, in the RCC, second degree nonconsensual sexual conduct [9] The other current sexual abuse statutes grade offenses involving a "sexual act" more severely than offense involving a "sexual contact." Compare D.C. Code §§ 22-3002, 22-3003, 22-3008, 22-3009.01, 22-3013, 22-3015 (first degree sexual abuse offenses prohibiting a "sexual act") with §§ 22-3004, 22-3006, 22-3009, 22-3009.02, 22-3014, 22-3016 (second degree sexual abuse offenses prohibiting "sexual contact.").

[10] The District's current assault statute does not state the elements of the offense. D.C. Code § 22-404(a)(1) ("Whoever unlawfully assaults, or threatens another in a menacing manner, shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or be imprisoned not more than 180 days, or both."). DCCA case law, however, recognizes that assault includes non-violent touching. "Where the assault involves a nonviolent sexual touching the court has held that there is an assault . . . because 'the sexual nature [of the conduct] suppl[ies] the element of violence or threat of violence.'" Matter of A.B., 556 A.2d 645, 646 (D.C. 1989) (quoting Goudy v. United States, 495 A.2d 744, 746 (D.C.1985), modified, 505 A.2d 461 (D.C.), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 832, 107 S.Ct. 120, 93 L.Ed.2d 66 (1986)). The DCCA has stated that the elements of non-violent sexual touching assault are: 1) That the defendant committed a sexual touching on another person; 2) That when the defendant committed the touching, s/he acted voluntarily, on purpose and not by mistake or accident; and 3) That the other person did not consent to being touched by the defendant in that matter. Mungo v. United States, 772 A.2d 240, 246 (D.C. 2001) (quoting Criminal Jury Instructions for the District of Columbia, No. 4.06(C) (4th ed.1993)); see also Augustin v. United States, No. 17-CF-906, 2020 WL 6325889 (D.C. Oct. 29, 2020). "Touching another's body in a place that would cause fear, shame, humiliation or mental anguish in a person of reasonable sensibility, if done without consent, constitutes sexual touching." Mungo v. United States, 772 A.2d 240, 246 (D.C. 2001) (citations omitted). "The government need not prove that the victim actually suffered anger, fear, or humiliation." Mungo, 772 A.2d at 246 (citations omitted).

[11] In Mungo v. United States, the DCCA held that non-violent sexual touching assault is a lesser included offense of MSA. Mungo, 772 A.2d at 246. The DCCA stated that the actus reus of non-violent sexual touching assault can be "less intimate" than the conduct the MSA prohibits, but "the fundamental difference" between the offenses is the culpable mental state requirement. Id. ("Misdemeanor sexual abuse requires an intent to do the acts; in addition, in this case, it requires an intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, or arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person. Simple assault requires only an intent to do the proscribed act."). However, the sexual conduct at issue in Mungo was a "sexual contact." Mungo, 772 A.2d at 242. Consequently, the Mungo decision that non-consensual sexual touching forms of assault are a lesser included of MSA may only be dicta with respect to sexual acts, even though the DCCA's holding in Mungo did not differentiate between an MSA conviction based on a "sexual act" and an MSA conviction based on "sexual contact." Id. at 246 ("[W]e conclude that non-violent sexual touching assault is a lesser included offense" of MSA). Instead, the court was focused on the parts of the current definitions of "sexual act" and "sexual contact" that require an extra intent to gratify or arouse that simple assault does not. Id. ("When prosecuting MSA based on an alleged sexual contact or an alleged sexual act [based on subsection (C) of the current definition], the government must therefore prove an element of intent, i.e. the intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, or arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person.").

[12] Simple assault is a lesser included offense of offenses such as ADW, assault with significant bodily injury, and aggravated assault. See Williams v. United States, 106 A.3d 1063, 1065 & n.5 (D.C. 2015) (referring to simple assault as a lesser included offense of ADW); Woods v. United States, 65 A.3d 667, generally replaces the non-violent sexual touching form of assault, although, depending on the facts, a non-consensual sexual touching may satisfy the elements of more serious RCC sex offenses[13] or the comparatively less serious sexually suggestive conduct with a minor offense (RCC § 22E-1304).[14] The RCC offensive physical contact offense (RCC § 22E-1205) provides even more general liability for offensive touching (regardless whether there is a sexual intent).[15] The RCC abolishes common law non-violent sexual touching assault that is currently recognized in DCCA case law.[16] This change reduces unnecessary overlap between offenses and improves the proportionality and consistency of the revised offense.

Third, the revised nonconsensual sexual conduct offense requires a culpable mental state of "recklessly" as to the fact that the actor lacked effective consent from the complainant. The current MSA statute requires that an actor "should have knowledge or reason to know that the act was committed without that other person's permission."[17] There is no case law describing the meaning of these mental state terms.[18] However, 668 (D.C. 2013) (referring to simple assault as a lesser included offense of assault with significant bodily injury); McCloud v. United States, 781 A.2d 744, 746 (D.C. 2001) (referring to simple assault as a lesser included of aggravated assault). The lesser included offense relationship between simple assault and ADW and simple assault and aggravated assault suggests that recklessness should suffice for simple assault because proof of recklessness or extreme recklessness satisfies these greater offenses. See Vines v. United States, 70 A.3d 1170, 1180 (D.C. 2013), as amended (Sept. 19, 2013) ("[I]t is clear that a conviction for ADW can be sustained by proof of reckless conduct alone."). However, the DCCA has recently declined to state that recklessness, versus a higher culpable mental state, is sufficient, see Vines v. United States, 70 A.3d 1170, 1181 (D.C. 2013), as amended (Sept. 19, 2013), and, in the context of intent-to-frighten assault, has suggested that a higher culpable mental state than recklessness is required. See Powell v. United States, 238 A.3d 954, 959 (D.C. 2020) ("Our additional concern is whether the evidence proved that appellant had the mens rea required for intent-to-frighten assault: a 'purposeful design ... to engender fear' or 'create apprehension.') (quoting Parks v. United States, 627 A.2d 1, 5 (D.C. 1993); id. at 959 ("For similar reasons, we conclude that the evidence was insufficient for conviction even if we assume arguendo that the mens rea for intent-to-frighten assault can be satisfied by evidence of recklessness.").

[13] For example, a non-consensual sexual touching of a person who is unconscious may constitute fourth degree sexual assault in the RCC.

[14] The RCC sexually suggestive conduct with a minor statute prohibits various types of sexual touching that do not satisfy the RCC definitions of "sexual act" or "sexual contact" and is limited to certain complainants under the age of 18 years.

[15] However, the general merger provision in RCC § 22E-214 would likely prohibit an actor from receiving a conviction for both offensive physical contact and nonconsensual sexual conduct based on the same course of conduct, which would be consistent with current case law on assault and MSA. See, e.g., Mattete v. United States, 902 A.2d 113, 117-18 (D.C. 2006) (agreeing with appellant and the government that appellant's assault conviction merges into the conviction for MSA and remanding the case to the trial court for the purpose of vacating the assault conviction).

[16] See, e.g., Augustin v. United States, No. 17-CF-906, 2020 WL 6325889 (D.C. Oct. 29, 2020).

[17] D.C. Code § 22-3006.

[18] The current "should have knowledge or reason to know" language may suggest a culpable mental state akin to negligence. However, negligence is disfavored as a basis for criminal liability. DiGiovanni v. United States, 580 A.2d 123, 126–27 (D.C. 1990) (J. Steadman, concurring) (referencing "the principle that neither simple negligence nor naivete ordinarily forms the basis of felony liability.") (quoting Morissette v. United States, 342 U.S. 246, 251 (1952) ("[C]rime . . . generally constituted only from concurrence of an evil-meaning mind with an evil-doing hand"). In addition, with respect to the similar phrase "knowing or having reason to believe" in the District's current receiving stolen property offense, D.C. Code § 22-3232, the DCCA held that the culpable mental state still required a subjective awareness by the defendant as to the offense element. See Owens v. United States, 90 A.3d 1118, 1123 (D.C. 2014) (noting that jury

District case law[19] and District practice[20] have consistently construed the culpable mental state regarding the lack of permission in the current MSA statute as "know or should have known," without discussion of the discrepancy with the statutory language. In contrast, the RCC nonconsensual sexual conduct offense requires a "recklessly" culpable mental state as to the lack of effective consent. Requiring, at a minimum, a knowing culpable mental state for the elements of an offense that make otherwise legal conduct illegal is a generally accepted legal principle.[21] However, recklessness has been upheld in some cases as a minimal basis for punishing morally culpable crime.[22] It would be disproportionate to allow a conviction, particularly a felony conviction that requires sex offender registry, on the basis of negligence. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Fourth, the revised nonconsensual sexual conduct offense requires proof that the actor lacked "effective consent" and does not provide for a separate consent defense. The current MSA statute requires that the sexual act or sexual contact occur without the complainant's "permission."[23] "Permission," unlike "consent,"[24] is undefined in the instructions "improperly focused on what a reasonable person would have believed without emphasizing the jury's duty to determine appellant's subjective knowledge"). However, in Coleman v. United States, the DCCA recently held that in the District's stalking statute, a culpable mental state of "should have known" is an "objective standard" that allows for a stalking conviction "based on what an objectively reasonable person would have known." Coleman v. United States, 202 A.3d 1127, 1143, 1144 (D.C. 2019). In Coleman, the DCCA distinguished the Owens opinion as "merely reflect[ing] courts' longstanding reluctance to read a negligence standard into a criminal statute in the absence of a 'clear statement from the legislature.'" Coleman, 202 A.2d at 1143 (internal citations omitted). The DCCA stated that the "should have known" language in the current stalking statute represents "the type of clear legislative statement not present in Owens." Id. at 1143-1144.

It should be noted, however, that the current mental state language in the MSA statute does not fit neatly into either category of mental state discussed in Owens ("reason to believe") or Coleman ("should have known."). The current MSA statute requires "should have knowledge or reason to know that the act was committed without that other person's permission.

[19] See, e.g., Mungo v. United States, 772 A.2d 240, 244-45 (D.C. 2001) (stating that the "essential elements" of MSA are "(1) that the defendant committed a 'sexual act' or 'sexual contact' . . . and (2) that the defendant knew or should have known that he or she did not have the complainant's permission to engage in the sexual act or sexual contact.") (citing the Criminal Jury Instructions for the District of Columbia, No. 460A (4th ed. 1993 & Supp. 1996)); Harkins v. United States, 810 A.2d 895, 900 (D.C. 2002) (stating that MSA "occurs when an individual 'engages in a sexual act or sexual contact with another person and who should have knowledge or reason to know that the act was committed without that other person's permission," citing the MSA statute, but also stating that "there are two essential elements to [MSA]: "'(1) that the defendant committed a 'sexual act' or 'sexual contact' . . . and (2) that the defendant knew or should have known that he or she did not have the complainant's permission to engage in the sexual act or sexual contact." current sexual abuse statutes. DCCA case law has not specifically addressed the definition of "permission," although it has used the terms "permission" and "consent" interchangeably in discussing the MSA statute.[25] The current MSA statute, however, is subject to the same consent defense applicable to other sexual abuse statutes.[26] In contrast, the nonconsensual sexual conduct offense requires proof of lack of "effective consent" and eliminates the consent defense for the MSA statute. "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception." The RCC definition of "effective consent" appears to be consistent with the current definition of "consent" for sex abuse offenses.[27] Elimination of a separate consent defense to the RCC nonconsensual sexual conduct offense does not change the scope of the statute because if a complainant gives effective consent, that negates an element of the offense, and the actor is not guilty. The elimination of a consent defense, moreover, avoids unconstitutionally shifting the burden of proof for an element of the offense to the actor.[28] These changes improve the clarity, consistency and legality of the revised offense.

Fifth, only the general penalty enhancements in subtitle I of the RCC apply to the revised nonconsensual sexual conduct statute. Current D.C. Code § 22-3020 specifies aggravators that apply to all of the current sex offense statutes.[29] In contrast, the revised

[25] See, e.g., Davis v. United States, 973 A.2d 1101, 1104, 1106 (D.C. 2005) (noting in dicta that "permission" is "not specifically defined in the [MSA] statute, but in common usage, the word is a synonym for 'consent'" and holding that "if the complainant in a misdemeanor sexual abuse (or other general sexual assault) prosecution was a child at the time of the alleged offense, an adult defendant who is at least four years older than the complainant may not assert a 'consent' defense."); Hailstock v. United States, 85 A.3d 1277, 1280, 1281, (noting that "what was required to convict [the appellant] of the offense of attempted MSA was that he took the requisite overt steps at a time when he should have known that he did not have [the complainant's] consent for the acts he contemplated.") (emphasis in original).

[26] D.C. Code § 22-3007.

[27] D.C. Code § 22-3001(4), defining consent, requires that there be "words or overt actions indicating a freely given agreement" (emphasis added). There is no DCCA case law interpreting the "freely given" requirement in the current definition of "consent." However, the RCC definition of "effective consent" in RCC § 22E-701 appears to cover this requirement insofar as it requires consent that is obtained by means other than physical force, a coercive threat, or deception.

[28] In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358, 364 (1970) ("[The] Due Process Clause protects the accused against conviction except upon proof beyond a reasonable doubt of every fact necessary to constitute the crime with which he is charged."). To the extent that "permission" in the current MSA statute is the same as "consent," (see commentary above) the current consent defense may unconstitutionally shift the burden of proof to the defendant.

[29] The relevant sex offense statutes addressed in RCC Chapter 13 are: First degree through fourth degree sexual abuse (D.C. Code §§ 22-3002 through 22-3005), misdemeanor sexual abuse (D.C. Code § 22-3006), child sexual abuse (D.C. Code §§ 22-3008 and 22-3009), sexual abuse of a minor (D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.01 and 22-3009.02), sexual abuse of a secondary education student (D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.03 and 22-3009.04), misdemeanor sexual abuse of a child or minor (D.C. Code § 22-3010.01), sexual abuse of a ward (D.C. Code §§ 22-3013 and 22-3014), sexual abuse of a patient or client (D.C. Code §§ 22-3015 and 22-3016), enticing a minor (D.C. Code § 22-3010), and arranging for sexual contact with a real or fictitious child (D.C. Code § 22-3010.01). Two of the six possible aggravators are age-based. D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(1) (victim under 12 years of age); D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(2) (victim under 18 years of age and in a "significant relationship" with actor). Three of the six possible aggravators concern circumstances indicating the presence of greater force, fraud, or coercion. D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(3) (victim sustained "serious bodily injury."); D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(4) (accomplices aided the crime); D.C. Code § 22-nonconsensual sexual conduct statute is subject to only the general penalty enhancements specified in subtitle I of the RCC. The current sex offense aggravators in D.C. Code § 22-3020[30] are not necessary in the revised nonconsensual sexual conduct statute because the offense is limited to sexual conduct that occurs without the use of force, threats, or coercion. Limiting the penalty enhancements in RCC subtitle I to the revised nonconsensual sexual conduct statute improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised sex offenses.

Sixth, to the extent that the protection of District public officials statute,[31] various offense-specific penalty enhancements,[32] and certain statutory minimum penalties[33] apply to the current assault statute and related assault offenses, the RCC second degree nonconsensual sexual conduct offense partially replaces them. These statutes are silent as to whether the provisions are intended to apply to low-level assaultive conduct and there is no DCCA case law on the issue. In contrast, in the RCC, non-violent sexual touching that is criminalized in the RCC nonconsensual sexual conduct statute no longer is subject to these provisions. This change improves the proportionality of the revised offense. For further discussion of how these enhancements and provisions apply to the District's current assault statutes, see the commentary to the revised assault statute (RCC § 22E-1202).

Beyond these six changes to current District law, three other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised nonconsensual sexual conduct statute consistently requires that the actor "engages in" a sexual act or sexual contact with the complainant or "causes the complainant to engage in or submit to" the sexual act or sexual contact. While all of the current sexual abuse statutes require that the actor "engages in" the sexual conduct, they vary in whether there is liability if the actor "causes" the complainant to "engage in" the 3020(a)(6) (defendant was armed with a deadly or dangerous weapon). The remaining aggravator, D.C. Code § 22-3020(a)(5) concerns repeat offenders.

[30] However, an actor that merely possesses a dangerous weapon or a firearm while committing sexually suggestive conduct with a minor, without using or displaying it, may face liability under the revised possession of a dangerous weapon during a crime of violence statute (RCC § 22E-4104) or other RCC weapons offenses.

[31] D.C. Code § 22-851.

[32] The enhancement for committing an offense while armed (D.C. Code § 22-4502); the enhancement for senior citizens (D.C. Code § 22-3601); the enhancement for citizen patrols (D.C. Code § 22-3602); the enhancement for minors (D.C. Code § 22-3611); the enhancement for taxicab drivers (D.C. Code §§ 22-3751; 22-3752); and the enhancement for transit operators and Metrorail station managers (D.C. Code §§ 22-3751.01; 22-3752).

[33] D.C. Code §§ 24-403.01(e) ("The sentence imposed under this section on a person who was over 18 years of age at the time of the offense and was convicted of assault with intent to commit first or second degree sexual abuse or child sexual abuse in violation of § 22-401…shall be not less than 2 years if the violation occurs after the person has been convicted in the District of Columbia or elsewhere of a crime of violence as defined in § 22-4501, providing for the control of dangerous weapons in the District of Columbia."); D.C. Code § 24-403.01(f) ("The sentence imposed under this section shall not be less than 1 year for a person who was over 18 years of age at the time of the offense and was convicted of: (1) Assault with a dangerous weapon on a police officer in violation of § 22-405, occurring after the person has been convicted of a violation of that section or of a felony, either in the District of Columbia or in another jurisdiction.").

sexual conduct or "causes" the complainant to "submit to" the sexual conduct.[34] This variation creates different plain language readings of the current sexual abuse statutes and suggests that the current offenses vary in scope as to the prohibited conduct and liability for involvement of a third party. There is no case law on point. However, DCCA case law addressing similar language in the District's current misdemeanor sexual abuse statute suggests that the DCCA may not construe such language variations as legally significant.[35] In addition to case law, District practice does not appear to follow the variations in statutory language.[36] Instead of these variations in language, the revised sex offenses and the revised definitions of "sexual act" and "sexual contact" consistently require that the actor "engages in" or "causes" the complainant to "engage in" or "submit to" the sexual conduct. Differentiating liability based on whether an actor themselves commits the sexual conduct in question, or whether the actor causes the complainant to engage in or submit to the sexual conduct, may lead to disproportionate outcomes. This change improves the consistency, clarity, and proportionality of the revised offenses, and reduces unnecessary gaps in liability.

Second, the revised nonconsensual sexual conduct offense requires a culpable mental state of "knowingly" as to engaging in the sexual act or contact. The current MSA statute does not specify any culpable mental state for engaging in a sexual act or sexual contact, although the current statutory definition of "sexual contact" requires an [34] First degree sexual abuse, second degree sexual abuse, and sexual abuse of a ward codify "engages in" the sexual conduct, "causes" the complainant to "engage in" the sexual conduct, and "causes" the complainant to "submit to" the sexual conduct. D.C. Code §§ 22-3002 and 22-3003; 22-3013 and 22-3014. Third and fourth degree sexual abuse, child sexual abuse, sexual abuse of a minor, and sexual abuse of a secondary education student are limited to "engages in" the sexual conduct and "causes" the complainant to "engage in" the sexual conduct. D.C. Code §§ 22-3004 and 22-3005; 22-3008 and 22-3009; 22-3009.01 and 22-3009.02. Misdemeanor sexual abuse and sexual abuse of a patient or client require only "engages in." D.C. Code §§ 22-3006; 22-3015 and 22-3016.

[35] In Pinckney v. United States, the DCCA held that the misdemeanor sexual abuse statute includes "conduct where a person uses another to touch intimate parts of the person's own body" even though the plain language of the statute requires "engages in a sexual act or sexual contact with another person." Pinckney v. United States, 906 A.2d 301, 303, 306 (D.C. 2006) (quoting Council of the District of Columbia, Report of the Committee on the Judiciary, Bill 10-87, the "Anti-Sexual Abuse Act of 1994 at 1). The DCCA declined "an interpretation that would exclude such an obvious means of offensive touching," in part because the legislature intended to "'strengthen the District's laws against sexual abuse and make them more inclusive, flexible and reflective of the broad range of abusive conduct which does in fact occur.'" Id. (quoting Council of the District of Columbia, Report of the Committee on the Judiciary, Bill 10-87, the "Anti-Sexual Abuse Act of 1994 at 1). The DCCA stated that its interpretation of the misdemeanor sexual abuse statute "as applying to the facts of this case does not require appellant to have caused the victim to engage in or submit to sexual contact" because the appellant engaged in the prohibited sexual contact by his own actions." Id. However, the DCCA's reliance on the legislative intent of the Anti-Sexual Abuse Act suggests that it would broadly interpret any variations in the language of the current sexual abuse statutes.

[36] The jury instructions for third degree, fourth degree, child sexual abuse, and sexual abuse of a minor include that the actor "caused" the complainant "to engage in or submit to" a sexual act or sexual contact, even though the statutory language for those offenses does not include "causes" the complainant to "submit to." Compare D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. §§ 4.400 (general sexual abuse); 4.401 (child sexual abuse); 4.402 (sexual abuse of a minor) D.C. Code §§ 22-3003 and 22-3004 (third degree and fourth degree sexual abuse statutes); 22-3008 and 22-3009 (first degree and second degree child sexual abuse statutes); 22-3009.01 and 22-3009.02 (first degree and second degree sexual abuse of a minor statutes).

"intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, or arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person."[37] The DCCA has characterized the current first degree and third degree sexual abuse statutes, which concern a "sexual act," as "general intent" crimes. However, it is not clear what specific culpable mental state must be proven for such "general intent" crimes—e.g., knowledge or recklessness.[38] In addition, the current assault statute,[39] which has been interpreted by the DCCA to include liability for nonconsensual sexual touching,[40] likely requires a culpable mental state of recklessness.[41] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised nonconsensual sexual conduct statute requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state in each gradation for causing the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act or sexual contact. Requiring, at a minimum, a knowing culpable mental state for the elements of an offense that make otherwise legal conduct illegal is a [37] D.C. Code § 22-3001(9) (defining "sexual contact."). Despite this additional intent element the definition of "sexual contact" requires, the DCCA has sustained a conviction for second degree child sexual abuse when the jury instructions required that the actor "knowingly" touched the complainant and erroneously omitted "with intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, or arouse or gratify." Green v. United States, 948 A.2d 554, 558, 561 (D.C. 2008) (affirming appellant's conviction for second degree child sexual abuse when the jury instructions required that the appellant "knowingly" touched the complainant and omitted the "intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, or arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person" requirement because "no rational jury could have found that appellant touched [the complainants] in a way consistent with the trial court's jury instruction . . . without also finding the requisite intent.").

[38] See commentary to RCC § 22E-1301, Sexual assault, for further discussion.

[39] D.C. Code § 22-404(a)(1) ("Whoever unlawfully assaults, or threatens another in a menacing manner, shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or be imprisoned not more than 180 days, or both.").

[40] In Mungo v. United States, the DCCA held that non-violent sexual touching assault is a lesser included offense of MSA. Mungo, 772 A.2d at 246. The DCCA stated that the actus reus of non-violent sexual touching assault can be "less intimate" than the conduct the MSA prohibits, but "the fundamental difference" between the offenses is the culpable mental state requirement. Id. ("Misdemeanor sexual abuse requires an intent to do the acts; in addition, in this case, it requires an intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, or arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person. Simple assault requires only an intent to do the proscribed act.").

[41] Simple assault is a lesser included offense of offenses such as ADW, assault with significant bodily injury, and aggravated assault. See Williams v. United States, 106 A.3d 1063, 1065 & n.5 (D.C. 2015) (referring to simple assault as a lesser included offense of ADW); Woods v. United States, 65 A.3d 667, 668 (D.C. 2013) (referring to simple assault as a lesser included offense of assault with significant bodily injury); McCloud v. United States, 781 A.2d 744, 746 (D.C. 2001) (referring to simple assault as a lesser included of aggravated assault). The lesser included offense relationship between simple assault and ADW and simple assault and aggravated assault suggests that recklessness should suffice for simple assault because proof of recklessness or extreme recklessness satisfies these greater offenses. See Vines v. United States, 70 A.3d 1170, 1180 (D.C. 2013), as amended (Sept. 19, 2013) ("[I]t is clear that a conviction for ADW can be sustained by proof of reckless conduct alone."). However, the DCCA has recently declined to state that recklessness, versus a higher culpable mental state, is sufficient, see Vines v. United States, 70 A.3d 1170, 1181 (D.C. 2013), as amended (Sept. 19, 2013), and, in the context of intent-to-frighten assault, has suggested that a higher mental state than recklessness is required. See Powell v. United States, 238 A.3d 954, 959 (D.C. 2020) ("Our additional concern is whether the evidence proved that appellant had the mens rea required for intent-to-frighten assault: a 'purposeful design ... to engender fear' or 'create apprehension.') (quoting Parks v. United States, 627 A.2d 1, 5 (D.C. 1993); id. at 959 ("For similar reasons, we conclude that the evidence was insufficient for conviction even if we assume arguendo that the mens rea for intent-to-frighten assault can be satisfied by evidence of recklessness.").

generally accepted legal principle.[42] Requiring a "knowingly" culpable mental state may also clarify that the gradations that require "sexual contact" are lesser included offenses of the gradations that require a "sexual act," an issue which has been litigated in current DCCA case law, but remains unresolved.[43] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statutes.

Third, notwithstanding the requirement for liability that the defendant lack "effective consent," subsection (c) of the RCC nonconsensual sexual conduct statute excludes from liability the use of deception to induce the sexual conduct. "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception." As is discussed earlier in this commentary, the RCC definition of "effective consent" appears to be consistent with the current definition of "consent" for sex offenses,[44] which requires that the agreement be "freely given." However, there is no DCCA case law interpreting the current definition of "consent" for the sex offense statutes and it is not clear whether deception, or what kind of deception, prevents consent from being "freely given." Resolving this ambiguity, the RCC excludes from liability deception as to the inducement of the sexual act or sexual contact. The use of deception to induce the sexual act or sexual contact is not of the same gravity as deception as to the nature of the sexual conduct. Criminalizing sexual conduct by deception is largely disfavored in current American criminal law,[45] with the exceptions of falsely represented medical procedures and impersonation of a woman's husband.[46] This exclusion from liability is discussed further in the explanatory note to this offense. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute.

[43] In re E.H. is a child sexual abuse case, but the court's reasoning regarding the relationship between "sexual act" and "sexual contact" may be instructive for the general sexual abuse statutes. In In re E.H., the appellant was convicted of first degree child sexual abuse, but the court reversed the conviction due to insufficient evidence. In re E.H., 967 A.2d 1270, 1271, 1275 (D.C. 2009). The court declined to address whether second degree child sexual abuse is a lesser included offense of first degree child sexual abuse, but did note that "[a]t oral argument, counsel for the government agreed with appellant's counsel that second-degree sexual abuse is not a lesser-included offense of first-degree sexual abuse because, at least in two instances, to prove a "sexual act" (for first-degree) it is not necessary to show the specific intent required to prove "sexual contact" (for second-degree)." Id. at 1276 n. 9. The DCCA further noted that "[i]n general, a crime can only be a lesser-included offense of another if its required proof contains some, but not all, of the elements of the greater offense" and "the gravamen of whether a crime is the lesser-included offense of another is legislative intent. Id. (internal quotation omitted).

[44] The current MSA statute requires that the sexual act or sexual contact occur without the complainant's "permission." "Permission," unlike "consent," is undefined in the current sexual abuse statutes, but, as is discussed elsewhere in this commentary, DCCA case law has used the terms "permission" and "consent" interchangeably in discussing the MSA statute.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

The revised nonconsensual sexual conduct statute relies on the general attempt statute to define what conduct constitutes an attempt and the appropriate penalty. Current D.C. Code § 22-3018 provides a separate attempt statute applicable to all current sexual offenses.[47] Under the statute, if the maximum term of imprisonment for the underlying offense is life, an attempt has a maximum term of imprisonment of 15 years.[48] Otherwise the maximum term of imprisonment is "not more than 1/2 of the maximum prison sentence authorized for the offense."[49] These attempt penalties differ from the attempt penalties established under D.C. Code § 22-1803, the current general attempt statute.[50] In the revised nonconsensual sexual conduct statute, the RCC General Part's attempt provisions (RCC § 22E-301) establish the requirements to prove an attempt and applicable penalties, consistent with other offenses. While a separate attempt statute for sex offenses may be justified in the current D.C. Code given the generally lower penalties available through the general attempt statute in D.C. Code § 22-1803, the penalties in the RCC general attempt provision provide penalties at ½ the maximum imprisonment sentence. Elimination of a separate attempt statute for sex offenses, consequently, has no substantive effect on available penalties. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised nonconsensual sexual conduct offense.

[47] The relevant sex offense statutes addressed in RCC Chapter 13 are: First degree through fourth degree sexual abuse (D.C. Code §§ 22-3002 through 22-3005), misdemeanor sexual abuse (D.C. Code § 22-3006), child sexual abuse (D.C. Code §§ 22-3008 and 22-3009), sexual abuse of a minor (D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.01 and 22-3009.02), sexual abuse of a secondary education student (D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.03 and 22-3009.04), misdemeanor sexual abuse of a child or minor (D.C. Code § 22-3010.01), sexual abuse of a ward (D.C. Code §§ 22-3013 and 22-3014), sexual abuse of a patient or client (D.C. Code §§ 22-3015 and 22-3016), enticing a minor (D.C. Code § 22-3010), and arranging for sexual contact with a real or fictitious child (D.C. Code § 22-3010.01).

[48] D.C. Code § 22-3018 ("Any person who attempts to commit an offense under this subchapter shall be imprisoned for a term of years not to exceed 15 years where the maximum prison term authorized for the offense is life or for not more than 1/2 of the maximum prison sentence authorized for the offense and, in addition, may be fined an amount not to exceed 1/2 of the maximum fine authorized for the offense.").

[49] D.C. Code § 22-3018 ("Any person who attempts to commit an offense under this subchapter shall be imprisoned for a term of years not to exceed 15 years where the maximum prison term authorized for the offense is life or for not more than 1/2 of the maximum prison sentence authorized for the offense and, in addition, may be fined an amount not to exceed 1/2 of the maximum fine authorized for the offense.").

[50] D.C. Code § 22-1803 establishes general attempt penalties for offenses that do not otherwise have an attempt penalty specified. "Whoever shall attempt to commit any crime, which attempt is not otherwise made punishable by chapter 19 of An Act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901 (31 Stat. 1321), shall be punished by a fine not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or by imprisonment for not more than 180 days, or both. Except, whoever shall attempt to commit a crime of violence as defined in § 23-1331 shall be punished by a fine not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or by imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both." D.C. Code § 22-1803. Under this general attempt penalty statute, the current MSA statute would have a maximum term of imprisonment of 180 days, which is the same as the current penalty for the completed offense. D.C. Code § 22-3010.01.

RCC § 22E-1308. Incest.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the incest offense and penalty for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The offense prohibits knowingly engaging in a sexual act or a sexual contact with a specified family member when the consent of that family member is obtained by undue influence. The offense has two gradations that are based on the nature of the sexual conduct. The incest offense replaces the incest offense[1] in the current D.C. Code.

Subsection (a) establishes the requirements for first degree incest, the most serious gradation of the offense. First, per paragraph (a)(1), the actor must, "in fact," be at least 16 years of age. "In fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, is used here to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to the age of the actor.

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies the prohibited conduct for first degree incest — engaging in a "sexual act" with another person. "Sexual act" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that specifies types of sexual penetration or contact between the mouth and certain body parts. Paragraph (a)(2) specifies that the required culpable mental state for this conduct is "knowingly." "Knowingly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the accused must be practically certain that he or she engages in a "sexual act" with another person. "Sexual act" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that specifies types of sexual penetration or contact between the mouth and certain body parts.

Subparagraph (a)(2)(A), sub-subparagraphs (a)(2)(A)(i) and (a)(2)(A)(ii), and subparagraph (a)(2)(B) specify the family members that are included in the scope of the revised incest statute. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the culpable mental state "knowingly" in paragraph (a)(2) applies to subparagraph (a)(2)(A), sub-subparagraphs (a)(2)(A)(i) and (a)(2)(A)(ii), and subparagraph (a)(2)(B). "Knowingly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the accused must be practically certain that the other person is a family member in one of the specified relationships—for example, a parent related by blood or adoption.

Paragraph (a)(3) specifies the final requirement for first degree of the revised incest statute. The actor must obtain the consent of the other person by undue influence. "Consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that requires some indication (by word or action) of agreement given by a person generally competent to do so. "Undue influence" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 as "mental, emotional, or physical coercion that overcomes the free will or judgment of a person and causes that person to act in a manner that is inconsistent with his or her financial, emotional, mental, or physical well-being." Whether the coercion causes a person to act in a manner that is inconsistent with his or her financial, emotional, mental, or physical well-being is a fact-specific determination. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the culpable mental state "knowingly" in paragraph (a)(2) applies to the requirements in paragraph (a)(3). "Knowingly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the accused must be practically certain that the consent of the other person is obtained by "undue influence," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701.

Subsection (b) specifies the prohibited conduct for second degree of the revised incest statute. The requirements for second degree incest are the same as the requirements under subsection (a), the only difference being that second degree incest requires a "sexual contact" as opposed to a "sexual act." "Sexual contact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means touching the specified body parts, such as genitalia, of any person with the desire to sexually abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, arouse, or gratify any person.

Subsection (c) specifies relevant penalties for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (d) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised incest statute clearly changes current District law in eleven main ways.

First, the revised incest statute no longer prohibits marriage or cohabitation. The current D.C. Code incest statute states that no person "shall marry or cohabit with" specified family members.[2] The statute does not define "marry" or "cohabit" and there is no DCCA case law on the issue. In contrast, the revised incest statute is limited to engaging in a "sexual act" or a "sexual contact" as those terms are defined in RCC § 22E-701, and does not prohibit marriage or cohabitation. Marriage between several of the specified individuals may be precluded under District or other jurisdictions' civil law. Cohabitation with a relative, absent engaging in a sexual act or sexual contact with consent obtained by undue influence, is decriminalized. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Second, the revised incest statute includes adoptive parents, grandparents, and great-grandparents, and adopted children, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren. The current D.C. Code incest statute[3] includes these relationships by blood, but not by adoption. In contrast, the revised incest statute includes adoptive parents, grandparents, and great-grandparents, and adopted children, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren, when consent is obtained by undue influence. Including these adoptive relationships in incest is consistent with the scope of several current D.C. Code[4] sex offenses and the [3] The current incest statute prohibits relationships "within and not including the fourth degree of consanguinity, computed according to the rules of the Roman or civil law." D.C. Code § 22-1901. Parents and children are within the first degree of consanguinity, grandparents, grandchildren, and siblings are within the second degree of consanguinity, and great-grandparents, great-grandchildren, uncles, aunts, nieces, and nephews are within the third degree of consanguinity. MPC § 230.2 cmt. at 398 n. 7.

[4] Current District law includes adoptive parents and adoptive grandparents in the definition of "significant relationship." D.C. Code § 22-3001(10) (defining "significant relationship" to include "A parent, sibling, aunt, uncle, or grandparent, whether related by blood, marriage, domestic partnership, or adoption."). Whether a defendant is in a "significant relationship" with a minor complainant determines liability for several of the current D.C. Code sex offenses, such as sexual abuse of a minor. D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.01 and 22-3009.02 (first degree and second degree sexual abuse of a minor), 22-3001(5A) (defining a "minor" as a "person who has not yet attained the age of 18 years."). However, if the adoptive parent or grandparent satisfies the age requirements of the current sexual abuse of a child statutes, then the fact that there is a "significant relationship" is irrelevant to liability. D.C. Code §§ 22-3008 and 22-3009 (first degree and second degree sexual abuse of a child), 22-3001(3) (defining a "child" as a "person who has not yet attained the age of 16 years.").

Third, the revised incest statute includes specified relationships by marriage or domestic partnership, both during the marriage or domestic partnership and after the marriage or domestic partnership ends. The current D.C. Code incest statute[6] includes several of these relationships by blood, but not by marriage or domestic partnership. In contrast, the revised incest statute includes these relationships by marriage or domestic partnership, both during the marriage or domestic partnership and after the marriage or domestic partnership ends, when consent is obtained by undue influence. Including these relationships by marriage or domestic partnership in incest is consistent with the scope of several current D.C. Code[7] sex offenses and the RCC definition of "position of trust with or authority over,"[8] and recognizes their importance to the family unit. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute, and removes a possible gap in current law.

Fourth, the revised incest statute includes siblings by adoption. The current D.C. Code incest statute[9] includes siblings related by blood, but not by adoption. In contrast, the revised incest statute prohibits sexual activity between adopted siblings, when consent is obtained by undue influence. Including siblings by adoption in incest is consistent with the scope of several current D.C. Code[10] sex offenses and the RCC definition of [7] Current District law defines "significant relationship" to include "A parent, sibling, aunt, uncle, or grandparent, whether related by . . . marriage [or] domestic partnership. . .". D.C. Code § 22-3001(10). Whether a defendant is in a "significant relationship" with a minor complainant determines liability for several of the current D.C. Code sex offenses, such as sexual abuse of a minor. D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.01 and 22-3009.02 (first degree and second degree sexual abuse of a minor), 22-3001(5A) (defining a "minor" as a "person who has not yet attained the age of 18 years."). However, if the adoptive parent or grandparent satisfies the age requirements of the current sexual abuse of a child statutes, then the fact that there is a "significant relationship" is irrelevant to liability. D.C. Code §§ 22-3008 and 22-3009 (first degree and second degree sexual abuse of a child), 22-3001(3) (defining a "child" as a "person who has not yet attained the age of 16 years.").

MPC § 230.2 cmt. at 398 n. 7.

[10] Current District law includes adoptive siblings in the definition of "significant relationship." D.C. Code § 22-3001(10) (defining "significant relationship" to include "A parent, sibling, aunt, uncle, or grandparent, whether related by blood, marriage, domestic partnership, or adoption."). Whether a defendant is in a "significant relationship" with a minor complainant determines liability for several of the current D.C. Code sex offenses, such as sexual abuse of a minor. D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.01 and 22-3009.02 (first degree and second degree sexual abuse of a minor), 22-3001(5A) (defining a "minor" as a "person who has not yet attained the age of 18 years."). However, if the adoptive parent or grandparent satisfies the age

"position of trust with or authority over,"[11] and recognizes their importance to the family unit. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute, and removes a possible gap in current law.

Fifth, the revised incest statute includes a "parent's sibling," whether related by blood, adoption, marriage, or domestic partnership. The current D.C. Code incest statute[12] includes a parent's sibling related by blood, but not by adoption, marriage, or domestic partnership. In contrast, the revised incest statute includes a parent's sibling, whether related by blood, adoption, marriage, or domestic partnership, when consent is obtained by undue influence. Including these relationships in incest is consistent with the scope of several current D.C. Code[13] sex offenses and the RCC definition of "position of trust with or authority over,"[14] and recognizes their importance to the family unit. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute, and removes a possible gap in current law.

Sixth, the revised incest statute includes a "sibling's child," whether related by blood, adoption, marriage, or domestic partnership. The current D.C. Code incest statute[15] includes a sibling's child related by blood, but not by adoption, marriage, or domestic partnership. In contrast, the revised incest statute includes a sibling's child, whether related by blood, adoption, marriage, or domestic partnership, when consent is obtained by undue influence. requirements of the current sexual abuse of a child statutes, then the fact that there is a "significant relationship" is irrelevant to liability. D.C. [13] Current District law includes a parent's sibling (aunt or uncle) whether related by blood, adoption, marriage, or domestic partnership in the definition of "significant relationship." D.C. Code § 22-3001(10) (defining "significant relationship" to include "A parent, sibling, aunt, uncle, or grandparent, whether related by blood, marriage, domestic partnership, or adoption."). Whether a defendant is in a "significant relationship" with a minor complainant determines liability for several of the current D.C. Code sex offenses, such as sexual abuse of a minor. D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.01 and 22-3009.02 (first degree and second degree sexual abuse of a minor), 22-3001(5A) (defining a "minor" as a "person who has not yet attained the age of 18 years."). However, if the adoptive parent or grandparent satisfies the age requirements of the current sexual abuse of a child statutes, then the fact that there is a "significant relationship" is irrelevant to liability. D.C. Code §§ 22-3008 and 22-3009 (first degree and second degree sexual abuse of a child), 22-3001(3) (defining a "child" as a "person who has not yet attained the age of 16 years.").

[15] The current incest statute specifies relationships "within and not including the fourth degree of consanguinity, computed according to the rules of the Roman or civil law." D.C. Code § 22-1901. Parents and children are within the first degree of consanguinity, grandparents, grandchildren, and siblings are within the second degree of consanguinity, and great-grandparents, great-grandchildren, uncles, aunts, nieces, and nephews are within the third degree of consanguinity. MPC § 230.2 cmt. at 398 n. 7.

Seventh, the revised incest statute includes first cousins (child of a parent's sibling), whether related by blood, adoption, marriage, or domestic partnership. The current D.C. Code incest statute does not include first cousins because first cousins are within the fourth degree of consanguinity.[16] In contrast, the revised incest statute includes a first cousin, whether related by blood, adoption, marriage, or domestic partnership, when consent is obtained by undue influence. Including these relationships recognizes their importance to the family unit. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute, and removes a possible gap in current law.

Eighth, the revised incest statute requires that the actor obtains the consent of the specified relative "by undue influence," as defined in RCC § 22E-701,[17] and applies a "knowingly" culpable mental state to this element. The current D.C. Code incest statute does not have any such element[18] and criminalizes consensual sexual activity between specified relatives due to the familial relationship. In contrast, the revised incest statute requires that the actor obtains the consent of the specified relative "by undue influence," as defined in RCC § 22E-701, and applies a "knowingly" culpable mental state to this element. These requirements, in conjunction with the requirement that the defendant in an incest case be at least 16 years old, ensure that the revised incest statute does not criminalize consensual sexual activity between adults or minors that are close in age. When a minor complainant is under the age of 16 years and the actor is at least 4 years older, the RCC sexual abuse of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1302) criminalizes a sexual act or sexual contact, regardless of apparent consent, based on the ages of the parties. For minor complaints that are under the age of 18 years, third degree and sixth degree of the RCC sexual abuse of a minor statute criminalize otherwise consensual sexual conduct with many of the familial relationships in the RCC incest statute if the actor is at least 18 years of age and at least four years older, without regard to apparent consent. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statutes. The commentary to this offense has been updated to reflect that this is a change in law.

Ninth, the revised incest statute codifies two degrees of incest, based on whether there is a "sexual act" or "sexual contact." The current D.C. Code incest statute is limited to one degree.[19] In contrast, the revised incest statute has two degrees—first degree requires a "sexual act" and second degree incest requires a "sexual contact." This is consistent with RCC sex offenses that differentiate gradations based on whether there is a "sexual act" or "sexual contact." This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Tenth, the revised incest statute requires that the actor be at least 16 years of age and, by use of the phrase "in fact," requires strict liability for this element. The current

[17] RCC § 22E-701 defines "undue influence" as "mental, emotional, or physical coercion that overcomes the free will or judgment of a person and causes that person to act in a manner that is inconsistent with his or her financial, emotional, mental, or physical well-being."

[18] D.C. Code § 22-1901.

[19] D.C. Code § 22-1901.

D.C. Code incest statute, D.C. Code § 22-1901, does not address whether an actor must be a certain age and there is no DCCA case law on this issue. However, absent an age requirement for the actor, the current D.C. Code incest statute includes a person under the age of 16 years who engages in sexual activity with an older family member, as well as a person under 16 years of age who engages in consensual sexual activity with a younger family member that is close in age. This differs from current D.C. Code sexual abuse statutes and the RCC which criminalize otherwise consensual sexual acts between persons under the age of 16 only when the actor is at least four years older than the complainant.[20] In contrast, the revised incest statute requires that the actor be at least 16 years of age and applies strict liability to this element.[21] This change clearly and categorically removes criminal liability for incest for persons under 16 years of age, although there may still be liability under the RCC sexual assault statute (RCC § 22E-1301) or the RCC sexual abuse of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1302). This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Eleventh, the revised incest statute is subject to the RCC duty to report a sex crime and the related civil infraction and civil provisions (RCC § 22E-1309), and the RCC evidentiary provisions for RCC sex offenses (RCC § 22E-1310). The current D.C. Code incest statute is codified in D.C. Code § 22-1901. As a result, it is not subject to the current D.C. Code equivalents of these provisions.[22] In contrast, the revised incest statute is subject to the RCC duty to report a sex crime and the related civil infraction and civil provisions (RCC § 22E-1309), and the RCC admission of evidence in sexual assault and related cases statute (RCC § 22E-1310). Given the overlap between the current D.C. Code sexual abuse statutes and the RCC sexual abuse statutes discussed elsewhere in this commentary, it is inconsistent for the duty to report and related civil provisions and sex offense evidentiary provisions to not apply to incest. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Beyond these eleven substantive changes to current District law, three other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

[20] The current D.C. Code child sexual abuse statute requires that the complainant be under the age of 16 years and that the defendant be at least four years older. D.C. Code §§ 22-3008 and 22-3009; 22-3001(3) (defining "child" as a "person who has not yet attained the age of 16 years."). First degree, second degree, fourth degree, and fifth degree of the RCC sexual abuse of a minor statute have the same requirements. RCC § 22E-1302.

[21] It is generally recognized that a person may be held strictly liable for elements of an offense that do not distinguish innocent from guilty conduct. See Elonis v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2001, 2010, 192 L.Ed.2d 1 (2015). ("When interpreting federal criminal statutes that are silent on the required mental state, we read into the statute 'only that mens rea which is necessary to separate wrongful conduct from 'otherwise innocent conduct.'" Carter v. United States, 530 U.S. 255, 269, 120 S.Ct. 2159, 147 L.Ed.2d 203 (2000) (quoting X–Citement Video, 513 U.S., at 72, 115 S.Ct. 464)."). Strict liability for the age of the actor also is consistent with several of the RCC sex offenses.

[22] Incest is not included in the current D.C. Code duty to report a sex crime statute and failing to report incest is not included in the related civil infraction. D.C. Code §§ 22-3020.51(4) (defining "sexual abuse" for the purposes of the duty to report a sex crime and related statutes as "any act that is a violation of: (A) Section 22-1834; (B) Section 22-2704; (C) This chapter; or (D) Section 22-3102."). Similarly, incest is not included in the current D.C. Code evidence provisions for the current D.C. Code sexual abuse offenses in Chapter 30 of Title 22. See D.C. Code §§ 22-3021 through 22-3024.

First, the revised incest statute requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state for engaging in the sexual act or sexual contact. The current D.C. Code incest statute requires that the defendant know that he or she is related to the other person within one of the specified degrees of consanguinity,[23] but does not specify any culpable mental state for marrying, cohabiting, or engaging in sexual intercourse. There is no DCCA case law regarding the required mental state, if any, for this conduct. Resolving these ambiguities, the revised incest statute requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state for engaging in a sexual act or sexual contact. Requiring, at a minimum, a knowing culpable mental state for the elements of an offense that make otherwise legal conduct illegal is a generally accepted legal principle.[24] Requiring a "knowingly" culpable mental state is also consistent with the RCC sex offenses, which require that the defendant "knowingly" engage in the prohibited conduct. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statutes.

Second, the revised incest statute prohibits engaging in a "sexual act" or "sexual contact," as those terms are defined in RCC § 22E-701. The current incest statute, D.C. Code § 22-1901, prohibits "sexual intercourse," but does not define the term. However, DCCA case law states that incest "involves the same bodily invasion, i.e. sexual intercourse, as that of rape,"[25] and some District case law appears to limit "sexual intercourse" in that context to penile penetration of the vagina.[26] In 1995, the District's sexual assault laws were significantly amended to specifically prohibit means of sexual penetration besides penile penetration of the vagina,[27] but the incest statute was not revised. Resolving this ambiguity, through the definitions of "sexual act" and "sexual contact" in RCC § 22E-701, the revised incest statute prohibits additional forms of sexual penetration other than penile penetration of the vagina and sexual touching. Prohibiting a "sexual act" or "sexual contact" is also consistent with the scope of other RCC sex offenses. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Third, the revised incest statute specifies that half-siblings by blood are included. The current incest statute, D.C. Code § 22-1901, prohibits marriage, cohabitation, or sexual intercourse with a person related "within and not including the fourth degree of consanguinity, computed according to the rules of the Roman or civil law." The statute does not specify whether a half-sibling is included, and there is no DCCA case law on this issue. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised incest statute specifies that half-siblings are included. Including half-siblings in incest is consistent with the RCC definition of "position of trust with or authority over,"[28] and recognizes their importance to the family unit. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statutes, and removes a possible gap in current law.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, the revised incest statute replaces the language "related to another person within and not including the fourth degree of consanguinity, computed according to the rules of the Roman or civil law" in the current statute with the specific relatives related by blood.[29] This change improves the clarity of the revised statute without changing current District law.

Second, the revised incest statute no longer specifies that the actor must be "in the District." The language is surplusage, particularly since the revised statute is limited to sexual intercourse, and no longer prohibits marriage. Deleting it does not change the scope of the offense.

RCC § 22E-1309. Civil Provisions on the Duty to Report a Sex Crime.

Explanatory Note. The RCC Civil Provisions on the Duty to Report a Sex Crime statute establishes a duty for persons 18 years of age or older to report known or suspected specified sex crimes involving persons under 16 years of age. The revised statute establishes several exclusions from the duty to report, as well as immunity from liability and employment discrimination for good-faith reports made pursuant to this statute. The revised statute establishes a civil violation for failing to report a sex crime as required. The civil violation has a single penalty gradation. The revised statute replaces five distinct provisions in the current D.C. Code: the child sexual abuse reporting requirements and privileges statute,[1] the defense to non-reporting statute,[2] the penalties for failing to report statute,[3] immunity from liability for good-faith reporting statute,[4] and definitions for these provisions.[5]

Subsection (a) of the revised statute establishes the duty to report specified sex crimes. To be subject to the duty to report, a person must "in fact" be at least 18 years of age. "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element, here the required age for a person to be subject to the duty to report. Subsection (a) further requires that, in order to be subject to the duty to report the person "in fact . . . is aware of a substantial risk that a person under 16 years of age is being subjected to, or has been subjected to, a predicate crime." Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "in fact" specified in subsection (a) applies to these requirements and no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205 applies to them. However, to be subject to the duty to report, a person must be aware of a substantial risk both that the other person is under 16 years of age and that this person is being subjected to, or has been subjected to, a predicate crime. Subparagraph (i)(2)(B) defines the term "predicate crime" for the revised statute.

If a person is, in fact, at least 18 years of age and is aware of a substantial risk that a person under 16 years of age is being subjected to, or has been subjected to, a predicate crime, subsection (a) requires that person shall "shall immediately report such information or belief in a call to 911, a report to the Child and Family Services Agency, or a report to the Metropolitan Police Department." Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "in fact" specified in subsection (a) applies to the required ways of reporting information or belief of a suspected predicate crime, and no culpable mental state applies.

Subsection (b) establishes several exclusions to the duty to report a predicate crime established in subsection (a). Paragraph (b)(1) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "in fact" specified in paragraph (b)(1) applies to the requirements of all the exclusions from the duty to report specified in the subparagraphs and sub-subparagraphs under paragraph (b)(1).

The first exclusion from the duty to report is in subparagraph (b)(1)(A)—a person that is subjected to a predicate crime by the same person alleged to have committed a predicate crime against the person under 16 years of age. The second exclusion from the duty to report is in subparagraph (b)(1)(B)—a lawyer or a person employed by a lawyer if certain requirements are met. The third exclusion to the duty to report is in subparagraph (b)(1)(C)—a "religious leader described in D.C. Code § 14-309, when the information or basis for the belief is the result of a confession or penitential communication made by a penitent directly to the minister" and satisfies the requirements in sub-subparagraphs (b)(1)(C)(i) through (b)(1)(C)(iv). A "religious leader described in D.C. Code § 14-309" is a priest, clergyman, rabbi, or other duly licensed, ordained, or consecrated minister of a religion authorized to perform a marriage ceremony in the District of Columbia or duly accredited practitioner of Christian Science, regardless of whether the religious leader hears confessions or receives other communications. The final exclusion to the duty to report is in subparagraph (b)(1)(D)—"a sexual assault counselor, when the information or basis for the belief is disclosed in a confidential communication" unless the sexual assault counselor is "aware of a substantial risk" of specified situations in sub-subparagraphs (b)(1)(D)(i) through (b)(1)(D)(iii),[6] such as the sexual assault victim is under 13 years of age. "Sexual assault counselor" and "confidential communication" are defined terms in subsection (i).

Paragraph (b)(2) states that no legal privilege, other than those established in subsection (b), applies to the duty to report established in subsection (a).

Subsection (c) establishes that RCC § 22E-1309 does not alter the mandatory reporting requirements for certain individuals, such as teachers, that are required in D.C. Code § 4-1321.02(b).

Subsection (d) establishes the requirements for the civil violation. First, per paragraph (d)(1), the person must, "in fact," be at least 18 years of age. "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element, here the required age of the person committing the civil violation. Paragraph (a)(2) requires that the person "knows" that he or she has a duty to report the predicate crime involving a person under 16 years of age as required by subsection (a). "Knows" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the person must be practically certain that he or she has a duty to report a predicate crime as required by subsection (a). Paragraph (a)(3) requires that the person fails to carry out the duty required in subsection (a). Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" culpable mental state specified in paragraph (d)(2) applies to the elements in paragraph (d)(3) and the person must be practically certain that he or she fails to carry out the duty specified in subsection (a).

[6] Per the rules of interpretation in in RCC § 22E-207, the "in fact" specified in paragraph (b)(1) applies to all the requirements of the exclusion in subparagraph (b)(1)(D) and sub-subparagraphs (b)(1)(D)(i) through (b)(1)(D)(i)(iii), and no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to them. However, a sexual assault counselor must be "aware of a substantial risk" that the specified situations in sub-subparagraphs (b)(1)(D)(i) through (b)(1)(D)(i)(iii) exist, such as the sexual assault victim is under 13 years of age.

Subsection (e) establishes a defense to the civil violation. The general provision in RCC § 22E-201 establishes the burdens of proof and production for all defenses in the RCC. The defense applies if the person, "in fact," reasonably believes[7] that they are a survivor of either intimate partner violence, as defined in D.C. Code § 16-1001(7), or intrafamily violence, as defined in D.C. Code § 16-1001(9). Subsection (e) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element. Although no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to the defense, the actor must subjectively believe, and that belief must be reasonable, that they are a survivor of either intimate partner violence, as defined in D.C. Code § 16-1001(7), or intrafamily violence, as defined in D.C. Code § 16-1001(9). Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[8] There is no defense when the person makes an unreasonable mistake that they are a survivor of either intimate partner violence, as defined in D.C. Code § 16-1001(7), or intrafamily violence, as defined in D.C. Code § 16-1001(9).

Subsection (f) establishes the penalty for the civil violation. Paragraph (f)(1) establishes that the penalty for the civil violation is a civil fine of $300. Paragraph (f)(2) establishes that a civil violation under subsection (d) "shall not" constitute a criminal offense or a delinquent act as defined in D.C. Official Code § 16-2301(7).

Subsection (g) establishes that the Office of Administrative Hearings has jurisdiction to adjudicate civil infractions under this statute, pursuant to D.C. Code § 2-1831.03(b-6).

Subsection (h) establishes immunity for persons who make good-faith reports pursuant to this statute. In particular, paragraph (h)(1) is specific to immunity from civil or criminal liability with respect to making the report or any participation in any judicial proceeding involving the report. In all relevant civil or criminal proceedings, paragraph (h)(1) establishes that good faith shall be presumed unless rebutted. Paragraph (h)(2) states that in the event of employment discrimination due to a good-faith report made pursuant to this statute, a person may commence a civil action for appropriate relief and the Superior Court for the District of Columbia may grant appropriate relief. Paragraph (h)(2) also states that the District may intervene in any action commenced under paragraph (h)(2).

Subsection (i) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC and D.C. Code.

[7] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist.

[8] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

Relation to Current District Law. The revised civil provisions on the duty to report a sex crime statute clearly changes current District law in five main ways.

First, the revised duty to report statute includes incest as a predicate crime. The current D.C. Code duty to report statute applies to a violation of the sexual abuse offenses in Chapter 30 of Title 22 of the D.C. Code.[9] The current D.C. Code incest statute is codified at D.C. Code § 22-1901 and is not included in the current D.C. Code duty to report statute. In contrast, the revised duty to report statute includes any RCC sex offense in RCC Chapter 13 as a predicate crime, which includes incest (RCC § 22E-1308). This change improves clarity and consistency of the revised duty to report statute and removes a possible gap in liability.

Second, the revised duty to report statute includes several human trafficking statutes as predicate crimes. The current D.C. Code duty to report statute applies to a violation of D.C. Code § 22-1834 (sex trafficking of children),[10] but does not include any other human trafficking offenses. In contrast, the revised duty to report statute includes the RCC statute that is equivalent to D.C. Code § 22-1834 (§ 22E-1605; sex trafficking of a minor or adult incapable of consenting), as well as three additional RCC trafficking statutes: 1) forced commercial sex (RCC § 22E-1602); 2) trafficking in forced commercial sex (RCC § 22E-1604); and 3) commercial sex with a trafficked person (RCC § 22E-1608). These human trafficking crimes generally do not require the complainant to be a minor, but could apply when the complainant is a minor, and should be included as predicate crimes in the duty to report a known or suspected sex crime. This change improves clarity and consistency of the revised duty to report statute and removes a possible gap in liability.

Third, the revised statute includes the RCC trafficking in commercial sex statute (RCC § 22E-4403) as a predicate crime, which broadly prohibits causing an individual to engage in consensual commercial sex acts. The current D.C. Code duty to report statute only includes one prostitution-related offense as a predicate crime—D.C. Code § 22-2704, abducting or enticing a child from his or her home for the purposes of prostitution. However, prostitution may fall under one of the other predicate crimes included in the current D.C. Code duty to report statute: 1) D.C. Code § 22-1834, sex trafficking of children; or 2) a sexual abuse offense in Chapter 30 of Title 22.[11] In contrast, the revised duty to report statute specifically includes the RCC trafficking in commercial sex statute (RCC § 22E-4403). This offense broadly prohibits causing an individual to engage in consensual commercial sex acts and should be included in the list of predicate offenses for a duty to report when the complainant is under the age of 16 years. This change improves clarity and consistency of the revised duty to report statute and removes a possible gap in liability.

Fourth, the revised statute no longer includes abduction for the purposes of prostitution as a predicate offense. The current D.C. Code duty to report statute applies to a violation of D.C. Code § 22-2704, abducting or enticing a child from his or her home for the purposes of prostitution.[12] In contrast, the revised duty to report statute no longer includes abduction for the purposes of prostitution as a predicate offense. To the extent that abducting or enticing a minor for purposes of prostitution satisfies the other offenses included in the definition of "predicate crime" under subparagraph (i)(2)(B), such as the RCC trafficking in commercial sex statute (RCC § 22E-4403), the RCC duty to report statute still applies. However, for conduct that falls outside these offenses, the RCC duty to report statute does not apply. This change improves the consistency of the revised statute.

[9] D.C. Code § 22-3020.51(4) (defining "sexual abuse" as "any act that is a violation of: (A) Section 22-1834; (B) Section 22-2704; (C) This chapter; or (D) Section 22-3102.").
[10] D.C. Code § 22-3020.51(4) (defining "sexual abuse" as "any act that is a violation of: (A) Section 22-1834; (B) Section 22-2704; (C) This chapter; or (D) Section 22-3102.").
[11] D.C. Code § 22-3020.51(4) (defining "sexual abuse" as "any act that is a violation of: (A) Section 22-1834; (B) Section 22-2704; (C) This chapter; or (D) Section 22-3102.").

Fifth, the predicate crimes that give rise to the duty to report in the revised statute differ as compared to current law. The current D.C. Code duty to report statute applies to a violation of: 1) D.C. Code § 22-1834 (sex trafficking of children); 2) D.C. Code § 22-2704 (abducting or enticing a child from his or her home for the purposes of prostitution; harboring such child); 3) Chapter 30 of Title 22 of the D.C. Code (sexual abuse offenses); and 4) D.C. Code § 22-3102 (sexual performance using minors).[13] These offenses have been revised and the scope of the RCC offenses may differ as compared to current law. For example, the RCC obscenity offenses included as predicate crimes in the revised duty to report statute (Creating or Trafficking an Obscene Image of a Minor under RCC § 22E-1807, Possession of an Obscene Image of a Minor under RCC § 22E-1808, Arranging a Live Sexual Performance of a Minor under RCC § 22E-1809, or Attending or Viewing a Live Sexual Performance of a Minor under RCC § 22E-1810) include a wider scope of prohibited images as compared to the current D.C. Code sexual performance using a minors statute (D.C. Code § 22-3102). The RCC commentaries to the revised offenses discuss the difference with the current D.C. Code statutes in detail.

Beyond these five changes to current District law, nine other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised duty to report statute requires that a person 18 years of age or older is "aware of a substantial risk" that a person under 16 years of age is being, or has been subjected to, specified sex crimes. The current D.C. Code reporting statute requires such a person "knows" or "has reasonable cause to believe."[14] There is no DCCA case law interpreting these terms in the current statute. Resolving these ambiguities, the revised duty to report statute requires the person is "aware of a substantial risk." This language requires that the person have subjective awareness of a substantial risk, as opposed to negligence—that the person merely should have known that there was a substantial risk of abuse. An objective (negligence) standard that applies even when a person had no subjective awareness of misconduct would be inconsistent with the Council's stated intent to encourage persons to report behavior.[15] This change improves the clarity and completeness of the revised statute.

[12] D.C. Code § 22-3020.51(4) (defining "sexual abuse" to include "any act that is a violation of . . . (B) Section 22-2704.").

[14] D.C. Code § 22-3020.52(a).

[15] See, e.g., Committee on the Judiciary, Report on Bill 19-647, "Child Sexual Abuse Reporting Amendment Act of 2012," (October 9, 2012) at 6 ("Requiring everyone to report simplifies the reporting requirement, Second, the revised duty to report statute applies to situations where a person is aware of a substantial risk that a person under 16 years of age "is being," currently, or "has been subjected to," in the past, specified sexual crimes. The current D.C. Code reporting statute applies to a child that "is a victim" of specified sexual crimes. "Victim" is defined for the current D.C. Code reporting statute and all of Chapter 30 of Title 22 of the D.C. Code as "a person who is alleged to have been subject to any offense set forth in subchapter II of this chapter [Chapter 30].[16] However, as applied in the reporting statute, this definition of "victim" conflicts with the definition of "sexual abuse," which includes sex crimes that are not in Chapter 30 of Title 22 of the D.C. Code.[17] Moreover, it is unclear whether the current D.C. Code reporting statute includes both current and past instances of known or suspected sexual abuse, or if it is limited to current instances. There is no DCCA case law interpreting the scope of the current statute and the legislative history is ambiguous.[18] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised duty to report statute applies to a child under 16 years of age that is being, or has been subjected to, a predicate crime. This requirement is consistent with the scope of the mandatory reporters statute in current D.C. Code § 4-1321.02.[19] This change improves the clarity, completeness, and consistency of the revised statute.

Third, the revised duty to report statute replaces the reference to a "priest, clergyman, rabbi, or other duly appointed, licensed, ordained, or consecrated minister of a given religion in the District of Columbia, or a duly accredited practitioner of Christian Science in the District of Columbia"[20] in the current D.C. Code duty to report statute with "a religious leader described in D.C. Code § 14-309." The language in the current D.C.

eliminates the need to analyze whether one is a mandatory reporter, and may overcome the reluctance of many . . . to get involved.").

[16] D.C. Code § 22-3001 defines terms for Chapter 30, Sexual Abuse, of Title 22 of the current D.C. Code. D.C. Code § 22-3001 states that "[f]or the purposes of this chapter . . . 'victim' means a person who is alleged to have been subject to any offense set forth in subchapter II of this chapter." D.C. Code § 22-3001(11). The current reporting statute is codified in D.C. Code § 22-3020.52 and is included in Chapter 30. The definition of "victim" in D.C. Code § 22-3001(11) applies to the current reporting statute.

[17] See D.C. Code §§ 22-3020.51(4) (defining "sexual abuse" to include D.C. Code § 22-1834, § 22-2704, and § 22-3102, as well as all offenses in Chapter 30 of Title 22); 22-3020.52(a) ("Any person who knows, or has reasonable cause to believe, that a child is a victim of sexual abuse shall immediately report…").

[18] The Committee Report for the current reporting statute frequently refers to a child that "is a victim of sexual abuse," which raises the same ambiguity that is in the statute. See, e.g., Committee on the Judiciary, Report on Bill 19-647, "Child Sexual Abuse Reporting Amendment Act of 2012," (October 9, 2012) at 1, 6. There are at least two references to "is being sexually abused," which may indicate a legislative intent to limit the reporting statute to current sexual abuse. Committee on the Judiciary, Report on Bill 19-647, "Child Sexual Abuse Reporting Amendment Act of 2012," (October 9, 2012) at 4, 13. However, there is no discussion in the legislative history regarding the required time frame or the meaning of the term "victim."

[19] D.C. Code § 4-1321.02(a) ("Notwithstanding § 14-307, any person specified in subsection (b) of this section who knows or has reasonable cause to suspect that a child known to him or her in his or her professional or official capacity has been or is in immediate danger of being a mentally or physically abused or neglected child, as defined in § 16-2301(9), shall immediately report or have a report made of such knowledge or suspicion to either the Metropolitan Police Department of the District of Columbia or the Child and Family Services Agency.") (emphasis added).

[20] D.C. Code § 22-3020.52(c)(2)(A).

Code duty to report statute and the religious leaders described in D.C. Code § 14-309[21] differ primarily in that D.C. Code § 14-309 refers to specified religious leaders that are "authorized to perform a marriage ceremony" in the District, and the current D.C. Code duty to report statute refers to a duly appointed, licensed, ordained, or consecrated minister "of a given religion" in the District. It is unclear whether this is a substantive difference and there is no DCCA case law. Resolving this ambiguity, the RCC duty to report statute refers to a "religious leader in D.C. Code § 14-309," which is consistent with the inclusion of this language in the RCC sexual abuse by exploitation statute (RCC § 22E-1303). A "religious leader described in D.C. Code § 14-309" is a 'priest, clergyman, rabbi, or other duly licensed, ordained, or consecrated minister of a religion authorized to perform a marriage ceremony in the District of Columbia or duly accredited practitioner of Christian Science,' regardless of whether the religious leader hears confessions or receives other communications." This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Fourth, the revised defense in subsection (e) requires that the person "reasonably believes"[22] that he or is a survivor of intimate partner violence, as defined in D.C. Code § 16-1001(7), or intrafamily violence, as defined in D.C. Code § 16-1001(9)." The defense in current D.C. Code § 22-3020.53[23] does not specify any such subjective awareness, and it is unclear whether such subjective awareness, or strict liability, applies. There is no DCCA case law on this issue. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised defense requires that the person "reasonably believes" that he or she is a survivor of intimate partner violence, as defined in D.C. Code § 16-1001(7), or intrafamily violence, as defined in D.C. Code § 16-1001(9). This is consistent with the "reasonably believes" requirement in other defenses in the RCC. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Fifth, the revised defense in subsection (e) requires that the person fail to report known or suspected sexual abuse as required by subsection (a) "because" he or she is a survivor of intimate partner violence, as defined in D.C. Code § 16-1001(7), or intrafamily violence, as defined in D.C. Code § 16-1001(9). The current D.C. Code defense states that "[a]ny survivor of [intimate partner violence, as defined in D.C. Code § 16-1001(7), or intrafamily violence, as defined in D.C. Code § 16-1001(9)] may use such . . . violence as a defense to his or her failure to report."[24] The current defense does not appear to require any causal link between the violence and the failure to report, meaning that the specified types of violence are a defense even if they are unrelated to the known or suspected child sexual abuse or the failure to report is part of a purposeful criminal scheme. However, the legislative history for the current D.C. Code reporting

[21] D.C. Code § 14-309 refers to a "priest, clergyman, rabbi, or other duly licensed, ordained, or consecrated minister of a religion authorized to perform a marriage ceremony in the District of Columbia or duly accredited practitioner of Christian Science."

[22] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist.

[23] D.C. Code § 22-3020.53(a) ("Any survivor of domestic violence may use such domestic violence as a defense to his or her failure to report under this subchapter.").

[24] D.C. Code § 22-3020.53(a).

statute and related provisions suggests that a causal link was intended.[25] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised in subsection (e) requires that the failure to report be "because" the person is a survivor of intimate partner violence or intrafamily violence. This change improves the clarity and completeness of the revised statute.

Sixth, the revised civil violation for failing to report a sex crime (subsection (d)) requires that a person "knows" that he or she has a duty to report a known or suspected specified sexual crime pursuant to subsection (a). The current D.C. Code civil infraction statute prohibits "willfully fail[ing]" to make the required report.[26] "Willfully" is not defined in the current D.C. Code civil infraction statute and there is no DCCA case law for this statute. It is unclear whether "willfully" requires that a person know that he or she has a duty to report as required by D.C. Code § 22-3020.52. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised civil violation in subsection (d) requires that a person "knows" that he or she has a duty to report pursuant to RCC § 22E-1309(a). Supreme Court case law commonly interprets "willfully" in a criminal statute as requiring that the defendant act with a purpose to disobey or disregard the law,[27] and in the case of highly complex laws such as federal tax laws, may require that the defendant know of the specific law that his or her conduct is violating.[28] In addition, Supreme Court case law recognizes due process limits on criminal convictions for the mere failure to act if there is no reason for the person to believe he or she had a legal duty to act or that his or her failure to act was [25] Committee on the Judiciary, Report on Bill 19-647, "Child Sexual Abuse Reporting Amendment Act of 2012," (October 9, 2012) at 4-5 (stating that the legislation "[p]rovides a defense to any survivor of domestic violence who, due to the domestic violence, failed to report as required by this bill."). In addition, the legislative history indicates that the defense should be narrowly interpreted:

> Although victims will now have an opportunity to reach safety before reporting, the defense should not be used as a reason to never notify authorities about the known or suspected sexual abuse. Once a victim and his or her family are safely away from their abuser, the Committee intends that authorities be notified in order to report the abuse and to ensure that the abuser is not able to prey upon other children.

[27] See, e.g., Bryan v. United States, 524 U.S. 184, 191–92 (1998) ("The word 'willfully' is sometimes said to be 'a word of many meanings' whose construction is often dependent on the context in which it appears. Most obviously it differentiates between deliberate and unwitting conduct, but in the criminal law it also typically refers to a culpable state of mind. As we explained in United States v. Murdock, 290 U.S. 389, 54 S.Ct. 223, 78 L.Ed. 381 (1933), a variety of phrases have been used to describe that concept. As a general matter, when used in the criminal context, a 'willful' act is one undertaken with a 'bad purpose.' In other words, in order to establish a 'willful' violation of a statute, 'the Government must prove that the defendant acted with knowledge that his conduct was unlawful.'") (internal citations and footnotes omitted); Ratzlaf v. United States, 510 U.S. 135, 137 (1994) (holding that "[t]o establish that a defendant willfully violated the antistructuring law, the Government must prove that the defendant acted with knowledge that his conduct was unlawful.").

[28] See, e.g., Bryan v. United States, 524 U.S. 184, 194 (1991) ("In certain cases involving willful violations of the tax laws, we have concluded that the jury must find that the defendant was aware of the specific provision of the tax code that he was charged with violating. See, e.g., Cheek v. United States, 498 U.S. 192, 201, 111 S.Ct. 604, 610, 112 L.Ed.2d 617 (1991).").

blameworthy.[29] This case law supports requiring at least a "knowing" culpable mental state for the duty to report as required in subsection (a). This change improves the clarity and completeness of the revised statute.

Seventh, the revised civil violation for failure to report a sex crime (subsection d)) requires that the person knowingly fail to carry out his or her duty to report specified sex crimes to the authorities per subsection (a). The current D.C. Code civil infraction statute prohibits "willfully fail[ing]" to make the required report.[30] It is unclear what is required for a person to "willfully" fail to make the required report and there is no DCCA case law on this issue. Resolving this ambiguity, the civil violation for failure to report a sex crime (subsection d)) requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state for failing "to carry out his or her duty to report" as required by subsection (a). The current and revised duty to report statutes have specific reporting requirements and requiring a "knowing" culpable mental state for the failure to report is proportional to the specificity of these requirements. This change improves the clarity and completeness of the revised infraction.

[29] Former D.C. Code § 22-2511 stated in relevant part, "It is unlawful for a person to be voluntarily in a motor vehicle if that person knows that a firearm is in the vehicle, unless the firearm is being lawfully carried or lawfully transported." D.C. Code § 22-2511(a) (Repl. 2015). The statute was repealed in 2015. Prior to its repeal, however, the DCCA in Conley v. United States held that the statute was unconstitutional for two reasons. Pertinent to the present discussion, the second reason was that:

> [I]t is incompatible with due process to convict a person of a crime based on the failure to take a legally required action—a crime of omission—if he had no reason to believe he had a legal duty to act, or even that his failure to act was blameworthy. The fundamental constitutional vice of § 22–2511 is that it criminalizes entirely innocent behavior—merely remaining in the vicinity of a firearm in a vehicle, which the average citizen would not suppose to be wrongful (let alone felonious)—without requiring the government to prove that the defendant had notice of any legal duty to behave otherwise."

Conley v. United States, 79 A.3d 270, 273 (D.C. 2013) (citing Lambert v. California, 355 U.S. 225 (1957)).

The DCCA acknowledged that Lambert "applies only when an unusual statute is 'triggered in circumstances so commonplace, that an average citizen would have no reason to regard the triggering event as calling for a heightened awareness of one's legal obligations.'" Conley, 79 A.3d at 283 (quoting Texaco, Inc. v. Short, 454 U.S. 516, 547 (1982) (Brennan, J., dissenting)). The DCCA stated that courts have typically rejected Lambert challenges for "public welfare offenses" that involve dangerous articles like drugs and dangerous weapons and for statutes "imposing legal obligations on persons with other particular reasons to be on notice of them, as in prosecutions for violating [statutes that prohibit the possession of firearms by persons who have been convicted of misdemeanor domestic violence offenses or who are subject to a judicial anti-harassment or anti-stalking order] and for failing to register as required by the Sex Offender Registration and Notification Act." Conley, 79 A.3d at 283-84.

However, despite these limitations, the DCCA found that D.C. Code § 22-2511 was similar to the statute held unconstitutional in Lambert because it criminalized mere presence and did not require proof of any conduct "that would traditionally and foreseeably subject a person to criminal sanction, such as handling or concealing the firearm, constructively possessing it, or aiding and abetting someone else's possession or use of it." Id. at 285. In addition, the statute targeted individuals "who are not engaged in [firearm ownership, possession, transportation, or dealing] and who therefore have no reason to be familiar with the firearms laws or to investigate whether those laws impose any duties on them." Id. at 286 (emphasis in original).

[30] D.C. Code § 22-3020.54(a) ("Any person required to make a report under this subchapter who willfully fails to make such a report shall be subject to a civil fine of $300.").

Eighth, the exclusion to the duty to report for sexual assault counselors requires that the sexual assault counselor is "aware of a substantial risk" that the situations specified in sub-subparagraphs (b)(1)(D)(i), (b)(1)(D)(ii), and (b)(1)(D)(iii) exist, such as the sexual assault victim is under 13 years of age. The exclusion in the current D.C. Code reporting statute requires that the sexual assault counselor have "actual knowledge" of these situations.[31] The meaning of "actual knowledge" is unclear and is inconsistent with the "knows, or has reasonable cause to believe" requirement for the duty to report in the current D.C. Code duty to report statute.[32] There is no DCCA case law interpreting these terms in the current statute. Resolving these ambiguities, the revised duty to report statute requires that a sexual assault counselor is "aware of a substantial risk" that the situations specified in sub-subparagraphs (b)(1)(D)(i), (b)(1)(D)(ii), and (b)(1)(D)(iii) exist. This language requires that the person have subjective awareness of a substantial risk, as opposed to negligence—that the person merely should have known that there was a substantial risk—and is consistent with the duty to report in subsection (a) of the revised statute. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Ninth, due to the RCC definition of "position of trust with or authority over" in RCC § 22E-701, the scope of the exclusion to the duty to report for sexual assault counselors (subparagraph (b)(1)(D)) may differ as compared to the current D.C. Code reporting statute. The current D.C. Code duty to report statute establishes an exclusion to the duty to report for a sexual assault counselor that is limited when a perpetrator or alleged perpetrator of the predicate crime has a "significant relationship" with the sexual assault victim."[33] "Significant relationship" is defined in D.C. Code § 22-3001[34] as "includ[ing]" the specified individuals as well as "any other person in a position of trust with or authority over" the complainant."[35] There is no DCCA case law interpreting the current definition of "significant relationship." The RCC definition of "position of trust with or authority over" is close-ended, but defines "position of trust with or authority over as "mean[ing]" specified individuals or "a person responsible under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant." The revised definition provides a broad, flexible, objective standard for determining who is in a position of trust with or authority over another person. The RCC definition of "position of trust with or authority over" is discussed in detail in the commentary to RCC § 22E-701. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statutes.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, paragraph (b)(2) states that "No legal privilege, except the privileges set forth in subsection (b) of this section, shall apply to the duty to report in subsection (a) of this section." Paragraph (b)(2) accounts for the language in the current D.C. Code duty to report statute that "[n]o other legally recognized privilege, except the following [applies to the duty to report a sex crime]"[36] and is not intended to change current District law.

Second, the revised reporting statute revises and deletes the separate definitions for "child," "person," and "police" that apply to the current D.C. Code reporting statute and related provisions.[37] Instead of having separate defined terms, the revised definitions are incorporated directly into the revised statute. The revised definitions are intended to be clarificatory and not change current District law.[38]

Third, subsection (b) of revised duty to report statute deletes the provision in the current D.C. Code duty to report statute that states "A confession or communication made under any other circumstances does not fall under this exemption."[39] Nothing in the revised duty to report statute suggests that confessions or communications that do not satisfy the requirements under paragraph (b)(1) would be privileged, and paragraph (b)(2) of the revised statute clearly establishes that no other privileges than those described in subsection (b) apply. Codifying a provision that explicitly states other confessions or communications are not privileged is potentially confusing for other provisions that do not similarly list what is "not" included. Deleting this provision from the current statute is a clarificatory change in law.

Fourth, the revised duty to report statute refers to a violation of the prohibited conduct "as a civil violation." The current D.C. Code duty to report statute refers to an offense as an "infraction"[40] subject to a "civil fine."[41] Referring to a violation of the [38] D.C. Code § 22-3020.51 currently defines "child" as "an individual who has not yet attained the age of 16 years." D.C. Code § 22-3020.51(1). Consistent with other RCC offenses and provisions, the revied statute instead codifies "a person under 16 years of age" as necessary instead of referring to a separate definition. D.C. Code § 22-3020.51 currently defines "person" as "an individual 18 years of age or older." D.C. Code § 22-3020.51(2). Consistent with other RCC offenses and provisions, the revised statute refers to "a person at least 18 years of age" as necessary instead of referring to a separate definition. D.C. Code § 22-3020.51 defines "police" as "the Metropolitan Police Department." RCC § 22-1310 refers to "the Metropolitan Police Department" as necessary.

prohibited conduct as a "civil violation" is consistent with marijuana decriminalization in current D.C. Code § 48-1201[42] and is not intended to change current District law.

Fifth, subparagraph (e)(2) of the revised duty to report statute states that "A violation of subsection (c) of this section shall not constitute a criminal offense or a delinquent act as defined in § 16-2301(7)."[43] The marijuana decriminalization in current D.C. Code § 48-1201[44] has an identical provision and including it in the revised statute is not intended to change current District law.

Sixth, the revised duty to report statute, by use of the phrase "in fact" in subsection (a) specifies that strict liability applies to the requirements of the duty to report a sex crime: 1) the age of the person with the duty to report (at least 18 years); 2) the fact that the person with a duty to report is aware of a substantial risk[45] that a person under 16 years of age is being subjected to, or has been subjected to, a predicate crime; and 3) the required method of reporting known or suspected abuse. The current D.C. Code duty to report statute[46] does not specify any culpable mental states for these requirements. This change improves the clarity of the revised statute.

Seventh, the revised duty to report statute, by use of the phrase "in fact" in paragraph (b)(1) specifies that strict liability applies to the requirements of the exclusions from the duty to report under paragraph (b)(1).[47] The current D.C. Code duty to report statute does not specify any culpable mental states for the exclusions to the duty to report.[48] This change improves the clarity of the revised statute.

Eighth, the revised duty to report statute defines "confidential communication" as having "the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 14-312(a)(1), and is subject to the protections in D.C. Code § 14-312(b)(3)." Section 6 of the Sexual Assault Victims' Rights Amendment Act of 2019 (the Act) added an exclusion for sexual assault counselors to the current D.C. Code duty to report a sex crime statute[49] (subparagraph [47] "Aware of a substantial risk" in subparagraph (b)(1)(D) is not a culpable mental state as defined in RCC § 22E-205.

Code §§ 22-3020.52(a) ("(a) Any person who knows, or has reasonable cause to believe, that a child is a victim of sexual abuse shall immediately report such knowledge or belief to the police. [49] D.C. Code § 22-3020.52(c), (c)(3) ((c) No legally recognized privilege, except for the following, shall apply to this subchapter: (3 "Sexual assault counselors shall be exempt from reporting pursuant to subsection (a) of this section any crime disclosed in a confidential communication unless the sexual assault counselor has actual knowledge that the crime disclosed to the sexual assault counselor involves: (A) A (b)(1)(D)) in the revised statute). Section 6 of the Act did not codify a definition for the term "confidential communication." However, Section 5 of the Act added an identical exclusion to current D.C. Code § 14-312[50] for mandatory reporting and codified a definition of "confidential communication"[51] applicable to that exclusion. The revised duty to report statute incorporates this definition of "confidential communication," as well as the protections for a "confidential communication" that Section 5 of the Act added to current D.C. Code § 14-312.[52] This change improves the clarity of the revised statutes.

Ninth, the revised duty to report statute defines "sexual assault counselor" as having "the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 23-1907(10). Section 6 of the Sexual Assault Victims' Rights Amendment Act of 2019 (the Act) added an exclusion for sexual assault counselors to the current D.C. Code duty to report a sex crime statute[53]

[50] Section 5 of the Act added a new paragraph (b)(5) to current D.C. Code § 14-312:

> (5) Notwithstanding § 4-1321.02, sexual assault counselors shall be exempt from mandatory reporting of any crime disclosed in a confidential communication unless the sexual assault counselor has actual knowledge that the crime disclosed to the sexual assault counselor involves:

>
> (B) A perpetrator or alleged perpetrator with whom the sexual assault victim has a significant relationship, as that term is defined in § 22-3001(10); or
>
> (C) A perpetrator or alleged perpetrator who is more than 4 years older than the sexual assault victim.

D.C. Code § 14-312(b)(5).

[51] D.C. Code § 14-312(a), (a)(1):

> (a) For the purposes of this section, the term:
>
> (1) "Confidential communication" means:
>
> (A) Information exchanged between a sexual assault victim 13 years of age or older and a sexual assault counselor during the course of the sexual assault counselor providing counseling, support, and assistance to the victim; and
>
> (B) Records kept by a community-based organization in the course of providing victim advocacy services pursuant to § 23-1909 for sexual assault victim 13 years of age or older.

[52] D.C. Code § 14-312(b)(3):

> (3) The confidentiality of a confidential communication shall not be waived by the presence of, or disclosure to a:
>
> (A) Sign language or foreign language interpreter; provided, that a sign language or foreign language interpreter shall be subject to the limitations and exceptions set forth in paragraph (1) of this subsection and the same privileges set forth in subsection (c) of this section;
>
> (B) Third party participating in group counseling with the sexual assault victim; or
> (C) Third party with the consent of the victim where reasonably necessary to accomplish the purpose for which the sexual assault counselor is consulted.

[53] D.C. Code § 22-3020.52(c), (c)(3) ((c) No legally recognized privilege, except for the following, shall apply to this subchapter: (3 "Sexual assault counselors shall be exempt from reporting pursuant to subsection (a) of this section any crime disclosed in a confidential communication unless the sexual assault counselor has actual knowledge that the crime disclosed to the sexual assault counselor involves: (A) A victim under the age of 13; (B) A perpetrator or alleged perpetrator with whom the sexual assault victim (subparagraph (b)(1)(D)) in the revised statute). Section 6 of the Act did not codify a definition for the term "sexual assault counselor." However, Section 5 of the Act added an identical exclusion to current D.C. Code § 14-312[54] for mandatory reporting and codified a definition of "sexual assault counselor"[55] applicable to that exclusion. The revised duty to report statute incorporates this definition of "sexual assault counselor." This change improves the clarity of the revised statutes.

Tenth, the exclusion for sexual assault counselors in the revised statute consistently uses the term "sexual assault victim" and adopts the definition of that term in D.C. Code § 23-1907(11). The sexual assault counselor exclusion in the current D.C. Code duty to report statute is limited when the predicate crime involves "(A) A victim under the age of 13; (B) A perpetrator or alleged perpetrator with whom the sexual assault victim has a significant relationship, as that term is defined in § 22-3001(10); or (C) A perpetrator or alleged perpetrator who is more than 4 years older than the sexual assault victim."[56] It is unclear why subparagraph (A) uses the term "victim" instead of "sexual assault victim" as in subparagraphs (B) and (C).

Section 6 of the Sexual Assault Victims' Rights Amendment Act of 2019 (the Act) added this exclusion to current D.C. Code § 22-3020.52 and does not define the term "victim"[57] or "sexual assault victim." However, Section 5 of the Act added an identical exclusion to D.C. Code § 14-312 for mandatory reporting. D.C. Code § 14-312 does not define the term "victim," but does define "sexual assault victim" as "any individual against whom a sexual assault has been committed or is alleged to have been committed, including: (A) Deceased individuals; and (B) Representatives appointed by the court to exercise the rights and receive services on behalf of sexual assault victims who are under 18 years of age, incompetent, incapacitated, or deceased."[58] The exclusion for sexual assault counselors in the RCC duty to report statute consistently uses the term "sexual assault victim" because this definition is consistent with the use of that term in sub-subparagraphs (b)(1)(D)(i) and (b)(1)(D)(ii). The definition of "sexual assault victim" in has a significant relationship, as that term is defined in § 22-3001(10); or (C) A perpetrator or alleged perpetrator who is more than 4 years older than the sexual assault victim.").

[54] Section 5 of the Act added a new paragraph (b)(5) to current D.C. Code § 14-312:

> (5) Notwithstanding § 4-1321.02, sexual assault counselors shall be exempt from mandatory reporting of any crime disclosed in a confidential communication unless the sexual assault counselor has actual knowledge that the crime disclosed to the sexual assault counselor involves:
>
> (A) A victim under the age of 13;
>
> (B) A perpetrator or alleged perpetrator with whom the sexual assault victim has a significant relationship, as that term is defined in § 22-3001(10); or
>
> (C) A perpetrator or alleged perpetrator who is more than 4 years older than the sexual assault victim.

D.C. Code § 14-312(b)(5).

[55] D.C. Code § 14-312(a)(5A): "(a) For the purposes of this section, the term: (5) 'Sexual assault counselor' shall have the same meaning as provided in § 23-1907(10).").

[56] D.C. Code § 22-3020.52(c)(3) (emphasis added).

[57] It seems unlikely that the Act intended to adopt the definition of "victim" in D.C. Code § 22-3001 that would otherwise apply in D.C. Code § 22-3001(11) ("victim" is "a person who is alleged to have been subject to any offense set forth in subchapter II of this chapter."). Section 5 of the Act added an identical exclusion for sexual assault counselors to D.C. Code § 14-312 for mandatory reporting and also uses the undefined term "victim," as opposed to "sexual assault victim."

[58] D.C. Code § 14-312(a)(6).

D.C. Code § 14-312 is identical to the definition of that term in D.C. Code § 23-1907(11)E and the revised statute refers to that definition for consistency with the definition of "sexual assault counselor," also in Title 23 of the current D.C. Code. This change improves the clarity of the revised statute.

RCC § 22E-1310. Admission of Evidence in Sexual Assault and Related Cases.

Explanatory Note. The RCC admission of evidence in sexual assault and related cases statute (revised admission of evidence statute) establishes limitations on the use of evidence pertaining to a complainant's past sexual behavior in criminal cases for sex offenses under RCC Chapter 13. The revised admission of evidence statute replaces four distinct provisions in the current D.C. Code: the statute prohibiting the use of reputation or opinion evidence of a complainant's past sexual behavior,[1] the statute governing admissibility of other evidence of a complainant's past sexual behavior,[2] the prompt reporting statute,[3] and the statute prohibiting privilege between spouses or domestic partners.[4]

Subsection (a) states that notwithstanding any other provision of law, in a criminal case under RCC Chapter 13, reputation or opinion evidence of the past sexual behavior of the complainant is not admissible. Paragraph (e)(2) defines "past sexual behavior" for this statute.

Subsection (b) governs the admissibility of evidence of a complainant's past sexual behavior, other than reputation or opinion evidence, in criminal cases under RCC Chapter 13. Paragraph (1) states the standards for when such evidence is admissible. Paragraph (2) establishes the procedural requirements an actor must follow if the actor plans to offer such evidence. Paragraph (3) and paragraph (4) establish court procedures for determining the admissibility, as well as the use of such evidence.

Subsection (c) states that evidence of delay in reporting an offense under RCC Chapter 13 to a public authority shall not raise any presumption concerning the credibility or veracity of a charge under RCC Chapter 13.

Subsection (d) states that laws attaching a privilege against disclosure of communications between spouses or domestic partners are inapplicable in prosecutions under RCC Chapter 13 in specified situations.

Subsection (e) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC and also provides a definition of "past sexual behavior" applicable to this statute.

Relation to Current District Law. The changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change District law.

First, the revised admission of evidence statute refers to a "complainant" instead of "victim" or "alleged victim." "Victim" is defined for the current admissibility of evidence statutes and related provisions as "a person who is alleged to have been subject to any offense set forth in subchapter II of this chapter [Chapter 30].[5] RCC § 22E-701

[1] D.C. Code § 22-3021.
[2] D.C. Code § 22-3022.
[3] D.C. Code § 22-3023.
[4] D.C. Code § 22-3024.
[5] D.C. Code § 22-3001 defines terms for Chapter 30, Sexual Abuse, of Title 22 of the current D.C. Code. D.C. Code § 22-3001 states that "[f]or the purposes of this chapter . . . 'victim' means a person who is alleged to have been subject to any offense set forth in subchapter II of this chapter." D.C. Code § 22-3001(11). The current admissibility of evidence statutes and related provisions are codified in D.C. Code §§ 22-3021 through 22-3024 and are included in Chapter 30. The definition of "victim" in D.C. Code § 22-3001(11) applies to these statutes.

defines "complainant" as "person who is alleged to have been subjected to a criminal offense." Consistently using the defined term "complainant" instead of "victim" or "alleged victim" improves the clarity and consistency of the revised admission of evidence statute.

Second, the revised admission of evidence statute refers to the "actor" instead of the "person accused of an offense under subchapter II of this chapter,"[6] the "accused"[7] or the "defendant."[8] RCC § 22E-701 defines "actor" as "person accused of a criminal offense." Consistently using the defined term "actor" improves the clarity and consistency of the revised admission of evidence statute.

Third, sub-subparagraph (b)(1)(B)(ii) refers to the "consent" and "effective consent" of the complainant. The current admission of evidence statute refers to the "consent" of the complainant.[9] "Consent" is currently defined, in part, as "words or overt actions indicating a freely given agreement to the sexual act or contact in question."[10] The RCC breaks the current sex offense definition of "consent" into two terms, "consent" and "effective consent." The RCC definition of "consent" in RCC § 22E-701 refers to the bare fact of an agreement between parties obtained by any means when the parties are generally competent, while the RCC definition of "effective consent" in RCC § 22E-701 refers to "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception." The revised statute refers to both "consent" and "effective consent" because either may be relevant, depending on the RCC sex offense statute at issue. The use of these terms in the revised admission of evidence statute is not intended to change the scope of D.C. Code § 22-3022 or the scope of the RCC sex offenses. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Fourth, the revised admission of evidence statute incorporates the RCC definitions of "domestic partner" and "bodily injury" in RCC § 22E-701. The RCC definition of "domestic partner" is the same as it is for the current admission of evidence statute.[11] As is discussed to the commentary for the revised definition of "bodily injury" in RCC § 22E-701, the RCC definition of "bodily injury" is changed from the definition that applies to the current admission of evidence statute.[12] Although the revised 'domestic partner' shall have the same meaning as provided in § 32-701(3)." D.C. Code § 22-3001(4A). The current admissibility of evidence statutes and related provisions are codified in D.C. Code §§ 22-3021 through 22-3024 and are included in Chapter 30. The definition of "domestic partner" in D.C. Code § 22-3001(4A) applies to these statutes and is unchanged in RCC § 22E-701.

[12] D.C. Code § 22-3001 defines terms for Chapter 30, Sexual Abuse, of Title 22 of the current D.C. Code. D.C. Code § 22-3001 states that "[f]or the purposes of this chapter . . . 'bodily injury' means injury involving loss or impairment of the function of a bodily member, organ, or mental faculty, or physical disfigurement, disease, sickness, or injury involving significant pain." definition may substantively change parts of current District law for the sex offenses to which they apply, the use of these terms in the revised admission of evidence statute is not intended to affect the procedures established in current D.C. through 22-3024 and are included in Chapter 30. The definition of "bodily injury" in D.C. Code § 22-3001(2) applies to these statutes.

RCC § 22E-1401. Kidnapping.

Explanatory Note. This subsection establishes the kidnapping offense for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). This offense criminalizes knowingly confining or moving another person with intent: to hold that person for ransom; to hold that person as a hostage or shield; to facilitate commission of any felony or flight thereafter; to inflict bodily injury or commit a sexual assault; to cause any person to believe that the complainant will not be released without suffering death, serious bodily injury, or a sex offense; or to permanently leave a parent who is responsible for the general care and supervision of the complainant, or a court appointed guardian, without custody of the complainant. The kidnapping offense is divided into two penalty grades, based on the actor's intent in moving or confining the complainant. The statute also includes penalty enhancements, which require that the accused commits kidnapping with recklessness as to the fact that the complainant is a protected person; with the purpose of harming the complainant because of the complainant's status as a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or public official; or by knowingly displaying or using a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon. Along with the criminal restraint statute,[1] the revised kidnapping statute replaces the kidnapping[2] statute in the current D.C. Code, and parts of several prostitution related statutes that involve restraining or moving another person.[3] Insofar as they are applicable to current kidnapping offense, the revised kidnapping offense also replaces the protection of District public officials statute[4] and seven penalty enhancements: the enhancement for committing an offense while armed;[5] the enhancement for senior citizens;[6] the enhancement for citizen patrols;[7] the enhancement for minors;[8] the enhancement for taxicab drivers;[9] and the enhancement for transit operators and Metrorail station managers.[10]

Subsection (a) specifies the elements of first degree kidnapping. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that first degree kidnapping requires the actor knowingly and substantially confines or moves another person. The paragraph specifies that a "knowingly" culpable mental state applies, which requires that the actor was practically certain that he or she confines or moves another person. Moving a person requires causing that person to move to another location when that person would not have done so absent the actor's intervention. Moving another person can include either moving a person against his or her will, such as by tying up and carrying away a person, or by causing the person to move by means of persuasion, threat, or deception. Confining a person requires causing that person to remain in a location when that person would not have done so absent the actor's intervention. Confining another person can include either physically trapping a person in a location against his or her will, such as by locking a person in a room, or by causing the person to remain in a location by means of persuasion, threat, or deception.[11]

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies prohibited means of confining or moving a person. Subparagraph (a)(2)(A) requires that the actor confines or moves the complainant by causing bodily injury to the complainant, or by using physical force. The term "bodily injury" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 as "physical pain, physical injury, illness, or impairment of a physical condition." Subparagraph (a)(2)(B) requires that the actor makes an explicit or implicit coercive threat. The term "coercive threat" is defined in RCC § 22E-701, and includes an array of specified threats. The definition of "coercive threat" prohibits "communicat[ing]" specified harms such as accusing someone of a criminal offense, as well as sufficiently serious harms that would cause a reasonable person to comply. The verb "communicates" is intended to be broadly construed, encompassing all speech[12] and other messages,[13] which includes gestures or other conduct,[14] that are received and understood by another person. Subparagraph (a)(2)(C) requires that the actor use deception. The term "deception" is defined in RCC § 22E-701. Per the rule of interpretation under RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" mental state also applies to the elements in subparagraphs (a)(2)(A)-(C).

Subparagraph (a)(2)(D) specifies two additional means of committing first degree kidnapping when the complainant is an incapacitated individual or under the age of 16. This subparagraph applies regardless of whether the complainant agrees to the confinement or movement. Sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(D)(i) requires that the actor was reckless as to the fact that the complainant is an incapacitated individual, and that a person with legal authority over the complainant who is acting consistent with that authority[15] has not given effective consent to the confinement or movement. The term "effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701, which means "consent other [11] For example, a person who invites a guest to his home for dinner has "moved" and "confined" the guest, as the guest would not have gone to and remained at the person's home absent the dinner invitation. However, this would not constitute kidnapping, as the movement and confinement were consensual.

[12] The term "speech" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and means oral or written language, symbols, or gestures.

[13] A person may communicate through non-verbal conduct such as displaying a weapon. See State v. Murphy, 545 N.W.2d 909, 915 (Minn. 1996) ("Many physical acts considered in context communicate a terroristic threat. We may find our examples in the case law, such as drawing a finger across one's throat or discharging a firearm over the telephone; in the movies, such as boiling a rabbit on the stove in the tranquil setting of former paramour's new family home, or placing a severed horse's head in a bed; or as here, depositing dead animals at a residence or planting a fake bomb. Life is replete with such examples, and whatever the source, the principle is the same: physical acts communicate a threat that its originator will act according to its tenor." (Internal quotations omitted.)).

[14] For example, if a person consistently beats people who refuse to comply with his demands, this pattern of conduct may constitute a coercive threat when that person makes similar demands of others. In addition, ongoing infliction of harm may constitute communication, if it communicates that harm will continue in the future.

[15] If the person with legal authority over the complainant provides effective consent, but is not acting consistent with that authority, kidnapping liability may apply. For example, if a person with legal authority over the complainant consents to the complainant being taken and held for ransom, kidnapping liability may still apply notwithstanding the effective consent.

than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception. "Person with legal authority over the complainant" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 which means, in relevant part, "[w]hen the complainant is an incapacitated individual," "a court-appointed guardian to the complainant" or "someone who is acting with the effective consent of such a guardian."[16] The sub-subparagraph specifies that a "reckless" culpable mental state applies to this element, which requires that the accused consciously disregarded a substantial risk that the complainant is incapacitated, and that a person with legal authority has not consented to the confinement or movement.[17] Under this sub-subparagraph, it is immaterial if the complainant consents to the movement or confinement.

Sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(D)(ii) requires that the actor was, in fact, 18 years of age or older, and was reckless as to the fact that the complainant is under 16 years of age and four years younger than the actor, and that a person with legal authority over the complainant has not given effective consent to the confinement or movement. "Person with legal authority over the complainant" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 which means, in relevant part, "[w]hen the complainant is under 18 years of age," "[a] parent, or a person acting in the place of a parent under civil law, who is responsible for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant" or "[s]omeone who is acting with the effective consent of such a parent or such a person."[18] The sub-subparagraph specifies that a "reckless" culpable mental state applies to this element, which requires that the accused consciously disregarded a substantial risk that the complainant is under the age of 16, and that a person with legal authority has not consented to the confinement or movement.[19] Under this sub-subparagraph, it is immaterial if the complainant consents to the movement or confinement.

Paragraph (a)(3) specifies that the accused must confine or move another person "with intent to" accomplish one of the goals listed in subparagraphs (a)(3)(A)-(H). "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor was practically certain that his or her conduct would cause one of the goals listed in subparagraphs (a)(3)(A)-(H). Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that one of the goals actually occurred, just that the defendant believed to a practical certainty that one of the goals would occur.[20]

[17] Whether there was a substantial risk that a person with legal authority would not have consented, and whether the actor's disregard of the risk was a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct is a fact based analysis that may take into account the complainant's age, the nature of and motivation for the confinement or movement, or any other relevant facts.

[19] Whether there was a substantial risk that a person with legal authority would not have consented, and whether the actor's disregard of the risk was a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct is a fact based analysis that may take into account the complainant's age, the nature of and purpose for the confinement or movement, or any other relevant facts.

[20] For example, an actor who confines another with intent to commit a sexual offense against that person may be convicted of kidnapping even if the actor does not actually commit the sexual offense.

Subparagraph (a)(3)(A) specifies that first degree kidnapping includes acting "with intent to" hold the complainant for ransom or reward. Holding a person for ransom or reward requires demanding anything of value in exchange for release of the complainant.

Subparagraph (a)(3)(B) specifies that first degree kidnapping includes acting "with intent to" use the complainant as a shield or hostage. Holding a person as a shield or for hostage requires using the person's body as defense against potential attack, or to demand fulfillment of any condition in exchange for the person's release.

Subparagraph (a)(3)(C) specifies that first degree kidnapping includes acting "with intent to" facilitate the commission of a felony or the flight thereafter. The confinement or movement of the person must aid the commission or flight from the felony.[21] Many offenses, such as robbery or sexual assaults, often involve confining or moving a person with intent to facilitate that offense. Although confinement or movement in the course of another offense may satisfy the elements of kidnapping per subparagraph (a)(3)(C), liability in these cases is limited by subsection (e), discussed below.

Subparagraph (a)(3)(D) specifies that first degree kidnapping includes acting "with intent to" inflict death or serious bodily injury. "Serious bodily injury" is a defined term under RCC § 22E-701 and means a bodily injury that involves: a risk of death; protracted and obvious disfigurement; protracted loss or impairment of the function of a bodily member or organ; or protracted loss of consciousness.

Subparagraph (a)(3)(E) specifies that first degree kidnapping includes acting "with intent to" commit a sexual offense, as defined under Chapter 13 of Title 22E, against the complainant.[22]

Subparagraph (a)(3)(F) specifies that first degree kidnapping includes acting "with intent to" cause any person to believe that the complainant will not be released without suffering death, serious bodily injury[23] or a sex offense as defined in Chapter 13 of Title 22E. This element may be satisfied if any person believes the complainant will not be released at all, or will only be released after having suffered death, serious [21] For example, a bank robber who seizes and drives off with a security guard to prevent the guard from calling for help may be convicted of kidnapping.

[22] There is some overlap between subsection (b)(4)(C) and subsection (b)(4)(E). For example, a defendant who interferes with another person's freedom of movement in order to commit a felony sexual offense could be prosecuted for kidnapping under both subsections. However, subsection (b)(4)(E) is both broader and narrower than subsection (b)(4)(C). It is broader in that intent to facilitate misdemeanor assault or sexual assaults would not suffice under (a)(3)(C). It is narrower however in that it requires intent to commit a sexual offense, but other means of facilitating misdemeanor assaults or sexual assaults would not be covered.
