[23] The seeming discrepancy between subsection (a)(3)(C) which requires intent to cause bodily injury and subsection (a)(3)(D) which requires intent to cause a person to believe the complainant will not be released without having suffered significant bodily injury is due to the different interests addressed in each subsection. Subsection (a)(3)(C) criminalizes cases in which the defendant had intent to inflict actual injury, whereas subsection (a)(3)(D) criminalizes cases in which the defendant merely had intent to put another person in fear, regardless of whether the defendant actually intended to inflict any injury on the complainant. Since subsection (a)(3)(D) only requires intent to cause another to be in fear, a more stringent requirement of intent to cause a person to believe the complainant will not be released without having suffered significant bodily injury is appropriate.

physical injury, or being subjected to a sex offense. This element does not require that the actor actually intends to inflict death, serious bodily injury or to commit a sex offense.

Subparagraph (a)(3)(G) specifies that first degree kidnapping includes acting "with intent to" permanently leave a person with legal authority over the complainant without of custody of the complainant.[24] The term "person with legal authority over the complainant" is defined in RCC § 22E-701. Intent to temporarily interfere with lawful custody is insufficient.

Subparagraph (a)(3)(H) specifies that first degree kidnapping includes acing "with intent to" confine or move the complainant for 72 hours or more. This element may be satisfied if the actor actually confines or moves the complainant for 72 hours or more, or is practically certain that he or she will confine or move the complainant for 72 hours or more.

Subsection (b) defines the elements of second degree kidnapping. The elements of second degree kidnapping specified in paragraphs (b)(1) and (b)(2) are identical to the elements of first degree kidnapping that are specified in paragraphs (a)(1) and (a)(2).

Paragraph (b)(3) specifies that the accused must confine or move another person "with intent to" accomplish one of the goals listed in subparagraphs (b)(3)(A) or (b)(3)(B). "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor was practically certain that his or her conduct would cause one of the goals listed in subparagraphs (b)(3)(A) or (b)(3)(B). Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that one of the goals actually occurred, just that the defendant believed to a practical certainty that one of the goals would occur.[25]

Subparagraph (b)(3)(A) specifies that second degree kidnapping includes acting "with intent to" inflict bodily injury. "Bodily injury" is a defined term under RCC § 22E-701, and means "physical pain, physical injury, illness, or impairment of physical condition."

Subparagraph (b)(3)(B) specifies that second degree kidnapping includes acting "with intent to" cause any person to believe that the complainant will not be released without suffering bodily injury.[26] This element may be satisfied if any person believes

[24] The seeming discrepancy between subsection (a)(3)(C) which requires intent to cause bodily injury and subsection (a)(3)(D) which requires intent to cause a person to believe the complainant will not be released without having suffered significant bodily injury is due to the different interests addressed in each subsection. Subsection (a)(3)(C) criminalizes cases in which the defendant had intent to inflict actual injury, whereas subsection (a)(3)(D) criminalizes cases in which the defendant merely had intent to put another person in fear, regardless of whether the defendant actually intended to inflict any injury on the complainant. Since subsection (a)(3)(D) only requires intent to cause another to be in fear, a more stringent requirement of intent to cause a person to believe the complainant will not be released without having suffered significant bodily injury is appropriate.

[25] For example, an actor who confines another with intent to commit a sexual offense against that person may be convicted of kidnapping even if the actor does not actually commit the sexual offense.

[26] The seeming discrepancy between subsection (a)(3)(C) which requires intent to cause bodily injury and subsection (a)(3)(D) which requires intent to cause a person to believe the complainant will not be released without having suffered significant bodily injury is due to the different interests addressed in each subsection. the complainant will not be released at all, or will only be released after having suffered physical injury. This element does not require that the actor actually intends to inflict bodily injury.

Subsection (c) provides a defense to prosecution for under paragraphs (a)(3)(G) and (a)(3)(H) when complainant is under the age of 18, and the actor is either: a "close relative" of the complainant, who acts with intent[27] to assume full responsibility for the care and supervision of the complainant; or a person who reasonably[28] believes he or she is acting at the direction of a close relative who acts with the intent that the close relative will assume full responsibility for the care and supervision of the complainant. In addition, subparagraphs (c)(1)(B) and (c)(2)(B) require that the actor did not cause bodily injury or threaten to cause bodily injury to the complainant, or cause or threaten to cause the complainant to engage in a sexual act or sexual contact. The term "close relative" is defined in RCC §22E-701 to mean the complainant's parents, grandparents, siblings, children, cousins, aunts, or uncles. More distant relatives are not included within the definition, and cannot rely on this exception to liability.

Subsection (d) specifies relevant penalties for first and second degree kidnapping. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.] Paragraph (d)(3) specifies three penalty enhancements. If the government proves at least one of the penalty enhancements listed under paragraph (d)(3), the penalty classification for first and second degree kidnapping may be increased in severity by one penalty class. These penalty enhancements may apply in addition to any penalty enhancements authorized by RCC Chapter 6. [29] injury, whereas subsection (a)(3)(D) criminalizes cases in which the defendant merely had intent to put another person in fear, regardless of whether the defendant actually intended to inflict any injury on the complainant. Since subsection (a)(3)(D) only requires intent to cause another to be in fear, a more stringent requirement of intent to cause a person to believe the complainant will not be released without having suffered significant bodily injury is appropriate.

[27] "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor was practically certain he or she would assume full responsibility for the care and supervision of the complainant. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that the actor assumed full responsibility for the care and supervision of the complainant, only that he or she believed to a practical certainty that he or she would do so.

Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase.

[28] Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[28] S*ee, e.g.,* Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

[29] If general penalty enhancements under RCC §22E-606 or §22E-607 apply to this offense, the penalty for RCC §22E-606 and §22E-607 shall be based on the classification of the relevant unenhanced gradation of this offense.

Subparagraph (d)(3)(A) requires that the actor was reckless as to the complainant being a protected person. The term "protected person" is defined in RCC § 22E-701. Under subparagraph (d)(3)(A), the actor must have been reckless as to the complainant being a protected person, a culpable mental state defined in RCC § 22E-206, meaning the accused must consciously disregard a substantial risk that the complainant is a "protected person," and that disregard of that risk is a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct.

Subparagraph (d)(3)(B) requires that the accused commits kidnapping by recklessly causing the confinement or movement by displaying or using a dangerous weapon or imitation weapon. The phrase "by displaying or using a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon" should be broadly construed to include kidnappings in which the accused only momentarily displays such a weapon, or slightly touches the complainant with such a weapon.[30] The term "use" is intended to include making physical contact with the weapon, and conduct other than oral or written language, symbols, or gestures, that indicates the presence of a weapon.[31] The terms "dangerous weapon" or "imitation weapon," are defined in RCC § 22E-701. Subparagraph (d)(3)(C) specifies that a "recklessly" mental state applies to this enhancement, which requires that the actor consciously disregarded that the display or use of the weapon or imitation weapon caused the confinement or movement. However, the subparagraph also uses the term "in fact,"[32] to specify that no culpable mental state required as to whether the implement used or displayed was a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon.

Subparagraph (d)(3)(C) requires that the actor has the purpose of harming the complainant because of the complainant's status as a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or public official. This requires that the accused acted with "purpose," a term defined at RCC § 22E-206, which means that the actor must consciously desire to harm that person because of his or her status as a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or District official.[33] Harm may include, but does not require bodily injury. Harm should be construed more broadly to include causing an array of adverse outcomes.[34] "Law enforcement officer," "public safety employee," and "public official" are all defined terms in RCC § 22E-701. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with the purpose" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. Here, it [30] For example, assuming the other elements of the offense are proven, rearranging one's coat to provide a momentary glimpse of part of a knife, or holding a sharp object to someone's back without actually causing injury, may be sufficient for liability under paragraph (a)(3).

[31] For further detail on what conduct constitutes "using" a dangerous weapon, see Commentary to criminal threats, RCC § 22E-1204.

[32] RCC § 22E-207.

[33] While the RCC § 22E-701 definitions of "law enforcement officer" and "public safety employee" refer to some persons only when on-duty (e.g., a campus officer), this provision on committing the offense with the purpose of harming the complainant because of their status as a law enforcement officer or public safety employee applies to committing the offense against an off-duty person based on their on-duty role. For example, a defendant who kidnaps an off-duty police officer in retaliation for the officer arresting the defendant's friend would constitute committing kidnapping with the purpose of harming the complainant due to his status as a law enforcement officer.

[34] For example, confining or moving a person without consent may constitute harm, even if no bodily injury occurs, because it is an interference with the person's freedom of movement.

is not necessary to prove that the complainant who was harmed was a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or District official, only that the actor consciously desired to harm a person of such a status.

Subsection (e) provides that convictions for first or second degree kidnapping and a separate offense merge if the offenses arose from the same act or course of conduct and the confinement or movement was incidental to the commission of the other offense. Confinement or movement is incidental to another offense when the actor's primary purpose in confining or moving the other person was to commit the other offense, provided that the movement or confinement did not exceed what is normally associated with the other offense.[35] The subsection specifies that the court will follow the procedures in RCC § 22E-214 (b) and (c) to effect the merger.

Subsection (f) cross-references definitions found elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised kidnapping statute changes current District law in eight main ways.

First, the revised kidnapping offense requires that the actor confines or moves another person with intent to hold the person for ransom, inflict bodily injury, or commit other particularly harmful or dangerous acts. The current kidnapping statute requires that the defendant hold a person "for ransom, reward, or otherwise[.]"[36] The D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) has interpreted the "or otherwise" language broadly and held that "[t]he motive behind the kidnapping is unimportant, so long as the act was done with the expectation of benefit to the transgressor."[37] By contrast, the RCC divides the current kidnapping offense into two primary offenses, with criminal constraint providing liability for confining or moving a person, while the revised kidnapping requires an added wrongful intent that makes the confinement or movement especially dangerous, harmful, or terrifying. Under the revised kidnapping statute, confining or moving another with intent to enact revenge or to seek companionship, or other purpose would not constitute

---

[35] This provision is intended to re-instate D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) case law prior to Parker v. United States, 692 A.2d 913 (D.C. 1997). Prior to Parker, District courts employed a fact-based inquiry to determine whether convictions for kidnapping and other offenses that arise from a single act or course of conduct should merge. In Parker, the DCCA held that instead of a fact-based inquiry, courts should only use a Blockburger elements test to determine if convictions for kidnapping and separate offenses should merge. The restraint need not be necessarily associated with commission of the other offense. For example, a person who commits robbery by forcing a person to walk into an adjacent room to locate valuables would not be guilty of kidnapping because the movement was incidental to the robbery. However, a person who confines another for a full day in order to facilitate commission of a robbery may still be convicted of kidnapping because the duration of the confinement far exceeded what would normally be associated with a robbery. See e.g., Sinclair v. United States, 388 A.2d 1201 (D.C. 1978) (kidnapping was not incidental to robbery when the defendant held a person at gunpoint in a car and drove 25 blocks away); Robinson v. United States, 388 A.2d 1210, 1211–12 (D.C. 1978) (holding that when defendant dragged a person 63 paces over the course of a few moments in order to commit a sexual assault, the "seizure and asportation was clearly incidental to the crime of assault with intent to rape" and that the conduct should not constitute two separate crimes.).

[37] Walker v. United States, 617 A.2d 525, 527 (D.C. 1992) (quoting United States v. Wolford, 144 U.S.App.D.C. 1, 5-6, 444 F.2d 876, 880-81 (1971) (internal quotations omitted). For example, restraining another person in order to enact revenge, or out of a desire for companionship could sustain a kidnapping conviction under current law. See Walker, 617 A.2d at 527.

kidnapping, unless the actor had intent to achieve one of the goals listed in subparagraphs (a)(3)(A)-(H) or (b)(3)(A)-(B).[38] Codifying a new kidnapping offense based on the actor's intent improves the proportionality of the RCC by separately labeling and penalizing more harmful and dangerous forms confinement or movement.[39]

Second, the RCC kidnapping offense is divided into two penalty gradations based on the actor's intent in confining or moving the complainant. The current kidnapping statute has only one penalty grade. By contrast, the revised statute differentiates between intents which present a lower degree of harm or risk, from those that create a greater degree of harm or risk of more serious injury. This change improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

Third, the RCC kidnapping offense provides a defense under subsection (c) if the actor is a "close relative" of a complainant and had intent to assume full responsibility for the care and supervision of the complainant, or if the actor reasonably believed he or she was acting at the direction of a close relative, with intent that the close relative would assume full responsibility for care and supervision of the complainant. In addition, the defense requires that the actor did not cause or threaten to cause bodily injury to the complainant, or cause or threaten to cause the complainant to engage in a sexual act or sexual contact. The current kidnapping statute provides an exception to liability if the victim is a minor, and the defendant is the victim's parent. However, the current statute does not specify any further conditions for the exception, and it is unclear whether the current statute's parental exception applies in all kidnapping cases or is inapplicable if the parent uses force or threats to restrain the child. Case law has not resolved this ambiguity.[40] By contrast, the revised kidnapping statute's defense applies to close relatives[41] not just parents of the complainant. However, the defense requires that the actor had intent to assume full responsibility for the care and supervision of the complainant and that the actor did not cause bodily injury or threaten to cause bodily injury. The defense does not apply if the actor confined or moved another person without that person's consent, by causing or threatening to cause bodily injury.[42] The defense also does not apply if the actor had any intent other than to assume full responsibility for [38] For example, a person who confines another with intent to enact revenge may have intent to cause bodily injury, or intent to cause another person to believe that the complainant will not be released without suffering significant bodily injury.

[39] For example, a person who in the heat of the moment blocks a door to prevent his significant other to leave in the midst of an argument may be guilty of kidnapping under current law, and subject to the same penalty as a person who, after substantial planning, forcibly seizes a person, transports them to another location, and holds them for ransom on fear of death. Under the RCC, these two types of conduct would be penalized differently, as a criminal restraint and kidnapping.

[40] In Byrd v. United States, 705 A.2d 629, 633 (D.C. 1997), the DCCA held that a person acting in loco parentis may not rely on the parental exception if "the defendant has engaged in separate felonious conduct during the kidnapping which exposes the child to a serious risk of death or bodily injury." However, the DCCA explicitly declined to decide "whether a biological parent may similarly forfeit the protection of the exception." Id. at 634 n. 7.

[41] As defined in RCC § 22E-701, which includes a parent, grandparent, sibling, child cousin, aunt, or uncle.

[42] For example, a non-custodial parent that uses force to restrain a child with intent to assume custody of that child may still be convicted of kidnapping under the revised statute.

the care and supervision of the complainant.[43] The defense under subsection (c) recognizes the diminished culpability and risk to the complainant in cases where the actor is related to the complainant, and no force or threats were used.[44] However, the District's parental kidnapping statute[45] may still provide liability in such conduct by a relative. Changing the parental defense to include a broader array of relatives but limiting the defense to cases in which the actor did not cause bodily injury or threaten to cause bodily injury, improves the proportionality of the revised offenses.

Fourth, the RCC kidnapping states that if the confinement or movement was incidental to the commission of any other offense, convictions for kidnapping and the other offense shall merge.[46] Under current DCCA case law a defendant may be convicted of both kidnapping and another offense that arise from the same act or course of conduct, as long as kidnapping and the other offense each include "at least one element which the other one does not."[47] By contrast, the RCC kidnapping statute reinstates the fact-based test applied by the DCCA prior to Parker v. United States,[48] which required courts to make a determination in each case as to whether the kidnapping was merely incidental to another offense.[49] Where, as is common,[50] the confinement or movement is incidental to another offense,[51] the authorized punishment for the other offense is sufficient. The RCC kidnapping sentencing provision improves the proportionality of the offense.

Fifth, the RCC kidnapping statute incorporates multiple penalty enhancements based on the status of the complainant, and the use of a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon, into new penalty enhancements, and caps the effect of these enhancements. The D.C. Code currently provides multiple penalty enhancements for the [43] For example, a parent who holds his own child for ransom may still be convicted of kidnapping under the revised statute.

[44] See, Byrd, 705 A.2d at 633 (noting that the current kidnapping statute was with the intent that "a parent who kidnapped a child, however misguidedly, out of affection and disagreement over custody should not be prosecuted for that act alone").

[45] D.C. Code § 16-1022.

[46] By barring sentences for kidnapping, the revised statute allows for the possibility that convictions for kidnapping and the other offense may be entered for purposes of appeal. If the conviction for the other offense is reversed on appeal, the appellate court may order a lower court to sentence the defendant for the surviving kidnapping conviction.

[47] Malloy v. United States, 797 A.2d 687, 691 (D.C. 2002)

[48] 692 A.2d 913 (D.C. 1997). In Parker, the DCCA applied a new test for how to determine, in the absence of legislative intent, whether charged offenses should merge. The Parker ruling applied the new "elements" test the DCCA first adopted in Byrd v. United States, 598 A.2d 386 (D.C.1991) (en banc) because there was no legislative intent discernible as to whether kidnapping should merge with murder.

[49] E.g., West v. United States, 599 A.2d 788, 793 (D.C. 1991); Vines v. United States, 540 A.2d 1107, 1109 (D.C. 1988); Robinson v. United States, 388 A.2d 1210, 1211–12 (D.C. 1978).

[50] Many offenses against persons commonly involve some type of significant, non-consensual confinement or movement. For example, victims of robberies, assaults, sexual assaults, and homicides are frequently subjected to threats or physical restraint that prevent them from fleeing. Under current District law, such offenses against persons typically would provide the basis for a kidnapping charge. In practice, however, kidnapping charges are not typically brought in cases with such offenses against persons.

commission of a kidnapping offense,[52] without specifying whether or how these enhancements may be combined or "stacked" when multiple enhancements are applicable to a single charge. DCCA case law has not addressed whether most combinations of these penalty enhancements can be combined, but the combination of at least some of these enhancements has been upheld.[53] By contrast, under the revised kidnapping statute, the penalty for first or second degree kidnapping cannot be enhanced more than once based on any of the listed enhancements.[54] While multiple penalty enhancements may be charged, proof of just one is sufficient to increase the penalty class severity, and proof of others does not change the maximum statutory penalty for the crime.[55] Capping the effect of penalty enhancements improves the proportionality of the District law by preventing aggravated forms of the offense from being penalized the same as much more serious offenses.[56]

Sixth, the RCC kidnapping statute provides new, heightened penalties based on recklessness as to the status of the complainant as a protected person, which includes on-duty law enforcement officers, on-duty public safety employee, on-duty transportation workers. The current kidnapping statute has no gradations and does not reference the status of the complainant, but multiple statutes in the current D.C. Code authorize enhanced penalties for kidnapping committed against certain groups of persons.[57] Currently, the D.C. Code does not enhance crimes based on the status of the complainant as an on-duty law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or on-duty transportation workers. By contrast, through its use of the term "protected person," the RCC kidnapping statute authorizes enhanced penalties if the accused is reckless as to the fact the complainant is an on-duty law enforcement officer, on duty public safety employee, or on-duty transportation worker. Such penalties are consistent with enhancements for assault-type,[58] robbery[59], and homicide offenses,[60] and reflect some unique vulnerabilities

[52] See, e.g., D.C. Code § 22-3602 (providing an enhanced penalty for kidnapping committed against "a member of a citizen patrol ("member") while that member is participating in a citizen patrol, or because of the member's participation in a citizen patrol"); D.C. Code § 22-851 (District official or employee while in the course of their duties or on account of those duties, or actions against a family member of a District official or employee); D.C. Code § 22-4502 (enhanced penalty for committing kidnapping "while armed" or with a dangerous weapon "readily available").

[53] Convictions have been upheld applying multiple enhancements. C.f. Forte v. United States, 856 A.2d 567 (D.C. 2004) (holding that "double enhancement" under senior citizen penalty enhancement statute and repeat offender statute was proper).

[54] For instance, the status of the complainant and the defendant's use of a weapon.

[55] The existence of more than one aggravating factors may be a significant factor in sentencing, however.

[56] For example, under current law the unarmed kidnapping of a 65 year old taxi cab driver is subject to two penalty enhancements under D.C. Code § 22-3601, and § 22-3751, each of which permits a sentence 1 ½ times the maximum sentence otherwise allowed. Kidnapping ordinarily carries a maximum sentence of 30 years. If these enhancements are both applied, kidnapping a 65 year old taxi driver would be subject to a maximum 60 year sentence, the same as first degree murder. D.C. Code § 22-2104.

[57] D.C. Code § 22-851 (District official or employee while in the course of their duties or on account of those duties, or actions against a family member of a District official or employee); D.C. Code § 22-3611 (minors); D.C. Code § 22-3601 (persons over 65 years of age); D.C. Code §§ 22-3751; 22-3752 (taxicab drivers); and D.C. Code §§ 22-3751.01; 22-3752 (transit operators and Metrorail station managers); and D.C. Code § 22-3602 (members of a citizen patrol).

of such complainants.[61] Requiring a reckless culpable mental state is also consistent with many current statutes that authorize enhanced penalties based on the complainant's status.[62] Including recklessness as to the complainant being an on-duty law enforcement officer, public safety employee, a vulnerable adult, or on-duty transportation worker as a penalty enhancement to kidnapping removes a possible gap in current law, and improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised code.

Seventh, the revised kidnapping statute provides new, heightened penalties based on the offense being committed for the purpose of harming the complainant because of his or her status as a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or District official. The current kidnapping statute has no gradations and does not reference a purpose of harming the complainant because of the status of the complainant, although multiple statutes in the current D.C. Code authorize enhanced penalties for kidnapping committed against certain groups of persons.[63] By contrast, the revised kidnapping statute includes a penalty enhancement for committing the offense with the purpose of harming another person due to that person's status as a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or District official. In practice, this change only affects law enforcement officers and public safety employees who are not District employees, as kidnapping of any District employee is subject to more severe statutory penalties under current District law.[64] Authorizing heightened penalties for committing kidnapping with the purpose of harming the complainant because of the complainant's status as a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or District official removes a possible gap in current law, and improves the consistency and proportionality of penalties.

Eighth, the revised kidnapping statute incorporates penalty enhancements for "displaying or using" a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon. Current D.C. Code § 22-4502 provides enhanced penalties for committing kidnapping "while armed" or "having readily available" a dangerous weapon. District case law on D.C. Code § 22-4502 holds that the penalty enhancements are authorized if the accused either had "actual [61] For example, on-duty law enforcement and public safety officers performing investigative duties and private vehicle-for-hire services drivers may often enter situations where they are isolated with persons in enclosed places and more susceptible to unwanted interference with their personal movements; vulnerable adults may be targeted due to their limited ability to evade interference with their freedom of movement.

[62] Under current District law it is a defense to the senior citizen complainant enhancement that "the accused knew or reasonably believed the complainant was not 65 years old or older at the time of the offense, or could not have known or determined the age of the complainant because of the manner in which the offense was committed." D.C. Code § 22-3601(c). Similarly, under the current minor complainant enhancement, it is a defense that "the accused reasonably believed that the complainant was not a minor [person less than 18 years old] at the time of the offense." D.C. Code § 22-3611(b). The current assault of a law enforcement officer offense requires that the defendant was physical possession of [a weapon]";[65] or if the weapon was merely in "close proximity or easily accessible during the commission of the underlying [offense],"[66] provided that the accused also constructively possessed the weapon.[67] There is no requirement under D.C. Code § 22-4502 that the accused actually used the weapon to commit kidnapping.[68] By contrast, the penalty enhancement under the revised kidnapping statute requires that the actor actually displayed or used[69] a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon. Merely possessing or having a weapon or imitation weapon readily available is insufficient to satisfy the penalty enhancement under subparagraph (d)(3)(B), although such conduct is criminalized elsewhere in current law and the RCC as a separate offense with a lower penalty.[70] Including use of a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon within the kidnapping statute as penalty enhancement improves the proportionality of punishment by matching more severe penalties to kidnappings in which the actor actually uses or displays a weapon.

Beyond these eight changes to current District law, seven other aspect of the revised kidnapping statute may constitute a substantive change of law.

First, the RCC kidnapping statute specifies that the actor must have "knowingly" confined or moved another person. The current kidnapping statute references as one means of committing the offense that the actor had "intent to hold or detain,"[71] but it is not clear whether this culpable mental state applies to other elements of the offense, and the phrase "with the intent" is not defined in the statute. In one case the DCCA stated that the current kidnapping statute requires that the actor had "specific intent to detain the complainant"[72] although it is unclear whether the DCCA in that case was referring only to the defendant's motive rather than their awareness of the objective elements of the [69] "Using" a weapon includes physically touching another person with the weapon. offense. Current District practice appears to treat the kidnapping as a "general intent" offense.[73] The revised kidnapping statute specifies that a "knowingly" culpable mental state applies to the element of confining or moving the complainant. Applying a knowledge requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[74] Specifying a culpable mental state for the offense improves the clarity of the RCC and is consistent with requirements for most other offenses.

Second, the RCC kidnapping offense requires that the complainant did not effectively consent to the interference, other than in cases involving complainants under the age of 16, or who are incapacitated. The current kidnapping statute is silent as to whether and by what means the actor must confine or move the complainant. The current statute broadly states that a person commits kidnapping by "seizing, confining, inveigling, enticing, decoying, kidnapping, abducting, concealing, or carrying away any individual",[75] but none of these terms are statutorily defined. The DCCA has generally recognized that kidnapping requires an "involuntary seizure,"[76] which includes forcible seizures[77], or restraining a person by threat of force.[78] Current District practice also recognizes that a person can commit kidnapping by "seiz[ing], confin[ing], abduct[ing], or carr[ying] away [the complainant] against his/her will."[79] The revised kidnapping statute specifies that the confinement or movement must be without effective consent of the complainant, except in cases where the complainant is under the age of 16 or incapacitated. The revised language improves the clarity and proportionality of the offense.

Third, the RCC kidnapping statute requires that the actor must "substantially" confine or move the complainant. The current kidnapping statute does not explicitly include any substantiality element, and the DCCA has never discussed in a published opinion whether momentary or trivial confinement or movement suffices under the current kidnapping statute.[80] By contrast, the revised kidnapping statute requires that the actor must "substantially" confine or move the complainant. This excludes momentary or trivial confinement or movement. The precise effect on current law is somewhat unclear, as there is no case law on point. Requiring that the actor "substantially" confine or move the complainant improves the proportionality of the RCC by excluding cases that only involve trivial or momentary interference.[81]

Fourth, when the complainant is under the age of 16[82] or is incapacitated, the RCC kidnapping statute requires that the actor be reckless as to the fact that a person with legal authority over the complainant has not effectively consented to the confinement or movement. The current kidnapping statute does not specify when confining or moving a person who is under the age of 16 or is incapacitated constitutes kidnapping, and there is no relevant DCCA case law on point.[83] It is unclear under current law whether, and under what circumstances, a person would be guilty of kidnapping for confining or moving a person without effective consent of a person with legal authority over the complainant. The revised statute resolves this ambiguity by requiring that the actor at least be reckless as to whether a person with legal authority over the complainant has not effectively consented to the confinement or movement. This change improves the clarity, completeness, and perhaps the proportionality, of the revised statute.

Fifth, the RCC kidnapping statute requires that the actor confines or moves another person. The current kidnapping statute criminalizes "seizing, confining, inveigling, enticing, decoying, kidnapping, abducting, concealing, or carrying away any individual by any means whatsoever[.]"[84] With the exception of "enticing," discussed below, replacing these verbs with "confines" and "moves" does not appear to change current District law. The verbs "seizing," "confining," "kidnapping," "abducting," "concealing," and "carrying away" all constitute confining or moving another person. However, it is possible that "inveigling" and "decoying" a person includes conduct not [80] DCCA case law discussing whether kidnapping should merge with other offenses has suggested that relatively brief interference with another person's freedom of movement can constitute kidnapping. E.g., Sinclair v. United States, 388 A.2d 101, 1204 (D.C. 1978) (noting that "victims of [rape or robbery] are detained against their will while the criminal is accomplishing his objective"). This case law implies that even the brief detention associated with an ordinary street robbery is sufficient for kidnapping. However, the DCCA has never specifically decided whether on its own, such a brief detention would satisfy the elements of kidnapping.

[81] If a defendant intended to interfere with a person's freedom of movement to a substantial degree but failed to do so and was only able to interfere in an insubstantial manner, attempt liability may still be applicable depending on the facts of the case.

[82] This form of kidnapping also requires that the actor is 18 years of age or older, and at least four years older than the complainant.

[83] But see, Blackledge v. United States, 871 A.2d 1193, 1197 (D.C. 2005) (holding that convictions for kidnapping and enticing a minor do not merge, noting that "the kidnapping statute requires . . . that the complainant was seized involuntarily through the defendant's use of mental or physical coercion; however, consent is never a valid defense to child enticement, and therefore the government is not required to show that the child was taken involuntarily."). This language suggests that kidnapping requires, even in the case of minors, that the defendant seize another person "involuntarily", and that kidnapping does not criminalize moving or confining a minor by means of enticement.

covered by confining and moving another.[85] The terms "inveigling" and "decoying" are not defined in the current statute, and there is no DCCA case law defining these terms, and it is unclear how omitting these terms changes the scope of the offense. The RCC kidnapping statute resolves this ambiguity by requiring that the actor confine or move another person, without that person's effective consent.[86] These limitations improve the clarity and proportionality of the offense, by more clearly defining the scope of the offense, and only including conduct dangerous enough to warrant the penalties under the kidnapping statute.[87]

Sixth, the RCC's kidnapping statute omits the word "entices." The current kidnapping statute states that a person commits kidnapping by "enticing . . . any individual . . . with intent to hold or detain such individual for ransom, reward, or otherwise[.]"[88] Under a plain language reading, the current kidnapping statute provides liability for merely enticing a person with intent to hold or detain that person for some personal benefit, even if the person was never actually held. However, the DCCA has never discussed in a published opinion whether such conduct would actually constitute kidnapping, and such an interpretation would run counter to case law requiring the kidnapping to be "involuntary" in nature.[89] The RCC's kidnapping statute resolves this ambiguity by providing that kidnapping requires actually confining or moving a person without that person's effective consent. A person cannot commit kidnapping merely by offering some reward, without actually confining or moving another person.[90] These limitations improve the clarity and proportionality of the offense, by more clearly defining the scope of the offense, and only including conduct dangerous enough to warrant the penalties under the kidnapping statute.[91]

Seventh, the RCC kidnapping statute does not separately criminalize a conspiracy to commit kidnapping. The District's current kidnapping statute specifically provides that any person who conspires to commit kidnapping "shall be deemed to have violated the provisions of this section."[92] The current kidnapping statute's reference to a [86] Or without the effective consent of a person with legal authority over the complainant if the complainant is an incapacitated individual, or under the age of 16.

[87] Since the RCC kidnapping statute requires intent to achieve one of the goals under paragraph (b)(3), it is unlikely, though possible, that a defendant could satisfy all the elements of kidnapping without using physical force, coercive threats, or deception. For example, it is unlikely a person would hold another person hostage or for ransom without using physical force, coercive threats, or deception.

[89] C.f. Walker, 617 A.2d at 527 (noting that "involuntary seizure is the very essence of the crime of kidnapping").

[90] However, a person can commit kidnapping by initially enticing another person with offer of some benefit as a means of luring the other person to move to or remain in a particular location as long as the actor confines or moves a person without effective consent.

[91] Since the RCC kidnapping statute requires intent to achieve one of the goals under subsection (b)(3), it is unlikely, though possible, that a defendant could satisfy all the elements of kidnapping without using force, threat of force, or deception. For example, it is unlikely a person would hold another person hostage or for ransom without using force, threat of force, or deception.

[92] D.C. Code § 22-2001. "If 2 or more individuals enter into any agreement or conspiracy to do any act or acts which would constitute a violation of the provisions of this section, and 1 or more of such individuals do any act to effect the object of such agreement or conspiracy, each such individual shall be deemed to conspiracy, however, does not specify what culpable mental states, if any, apply to the conspiracy. By contrast, under the RCC kidnapping statute, conspiracy to commit kidnapping is subject to the RCC's general conspiracy statute. The RCC's general conspiracy statute details the culpable mental state and other requirements for proof of a conspiracy in a manner broadly applicable to all offenses. To the extent that the RCC's general conspiracy provision differs from the law on conspiracy as applied to the current kidnapping statute, relying on the RCC's general conspiracy provision may constitute a change in current law.[93] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised offense.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change District law.

The RCC kidnapping statute does not contain special provisions regarding jurisdiction. The current kidnapping statute states that "[t]his section shall be held to have been violated if the seizing, confining, inveigling, enticing, decoying, kidnapping, abducting, concealing, carrying away, holding, or detaining occurs in the District of Columbia."[94] This language apparently is intended to ensure that District courts have jurisdiction over kidnappings that do not occur entirely within the District of Columbia. However, it is unclear whether this language changes the scope of jurisdiction that a District court would otherwise have over kidnapping cases. The DCCA has generally held that District courts have jurisdiction over alleged offenses if "one of several constituent elements to the complete offense" occurs within the District, "even though the remaining elements occurred outside of the District."[95] Consequently, although the DCCA has not applied this rule to kidnapping cases, it seems that District courts would have jurisdiction over any case in which a person was seized or held within the District, regardless of whether the person was initially seized outside of the District, or if the person were seized within the District and transported out of the District.[96] The RCC kidnapping statute eliminates jurisdiction language specific to kidnapping. In addition to general case law providing authority for offenses if "one of several constituent elements to the complete offense" occurs within the District,"[97] RCC § 22E-303 specifically provides jurisdiction for conspiracies formed within the District when the object of the conspiracy is engage in conduct outside of the District if the conduct would constitute a crime under D.C. Code.[98] District courts would therefore have jurisdiction over conspiracies to commit kidnapping outside of the District. Omitting special jurisdiction language from the kidnapping statute improves the law's clarity by omitting unnecessary language and making the offense more consistent with other offenses.

RCC § 22E-1402. Criminal Restraint.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the criminal restraint offense for the Revised Criminal Code. This offense criminalizes knowingly confining or moving a person without that person's effective consent. The offense is identical to the RCC's kidnapping offense, except that criminal restraint does not require intent to hold that person for ransom or another specified purpose [1] Along with the revised kidnapping[2] offense, the revised criminal restraint offense replaces the kidnapping offense in the current D.C. Code,[3], and parts of several prostitution related statutes that involve restraining or moving another person.[4] The statute also includes penalty enhancements, which require that the accused commits criminal restraint with recklessness as to the fact that the complainant is a protected person; with the purpose of harming the complainant because of the complainant's status as a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or public official; or by recklessly displaying or using a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon.

Subsection (a) specifies the elements of criminal restraint. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that criminal restraint requires the actor knowingly and substantially confines or moves another person. The paragraph specifies that a "knowingly" culpable mental state applies, which requires that the actor was practically certain that he or she would confine or move another person. Moving a person requires causing that person to move to another location when that person would not have done so absent the actor's intervention. Moving another person can include either moving a person against his or her will, such as by tying up and carrying away a person, or by causing the person to move by means of persuasion, threat, or deception. Confining a person requires causing that person to remain in a location when that person would not have done so absent the actor's intervention. Confining another person can include either physically trapping a person in a location against his or her will, such as by locking a person in a room, or by causing the person to remain in a location by means of persuasion, threat, or deception. Confining or moving a person per this subsection need not involve force, threats, or other forms of coercion.[5]

Subsection (a) also requires that the actor must substantially confine or move the complainant. This paragraph clarifies that momentary or trivial[6] confinement or movement is insufficient. Per the rule of interpretation under RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" mental state also applies to this element. The actor must be practically certain that the confinement or movement was substantial.

[5] For example, a person who invites a guest to his home for dinner has "moved" and "confined" the guest, as the guest would not have gone to and remained at the person's home absent the dinner invitation. However, this would not constitute criminal restraint, as the movement and confinement were consensual.
[6] Confinement or movement may be trivial even if they are of significant duration. For example, if a person barricades a door to prevent another from leaving a building, but there is an alternate exit that is easily accessible, the interference would not be substantial regardless of how long the door remains barricaded.

Paragraph (a)(1) specifies prohibited means of confining or moving a person. Subparagraph (a)(1)(A) requires that the actor confines or moves the complainant by causing bodily injury to the complainant, or by using physical force. The term "bodily injury" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 as "physical pain, physical injury, illness, or impairment of a physical condition." Subparagraph (a)(1)(B) requires that the actor makes an explicit or implicit coercive threat. The term "coercive threat" is defined in RCC § 22E-701, and includes an array of specified threats. Subparagraph (a)(1)(C) requires that the actor use deception. The term "deception" is defined in RCC § 22E-701. Per the rule of interpretation under RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" mental state also applies to the elements in subparagraphs (a)(1)(A)-(C).

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies two additional means of committing criminal restraint when the complainant is an incapacitated individual or under the age of 16. Under this paragraph it is irrelevant whether the complainant agrees to the confinement or movement. Subparagraph (a)(2)(A) requires that the actor was reckless as to the fact that the complainant is an incapacitated individual, and that a person with legal authority over the complainant who is acting consistent with that authority[7] has not given effective consent to the confinement or movement. "Person with legal authority over the complainant" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 which means, in relevant part, "[w]hen the complainant is an incapacitated individual, the court-appointed guardian to the complainant engaging in conduct permitted under civil law controlling the actor's guardianship, or someone acting with the effective consent of such a guardian."[8] The subparagraph specifies that a "reckless" culpable mental state applies to this element, which requires that the accused consciously disregarded a substantial risk that the complainant is incapacitated, and that a person with legal authority has not consented to the confinement or movement.[9] Under this subparagraph, it is immaterial if the complainant consents to the movement or confinement.

Subparagraph (a)(2)(B) requires that the actor was, in fact, 18 years of age or older, and was reckless as to the fact that the complainant is under 16 years of age and four years younger than the actor, and that a person with legal authority over the complainant has not given effective consent to the confinement or movement. "Person with legal authority over the complainant" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 which means, in relevant part, "[w]hen the complainant is incapacitated, the court-appointed guardian to the complainant engaging in conduct permitted under civil law controlling the actor's guardianship, or someone acting with the effective consent of such a guardian."[10] The subparagraph specifies that a "reckless" culpable mental state applies to this element, which requires that the accused consciously disregarded a substantial risk that the complainant is under the age of 16, and that a person with legal authority has not

[7] If the person with legal authority over the complainant provides effective consent, but is not acting consistent with that authority, criminal restraint liability may apply. For example, if a [9] Whether there was a substantial risk that a person with legal authority would not have consented, and whether the actor's disregard of the risk was a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct is a fact based analysis that may take into account the complainant's age, the nature of and purpose for the confinement or movement, or any other relevant facts.

[10] RCC § 22E-701.

consented to the confinement or movement.[11] Under this subparagraph, it is immaterial if the complainant consents to the movement or confinement.[12]

Subsection (b) specifies defenses to prosecution under this section. Paragraph (b)(1) provides two defenses when the complainant is under 18 years of age. Paragraph (b)(1) uses the term "in fact" a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, which specifies that there is no culpable mental state required as to the complainant's age. Subparagraph (b)(1)(A) provides an exclusion to liability when the complainant is under the age of 18, and the actor is a close relative or a former legal guardian with authority to control the complainant's freedom of movement who acts "with intent to"[13] assume full responsibility for the care and supervision of the complainant, and does not cause bodily injury or use a coercive threat. Subparagraph (b)(1)(B) provides an exclusion to liability if the actor reasonably believes[14] he or she is acting at the direction of a close relative. In addition, the actor must act with intent that the close relative will assume full responsibility for the care and supervision of the complainant, and did not cause bodily injury or use an explicit or implicit coercive threat. The term "close relative" is defined in RCC § 22E-701, and means a parent, grandparent, child, sibling, aunt, or uncle. The defenses under paragraph (b)(1) do not preclude criminal liability under any other offenses.[15] Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[16] [11] Whether there was a substantial risk that a person with legal authority has not consented, and whether the actor's disregard of the risk was a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct is a fact based analysis that may take into account the complainant's age, the nature of and purpose for the confinement or movement, or any other relevant facts.

[12] For example, if a person lures a child to enter and remain in his basement by promising to give the child candy, criminal restraint liability may apply even if the child willingly entered and remained in the basement.

[13] "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor was practically certain he or she would assume full responsibility for the care and supervision of the complainant. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that the actor assumed full responsibility for the care and supervision of the complainant, only that he or she believed to a practical certainty that he or she would do so.

Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase.

[14] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist.

[15] For example, although the defense under paragraph (b)(1)(A) bars criminal restraint liability when a close relative moves a child with intent to assume full responsibility and care over the child, this does not preclude liability for parental kidnapping under RCC § 16-1022, provided the elements of that offense are satisfied.

[16] See, e.g.,* Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

Paragraph (b)(2) provides two additional defenses to prosecution under paragraph (a)(1) of this section. Subparagraph (b)(2)(A) specifies that it is a defense that the actor is, in fact, is a transportation worker who moves the complainant while in the course of the worker's official duties.[17] Paragraph (b)(2)(B) specifies that it is a defense that the actor is, in fact, a person who moves the complainant solely by persuading the complainant to go to a location open to the general public to engage in a commercial or other legal activity.[18]

Paragraph (c) specifies two affirmative defenses. RCC § 22E-201 specifies the burden of proof and production for all affirmative defenses in the RCC. Under RCC § 22E-201, the actor bears the burden of proving the elements of the defense by a preponderance of the evidence. Under paragraph (c)(1), it is an affirmative defense to prosecution under paragraph (a)(1) that the actor lacked effective consent to confine or move the complainant due to the use of deception, but the actor did not have intent to[19] proceed by the infliction of bodily injury or an explicit or implicit coercive threat[20] if the deception should fail.[21]

Under paragraph (c)(2), it is an affirmative defense to prosecution under paragraph (a)(2) if the actor reasonably believes[22] that a person with legal authority over the complainant would have given effective consent to the conduct constituting the offense. This defense applies if the actor has not communicated with a person with legal authority over the complainant, but reasonably believes that such a person would effectively consent to the confinement or movement. The determination of whether the actor reasonably believed that a person with legal authority over the complainant would have effectively consented is a fact-specific inquiry. The complainant's age, the nature of and motivation for the confinement or movement, and any other relevant [17] For example, if a 12 year old child gets on a public bus while unaccompanied by a parent or guardian, the bus driver would technically satisfy the elements of criminal restraint under subparagraph (a)(2)(B), by moving the complainant without consent of a person with legal authority over the complainant. This defense bars criminal liability for this conduct.

[18] For example, a store owner who convinces a 12 year old child unaccompanied by a parent or guardian to enter the store would technically satisfy the elements of criminal restraint under subparagraph (a)(2)(B), by moving the complainant without consent of a person with legal authority over the complainant. This defense bars criminal liability for this conduct.

[19] "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor was practically certain that he or she would proceed by the infliction of bodily injury or a coercive threat if the deception should fail. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that the actor proceeded with the infliction of bodily injury or a coercive threat, only that the actor believed to a practical certainty that he or she would do so if the deception failed.

[20] A coercive threat may come in the form of a verbal or written communication, however gestures or other conduct may also suffice. In addition, the statute specifies that the coercive threat need not be explicit. Communications and conduct that are implicitly threatening given the circumstances may satisfy this element. For example, depending on the context, saying "it would be a shame if anything happened to your store," may constitute an implicit threat of property damage.

[21] Deception can fail either by the complainant realizing that he or she has been deceived, or by a third party intervening on behalf of the complainant. The defendant's motive for deceiving the other person, whether the defendant was armed, or an actual attempt to use force or threats may all be relevant to determinations of the defendant's willingness to resort to force or threats should the deception fail.

[22] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist.

circumstances may be taken into account. Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[23]

Subsection (d) specifies relevant penalties for the criminal restraint offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Paragraph (d)(2) specifies three penalty enhancements. If the government proves at least one of the penalty enhancements listed under paragraph (d)(2), the penalty classification for criminal restraint may be increased in severity by one penalty class. These penalty enhancements may apply in addition to any penalty enhancements authorized by RCC Chapter 6. [24]

Subparagraph (d)(2)(A) requires that the actor was reckless as to the complainant being a protected person. The term "protected person" is defined under RCC § 22E-701. Under sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(B)(i), the actor must have been reckless as to the complainant being a protected person, a culpable mental state defined in RCC § 22E-206, meaning the accused must consciously disregard a substantial risk that the complainant is a "protected person," and that disregard of that risk is a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct.

Subparagraph (d)(2)(B) requires that the accused commits the offense by recklessly displaying or using a dangerous weapon or imitation weapon. The phrase "by displaying or using a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon" should be broadly construed to include criminal restraints in which the accused only momentarily displays such a weapon, or slightly touches the complainant with such a weapon.[25] The term "use" is intended to include making physical contact with the weapon, and conduct other than oral or written language, symbols, or gestures, that indicates the presence of a weapon.[26] The terms "dangerous weapon" or "imitation weapon," are defined in RCC § 22E-701. Sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(C) specifies that a "recklessly" culpable mental state applies to this penalty enhancement, which requires that the actor consciously disregarded a substantial risk that he or she would display or use a dangerous weapon or imitation weapon. However, the sub-subparagraph also uses the term "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, to specify that there is no culpable mental state required as to [24] If general penalty enhancements under RCC §22E-606 or §22E-607 apply to this offense, the penalty for RCC §22E-606 and §22E-607 shall be based on the classification of the relevant unenhanced gradation of this offense.

[23] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

[25] For example, assuming the other elements of the offense are proven, rearranging one's coat to provide a momentary glimpse of part of a knife, or holding a sharp object to someone's back without actually causing injury, may be sufficient for liability under paragraph (a)(3).

[26] For further detail on what conduct constitutes "using" a dangerous weapon, see Commentary to criminal threats, RCC § 22E-1204.

whether the implement used or displayed was a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon.

Subparagraph (d)(2)(C) requires that the actor has the purpose of harming the complainant because of the complainant's status as a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or public official. This requires that the accused acted with "purpose," a term defined at RCC § 22E-206, which means that the actor must consciously desire to harm that person because of his or her status as a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or District official.[27] Harm may include, but does not require bodily injury. Harm should be construed more broadly to include causing an array of adverse outcomes.[28] "Law enforcement officer," "public safety employee," and "public official" are all defined terms in RCC § 22E-701. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with the purpose" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. Here, it is not necessary to prove that the complainant who was harmed was a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or District official, only that the actor believed to a practical certainty that the complainant that he or she would harm a person of such a status.

Subsection (e) provides that convictions for criminal restraint and a separate offense merge if the offenses arose from the same act or course of conduct and the confinement or movement was incidental to the commission of the other offense. Confinement or movement is incidental to another offense when the actor's primary purpose in confining or moving the other person was to commit the other offense, provided that the movement or confinement did not exceed what is normally associated with the other offense.[29] The subsection specifies that the court will follow the procedures in RCC § 22E-214 (b) and (c) to effect the merger.

[27] While the RCC § 22E-701 definitions of "law enforcement officer" and "public safety employee" refer to some persons only when on-duty (e.g., a campus officer), this provision on committing the offense with the purpose of harming the complainant because of their status as a law enforcement officer or public safety employee applies to committing the offense against an off-duty person based on their on-duty role. For example, a defendant who restrains an off-duty police officer in retaliation for the officer arresting the defendant's friend would constitute committing criminal restraint with the purpose of harming the complainant due to his status as a law enforcement officer.

[28] For example, confining or moving a person without consent may constitute harm, even if no bodily injury occurs, because it is an interference with the person's freedom of movement.

[29] This provision is intended to re-instate DCCA case law prior to Parker v. United States, 692 A.2d 913 (D.C. 1997). Prior to Parker, District courts employed a fact-based inquiry to determine whether convictions for kidnapping and other offenses that arise from a single act or course of conduct should merge. In Parker, the DCCA held that instead of a fact-based inquiry, courts should only use a Blockburger elements test to determine if convictions for kidnapping and separate offenses should merge. The restraint need not be necessarily associated with commission of the other offense. For example, a person who commits robbery by forcing a person to walk into an adjacent room to locate valuables would not be guilty of criminal restraint because the movement was incidental to the robbery. However, a person who confines another for a full day in order to facilitate commission of a robbery may still be convicted of a criminal restraint because the duration of the confinement far exceeded what would normally be associated with a robbery. See, e.g., Sinclair v. United States, 388 A.2d 1201 (D.C. 1978) (kidnapping was not incidental to robbery when the defendant held a person at gunpoint in a car and drove 25 blocks away); Robinson v. United States, 388 A.2d 1210, 1211–12 (D.C. 1978) (holding that when defendant dragged a person 63 paces over the course of a few moments in order to commit a sexual assault, the "seizure and

Relation to Current District Law. The revised criminal restraint statute changes current District law in seven main ways.

First, the RCC criminal restraint offense codifies as a separate offense for confining or moving another person when the motive of the perpetrator is not ransom, the infliction of bodily injury, or other particularly harmful or dangerous acts. The current kidnapping statute requires that the defendant hold a person "for ransom, reward, or otherwise[.]"[30] The D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) has interpreted the "or otherwise" language broadly and held that "[t]he motive behind the kidnapping is unimportant, so long as the act was done with the expectation of benefit to the transgressor."[31] By contrast, the RCC divides the current kidnapping offense into two primary offenses, with criminal constraint providing liability for confining or moving another person while the revised kidnapping requires an added wrongful intent that makes the confinement or movement especially dangerous, harmful, or terrifying. Codifying a new criminal restraint offense improves the proportionality of the RCC by separately labeling and penalizing less harmful and dangerous forms of confinement or movement.[32]

Second, the criminal restraint offense provides a defense when the complainant is under the age of 18, and the actor is either a close relative or a former legal guardian with authority to control the complainant's freedom of movement.[33] The current kidnapping statute provides an exception to liability if the victim is a minor, and the actor is the victim's parent. By contrast, in certain circumstances the RCC criminal restraint statute extends the exception to close relatives and former legal guardians. The revised criminal restraint statute recognizes that under certain circumstances, a close relative or former legal guardian confining or moving a child does not warrant criminal liability under the criminal restraint statute.[34] Extending the parental exception to include other authority figures improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

asportation was clearly incidental to the crime of assault with intent to rape" and that the conduct should not constitute two separate crimes.).

[30] D.C. Code § 22-2001.

[31] Walker v. United States, 617 A.2d 525, 527 (D.C. 1992) (quoting United States v. Wolford, 144 U.S.App.D.C. 1, 5-6, 444 F.2d 876, 880-81 (1971) (internal quotations omitted). For example, restraining another person in order to enact revenge, or out of a desire for companionship could sustain a kidnapping conviction under current law. See Walker, 617 A.2d at 527.

[32] For example, a person who in the heat of the moment blocks a door to prevent his significant other to leave in the midst of an argument may be guilty of kidnapping under current law, and subject to the same penalty as a person who, after substantial planning, forcibly seizes a person, transports them to another location, and holds them for ransom on fear of death. Under the RCC, these two types of conduct would be penalized differently, as a criminal restraint and kidnapping.

[33] When the actor is a close relative or former legal guardian, the exception also requires that the actor acts with intent to assume full responsibility for the care and supervision of the complainant, and does not cause bodily injury or use a coercive threat.

[34] Application of this defense does not preclude liability under any other statute. A close relative may still be convicted of parental kidnapping under RCC § 16-1022, provided the elements of that offense are satisfied

Third, the RCC criminal restraint statute bars multiple convictions for criminal restraint and any other offense if the confinement or movement was incidental to the commission of the other offense.[35] Under current DCCA case law a person may be convicted of both kidnapping and another offense that arise from the same act or course of conduct, as long as kidnapping and the other offense each include "at least one element which the other one does not."[36] By contrast, the RCC criminal restraint statute reinstates the fact-based test applied by the DCCA prior to Parker v. United States,[37] which required courts to make a determination in each case as to whether the confinement or movement was merely incidental to another offense.[38] Where, as is common,[39] such confinement or movement is incidental to another offense,[40] the authorized punishment for the other offense is sufficient. The RCC criminal restraint sentencing provision improves the proportionality of the offense.

Fourth, the RCC criminal restraint statute incorporates multiple penalty enhancements based on the status of the complainant, capping the effect of these enhancements. The D.C. Code currently provides multiple penalty enhancements for the commission of a kidnapping offense,[41] without specifying whether or how these enhancements may be combined or "stacked" when multiple enhancements are applicable to a single charge. DCCA case law has not addressed whether most combinations of these penalty enhancements can be combined, but the combination of at least some of [35] By barring sentences for kidnapping, the revised statute allows for the possibility that convictions for kidnapping and the other offense may be entered for purposes of appeal. If the conviction for the other offense is reversed on appeal, the appellate court may order a lower court to sentence the defendant for the surviving kidnapping conviction.

[37] 692 A.2d 913 (D.C. 1997). In Parker, the DCCA applied a new test for how to determine, in the absence of legislative intent, whether charged offenses should merge. The Parker ruling applied the new "elements" test the DCCA first adopted in Byrd v. United States, 598 A.2d 386 (D.C.1991) (en banc) because there was no legislative intent discernible as to whether kidnapping should merge with murder.

[38] E.g., West v. United States, 599 A.2d 788, 793 (D.C. 1991); Vines v. United States, 540 A.2d 1107, 1109 (D.C. 1988); Robinson v. United States, 388 A.2d 1210, 1211–12 (D.C. 1978).

[39] Many offenses against persons commonly involve some type of significant, non-consensual interference with another person's freedom of movement. For example, victims of robberies, assaults, sexual assaults, and homicides are frequently subjected to threats or physical restraint that prevent them from fleeing. Under current District law, such offenses against persons typically would provide the basis for a kidnapping charge. In practice, however, kidnapping charges are not typically brought in cases with such offenses against persons.

[40] E.g., Robinson, 388 A.2d at 1212–13 (holding that when defendant dragged a person 63 paces over the course of a few moments in order to commit a sexual assault, the "seizure and asportation was clearly incidental to the crime of assault with intent to rape" and that the conduct should not constitute two separate crimes.).

[41] See, e.g., D.C. Code § 22-3602 (providing an enhanced penalty for kidnapping committed against "a member of a citizen patrol ("member") while that member is participating in a citizen patrol, or because of the member's participation in a citizen patrol"); D.C. Code § 22-851 (District official or employee while in the course of their duties or on account of those duties, or actions against a family member of a District official or employee); D.C. Code § 22-4502 (enhanced penalty for committing kidnapping "while armed" or with a dangerous weapon "readily available").

these enhancements has been upheld.[42] By contrast, under the criminal restraint statute, the penalty for criminal restraint cannot be enhanced more than once based on any of the listed penalty enhancements.[43] While multiple penalty enhancements may be charged, proof of just one is sufficient to increase the penalty class in severity and proof of others does not change the maximum statutory penalty for the crime.[44] Capping the effect of penalty enhancements improves the proportionality of the District law by preventing aggravated forms of the offense from being penalized the same as much more serious offenses.

Fifth, the RCC penalty enhancements in criminal restraint statute provides new, heightened penalties based on recklessness as to the status of the complainant as a protected person, which includes on-duty law enforcement officers, on-duty public safety employee, on-duty transportation workers. The current kidnapping statute does not reference the status of the complainant, but multiple statutes in the current D.C. Code authorize enhanced penalties for kidnapping committed against certain groups of persons.[45] Currently, the D.C. Code does not enhance crimes based on the status of the complainant as an on-duty law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or on-duty transportation workers. By contrast, through its use of the term "protected person," the RCC criminal restraint statute authorizes heightened penalties if the accused is reckless as to the fact the complainant is an on-duty law enforcement officer, on-duty public safety employee, or on-duty transportation worker. Such penalties are consistent with enhancements for assault-type,[46] robbery[47], and homicide offenses,[48] and reflect some unique vulnerabilities of such complainants.[49] Requiring a reckless culpable mental state is also consistent with many current statutes that authorize enhanced penalties based on the complainant's status.[50] Including recklessness as to the complainant being an on-duty

[42] Convictions have been upheld applying multiple enhancements. C.f. Forte v. United States, 856 A.2d 567 (D.C. 2004) (holding that "double enhancement" under senior citizen penalty enhancement statute and repeat offender statute was proper).

[43] For instance, the status of the complainant and the defendant's use of a weapon.

[44] The existence of more than one aggravating factors may be a significant factor in sentencing, however.

Code § 22-3611 (minors); D.C. Code § 22-3601 (persons over 65 years of age); D.C. Code §§ 22-3751; 22-3752 (taxicab drivers); and D.C. Code §§ 22-3751.01; 22-3752 (transit operators and Metrorail station managers); and D.C. Code § 22-3602 (members of a citizen patrol).

[47] RCC § 22E-1201.

[48] RCC §§ 22E-1101 - 1102.

[49] For example, on-duty law enforcement and public safety officers performing investigative duties and private vehicle-for-hire services drivers may often enter situations where they are isolated with persons in enclosed places and more susceptible to unwanted interference with their personal movements; vulnerable adults may be targeted due to their limited ability to evade interference with their freedom of movement.

[50] Under current District law it is a defense to the senior citizen complainant enhancement that "the accused knew or reasonably believed the complainant was not 65 years old or older at the time of the offense, or could not have known or determined the age of the complainant because of the manner in which the offense was committed." D.C. Code § 22-3601(c). Similarly, under the current minor complainant enhancement, it is a defense that "the accused reasonably believed that the complainant was not a minor [person less than 18 years old] at the time of the offense." D.C. Code § 22-3611(b). The current assault of a law enforcement officer offense requires that the defendant was law enforcement officer, public safety employee, a vulnerable adult, or on-duty transportation worker as penalty enhancement removes a possible gap in current law, and improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised code.

Sixth, the revised statute includes a penalty enhancement based on the crime being committed for the purpose of harming the complainant because of his or her status as a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or District official. The current kidnapping statute does not reference acting with the purpose of harming the complainant because of the status of the complainant, although multiple statutes in the current D.C. Code authorize enhanced penalties for kidnapping committed against certain groups of persons.[51] By contrast, the criminal restraint statute includes a penalty enhancement for committing the offense with the purpose of harming another person due to that person's status as a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or District official. In practice, this change only affects law enforcement officers and public safety employees who are not District employees, as kidnapping of any District employee is subject to more severe statutory penalties under current District law.[52] Authorizing heightened penalties for criminal restraint with the purpose of harming the complainant because of the complainant's status as a law enforcement officer or public safety employee removes a possible gap in current law, and improves the consistency and proportionality of penalties.

Seventh, the criminal restraint statute includes a penalty enhancement for "displaying or using" a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon. Current D.C. Code § 22-4502 provides enhanced penalties for committing kidnapping "while armed" or "having readily available" a dangerous weapon. District case law on D.C. Code § 22-4502 holds that the penalty enhancements are authorized if the accused either had "actual physical possession of [a weapon]";[53] or if the weapon was merely in "close proximity or easily accessible during the commission of the underlying [offense],"[54] provided that the accused also constructively possessed the weapon.[55] There is no requirement under D.C.

[51] D.C. Code § 22-3602 (providing an enhanced penalty for kidnapping committed against "a member of a citizen patrol ("member") while that member is participating in a citizen patrol, or because of the member's participation in a citizen patrol"); D.C. Code § 22-851 (District official or employee while in the course of their duties or on account of those duties, or actions against a family member of a District official or employee);

[52] D.C. Code § 22-851. Subparagraph (d)(2)(C) of the RCC criminal restraint statute provides liability for criminal restraints with the purpose of harming the complainant because of the complainant's status as a District official.

[54] Clyburn v. United States, 48 A.3d 147, 154 (D.C. 2012) (reversing sentencing enhancement under D.C. Code § 22-4502 when rifle was located in a different room from where defendant committed the underlying offense); cf. Guishard v. United States, 669 A.2d 1306, 1310 (D.C. 1995) (affirming sentencing enhancement under D.C. Code § 22-4502 when firearm was in a dresser drawer in the same room as the underlying offense).

[55] *Cox v. United State*s, 999 A.2d 63, 69 (D.C. 2010) ("to have a weapon 'readily available,' one must at a minimum have constructive possession of it. To prove constructive possession, the prosecution was required to show that Cox knew the pistol was present in the car, and that he had not merely the ability, but also the intent to exercise dominion or control over it.").

Code § 22-4502 that the accused actually used the weapon to commit kidnapping.[56] By contrast, the penalty enhancement requires that the actor actually displayed or used[57] a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon. Merely possessing or having a weapon readily available is insufficient to satisfy the penalty enhancement subparagraph (d)(2)(B), although such conduct is criminalized elsewhere in current law and the RCC as a separate offense with a lower penalty.[58] Including use of a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon as a penalty enhancement improves the proportionality of punishment by matching more severe penalties to criminal restraints in which the defendant actually uses a weapon.

Beyond these seven changes to current District law, nine other aspects of the revised criminal restraint offense may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the RCC criminal restraint statute specifies that the actor must "knowingly" confine or move another person. The current kidnapping statute references as one means of committing the offense that the actor had "intent to hold or detain,"[59] but it is not clear whether this culpable mental state applies to other elements of the offense, and the phrase "with the intent" is not defined in the statute. In one case the DCCA stated that the current kidnapping statute requires that the actor had "specific intent to detain the complainant"[60] although it is unclear whether the DCCA in that case was referring only to the defendant's motive rather than their awareness of the objective elements of the offense. Current District practice appears to treat the kidnapping as a "general intent" offense.[61] The revised criminal restraint statute specifies that a "knowingly" culpable mental state applies to the element of confining or moving the complainant. Applying a knowledge requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[62] Specifying a culpable mental state for the offense improves the clarity of the RCC and is consistent with requirements for most other offenses.

[57] "Using" a weapon includes physically touching another person with the weapon. For example, if all other offense elements are satisfied, placing a knife or firearm to the complainant's back and telling them to walk to another location may satisfy the penalty enhancement under subparagraph (d)(3)(C) for kidnapping.

United States*, 613 A.2d 906, 912 (D.C. 1992) ("To prove a kidnapping, the government must show that the defendant confined the complainant with specific intent to detain the complainant for 'ransom or reward or otherwise' and that such detention was involuntary or by use of coercion; the detention may be for any purpose that the defendant believes might benefit him.").

[61] Redbook § 4.303 Kidnapping requires that the accused acted "voluntarily and on purpose, and not by mistake or accident," which accords with the jury instructions treatment of "general intent," not "specific intent" offenses. See Redbook § 3.100 Defendant's State of Mind.

[62] See Elonis v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2001, 2009 (2015) ("[O]ur cases have explained that a defendant generally must 'know the facts that make his conduct fit the definition of the offense,' even if he does not know that those facts give rise to a crime. (Internal citation omitted)").

Second, the RCC criminal restraint offense requires that the complainant did not effectively consent to the interference, other than in cases involving complainants under the age of 16, or who are incapacitated. The current kidnapping statute is silent as to whether and by what means the actor must confine or move the complainant. The current statute broadly states that a person commits kidnapping by "seizing, confining, inveigling, enticing, decoying, kidnapping, abducting, concealing, or carrying away any individual",[63] but none of these terms are statutorily defined. The DCCA has generally recognized that kidnapping requires an "involuntary seizure,"[64] which includes forcible seizures[65], or restraining a person by threat of force.[66] Current District practice also recognizes that a person can commit kidnapping by "seiz[ing], confin[ing], abduct[ing], or carr[ying] away [the complainant] against his/her will"[67] The revised criminal restraint statute specifies that the confinement or movement must be without effective consent of the complainant, except in cases where the complainant is under the age of 16 or incapacitated. The revised language improves the clarity and proportionality of the offense.

Third, the RCC criminal restraint statute provides defenses if the actor is a transportation worker who moves the complainant while in the course of the worker's official duties, or a person who moves the complainant solely by persuading the complainant to go to a location open to the general public to engage in a commercial or other legal activity. This defense recognizes that in these circumstances, moving an incapacitated individual or child under the age of 16 does not warrant criminalization even if a person with legal authority over the complainant has not effectively consented. The current kidnapping statute does not specify whether this type of movement constitutes an offense, and there is no DCCA case law on point. To resolve this ambiguity, the revised criminal restraint statute clarifies that these types of movements of incapacitated individual and children under the age of 16 is not criminalized. This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised statute.

Fourth, the RCC criminal restraint statute requires that the actor must "substantially" confine or move the complainant. The current kidnapping statute does not explicitly include any substantiality element, and the DCCA has never discussed in a published opinion whether momentary or trivial confinement or movement suffices under the current kidnapping statute.[68] By contrast, the revised criminal restraint statute requires that the actor must "substantially" confine or move the complainant. This excludes momentary or trivial confinement or movement. The precise effect on current law is somewhat unclear, as there is no case law on point. Requiring that the actor "substantially" confine or move the complainant improves the proportionality of the RCC by excluding cases that only involve trivial or momentary interference.[69]

United States*, 613 A.2d 906, 912 (D.C. 1992) ("To prove a kidnapping, the government must show that the defendant confined the complainant with specific intent to detain the complainant for "ransom or reward or otherwise" and that such detention was involuntary or by use of coercion[.]")

[66] E.g., Battle v. United States, 515 A.2d 1120 (D.C. 1986) (defendant committed kidnapping by displaying a gun, got into complainant's car, and drove the car away to a different location where the complainant would be held).

[67] D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 4.303 Kidnapping.

Fifth, when the complainant is under the age of 16 or is incapacitated, the RCC criminal restraint statute requires that the actor be reckless as to the fact that a person with legal authority over the complainant has not effectively consented to the confinement or movement. The current kidnapping statute does not specify when confining or moving a person who is under the age of 16 or is incapacitated constitutes kidnapping, and there is no relevant DCCA case law on point.[70] It is unclear under current law whether, and under what circumstances, a person would be guilty of kidnapping for confining or moving a person without effective consent of a person with legal authority over the complainant. The revised statute resolves this ambiguity by requiring that the actor at least be reckless as to whether a person with legal authority over the complainant has not effectively consented to the confinement or movement. This change improves the clarity, completeness, and perhaps the proportionality, of the revised statute.

Sixth, the RCC criminal restraint statute requires that the actor confines or moves another person. The current kidnapping statute criminalizes "seizing, confining, inveigling, enticing, decoying, kidnapping, abducting, concealing, or carrying away any individual by any means whatsoever[.]"[71] With the exception of "enticing," discussed below, replacing these verbs with "confines" and "moves" does not appear to change current District law. The ordinary definitions of the verbs "seizing," "confining," "kidnapping," "abducting," "concealing," and "carrying away" all constitute confining or moving another person. However, it is possible that "inveigling" and "decoying" a person includes conduct not covered by confining and moving another.[72] The terms "inveigling" and "decoying" are not defined in the current statute, and there is no DCCA case law defining these terms. The RCC criminal restraint statute resolves this ambiguity by requiring that the actor confine or move another person, without that person's effective consent.[73] These limitations improve the clarity and proportionality of the offense, by more clearly defining the scope of the offense.

[68] DCCA case law discussing whether kidnapping should merge with other offenses has suggested that relatively brief interference with another person's freedom of movement can constitute kidnapping. E.g., Sinclair v. United States, 388 A.2d 101, 1204 (D.C. 1978) (noting that "victims of [rape or robbery] are detained against their will while the criminal is accomplishing his objective"). This case law implies that even the brief detention associated with an ordinary street robbery is sufficient for kidnapping. However, the DCCA has never specifically decided whether on its own, such a brief detention would satisfy the elements of kidnapping.

[69] If a defendant intended to interfere with a person's freedom of movement to a substantial degree but failed to do so and was only able to interfere in an insubstantial manner, attempt liability may still be applicable depending on the facts of the case.

[70] But see, Blackledge v. United States, 871 A.2d 1193, 1197 (D.C. 2005) (holding that convictions for kidnapping and enticing a minor do not merge, noting that "the kidnapping statute requires . . . that the complainant was seized involuntarily through the defendant's use of mental or physical coercion; however, consent is never a valid defense to child enticement, and therefore the government is not required to show that the child was taken involuntarily."). This language suggests that kidnapping requires, even in the case of minors, that the defendant seize another person "involuntarily", and that kidnapping does not criminalize moving or confining a minor by means of enticement.

Seventh, the RCC's criminal restraint statute omits the word "entices." The current kidnapping statute states that a person commits kidnapping by "enticing . . . any individual . . . with intent to hold or detain such individual for ransom, reward, or otherwise[.]"[74] Under a plain language reading, the current kidnapping statute provides liability for merely enticing a person with intent to hold or detain that person for some personal benefit, even if the person was never actually held. However, the DCCA has never discussed in a published opinion whether such conduct would actually constitute kidnapping, and such an interpretation would run counter to case law requiring the kidnapping to be "involuntary" in nature.[75] The RCC's criminal restraint statute resolves this ambiguity by providing that the offense requires actually confining or moving a person without that person's effective consent. A person cannot commit criminal restraint merely by offering some reward, without actually confining or moving another person.[76] These limitations improve the clarity and proportionality of the offense, by more clearly defining the scope of the offense, and only including conduct dangerous enough to warrant the penalties under the criminal restraint statute.

Eighth, the RCC criminal restraint statute provides an affirmative defense when the actor obtained consent by deception and did not intend to obtain consent by inflicting bodily injury or making a coercive threat should the deception fail. The current D.C. Code kidnapping statute does not reference use of "deception," but it does include the terms "inveigle" and "decoy" which, at least considered alone, may allow for kidnapping liability for the use of deception.[77] The DCCA has never discussed in a published opinion whether deception that causes a person to change how they otherwise would [76] However, a person can commit kidnapping by initially enticing another person with offer of some benefit as a means of luring the other person to move to or remain in a particular location as long as the actor confines or moves a person without effective consent.

[77] D.C. Code § 22-2001. ("Whoever shall be guilty of, or of aiding or abetting in, seizing, confining, inveigling, enticing, decoying, kidnapping, abducting, concealing, or carrying away any individual by any means whatsoever, and holding or detaining, or with the intent to hold or detain, such individual for ransom or reward or otherwise, except, in the case of a minor, by a parent thereof, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by imprisonment for not more than 30 years."). One meaning of "inveigle" is "to win over by wiles." Merriam Webster Dictionary Online, at https://www.merriam-webster.com/dictionary/inveigle. However, in addition to "inveigle," the plain text of the current statute also to requires "holding or detaining, or with the intent to hold or detain…" which suggests that mere substantial movement or confinement by deception may be inadequate for liability.

exercise their freedom of movement can alone constitute kidnapping, absent proof that the defendant would have resorted to force or threats should the deception fail.[78] Federal courts interpreting an analogous federal kidnapping statute[79] are split as to whether deception alone can constitute kidnapping.[80] The revised statute resolves this ambiguity, by including an affirmative defense that the actor used deception but did not intend to resort to force or coercive threats. The revised language improves the clarity and proportionality[81] of the offense.

Ninth, the revised statute does not separately criminalize a conspiracy to commit criminal restraint. The District's current kidnapping statute specifically provides that any person who conspires to commit kidnapping "shall be deemed to have violated the provisions of this section."[82] The current kidnapping statute's reference to a conspiracy, however, does not specify what culpable mental states, if any, apply to the conspiracy. By contrast, under the RCC criminal restraint statute, conspiracy to commit criminal restraint is subject to the RCC's general conspiracy statute. The RCC's general conspiracy statute details the culpable mental state and other requirements for proof of a conspiracy in a manner broadly applicable to all offenses. To the extent that the RCC's general conspiracy provision differs from the law on conspiracy as applied to the current kidnapping statute, relying on the RCC's general conspiracy provision may constitute a change in current law.[83] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised offense.

For this reason, and because both statutes were enacted by Congress, decisions construing the meaning and application of the Federal Kidnaping Act may be resorted to as an aid in determining the meaning of the similar language employed in the District statute.); D.C. Hoog,* 504 F.2d 45, 50–51 (8th Cir.1974) (finding the evidence to be sufficient where the defendant promised the victim a ride and then kept her in his car by inventing an emergency detour).").

[81] Absent the RCC specification that consent by deception must be accompanied by an intent to use bodily injury or threat of bodily injury if necessary, a broad range of otherwise accepted, legal conduct may fall within the scope of the RCC criminal restraint and current kidnapping statute. For example, if a defendant lures another person to a location, and convinces the person to remain in that location by false promise of employment, the defendant could be convicted of criminal restraint even if the defendant had no intent to use force or threats to compel the person to remain.

In addition to any other penalty provided under this section, a person may be fined an amount not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01.").

One other change to the revised statute is clarificatory in nature and is not intended to substantively change District law.

The RCC criminal restraint statute does not contain special provisions regarding jurisdiction. The current kidnapping statute states that "[t]his section shall be held to have been violated if the seizing, confining, inveigling, enticing, decoying, kidnapping, abducting, concealing, carrying away, holding, or detaining occurs in the District of Columbia."[84] This language apparently is intended to ensure that District courts have jurisdiction over kidnappings that do not occur entirely within the District of Columbia. However, it is unclear whether this language changes the scope of jurisdiction that a District court would otherwise have over kidnapping cases. The DCCA has generally held that District courts have jurisdiction over alleged offenses if "one of several constituent elements to the complete offense" occurs within the District, "even though the remaining elements occurred outside of the District."[85] Consequently, although the DCCA has not applied this rule to kidnapping cases, it seems that District courts would have jurisdiction over any case in which a person was seized or held within the District, regardless of whether the person was initially seized outside of the District, or if the person were seized within the District and transported out of the District.[86] The RCC criminal restraint statute eliminates jurisdiction language specific to kidnapping and criminal restraint. In addition to general case law providing authority for offenses if "one of several constituent elements to the complete offense" occurs within the District,"[87] RCC § 22E-303 specifically provides jurisdiction for conspiracies formed within the District when the object of the conspiracy is engage in conduct outside of the District if the conduct would constitute a crime under D.C. Code.[88] District courts would therefore have jurisdiction over conspiracies to commit criminal restraint outside of the District. Omitting special jurisdiction language from the criminal restraint statute improves the law's clarity by omitting unnecessary language and making the offense more consistent with other offenses.

RCC § 22E-1403. Blackmail.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the blackmail offense for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The offense criminalizes compelling a person to act, or refrain from acting, by means of certain coercive threats. While some RCC crimes explicitly address commission by use of a coercive threat,[1] and many more RCC crimes may be committed by using a coercive threat,[2] the RCC blackmail statute is intended to criminalize various types of conduct that are not otherwise addressed. The revised blackmail statute does not apply to the use of coercive threats to make a complainant transfer, use, give control over, or allow the actor to damage property; to allow the actor to enter or remain on property; or to remain in or move to a particular location. and categorically excludes ordinary, legal employment actions. Due to its breadth, the social harm addressed by the blackmail statute overlaps with several other offenses that involve the use of coercive threats to compel a person to act or refrain from acting in a particular manner.[3] The general merger provision under RCC § 22E-214 applies to blackmail and these other offenses when they arise from the same act or course of conduct. The RCC blackmail statute also includes a defense that precludes criminal liability in certain cases where the defendant acted with a socially desirable purpose. The revised statute replaces the current blackmail statute in D.C. Code § 22-3252.

Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that blackmail requires that the accused purposely causes a person to engage in, or refrain from any act. This requires that the other person acts, or refrains from acting, in a way that the person would not have absent the accused's intervention. The subsection specifies that a "purposely" culpable mental state applies, which requires that the actor consciously desired that he or she would cause the other person to act, or refrain from acting. A threat that does not cause another person to act or refrain from acting, or an actor who does not consciously desire that the threat causes the complainant to engage in or refrain from an action, does not commit blackmail.

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies that the actor must have caused another person to act or refrain from acting by communicating, explicitly or implicitly, that any person will commit any of the acts listed in subparagraphs (a)(2)(A)-(G). The communication does not require any precise words; it may be bluntly spoken, or done by innuendo or suggestion.[4] The verb "communicates" is intended to be broadly construed, encompassing all speech[5] and other messages,[6] which includes gestures or other

[1] These RCC offenses include: extortion RCC § 22E-2301, forced labor RCC § 22E-1601; and sexual assault RCC § 22E-1301. Unlike extortion, which requires that the actor uses coercive threats to obtain property of another, blackmail broadly criminalizes the use of coercive means to compel a person to engage in or refrain from engaging in any conduct.

[2] These RCC offenses include criminal restraint, RCC § 22E-1402, and many other offenses that require conduct occur without the complainant's effective consent. The term "effective consent" includes consent obtained by means of a coercive threat.

[3] For example, sexual assault RCC § 22E-1301; forced labor, RCC § 22E-1601; forced commercial sex, RCC § 22E-1602.

[4] Griffin v. United States, 861 A.2d 610, 616 (D.C. 2004) (citing Clark v. United States, 755 A.2d 1026, 1030 (D.C. 2000)).

[5] The term "speech" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and means oral or written language, symbols, or gestures.

conduct,[7] that are received and understood by another person. Per the rule of interpretation under RCC § 22E-207, the "purposely" mental state also applies to this element. The actor must consciously desire that the other person would fear that if he or she does not conform his or her behavior to the actor's demands, then any person will resort to the coercive means listed in subparagraphs (a)(2)(A)-(D).

Subparagraph (a)(2)(A) specifies that blackmail includes threatening to take or withhold action as a public official, or to cause a public official to take or withhold action. This form of blackmail includes threats to cite someone for violation of a regulation, make an arrest, or deny the award of a government contract or permit.[8] The term "public official" is defined in RCC § 22E-701, and means a "a government employee, government contractor, law enforcement officer, or public official as defined in D.C. Code § 1-1161.01(47)."

Subparagraph (a)(2)(B) specifies that blackmail incudes threatening to accuse another person of a crime. Under this form of blackmail, it is immaterial whether the accusation is accurate.[9]

Subparagraph (a)(2)(C) specifies that blackmail includes threatening to expose a secret, publicize an asserted fact, or distribute a photograph, video or audio recording, regardless of the truth or authenticity of the secret, fact, or item, that tends to subject another person to, or perpetuate hatred, contempt, ridicule, or other significant injury to personal reputation, or a significant injury to credit or business reputation. This subparagraph does not require that the asserted secret or fact be true or false. Threats to reveal minimally embarrassing information would not suffice under this form of blackmail. This form of blackmail is intended to include threats to expose secrets or assert facts that would have traditionally constituted blackmail.[10] This form of blackmail also includes threats to expose secrets, assert facts, etc., that would tend to perpetuate hatred, contempt, ridicule, or other significant injury to personal reputation. A person who is already subject to hatred, contempt, and ridicule may still be the target of this form of threat.[11]

Subparagraph (a)(2)(D) specifies that blackmail includes threatening to significantly impair the reputation of a deceased person. This subparagraph does not

[6] A person may communicate through non-verbal conduct such as displaying a weapon. See State v. Murphy, 545 N.W.2d 909, 915 (Minn. 1996) ("Many physical acts considered in context communicate a terroristic threat. We may find our examples in the case law, such as drawing a finger across one's throat or discharging a firearm over the telephone; in the movies, such as boiling a rabbit on the stove in the tranquil setting of former paramour's new family home, or placing a severed horse's head in a bed; or as here, depositing dead animals at a residence or planting a fake bomb. Life is replete with such examples, and whatever the source, the principle is the same: physical acts communicate a threat that its originator will act according to its tenor." (Internal quotations omitted.)).

[7] For example, if a person consistently beats people who refuse to comply with his demands, this pattern of conduct may constitute a coercive threat when that person makes similar demands of others. In addition ongoing infliction of harm may constitute a communication, if it communicates that harm will continue in the future.

[8] In some cases, threatening to take official action may fall under the defense under subsection (d).

[9] However, when the actor believes the accusation is accurate, the defense under subsection (d) may apply.

[11] For example, even if it is well known that a person has engaged in numerous acts of infidelity, a threat to reveal an additional act of infidelity may still constitute blackmail under this paragraph.

include threats to impair a deceased person's reputation to a trivial degree. This form of blackmail is intended to include threats to expose secrets or assert facts that would have traditionally constituted blackmail.[12]

Subparagraph (a)(2)(E) specifies that blackmail includes threatening to notify a federal, state, or local government agency or official of, or to publicize, another person's immigration or citizenship status.

Subparagraph (a)(2)(F) specifies that blackmail includes threatening to restrict a person's access to a controlled substance that the person owns, or to prescription medication that the person owns. As this form of blackmail requires that the other person already owns the controlled substance or prescription medication, a threat to refuse to sell or provide a controlled substance or prescription medication does not constitute blackmail under this subparagraph.

Subparagraph (a)(2)(G) specifies that blackmail includes threatening that any other person will engage in conduct that constitutes a criminal offense against persons as defined in Subtitle II of Title 22E, or a property offense as defined in Subtitle III of Title 22E. This form of blackmail does not include threats to commit any other types of criminal offenses.[13] The use of "in fact" indicates that no culpable mental state is required as to whether the threatened conduct constitutes an offense against persons or a property offense. However, it must be proven that the actor threatened that a person would engage in conduct that satisfies all elements of an offense against persons or property offense, including any culpable mental states.

Subsection (b) establishes two exclusions to liability under this section. Paragraph (b)(1) specifies that threats of ordinary and legal employment or business actions are not a basis for liability under the subparagraph (a)(2)(C) of the blackmail statute. This exclusion recognizes that ordinary and legal employment and business relationships may involve threats to reveal embarrassing information in order to coerce another party to act or refrain from acting in a particular way[14], and such conduct does not constitute a crime under this section.[15]

Paragraph (b)(2) specifies that blackmail does not include causing a person to do any of the acts listed under subparagraphs (b)(2)(A)-(C). The blackmail offense provides broad liability for use of threats to compel a person to engage in any act, but is not intended to replace or add liability to those RCC offenses that already specifically address the use of threats to compel a person to act in a particular way.[16] Consequently, this paragraph eliminates liability under the revised blackmail statute when a more

[12] D.C. Code § 22-3252.

[13] For example, threatening to engage in disorderly conduct, a public order offense would not satisfy this element.

[14] For example, a manager may threaten to reveal an employee's malfeasance in the workplace to upper management unless the employee changes his behavior.

[15] Threats that go beyond ordinary and legal employment or business actions are subject to liability. For example, if a business owner threatens to reveal highly embarrassing personal information unless another business owner agrees to provide services for free, this exclusion to liability would not apply.

[16] For example, sexual assault specifically addresses the use of coercion to compel a person to engage in a sexual act or sexual contact. The revised criminal code's extortion RCC § 22E-2301 and forced labor RCC § 22E-1601 offenses also specifically address commission of those crimes by means of coercive threats.

narrowly-tailored RCC offense addresses the actor's conduct.[17] Subparagraph (b)(2)(A) excludes causing a person to transfer, use, give control over property, or to give consent to damage property. The term "use" is intended to include use of both tangible[18] and intangible property.[19] This subparagraph prevents extortion, robbery, criminal damage to property, and other offenses that involve taking, using, controlling, or damaging property[20] being prosecuted as blackmail. Subparagraph (b)(2)(B) excludes causing a person to remain in or move to a location. This subparagraph is intended to prevent conduct that constitutes criminal restraint or kidnapping from being prosecuted as blackmail.[21] Subparagraph (b)(2)(C) excludes causing a person to consent to another person entering or remaining in a location. This subparagraph is intended to prevent trespass or burglary from being prosecuted as blackmail.[22]

Subsection (c) provides three affirmative defenses to blackmail under particular circumstances, and specifies the burden of proof. RCC § 22E-201 specifies the burden of proof and production for all affirmative defenses in the RCC. Under RCC § 22E-201, the actor bears the burden of proving the elements of the defense by a preponderance of the evidence. Paragraph (c)(1) defines an affirmative defense that recognizes that criminal liability is not appropriate under certain circumstances when the actor causes a person to act or refrain from acting for certain benign purposes. The defense is only available to prosecutions under subparagraphs (a)(2)(A)-(F). The defense has two main components. First, under subparagraph (c)(1)(A), the actor must reasonably believe[23] that the accusation or assertion was true[24], that the official action was justified,[25] or that the [17] The harm in coercing a person to act is largely determined by the nature of the coerced act; coercing a person to engage in a sexual act is more wrongful than coercing a person to pay a small sum of money. The RCC recognizes this by defining various offenses based on the type of conduct that the complainant is coerced into performing. Sexual assault is a more serious offense than 5th degree extortion. Blackmail is a residual offense, which can include compelling a person to perform an act that could be quite harmful. When the RCC has specified particular coerced acts as warranting less severe penalties, such as 5th degree extortion, it would be inappropriate to convict the person for blackmail, which is intended to cover potentially much more harmful conduct.

[18] For example, using threats to cause a person to allow the actor to operate a motor vehicle would fall under this inclusion.

[19] For example, using threats to cause a person to allow a person to make copies of audio recordings would fall within this exception.

[20] Numerous property offenses can be committed by means of a coercive threat, and are intended to be excluded from the revised blackmail statute. These offenses include: unauthorized use of property, RCC § 22E-2102; unauthorized use of a motor vehicle, RCC § 22E-2103; unlawful creation or possession of a recording, RCC § 22E-2105; unlawful operation of a recording device in a motion picture theater, RCC § 22E-2106; payment card fraud, RCC § 22E-2202; identity theft, RCC § 22E-2205; financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult, RCC § 22E-2208; and criminal graffiti, RCC § 22E-2504.

[21] Criminal restraint and kidnapping both require that the actor substantially confines or moves the complainant. RCC §§ 22E-1401, 1402. The exclusion under this subparagraph applies even if the confinement or movement is not substantial.

[22] For example, if a person obtains consent to enter another person's property by threatening to reveal the property owner's humiliating secret, trespass liability would apply instead of blackmail.

[23] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist.

[24] An actor who threatened to accuse a person of a criminal offense believing that the person had not actually committed the offense would not be able to claim this defense.

photograph, video, or audio recording was authentic.[26] Second, under subparagraph (c)(1)(B) the actor must have acted with the purpose to compel another person to desist or refrain from criminal[27] or tortious activity[28], or behavior harmful to any person's physical mental health[29]; to take reasonable action related to the wrong that is the subsection of the accusation[30], assertion[31], or invocation of official action[32]; or to refrain from taking any action or responsibility that the defendant believes the other unqualified.[33] Although people often act with mixed motives, the defense is only available if the actor would not have acted absent one of the benign purposes listed in this subsection. If the actor coerces another person and inadvertently brings about one of the benign ends listed in this subsection, the defense is not available.

Paragraph (c)(2) defines the elements of an effective consent affirmative defense. RCC § 22E-201 specifies the burden of proof and production for all affirmative defenses in the RCC. Under RCC § 22E-201, the actor bears the burden of proving the elements of the defense by a preponderance of the evidence. This defense requires that the defendant reasonably believes[34] that the complainant gives effective consent to the conduct constituting the offense.[35] The term "effective consent" is defined in RCC §

[25] An actor who threatened to rescind a business license believing that rescinding the license was not actually warranted would not be able to claim this defense.

[26] An actor who threatened to publish a photograph that had been doctored to portray another person engaged in a sexually explicit act would not be able to claim this defense.

[27] For example, a passenger riding in a car with a drunk driver threatening to report the person's drunk driving to authorities unless he pulls over.

[28] For example, threatening to expose a person's embarrassing secret in order to prevent that person from committing the tort of intentional infliction of emotional distress.

[29] For example, threatening to reveal an embarrassing secret about another person in order to coerce that person into obtaining necessary emergency medical care.

[30] Whether an action is reasonably related to the wrong depends on the totality of the circumstances, including the nature of the harm sought to be addressed, the effort and cost imposed on the coerced person, and the availability of alternative means of addressing the wrong. For example, if a prosecutor threatens to charge a defendant with an additional criminal offense unless the defendant agrees to plead guilty to a separate charge, the threat of the additional charge may be reasonably related to the wrong that is the subject of the accusation. Even when the demanded action is clearly related to the subject of the wrong, the demand must still be reasonable. For example, threatening to accuse a person of theft unless that person returns the stolen property to its rightful owner may be reasonable. However, an unreasonable demand would include threatening to accuse another of theft unless the other person pays the original property owner an amount several times the value of the stolen property.

In addition, threatening to publish nude or sexually explicit photographs, videos, or audio recordings unless the person provides additional nude or sexually explicit photographs, videos or recordings would not satisfy this element of the defense.

[31] For example, threatening to reveal that a person has been having an extra-marital affair unless that person agrees to put an end to the affair.

[32] For example, a health inspector threatening to repeal a restaurant's license unless the owners bring their restaurant into compliance with health codes.

[33] For example, threatening to reveal prior corrupt acts of prospective political candidate unless that person declines to run for office.

[34] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist.

[35] This defense is most likely to arise when a complainant consents to another person using blackmail-type threats in order to prevent the complainant from succumbing to some form of temptation. For example, if a

Subsection (d) specifies relevant penalties for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.] Paragraph (d)(2) states that a person convicted under subparagraph (a)(2)(A) of the RCC blackmail offense shall not be subject to the abuse of government power penalty enhancement in RCC § 22E-610 for the same conduct.

Subsection (e) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC's revised blackmail statute replaces the blackmail statute in the current D.C. Code.[36] The revised blackmail statute makes five substantive changes to current District law that improve the clarity and proportionality of the code, fills gaps in the current code, and clearly describe all elements that must be proven, including culpable mental states.

First, the revised blackmail offense requires that the actor actually compels another person to engage in, or refrain from, any act. The current blackmail offense only requires threats with intent to cause another to do or refrain from doing any act.[37] By contrast, the revised offense requires that the accused actually succeed in compelling another person to act or refrain from acting.[38] Requiring that the defendant actually compel another person to act or refrain from acting improves the proportionality of the RCC, and is consistent with the RCC's extortion offense,[39] which requires that the defendant actually takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over property of another.

Second, the revised blackmail offense changes the scope of threats as compared to the current blackmail statute. The current blackmail statute includes threats to accuse any person of a crime; to expose a secret or publicize an asserted fact tending to subject any person to hatred, contempt, or ridicule; to impair the reputation of any person, including a deceased person; to distribute a photograph, video, or audio recording tending to subject another person to hatred contempt, ridicule, embarrassment, or other injury to reputation; or to notify a federal, state, or local government agency or official of, or publicize, another person's immigration or citizenship status.[40] By contrast, the revised blackmail offense also includes four additional threats: (1) to commit an offense against persons as defined in subtitle II of Title 22E, or a property offense as defined in subtitle III of Title 22E; (2) to assert a fact about another person that would tend to impair that person's credit or business repute; (3) to take or withhold action as an official; or (4) to restrict a person's access to a controlled substance that the person owns, or restrict a person's access to prescription medication that the person owns. This change closes a gap in current District law, and makes the revised blackmail offense more consistent with the revised extortion offense.[41]

Third, the revised blackmail offense excludes liability when the actor's threats constituted normal and legal employment or business practices. The current D.C. Code blackmail statute does not include an exclusion for ordinary and legal employment or businesses practices, and there is no District case law on point. By contrast, the revised blackmail statute excludes threats that are part of ordinary and legal employment or business practices and involve threats to reveal embarrassing information in order to coerce another party to act or refrain from acting in a particular way.[42] Such conduct may have social benefits and criminalization would be inappropriate.[43] This change improves the proportionality of the revised statutes.

Fourth, the revised blackmail offense recognizes three exclusions to liability for conduct covered more specifically by other revised offenses. First, the revised offense does not include use of threats to cause a person to transfer, use, give control over, or consent to damage property. The current D.C. Code blackmail statute includes the use of various types of threats to obtain property of another, or to cause a person to do any act, and potentially overlaps with the several other D.C. Code offenses such as extortion and robbery.[44] Similarly, the revised blackmail statute also overlaps with numerous property offenses.[45] By contrast, to address this overlap, the revised blackmail statute excludes uses of threats to cause a person to transfer, use, give control over, or consent to damage [41] RCC § 22E-2301. The revised extortion statute covers obtaining property of another by means of a "coercive threat," a defined term which includes several types of threats. The revised blackmail offense includes all types of threats included in the definition of "coercive threat," except for the catch-all provision, which includes any threats to "cause any harm that is sufficiently serious, under all the surrounding circumstances, to compel a reasonable person of the same background and in the same circumstances as the complainant to comply." RCC § 22E-701. The revised blackmail statute does not include a catch-all provision, because blackmail includes compelling a person to commit or refrain from any act. Including a catch-all provision in the revised blackmail statute would be overbroad and criminalize minor negotiations that are part of everyday life.

[42] For example, a manager may threaten to reveal an employee's malfeasance in the workplace to upper management unless the employee changes his behavior.

[43] Threats that go beyond ordinary and legal employment or business actions are subject to liability. For example, if a business owner threatens to reveal highly embarrassing personal information unless another business owner agrees to provide services for free, this exclusion to liability would not apply.

[44] Numerous property offenses in the current D.C. Code criminalize taking or using property without consent. These offenses may include taking or using property when the consent was obtained by one of the threats enumerated in the current blackmail statute. For example, the current unauthorized use of a motor vehicle offense may include compelling a person to grant permission to use an automobile by threatening to reveal an embarrassing secret about that person. Other similar current offenses that may overlap with the current blackmail statute include: credit card fraud, D.C. Code § 22-3223; identity theft, unlawful operation of a recording device in a motion picture theater, D.C. Code § 22–3214.02; financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult or elderly person, D.C. Code § 22-933.01.

[45] Numerous property offenses can be committed by means of a coercive threat, and are intended to be excluded from the revised blackmail statute. These offenses include: unauthorized use of property, RCC § 22E-2102; unauthorized use of a motor vehicle, RCC § 22E-2103; unlawful creation or possession of a recording, RCC § 22E-2105; unlawful operation of a recording device in a motion picture theater, RCC § 22E-2106; payment card fraud, RCC § 22E-2202; identity theft, RCC § 22E-2205; financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult, RCC § 22E-2208; and criminal graffiti, RCC § 22E-2504.

property.[46] This limitation on liability prevents multiple convictions for offenses addressing the same social harm. Second, the revised offense excludes causing a person to remain in or move to a location. The current D.C. Code blackmail statute does not include this limitation, and there is no District case law on point. The current blackmail potentially overlaps with the D.C. Code kidnapping offenses.[47] By contrast, the revised statute includes this limitation to prevent the less serious offense of criminal restraint from being charged as blackmail. Third, the revised offense excludes causing another person to consent to allow a person to enter or remain in a location.[48] The current blackmail statute does not include this limitation. By contrast, the revised statute includes this limitation to prevent the less serious offense of trespass from being charged as blackmail. These exclusions to liability address overlap between the revised blackmail offense and other lesser offenses, and improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised criminal code.

Fifth, the revised blackmail offense includes a defense that the actor believed the accusation, assertion, or secret to be true, and acted with certain benign purposes. The current blackmail statute does not include any defenses, and there is no relevant D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) case law. By contrast, the revised blackmail offense includes a defense, which allows an actor to use certain threats to compel another person to act or refrain from acting in cases when criminal liability would be inappropriate. This revision improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised criminal code.

Beyond these five main changes to current District law, four other aspects of the revised blackmail statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised blackmail offense requires a culpable mental state of purpose. The current blackmail statute does not specify a culpable mental state as to threatening another, but requires that the actor did so "with intent to obtain property of another or to cause another to do or refrain from doing any act."[49] The term "intent" as used in the current statute is not defined, and there is no relevant DCCA case law. To resolve this ambiguity, the revised statute applies the RCC standardized definition of "purposely." Applying at least a knowing culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American [46] Many other property offenses may overlap with blackmail. For example, using a coercive threat to compel a person to consent to use copy a sound recording could constitute unlawful creation or possession of a recording under RCC § 22E-2105.

[47] The current blackmail statute criminalizes causing a person to engage in, or refrain from, any act, by use of certain enumerated threats. The current kidnapping statute includes "seizing, confining, inveigling, enticing, decoying, kidnapping, abducting, concealing, or carrying away any individual by any means whatsoever[.]" It is possible that confining a person under threat of revealing a deeply embarrassing secret would constitute both kidnapping and blackmail under the current D.C. Code.

[48] The current blackmail statute criminalizes causing a person to engage in, or refrain from, any act, by use of certain enumerated threats. The current unlawful entry offense criminalizes entering property "without lawful authority[.]" Entering property with consent obtained by threat could constitute entering "without lawful authority," creating overlap between the current blackmail and unlawful entry statutes.

jurisprudence.[50] Using the purposeful culpable mental state is justified due to the breadth of the revised blackmail statute, which includes causing a person to do, or refrain from doing, any act. Since people routinely, and legally, engage in threatening behavior in everyday life, not desiring to cause fear but knowing the behavior will do so,[51] criminalization would be inappropriate. However, requiring only a knowing mental state would criminalize a broad array of cases in which the actor merely knew that, due to the otherwise legal threat, another person would react in some manner.[52] Requiring a purposeful mental state improves the proportionality of the revised criminal code.

Second, the revised blackmail offense includes threats that any person will engage in the conduct specified in subparagraphs (a)(2)(A)-(G). The current blackmail statute does not specify whether it includes threats that another person will carry out the threatened conduct, and there is no DCCA case law on point. Specifying that blackmail includes threats that any person will carry out the threatened conduct improves the clarity of the revised criminal code, and make the offense consistent with the revised extortion statute.[53]

Third the revised blackmail statute, through application of the general merger provision under RCC § 22E-214, prevents multiple convictions for blackmail and other offenses that address more specific instances of coercive threats causing harms, or address the same basic social harm. The current D.C. Code does not include a general merger provision, and the DCCA has held that offenses merge if the elements of one offense are necessarily included in the elements of the other offense.[54] There is no District case law that squarely addresses whether blackmail merges with other overlapping offenses, however in dicta the DCCA has suggested that a person may be convicted of both blackmail and a separate offense that involves blackmail.[55] Resolving this ambiguity, the RCC general merger provision provides that multiple convictions for 2 or more offenses arising from the same act or course of conduct merge whenever one offense is "defined to prohibit a designated kind of conduct generally, and the other is defined to prohibit a specific instance of such conduct,"[56] or when "one offense reasonably accounts for the other offense given the harm or wrong, culpability, and

[50] See, Elonis v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2001, 2009 (2015) ("[O]ur cases have explained that a defendant generally must 'know the facts that make his conduct fit the definition of the offense,' even if he does not know that those facts give rise to a crime. (Internal citation omitted)").

[51] For example, telling someone that if they don't stop illegal conduct they will be reported the activity to the police may be perceived as a threat, but the purpose is to cause a person to cease further criminal activity.

[52] For example, it is legal to threaten to accuse a person of a crime. In most cases a person making such a threat will know that the other person will act in some manner that he or she would not have absent the threat. However, this knowledge alone should not create criminal liability. Only when the person makes the threat with the purpose of causing the other person to act is criminal liability justified.

[53] RCC § 22E-2301. The revised extortion statute criminalizes taking property of another by means of a "coercive threat." The term "coercive threat" is defined as a threat that "any person" will engage in one of the enumerated types of conduct. RCC § 22E-701.

[55] See, Hall v. United States, 343 A.2d 35, 39 (D.C. 1975) (holding that convictions for simple assault and obstructing justice do not merge, because it is possible to commit obstructing justice without necessarily committing a simple assault. The DCCA noted that "acts such as blackmail and unfulfilled threats of violence could support an obstructing justice charge.").

[56] RCC § 22E-214 (a)(2)(C).

penalty proscribed by each[.]"[57] Numerous offenses in the RCC criminalize use of coercive threats to compel another person to act in specific manner. For example, sexual assault[58] criminalizes compelling a person to engage in or submit to a sexual act or contact; forced labor[59] criminalizes compelling a person to perform labor or services, and forced commercial sex[60] criminalizes compelling a person to engage in commercial sex acts. In most cases, a person who commits these offenses will also satisfy the elements of blackmail.[61] If the other offense and blackmail arise from the same act or course of conduct, the offenses will merge as provided in RCC § 22E-214. Other offenses criminalize use of coercion to compel a person to act in a specific manner, whereas blackmail more broadly criminalizes compelling a person to engage in, or refrain from, any act. The authorized penalties for these offenses reflect the relative seriousness of being coerced to engage in the specific acts required for each offense.[62] It would be disproportionately severe for an actor to be convicted of both the separate offense and blackmail based on the same act or course of conduct. This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised criminal code.

Fourth, the revised blackmail offense includes an affirmative effective consent defense. The current blackmail statute does not specify any defenses, and there is no relevant DCCA case law on whether a person a person may consent to be threatened in such a manner. To resolve this ambiguity, the revised blackmail offense includes an affirmative defense that the complainant effectively consented to the conduct constituting the offense. While it may be highly unusual for a person to give effective consent to another to cause them to engage in an act by the specified types of communication, should such effective consent exist it would negate the harm the blackmail offense is intended to address. This revision improves the clarity and the proportionality of the revised offense.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

[57] RCC § 22E-214 (a)(4).
[58] RCC § 22E-1301.
[59] RCC § 22E-1601.
[60] RCC § 22E-1602.
[61] It is possible to commit these offenses without satisfying the elements of blackmail, and therefore the offenses do not merge under a strict Blockburger elements test under current DCCA case law and codified in RCC § 22E213 (a)(1). Each of these offenses includes the use of a "coercive threat." The term "coercive threat" is defined in RCC § 22E-701, and includes threats to "cause harm that is sufficiently serious, under all the surrounding circumstances, to compel a reasonable person of the same background and in the same circumstances as the complainant to comply." This catch-all provision in the "coercive threat" definition is not included in the blackmail statute. A person committing these offenses using a threat that satisfies the catch-all, but not the threats specified in the blackmail statute, would not be guilty of blackmail.
[62] For example, forced commercial sex and criminal restraint may both be committed using identical threats. However, the penalties for forced commercial sex are significantly higher than for criminal restraint, due to the particular harmfulness of coercing someone into engaging in commercial sex acts.

RCC § 22E-1501. Criminal Abuse of a Minor.

Explanatory Note. The RCC criminal abuse of a minor offense proscribes a broad range of conduct in which there is harm to a minor's bodily integrity or mental well-being, including conduct that constitutes fourth degree assault, criminal threats, offensive physical contact, criminal restraint, stalking, or electronic stalking as those crimes are defined in the RCC.[1] The penalty gradations are primarily based on the degree of bodily harm or mental harm. Along with the revised criminal neglect of a minor offense,[2] the revised criminal abuse of a minor offense replaces the child cruelty offense[3] and the failure to provide for a child offense[4] in the current D.C. Code. Insofar as it is applicable to the current child cruelty offense, the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute also replaces the current enhancement for certain crimes committed against minors.[5]

There are three degrees of the RCC criminal abuse of a minor statute. Each gradation requires that the accused is "reckless" as to the fact that he or she has a "responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant"[6] (paragraph (a)(1) and subparagraph (a)(1)(A) for first degree, paragraph (b)(1) and subparagraph (b)(1)(A) for second degree, and paragraph (c)(1) and subparagraph (c)(1)(A)) for third degree). Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "reckless" culpable mental state specified in paragraph (a)(1) for first degree, paragraph (b)(1) for second degree, and paragraph (c)(1)) for third degree, applies to the fact that the complainant has the specified responsibility to the complainant in subparagraph (a)(1)(A) for first degree, subparagraph (b)(1)(A) for second degree, and subparagraph (c)(1)(A)) for third degree). "Reckless" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the accused must consciously disregard a substantial risk that he or she has a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant.

Each gradation of the offense further requires that the accused is "reckless" as to the fact that the complainant is under the age of 18 years. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "reckless" culpable mental state specified in paragraph (a)(1) for first degree, paragraph (b)(1) for second degree, and paragraph (c)(1)) for third degree, applies to the fact that the complainant is under 18 years of age in subparagraph (a)(1)(B) for first degree, subparagraph (b)(1)(B) for second degree, and subparagraph (c)(1)(B)) for third degree). "Reckless" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the accused must consciously disregard a substantial risk that the complainant is under the age of 18 years.

Paragraph (a)(2) and subparagraphs (a)(2)(A) and (a)(2)(B) specify the two types of prohibited conduct in first degree criminal abuse of a minor, the highest grade of the revised offense.

[6] Such a duty of care to the complainant may arise, for example, from the actor being a parent, guardian, teacher, doctor, daycare provider, or babysitter, depending on the facts of a case.

Subparagraph (a)(2)(A) establishes liability for causing "serious mental injury," a term defined in RCC § 22E-701 as "substantial, prolonged harm to a person's psychological or intellectual functioning," to the complainant. Subparagraph (a)(2)(A) specifies that the culpable mental state for causing "serious mental injury" to the complainant is "purposely," a term defined in RCC § 22E-206 to here mean the accused must consciously desire that his or her conduct causes "serious mental injury" to the complainant. Subparagraph (a)(2)(B) establishes liability causing "serious bodily injury," a term defined in RCC § 22E-701 as injury involving a substantial risk of death, or protracted and obvious disfigurement, or protracted loss or impairment of the function of a bodily member or organ, or protracted unconsciousness, to the complainant. Subparagraph (a)(2)(B) specifies that the culpable mental state for causing "serious bodily injury" to the complainant is "recklessly," a term defined in RCC § 22E-206 that here means being aware of a substantial risk that one's conduct will cause serious bodily injury to the complainant.

Paragraph (b)(2) specifies the prohibited conduct for second degree of the criminal abuse of a minor statute—causing "significant bodily injury." "Significant bodily injury" is the intermediate level of bodily injury in the RCC and is defined in RCC § 22E-701 as an injury that requires hospitalization or immediate medical treatment, or is a specific type of injury, such as a fracture of a bone. Per the rule of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "recklessly" culpable mental state in paragraph (b)(1) applies to the elements in paragraph (b)(2). "Recklessly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the accused is aware of a substantial risk that he or she will cause "significant bodily injury" to the complainant.

Paragraph (c)(2) and subparagraphs (c)(2)(A) and (c)(2)(B) specify the two types of prohibited conduct for third degree criminal abuse of a minor, the lowest grade of the revised offense. Paragraph (c)(2) and subparagraph (c)(2)(A) establish liability for causing "serious mental injury," a term defined in RCC § 22E-701 as "substantial, prolonged harm to a person's psychological or intellectual functioning," to the complainant. Per the rule of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "recklessly" culpable mental state in paragraph (c)(1) applies to the elements in subparagraph (c)(2)(A). "Recklessly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the accused is aware of a substantial risk that he or she will cause "serious mental injury" to the complainant.

Paragraph (c)(2) and subparagraph (c)(2)(B) establish liability for the final type of liability in third degree criminal abuse of a minor—the accused must, "in fact," commit a "predicate offense against persons" against the complainant. "Predicate offense against persons" is defined in paragraph (e)(2) as the RCC offenses of fourth degree assault (RCC § 22E-1202(d)), criminal threats (RCC § 22E-1204), offensive physical contact (RCC § 22E-1205), criminal restraint (RCC § 22E-1404), stalking (RCC § 22E-1801), and electronic stalking (RCC § 22E-1802). "In fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to given element, here whether the accused committed one of the specified offenses. The use of "in fact" does not change the culpable mental states required in the specified offenses.

Subsection (d) codifies an exclusion from liability for criminal abuse of a minor. The general provision in RCC § 22E-201 establishes the burdens of proof and production for all exclusions from liability in the RCC. The actor does not commit an offense under the revised statute when, in fact, the actor's conduct is specifically permitted by a District statute or regulation. Subsection (d) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element, here that the actor's conduct is specifically permitted by a District statute or regulation. For example, Title 22, Health, of the current D.C. Municipal Regulations, has regulations that will satisfy the exclusion from liability.[7]

Subsection (e) codifies an affirmative defense to the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute. The general provision in RCC § 22E-201 establishes the burdens of proof and production for all affirmative defenses in the RCC. The affirmative defense is limited to subsection (b)—causing "significant bodily injury," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701—and subsection (c)—causing "serious mental injury," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701, or engaging in a specified "RCC predicate offense against persons," defined in paragraph (g)(2) of the revised statute, such as fourth degree assault or criminal restraint. An actor that commits a predicate offense against persons, but does not have liability for criminal abuse of a minor due to a successful affirmative defense, would still have liability for the predicate offense against persons if the requirements of that offense are met.

The defense has two requirements. First, per paragraph (e)(1), the actor must not be "a person with legal authority over the complainant," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701. As specified by use of "in fact" in subsection (e), no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to the fact that the actor is not "a person with legal authority over the complainant." When the complainant is under the age of 18 years, RCC § 22E-701 defines a "person with legal authority over the complainant" as the "parent, or a person acting in the place of a parent under civil law, who is responsible for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant, or someone acting with the effective consent of such a parent or such a person." "Person acting in the place of a parent under civil law" is further defined in RCC § 22E-701.

The effect of paragraph (e)(1) is that an actor who is "a person with legal authority over the complainant," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701, does not have this effective consent defense.[8] However, such an actor may have a defense under either the parental or guardian defenses in RCC § 22E-408, which provide expansive defenses for specified parents and guardians and those acting with the effective consent of such a parent or guardian.[9]

[7] For example, D.C. Mun. Regs. tit. 22-B, § 602.4 states:

> Any minor who is examined, treated, hospitalized, or receives health services under this chapter may give legal consent, and no person who administers the health services shall be liable civilly or criminally for assault, battery, or assault and battery; or any other civil legal charge, except for negligence or intentional harm in the diagnosis and treatment rendered to the minor and for violations of the D.C. Mental Health Information Act of 1978.

[8] The defense under paragraph (e)(1) is not available to an actor that is a "person with legal authority over the complainant" and there is no general effective consent defense in the RCC.

[9] These defenses have different requirements than the effective consent defense in subsection (e). For example, both the parental and guardian defenses in RCC § 22E-408 require that the actor's conduct be reasonable.

The second requirement for the defense is in paragraph (e)(2). The actor must reasonably believe[10] that a "person with legal authority over the complainant," acting consistent with that authority, would give "effective consent" to the conduct constituting the offense under subsection (b) or subsection (c). The defense applies if the actor has not communicated with a person with legal authority over the complainant, but reasonably believes that such a person, acting consistent with that authority, would effectively consent to the conduct. The determination of whether the actor reasonably believed that a person with legal authority over the complainant, acting consistent with that authority, would have effectively consented is a fact-specific inquiry. The complainant's age, the nature of and motivation for the conduct, and any other relevant circumstances may be taken into account. The "in fact" specified in subsection (e) applies to paragraph (e)(2) and no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to paragraph (e)(2). It is not necessary to prove that the actor desired or was practically certain that a person with legal authority over the complainant, acting consistent with that authority, would give effective consent to the conduct constituting the offense. However, the actor must subjectively believe, and that belief must be reasonable, that a person with legal authority over the complainant, acting consistent with that authority, would give effective consent to the conduct constituting the offense. Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[11] There is no effective consent defense under paragraph (e)(2) when the actor makes an unreasonable mistake as to whether a person with legal authority over the complainant, acting consistent with that authority, would give effective consent to the conduct constituting the offense.

Subsection (f) specifies relevant penalties for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (g) codifies a definition of "predicate offense against persons" for the offense and cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised criminal abuse of a minor statute clearly changes current District law in five main ways.

First, the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute does not criminalize as a completed offense conduct that does not actually harm the complainant. The current second degree child cruelty statute criminalizes not only actual "maltreatment" of a complainant, but also causing a "grave risk of bodily injury," without any distinction in penalty.[12] In contrast, the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute does not criminalize as a completed offense mere risk creation. Conduct that results in a risk of serious bodily injury, death, significant bodily injury, serious mental injury, or bodily injury from consumption of a controlled substance or alcohol is criminalized by the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1502). The RCC criminal neglect of a minor statute does not include any other risk of "bodily injury" because, given the RCC definition of "bodily injury," this may criminalize the risk of comparatively trivial harms that are part of everyday life, such as allowing a child to play on playground monkey bars. However, conduct that results in a risk of physical or mental harm, including "bodily injury," may also constitute attempted criminal abuse of a minor. This change improves the organization, clarity, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Second, the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute partially grades the offense based on whether the defendant "purposely" or "recklessly" caused "serious mental injury." The current District child cruelty statute is silent as to whether the offense covers purely psychological harms.[13] However, DCCA case law is clear that the current child cruelty statute extends at least to serious psychological harm.[14] Moreover, the current child cruelty statute provides for the same penalties whether such harm was inflicted "intentionally, knowingly, or recklessly."[15] In contrast, the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute specifically prohibits "serious mental injury," as defined in RCC § 22E-701. There are two gradations for "serious mental injury" in the revised statute depending on the culpable mental state—purposely causing "serious mental injury" in first degree criminal abuse of a minor and recklessly causing "serious mental injury" in third degree criminal abuse of a minor. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Third, the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute limits liability to a person that is reckless as to the fact that that he or she has a "responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant." The current child cruelty statute requires that the complainant be under 18 years of age,[16] but does not state any requirements for the defendant's relationship to the complainant. As a result, the current statute significantly overlaps with the District's current assault statutes,[17] which are also subject to separate enhancements for harming a minor.[18] In contrast, the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute limits liability to a person that is reckless as to the fact that he or she has a "responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant." This change narrows the scope of liability for the offense to those persons with a duty of care to the complainant (e.g., a parent, guardian, teacher, doctor, daycare provider, or babysitter may be liable for the offense). The revised criminal abuse of a minor offense thus provides a distinct charge for individuals with responsibilities under civil law for complainants under the age of 18 years and who harm those they are supposed to protect. The revised offense still overlaps in many respects with assault and other offenses that are predicates for third degree criminal abuse of a minor, but only for persons with a duty of care to the complainant they harm.[19] Individuals who do not satisfy this requirement may still have liability under other revised offenses, such as assault (RCC § 22E-1202), criminal threats (RCC § 22E-1204), criminal restraint (RCC § 22E-1404), or offensive physical contact (RCC § 22E-1205). This change reduces unnecessary overlap between the revised statute and other RCC offenses against persons, including assault.

[14] The DCCA has stated that "an attempt to inflict mental or emotional pain or suffering upon a child, if sufficiently extreme or unreasonable, constitutes attempted second-degree cruelty to children" and that "maltreats" in first degree child cruelty "cannot reasonably be read as embracing only physical maltreatment." Alfaro v. United States, 859 A.2d 149, 153-54, 157. The DCCA has further stated that "the infliction of psychological harm can contravene a criminal statute prohibiting cruelty to children, but the harm must be serious and 'unjustifiable' rather than mild or trivial." Alfaro, 859 A.2d at 159 (agreeing with the analysis of the Supreme Court of Louisiana of a Louisiana child abuse statute).

Fourth, the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute is not subject to a separate penalty enhancement as a crime committed against a minor. Under current District law, first degree child cruelty is subject to a penalty enhancement if the defendant is 18 years of age or older and is at least two years older than a complainant under the age of 18 years.[20] There is no case law interpreting this enhancement as applied to child cruelty.[21] The current child cruelty statute and the penalty enhancement significantly overlap, effectively allowing a substantial increase in penalties for the same conduct whenever the actor is an adult. In contrast, the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute does not provide an enhancement based on the complainant's status as a minor. This change improves the proportionality of the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute, and reduces unnecessary overlap.

Fifth, the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute is not subject to a separate penalty enhancement for committing the offense "while armed" or "having readily available" a dangerous weapon, and does not grade the offense by the use or display of a weapon. Current D.C. Code § 22-4502 provides severe, additional penalties for committing, attempting, soliciting, or conspiring to commit an array of serious crimes, [19] Under the general merger provision in RCC § 22E-214, the predicate offenses for third degree criminal abuse of a minor are intended to merge into a conviction for criminal abuse of a minor when arising from the same course of conduct.

[20] D.C. Code § 22-3611. The enhancement refers to a "minor" instead of a "child," but defines a "minor" as a person under the age of 18. D.C. Code § 22-3611(c)(3). Under the enhancement, the defendant "may" receive a fine of up to 1½ times the maximum fine for first degree child cruelty, a term of imprisonment of up to 1½ times the maximum term of imprisonment for first degree child cruelty, or both. D.C. Code § 22-3611(a).

[21] However, the DCCA has declined to allow enhancement of another offense where the enhancement concerns an element in the underlying offense. The DCCA has held that the "while armed" enhancement in D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(1) may not apply to the offense of assault with a dangerous weapon because the offense already provides for an enhancement. McCall v. United States, 449 A.2d 1095, 1096 (D.C. 1982) ("The government concedes that [the "while armed" enhancement in D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(1)] may not apply to [assault with a dangerous weapon] since [the assault with a dangerous weapon offense] provides for enhancement and is a more specific and lenient provision."). Similarly, it could be argued that the enhancement for crimes against a minor enhances a crime which is already enhanced due to the complainant being under 18 years of age.

including first degree child cruelty, "while armed with" or "having readily available" a dangerous weapon.[22] In contrast, the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute does not grade the offense based on the use or display of a dangerous weapon, and is not subject to a separate while armed weapons enhancement. The focus of the offense is on the betrayal of trust to the victim and the harm suffered by the minor. Use or display of a dangerous weapon to commit conduct that satisfies the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute may be chargeable under another RCC offense against persons, such as the RCC assault statute (RCC § 22E-1202). Or, an individual who possesses a dangerous weapon while committing criminal abuse of a minor may be subject to liability for possessing a dangerous weapon in furtherance of a crime of violence per RCC § 22E-4104. This change improves the proportionality of the revised statute.

Beyond these five changes to current District law, eight other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute specifically bases liability on "serious mental injury," a term defined in RCC § 22E-701. The current District child cruelty statute is silent as to whether it includes psychological harm.[23] DCCA case law is clear that the current child cruelty statute extends to at least serious psychological injury,[24] but the court has not articulated a precise definition of the required harm. Resolving this ambiguity, RCC § 22E-701 defines "serious mental injury" as "substantial, prolonged harm to a person's psychological or intellectual functioning, which may be exhibited by severe anxiety, depression, withdrawal, or outwardly aggressive behavior, or a combination of those behaviors, and which may be demonstrated by a change in behavior, emotional response, or cognition." The RCC definition of "serious mental injury" differs from the definition of "mental injury" in the District's current civil statutes for proceedings on child delinquency, neglect, or need of supervision[25] by adding the requirement that the harm be "substantial" and "prolonged."

[22] For a first offense of committing specified crimes of violence "while armed with or having readily available" a dangerous weapon, the defendant "may" receive a maximum term of imprisonment of up to 30 years. D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(1). If the defendant committed the offense "while armed with any pistol or firearm," however, he or she "shall" receive a five year "mandatory-minimum" term of imprisonment of not less than 5 years. D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(1). If the current conviction is for committing a specified crime of violence "while armed with or having readily available" a dangerous weapon and the defendant has at least one prior conviction for an armed crime of violence, the defendant "shall" be sentenced to "not less than 5 years" imprisonment and not more than 30 years. D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(2). If the current conviction is for committing a specified crime of violence "while armed with any pistol or firearm" and the defendant has the required prior conviction for an armed crime of violence, the defendant "shall" be "imprisoned for a mandatory-minimum term of not less than 10 years." D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(2).

[23] D.C. Code § 22-1101.

[24] The DCCA has stated that "an attempt to inflict mental or emotional pain or suffering upon a child, if sufficiently extreme or unreasonable, constitutes attempted second-degree cruelty to children" and that "maltreats" in first degree child cruelty "cannot reasonably be read as embracing only physical maltreatment." Alfaro, 859 A.2d at 153-54, 157. The DCCA has further stated that "the infliction of psychological harm can contravene a criminal statute prohibiting cruelty to children, but the harm must be serious and 'unjustifiable' rather than mild or trivial." Alfaro, 859 A.2d at 159 (agreeing with the analysis of the Supreme Court of Louisiana of a Louisiana child abuse statute).

[25] D.C. Code § 16-2301(31) ("The term 'mental injury' means harm to a child's psychological or intellectual functioning, which may be exhibited by severe anxiety, depression, withdrawal, or outwardly

These requirements reflect DCCA case law supporting a high standard for psychological harm for child cruelty,[26] but given the imprecision of current case law it is unclear what change, if any, the definition will have on current District law. This change improves the clarity and completeness of the revised statute.

Second, the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute prohibits committing stalking (RCC § 22E-1801), electronic stalking (RCC § 22E-1802), criminal threats (RCC § 22E-1204), or criminal restraint (RCC § 22E-1404) against the complainant. The current District child cruelty statute is silent as to whether it includes psychological harm. DCCA case law is clear that the current child cruelty statute extends to at least serious psychological injury,[27] but the court has not articulated a precise definition of the required harm. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised statute reflects current case law by including "serious mental injury" in first degree and third degree criminal abuse of a minor, and by providing liability for separately codified criminal conduct that may cause psychological harms in third degree criminal abuse of a minor. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and completeness of the revised statute.

Third, the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute requires a culpable mental state of "reckless" as to the fact that the complainant is under the age of 18 years. The current child cruelty statute does not specify what culpable mental state, if any, applies to the fact that the complaining witness is a "child." There is no DCCA case law discussing the culpable mental state for this element. However, under the current penalty enhancement for certain crimes against minors, including first degree child cruelty, it is an affirmative defense that "the accused reasonably believed that the victim was not a [person under 18 years old] at the time of the offense."[28] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute requires a culpable mental state of "reckless" as to the fact that the complainant is under the age of 18 years. The "reckless" culpable mental state in the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute preserves the substance of this defense.[29] This change improves the clarity, completeness, and proportionality of the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute.

aggressive behavior, or a combination of those behaviors, and which may be demonstrated by a change in behavior, emotional response, or cognition.").

[26] The DCCA has stated that "an attempt to inflict mental or emotional pain or suffering upon a child, if sufficiently extreme or unreasonable, constitutes attempted second-degree cruelty to children" and that "maltreats" in first degree child cruelty "cannot reasonably be read as embracing only physical maltreatment." Alfaro v. United States, 859 A.2d 149, 153-54, 157. The DCCA has further stated that "the infliction of psychological harm can contravene a criminal statute prohibiting cruelty to children, but the harm must be serious and 'unjustifiable' rather than mild or trivial." Alfaro, 859 A.2d at 159 (agreeing with the analysis of the Supreme Court of Louisiana of a Louisiana child abuse statute).

[28] D.C. Code § 22-3611(b).

[29] "Reckless" is defined in RCC § 22E-206 and means that the accused must consciously disregard a substantial risk that the complainant was under 18. The enhancement for crimes against minors has an affirmative defense that "the accused reasonably believed that the victim was not a minor at the time of the Fourth, the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute specifies the types of physical injury that are a basis for liability. The current first degree child cruelty statute prohibits, in part, "tortures,"[30] "beats,"[31] "maltreats,"[32] and "causes bodily injury,"[33] and second degree child cruelty prohibits, in part, "maltreats."[34] The current statute does not define these terms, however. DCCA case law suggests that "bodily injury" in the child cruelty statute is a relatively low threshold,[35] but the required amount of physical harm is unclear. Similarly, the DCCA has not determined the required amount of physical harm for "tortures," "beats," or "maltreats."[36] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute specifies the minimal degree of physical harm required for each grade of the offense. For first degree, the minimal degree of physical harm required is "serious bodily injury," and for second degree, it is "significant bodily injury." For third degree, the minimal degree of physical harm required is either "bodily injury," as required by fourth degree assault, or conduct that satisfies offensive physical contact (RCC § 22E-1205) or criminal restraint (RCC § 22E-1404). The specified types of "bodily injury" in the revised statute are defined in RCC § 22E-701 and are intended to cover conduct prohibited by the words "tortures," "beats," "maltreats," and "causes bodily injury" in the current child cruelty statute. The RCC definition of "bodily injury" in RCC § 22E-701 ("physical pain, physical injury, illness, or impairment of physical condition") in particular, accords with the limited DCCA case law on "bodily injury" in the current child cruelty statute.[37] Use of the defined term "bodily injury" clarifies that not only physical contacts that result in pain are criminal under the RCC criminal abuse of a minor statute, but also potentially painless harms such as sickness[38] or impaired offense." D.C. Code § 22-3611(b). If an accused reasonably believed that the complaining witness was not a minor, the accused would not satisfy the culpable mental state of recklessness as to the age of the complaining witness because the accused would not consciously disregard a substantial risk that the complainant was under 18 years of age. See RCC § 22E-208(b)(3) and accompanying commentary, providing that a reasonable mistake as to a circumstance element negates the existence of recklessness as to that element.

[35] See, e.g., Jones v. United States, 67 A.3d 547, 548, 550 (finding the evidence sufficient for second degree child cruelty when the child sustained a "large raised bump on her head.").

[36] The DCCA has extensively discussed "maltreats" in terms of incorporating serious psychological or emotional harm, but not the required physical harm. Alfaro v. United States, 859 A.2d 149, 157-60 (D.C. 2004).

[37] See, e.g., Jones v. United States, 67 A.3d 547, 548, 550 (finding the evidence sufficient for second degree child cruelty when the child sustained a "large raised bump on her head.").

[38] Recklessly engaging in nonconsensual physical contact that transmits a disease to a complainant may suffice for criminal abuse of a minor. However, particular care should be given to the gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct requirement in the RCC definition of recklessness. For example, a sneezy parent who disregards a substantial risk that he will transmit a cold virus to a complainant under the age of 18 years by living in proximity to the complainant would not ordinarily satisfy the requirement of bodily injury. However, if a parent intentionally sneezes in a minor's face, there would be liability for third degree criminal abuse of a minor if pain, illness, or impairment of the minor's physical condition results, and possibly a higher gradation depending on the facts of the case.

physical conditions.[39] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Fifth, the parental defense in RCC § 22E-408 applies to the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute, limiting liability for certain conduct undertaken with the intent of safeguarding or promoting the welfare of the complainant. The District's current child cruelty statute is silent as to whether there is a defense for parental discipline. However, while there is no case law on the applicability of a parental defense to child cruelty, the DCCA has recognized the defense for assault and has extended the parental discipline defense beyond parents to persons standing in loco parentis to the child.[40] The DCCA has not addressed the limits of permissible force in the parental discipline defense other than generally requiring that the force be "reasonable."[41] The parental defense in RCC § 22E-408 clarifies the scope of the parental defense as applied to RCC offenses against persons such as criminal abuse of a minor. This change improves the clarity and completeness of the law.

Sixth, the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute no longer separately criminalizes creating "a grave risk of bodily injury to a child, and thereby causes bodily injury." The current first degree child cruelty statute requires, in part, both that the defendant "engage[] in conduct which creates a graves risk of bodily injury to a child" and that the defendant "thereby cause[] bodily injury."[42] However, it is unclear whether or how this requirement differs from the alternative bases of liability in the current first degree child cruelty statute ("beats" or "maltreats" a child). No DCCA case law interprets this part of the current child cruelty statute. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute is limited to causing specific types of physical or mental harm. Conduct that results in a risk of serious bodily injury, death, significant bodily injury, serious mental injury, or bodily injury from consumption of a controlled substance or alcohol is criminalized by the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute [39] For example, a parent who intentionally feeds a minor food laced with drugs would face liability under third degree criminal abuse of a minor if pain, illness, or impairment of the minor's physical condition results, and possibly a higher gradation depending on the facts. If no "bodily injury" results, the parent may face liability under third degree of the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute for creating a substantial risk of "bodily injury" due to consumption of a controlled substance without a valid prescription.

[40] Martin v. United States, 452 A.2d 360, 362 (D.C. 1982) (finding that there was no evidence that appellant stood in loco parentis with his 13-year-old cousin because the record reflected "at best . . . that appellant helped on occasion with the basic running of the household," that disciplinary authority over the cousin had never been "specifically delegated" to appellant, and appellant had not "assumed any obligations (such as financial support) that would be 'associated with one standing as a natural parent to a child.'") (emphasis in original) (quoting Fuller v. Fuller, 135 U.S. App. D.C. 353 (1969). The court in Martin stated that "in loco parentis refers to a person who has put himself in the situation of a lawful parent by assuming the obligations incident to the parental relation. . . . It embodies the ideas of both assuming the parental status and discharging the parental duties." Martin, 452 A.2d at 362 (internal citations omitted). The court noted that in loco parentis involves "more than a duty to aid or assist . . . It arises only when one is willing to assume all the obligations and to receive all the benefits associated with one standing as a natural parent to a child." Id. (emphasis in original) (internal citations omitted).

[41] See, e.g., Newby v. United States, 797 A.2d 1233, 1241-42 (endorsing the common law "reasonable force" standard); Florence v. United States, 906 A.2d 889, 893 ("The [parental discipline defense] is established where the defendant uses reasonable force for the purpose of exercising parental discipline.").

[42] D.C. Code § 22-1101(a).

(RCC § 22E-1502). The RCC criminal neglect of a minor statute does not include any other risk of "bodily injury" because, given the RCC definition of "bodily injury," this may criminalize the risk of comparatively trivial harms that are part of everyday life, such as allowing a child to play on playground monkey bars. However, conduct that results in a risk of physical or mental harm, including "bodily injury," may also constitute attempted criminal abuse of a minor. This change improves the clarity of the statute.

Seventh, the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute codifies an effective consent affirmative defense, discussed extensively in the explanatory note to the offense. District statutes do not codify general defenses to criminal conduct. The current child cruelty statute does not address whether consent of the complainant or of a parent or guardian is a defense to liability. Longstanding case law of the United States Court of Appeals District of Columbia Circuit (D.C. Cir.) in Guarro v. United States has recognized that consent is a defense to assault, at least in the case of a nonviolent sexual touching.[43] A recent DCCA opinion in Woods v. United States, however, held that consent of the complainant is not a defense to assault in a public place that causes significant bodily injury, but explicitly declined to rule on the effect of consent in other circumstances.[44] It is unclear whether this District case law for assault would apply to child cruelty. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute codifies an effective consent affirmative defense for an actor that is not a "person with legal authority over the complainant." Due to this exclusion, the defense applies to individuals that have a duty of care to the minor, but do not rise to the level of a "person with legal authority over the complainant" as that term is defined in the RCC, such as a parent or guardian. The defense eliminates liability where the actor knows that they have no effective consent by the person with legal authority (e.g., they are absent or the contract for the childcare services didn't foresee the eventuality), and the requirements in the limited duty of care defense (RCC § 22E-408(a)(4)) are too stringent. For example, the defense would cover the babysitter who decides without prior consultation with the parent to let a minor climb the tree that results in a significant bodily injury. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Eighth, the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute codifies an exclusion from liability for conduct that is specifically permitted by a District statute or regulation. The District's current child cruelty statute does not address whether conduct that is specifically permitted under another District law or regulation can result in criminal liability for child cruelty. The exclusion resolves any apparent conflict within District laws. For example, Title 22, Health, of the current D.C. Municipal Regulations, has regulations that specifically refer to immunity from assault liability that clearly will satisfy this exclusion from liability.[45] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

[45] For example, D.C. Mun. Regs. tit. 22-B, § 602.4 states:

> Any minor who is examined, treated, hospitalized, or receives health services under this chapter may give legal consent, and no person who administers the health services shall be liable civilly or criminally for assault, battery, or assault and battery; or any other civil

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute codifies a culpable mental state of "reckless" for causing serious bodily injury in first degree and serious mental injury or significant bodily injury in second degree. The current child cruelty statute requires a culpable mental state of "intentionally, knowingly, or recklessly."[46] While the meaning of "recklessly" is not defined in the current child cruelty statute, case law has briefly interpreted these terms[47] in a manner consistent with the Model Penal Code definitions. The revised criminal abuse of a minor statute codifies a culpable mental state of "reckless," which is defined in RCC § 22E-206. It is unnecessary to codify the higher culpable mental states of "intentionally" and "knowingly" for these types of harm because under the general rule of construction in RCC § 22E-206, they satisfy the lower culpable mental state of "reckless." In addition, the definition of "reckless" in RCC § 22E-206 is consistent with DCCA case law.[48] This change clarifies the statute.

Second, the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute categorizes a person under the age of 18 as a "minor" and defines the revised offense in terms of the age of the complainant. The current child cruelty statute requires that the complainant be "a child under 18 years of age."[49] Referring to a teenager as a "child" may be misleading and leads to inconsistency with other District offenses that have different definitions of "child."[50] These changes improve the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

[50] For example, the current child sexual abuse statutes consider a complainant under the age of 16 years to be a "child." D.C. Code §§ 22-3008 (first degree child sexual abuse); 22-3009 (second degree child sexual abuse); 22-3001(3) (defining "child" as a "person who has not yet attained the age of 16 years.").

RCC § 22E-1502. Criminal Neglect of a Minor.

Explanatory Note. The RCC criminal neglect of a minor offense proscribes a broad range of conduct in which there is a risk of harm to a minor's bodily integrity or mental well-being. In addition to prohibiting a risk of harm to a minor, the RCC criminal neglect of a minor offense prohibits failing to provide a minor with necessary items or care, as well as abandoning a minor. The penalty gradations are primarily based on the type of physical or mental harm that is risked. Along with the revised criminal abuse of a minor offense,[1] the revised criminal neglect of a minor offense replaces the child cruelty offense[2] and the failure to provide for a child offense[3] in the current D.C. Code.

There are three degrees of the RCC criminal neglect of a minor statute. Each gradation requires that the accused is "reckless" as to the fact that he or she has a "responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant"[4] (paragraph (a)(1) and subparagraph (a)(1)(A) for first degree, paragraph (b)(1) and subparagraph (b)(1)(A) for second degree, and paragraph (c)(1) and subparagraph (c)(1)(A)) for third degree). Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "reckless" culpable mental state specified in paragraph (a)(1) for first degree, paragraph (b)(1) for second degree, and paragraph (c)(1)) for third degree, applies to the fact that the complainant has the specified responsibility to the complainant in subparagraph (a)(1)(A) for first degree, subparagraph (b)(1)(A) for second degree, and subparagraph (c)(1)(A)) for third degree). "Reckless" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the accused must consciously disregard a substantial risk that he or she has a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant.

Each gradation of the offense further requires that the accused is "reckless" as to the fact that the complainant is under the age of 18 years. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "reckless" culpable mental state specified in paragraph (a)(1) for first degree, paragraph (b)(1) for second degree, and paragraph (c)(1)) for third degree, applies to the fact that the complainant is under 18 years of age in subparagraph (a)(1)(B) for first degree, subparagraph (b)(1)(B) for second degree, and subparagraph (c)(1)(B)) for third degree). "Reckless" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the accused must consciously disregard a substantial risk that the complainant is under the age of 18 years.

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies additional requirements for first degree criminal neglect of a minor, the highest grade of the revised offense. The accused must have created, or failed to mitigate or remedy, a substantial risk that the complainant would experience serious bodily injury or death. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "reckless" culpable mental state in paragraph (a)(1) applies to all elements in paragraph (a)(2). "Reckless" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the accused must consciously disregard a substantial risk that he or she created, or failed to mitigate or remedy, a substantial risk that the complainant would experience serious bodily injury or death. "Serious bodily injury" is a term defined in RCC § 22E-701 as injury involving a substantial risk of death, or protracted and obvious disfigurement, or protracted loss or impairment of the function of a bodily member or organ, or protracted unconsciousness.

Paragraph (b)(2) and subparagraphs (b)(2)(A) and (b)(2)(B) specify the two types of prohibited conduct in second degree criminal neglect of a minor. Paragraph (b)(2) and subparagraph (b)(2)(A) establish liability for creating, or failing to mitigate or remedy, a substantial risk that the complainant would experience "significant bodily injury." "Significant bodily injury" is the intermediate level of bodily injury in the RCC and is defined in RCC § 22E-701 as an injury that requires hospitalization or immediate medical treatment, or is a specific type of injury, such as a fracture of a bone. Per the rule of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "reckless" culpable mental state in paragraph (b)(1) applies to all the elements in paragraph (b)(2) and subparagraph (b)(2)(A). "Reckless" is a term defined in RCC § 22E-206 which, applied here, means being aware of a substantial risk that the actor will create, or fail to mitigate or remedy, a substantial risk that the complainant would experience "significant bodily injury."

Paragraph (b)(2) and subparagraph (b)(2)(B) establish liability for creating, or failing to mitigate or remedy, a substantial risk that the complainant would experience "serious mental injury." "Serious mental injury" is a term defined in RCC § 22E-701 as "substantial, prolonged harm to a person's psychological or intellectual functioning." Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "reckless" culpable mental state in paragraph (b)(1) applies to all the elements in paragraph (b)(2) and subparagraph (b)(2)(B). "Reckless" is a term defined in RCC § 22E-206 which, applied here, means being aware of a substantial risk that one's conduct will create, or fail to mitigate or remedy, a substantial risk that the complainant would experience "serious mental injury."

Paragraph (c)(2) and its subparagraphs and sub-subparagraphs specify the three types of prohibited conduct in third degree criminal neglect of a minor, the lowest grade of the revised offense. Paragraph (c)(2) and subparagraph (c)(2)(A) establish liability for "knowingly" leaving the complainant in any place "with intent" to abandon the complainant. Per the rule of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" culpable mental state applies to all elements in subparagraph (c)(2)(A) until "with intent to" is specified. "Knowingly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 which, applied here, means the accused is practically certain that his or her conduct will result in leaving the complainant in any place. The accused must also act "with intent to" abandon the complainant. "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 which, applied here, means the accused was practically certain that he or she would abandon the complainant. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that such abandonment actually occurred, just that the defendant believed to a practical certainty, or consciously desired, that abandonment would result.

Paragraph (c)(2), subparagraph (c)(2)(B), and sub-subparagraph (c)(2)(B)(i) establish liability for failing to make a reasonable effort to provide food, clothing, or other items or care for the complainant that are "essential to the physical health, mental health, or safety of the complainant." Per the rule of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "recklessly" culpable mental state in subparagraph (c)(2)(B) applies to all elements in sub-subparagraph (c)(2)(B)(i). "Recklessly" is defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means being aware of a substantial risk that one's conduct will fail to make a reasonable effort to provide the items or care that are "essential to the physical health, mental health, or safety of the complainant."

Paragraph (c)(2), subparagraph (c)(2)(B), and sub-subparagraph (c)(2)(B)(ii) establish liability for creating, or failing to mitigate or remedy, a substantial risk that the complainant would experience "bodily injury" from consumption of alcohol, or consumption or inhalation, without a valid prescription, of a "controlled substance" or marijuana.[5] "Bodily injury" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 as "physical pain, physical injury, illness, or impairment of physical condition." "Controlled substance" is also a defined term in RCC § 22E-701. Per the rule of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "recklessly" culpable mental state in subparagraph (c)(2)(B) applies to all elements in sub-subparagraph (c)(2)(B)(ii). "Recklessly" is defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means being aware of a substantial risk that one's conduct will create, or fail to mitigate or remedy, a substantial risk that the complainant would experience bodily injury from consumption of alcohol, or consumption or inhalation, without a valid prescription, of a controlled substance or marijuana.

Subsection (d) codifies two exclusions from liability for criminal neglect of a minor. The general provision in RCC § 22E-201 establishes the burdens of proof and production for all exclusions from liability in the RCC. Under the first exclusion in paragraph (d)(1), the actor does not commit an offense under the revised statute for conduct that, in fact, constitutes surrendering a newborn child in accordance with D.C. Code § 4-1451.01 et. seq. Paragraph (d)(1) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element, here the fact that the actor's conduct constitutes surrendering a newborn child in accordance with D.C. Code § 4-1451.01 et seq. Under the second exclusion in paragraph (d)(2), the actor does not commit an offense under the revised statute when, in fact, the actor's conduct is specifically permitted by a District statute or regulation. Paragraph (d)(2) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element, here that the actor's conduct is specifically permitted by a District statute or regulation. For example, Title 22, Health, of the current D.C. Municipal Regulations, has regulations that will satisfy the exclusion from liability.[6]

[5] Specific reference is made to marijuana to ensure that marijuana is categorically included, regardless of amount. Title 48 of the D.C. Code generally defines a controlled substance to include marijuana as a controlled substance (see D.C. Code § 48–901.02(4)), but also separately modifies that general definition (see D.C. Code § 48–904.01(a)(1A)(A)) to eliminate marijuana under 2 ounces possessed by a person 21 or over. Because marijuana is categorically included, a parent who legally possesses marijuana may, for example, still be liable for blowing smoke from the marijuana upon a small child if it is proven that such conduct creates a substantial risk that the complainant would experience a bodily injury from the smoke.

[6] For example, D.C. Mun. Regs. tit. 22-B, § 602.4 states:

> Any minor who is examined, treated, hospitalized, or receives health services under this chapter may give legal consent, and no person who administers the health services shall be liable civilly or criminally for assault, battery, or assault and battery; or any other civil legal charge, except for negligence or intentional harm in the diagnosis and treatment rendered to the minor and for violations of the D.C. Mental Health Information Act of 1978.

Subsection (e) codifies an affirmative defense to the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute. The general provision in RCC § 22E-201 establishes the burdens of proof and production for all affirmative defenses in the RCC. The affirmative defense is limited to subsection (b)—22e-1303creating or failing to mitigate remedy a risk of "significant bodily injury" or "serious mental injury" as those terms are defined in RCC § 22E-701—and subparagraph (c)(2)(B)—failing to make a reasonable effort to provide essential items or care or creating, or failing to remedy a risk of bodily injury from drug or alcohol consumption.

The defense has two requirements. First, per paragraph (e)(1), the actor must not be "a person with legal authority over the complainant," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701. As specified by use of "in fact" in paragraph (e)(1), no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to the fact that the actor is not "a person with legal authority over the complainant." When the complainant is under the age of 18 years, RCC § 22E-701 defines a "person with legal authority over the complainant" as the "parent, or a person acting in the place of a parent under civil law, who is responsible for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant, or someone acting with the effective consent of such a parent or such a person." "Person acting in the place of a parent under civil law" is further defined in RCC § 22E-701.

The effect of paragraph (e)(1) is that an actor who is "a person with legal authority over the complainant," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701, does not have this effective consent defense.[7] However, such an actor may have a defense under either the parental or guardian defenses in RCC § 22E-408, which provide expansive defenses for specified parents and guardians and those acting with the effective consent of such a parent or guardian.[8]

The second requirement for the defense is in paragraph (e)(2). The actor must reasonably believe[9] that a "person with legal authority over the complainant," acting consistent with that authority, would give "effective consent" to the conduct constituting the offense under subsection (b) or subparagraph (c)(2)(B).[10] The defense applies if the actor has not communicated with a person with legal authority over the complainant, but reasonably believes that such a person, acting consistent with that authority, would effectively consent to the conduct. The determination of whether the actor reasonably believed that a person with legal authority over the complainant, acting consistent with that authority, would have effectively consented is a fact-specific inquiry. The complainant's age, the nature of and motivation for the conduct, and any other relevant circumstances may be taken into account. The "in fact" specified in subsection (e) applies to paragraph (e)(2) and no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC

[7] The defense under paragraph (e)(1) is not available to an actor that is a "person with legal authority over the complainant" and there is no general effective consent defense in the RCC.

[8] These defenses have different requirements than the effective consent defense in subsection (e). For example, both the parental and guardian defenses in RCC § 22E-408 require that the actor's conduct be reasonable.

[9] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist.

[10] The "conduct that constitutes the offense" in paragraph (e)(2) includes an omission. The paragraph does not use the term "omission," but the offense includes a failure to mitigate or remedy a risk and encompasses omissions.

§ 22E-205, applies to paragraph (e)(2). It is not necessary to prove that the actor desired or was practically certain that a person with legal authority over the complainant, acting consistent with that authority, would give effective consent to the conduct constituting the offense. However, the actor must subjectively believe, and that belief must be reasonable, that a person with legal authority over the complainant, acting consistent with that authority, would give effective consent to the conduct constituting the offense. Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[11] There is no effective consent defense under paragraph (e)(2) when the actor makes an unreasonable mistake as to whether a person with legal authority over the complainant, acting consistent with that authority, would give effective consent to the conduct constituting the offense.

Subsection (f) specifies relevant penalties for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (g) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised criminal neglect of a minor statute clearly changes current District law in six main ways.

First, the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute prohibits leaving a complainant with intent to abandon him or her as an offense distinct from the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute. The current second degree child cruelty statute prohibits, in relevant part, "expos[ing] a child, or aid[ing] and abet[ting] in exposing a child in any highway, street, field house, outhouse or other place, with intent to abandon the child,"[12] as well as "maltreat[ing]" a child.[13] Both these means of committing second degree child cruelty have the same maximum ten year penalty.[14] There is no case law defining the meaning of "exposing." In contrast, in the RCC, abandoning a complainant under the age of 18 years is criminalized by the criminal neglect of a minor statute instead of the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1501). Abandonment alone, absent any actual harm, is comparatively less serious than the physical or mental injury required in the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute. However, higher gradations of the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute or other RCC offenses may apply to abandonment that involves a risk of serious injury or any actual harm.[15] This change reduces unnecessary overlap between offenses and improves the organization and proportionality of the revised offense.

[13] D.C. Code § 22-1101(b)(1).

[14] D.C. Code § 22-111(c)(2). In addition to abandoning a child, the current second degree cruelty statute prohibits "engag[ing] in conduct which causes a grave risk of bodily injury to a child." D.C. Code § 22-1101(b)(2). It also has a maximum term of imprisonment of ten years. D.C. Code § 22-111(c)(2).

Second, the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute incorporates liability for a failure to provide certain items and care for a complainant under 18 years of age. Current D.C. Code § 22-1102 prohibits a parent or guardian of "sufficient financial ability" from refusing or neglecting to provide the "food, clothing, and shelter as will prevent the suffering and secure the safety" of a child under 14 years of age.[16] The offense has a maximum term of imprisonment of three months.[17] In contrast, in the RCC, failing to support a minor is criminalized as part of the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute[18] and is no longer a separate offense. Also, unlike the current failure to support offense, which is limited to children under 14 years of age,[19] the failure to support gradation in the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute applies to any complainant under 18 years of age so that it matches the current child cruelty statute[20] and revised criminal abuse of a minor[21] statute. This change reduces unnecessary overlap between offenses and improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute.

Third, the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute is limited to conduct that does not actually harm the complainant. The current second degree child cruelty statute criminalizes actual "maltreatment," causing a "grave risk of bodily injury," and "exposing a child . . . with intent to abandon it," without any distinction in penalty.[22] In contrast, the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute is limited to conduct that does not actually harm the complainant. First degree and second degree of the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute prohibit endangering the complainant and third degree prohibits failing to provide for the complainant, abandoning the complainant or creating a risk of bodily injury due to consumption of alcohol or a controlled substance. However, if the complainant sustains physical or mental injury as a result of the neglect, there may be liability under the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1501) or other [15] If leaving the complainant with intent to abandon him or her results in a risk of significant bodily injury, serious mental injury, serious bodily injury, or death, then the defendant's conduct may be subject to first degree or second degree criminal neglect of a minor. Moreover, if the complainant sustains physical or mental injury, or death, as a result of the abandonment, there may be liability under the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute, RCC § 22E-1501, the revised assault statute, RCC § 22E-1202, or the revised homicide statutes, RCC §§ 22E-1101 – 22E-1103.

[18] The specification of failing to support the complainant as third degree criminal neglect of a minor does not preclude the possibility that such failure to support may, depending on the facts of the case, be charged as a more serious gradation or offense. If failing to provide the necessary items or care results in a risk of significant bodily injury, serious mental injury, serious bodily injury, or death, then the defendant's conduct may be subject to first degree or second degree criminal neglect of a minor. Moreover, if the complainant sustains physical or mental injury, or death, as a result of the failure to provide, there may be liability under the revised criminal abuse of a minor statute, RCC § 22E-1501, the revised assault statute, RCC § 22E-1202, or the revised homicide statutes, RCC §§ 22E-1101 – 22E-1103.

RCC offenses against persons. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense.

Fourth, the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute partially grades the offense based on creating a risk of "serious bodily injury or death," "significant bodily injury," or "serious mental injury." The current second degree child cruelty offense prohibits, in part, creating "a grave risk of bodily injury."[23] However, the statute does not define "bodily injury." DCCA case law on the current child cruelty statute suggests "bodily injury" may have a relatively low threshold for physical harm,[24] but does not provide a general definition. With regard to mental injury, the DCCA has stated that "an attempt to inflict mental or emotional pain or suffering upon a child, if sufficiently extreme or unreasonable, constitutes attempted second-degree cruelty to children."[25] However, the DCCA has not discussed whether a risk of extreme emotional pain or suffering is sufficient for the "grave risk of bodily injury" prong of the current second degree child cruelty offense. In contrast, the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute partially grades the offense based on whether there is a risk of "serious bodily injury or death," "significant bodily injury," or "serious mental injury" and defines those terms in RCC § 22E-701. These types of "bodily injury" are consistent with the RCC assault statute (RCC § 22E-1202). The RCC criminal neglect of a minor statute does not criminalize a risk of "bodily injury" other than bodily injury due to the complainant's drug or alcohol consumption because, given the RCC definition of "bodily injury," this may criminalize the risk of comparatively trivial harms that are part of everyday life, such as allowing a child to play on playground monkey bars. This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised child neglect statute.

Fifth, the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute limits liability for a risk of bodily injury to a risk of bodily injury due to drug or alcohol consumption. The current second degree child cruelty offense prohibits, in part, creating "a grave risk of bodily injury."[26] The statute does not define "bodily injury." DCCA case law on the current child cruelty statute suggests "bodily injury" may have a relatively low threshold for physical harm,[27] but does not provide a general definition. In contrast, the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute limits liability for creating a risk of bodily injury to a risk of "bodily injury" due to the complainant consuming alcohol or consuming or inhaling, without a valid prescription, a controlled substance or marijuana. If the actor recklessly creates such a risk of a higher level of "bodily injury," such as "significant bodily injury," there is liability under first degree or second degree of the RCC criminal neglect of a minor statute. The RCC criminal neglect of a minor statute does not criminalize a risk of "bodily injury" other than bodily injury due to the complainant's drug or alcohol consumption because, given the RCC definition of "bodily injury," this may criminalize the risk of comparatively trivial harms that are part of everyday life, such as allowing a child to play on playground monkey bars. Conduct that results in a risk of "bodily injury" in contexts other than the complainant's drug or alcohol consumption may constitute attempted criminal abuse of a minor.[28] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statutes, and may remove a possible gap in liability.

Sixth, the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute limits liability to individuals that are "reckless" as to the fact that they have "a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant." The current child cruelty statute does not state any requirements for the defendant's relationship to the child, and the DCCA has sustained second degree child cruelty convictions for creation of a "grave risk of bodily injury" when an individual has no relationship to the child.[29] There is no DCCA case law interpreting the scope of the abandonment prong of second degree child cruelty. The failure to support a child offense in D.C. Code § 22-1102, however, is limited to a "parent or guardian."[30] In contrast, all gradations of the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute require that the defendant is "reckless" as to the fact that "he or she has a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant." This change narrows the scope of liability for the offense to those persons with a duty of care to the minor (e.g., a parent, guardian, teacher, doctor, daycare provider, or babysitter may be liable for the offense). The revised criminal neglect of a minor offense thus provides a distinct charge for individuals with responsibilities under civil law for complainants under the age of 18 years who subject to a risk of harm those they are supposed to protect. The revised statute applies a culpable mental state of "reckless" as to the fact that the defendant has a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant." This change improves the proportionality and consistency of revised offenses.

Beyond these six changes to current District law, nine other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute requires a culpable mental state of "knowingly" for "leav[ing]" the complainant. The abandonment prong in the current child cruelty statute requires a culpable mental state of "intentionally, knowingly, or recklessly," but also requires the conduct occur "with intent to abandon the child."[31]

[28] In addition, if an actor recklessly creates, or fails to mitigate or remedy, a risk that a complainant would experience bodily injury from consumption of drugs or alcohol, and "bodily injury" results, there would be liability under the RCC criminal abuse of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1501).

[29] See, e.g., Coffin v. United States, 917 A.2d 1089, 1090, 1093 (affirming appellant's convictions for attempted second degree child cruelty when appellant drove a car dangerously while intoxicated with two children in the back seat that were not in seatbelts because he created a grave risk of bodily injury to the child passengers); Speaks v. United States, 959 A.2d 712, 713, 714, 716-17 (D.C. 2008) (affirming three counts of second degree cruelty to children while armed (which was subsequently amended to remove the "armed" element) when the appellant carjacked a vehicle containing three small children and crashed the vehicle into a parked car).

[30] D.C. Code § 22-1102.

[31] D.C. Code § 22-1101(b)(2).

While the meaning of these culpable mental states is not defined in the current child cruelty statute, case law has briefly interpreted these terms[32] in a manner consistent with the Model Penal Code definitions. Instead of this ambiguity, the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute codifies a culpable mental state of "knowingly" for the element "leaves the complainant in any place" and provides that leaving the complainant must be done "with the intent of" abandoning the complainant. This change resolves the inconsistent culpable mental states in the current statute[33] and clarifies the law.

Second, the failure to support gradation in the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute broadly includes failures to provide "supervision, medical services, medicine, or other items or care essential for the health or safety of the child." The current failure to support a child offense in D.C. Code § 22-1102 refers only to "food, clothing, and shelter."[34] However, the DCCA has stated that "the broad sweep" of the current statute includes a duty of providing medical care.[35] Current District statutes defining a "neglected child" for civil purposes also specifically refer to a lack of parental "care or control necessary for [the child's] physical, mental, or emotional health."[36] The list of items and care in the revised third degree criminal neglect of a minor statute reflects the DCCA's expansive interpretation of current D.C. Code § 22-1102 and the broad sweep of relevant civil laws in the District. This change reduces possible gaps in the law and improves consistency with the civil statutes.

Third, the failure to support gradation of the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute requires that the defendant "fails to make a reasonable effort" to provide the specified support. The current statute in D.C. Code § 22-1102 refers only to a person "of sufficient financial ability, who shall refuse or neglect to provide…" the specified support.[37] The DCCA has not interpreted the limits of this language. In the revised statute, however, a person must only fail to make a "reasonable effort" to provide the specified support. The revised language would preclude liability where a person does not provide necessary support due, not only to insufficient financial ability, but also due to factors such as a hospitalization or other incapacity.[38] This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised statute.

[32] Jones v. United States, 813 A.2d 220, 224-25 (D.C. 2002) (stating that the trial court did not err in giving a jury instruction that defined "intentionally or knowingly" as "the defendant acted voluntarily and on purpose, not by mistake or accident" and "recklessly" as "the defendant was aware of and disregarded the grave risk of bodily harm created by his conduct.").

[33] It is unclear in the current child cruelty statute how a person could "recklessly" abandon a child "with intent to abandon" the child. However, a knowledge requirement as to leaving the child and an intent requirement as to abandonment, as these terms are defined in the RCC, are compatible. See, generally, Commentary to RCC § 22E-206.

[36] D.C. Code § 16-2301(9A).

[37] D.C. Code § 22-1102.

[38] The District's current civil statutes define "neglected child," in part as "a child:…(ii) who is without proper parental care or control, subsistence, education as required by law, or other care or control necessary for his or her physical, mental, or emotional health, and the deprivation is not due to the lack of financial means of his or her parent, guardian, or custodian; (iii) whose parent, guardian, or custodian is unable to discharge his or her responsibilities to and for the child because of incarceration, hospitalization, or other physical or mental incapacity." D.C. Code § 16-2301(9)(A).

Fourth, the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute specifies that "fail[ing] to mitigate" or "fail[ing] to remedy" a substantial risk is sufficient for liability. It is unclear whether the current child cruelty statute includes failing to mitigate or remedy a risk of harm to the complainant. Current first degree child cruelty criminalizes, in part, conduct that "maltreats" the complainant or "creates a grave risk of bodily injury to a child and thereby causes bodily injury."[39] Current second degree child cruelty criminalizes, in part, conduct that "maltreats" a child,[40] as well as conduct that "causes a grave risk of bodily injury" to a child.[41] "Maltreats" is not statutorily defined and there is no DCCA case law regarding whether the current child cruelty offense extends to failing to mitigate or remedy a risk of harm. The current failure to support statute in D.C. Code § 22-1102 criminalizes the refusal or neglect to provide "food, clothing, and shelter as will prevent the suffering and secure the safety of such child,"[42] but is silent as to failing to mitigate or remedy a risk and there is no case law on point. However, in the context of parental duties, the DCCA also has recognized the "unique obligation of parents to take affirmative actions for their children's benefit."[43] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute clarifies that not only creating risks to a child, but also failing to mitigate or remedy a substantial risk, is sufficient for liability. Under the general provision in RCC § 22E-202, omissions are equivalent to affirmative conduct and sufficient for liability for any offense in the RCC where the defendant had a duty of care to the complainant.[44] However, although technically superfluous, given that neglect offenses usually will involve an omission, the revised statute explicitly codifies "fail[ing] to remedy" or "fail[ing] to remedy" as a basis for liability. This change clarifies the revised statute.

Fifth, the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute requires a culpable mental state of "reckless" as to the fact that the complainant is under 18 years of age. The current child cruelty statute does not specify what culpable mental state, if any, applies to the fact that the complaining witness is a "child." There is no DCCA case law discussing if there is a culpable mental state for this element. However, under the current enhancement for certain crimes against minors it is an affirmative defense that "the accused reasonably believed that the victim was not a minor [person less than 18 years old] at the time of the offense."[45] The "reckless" culpable mental state in the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute preserves the substance of this defense.[46] This change improves the clarity, completeness, and proportionality of the revised statute.

United States*, 413 A.2d at 1299-300 (D.C. 1980) ("The cases of several state courts hold there is a 'common law natural duty of parents to provide medical care for their minor dependent children. . . . To the extent that the common law imposes a duty to aid a child, the DCCA may find a common law duty in the District. See generally § 6.2.Omission to act, 1 Subst. Crim. L. § 6.2 (3d ed.)
[44] This principle is reflected in the current version of the draft general provision on omission liability. See RCC § 202(c), (d) ("(c) 'Omission' means a failure to act when (1) a person is under a legal duty to act and (2) the person is either aware that the legal duty to act exists or, if the person lacks such awareness, the person is culpably unaware that the legal duty to act exists. (d) For purposes of this Title, a legal duty to act exists when: (1) The failure to act is expressly made sufficient by the law defining the offense; or (2) A duty to perform the omitted act is otherwise imposed by law.").

Sixth, for liability, the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute requires a "substantial risk" of the specified physical or mental harm. The current second degree child cruelty offense prohibits "engag[ing] in conduct which causes a grave risk of bodily injury."[47] There is no DCCA case law discussing the meaning of "grave risk." However, in an attempted second degree cruelty to children case, the DCCA affirmed a conviction based upon the defendant creating a "grave or substantial risk of bodily injury,"[48] suggesting that "grave" and "substantial" are interchangeable, equivalent terms. The revised criminal neglect of a minor statute clarifies that the required risk must be "substantial." The "substantial" language is technically superfluous where recklessness is alleged because the "reckless" culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-206, also requires, in relevant part, that a risk be "substantial." However, given that neglect offenses will often depend on the nature of the risk to the complainant, the revised statute specifies the "substantial" requirement to clarify the statute, particularly where the defendant is alleged to act knowingly, intentionally, or purposely.[49] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Seventh, the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute specifically bases liability on "serious mental injury" in RCC § 22E-701. The current District child cruelty statute is silent as to whether it includes psychological harm. DCCA case law is clear that the current child cruelty statute extends at least to serious psychological injury,[50] but the [46] "Reckless" is defined in RCC § 22E-206 and, as applied here, means that the accused must consciously disregard a substantial risk that the complainant was under the age of 18 years. The enhancement for crimes against minors has an affirmative defense that "the accused reasonably believed that the victim was not a minor at the time of the offense." D.C. Code § 22-3611(b). If an accused reasonably believed that the complaining witness was not a minor, the accused would not satisfy the culpable mental state of recklessness or knowledge as to the age of the complaining witness because the accused would not consciously disregard a substantial risk (recklessness) or be practically certain (knowledge) that the complainant was under 18 years of age. See RCC § 22E-208(b)(3) and accompanying commentary, providing that a reasonable mistake as to a circumstance element negates the existence of recklessness as to that element.

[45] D.C. Code § 22-3611(b).

[47] D.C. Code § 22-111(b)(1).

United States*, 902 A.2d 107, 112-13 (D.C. 2006) (discussing the Model Penal Code definition of "recklessly" and affirming the appellant's conviction for attempted second degree cruelty to children because the appellant "created a grave or substantial risk of bodily injury when he struck [the child] in the face and disregarded 'the risk of fractures of the orbital eye socket.'").

[49] For example, where a parent gives her sick child with cancer an experimental and dangerous drug prescribed by the child's oncologist, the fact that the parent knows (i.e. is practically certain) that doing so will create a risk of serious bodily injury or death to the child does not, by itself, establish first degree child neglect. Rather, it would also have to be proven by the government, as an affirmative element of the offense, that this risk was substantial under the circumstances.

[50] The DCCA has stated that "an attempt to inflict mental or emotional pain or suffering upon a child, if sufficiently extreme or unreasonable, constitutes attempted second-degree cruelty to children" and that "maltreats" in first degree child cruelty "cannot reasonably be read as embracing only physical maltreatment." Alfaro, 859 A.2d at 153-54, 157. The DCCA has further stated that "the infliction of psychological harm can contravene a criminal statute prohibiting cruelty to children, but the harm must be court has not articulated a precise definition of the requisite psychological harm. Instead of this ambiguity, RCC § 22E-701 defines "serious mental injury" as "substantial, prolonged harm to a person's psychological or intellectual functioning, which may be exhibited by severe anxiety, depression, withdrawal, or outwardly aggressive behavior, or a combination of those behaviors, and which may be demonstrated by a change in behavior, emotional response, or cognition." The RCC definition of "serious mental injury" modifies the definition of "mental injury" in the District's current civil statutes for proceedings on child delinquency, neglect, or need of supervision[51] by adding the requirement that the harm be "substantial" and "prolonged." by adding the requirement that the harm be "substantial" and "prolonged." The requirements of "substantial" and "prolonged" reflect DCCA case law supporting a high standard for psychological harm for child abuse,[52] but given the imprecision of current case law it is unclear what change, if any, the definition will have on current District law. This change clarifies the law.

Eighth, the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute codifies an effective consent affirmative defense, discussed extensively in the explanatory note to the offense. District statutes do not codify general defenses to criminal conduct. The current child cruelty statute does not address whether consent of the complainant or of a parent or guardian is a defense to liability. Longstanding case law of the United States Court of Appeals District of Columbia Circuit (D.C. Cir.) in Guarro v. United States has recognized that consent is a defense to assault, at least in the case of a nonviolent sexual touching.[53] A recent DCCA opinion in Woods v. United States, however, held that consent of the complainant is not a defense to assault in a public place that causes significant bodily injury, but explicitly declined to rule on the effect of consent in other circumstances.[54] It is unclear whether this District case law for assault would apply to child cruelty. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute codifies an effective consent affirmative defense for an actor that is not a "person with legal authority over the complainant." Due to this exclusion, the defense applies to individuals that have a duty of care to the minor, but do not rise to the level of a "person with legal authority over the complainant" as that term is defined in the RCC, such as a parent or guardian. The defense eliminates liability where the actor knows that they have

Code § 16-2301(31) ("The term 'mental injury' means harm to a child's psychological or intellectual functioning, which may be exhibited by severe anxiety, depression, withdrawal, or outwardly aggressive behavior, or a combination of those behaviors, and which may be demonstrated by a change in behavior, emotional response, or cognition.").

[52] The DCCA has stated that "an attempt to inflict mental or emotional pain or suffering upon a child, if sufficiently extreme or unreasonable, constitutes attempted second-degree cruelty to children" and that "maltreats" in first degree child cruelty "cannot reasonably be read as embracing only physical maltreatment." Alfaro, 859 A.2d at 153-54, 157. The DCCA has further stated that "the infliction of psychological harm can contravene a criminal statute prohibiting cruelty to children, but the harm must be serious and 'unjustifiable' rather than mild or trivial." Alfaro, 859 A.2d at 159 (agreeing with the analysis of the Supreme Court of Louisiana of a Louisiana child abuse statute).

no effective consent by the person with legal authority (e.g., they are absent or the contract for the childcare services didn't foresee the eventuality), and the requirements in the limited duty of care defense (RCC § 22E-408(a)(4)) are too stringent. For example, the defense would cover the babysitter who decides to let a minor briefly play outside in the snow without gloves if the babysitter can't find them or there aren't any available. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Ninth, the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute codifies an exclusion from liability for conduct that is specifically permitted by a District statute or regulation. The District's current child cruelty statute does not address whether conduct that is specifically permitted under another District law or regulation can result in criminal liability for child cruelty. The exclusion resolves any apparent conflict within District laws. For example, Title 22, Health, of the current D.C. Municipal Regulations, has regulations that specifically refer to immunity from assault liability that clearly will satisfy this exclusion from liability.[55] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute codifies a culpable mental state of "recklessly" for the element "created, or failed to mitigate or remedy, a substantial risk." The current child cruelty statute requires a culpable mental state of "intentionally, knowingly, or recklessly."[56] While the meaning of "recklessly" is not defined in the current child cruelty statute, case law has briefly interpreted these terms,[57] in a manner consistent with the Model Penal Code definitions. The revised criminal neglect of a minor statute codifies a culpable mental state of "recklessly," which is defined in RCC § 22E-206. It is unnecessary to codify the higher culpable mental states of "intentionally" and "knowingly" because under the general rule of construction in RCC § 22E-206, they satisfy the lower culpable mental state of "recklessly." In addition, the definition of "recklessly" in RCC § 22E-206 is consistent with DCCA case law.[58] This change clarifies the revised statute.

Second, subsection (f) of the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute codifies an exclusion from liability for surrendering a newborn child in accordance with D.C. Code § 4-1451.01 et. seq. It is inconsistent for an individual who surrenders a newborn child in accordance with D.C. Code § 4-145.01 et. seq. to face criminal liability. Current

[55] For example, D.C. Mun. Regs. tit. 22-B, § 602.4 states:

> Any minor who is examined, treated, hospitalized, or receives health services under this chapter may give legal consent, and no person who administers the health services shall be liable civilly or criminally for assault, battery, or assault and battery; or any other civil legal charge, except for negligence or intentional harm in the diagnosis and treatment rendered to the minor and for violations of the D.C. Mental Health Information Act of 1978.

United States*, 813 A.2d 220, 224-25 (D.C. 2002) (stating that the trial court did not err in giving a jury instruction that defined "intentionally or knowingly" as "the defendant acted voluntarily and on purpose, not by mistake or accident" and "recklessly" as "the defendant was aware of and disregarded the grave risk of bodily harm created by his conduct.").

[58] Jones v. United States, 813 A.2d 220, 224-25 (D.C. 2002).

D.C. Code § 4-1451.02 states such a person "shall not . . . be prosecuted for the surrender of the newborn."[59] This change clarifies the revised statute.

Third, the revised criminal neglect of a minor statute categorizes a person under the age of 18 as a "minor" and defines the revised offense in terms of the age of the complainant. The current child cruelty statute requires that the complainant be "a child under 18 years of age."[60] Referring to a teenager as a "child" may be misleading and leads to inconsistency with other District offenses that have different definitions of "child."[61] These changes improve the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

[59] D.C. Code § 4-1451.02(a) ("Except when there is actual or suspected child abuse or neglect, a custodial parent who is a resident of the District of Columbia may surrenders a newborn in accordance with this chapter and shall have the right to remain anonymous and to leave the place of surrender at any time and shall not be pursued by any person at the time of surrender or prosecuted for the surrender of the newborn.").

[60] D.C. Code § 22-1101(a).

[61] For example, the current child sexual abuse statutes consider a complainant under the age of 16 years to be a "child." D.C. Code §§ 22-3008 (first degree child sexual abuse); 22-3009 (second degree child sexual abuse); 22-3001(3) (defining "child" as a "person who has not yet attained the age of 16 years.").

RCC § 22E-1503. Criminal Abuse of a Vulnerable Adult or Elderly Person.

Explanatory Note. The RCC criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person offense proscribes a broad range of conduct in which there is harm to a vulnerable adult or elderly person's bodily integrity or mental well-being, including conduct that constitutes fourth degree assault, criminal threats, offensive physical contact, criminal restraint, stalking, or electronic stalking as those crimes are defined in the RCC.[1] The penalty gradations for the revised offense are primarily based on the degree of bodily harm or mental harm. Along with the revised criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person offense,[2] the revised criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person offense replaces several offenses and provisions in the current D.C. Code: abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person offense and penalties;[3] neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person offense and penalties;[4] and the spiritual healing defense for abuse or neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person.[5]

There are three degrees of the RCC criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute. Each gradation requires that the accused is "reckless" as to the fact that he or she has a "responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant"[6] (paragraph (a)(1) and subparagraph (a)(1)(A) for first degree, paragraph (b)(1) and subparagraph (b)(1)(A) for second degree, and paragraph (c)(1) and subparagraph (c)(1)(A)) for third degree). Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "reckless" culpable mental state specified in paragraph (a)(1) for first degree, paragraph (b)(1) for second degree, and paragraph (c)(1)) for third degree, applies to the fact that the complainant has the specified responsibility to the complainant in subparagraph (a)(1)(A) for first degree, subparagraph (b)(1)(A) for second degree, and subparagraph (c)(1)(A)) for third degree). "Reckless" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the accused must consciously disregard a substantial risk that he or she has a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant.

Each gradation of the offense further requires that the accused is "reckless" as to the fact that the complainant is a "vulnerable adult" or "elderly person," as those terms are defined in RCC § 22E-701. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "reckless" culpable mental state specified in paragraph (a)(1) for first degree, paragraph (b)(1) for second degree, and paragraph (c)(1)) for third degree, applies to the fact that the complainant is a "vulnerable adult" or "elderly person" in subparagraph (a)(1)(B) for first degree, subparagraph (b)(1)(B) for second degree, and subparagraph (c)(1)(B)) for third degree). "Reckless" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the accused must consciously disregard a substantial risk that the complainant is a "vulnerable adult" or "elderly person," as those terms are defined in RCC § 22E-701.

Paragraph (a)(2) and subparagraphs (a)(2)(A) and (a)(2)(B) specify the three types of prohibited conduct in first degree criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person, the highest grade of the revised offense.

Subparagraph (a)(2)(A) specifies liability for one type of prohibited conduct in first degree criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person—causing "serious mental injury," a term defined in RCC § 22E-701 as "substantial, prolonged harm to a person's psychological or intellectual functioning," to the complainant. Subparagraph (a)(2)(A) specifies that the culpable mental state for causing "serious mental injury" is "purposely," a term defined in RCC § 22E-206 that, applied here, means the accused must consciously desire that the accused causes "serious mental injury" to the complainant. Subparagraph (a)(2)(B) specifies the second type of prohibited conduct for first degree criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person—causing "serious bodily injury," a term defined in RCC § 22E-701 as injury involving a substantial risk of death, or protracted and obvious disfigurement, or protracted loss or impairment of the function of a bodily member or organ, or protracted unconsciousness, to the complainant. Subparagraph (a)(2)(B) specifies that the culpable mental state for causing "serious bodily injury" is "recklessly," a term defined in RCC § 22E-206 that, applied here, means being aware of a substantial risk that the accused will cause serious bodily injury to the complainant.

Paragraph (b)(2) specifies the prohibited conduct in second degree criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person—causing "significant bodily injury." "Significant bodily injury" is the intermediate level of bodily injury in the RCC and is defined in RCC § 22E-701 as an injury that requires hospitalization or immediate medical treatment, or is a specific type of injury, such as a fracture of a bone. Per the rule of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "recklessly" culpable mental state in paragraph (b)(1) applies to the elements in paragraph (b)(2). "Recklessly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the accused is aware of a substantial risk that he or she will cause "significant bodily injury" to the complainant.

Paragraph (c)(2) and subparagraphs (c)(2)(A) and (c)(2)(B) specify the two types of prohibited conduct for third degree criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person, the lowest grade of the revised offense. Paragraph (c)(2) and subparagraph (c)(2)(A) establish liability for causing "serious mental injury," a term defined in RCC § 22E-701 as "substantial, prolonged harm to a person's psychological or intellectual functioning," to the complainant. Per the rule of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "recklessly" culpable mental state in paragraph (c)(1) applies to the elements in subparagraph (c)(2)(A). "Recklessly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the accused is aware of a substantial risk that he or she will cause "serious mental injury" to the complainant.

Paragraph (c)(2) and subparagraph (c)(2)(B) establish liability for the final type of liability in third degree criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person —the accused must, "in fact," commit a "predicate offense against persons" against the complainant. "Predicate offense against persons" is defined in paragraph (g)(2) as the RCC offenses of fourth degree assault (RCC § 22E-1202(d)), criminal threats (RCC § 22E-1204), offensive physical contact (RCC § 22E-1205), criminal restraint (RCC § 22E-1404), stalking (RCC § 22E-1801), and electronic stalking (RCC § 22E-1802). "In fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to given element, here whether the accused committed one of the specified offenses. The use of "in fact" does not change the culpable mental states required in the specified offenses.

Subsection (d) codifies an exclusion from liability for the offense. The general provision in RCC § 22E-201 establishes the burdens of proof and production for all defenses in the RCC. An actor does not commit an offense under the revised criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute when, in fact, the actor's conduct is specifically permitted by a District statute or regulation. Subsection (d) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element, here that the actor's conduct is specifically permitted by a District statute or regulation. For example, Title 22, Health, of the current D.C. Municipal Regulations, has regulations that will satisfy the exclusion from liability.[7]

Subsection (e) codifies two defenses for the revised criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute. The general provision in RCC § 22E-201 establishes the requirements for the burden of production and the burden of proof for all defenses in the RCC.

Paragraph (e)(1) codifies a defense for subparagraph (a)(2)(B) of first degree of the revised criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute—causing "serious bodily injury," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701.

Paragraph (e)(1) uses the phrase "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element. Per the rules of construction in RCC § 22E-207, the term "in fact" applies to all requirements of the defense in paragraph (e)(1) and its subparagraphs and sub-subparagraphs, and there is no culpable mental state requirement for these requirements.

There are several requirements for the defense. First, per subparagraph (e)(1)(A) and sub-subparagraph (e)(1)(A)(i), the injury must be caused by a "lawful cosmetic or medical procedure." The "lawful" requirement applies both to a cosmetic procedure and a medical procedure. As specified by use of "in fact" in paragraph (e)(1), no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to the fact that the injury is caused by a lawful cosmetic or medical procedure. A medical procedure is an activity directed at or performed on an individual with the object of improving health, treating disease or injury, or making a diagnosis. Experimental medical procedures are included in this definition if they are otherwise legal under District or federal law. Cosmetic procedures that are legal[8] also are within the scope of the defense.

In the alternative, subparagraph (e)(1)(A) and sub-subparagraph (e)(1)(A)(ii) apply if the injury is caused by an omission. As specified by use of "in fact" in paragraph (e)(1), no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to the fact that the injury is caused by an "omission," a defined term in RCC § 22E-701. An omission

[7] For example, D.C. Mun. Regs. tit. 22-B, § 602.4 states:

> Any minor who is examined, treated, hospitalized, or receives health services under this chapter may give legal consent, and no person who administers the health services shall be liable civilly or criminally for assault, battery, or assault and battery; or any other civil legal charge, except for negligence or intentional harm in the diagnosis and treatment rendered to the minor and for violations of the D.C. Mental Health Information Act of 1978.

[8] See, e.g., D.C. Code § 47–2853.81. Scope of practice for cosmetologists.

includes the actor administering prayer or allowing prayer to be administered instead of medical treatment, but also accounts for other types of omissions that a vulnerable adult or elderly person should be able to give effective consent to, such as a refusal to eat, drink, or take medication, or refusing an offer from the actor to get up from a fall.

Subparagraph (e)(1)(B) requires that the actor is not "a person with legal authority over the complainant," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701. As specified by use of "in fact" in paragraph (e)(1), no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to the fact that the actor is not "a person with legal authority over the complainant." When the complainant is an "incapacitated individual," RCC § 22E-701 defines a "person with legal authority over the complainant" as "a court-appointed guardian to the complainant, or someone acting with the effective consent of such a guardian." RCC § 22E-701 further defines "incapacitated individual."

The effect of subparagraph (e)(1)(B) is that an actor who is "a person with legal authority over the complainant," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701, does not have this effective consent defense[9] to first degree criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person. However, such an actor may have a defense under either the parental or guardian defenses in RCC § 22E-408, which provide expansive defenses for specified parents and guardians and those acting with the effective consent of such a parent or guardian.[10]

Subparagraph (e)(1)(C) specifies the final requirement for the defense under paragraph (e)(1)—the actor must "reasonably believe"[11] that the complainant, or a "person with legal authority over the complainant" acting consistent with that authority gives "effective consent" to the actor to engage in the conduct that constitutes the offense. The provision in subparagraph (e)(1)(C) for a "person with legal authority over the complainant acting consistent with that authority" giving effective consent to the actor is intended to cover guardians of vulnerable adults and elderly persons giving effective consent to the actor. "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception." The RCC definition of "effective consent" incorporates the RCC definition of "consent," which requires some indication (by word or action) of agreement given by a person generally competent to do so. In addition, the RCC definition of "consent" excludes consent from a person that "[b]ecause of youth, mental disability, or intoxication, is unable to make a reasonable judgment as to the nature or harmfulness of the conduct to constitute the offense or to the result thereof." Thus, although subparagraph (e)(1)(C) permits complainants that are vulnerable adults or elderly persons to give effective consent in certain situations, the defendant's believe that such an individual gave "consent" may not be reasonable, and the defense would not apply.

[9] The defense under paragraph (e)(1) is not available to an actor that is a "person with legal authority over the complainant" and there is no general effective consent defense in the RCC.

[10] These defenses have different requirements than the effective consent defense in paragraph (e)(1). For example, both the parental and guardian defenses in RCC § 22E-408 require that the actor's conduct be reasonable.

[11] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist.

The "in fact" specified in paragraph (e)(1) applies to the requirements in subparagraph (e)(1)(C). No culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to subparagraph (e)(1)(C). It is not necessary to prove that the actor desired or was practically certain that the actor had the effective consent of one of the specified persons. However, the actor must subjectively believe, and that belief must be reasonable, that the actor has the required effective consent. Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[12] There is no effective consent defense under subparagraph (e)(1)(C) when the actor makes an unreasonable mistake as to the effective consent of the complainant or of the person acting with legal authority over the complainant. There is also no defense under subparagraph (e)(1)(C) when the actor makes an unreasonable mistake as to the fact that a person acting with legal authority over the complainant is acting consistent with their authority.

Finally, subparagraph (e)(1)(C) requires that the actor "reasonably believes" that the complainant or a "person with legal authority over the complainant acting consistent with that authority" gives effective consent to cause the injury of engage in the omission. As is discussed above, due to the "in fact" specified in paragraph (e)(1), no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to subparagraph (e)(1)(C). However, the actor must subjectively believe, and that belief must be reasonable,[13] that there is effective consent to consent to cause the injury of engage in the omission. There is no effective consent defense under subparagraph (e)(1)(C) when the actor makes an unreasonable mistake as to the type of injury or omission to which effective consent is given.[14]

[12] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

[14] For example, if, as part of a lawful medical procedure, the complainant gives effective consent to the actor to cause "bodily injury," and the actor unreasonably believes that the complainant gives effective consent to cause "serious bodily injury," the effective consent defense does not apply, and the actor may be guilty of fourth degree assault as a predicate offense against persons in third degree of the revised statute. However, the inverse is also true. If, as part of a lawful medical procedure, the complainant gives effective consent to the actor to cause "bodily injury," and the actor reasonably believes that the complainant gives

Paragraph (e)(2) codifies a defense for second degree (subsection (b)) of the revised statute—causing "significant bodily injury," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701—and third degree (subsection (c)) of the revised statute—causing "serious mental injury," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701, or engaging in a specified "RCC predicate offense against persons," defined in paragraph (g)(2) of the revised statute, such as fourth degree assault or criminal restraint. An actor that commits a predicate offense against persons, but does not have liability for criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person due to a successful affirmative defense, would still have liability for the predicate offense against persons if the requirements of that offense are met.

Paragraph (e)(2) uses the phrase "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element. Per the rules of construction in RCC § 22E-207, the term "in fact" applies to all requirements of the defense in paragraph (e)(2) and its subparagraphs and sub-subparagraphs, and there is no culpable mental state requirement for these requirements.

There are several requirements to the defense. The requirement in subparagraph (e)(2)(A) that the actor is not "a person with legal authority over the complainant," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701, is identical to the requirement in subparagraph (e)(1)(B), discussed above.

Subparagraph (e)(2)(B) requires that the actor "reasonably believes"[15] that the either the complainant or a "person with legal authority over the complainant" acting consistent with that authority gives "effective consent" to the actor to engage in the conduct specified in sub-subparagraphs (e)(2)(B)(i) and (e)(2)(B)(ii). The provision in subparagraph (e)(2)(B for a "person with legal authority over the complainant acting consistent with that authority" giving effective consent to the actor is intended to cover guardians of vulnerable adults or elderly persons giving effective consent to the actor. "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 and is defined to incorporate the RCC definition of "consent." These terms, and their applicability to the defense in paragraph (e)(1) for first degree criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person, are discussed above. This discussion also applies to the defense to second degree and third degree in subparagraph (e)(2)(B).

The "in fact" specified in paragraph (e)(2) applies to subparagraph (e)(2)(B) and no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to subparagraph (e)(2)(B). It is not necessary to prove that the actor desired or was practically certain that the actor had the effective consent of one of the specified persons. However, the actor must subjectively believe, and that belief must be reasonable, that the actor has the effective consent of one of the specified persons. Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[16] effective consent to "serious bodily injury," the effective consent defense does apply, and the actor is not guilty of first degree of the revised statute.

[15] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist.

[16] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in

There is no effective consent defense under subparagraph (e)(2)(B) when the actor makes an unreasonable mistake as to the effective consent of the complainant or of the person acting with legal authority over the complainant. There is also no defense under subparagraph (e)(2)(B) when the actor makes an unreasonable mistake as to the fact that a person acting with legal authority over the complainant is acting consistent with their authority.

Sub-subparagraphs (e)(2)(B)(i), (e)(2)(B)(ii), and (e)(2)(B)(iii) specify alternate bases for the defense under paragraph (e)(2). First, subparagraph (e)(2)(B) and sub-subparagraph (e)(2)(B)(i) require that the actor "reasonably believes" that the complainant or a "person with legal authority over the complainant acting consistent with that authority" gives effective consent to cause the injury. As is discussed above, due to the "in fact" specified in paragraph (e)(2), no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to subparagraph (e)(2)(B) or the following sub-subparagraphs. However the actor must subjectively believe, and that belief must be reasonable[17] that there is effective consent to cause the injury. There is no effective consent defense under subparagraph (e)(2)(B) when the actor makes an unreasonable mistake as to the injury to which effective consent is given.

In the alternative, subparagraph (e)(2)(B) and sub-subparagraph (e)(2)(B)(ii) apply if the injury is caused by an omission and the complainant or a "person with legal authority over the complainant" acting consistent with that authority, gave effective consent to the actor to engage in the omission. As specified by use of "in fact" in paragraph (e)(2), no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to the fact that the injury is caused by an "omission," a defined term in RCC § 22E-701. An omission includes the actor administering prayer or allowing prayer to be administered instead of medical treatment, but also accounts for other types of omissions that a vulnerable adult or elderly person should be able to give effective consent to, such as a refusal to eat, drink, or take medication, or refusing an offer from the actor to get up from a fall.

Finally, and in the alternative, subparagraph (e)(2)(B) and sub-subparagraph (e)(2)(B)(iii) require that the actor reasonably believes that the complainant, or a "person with legal authority over the complainant" acting consistent with that authority, gives "effective consent" to the actor to engage in a lawful sport, occupation, or other concerted 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

activity.[18] As noted above, there is no effective consent defense when the actor makes an unreasonable mistake as to the conduct to which effective consent is given. Sub-subparagraph (e)(2)(B)(iii) further requires that the actor's infliction of the injury is a reasonably foreseeable hazard of that activity. As specified by the "in fact" in paragraph (e)(2), no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to the requirement that the actor's infliction of the injury is a reasonably foreseeable hazard of a permissible activity. This is an objective determination and the defense does not apply if the infliction of the injury is not a reasonably foreseeable hazard.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute clearly changes current District law in six main ways.

First, the revised abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute includes a gradation for causing "significant bodily injury," which is defined in RCC § 22E-701. The current abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute grades, in part, based on whether "physical pain or injury,"[19] "serious bodily injury,"[20] or "permanent bodily harm"[21] resulted. The statute does not define any of these terms. The DCCA has interpreted "physical pain or injury" in the current abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute to include a contusion and an abrasion in a case where the complainant testified that he was "hurt,"[22] but there is no DCCA case law interpreting "serious bodily injury" or "permanent bodily harm." It is unclear how "serious bodily injury" and "permanent bodily harm" differ, if at all, particularly given that DCCA case law for the current aggravated assault statute includes permanent bodily injury in the definition of "serious bodily injury."[23] In contrast, the revised criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute includes an additional gradation for causing "significant bodily [18] "Other concerted activity" includes informal activities that aren't normally conceived as a sport or occupational activity, for example sparring, playing "catch" with a baseball, or helping someone repair their car.

[22] Poole v. United States, 929 A.2d 413, 415 (D.C. 2007) (finding sufficient evidence of "physical pain or injury" when appellant "put his knee into [the complaining witness's back] in an attempt to restrain [the complaining witness]" and threatened appellant, and appellant suffered a contusion and abrasion and testified that he was "hurt.").

[23] The District's current aggravated assault statute prohibits causing "serious bodily injury," but does not define the term. D.C. Code § 22-404.01. The DCCA has applied the definition of "serious bodily injury" that is codified in the District's current sexual abuse statutes to the aggravated assault statute. Nixon v. United States, 730 A.2d 145, 150 (D.C. 1999) ("Since the definition of "serious bodily injury" which appears in . . . the District's sexual abuse statute . . . is consistent with that followed in the majority of jurisdictions, we adopt it for the purpose of determining whether the government met its burden to prove 'serious bodily injury' under the aggravated assault statute."). The definition is "bodily injury that involves a substantial risk of death, unconsciousness, extreme physical pain, protracted and obvious disfigurement, or protracted loss or impairment of the function of a bodily member, organ, or mental faculty." D.C. Code § 22-3001(7).

injury," using the revised definition for that term in RCC § 22E-701. Both the current[24] and revised[25] assault statutes use "significant bodily injury" to partially grade the offenses, and the revised definition is modified from the definition in the current assault with significant bodily injury statute.[26] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised offense.

Second, the revised criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute does not recognize as a distinct basis of liability causing the death of a vulnerable adult or elderly person. The current abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute grades, in part, based on the death of the vulnerable adult or elderly person.[27] The current statute provides a maximum term of imprisonment of 20 years for such conduct, which is inconsistent with applicable homicide penalties currently in the D.C. Code.[28] In contrast, the revised criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute does not grade based on the death of the vulnerable adult or elderly person. The RCC homicide offenses, through penalty enhancements for killing a "protected person,"[29] provide enhanced liability for the death of a vulnerable adult or elderly person. This change reduces unnecessary overlap between the revised statute and RCC homicide offenses, and improves the proportionality and consistency of the revised statute.

Third, the revised criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute has two grades that provide liability for causing "serious mental injury," depending on whether the conduct is done purposely or recklessly. The current abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute is graded, in part, based on whether "severe mental distress" resulted.[30] Such injury requires a culpable mental state of either "intentionally" or "knowingly," without distinction in penalty,[31] and neither the current statute nor case law defines these culpable mental state terms. In contrast, the revised statute prohibits "purposely" causing "serious mental injury" in first degree criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person and "recklessly" causing "serious mental injury" in third degree criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person. Including a "recklessly" culpable mental state makes the revised criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute consistent with the current[32] and revised[33] assault offenses and the current[34] and revised[35] criminal abuse of a minor statutes, which either require or have gradations for a "recklessly" culpable mental state. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute.

Fourth, the revised criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute requires a culpable mental state of "recklessly" for physical harm. The current abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute requires a culpable mental state of either "intentionally" or "knowingly."[36] Neither the current statute nor case law defines these culpable mental state terms. In contrast, the revised first degree criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute requires a "recklessly" culpable mental state for causing serious bodily injury, significant bodily injury, or bodily injury. The "recklessly" culpable mental state is consistent with gradations in the current[37] and revised[38] assault offenses and the current[39] and revised[40] criminal abuse of a minor statutes. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute.

Fifth, the revised criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute is no longer limited to "corporal means." The current abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute requires, in part, "inflict[ing] or threat[ening] to inflict physical pain or injury by hitting, slapping, kicking, pinching, biting, pulling hair or other corporal means."[41] There is no case law regarding the phrase "corporal means." In contrast, the revised statute requires that the defendant "cause[]" the specified type of physical or mental injury by any means.[42] This change broadens the statute to potentially include drugging a complainant or using mechanical devices to inflict bodily injury. The requirement of causing injury by any means matches the current[43] and revised[44] assault culpable mental state). The District's current simple assault statute, D.C. Code § 22-404(a)(1) does not specify a culpable mental state. Current District case law suggests that recklessness may suffice, however, the DCCA has recently declined to state that recklessness, versus a higher culpable mental state, is sufficient. The culpable mental state for simple assault is discussed in First Draft of Report #15 Recommendations for Assault & Offensive Physical Contact Offenses.

statutes and the current[45] child cruelty and revised[46] criminal abuse of a minor statutes. This change reduces an unnecessary gap in the offense's coverage and improves the consistency of the statute with similar statutes.

Sixth, the revised criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute limits liability to a person that reckless as to the fact that "he or she has a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision" of the complainant. The current abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute does not state any requirements for the defendant's relationship to the complainant.[47] As a result, the current statute significantly overlaps with the District's current assault statutes,[48] which are also subject to separate enhancements for harming an elderly person.[49] However, the current neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute requires "a duty to provide [necessary] care and services" to the vulnerable adult or elderly person statute.[50] Regarding mental states, the current abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute requires an "intentionally" culpable mental state, and the current neglect statute requires "willfully or through a wanton, reckless, or willful indifference fails to discharge a duty."[51] There is no DCCA case law interpreting "intentionally" in the abuse statute, but the DCCA has generally found that "wanton, reckless, or willful indifference" in the neglect statute requires something similar to recklessness.[52] In contrast, the revised criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute limits liability to a person that is "reckless as to the fact that he or she has a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant." This change narrows the scope of liability for the offense to those persons with a duty of care to the complainant (e.g., a teacher, doctor, or caretaker). The revised criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person offense thus provides a distinct charge for individuals with responsibilities under civil law who harm those they are supposed to protect. The revised offense still overlaps in many respects with assault and other offenses that are predicates for third degree criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute, but only for persons with a duty of care to the complainant they harm.[53] Individuals who do not satisfy this requirement may still have liability under other revised offenses, such as assault (RCC § 22E-1202), criminal threats (RCC § 22E-1204), criminal restraint (RCC § 22E-1404), or offensive physical contact (RCC § 22E-1205). This change reduces unnecessary overlap between the revised statute and other RCC offenses against persons, including assault.

United States*, 62 A.3d 1266, 1271 (D.C. 2013).
[53] Under the general merger provision in RCC § 22E-214, the predicate offenses for third degree criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person are intended to merge into a conviction for criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person when arising from the same course of conduct.

First, the revised criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute prohibits behavior that would constitute stalking, electronic stalking, criminal threats, or criminal restraint, as defined by the RCC. The current abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute prohibits, in part, conduct that "threatens to inflict physical pain or injury,"[54] uses "repeated or malicious oral or written statements that would be considered by a reasonable person to be harassing or threatening,"[55] or involves "unreasonable confinement or involuntary seclusion, including but not limited to, the forced separation from other persons against his or her will or the directions of any legal representative."[56] There is no DCCA case law interpreting the meaning of these provisions in the current statute, or how such conduct may differ from conduct covered in other current statutes that prohibit threats,[57] stalking,[58] or involuntary confinement.[59] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute clearly states that third degree includes the RCC offenses of stalking, criminal threats, or criminal restraint. The revised stalking (RCC § 22E-1801), electronic stalking (RCC § 22E-1802), and criminal threats (RCC § 22E-1204) statutes cover threats of "physical pain or injury" and "repeated or malicious oral or written statements that would be considered by a reasonable person to be harassing or threatening" in the current statute, and the revised criminal restraint statute (RCC § 22E-1404) covers conduct involving unreasonable confinement or involuntary seclusion in the current statute. This change improves the clarity of the revised offense and creates consistency between the revised offense and other closely related offenses pertaining to such as criminal threats and restraint.

Second, the revised criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute prohibits behavior that satisfies fourth degree assault as defined in RCC § 22E-1202(d) and offensive physical contact as defined in RCC § 22E-1205. The current abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute requires, in part, "inflict[ing] or threat[ening] to inflict physical pain or injury by hitting, slapping, kicking, pinching, biting, pulling hair or other corporal means."[60] The DCCA has interpreted "physical pain or injury…or other corporal means" in the current abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute to include a contusion and an abrasion in a case where the complainant testified that he was "hurt,"[61] but did not provide a definition of the terms. The revised abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute establishes that, whether or not it would constitute a physical injury by corporal means, causing "bodily injury," as required by fourth degree assault, or offensive physical contact is within the scope of the offense. This change clarifies and potentially fills a gap in the current statute.

Third, the revised criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute requires a culpable mental state of recklessness as to the fact that the complainant is a vulnerable adult or elderly person. The current abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute does not specify what culpable mental state, if any, applies to the fact that the complaining witness is a vulnerable adult or elderly person.[62] There is no DCCA case law discussing if there is a culpable mental state for this element. However, the current enhancement for certain crimes committed against senior citizens provides a defense that the accused did not know or reasonably believed that the victim was not 65 years or older.[63] To resolve these ambiguities, the revised criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute consistently requires a "recklessly" culpable mental state as to the fact that the complainant is a vulnerable adult or elderly person. The "recklessly" culpable mental state matches the culpable mental state for the fact that the complainant is under the age of 18 years in the revised criminal abuse of a minor and criminal neglect of a minor statutes (RCC §§ 22E-1501 and 22E-1502), and the "protected person" gradations in the revised assault statute (RCC § 22E-1202). A "recklessly" culpable mental state is also consistent with the culpable mental state requirements in the current enhancement for certain crimes committed against senior citizens.[64] This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense.

Fourth, the revised criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute incorporates the standard definitions for the terms "serious bodily injury" and "bodily injury" in RCC § 22E-701. The District's current abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute is graded, in part, based on whether "physical pain or injury" or "serious bodily injury" results.[65] The current statute, however, does not define these terms. The [62] The current neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute requires a culpable mental state of "intentionally or knowingly." D.C. Code § 22-933. Surprisingly, "vulnerable adult" or "elderly person" are not codified elements of the current criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person offense in D.C. Code § 22-933, nor is proof that the complainant is a "vulnerable adult" or "elderly person" codified as an element in the offense's penalty provisions. D.C. Code §§ 22-933, 22-936.

[63] The current enhancement for crimes against senior citizens makes it an affirmative defense that "the accused knew or reasonably believed the victim was not 65 years old or older at the time of the offense, or could not have known or determined the age of the victim because of the manner in which the offense was committed." D.C. Code § 22-3601(c). Abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person is not one of the crimes to which the current senior citizens enhancement applies.

[64] "Reckless" is defined in RCC § 22E-206 and means that the accused must consciously disregard a substantial risk that the complainant was 65 years of age or older. In the RCC, an accused that knew or reasonably believed that the complainant was not 65 years or older or could not have known or determined the age of the complainant, per the current enhancement for crimes against senior citizens, would not satisfy the culpable mental state of recklessness as to the age of the complaining witness. The accused would not consciously disregard a substantial risk that the complainant was 65 years of age or older. See RCC § 22E-208(b)(3) and accompanying commentary, providing that a reasonable mistake as to a circumstance element negates the existence of recklessness as to that element.

[65] If "serious bodily injury or severe mental distress" results, the current abuse of a vulnerable adult offense has a maximum term of imprisonment of 10 years. D.C. Code § 22-936(b). If "permanent bodily harm or death" results, the current offense has a maximum term of imprisonment of 20 years. D.C. Code § 22-936(c). If the offense results in a lesser harm than "serious bodily injury," "severe mental distress,"

DCCA has interpreted "physical pain or injury" in the current abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute to include a contusion and an abrasion in a case where the complainant testified that he was "hurt,"[66] but did not provide a definition of either term. There is no DCCA case law interpreting "serious bodily injury" in the current abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute.[67] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute codifies and uses standard definitions of "serious bodily injury" and "bodily injury" per RCC § 22E-701. The revised definition of "serious bodily injury" is modified from the definition that the DCCA applies to the current aggravated assault statute[68] and would appear to encompass "permanent bodily harm" in the current abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute. It is unclear whether the revised definition otherwise changes "serious bodily injury" in the current statute. The revised definition of "bodily injury" in RCC § 22E-701 encompasses the limited DCCA case law interpreting "bodily injury" for the current abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute, as well as the alternative basis for liability in the current statute, that the conduct cause "physical pain."[69] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute.

Fifth, the revised criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute incorporates the standardized definition of "serious mental injury" in RCC § 22E-701. The current abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute grades, in part, based on [67] However, there is DCCA case law interpreting "serious bodily injury" in the current aggravated assault statute. "The current aggravated assault statute prohibits causing "serious bodily injury," but does not define the term. D.C. Code § 22-404.01. The DCCA has applied the definition of "serious bodily injury" that is codified in the District's current sexual abuse statutes to the aggravated assault statute. *Nixon v. The definition is "bodily injury that involves a substantial risk of death, unconsciousness, extreme physical pain, protracted and obvious disfigurement, or protracted loss or impairment of the function of a bodily member, organ, or mental faculty." whether "severe mental distress" resulted,[70] but the statute does not define the term and there is no DCCA case law. Resolving this ambiguity, RCC § 22E-701 defines "serious mental injury" as "substantial, prolonged harm to a person's psychological or intellectual functioning, which may be exhibited by severe anxiety, depression, withdrawal, or outwardly aggressive behavior, or a combination of those behaviors, and which may be demonstrated by a change in behavior, emotional response, or cognition." The revised criminal abuse of a minor and criminal neglect of a minor statutes also use the term "serious mental injury," which is modified from the District's current civil statutes for proceedings on child delinquency, neglect, or need of supervision.[71] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised offense.

Sixth, the revised criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute requires a culpable mental state as to the resulting physical or mental injury. The current abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute requires culpable mental states of "intentionally or knowingly" as to the prohibited conduct.[72] However, the current offense's penalty gradations do not specify culpable mental states for whether the prohibited conduct "causes" "serious bodily injury or severe mental distress"[73] or "permanent bodily harm or death."[74] The DCCA has not determined whether there is a culpable mental state for the resulting physical or mental harm in the abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute. Unlike the current statute, the revised statute clarifies that a culpable mental state applies to the resulting physical or mental harm—either "recklessly" or "purposely." This change improves the clarity, completeness, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Seventh, the revised criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute does not recognize as a distinct basis of liability causing "permanent bodily harm." The current abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute grades, in part, based on whether "permanent bodily harm" resulted,[75] providing a maximum term of imprisonment of 20 years for such conduct. The current statute does not define "permanent bodily harm" and there is no comparable grade in the District's current assault statutes. However, the current aggravated assault statute does prohibit "serious bodily injury"[76] and DCCA case law includes permanent bodily injury in the definition of "serious bodily injury."[77] To resolve this ambiguity, the revised criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute grades, in part, on whether "serious bodily injury" occurred, as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Eighth, the revised criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute codifies an effective consent defense, discussed extensively in the explanatory note to the offense. District statutes do not codify general defenses to criminal conduct. The current abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute does not address whether consent of the complainant is a defense to liability, although current D.C. Code § 22-935 exempts from liability anyone who "provides or permits to be provided treatment by spiritual means through prayer alone in accordance with a religious method of healing, in lieu of medical treatment."[78] Longstanding case law of the United States Court of Appeals District of Columbia Circuit (D.C. Cir.) in Guarro v. United States has recognized that consent is a defense to assault, at least in the case of a nonviolent sexual touching.[79] A recent DCCA opinion in Woods v. United States, however, held that consent of the complainant is not a defense to assault in a public place that causes significant bodily injury, but explicitly declined to rule on the effect of consent in other circumstances.[80] It is unclear whether this District case law for assault would apply to abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute effective consent defense clarifies when the actor's reasonable belief that the complainant or a "person with legal authority over the complainant," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701, has given "effective consent" is a defense. In particular, the new effective consent defenses in subsection (e) specifically address where the injury is caused by an "omission" if the complainant, or a "or person with legal authority over the complainant" acting consistent with that authority gives effective consent to the omission. This replaces in relevant part the exception in the current D.C. Code abuse or neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statutes.[81] An omission includes the actor administering prayer or allowing prayer to be administered instead of medical treatment, but also accounts for other types of omissions that a vulnerable adult or elderly person should be able to give effective consent to, such as a refusal to eat, drink, or take medication, or refusing an offer from the actor to get up from a fall. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Ninth, the revised criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute codifies an exclusion from liability for conduct that is specifically permitted by a District statute or regulation. The District's current abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statutes do not address whether conduct that is specifically permitted under another District law or regulation can result in criminal liability for those offenses. The exclusion resolves any apparent conflict within District laws. For example, Title 22, Health, of the current D.C. Municipal Regulations, has regulations that specifically refer to immunity from assault liability that clearly will satisfy this exclusion from liability.[82] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change District law.

[82] For example, D.C. Mun. Regs. tit. 22-B, § 602.4 states:

> Any minor who is examined, treated, hospitalized, or receives health services under this chapter may give legal consent, and no person who administers the health services shall be liable civilly or criminally for assault, battery, or assault and battery; or any other civil legal charge, except for negligence or intentional harm in the diagnosis and treatment rendered to the minor and for violations of the D.C. Mental Health Information Act of 1978.

RCC § 22E-1504. Criminal Neglect of a Vulnerable Adult or Elderly Person.

Explanatory Note. The RCC criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person offense proscribes a broad range of conduct in which there is a risk of harm to a vulnerable adult or elderly person's bodily integrity or mental well-being. In addition to prohibiting a risk of harm to a vulnerable adult or elderly person, the RCC neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person offense prohibits failing to provide a vulnerable adult or elderly person with necessary items or care. The penalty gradations are primarily based on the type of physical or mental harm that is risked. Along with the revised criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person offense, the revised criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person offense replaces several offenses and provisions in the current D.C. Code: abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person;[1] neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person;[2] and the spiritual healing defense for abuse or neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person.[3]

There are three degrees of the RCC criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute. Each gradation requires that the accused is "reckless" as to the fact that he or she has a "responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant"[4] (paragraph (a)(1) and subparagraph (a)(1)(A) for first degree, paragraph (b)(1) and subparagraph (b)(1)(A) for second degree, and paragraph (c)(1) and subparagraph (c)(1)(A)) for third degree). Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "reckless" culpable mental state specified in paragraph (a)(1) for first degree, paragraph (b)(1) for second degree, and paragraph (c)(1)) for third degree, applies to the fact that the complainant has the specified responsibility to the complainant in subparagraph (a)(1)(A) for first degree, subparagraph (b)(1)(A) for second degree, and subparagraph (c)(1)(A)) for third degree). "Reckless" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the accused must consciously disregard a substantial risk that he or she has a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant.

Each gradation of the offense further requires that the accused is "reckless" as to the fact that the complainant is a "vulnerable adult" or "elderly person," as those terms are defined in RCC § 22E-701. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "reckless" culpable mental state specified in paragraph (a)(1) for first degree, paragraph (b)(1) for second degree, and paragraph (c)(1)) for third degree, applies to the fact that the complainant is a "vulnerable adult" or "elderly person" in subparagraph (a)(1)(B) for first degree, subparagraph (b)(1)(B) for second degree, and subparagraph (c)(1)(B)) for third degree). "Reckless" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the accused must consciously disregard a substantial risk that the complainant is a "vulnerable adult" or "elderly person," as those terms are defined in RCC § 22E-701.

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies the prohibited conduct for first degree criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person, the highest grade of the revised criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person offense—creating, or failing to mitigate or remedy, a substantial risk that the complainant would experience "serious bodily injury" or death. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "reckless" culpable mental state in paragraph (a)(1) applies to this requirement. "Reckless" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the accused must consciously disregard a substantial risk that he or she created, or failed to mitigate or remedy, a substantial risk that the complainant would experience "serious bodily injury" or death. "Serious bodily injury" is a term defined in RCC § 22E-701 as injury involving a substantial risk of death, or protracted and obvious disfigurement, or protracted loss or impairment of the function of a bodily member or organ, or protracted unconsciousness.

Subsection (b) specifies the prohibited conduct for second degree criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person. Paragraph (b)(2) and subparagraph (b)(2)(A) specify one type of prohibited conduct—creating, or failing to mitigate or remedy, a substantial risk that the complainant would experience "significant bodily injury." "Significant bodily injury" is the intermediate level of bodily injury in the RCC and is defined in RCC § 22E-701 as an injury that requires hospitalization or immediate medical treatment, or is a specific type of injury, such as a fracture of a bone. Per the rule of construction in RCC § 22E-207, the "reckless" culpable mental state in paragraph (b)(1) applies to the elements in paragraph (b)(2) and subparagraph (b)(2)(A). "Reckless" is a term defined in RCC § 22E-206 which, applied here, means being aware of a substantial risk that one's conduct will create, or fail to mitigate or remedy, a substantial risk that the complainant would experience "significant bodily injury."

Paragraph (b)(2) and subparagraph (b)(2)(B) specify the second type of prohibited conduct for second degree criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person—creating, or failing to mitigate or remedy, a substantial risk that a child would experience "serious mental injury." "Serious mental injury" is a term defined in RCC § 22E-701 as "substantial, prolonged harm to a person's psychological or intellectual functioning." Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "reckless" culpable mental state in paragraph (b)(1) applies to the elements in paragraph (b)(2) and subparagraph (b)(2)(B). "Reckless" is a term defined in RCC § 22E-206 which, applied here, means being aware of a substantial risk that one's conduct will create, or fail to mitigate or remedy, a substantial risk that the complainant would experience "serious mental injury."

Subsection (c) specifies the prohibited conduct for third degree criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person. Subparagraph (c)(2)(A) specifies one type of prohibited conduct—failing to make a reasonable effort to provide food, clothing, or other items or care for the complainant that are "essential to the physical health, mental health, or safety of the complainant." Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the culpable mental state of "reckless" in paragraph (c)(1) applies to all the elements in subparagraph (c)(2)(A). "Reckless" is a term defined in RCC § 22E-206 which, applied here, means being aware of a substantial risk that one's conduct will fail to make a reasonable effort to provide the items or care and that the items or care are "essential to the physical health, mental health, or safety of the complainant."

Subparagraph (c)(2)(B) establishes liability for creating, or failing to mitigate or remedy, a substantial risk that the complainant would experience "bodily injury" from consumption of alcohol, or consumption or inhalation, without a valid prescription, of a "controlled substance" or marijuana.[5] "Bodily injury" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 as "physical pain, physical injury, illness, or impairment of physical condition." "Controlled substance" is also a defined term in RCC § 22E-701. Per the rule of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "recklessly" culpable mental state in paragraph (c)(1) applies to all elements in subparagraph (c)(2)(B). "Recklessly" is defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means being aware of a substantial risk that one's conduct will create, or fail to mitigate or remedy, a substantial risk that the complainant would experience bodily injury from consumption of alcohol, or consumption or inhalation, without a valid prescription, of a controlled substance or marijuana.

Subsection (d) codifies an exclusion from liability for the offense. The general provision in RCC § 22E-201 establishes the burdens of proof and production for all exclusions from liability in the RCC. An actor does not commit an offense under the revised criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute when, in fact, the actor's conduct is specifically permitted by a District statute or regulation. Subsection (d) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element, here that the actor's conduct is specifically permitted by a District statute or regulation. For example, Title 22, Health, of the current D.C. Municipal Regulations, has regulations that will satisfy the exclusion from liability.[6]

Subsection (e) codifies two defenses for the revised criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute. The general provision in RCC § 22E-201 establishes the requirements for the burden of production and the burden of proof for all defenses in the RCC.

Paragraph (e)(1) codifies a defense for first degree (subsection (a)) of the revised criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute—creating, or failing to mitigate or remedy, a substantial risk that the complainant would experience "serious bodily injury," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701, or death.

Paragraph (e)(1) uses the phrase "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element. Per the rules of construction in RCC § 22E-207, the term "in fact" applies to all requirements of [5] Specific reference is made to marijuana to ensure that marijuana is categorically included, regardless of amount. Title 48 of the D.C. Code generally defines a controlled substance to include marijuana as a controlled substance (see D.C. Code § 48–901.02(4)), but also separately modifies that general definition (see D.C. Code § 48–904.01(a)(1A)(A)) to eliminate marijuana under 2 ounces possessed by a person 21 or over. Because marijuana is categorically included, a caregiver who legally possesses marijuana may, for example, still be liable for blowing smoke from the marijuana upon a vulnerable adult or elderly person if it is proven that such conduct creates a substantial risk that the complainant would experience bodily injury from the smoke.

[6] For example, D.C. Mun. Regs. tit. 22-B, § 602.4 states:

> Any minor who is examined, treated, hospitalized, or receives health services under this chapter may give legal consent, and no person who administers the health services shall be liable civilly or criminally for assault, battery, or assault and battery; or any other civil legal charge, except for negligence or intentional harm in the diagnosis and treatment rendered to the minor and for violations of the D.C. Mental Health Information Act of 1978.

the defense in paragraph (e)(1) and its subparagraphs and sub-subparagraphs, and there is no culpable mental state requirement for these requirements.

There are several requirements for the defense. First, per subparagraph (e)(1)(A) and sub-subparagraph (e)(1)(A)(i), the risk must be caused by a "lawful cosmetic or medical procedure." The "lawful" requirement applies both to a cosmetic procedure and a medical procedure. As specified by use of "in fact" in paragraph (e)(1), no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to the fact that the risk is caused by a lawful cosmetic or medical procedure. A medical procedure is an activity directed at or performed on an individual with the object of improving health, treating disease or injury, or making a diagnosis. Experimental medical procedures are included in this definition if they are otherwise legal under District or federal law. Cosmetic procedures that are legal[7] also are within the scope of the defense.

In the alternative, subparagraph (e)(1)(A) and sub-subparagraph (e)(1)(A)(ii) apply if the risk is caused by an omission. As specified by use of "in fact" in paragraph (e)(1), no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to the fact that the risk is caused by an "omission," a defined term in RCC § 22E-701. An omission includes the actor administering prayer or allowing prayer to be administered instead of medical treatment, but also accounts for other types of omissions that a vulnerable adult or elderly person should be able to give effective consent to, such as a refusal to eat, drink, or take medication, or refusing an offer from the actor to get up from a fall.

Subparagraph (e)(1)(B) requires that the actor is not "a person with legal authority over the complainant," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701. As specified by use of "in fact" in paragraph (e)(1), no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to the fact that the actor is not "a person with legal authority over the complainant." When the complainant is an "incapacitated individual," RCC § 22E-701 defines a "person with legal authority over the complainant" as "a court-appointed guardian to the complainant, or someone acting with the effective consent of such a guardian." RCC § 22E-701 further defines "incapacitated individual."

The effect of subparagraph (e)(1)(B) is that an actor who is "a person with legal authority over the complainant," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701, does not have this effective consent defense[8] to first degree criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person. However, such an actor may have a defense under either the parental or guardian defenses in RCC § 22E-408, which provide expansive defenses for specified parents and guardians and those acting with the effective consent of such a parent or guardian.[9]

Subparagraph (e)(1)(C) specifies the final requirement for the defense under paragraph (e)(1)—the actor must "reasonably believe"[10] that the complainant, or a "person with legal authority over the complainant" acting consistent with that authority

[7] See, e.g., D.C. Code § 47–2853.81. Scope of practice for cosmetologists.

[8] The defense under paragraph (e)(1) is not available to an actor that is a "person with legal authority over the complainant" and there is no general effective consent defense in the RCC.

[9] These defenses have different requirements than the effective consent defense in paragraph (e)(1). For example, both the parental and guardian defenses in RCC § 22E-408 require that the actor's conduct be reasonable.

gives "effective consent" to the actor to engage in the conduct that constitutes the offense. The provision in subparagraph (e)(1)(C) for a "person with legal authority over the complainant acting consistent with that authority" giving effective consent to the actor is intended to cover guardians of vulnerable adults and elderly persons giving effective consent to the actor. "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception." The RCC definition of "effective consent" incorporates the RCC definition of "consent," which requires some indication (by word or action) of agreement given by a person generally competent to do so. In addition, the RCC definition of "consent" excludes consent from a person that "[b]ecause of youth, mental disability, or intoxication, is unable to make a reasonable judgment as to the nature or harmfulness of the conduct to constitute the offense or to the result thereof." Thus, although subparagraph (e)(1)(C) permits complainants that are vulnerable adults or elderly persons to give effective consent in certain situations, the defendant's believe that such an individual gave "consent" may not be reasonable, and the defense would not apply.

The "in fact" specified in paragraph (e)(1) applies to the requirements in subparagraph (e)(1)(C). No culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to subparagraph (e)(1)(C). It is not necessary to prove that the actor desired or was practically certain that the actor had the effective consent of one of the specified persons. However, the actor must subjectively believe, and that belief must be reasonable, that the actor has the required effective consent. Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[11] There is no effective consent defense under subparagraph (e)(1)(C) when the actor makes an unreasonable mistake as to the effective consent of the complainant or of the person acting with legal authority over the complainant. There is also no defense under subparagraph (e)(1)(C) when the actor makes an unreasonable mistake as to the fact that a person acting with legal authority over the complainant is acting consistent with their authority.

Finally, subparagraph (e)(1)(C) requires that the actor "reasonably believes" that the complainant or a "person with legal authority over the complainant acting consistent with that authority" gives effective consent to engage in the conduct that constitutes the offense. As is discussed above, due to the "in fact" specified in paragraph (e)(1), no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to subparagraph (e)(1)(C). However, the actor must subjectively believe, and that belief must be reasonable,[12] that there is effective consent to consent to engage in the conduct that constitutes the offense. There is no effective consent defense under subparagraph (e)(1)(C) when the actor makes an unreasonable mistake as to the conduct to which effective consent is given.

If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

Paragraph (e)(2) codifies a defense for second degree (subsection (b)) of the revised statute—creating, or failing to mitigate or remedy, a substantial risk that the complainant would experience "significant bodily injury" or "serious mental injury" as those terms are defined in RCC § 22E-701—and third degree (subsection (c)) of the revised statute—failing to make a reasonable effort to provide essential items or care or creating, or failing to remedy a risk of bodily injury from drug or alcohol consumption.

Paragraph (e)(2) uses the phrase "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element. Per the rules of construction in RCC § 22E-207, the term "in fact" applies to all requirements of the defense in paragraph (e)(2) and its subparagraphs and sub-subparagraphs, and there is no culpable mental state requirement for these requirements.

There are several requirements to the defense. The requirement in subparagraph (e)(2)(A) that the actor is not "a person with legal authority over the complainant," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701, is identical to the requirement in subparagraph (e)(1)(B), discussed above.

Subparagraph (e)(2)(B) requires that the actor "reasonably believes"[13] that the either the complainant or a "person with legal authority over the complainant" acting consistent with that authority gives "effective consent" to the actor to engage in the conduct specified in sub-subparagraphs (e)(2)(B)(i) and (e)(2)(B)(ii). The provision in subparagraph (e)(2)(B for a "person with legal authority over the complainant acting consistent with that authority" giving effective consent to the actor is intended to cover guardians of vulnerable adults or elderly persons giving effective consent to the actor. "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 and is defined to incorporate the RCC definition of "consent." These terms, and their applicability to the defense in paragraph (e)(1) for first degree criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person, are discussed above. This discussion also applies to the defense to second degree and third degree in subparagraph (e)(2)(B).

The "in fact" specified in paragraph (e)(2) applies to subparagraph (e)(2)(B) and no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to subparagraph (e)(2)(B). It is not necessary to prove that the actor desired or was practically certain that the actor had the effective consent of one of the specified persons. If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[14] There is no effective consent defense under subparagraph (e)(2)(B) when the actor makes an unreasonable mistake as to the effective consent of the complainant or of the person acting with legal authority over the complainant. There is also no defense under subparagraph (f)(2)(B) when the actor makes an unreasonable mistake as to the fact that a person acting with legal authority over the complainant is acting consistent with their authority.

Sub-subparagraphs (e)(2)(B)(i) and (e)(2)(B)(ii) specify alternate bases for the defense under paragraph (e)(2). First, subparagraph (e)(2)(B) and sub-subparagraph (e)(2)(B)(i) require that the actor "reasonably believes" that the complainant or a "person with legal authority over the complainant acting consistent with that authority" gives effective consent to engage in the conduct to constitute the offense.[15] As is discussed above, due to the "in fact" specified in paragraph (e)(2), no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to subparagraph (e)(2)(B) or the following sub-subparagraphs. However the actor must subjectively believe, and that belief must be reasonable[16] that there is effective consent to engage in the conduct that constitutes the offense. There is no effective consent defense under subparagraph (e)(2)(B) when the actor makes an unreasonable mistake as to the conduct to which effective consent is given.

In the alternative, subparagraph (e)(2)(B) and sub-subparagraph (e)(2)(B)(ii) require that the actor reasonably believes that the complainant, or a "person with legal authority over the complainant" acting consistent with that authority, gives "effective consent" to the actor to engage in a lawful sport, occupation, or other concerted activity.[17] As noted above, there is no effective consent defense when the actor makes an unreasonable mistake as to the conduct to which effective consent is given. If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

[15] The "conduct that constitutes the offense" in sub-subparagraph (e)(2)(B)(i) includes an omission. The sub-subparagraph does not use the term "omission," but the offense includes a failure to mitigate or remedy a risk and encompasses omissions.

[16] Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others. See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' [17] "Other concerted activity" includes informal activities that aren't normally conceived as a sport or occupational activity, for example sparring, playing "catch" with a baseball, or helping someone repair their car.

subparagraph (e)(2)(B)(ii) further requires that the actor's creation of the risk, or failure to mitigate or remedy the risk,[18] is a reasonably foreseeable hazard of that activity. As specified by the "in fact" in paragraph (e)(2), no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to the requirement that the actor's creation of, or failure to mitigate or remedy, the risk is a reasonably foreseeable hazard of a permissible activity. This is an objective determination and the defense does not apply if the infliction of the injury is not a reasonably foreseeable hazard.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute changes current District law in three main ways.

First, the revised criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute is limited to conduct that does not actually harm a person. The current neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute requires a failure to discharge a duty to provide necessary care and services to a vulnerable adult or elderly person.[19] The penalties for the offense, however, partially grade the offense on actual harm to the vulnerable adult or elderly person,[20] and partially on a failure to discharge the required duty.[21] In contrast, the revised criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute no longer grades the offense based on whether actual harm to the vulnerable adult or elderly person resulted. The revised statute is instead limited to creating, or failing to mitigate or remedy, a risk of harm to an elderly person or vulnerable adult, or a failure to provide necessary items or care. However, if physical or mental injury or death results, there still may be liability under the revised criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute (RCC § 22E-1503), the revised assault statute (RCC § 22E-1202), or the revised homicide offenses[22] (RCC §§ 22E-1101, 22E-1102, 22E-1103). This change reduces [18] "Failure to mitigate or remedy" a risk in sub-subparagraph (e)(2)(B)(ii) encompass an omission even though the sub-subparagraph does not use the term "omission."

[19] D.C. Code § 22-934.

[20] The higher gradations of the current statute require either "serious bodily injury or severe mental distress," with a maximum term of imprisonment of ten years, D.C. Code §§ 22-934, 22-936(b), or "permanent bodily harm or death," with a maximum term of imprisonment of 20 years, D.C. Code §§ 22-934, 22-936(c).

[21] D.C. Code §§ 22-934, 22-936(a) (stating that "[a] person who commits the offense of . . . criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person shall" receive a maximum term of imprisonment of 180 days.").

[22] The current abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute prohibits, in part, "intentionally or knowingly impos[ing] unreasonable confinement or involuntary seclusion." D.C. Code § 22-933(3). In one gradation of the current offense, if the defendant "causes permanent bodily harm or death," there is a maximum term of imprisonment of 20 years. D.C. Code § 22-934(c). The current statute does not specify any culpable mental state as to causing death and there is no DCCA case law, meaning that current District law may apply strict liability. For example if, after a defendant cuts off an elderly person's phone lines, the elderly person falls and dies because he or she cannot call for help, a court could find that the defendant "caused" the elderly person's death, even if the defendant was unaware that there was a risk of death. It is unclear whether current District homicide laws would cover imposing "unreasonable confinement or involuntary seclusion" that leads to death, as in this scenario.

unnecessary overlap between offenses and improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense.

Second, the revised criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute applies a recklessness requirement rather than a reasonable person standard to whether items or care are essential for the well-being of the vulnerable adult or elderly person. The current neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute requires "that a reasonable person would deem the items or care essential for the well-being of the vulnerable adult or elderly person."[23] It is unclear under the current statute what culpable mental state, if any, applies to the fact that the items or care are essential, although the statute's "reasonable person" standard may suggest a culpable mental state of negligence for this element. DCCA case law has not specifically addressed this culpable mental state, but has generally found that "wanton, reckless or willful indifference," two other culpable mental states specified in the current criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute, requires something similar to recklessness.[24] In contrast, the revised criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute eliminates the current statute's reasonable person requirement and applies a "recklessly" culpable mental state as defined in RCC § 22E-206. As applied in the revised statute, "recklessly" requires that a person is aware of a substantial risk that the items or care are "essential for the health or safety of a vulnerable adult or elderly person." This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised offense.[25]

Third, the revised criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute no longer requires as a distinct element that the defendant fail to discharge a duty to provide necessary care and services. The current D.C. Code neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute requires that the defendant "fail[] to discharge a duty to provide care and services necessary to maintain the physical and mental health" of a vulnerable adult or elderly person.[26] There is no case law regarding this phrase. Moreover, the D.C. Code does not specify any general defense for assault-type conduct committed with intent to fulfill a person's duty of care to another person, and there is no case law concerning such a general defense.[27] In contrast, the revised criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or

The revised criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute no longer specifically prohibits "unreasonable confinement or involuntary seclusion," although this conduct appears to be covered under the revised criminal restraint offense (RCC § 22E-1404). However, the RCC has a revised negligent homicide offense (RCC § 22E-1103) that may cover this conduct, and, depending on the facts of the case, the revised manslaughter offense (RCC § 22E-1102) may cover it.

[23] D.C. Code § 22-934.

[24] In Tarpeh v. United States, the DCCA held that "reckless indifference" requires not only "that the actor did not care about the consequences of his or her actions, but also that the actor was consciously aware of the risks involved in light of known alternative courses of action." Tarpeh v. United States, 62 A.3d 1266, 1271 (D.C. 2013).

[25] Although "essential for the health or safety of a vulnerable adult or elderly person" is an element of third degree of the revised criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute, the issue also may arise in the other degrees of the offense that prohibit "a substantial risk" of specified physical and mental harms. In these degrees, the "recklessly" culpable mental state would encompass recklessness as to whether items or care were essential for the health or safety of the vulnerable adult or elderly person.

[26] D.C. Code § 22-934.

[27] The DCCA has recognized a "lesser-evils" or "necessity" type of justification defense, however, that may apply in situations where an actor commits an assault-type act on a complainant as part of his or her duty of care to the complainant (e.g., a caretaker who restrains his ward to keep the ward from running into elderly person statute requires as an element of the offense only that the defendant have a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant, is reckless as to having this responsibility, and commit otherwise specified conduct. The RCC general justification defense for parents, guardians, and others per RCC § 22E-408 limits liability when an otherwise criminal act is justifiably committed because of the actor's duty of care to the complainant. Under this defense, once an actor's burden of production is satisfied, the government must prove that the actor's conduct was a violation of his or her duty of care. Specifically, in a charge of third degree of the RCC criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute, where an actor claims his or her conduct is in accord with his duty of care under RCC § 22E-408, the government then would need to prove that his or her failure to provide essential items or care was a violation of the actor's duty of care. Consequently, the effect of removing as a distinct element of the revised statute that the defendant fail to discharge a duty to provide necessary care and services is simply that the burden of alleging that such a failure was not a violation of the actor's duty of care falls upon the actor. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Beyond these three substantive changes to current District law, seven other aspects of the statute may be viewed as a substantive change of law.

First, the revised criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute requires a culpable mental state of recklessness as to the fact that the complainant is a vulnerable adult or elderly person. The current neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute is silent as to what culpable mental state, if any, applies to the fact that the complainant is a vulnerable adult or elderly person. There is no DCCA case law discussing the matter. However, the current neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute requires proof that the defendant "willfully or through a wanton, reckless, or willful indifference fails to discharge a duty" to a vulnerable adult or elderly person, which may imply awareness of the complainant's status which is the basis of the "duty." In a related statutory provision, the current enhancement for certain crimes committed against senior citizens provides a defense that the accused did not know or reasonably believed that the victim was not 65 years or older.[28] To resolve these ambiguities, the revised criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute consistently requires a "reckless" culpable mental state as to the fact that the complainant is an elderly person or a vulnerable adult. The reckless culpable mental state requirement matches the culpable mental state required as to the fact that the complainant is under the age 18 years in the revised criminal abuse and criminal neglect of a minor statutes (RCC § 22E-1501 and § 22E-1502) and the "protected person" gradations in the revised assault statute traffic). See Griffin v. United States, 447 A.2d 776, 777 (D.C. 1982) ("In essence, the necessity defense exonerates persons who commit a crime under the "pressure of circumstances," if the harm that would have resulted from compliance with the law would have significantly exceeded the harm actually resulting from the defendants' breach of the law.").

[28] The current enhancement for crimes against senior citizens makes it an affirmative defense that "the accused knew or reasonably believed the victim was not 65 years old or older at the time of the offense, or could not have known or determined the age of the victim because of the manner in which the offense was committed." D.C. Code § 223601(c). Abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person is not one of the crimes to which the current senior citizens enhancement applies.

(RCC § 22E-1202). A "reckless" culpable mental state is also consistent with the culpable mental state requirements in the current enhancement for certain crimes committed against senior citizens.[29] This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense.

Second, the revised criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute requires a "substantial risk" of the specified physical or mental harm for liability. The current neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute requires a failure to discharge a duty to provide necessary care and services to a vulnerable adult or elderly person.[30] The penalties for the offense partially grade on a failure to discharge the required duty.[31] In such a situation, it appears that an actual risk of harm may not be necessary,[32] although failure to mitigate a risk has been the basis of liability in at least one case.[33] The revised criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute clarifies that the required risk must be "substantial." The "substantial" language is technically superfluous where recklessness is alleged because the "reckless" culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-206, also requires, in relevant part, that a risk be "substantial." However, given that neglect offenses will often depend on the nature of the risk to the vulnerable adult or elderly person, the revised statute specifies the "substantial" requirement to clarify the statute, particularly where the defendant is alleged [29] The current enhancement for crimes against senior citizens makes it an affirmative defense that "the accused knew or reasonably believed the victim was not 65 years old or older at the time of the offense, or could not have known or determined the age of the victim because of the manner in which the offense was committed." D.C. Code § 223601(c). "Reckless" is defined in RCC § 22E-206 and means that the accused must consciously disregard a substantial risk that the complainant was 65 years of age or older. In the RCC, an accused that knew or reasonably believed that the complainant was not 65 years or older or could not have known or determined the age of the complainant would not satisfy the culpable mental states of recklessness or knowledge as to the age of the complaining witness. The accused would not consciously disregard a substantial risk (recklessness) or be practically certain (knowledge) that the complainant was 65 years of age or older. See RCC § 22E-208(b)(3) and accompanying commentary, providing that a reasonable mistake as to a circumstance element negates the existence of recklessness as to that element. Criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person is not one of the crimes to which the current senior citizens enhancement applies.

[30] D.C. Code § 22-934.

[31] D.C. Code §§ 22-934, 22-936(a) (stating that "[a] person who commits the offense of . . . criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person shall" receive a maximum term of imprisonment of 180 days."). The higher gradations of the current statute require either "serious bodily injury or severe mental distress," with a maximum term of imprisonment of ten years, D.C. Code §§ 22-934, 22-936(b), or "permanent bodily harm or death," with a maximum term of imprisonment of 20 years, D.C. Code §§ 22-934, 22-936(c).

[32] For example, a caretaker who knowingly fails to discharge their duty to provide necessary medicine to a vulnerable person may be liable under the current statute even though the vulnerable person was not actually at risk of an adverse consequence due to the intervention of a third party.

[33] Jackson v. United States, 996 A.2d 796, 797, 798 (D.C. 2010) (finding the evidence sufficient for criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult because "a reasonable factfinder could conclude that, under the statute, appellant failed to take steps that a 'reasonable person would deem essential for the well-being of the complainant' when appellant was involved in an altercation with the vulnerable adult, which left visible and significant injuries, and appellant did not inform his supervisor or file an incident report as required by his job duties).

to act knowingly, intentionally, or purposely.[34] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Third, the revised criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute incorporates the standard definitions for the terms "serious bodily injury" and "significant bodily injury" in RCC § 22E-701. The District's current neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute is graded, in part, on whether "serious bodily injury," "permanent bodily harm," or a lesser, unspecified, physical harm results.[35] The current statute, however, does not define these terms. The DCCA has interpreted "physical pain or injury" in the current abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute to include a contusion and an abrasion in a case where the complainant testified that he was "hurt,"[36] but did not provide a general definition. There is no DCCA case law interpreting these terms for the current neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute. To resolve these ambiguities, the revised criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute codifies and uses standard definitions of "serious bodily injury" and "significant bodily injury" per RCC § 22E-701. The revised definition of "serious bodily injury" is modified from the definition that the DCCA applies to the current aggravated assault statute.[37] The revised definition of "serious bodily injury" would appear to encompass "permanent bodily harm" in the current neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute, but it is unclear whether the revised definition otherwise changes "serious bodily injury" in the current statute. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

[34] For example, where a caregiver gives an elderly person with cancer an experimental and dangerous drug prescribed by the elderly person's oncologist, the fact that the caregiver knows (i.e. is practically certain) that doing so will create a risk of serious bodily injury or death to the elderly person does not, by itself, establish first degree neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person. Rather, it would also have to be proven by the government, as an affirmative element of the offense, that this risk was substantial under the circumstances.

[35] If "serious bodily injury or severe mental distress" results, the current abuse of a vulnerable adult offense has a maximum term of imprisonment of 10 years. D.C. Code § 22-936(b). If "permanent bodily harm or death" results, the current offense has a maximum term of imprisonment of 20 years. D.C. Code § 22-936(c). If the offense results in a lesser harm than "serious bodily injury," "severe mental distress," "permanent bodily harm," or death, the current offense is a misdemeanor with a maximum term of imprisonment of 180 days. D.C. Code § 22-936(a) ("A person who commits the offense of criminal abuse or criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person shall be subject to a fine not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, imprisoned for not more than 180 days, or both.

[36] Poole v. United States, 929 A.2d 413, 415 (D.C. 2007) (finding sufficient evidence of "physical pain or injury" when appellant "put his knee into [the complaining witness's back] in an attempt to restrain [the complaining witness]" and threatened appellant, and appellant suffered a contusion and abrasion and testified that he was "hurt.").

[37] "The current aggravated assault statute prohibits causing "serious bodily injury," but does not define the term. D.C. Code § 22-404.01. The DCCA has applied the definition of "serious bodily injury" that is codified in the District's current sexual abuse statutes to the aggravated assault statute. Nixon v. United States, 730 A.2d 145, 150 (D.C. 1999) ("Since the definition of "serious bodily injury" which appears in . . . the District's sexual abuse statute . . . is consistent with that followed in the majority of jurisdictions, we adopt it for the purpose of determining whether the government met its burden to prove 'serious bodily injury' under the aggravated assault statute."). The definition is "bodily injury that involves a substantial risk of death, unconsciousness, extreme physical pain, protracted and obvious disfigurement, or protracted loss or impairment of the function of a bodily member, organ, or mental faculty." D.C. Code § 22-3001(7).

Fourth, the revised criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute incorporates the standardized definition of "serious mental injury" in RCC § 22E-701. The current neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute grades, in part, based on whether "severe mental distress" resulted,[38] but the statute does not define the term. There is no DCCA case law interpreting "serious mental distress." RCC § 22E-701 defines "serious mental injury" as "substantial, prolonged harm to a person's psychological or intellectual functioning, which may be exhibited by severe anxiety, depression, withdrawal, or outwardly aggressive behavior, or a combination of those behaviors, and which may be demonstrated by a change in behavior, emotional response, or cognition." The revised criminal abuse of a minor and criminal neglect of a minor statutes also use the term "serious mental injury," which is modified from the District's current civil statutes for proceedings on child delinquency, neglect, or need of supervision.[39] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised offenses.

Fifth, the revised criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute limits liability for creating a risk of bodily injury to a risk of bodily injury due to drug or alcohol consumption. The current neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute prohibits failing to discharge a duty to "provide care and services necessary to maintain the physical and mental health of a vulnerable adult or elderly person."[40] The offense is partially graded on a failure to discharge the required duty.[41] The statute appears to provide liability for a failure to discharge the required duty even if the resulting risk to the physical or mental health of the complainant is comparatively trivial. There is no DCCA case law on this issue. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute limits liability for creating a risk of comparatively low-level physical harm to a risk of "bodily injury" due to the complainant consuming alcohol or consuming or inhaling, without a valid prescription, a controlled substance or marijuana. "Bodily injury" is the lowest level of physical harm in the RCC and is defined in RCC § 22E-701 as "physical pain, physical injury, illness, or impairment of physical condition." Prohibiting reckless creation of a risk of any "bodily injury" in the revised statute may criminalize the risk of comparatively trivial harms that are part of everyday life. If the actor recklessly creates such a risk with a higher level of "bodily injury," such as "significant bodily injury," there remains liability under first degree or second degree of the RCC criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute. Conduct that results in a risk of "bodily injury" in contexts other than drug or alcohol consumption may constitute attempted criminal neglect of a vulnerable

[38] D.C. Code § 22-936(b) (making it a felony with a maximum term of imprisonment of 10 years if "serious bodily injury or severe mental distress" results). In the revised criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute, risk of mental harm that does not satisfy the definition of "serious mental injury" may be covered by attempted criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person, or as third degree criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person in RCC § 22E-1503.

[39] D.C. Code § 16-2301(31) ("The term 'mental injury' means harm to a child's psychological or intellectual functioning, which may be exhibited by severe anxiety, depression, withdrawal, or outwardly aggressive behavior, or a combination of those behaviors, and which may be demonstrated by a change in behavior, emotional response, or cognition.").

[40] D.C. Code § 22-934.

[41] D.C. Code §§ 22-934, 22-936(a) (stating that "[a] person who commits the offense of . . . criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person shall" receive a maximum term of imprisonment of 180 days.").

adult or elderly person.[42] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Sixth, the revised criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute codifies an effective consent defense, discussed extensively in the explanatory note to the offense. District statutes do not codify general defenses to criminal conduct. The current neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute does not address whether consent of the complainant is a defense to liability, although current D.C. Code § 22-935 exempts from liability anyone who "provides or permits to be provided treatment by spiritual means through prayer alone in accordance with a religious method of healing, in lieu of medical treatment."[43] Longstanding case law of the United States Court of Appeals District of Columbia Circuit (D.C. Cir.) in Guarro v. United States has recognized that consent is a defense to assault, at least in the case of a nonviolent sexual touching.[44] A recent DCCA opinion in Woods v. United States, however, held that consent of the complainant is not a defense to assault in a public place that causes significant bodily injury, but explicitly declined to rule on the effect of consent in other circumstances.[45] It is unclear whether this District case law for assault would apply to neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute effective consent defense clarifies when the actor's reasonable belief that the complainant or a "person with legal authority over the complainant," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701, has given "effective consent" is a defense. In particular, the new effective consent defenses in subsection (e) specifically address where the risk, or failure to mitigate remedy the risk, is caused by an omission if the complainant, or a "or person with legal authority over the complainant" gives effective consent to the omission. This replaces in relevant part the exception in the current D.C. Code abuse or neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statutes.[46] An omission includes the actor administering prayer or allowing prayer to be administered instead of medical treatment, but also accounts for other types of omissions that a vulnerable adult or elderly person should be able to give effective consent to, such as a refusal to eat, drink, or take medication, or refusing an offer from the actor to get up from a fall. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Seventh, the revised criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute codifies an exclusion from liability for conduct that is specifically permitted by a District statute or regulation. The District's current neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statutes do not address whether conduct that is specifically permitted under another District law or regulation can result in criminal liability for those offenses. The exclusion resolves any apparent conflict within District laws. For example, Title 22, [42] In addition, if an actor recklessly creates, or fails to mitigate or remedy, a risk that a complainant would experience bodily injury from consumption of drugs or alcohol, and "bodily injury" results, there would be liability under the RCC criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute (RCC § 22E-1503).

Health, of the current D.C. Municipal Regulations, has regulations that specifically refer to immunity from assault liability that clearly will satisfy this exclusion from liability.[47] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

First, the revised criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute specifies that "fail[ing] to mitigate" or "fail[ing] to remedy" a substantial risk is sufficient for liability. The current neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute criminalizes conduct that "fails to discharge a duty" to provide necessary care and services.[48] The revised statute clarifies that not only creating risks to a vulnerable adult or elderly person, but also failing to mitigate or remedy a substantial risk, is sufficient for liability. Under the general provision in RCC § 22E-202, omissions are equivalent to affirmative conduct and sufficient for liability for any offense in the RCC where the defendant had a duty of care to the complainant.[49] However, although technically superfluous, given that neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person offenses usually will involve an omission, the revised statute explicitly codifies "fail[ing] to remedy" or "fail[ing] to remedy" as a basis for liability. The change clarifies the revised statute.

Second, the revised criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute requires that the defendant have a "responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision" of the vulnerable adult or elderly person and applies a recklessly culpable mental state to this element. The current neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute requires that the defendant "willfully or through a wanton, reckless, or willful indifference fails to discharge a duty" to provide necessary care and services to a vulnerable adult or elderly person. The extent of such care and services, however, is unclear under the statute, and "duty to provide care and services" is not statutorily defined. In addition, it is unclear as to whether any of these culpable mental states apply to the fact that the defendant has a duty to provide such care and services. There is no DCCA case law on point, but the DCCA has generally found that "wanton, reckless, or willful indifference" requires a mental state similar to recklessness.[50] To resolve these

[47] For example, D.C. Mun. Regs. tit. 22-B, § 602.4 states:

> Any minor who is examined, treated, hospitalized, or receives health services under this chapter may give legal consent, and no person who administers the health services shall be liable civilly or criminally for assault, battery, or assault and battery; or any other civil legal charge, except for negligence or intentional harm in the diagnosis and treatment rendered to the minor and for violations of the D.C. Mental Health Information Act of 1978.

[48] D.C. Code § 22-934.

[49] This principle is reflected in the current version of the draft general provision on omission liability. See RCC § 202(c), (d) ("(c) 'Omission' means a failure to act when (1) a person is under a legal duty to act and (2) the person is either aware that the legal duty to act exists or, if the person lacks such awareness, the person is culpably unaware that the legal duty to act exists. (d) For purposes of this Title, a legal duty to act exists when: (1) The failure to act is expressly made sufficient by the law defining the offense; or (2) A duty to perform the omitted act is otherwise imposed by law.").

[50] In Tarpeh v. United States, the DCCA held that "reckless indifference" requires not only "that the actor did not care about the consequences of his or her actions, but also that the actor was consciously aware of ambiguities, the revised statute requires that the defendant is reckless as to the fact he or she has a "responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision" of the vulnerable adult or elderly person. While generally corresponding to the language of the current statute, including duties pertaining to "supervision" may slightly expand liability for failure to provide services or care. The RCC also applies a culpable mental state of recklessness to the fact that the complainant has a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant because this matches the culpable mental state as to the fact that the complainant is a vulnerable adult or elderly person. Logically, the mental state as to the duty of care should match the mental state as to the attribute that gives rise to the duty. This change improves the clarity and completeness of the revised statute.

Third, the revised criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute codifies a "reckless" culpable mental state, defined in RCC § 22E-206, with respect to creating or failing to mitigate or remedy a risk, or to provide essential care or items. The current neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute prohibits failing to discharge a duty to provide necessary care and services "willfully or through wanton, reckless or willful indifference,"[51] but does not define any of these terms. The DCCA in Tarpeh v. United States discussed the meaning of "reckless" under the statute and said that it is a "state of mind that falls somewhere between simple negligence . . . and an intentional or willful decision to cause harm to a person."[52] The court stated that to prove "reckless indifference" in the neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute, "the evidence, as found by the trier of fact, must show not only that the actor did not care about the consequences of his or her actions, but also that the actor was consciously aware of risks involved in light of known alternative courses of action."[53] In Tarpeh, the DCCA explicitly referred to the Model Penal Code definition of "reckless," which requires the defendant to "consciously disregard[] a substantial and unjustified risk that the material element exists or will result from his conduct."[54] The revised criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person applies a "reckless" culpable mental state as defined in RCC § 22E-206, which is similar to the Model Penal Code.[55] This change improves the clarity of the revised statute.

Fourth, the revised criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute requires a "recklessly" culpable mental state as to the risk of physical or mental injury. The current neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person statute requires proof that the defendant "willfully or through a wanton, reckless, or willful indifference fails to discharge a duty" to provide necessary care and services to a vulnerable adult or elderly person. However, the statute is unclear as to whether any of these culpable mental states applies to the fact that, per the penalty gradations, the neglect causes "serious bodily injury or severe mental distress"[56] or "permanent bodily harm or death."[57] DCCA case law has not specifically addressed whether a culpable mental state applies to the penalty gradations, but has found that "reckless indifference" with respect to the failure to provide care and services in the current offense requires something similar to recklessness.[58] The revised statute provides that the standard culpable mental state of "recklessly" applies to the resulting risk of physical or mental harm. This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised statute.

[58] In *Tarpeh v. RCC § 22E-1601. Forced Labor.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the forced labor offense for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). This offense criminalizes knowingly causing another person to provide services either by means debt bondage or an explicit or implicit coercive threat. This offense replaces the forced labor offense in the current D.C. Code,[1] and attempt and penalty provisions relevant to that offense which are separately codified in the current D.C. Code.[2]

Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that forced labor requires that an actor knowingly causes a person to provide services. The paragraph specifies that a "knowingly" culpable mental state applies, a defined term[3] which requires that the accused was practically certain that he or she would cause a person to engage in labor or services. The term "services" is defined under RCC § 22E-701.[4]

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies that forced labor requires that the actor cause another person to engage in labor or services either by means of debt bondage or an explicit or implicit coercive threat. "Debt bondage" is also defined under RCC § 22E-701, and requires that the person perform labor or services to pay off a real or alleged debt under one of three specified circumstances.[5] "Coercive threat" is defined under RCC § 22E-701, and is comprised of seven different forms of threats. The definition of "coercive threat" prohibits "communicat[ing]" specified harms such as accusing someone of a criminal offense, as well as sufficiently serious harms that would cause a reasonable person to comply. The verb "communicates" is intended to be broadly construed, encompassing all speech[6] and other messages,[7] which includes gestures or other conduct,[8] that are received and understood by another person. Per the rule of interpretation under RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" culpable mental state also applies

[4] For further discussion on these terms, see Commentary to RCC § 22E-701.
[5] Debt bondage requires that complainant provides labor, services, or commercial sex acts to satisfy a debt and one of the following conditions apply: 1) the value of the labor, services, or commercial sex acts, as reasonably assessed, is not applied toward the liquidation of the debt; 2) the length and nature of the labor, services, or commercial sex acts are not respectively limited and defined; or 3) the amount of the debt does not reasonably reflect the value of the items or services for which the debt was incurred.
[6] The term "speech" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and means oral or written language, symbols, or gestures.
[7] A person may communicate through non-verbal conduct such as displaying a weapon. See State v. Murphy, 545 N.W.2d 909, 915 (Minn. 1996) ("Many physical acts considered in context communicate a terroristic threat. We may find our examples in the case law, such as drawing a finger across one's throat or discharging a firearm over the telephone; in the movies, such as boiling a rabbit on the stove in the tranquil setting of former paramour's new family home, or placing a severed horse's head in a bed; or as here, depositing dead animals at a residence or planting a fake bomb. Life is replete with such examples, and whatever the source, the principle is the same: physical acts communicate a threat that its originator will act according to its tenor." (Internal quotations omitted.)).
[8] For example, if a person consistently beats people who refuse to comply with his demands, this pattern of conduct may constitute a coercive threat when that person makes similar demands of others. In addition ongoing infliction of harm may constitute communication, if it communicates that harm will continue in the future.

to this element. The accused must be practically certain both that he or she is using debt bondage or coercive threats, and that the debt bondage or coercive threat causes the other person to provide services.

Subsection (b) specifies that communicating that any person will engage in legal employment actions is not a basis for liability under the forced labor statute. Such communications, which otherwise might satisfy the requirement of a coercive threat, may be a sufficient basis for other human trafficking offenses.[9] This subsection uses the term "in fact," which indicates that there is no culpable mental state requirement for this exclusion to liability.

Subsection (c) specifies relevant penalties and enhancements for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.] Paragraph (c)(1) specifies the penalty for forced labor.

Paragraph (c)(2) provides penalty enhancements applicable to this offense. Subparagraph (c)(2)(A) specifies that if a person commits forced labor and was reckless as to the complainant being under 18 years of age, an enhancement of one penalty class applies. "Reckless" is a defined term,[10] here requiring that the defendant was aware of a substantial risk that the complainant was under 18 years of age and such conduct was a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct. Subparagraph (c)(2)(B) specifies that if the actor held the complainant or caused the complainant to provide labor or services for a total of more than 180 days, the offense classification may be increased in severity by one class.[11] Per the rule of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "recklessly" culpable mental state in subparagraph (c)(2)(A) applies to the conduct in subparagraph (c)(2)(B). Even if both penalty enhancements are proven, the most the penalty can be increased is one class. The penalty enhancement under paragraph (c)(2) shall be applied in addition to any general penalty enhancements under this title.

Subsection (d) cross references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised forced labor statute changes current District law in four main ways.

First, by reference to the RCC's "coercive threats" definition, the forced labor statute does not provide liability for causing another to provide labor by fraud or deception. The current statutory definition of "coercion" includes "fraud or deception,"[12] and by extension the current forced labor statute includes using fraud or deception to cause a person to provide services. By contrast, the RCC's "coercive threats" definition does not include fraud or deception,[13] and such conduct is not a sufficient basis for forced [9] Threats that go beyond ordinary and legal employment actions are subject to liability. For example, the exception under this provision would not apply to a store manager who threatens to fire an employee unless that employee agrees to work for 24 hours without respite.

[10] RCC § 22E-206 (c).
[11] This enhancement may apply if the combined time in which a person was held and provided labor or services is greater than 180 days, even if the person did not provide labor or services for the entire time. If a person was held for 100 days, and provided labor or services for 81 days, this penalty enhancement would apply.
[12] D.C. Code § 22-1831 (3)(D).

labor liability. A person who uses deception or fraud to cause another person to provide services has not committed forced labor unless that person also uses one of the other coercive means listed in the RCC's definition or holds another person in debt bondage.[14] While using deception to cause another to provide services is wrongful, it does not warrant equal punishment to using coercive threats or debt bondage and could provide major felony liability for common employment disputes.[15] Rather, a person who causes another to provide services through fraud or deception may still be liable under the RCC's revised fraud[16] statute, a property offense with penalties based on the economic harm suffered. This change improves the penalty proportionality of the revised offense.

Second, by reference to the RCC's "coercive threats" definition, the revised forced labor offense criminalizes restricting another person's access to a controlled substance that the person owns or to prescription medication that the person owns. The current D.C. Code statutory definition of "coercion" in the human trafficking chapter provides liability for "facilitating or controlling" a person's access to any controlled substance or addictive substance. These terms are not defined by statute and have not been interpreted by the DCCA. By contrast, the revised forced labor offense only provides liability for threatening to restrict a person's access to controlled substances that the person owns or prescription medication that the person owns.[17] Restricting a person's access to a controlled substance or prescription medication that the person does not yet own does not constitute this form of per se coercive threat.[18] Similarly, restricting a person's access to an addictive substance that is not a controlled substance or prescription medication also does not constitute this form of per se coercive threat. This change likely eliminates liability for compensating someone with a controlled substance or prescription medication as part of an otherwise clear and consensual transaction,[19] and precludes arguments that an employer's attempts to limit an employee's access to legal and readily available addictive substances like tobacco or alcohol constitute forced labor.[20] However, in some circumstances, such conduct may still fall within another per se form [14] Forced labor may involve deceptive or fraudulent conduct in addition to other coercive means. For example, a person who initially lures a laborer with the false promise of high wages, and then coerces the laborer to provide labor or services under threat of bodily injury could be convicted under the RCC's forced labor statute. E.g., United States v. Bradley, 390 F.3d 145 (1st Cir. 2004).

[15] For instance, under the current statutory definition of "coercion," a person may be liable for forced labor or services, subject to a 20 year maximum imprisonment, for falsely stating the terms of an employee's advancement eligibility or scope of work duties at the time of hiring.

[16] RCC §22E-2201. The revised fraud statute criminalizes taking property of another by means of deception. The term "property" is defined as "anything of value" including "services[.]" RCC § 22E-701.

[17] A person can satisfy this subsection by providing a controlled substance, so long as that person explicitly or implicitly threatens that his or her access to those substances will be limited. For example, a person can behave coercively by giving heroin to a heroin addict to compel him to behave in a particular way if the person causes the addict to fear that his access to heroin will be limited in the future.

[18] For example, a drug trafficker refusing to sell a controlled substance to a person does not constitute this form of coercive threat.

[19] For example, compensating a person with a controlled substance may constitute "facilitation" under the current forced labor statute due to the definition of "coercion."

of coercive threat or the catch-all form of coercive threat.[21] Eliminating the facilitation of access to any addictive substance as a form of coercive threat prevents the possibility of criminalizing relatively less coercive conduct.[22] This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised statute.

Third, the revised statute allows for enhanced penalties if the actor recklessly held the complainant or caused the complainant to engage in labor or services for a total of more than 180 days. The D.C. Code forced labor, trafficking in labor or commercial sex, and sex trafficking of children statutes are subject to a penalty enhancement if "the victim is held or provides services for more than 180 days[.]"[23] However, the current statute does not specify any culpable mental state, nor does it clarify whether this 180 day threshold is based on the total of the days the complaint engaged in labor or services in addition to the days the complainant was held. There is no relevant DCCA case law. To resolve these ambiguities, the revised statute specifies that the enhancement applies if the actor recklessly holds the complainant, or causes the complainant to engage in labor or services for a total number of days that exceeds 180. This change clarifies and may improve the proportionality of the revised statute.

Fourth, the revised forced labor offense authorizes enhanced penalties if the actor is reckless as to whether the complainant is under 18 years of age. The current forced labor offense does not authorize enhanced penalties based on the age of the complainant. The D.C. Code includes a general penalty enhancement for "crimes of violence" committed against persons under the age of 18, but forced labor is not currently listed in the definition of a "crime of violence."[24] By contrast, the revised forced labor offense provides a penalty enhancement based on the complainant being a minor. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Beyond these three changes, five other aspects of the revised statute may constitute a substantive change to current District law.

First, by reference to the RCC's definition of "coercive threats," forced labor includes causing a person to provide services by threatening that any person will commit an offense against persons or a property offense.[25] The current "coercion" definition does not explicitly include threats to "commit any criminal offense against persons" but does include threats of "force" and "threats of physical restraint," conduct that appears to constitute the criminal offenses of assault, kidnapping, or criminal restraint. In addition, the current statutory definition of "coercion" generally includes "serious harm or threats of serious harm," which broadly covers "any harm . . . that is sufficiently serious, under all the surrounding circumstances, to compel a reasonable person of the same background and in the same circumstances to perform or to continue to perform labor, services, or commercial sex acts to avoid incurring that harm."[26] The revised definition of "coercive threats" and the RCC crime of forced labor together specify that a threat to commit any criminal offense against persons is categorically a basis for liability, even if it would otherwise be unclear whether the crime would constitute "serious harm" under the residual clause in paragraph (2)(G) of the coercion definition. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statutes.

[21] For example, if a person is severely addicted to a controlled substance, and relies on the actor as the sole provider of that substance, threatening to restrict the person's access to that substance may in some cases constitute a coercive threat under the catch all provision.

[22] For example, under current law inducing a person who is a regular tobacco user to perform any service by offering cigarettes in exchange arguably constitutes forced labor, an offense punishable by up to 20 years imprisonment. In addition, although alcohol is an addictive substance, it is not a controlled substance and thus is readily available. Facilitating a person's access to alcohol is not inherently coercive, as it is relatively easy for a person to obtain alcohol by other means, as compared to controlled substances.

Second, the revised statute specifies that threats of ordinary and legal employment actions are not a basis for liability under the forced labor statute. The current D.C. Code "coercion" definition includes "serious harm," which is defined as "any harm . . . that is sufficiently serious under all the surrounding circumstances, to compel a reasonable person of the same background and in the same circumstances to perform or to continue to perform labor, services, or commercial sex acts to avoid incurring that harm."[27] There is no relevant DCCA case law as to whether legal employment actions could be sufficient to compel a reasonable person to perform labor or services. The revised statute prevents liability for forced labor where the coercion consists only of ordinary and legal employer demands. Such conduct does not warrant criminalization as a serious felony. This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised statute.

Third, the revised statute allows for enhanced penalties if the actor recklessly held the complainant or caused the complainant to engage in labor or services for a total of more than 180 days. The D.C. Code forced labor, trafficking in labor or commercial sex, and sex trafficking of children statutes are subject to a penalty enhancement if "the victim is held or provides services for more than 180 days[.]"[28] However, the current statute does not specify any culpable mental state, nor does it clarify whether this 180 day threshold is based on the total of the days the complaint engaged in labor or services in addition to the days the complainant was held. There is no relevant DCCA case law. To resolve these ambiguities, the revised statute specifies that the enhancement applies if the actor recklessly holds the complainant, or causes the complainant to engage in labor or services for a total number of days that exceeds 180. This change clarifies and may improve the proportionality of the revised statute.

Fourth, the revised offense allows for offense-specific penalty enhancements and general penalty enhancements. The current D.C. Code forced labor, trafficking in labor or commercial sex, and sex trafficking of children statutes are subject to a penalty enhancement if "the victim is held or provides services for more than 180 days[.]"[29] However, neither this penalty enhancement nor other general penalty enhancements defined in the D.C. Code applicable to human trafficking specify how the enhancements interrelate—e.g., whether multiple enhancements can be applied, and to what effect. DCCA case law does not specifically address the relationship between the penalty enhancements applicable to human trafficking statutes specifically, and the D.C. Code provisions concerning repeat offender enhancements,[30] hate crime enhancements,[31] and pretrial release penalty enhancements.[32] To resolve this ambiguity, the revised statute specifies that the revised statute's penalty enhancements apply in addition to any general penalty enhancements based on RCC § 22E-605 Charging and Proof of Penalty Enhancements, § 22E-606 Repeat Offender Penalty Enhancements, § 22E-607 Pretrial Release Penalty Enhancement, or § 22E-608 Hate Crime Penalty Enhancement. This change improves the clarity and may improve the proportionality of the revised statute.

One other change to the forced labor statute is clarificatory, and is not intended to change current District law.

The revised statute uses the term "actor" instead of the terms "individual or business," as used in the current forced labor statute.[33] "Actor" is a defined term[34], which means "a person accused of any offense." The term "person" is also a defined term[35], and includes a "partnership, company, corporation, association, organization[.]" The term "actor" includes both individuals and businesses, and the use of this term is not intended to change current District law.

RCC § 22E-1602. Forced Commercial Sex.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the forced commercial sex offense for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). This offense criminalizes knowingly causing a person to engage in a commercial sex act by means of physical force, a coercive threat, debt bondage, or by administering a drug or other intoxicant. There is no analogous offense under the current human trafficking chapter, although conduct constituting forced commercial sex may violate the current forced labor statute. This offense also replaces aspects of several offenses in chapter 27 of the current D.C. Code, including: conduct to "compel" or attempt to compel a person into prostitution under the pandering statute;[1] compelling an individual to live life or prostitution against his or her will;[2] and causing a spouse or domestic partner "by force, fraud, coercion, or threats…to lead a life of prostitution."[3] To the extent that certain statutory provisions authorizing extended periods of supervised release[4] apply to the current forced labor statute, these provisions are replaced in relevant part by the revised offensive forced commercial sex offense.

Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that forced commercial sex requires that an actor knowingly causes the complainant to engage in or submit to a commercial sex act with or for[5] another person.[6] The paragraph specifies that a "knowingly" culpable mental state applies, which requires that the accused was practically certain that he or she would cause

[1] D.C. Code §22-2705. The pandering statute makes it a crime to "cause, compel . . . or attempt to cause or compel . . . any individual . . . to engage in prostitution[.]" The precise effect on D.C. law is unclear, as the D.C. Court of Appeals has not clearly defined what constitutes "compelling" a person to engage in prostitution. It is possible that some coercive means that would constitute "compelling" under the pandering statute do not fall within the revised "coercive threat" definition. In addition, the pandering statute provides for enhanced penalties when the person caused or compelled to engage in prostitution is under the age of 18. D.C. Code § 22-2705 (2). The penalty provision under the RCC's forced commercial sex statute replaces this provision in the current pandering statute.

[2] D.C. Code § 22-2706. This statute makes it a crime to "by threats or duress, to detain any individual against such individual's will, for the purpose of prostitution or a sexual act or sexual contact, or to compel any individual against such individual's will, to reside with him or her or with any other person for the purposes of prostitution or a sexual act or sexual contact." This conduct may also be criminalized under the RCC's kidnapping statute, RCC § 22E-1401 or criminal restraint statute, RCC § 22E-1402.

[3] D.C. Code § 22-2708. This statute makes it a crime to "by force, fraud, intimidation, or threats, places or leaves, or procures any other person or persons to place or leave, a spouse or domestic partner in a house of prostitution, or to lead a life of prostitution[.]" This conduct will be criminalized under the RCC's forced commercial sex statute. However, the RCC's forced commercial sex statute is narrower than § 22-2708. The forced commercial sex statute does not criminalize causing another person to provide commercial sex acts by means of deception or fraud.

[4] D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b)(4) (" In the case of a person sentenced for an offense for which registration is required by the Chapter 40 of Title 22, the court may, in its discretion, impose a longer term of supervised release than that required or authorized by paragraph (2) or (3) of this subsection, of: . . . (A) Not more than 10 years[.]" D.C. Code § 22-4001(8) defines "registration offense" to include "Any offense under the District of Columbia Official Code that involved a sexual act or sexual contact without consent or with a minor[.]" To the extent the current forced labor or services offense covers sexual acts or contacts without consent, D.C. Code § 22-403.01 may authorize an extended period of supervised release.

[5] The words "or for" clarify that the offense includes a person engaging masturbatory conduct for another person to observe.

[6] An actor who compels a person to engage in a commercial sex act with the actor himself or herself may be subject to liability under sex assault offenses defined under Chapter 13.

another person to engage in or submit to a commercial sex act. The term "commercial sex act" is defined under RCC § 22E-701.[7] Paragraph (a)(1) also specifies that the actor must cause the complainant to engage in or submit to commercial sex act with or for another person, which means that the act must be with or for someone other than the actor. This element may be satisfied if the actor causes the complainant to engage in a commercial sex act with a third party, or if the actor causes the complainant to engage in masturbatory conduct for a third party.[8]

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies the prohibited means by which the actor must cause a person to engage in or submit to a commercial sex act. Per the rule of interpretation under RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" culpable mental state also applies to this paragraph, which requires that the actor is practically certain that the means listed in subparagraphs (a)(2)(A)-(D) cause the complainant to engage in or submit to a commercial sex act.

Under subparagraph (a)(2)(A) the actor must use physical force that causes "bodily injury" to, overcomes, or retrains any person. "Bodily injury" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 as "physical pain, physical injury, illness, or any impairment of physical condition." Per the rule of interpretation under RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" culpable mental state also applies to this subparagraph, which here requires that the actor was practically certain that the actor used force that caused bodily injury to overcome or restrain any person.

Under subparagraph (a)(2)(B), the actor must use an explicit or implicit coercive threat to cause a person to engage in or submit to a commercial sex act. "Coercive threat" is defined under RCC § 22E-701 and includes multiple per se types of threats, as well as a flexible standard referring to a threat of any harm sufficiently serious to cause a reasonable person in the complainant's situation to comply.[9] Per the rule of interpretation under RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" culpable mental state also applies to this subparagraph, which here requires that the actor was practically certain he was making a coercive threat, explicit or implicit.

Under subparagraph (a)(2)(C), the actor must use debt bondage to cause a person to engage in or submit to a commercial sex act. "Debt bondage" is defined under RCC § 22E-701 and requires that the person perform labor or services to pay off a real or alleged debt under one of three specified circumstances.[10] Per the rule of interpretation under RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" culpable mental state also applies to this element. The actor must be practically certain both that he or she is using coercive threats or debt bondage, and that the coercive threat or debt bondage causes the other person to engage in a commercial sex act.

Under subparagraph (a)(2)(D), the actor must administer, or cause to be administered, to the complainant an intoxicant or other substance without the complainant's "effective consent." "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception." In addition, the actor must administer the intoxicant or other substance "with intent" to impair the complainant's ability to express unwillingness to engage in the commercial sex act (sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(D)(i)). "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor was practically certain that administering the intoxicant or other substance would impair the complainant's unwillingness to engage in the commercial sex act. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that the drug or intoxicant impaired the complainant's ability to express unwillingness to engage in the commercial sex act, only that the actor believed to a practical certainty that it would. However, sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(D)(ii) does require that the intoxicant or other substance have a specified effect on the complainant. The intoxicant or other substance must, "in fact," render the complainant asleep, unconscious, substantially paralyzed, or passing in and out of consciousness (sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(D)(ii)(I)), "substantially incapable of appraising the nature of the commercial sex act" (sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(D)(ii)(II)), or "substantially incapable of communicating unwillingness to engage in the commercial sex act" (sub-subparagraph (a)(2)(D)(ii)(III)). "In fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element, here the required effect of the intoxicant or other substance on the complainant.

Subsection (b)(1) specifies relevant penalties for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Paragraph (b)(2) provides penalty enhancements applicable to this offense. Subparagraph (b)(2)(A) specifies that if a person commits forced commercial sex and was reckless as to the complainant being under 18 years of age, an enhancement of one penalty class applies. "Reckless" is a defined term,[11] here requiring that the actor was aware of a substantial risk that the complainant was under 18 years of age and such conduct deviated from a reasonable standard of care. Alternatively, subparagraph (b)(2)(A) also specifies that if a person commits forced commercial sex, and in fact, the complainant is under the age of 12, an enhancement of one penalty class applies. The term "in fact" specifies that no culpable mental state is required as to the complainant being under the age of 12. Subparagraph (b)(2)(B) specifies that if the actor held the complainant or caused the complainant to engage in commercial sex acts for a total of more than 180 days, the offense classification may be increased in severity by one class.[12] Subparagraph (b)(2)(B) specifies that a "recklessly" culpable mental state applies to this enhancement. Even if more than one penalty enhancement is proven, the most the penalty can be increased is one class. The penalty enhancement under subsection (b)

[11] RCC § 22E-206.

[12] This enhancement may apply if the combined time in which a person was held and engaged in commercial sex acts is greater than 180 days, even if the person did not engage in commercial sex acts for the entire time. If a person was held for 100 days, and engaged in commercial sex acts for 81 days, this penalty enhancement would apply.

shall be applied in addition to any general penalty enhancements in RCC §§ 22E-605-608.

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC's forced commercial sex offense changes current District law in three main ways.

First, RCC forced commercial sex act creates a standardized penalty and enhancements for coercing or using debt bondage to cause a person to engage in a commercial sexual act. Although the current human trafficking chapter does not have a separate forced commercial sex offense, conduct constituting forced commercial sex could be charged under several current Chapter 27 offenses, with maximum sentences ranging from five years[13] to twenty years.[14] In contrast, the revised forced commercial sex act provides a single penalty, with applicable enhancements. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Second, by reference to the RCC's "coercive threats" definition, the forced commercial sex statute criminalizes restricting another person's access to a controlled substance that the person owns or to prescription medication that the person owns. The current D.C. Code statutory definition of "coercion" in the human trafficking chapter provides liability for "facilitating or controlling" a person's access to any controlled substance or addictive substance. These terms are not defined by statute and have not been interpreted by the DCCA. By contrast, the forced commercial sex offense only provides liability for threatening to restrict a person's access to controlled substances that the person owns or prescription medication that the person owns.[15] Restricting a person's access to a controlled substance or prescription medication that the person does not yet own does not constitute this form of per se coercive threat.[16] Similarly, restricting a person's access to an addictive substance that is not a controlled substance or prescription medication also does not constitute this form of per se coercive threat. This change likely eliminates liability for compensating someone with a controlled substance or prescription medication as part of an otherwise clear and consensual transaction,[17] and precludes arguments that an actor's attempts to limit an another person's access to legal and readily available addictive substances like tobacco or alcohol constitute forced commercial sex.[18] However, in some circumstances, such conduct may still fall within another per se form

[13] D.C. Code § 22-2705.
[14] D.C. Code § 22-2706.
[15] A person can satisfy this subsection by providing a controlled substance, so long as that person explicitly or implicitly threatens that his or her access to those substances will be limited. For example, a person can behave coercively by giving heroin to a heroin addict to compel him to behave in a particular way if the person causes the addict to fear that his access to heroin will be limited in the future.
[16] For example, a drug trafficker refusing to sell a controlled substance to a person does not constitute this form of coercive threat.
[17] For example, compensating a person with a controlled substance may constitute "facilitation" under the current forced labor statute due to the definition of "coercion."
[18] For example, an actor who limits a person's access to tobacco or alcohol may be liable for "controlling" the person's access to the substance.

of coercive threat or the catch-all form of coercive threat.[19] Eliminating the facilitation of access to any addictive substance as a form of coercive threats prevents the possibility of criminalizing relatively less coercive conduct.[20] This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised statute.

Third, the revised forced commercial sex offense authorizes enhanced penalties if the actor was reckless as to whether the complainant was under 18 years of age, or if the complainant was, in fact, under 12 years of age. It is unclear if the current forced labor and services statute criminalizes forced commercial sex acts, but even if it does, the current forced labor and services statute offense does not authorize enhanced penalties based on the age of the complainant. The D.C. Code includes a general penalty enhancement for "crimes of violence" committed against persons under the age of 18, but forced labor is not currently a "crime of violence."[21] By contrast, the revised trafficking in forced commercial sex offense provides a penalty enhancement based on recklessness as to whether the complainant was under the age of 18, or based on strict liability if the complainant was under the age of 12. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Eight other changes to the forced commercial sex statute may constitute a substantive change to current District law that improve the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised offense, and eliminate overlap with other offenses.

First, by reference to the RCC's definition of "coercive threats," the forced commercial sex statute does not provide liability for causing another to engage in commercial sex by fraud or deception. The current forced labor offense criminalizes using "coercion to cause person to provide labor or services"[22] and "coercion" is defined to include "fraud or deception."[23] If commercial sex acts fall within the definition of "labor or services," then under current law using fraud or deception to cause a person to engage in commercial sex acts constitutes forced labor. However, the current code does not specify whether "labor or services" includes commercial sex acts, and there is no relevant DCCA case law. The RCC's "coercive threats" definition does not include fraud or deception,[24] and such conduct is not a sufficient basis for forced commercial sex liability. A person who uses deception or fraud to cause another person to engage in commercial sex has not committed forced commercial sex unless that person also uses one of the other coercive means listed in the RCC's definition or holds another person in debt bondage.[25] While using deception to cause another to engage in commercial sex is wrongful, it does not warrant equal punishment to using other means of coercion or debt bondage and could provide major felony liability for what amount to disputes over payments for consensual commercial sex.[26] Rather, a person who causes another to engage in commercial sex through fraud or deception may still be liable under the RCC's revised fraud[27] statute, a property offense with penalties based on the economic harm suffered. This change improves the penalty proportionality of the revised statutes.

[19] For example, if a person is severely addicted to a controlled substance, and relies on the actor as the sole provider of that substance, threatening to restrict the person's access to that substance may in some cases constitute a coercive threat under the catch all provision.

Second, by reference to the RCC's definition of "coercive threats" the forced commercial sex offense includes causing a person to engage in a commercial sex act by threatening that any person will commit an offense against persons, or property offense.[28] The current "coercion" definition does not explicitly include threats to commit any "an offense against persons" but does include threats of "force, threats of force, physical restraint, or threats of physical restraint," conduct that appears to constitute the criminal offenses of assault or kidnapping. In addition, the current statutory definition of "coercion" generally includes "serious harm or threats of serious harm," which broadly covers "any harm . . . that is sufficiently serious, under all the surrounding circumstances, to compel a reasonable person of the same background and in the same circumstances to perform or to continue to perform labor, services, or commercial sex acts to avoid incurring that harm."[29] By contrast, the revised definition of "coercive threats" and the RCC crime of forced commercial sex together specify that a threat to commit any offense against persons or property offense is categorically a basis for liability, even if it would otherwise be unclear whether the crime would constitute "serious harm" under the residual clause in paragraph (2)(G) of the current coercion definition. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statutes.

Third, the RCC forced commercial sex act offense specifies what types of conduct constitute a crime when used to compel a person to engage in prostitution. Various offenses under Chapter 27 of the current D.C. Code make it a crime to "compel" a person to "engage in prostitution"[30]; "by threats or duress, to detain any individual against such individual's will for the purpose of prostitution or a sexual act or sexual contact"[31]; to "compel any individual, to reside with him or her or with any other person for the purposes of prostitution or a sexual act or sexual contact"[32]; or to use "force, fraud, intimidation, or threats" to "place[] or leave[] . . . a spouse or domestic partner in a house of prostitution, or to lead a life of prostitution[.]"[33] The current D.C. Code does not define the terms "threats," "duress," "detain," "force," "fraud," or "intimidation" for the as used in Chapter 27, and there is no relevant D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) case law interpreting these terms. In contrast, the revised statute refers to the defined terms "coercive threat" and "debt bondage," and specifies that physical force that causes bodily injury, and administering a drug, intoxicant, or other substance are barred means of compelling a person to engage in a commercial sex act constitutes a criminal offense. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statutes.

[25] Forced commercial sex may involve deceptive or fraudulent conduct in addition to other coercive means. For example, if a person initially lures a sex worker with the false promise of high wages, and then coerces the person to provide labor under threat of bodily injury could be convicted under the RCC's forced commercial sex statute. E.g., United States v. Bradley, 390 F.3d 145 (1st Cir. 2004).

Fourth, the RCC forced commercial sex offense requires a person to act with a "knowing" culpable mental state. Statutes under Chapter 27[34] that are replaced in whole or in part by the RCC's forced commercial sex offense do not specify culpable mental states, and there is no relevant DCCA case law on this issue. In contrast, the RCC forced commercial sex act offense specifies one consistent, defined culpable mental state. Applying a knowledge or intent requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[35] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Fifth, the RCC forced commercial sex offense requires only a single commercial sexual act for liability. Offenses under Chapter 27 criminalize detaining a person "for the purpose of prostitution,"[36] or compelling a person to "lead a life or prostitution,"[37] and make no reference to the number of occasions in which a person is compelled to engage in prostitution. There is no relevant DCCA case law on the unit of prosecution for these offenses, and it appears that compelling a person to engage in prostitution numerous times may constitute only a single violation of these statutes. In addition, it is possible that coercing a person to engage in a commercial sex act may constitute forced labor under the current statute.[38] However, the current forced labor statute does not specify whether commercial sex acts constitute labor or services, and if they do, whether multiple commercial sex acts may be prosecuted as more than one instance of forced labor. In contrast, the RCC forced commercial sex act offense provides liability for each separate commercial sexual act. This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised statutes.[39]

Sixth, the RCC forced commercial sex statute requires that the actor caused the complainant to engage in a commercial sex act with or for a person other than the actor. It is unclear if the current forced labor statute criminalizes coerced commercial sex, and if it does, whether the actor must have caused the complainant engage in a commercial sex act with someone other than the actor. There is no relevant DCCA case law. To resolve [39] Under the revised offense, a person who uses a coercive threat or debt bondage to compel another person to engage in more than one commercial sex act may be convicted for multiple counts of forced commercial sex. However, whether multiple convictions are permitted in a given case is governed by the merger analysis set for under RCC § 22E-214.

this ambiguity, the revised statute specifies that the offense requires that the actor caused the person to engage in a commercial sex act with another person. This change improves the clarity of the revised statute, and reduces unnecessary overlap.

Seventh, the revised statute allows for enhanced penalties if the actor recklessly held the complainant or caused the complainant to engage in commercial sex acts for a total of more than 180 days. The D.C. Code forced labor, trafficking in labor or commercial sex, and sex trafficking of children statutes are subject to a penalty enhancement if "the victim is held or provides services for more than 180 days[.]"[40] However, the current statute does not specify any culpable mental state, nor does it clarify whether this 180 day threshold is based on the total of the days the complaint engaged in labor or services in addition to the days the complainant was held. There is no relevant DCCA case law. To resolve these ambiguities, the revised statute specifies that the enhancement applies if the actor recklessly holds the complainant, or causes the complainant to engage in commercial sex acts for a total number of days exceeds that 180. This change clarifies and may improve the proportionality of the revised statute.

Eighth, the revised offense allows for offense-specific penalty enhancements and general penalty enhancements. The current D.C. Code forced labor, trafficking in labor or commercial sex, and sex trafficking of children statutes are subject to a penalty enhancement if "the victim is held or provides services for more than 180 days[.]"[41] However, neither this penalty enhancement nor other general penalty enhancements defined in the D.C. Code applicable to human trafficking specify how the enhancements interrelate—e.g., whether multiple enhancements can be applied, and to what effect. DCCA case law does not specifically address the relationship between the penalty enhancements applicable to human trafficking statutes specifically, and the D.C. Code provisions concerning repeat offender enhancements,[42] hate crime enhancements,[43] and pretrial release penalty enhancements.[44] To resolve this ambiguity, the revised statute specifies that the revised statute's penalty enhancements apply in addition to any general penalty enhancements based on RCC § 22E-605 Charging and Proof of Penalty Enhancements, § 22E-606 Repeat Offender Penalty Enhancements, § 22E-607 Pretrial Release Penalty Enhancement, or § 22E-608 Hate Crime Penalty Enhancement. This change improves the clarity and may improve the proportionality of the revised statute.

Three changes to the forced commercial sex offense statute are clarificatory in nature and not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, the forced commercial sex offense explicitly criminalizes as a human trafficking offense causing a person to engage in commercial sex acts by means of coercive threat or debt bondage. It is unclear whether the current forced labor statute criminalizes the use of coercion or debt bondage to cause a person to engage in commercial sex acts. The current forced labor offense requires that the actor "use coercion to cause a person to provide labor or services" or to "keep any person in debt bondage."[45] However, the current D.C. Code does not specify whether "labor or "services" include commercial sex acts. "Labor" is currently defined as "work that has economic or financial value," and "services" is currently defined as "legal or illegal duties or work done for another, whether or not compensated." [46] There is no relevant D.C. DCCA case law. The current D.C. Code, however, contains several prostitution-related offenses that do appear to criminalize coercing a person to engage in commercial sex acts.[47] The revised statute, however, specifies that the use of coercive threats to cause a person to engage in commercial sex is not only criminal, but a human trafficking offense. There is no clear justification for distinguishing the harm of using coercive threats to cause a person perform commercial sex when the complainant is a person who other times chooses to engage in commercial sex work from someone who has not engaged in such work. This change improves the clarity, organization, and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Second, the RCC defines a "commercial sex act" as "any sexual act or sexual contact on account of which or for which anything of value is given to, promised to, or received by any person."[48] Chapter 27 defines "prostitution" as "a sexual act or contact with another person in return for giving or receiving anything of value."[49] The RCC's definition of "commercial sexual act" definition is essentially equivalent to the current Chapter 27 definition of prostitution. The RCC's definition of "commercial sex act" is not intended to differ in any substantive way from the current code's definition of "prostitution."

Third, the revised statute uses the term "actor" instead of the terms "individual or business," as used in the current forced labor statute.[50] "Actor" is a defined term[51], which means "a person accused of any offense." The term "person" is also a defined term[52], and includes a "partnership, company, corporation, association, organization[.]" The term "actor" includes both individuals and businesses, and the use of this term is not intended to change current District law.

RCC § 22E-1603. Trafficking in Labor.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the trafficking in labor offense for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). This offense criminalizes knowingly recruiting, enticing, housing, transporting, providing, obtaining, or maintaining another person, with intent that, as a result, anyone will cause that person to provide labor or services by means of coercive threat or debt bondage. Trafficking persons for commercial sex acts is criminalized under the separate trafficking in commercial sex offense. The RCC's trafficking in labor offense, along with the RCC's trafficking in forced commercial sex offense[1], replaces the trafficking in labor or commercial sex acts statute,[2] and attempt and penalty provisions relevant to that offense which are separately codified in the current D.C. Code.[3]

Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that trafficking in labor requires that an actor knowingly recruits, entices, houses, transports, provides, obtains, or maintains by any means, a person. The words entice, transport, provide, obtain, and maintain by any means are intended to have the same meaning as under current law. The word "houses" is intended to include provision of shelter, even if only temporarily. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that a "knowingly" culpable mental state applies, which requires that the accused was practically certain that he or she would entice, house, transport, provide, obtain, and maintain a person.

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies that the person must have acted "with intent that" the trafficked person will be caused, as a result, to provide services by means of debt bondage or an explicit or implicit coercive threat.[4] "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor was practically certain that the trafficked person will be caused, as a result, to provide labor or services by means of a coercive threat or debt bondage. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent that" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that the trafficked person actually performs labor or services, only that the actor believed to a practical certainty that he or she would do so. The words "as a result" require a nexus between the trafficking activity, and the labor or services that the trafficked person will perform. Housing, transporting, etc. a person in a manner that is unrelated to that person providing labor or services is not criminalized under this section, even if the actor was practically certain that the person would be caused to provide services by means of coercive threat or debt bondage.[5]

[4] A coercive threat may come in the form of a verbal or written communication, however gestures or other conduct may also suffice. In addition, the statute specifies that the coercive threat need not be explicit. Communications and conduct that are implicitly threatening given the circumstances may satisfy this element. For example, if a person consistently beats people who refuse to comply with his demands, this pattern of conduct may constitute a coercive threat when that person makes similar demands of others. In addition, ongoing infliction of harm may constitute a coercive threat, if it communicates that harm will continue in the future.

Paragraph (b)(1) specifies relevant penalties for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Paragraph (b)(2) provides penalty enhancements applicable to this offense. Subparagraph (b)(1)(A) specifies that if a person commits trafficking in labor and was reckless as to the complainant being under 18 years of age, an enhancement of one penalty class applies. "Reckless" is a defined term,[6] here requiring that the defendant was aware of a substantial risk that the complainant was under 18 years of age. Subparagraph (b)(2)(B) specifies that if the complainant was held or provides services for more a total of more than 180 days, the offense classification may be increased in severity by one class.[7] Subparagraph (b)(2)(B) specifies that a "recklessly" culpable mental state applies to this enhancement, which requires that the actor was aware of a substantial risk that the complainant was held or provided services for more than 180 days. Even if both penalty enhancements are proven, the most the penalty can be increased is one class. The penalty enhancement under subsection (b) shall be applied in addition to any general penalty enhancements in RCC §§ 22E-605-608.

Subsection (c) cross references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The trafficking in labor offense changes current District law in six main ways.

First, by reference to the RCC's definitions of "labor" and "services", the revised offense excludes liability for trafficking persons who will engage in commercial sex acts. The current trafficking in labor or commercial sex acts offense criminalizes trafficking persons who will engage in labor, services, or commercial sex acts.[8] In contrast, the RCC re-organizes the current trafficking in labor or commercial sex acts into two separate offenses. This change improves the organization of the revised offense.

Second, by reference to the RCC's "coercive threat" definition, the trafficking in labor statute does not provide liability for trafficking a person who will be caused to provide labor or services by fraud or deception. The current statutory definition of "coercion" includes "fraud or deception,"[9] and by extension the current trafficking in labor or commercial sex acts statute references using fraud or deception to cause a person to provide labor or service. By contrast, the RCC's "coercive threat" definition does not include fraud or deception,[10] and trafficking a person who will be tricked into performing

[5] For example, if a taxi driver gives a ride to a person running an errand, practically certain that the next day that person will be coerced into performing labor, if there is no relationship between that errand and the labor the person will perform, the taxi driver cannot be held liable for trafficking in labor.
[6] RCC § 22E-206 (c).
[7] This enhancement may apply if the combined time in which a person was held and provided labor or services is greater than 180 days, even if the person did not provide labor or services for the entire time. If a person was held for 100 days, and provided labor or services for 81 days, this penalty enhancement would apply.

[9] D.C. Code § 22-1831 (3)(D).
[10] RCC § 22E-701.

labor or services is not a sufficient basis for liability under the revised trafficking in labor offense. The revised offense only provides liability for trafficking a person who will be caused to provide labor or services under threat of one of the means listed in the RCC's definition of "coercive threats," or by subjecting the person to debt bondage.[11] While using deception to cause another to engage in labor or services is wrongful, it does not warrant equal punishment to using other means of coercion or debt bondage and could provide major felony liability for common employment disputes and those engaged in such schemes.[12] Rather, a person who encourages or assists a person who causes another to provide labor or services through fraud or deception may still be liable as an accomplice[13] under the RCC's revised fraud[14] statute, a property offense with penalties based on the economic harm suffered. This change improves the penalty proportionality of the revised statute.

Third, by reference to the RCC's "coercive threat" definition, the revised trafficking in labor offense criminalizes trafficking when the coercion at issue is restricting another person's access to a controlled substance that the person owns or to prescription medication that the person owns. The current D.C. Code statutory definition of "coercion" in the human trafficking chapter provides liability for "facilitating or controlling" a person's access to any addictive substance. These terms are not defined by statute and have not been interpreted by the DCCA. By contrast, the revised trafficking in labor offense only provides liability for trafficking a person who will caused to provide labor or services under threat of restricting access to controlled substances that the person owns or prescription medication that the person owns. Restricting a person's access to a controlled substance or prescription medication that the person does not yet own does not constitute this form of per se coercive threat.[15] Similarly, restricting a person's access to an addictive substance that is not a controlled substance or prescription medication also does not constitute this form of per se coercive threat. This change likely eliminates liability for trafficking someone knowing that they will be compensated with a controlled substance or prescription medication as part of an otherwise clear and consensual transaction,[16] and precludes arguments that trafficking an employee knowing that an employer seeks to limit the employee's access to legal and readily available addictive [11] Trafficking in labor may involve deceptive or fraudulent conduct in addition to other coercive means. For example, a person who traffics a laborer knowing that he or she was initially lured with the false promise of high wages, and will be coerced into providing labor under threat of bodily injury could be convicted under the RCC's trafficking in labor statute. E.g., United States v. Bradley, 390 F.3d 145 (1st Cir. 2004).

[12] For instance, under the current statutory definition of "coercion," a person may be liable for trafficking in labor or commercial sex acts, subject to a [] year maximum imprisonment, for transporting a laborer to a job, knowing that the employer at the time of hire falsely stated the rate of pay or work duties that will be expected.

[13] RCC § 22E-210.

[14] RCC §22E-2201. The revised fraud statute criminalizes taking property of another by means of deception. The term "property" is defined as "anything of value" including "services[.]" RCC § 22E-701.

[15] For example, a drug trafficker refusing to sell a controlled substance to a person does not constitute this form of coercive threat.

substances like tobacco or alcohol constitutes trafficking in labor.[17] However, in some circumstances, such conduct may still fall within another per se form of coercive threat or the catch-all form of coercive threat.[18] Eliminating liability for trafficking where the harm is the facilitation of access to any addictive substance as a form of coercion prevents the possibility of criminalizing relatively less coercive conduct.[19] This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised statute.

Fourth, the revised trafficking in labor offense requires that the actor acted with intent that the trafficked person will be caused to provide labor or services by means of coercive threat or debt bondage. The current statute includes acting "with reckless disregard of the fact that" coercion will be used to cause the person to provide labor or services. By contrast, the revised statute requires that the actor was practically certain that the complainant will be caused to perform labor or services by means of a coercive threat or debt bondage.[20] Requiring that the actor was at least practically certain that the person will be caused to provide labor or services by means of coercive threat or debt bondage may avoid disproportionate penalties for persons who were unaware that the person would be coerced into providing labor or services.[21] This change improves the proportionality of the revised statute.

Fifth, the revised trafficking in labor offense requires that an actor's trafficking activity occur with intent that the complainant as a result will provide labor or services. The current D.C. Code trafficking in labor or commercial sex acts statute does not specify any relationship between the transporting, housing, etc., and the performance of labor or services. Consequently, it appears that there is criminal liability when a person transports, houses, etc. a person in a manner that is entirely unrelated to the coerced labor or services.[22] The current D.C. Code statute also states that it applies when "coercion

[17] For example, an employer who predicates a person's employment on not smoking tobacco or drinking alcohol may be liable for "controlling" the employee's access to the substance, and a person knowingly recruiting an employee into such circumstances may be liable for trafficking.

[18] For example, if a person is severely addicted to a controlled substance, and relies on the actor as the sole provider of that substance, threatening to restrict the person's access to that substance may in some cases constitute a coercive threat under the catch all provision.

[19] For example, under current law inducing a person who is a regular tobacco user to perform any service by offering cigarettes in exchange arguably constitutes coercion, and knowingly recruiting a person into such employment an offense punishable by up to 20 years imprisonment. In addition, although alcohol is an addictive substance, it is not a controlled substance and thus is readily available. Facilitating a person's access to alcohol is not inherently coercive, as it is relatively easy for a person to obtain alcohol by other means, as compared to controlled substances.

[20] For example, if a taxi driver overhears his passenger make comments which suggest that upon arrival at her destination, she may be coerced into performing labor or services, the driver is not guilty of trafficking in labor if the driver is only aware of a substantial risk, but not practically certain, that the passenger will be coerced into engaging labor or services.

[21] Under the rule of imputation of knowledge for deliberate ignorance set forth in RCC § 22E-208, an actor who traffics a person with recklessness that the person will be caused to provide labor or services by means of coercive threat or debt bondage may be held liable, if the actor avoided confirming or failed to investigate whether the trafficked person will be coerced into providing labor or services, with the purpose of avoiding criminal liability.

[22] For example, if a taxi driver gives a ride to a person running an errand, knowing that the next day that person will be coerced into performing labor, if there is no relationship between that errand and the labor the person will perform, the taxi driver cannot be held liable for trafficking in labor.

will be used or is being used."[23] By contrast, the revised statute requires a causal relationship between the trafficking activity, and the person performing labor or services. The actor's trafficking conduct need not be the sole or primary cause of the complainant being coerced by a threat or debt bondage, but there must be a causal link to a future result.[24] This revision excludes persons who may provide assistance to a complainant (e.g., housing, meals) that are unrelated to the coerced acts.[25] This change improves the proportionality of the revised criminal code.

Sixth, the revised trafficking in labor offense authorizes enhanced penalties if the actor was reckless as to whether the complainant was under 18 years of age. The current trafficking in labor or commercial sex acts offense does not authorize enhanced penalties based on the age of the complainant. The D.C. Code includes a general penalty enhancement for "crimes of violence" committed against persons under the age of 18, but trafficking in labor is currently not a "crime of violence."[26] By contrast, the revised trafficking in labor offense provides a penalty enhancement based on the complainant being a minor. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statutes.

In addition, the revised trafficking in labor offense makes three other changes that may constitute a substantive change to current District law.

First, by reference to the RCC's definition of "coercive threat," trafficking in labor includes causing a person to engage in labor or services by threatening that any person will "commit any criminal offense against persons" or any "property offense."[27] The current "coercion" definition does not explicitly include threats to "commit any criminal offense against persons" but does include threats of "force, threats of force, physical restraint, or threats of physical restraint," conduct that appears to constitute the criminal offenses of assault or kidnapping. In addition, the current statutory definition of "coercion" generally includes "serious harm or threats of serious harm," which broadly covers "any harm . . . that is sufficiently serious, under all the surrounding circumstances, to compel a reasonable person of the same background and in the same circumstances to perform or to continue to perform labor, services, or commercial sex acts to avoid incurring that harm."[28] The revised definition of "coercive threat" and the RCC crime of trafficking in labor together specify that trafficking a person with intent that any person will use threats to commit any criminal offense against persons or property offense to compel labor or services is categorically a basis for liability, even if it would otherwise be unclear whether the threat would constitute "serious harm" under the residual clause in paragraph (2)(G) of the coercion definition. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statutes.

[24] The result may be imminent or in the distant future, so long as the actor's conduct is causally linked and other elements of the offense are met. For example, an actor who drives people in a van to a District work site and believes to a practical certainty that as a result they will perform commercial labor or services by coercive threats, either immediately or weeks later, may be guilty of trafficking in labor.
[25] For example, there is not the required causal link where a waiter in a public restaurant serves a meal to a person, believing (due to an overheard conversation) to a practical certainty that the person will perform labor or services under coercive threat later that week. Also, there would not be a causal link to a future act of labor or services, or liability for trafficking in labor for a shelter driver who transports persons known to have performed labor or services by coercive threats to a shelter.

Second, the revised trafficking in labor statute replaces the word "harbor" with "houses." The current D.C. Code trafficking statute refers to "harboring" as one of many types of predicate conduct, including "recruit, entice, harbor, transport, provide, obtain, or maintain." "Harboring" is not statutorily defined, and there is no relevant D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) case law. To resolve this ambiguity, in the revised statute the word "houses" replaces the word "harbor." The RCC reference to "houses" may be narrower than "harbor,"[29] although the term "houses" is intended to broadly refer to the provision of physical shelter, including temporary shelter. This change clarifies and may improve the proportionality of the revised statute.

Third, the revised statute allows for enhanced penalties if the actor recklessly held the complainant or caused the complainant to engage in labor or services for a total of more than 180 days. The D.C. Code trafficking in labor or services statute is subject to a penalty enhancement if "the victim is held or provides services for more than 180 days[.]"[30] However, the current statute does not specify any culpable mental state, nor does it clarify whether this 180 day threshold is based on the total of the days the complaint engaged in labor or services in addition to the days the complainant was held. There is no relevant DCCA case law. To resolve these ambiguities, the revised statute specifies that the enhancement applies if the actor recklessly holds the complainant, or causes the complainant to engage in labor or services for a total number of days exceeds that 180. This change clarifies and may improve the proportionality of the revised statute.

One other change to the trafficking in labor statute is clarificatory, and is not intended to substantively change current District law.

The revised statute uses the term "actor" instead of the terms "individual or business," as used in the current forced labor statute.[31] "Actor" is a defined term[32], which means "a person accused of any offense." The term "person" is also a defined term[33], and includes a "partnership, company, corporation, association, organization[.]" The term "actor" includes both individuals and businesses, and the use of this term is not intended to change current District law.

[29] The verb form of the word "harbor" is defined by Meriam-Webster's Dictionary as, "to give shelter or refuge to[.]" https://www.merriam-webster.com/dictionary/harbor

RCC § 22E-1604. Trafficking in Forced Commercial Sex.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the trafficking in forced commercial sex offense for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). This offense criminalizes knowingly recruiting, enticing, housing, transporting, providing, obtaining, or maintaining another person, with intent that, as a result, the person will be caused to engage in a commercial sex act by means of physical force that causes bodily injury, a coercive threat, debt bondage, or a drug, intoxicant, or other substance. The RCC's trafficking in forced commercial sex offense, along with the RCC's trafficking in labor offense[1], replaces the trafficking in labor or commercial sex acts statute[2] and attempt and penalty provisions relevant to that offense which are separately codified in the current D.C. Code.[3] The revised offense also replaces portions of the pandering statute[4] the compelling an individual to live life or prostitution against his or her will statute,[5] the abducting or enticing a child from his or her home for purposes of prostitution; harboring such child statute[6] in Chapter 27 of the current D.C. Code.. To the extent that certain statutory provisions authorizing extended periods of supervised release[7] apply to the current trafficking in labor or commercial sex acts statute, these provisions are replaced in relevant part by the revised trafficking in forced commercial sex acts statute.

Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that trafficking in forced commercial sex requires that an actor knowingly recruits, entices, houses, transports, provides, obtains, or maintains by any means, the complainant. The words entice, transport, provide, obtain, and maintain by any means are intended to have the same meaning as under current law. The word "houses" is intended to include provision of shelter, even if only temporarily. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that a "knowingly" culpable mental state applies, which requires that the actor was practically certain that he or she would entice, house, transport, provide, obtain, or maintain the complainant.

[4] D.C. Code § 22-2705. The pandering statute makes it a crime for "any parent, guardian, or other person having legal custody of the person of an individual, to consent to the individual's being taken, detained, or used by any person, for the purpose of prostitution or a sexual act or sexual contact." This conduct will be criminalized under the RCC's trafficking in commercial sex statute.

[5] D.C. Code § 22-2706. This statute makes it a crime to "by threats or duress, to detain any individual against such individual's will, for the purpose of prostitution or a sexual act or sexual contact, or to compel any individual against such individual's will, to reside with him or her or with any other person for the purposes of prostitution or a sexual act or sexual contact." This conduct may also be criminalized under the RCC's kidnapping statute, RCC § 22E-1401 or criminal restraint statute, RCC § 22E-1402.

[7] D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b)(4) (" In the case of a person sentenced for an offense for which registration is required by the Chapter 40 of Title 22, the court may, in its discretion, impose a longer term of supervised release than that required or authorized by paragraph (2) or (3) of this subsection, of: . . . (A) Not more than 10 years[.]" D.C. Code §22-4001(8) defines "registration offense" to include "Any offense under the District of Columbia Official Code that involved a sexual act or sexual contact without consent or with a minor[.]" To the extent the current trafficking in labor or commercial sex acts offense involves sexual acts or contacts without consent, D.C. Code § 22-403.01 may authorize an extended period of supervised release.

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies that the actor must have acted with intent that the complainant will be caused, as a result, to engage in or submit to a "commercial sex act" by one of the means listed in subparagraphs (a)(2)(A)-(D). The term "commercial sex act" is a defined term.[8] "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor was practically certain that the complainant will be caused to engage in or submit to a commercial sex act by means specified in subparagraphs (a)(2)(A)-(D). Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent that" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that the trafficked person actually engages in or submits to a commercial sex act, only that the actor believed to a practical certainty that he or she would do so. The words "as a result" require a nexus between the trafficking activity, and the commercial sex act that the trafficked person will engage in or submit to. Housing, transporting, etc. a person in a manner that is unrelated to that person providing labor or services is not criminalized under this section, even if the actor was practically certain that the person would be caused to engage in or submit to a commercial sex act by one of the means listed in subparagraphs (a)(2)(A)-(D).[9]

Paragraph (a)(2) also specifies that the actor must cause the complainant to engage in or submit to a commercial sex act with or for another person, which means that the act must be with or for someone other than the actor.[10] This element may be satisfied if the actor intends that the complainant will engage in or submit to a commercial sex act with a third party, or that the complainant will engage in masturbatory conduct for a third party.[11]

Under subparagraph (a)(2)(A) the actor must intend that the trafficked person will be caused to engage in or submit to a commercial sex act by means of physical force that causes "bodily injury" to, overcomes, or retrains any person. "Bodily injury" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 as "physical pain, physical injury, illness, or any impairment of physical condition."

Under subparagraph (a)(2)(B), the actor must intend that a coercive threat, explicit or implicit, will be used to cause the complainant to engage in or submit to a commercial sex act. "Coercive threat" is defined under RCC § 22E-701 and includes multiple per se types of threats, as well as a flexible standard referring to a threat of any harm sufficiently serious to cause a reasonable person in the complainant's situation to comply.[12]

[8] RCC § 22E-701.

[9] For example, if a taxi driver gives a ride to a person running an errand, practically certain that the next day that person will be coerced into performing a commercial sex act, if there is no relationship between that errand and the commercial sex act the person will perform, the taxi driver cannot be held liable for trafficking in forced commercial sex.

[10] An actor who traffics a person with intent that the person engage in a commercial sex act with the actor by means of a coercive threat or debt bondage may be subject to liability under sex assault offenses defined under Chapter 13.

[11] Masturbation is not explicitly included in the definition of "commercial sex act." However, the term "commercial sex act" is defined to include any sexual act or sexual contact performed in exchange for anything of value. To the extent that conduct commonly understood as masturbation meets the definition of sexual act or sexual contact, if it performed in exchange for anything of value, it constitutes a "commercial sex act."

[12] For further discussion of this term, see Commentary to RCC § 22E-701.

Under subparagraph (a)(2)(C), the actor must intend that debt bondage will be used to cause a person to engage in or submit to a commercial sex act. "Debt bondage" is defined under RCC § 22E-701 and requires that the person perform labor or services to pay off a real or alleged debt under one of three specified circumstances.[13]

Under subparagraph (a)(2)(D), the actor must intend that the administration of an intoxicant or other substance without the complainant's "effective consent" will be used to cause the complainant to engage in or submit to a commercial sex act. "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception." "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor was practically certain that the complainant would be caused to engage in or submit to a commercial sex act by administration of a drug, intoxicant or other substance. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that anyone administered a drug, intoxicant, or other substance.

Subsection (b)(1) specifies relevant penalties for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Paragraph (b)(2) provides penalty enhancements applicable to this offense. Subparagraph (b)(2)(A) specifies that if a person commits trafficking in forced commercial sex and was reckless as to the complainant being under 18 years of age, an enhancement of one penalty class applies. "Reckless" is a defined term,[14] here requiring that the actor was aware of a substantial risk that the complainant was under 18 years of age and disregard of the risk was a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct. Alternatively, subparagraph (b)(2)(A) also specifies that if a person commits trafficking in forced commercial sex, the complainant was, in fact, under the age of 12, an enhancement of one penalty class applies. The term "in fact" specifies that no culpable mental state is required if the complainant was under the age of 12. Paragraph (b)(2)(B) specifies that if the actor held the complainant or caused the complainant to engage in commercial sex acts for a total of more than 180 days, the offense classification may be increased in severity by one class.[15] Subparagraph (b)(2)(B) specifies that a "recklessly" culpable mental state applies to this enhancement. Even if more than one penalty enhancement is proven, the most the penalty can be increased is one class. The penalty enhancement under paragraph (b)(2) shall be applied in addition to any general penalty enhancements in RCC §§ 22E-605-608.

Subsection (c) cross references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

[13] For further discussion of this term, see Commentary to RCC § 22E-701.

[14] RCC § 22E-206.

[15] This enhancement may apply if the combined time in which a person was held and provided labor or services is greater than 180 days, even if the person did not provide labor or services for the entire time. If a person was held for 100 days, and provided labor or services for 81 days, this penalty enhancement would apply.

Relation to Current District Law. The trafficking in forced commercial sex statute changes current District law in nine main ways.

First, the RCC trafficking in forced commercial sex offense is codified in a separate and distinct manner from the offense of trafficking in labor. The D.C. Code currently criminalizes in one statute trafficking persons who will engage in labor, services, or commercial sex acts.[16] In contrast, the RCC re-organizes the current trafficking in labor or commercial sex acts into two separate offenses and clarifies that commercial sex acts are not part of the revised definitions of "labor" and "services." This change improves the organization of the revised offenses.

Second, by reference to the RCC's "coercive threats" definition, the trafficking in forced commercial sex statute does not provide liability for trafficking a person who will be caused to engage in or submit to a commercial sex act by means of fraud or deception. The current statutory definition of "coercion" includes "fraud or deception,"[17] and by extension the current trafficking in in labor or commercial sex acts statute references using fraud or deception to cause a person to engage in a commercial sex act. By contrast, the RCC's "coercive threat" definition does not include fraud or deception,[18] and trafficking a person will be tricked into performing commercial sex is not a sufficient basis for liability under the revised trafficking in forced commercial sex offense. The revised offense only provides liability for trafficking a person who will be caused to engage in a commercial sex act under threat of one of the means listed in the RCC's definition of "coercive threat," or by subjecting the person to debt bondage.[19] While using deception to cause another to engage in commercial sex is wrongful, it does not warrant equal punishment to using other means of coercion or debt bondage.[20] Rather, a person who encourages or assists a person who causes another to provide commercial sex through fraud or deception may still be liable as an accessory[21] under the RCC's revised fraud[22] statute, a property offense with penalties based on the economic harm suffered. This change improves the penalty proportionality of the revised statute.

Third, by reference to the RCC's "coercive threat" definition, the revised trafficking in forced commercial sex offense criminalizes trafficking when the coercion at issue is restricting another person's access to a controlled substance that the person owns or to prescription medication that the person owns. The current D.C. Code statutory definition of "coercion" in the human trafficking chapter provides liability for

[18] RCC § 22E-701.
[19] Trafficking in forced commercial sex may involve deceptive or fraudulent conduct in addition to other coercive means. For example, a person who traffics a worker knowing that he or she was initially lured with the false promise of high wages, and will also be coerced into engaging in commercial sex acts under threat of bodily injury may be convicted under the RCC's trafficking in forced commercial sex statute. E.g., United States v. Bradley, 390 F.3d 145 (1st Cir. 2004).
[20] For instance, under the current statutory definition of "coercion," a person may be liable for trafficking in labor or commercial sex acts, subject to a [] year maximum imprisonment, for transporting a laborer to a job, knowing that the employer at the time of hire falsely stated the rate of pay or work duties that will be expected.
[21] RCC § 22E-210.
[22] RCC § 22E-2201. The revised fraud statute criminalizes taking property of another by means of deception. The term "property" is defined as "anything of value" including "services[.]" RCC § 22E-701.

"facilitating or controlling" a person's access to any addictive substance, and by extension the current trafficking in labor or commercial sex acts statute references facilitating or controlling access to addictive substances to cause a person to engage in a commercial sex act. These terms are not defined by statute and have not been interpreted by the DCCA. By contrast, the revised trafficking in forced commercial sex offense only provides liability for trafficking a person who will caused to provide a commercial sex act under threat of restricting access to controlled substances that the person owns or prescription medication that the person owns. Restricting a person's access to a controlled substance or prescription medication that the person does not yet own does not constitute this form of coercive threat.[23] Restricting a person's access to an addictive substance that is not a controlled substance or prescription medication also does not constitute this form of coercive threat. This change eliminates liability for trafficking someone knowing that they will be compensated with a controlled substance or prescription medication as part of an otherwise clear and consensual transaction,[24] and precludes arguments that trafficking a person knowing that someone will seek to limit that person's access to legal and readily available addictive substances like tobacco or alcohol constitutes trafficking in forced commercial sex acts.[25] However, in some circumstances, such conduct may still fall within another per se form of coercive threat or the catch-all form of coercive threat.[26] Eliminating liability for trafficking where the harm is the facilitation of access to any addictive substance as a form of coercion prevents the possibility of criminalizing relatively less coercive conduct.[27] These changes improve the clarity and proportionality of the revised statute.

Fourth, the revised trafficking in forced commercial sex offense requires that the actor acted with intent that the complainant will be caused to engage a commercial sex act by means of coercive threat or debt bondage. The current statute includes acting "with reckless disregard of the fact that" coercion or debt bondage will be used to cause the person to engage in a commercial sex act. By contrast, the revised statute requires that the actor was practically certain that the complainant will be caused to engage in a commercial sex act by means of a coercive threat or debt bondage.[28] Requiring that the [23] For example, a drug trafficker refusing to sell a controlled substance to a person does not constitute this form of coercive threat.

[24] For example, compensating a person with a controlled substance may constitute "facilitation" under the current forced labor statute due to the definition of "coercion."

[25] For example, a person who recruits someone to perform commercial sex acts, knowing that another will predicate performance of the commercial sex work on not smoking tobacco or drinking alcohol may be liable for "controlling" the employee's access to the substance, and may be liable for trafficking.

[26] For example, if a person is severely addicted to a controlled substance, and relies on the actor as the sole provider of that substance, threatening to restrict the person's access to that substance may in some cases constitute a coercive threat under the catch all provision.

[27] For example, under current law inducing a person who is a regular tobacco user to perform any service by offering cigarettes in exchange arguably constitutes coercion, and knowingly recruiting a person into such employment an offense punishable by up to [] years imprisonment. In addition, although alcohol is an addictive substance, it is not a controlled substance and thus is readily available. Facilitating a person's access to alcohol is not inherently coercive, as it is relatively easy for a person to obtain alcohol by other means, as compared to controlled substances.

[28] For example, if a taxi driver overhears his passenger make comments which suggest that upon arrival at her destination, she may be coerced into performing a commercial sex act, the driver is not guilty of actor was at least practically certain that the person will be caused to engage in a commercial sex act by means of coercive threat or debt bondage avoids disproportionate penalties for persons who were unaware that the person would be coerced into providing labor or services.[29] This change improves the proportionality of the revised statute.

Fifth, the revised trafficking in forced commercial sex offense requires that an actor's trafficking activity occur with intent that the complainant as a result will provide a commercial sex act. The current D.C. Code trafficking in labor or commercial sex acts statute does not specify any relationship between the transporting, housing, etc., and the performance of labor or services. Consequently, it appears that there is criminal liability when a person transports, houses, etc. a person in a manner that is entirely unrelated to the coerced labor or services.[30] The current D.C. Code statute also states that it applies when "coercion will be used or is being used."[31] By contrast, the revised statute requires a causal relationship between the trafficking activity, and the person performing a commercial sex act. The actor's trafficking conduct need not be the sole or primary cause of the complainant being coerced by a threat or debt bondage, but there must be a causal link to such a future result.[32] This revision excludes persons who may provide assistance to a complainant (e.g., housing, meals) that are unrelated to the coerced acts.[33] This change improves the proportionality of the revised criminal code.

Sixth, the revised trafficking in forced commercial sex offense authorizes enhanced penalties if the actor was reckless as to whether the complainant was under 18 years of age, or if the complainant was, in fact, under 12 years of age. The current trafficking in labor or commercial sex acts offense does not authorize enhanced penalties based on the age of the complainant. The D.C. Code includes a general penalty enhancement for "crimes of violence" committed against persons under the age of 18, but trafficking in labor or commercial sex acts is not currently a "crime of violence."[34] By contrast, the revised trafficking in forced commercial sex offense provides a penalty trafficking in forced commercial sex if the driver is only aware of a substantial risk, but not practically certain, that the passenger will be coerced into engaging in a commercial sex act.

[29] Under the rule of imputation of knowledge for deliberate ignorance set forth in RCC § 22E-208, an actor who traffics a person with recklessness that the person will be caused to engage in a commercial sex act by means of coercive threat or debt bondage may be held liable, if the actor avoided confirming or failed to investigate whether the trafficked person will be coerced into engaging a commercial sex act, with the purpose of avoiding criminal liability.

[30] For example, if a taxi driver gives a ride to a person running an errand, knowing that the next day that person will be coerced into performing a commercial sex act, if there is no relationship between that errand and the commercial sex act that the person will perform, the taxi driver cannot be held liable for trafficking in forced commercial sex.

[31] D.C. Code § 22-1833.

[32] The result may be imminent or in the distant future, so long as the actor's conduct is causally linked and other elements of the offense are met. For example, an actor who drives people in a van to a District house and believes to a practical certainty that as a result they will perform commercial sex acts by coercive threats, either immediately or weeks later, may be guilty of trafficking in forced commercial sex.

[33] For example, there is not the required causal link where a waiter in a public restaurant serves a meal to a person, believing (due to an overheard conversation) to a practical certainty that the person will perform a commercial sex act under coercive threat later that week. Also, there would not be a causal link to a future commercial sex act, or liability for trafficking in forced commercial sex for a shelter driver who transports persons known to have performed commercial sex acts by coercive threats to a shelter.

enhancement based on recklessness as to whether the complainant was under the age of 18, or based on strict liability if the complainant was under the age of 12. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Seventh, the revised RCC trafficking in forced commercial sex offense specifies what types of conduct are sufficient to "compel" a person to engage in prostitution.[35] Under Chapter 27, the current code makes it a crime "by threats or duress, to detain any individual against such individual's will for the purpose of prostitution or a sexual act or sexual contact"[36] or to "compel any individual, to reside with him or her or with any other person for the purposes of prostitution or a sexual act or sexual contact,"[37] or to "forcibly abduct a child under 18 from his or her home or usual abode, or from the custody and control of the child's parents or guardian."[38] The current code also makes it a crime to use "force, fraud, intimidation, or threats" to "place[] or leave[] . . . a spouse or domestic partner in a house of prostitution, or to lead a life of prostitution[.]"[39] The current code does not define the terms "threats," "duress," "detain," "force," "forcibly," "fraud," or "intimidation," and there is no relevant D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) case law interpreting these terms. In contrast, the revised statute refers to the defined terms "coercive threat" and "debt bondage," and specifies that physical force that causes bodily injury, and administering a drug, intoxicant, or other substance are barred means of compelling a person to engage in a commercial sex act constitutes a criminal offense. This change improves the clarity and consistency of revised statutes.

Eighth, the RCC trafficking in forced commercial sex offense requires a person to act with a "knowing" culpable mental state. Statutes under Chapter 27[40] that are replaced in whole or in part by the RCC's trafficking in forced commercial sex offense do not specify culpable mental states, and there is no relevant DCCA case law on this issue. In contrast, the RCC trafficking in forced commercial sex act offense specifies one consistent, defined culpable mental state of knowing. Applying a knowledge or intent requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[41] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the criminal code, and improves the proportionality of penalties.

Ninth, the RCC trafficking in forced commercial sex offense creates a standardized penalty and enhancements. The offenses under Chapter 27 that are replaced by the RCC's trafficking in forced commercial sex offense allow for a variety of penalties. Depending on which Chapter 27 offense an actor was prosecuted under, conduct that would constitute trafficking in forced commercial sex could be subject to maximum penalties ranging from 5 years[42] to 20 years.[43] In contrast, the RCC forced commercial sex offense applies a consistent penalty and enhancements. This change improves the consistency of the criminal code, and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Beyond these nine changes to current District law, five other aspects of the revised trafficking in forced commercial sex acts may constitute a substantive change to current District law.

First, by reference to the RCC's definition of "coercive threat," trafficking in forced commercial sex includes trafficking a person, with intent that, as a result, the person will be compelled to engage in a commercial sex act under threat that any person will commit an offense against persons or a property offense."[44] The current "coercion" definition does not explicitly include threats to commit any offenses against persons or property offenses but does include threats of "force, threats of force, physical restraint, or threats of physical restraint," conduct that appears to constitute the criminal offenses of assault or kidnapping. In addition, the current statutory definition of "coercion" generally includes "serious harm or threats of serious harm," which broadly covers "any harm . . . that is sufficiently serious, under all the surrounding circumstances, to compel a reasonable person of the same background and in the same circumstances to perform or to continue to perform labor, services, or commercial sex acts to avoid incurring that harm."[45] The revised definition of "coercive threats" and the RCC crime of forced commercial sex together specify that a threat to commit any criminal offense against persons or property offense is categorically a basis for liability, even if it would otherwise be unclear whether the crime would constitute "serious harm" under the residual clause in paragraph (2)(G) of the coercion definition. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statutes.

Second, the revised trafficking in forced commercial sex offense includes acting with intent that a person will administer a drug, intoxicant, or other substance to the complainant without the complainant's effective consent. The current trafficking statute does not explicitly include trafficking a person who will be administered a drug, intoxicant, or other substance without that person's effective consent. However, the statute includes the use of "coercion," which is defined to include force, and "facilitating or controlling a person's access to an addictive or controlled substance or restricting a person's access to prescription medication[.]"[46] Administering a drug, intoxicant, or other substance without effective consent may constitute force, or facilitation of a person's access to an addictive or controlled substance. There is no relevant D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) case law. To resolve this ambiguity, the revised statute clarifies that trafficking a person with intent that the person will engage in or submit to a commercial sex act by means of administration of a drug, intoxicant, or other substance without effective consent constitutes trafficking in forced commercial sex. This change clarifies and may improve the proportionality of the revised statute.

Third, the revised trafficking in forced commercial sex statute replaces the word "harbor" with "houses." The current D.C. Code trafficking statute refers to "harboring" as one of many types of predicate conduct, including "recruit, entice, harbor, transport, provide, obtain, or maintain." "Harboring" is not statutorily defined, and there is no relevant D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) case law. To resolve this ambiguity, in the revised statute the word "houses" replaces the word "harbor." The RCC reference to "houses" may be narrower than "harbor,"[47] although the term "houses" is intended to broadly refer to the provision of physical shelter, including temporary shelter. This change clarifies and may improve the proportionality of the revised statute.

Fourth, the revised trafficking in forced commercial sex statute requires that the actor had intent that the complainant would be caused to engage in or submit to a commercial sex act with a person other than the actor. The current statute does not specify whether the actor must have intent that the complainant engage in a commercial sex act with someone other than the actor, and there is no relevant DCCA case law. In contrast, the revised statute specifies that the actor must have had intent that the complainant would engage in a commercial sex act with someone other than the actor. This change improves the clarity of the revised criminal code, and reduces unnecessary overlap.

Fifth, the revised statute allows for enhanced penalties if the actor recklessly held the complainant or caused the complainant to engage in commercial sex acts for a total of more than 180 days. The D.C. Code trafficking in labor or commercial sex statute is subject to a penalty enhancement if "the victim is held or provides services for more than 180 days[.]"[48] However, the current statute does not specify any culpable mental state, nor does it clarify whether this 180 day threshold is based on the total of the days the complaint engaged in commercial sex acts in addition to the days the complainant was held. There is no relevant DCCA case law. To resolve these ambiguities, the revised statute specifies that the enhancement applies if the actor recklessly holds the complainant, or causes the complainant to engage in commercial sex acts for a total number of days exceeds that 180. This change clarifies and may improve the proportionality of the revised statute.

In addition, one change to the trafficking in forced commercial sex statute is clarificatory, and not intended to substantively change current District law.

The revised statute uses the term "actor" instead of the terms "individual or business," as used in the current forced labor statute.[49] "Actor" is a defined term[50], which means "a person accused of any offense." The term "person" is also a defined term[51], and includes a "partnership, company, corporation, association, organization[.]" The term "actor" includes both individuals and businesses, and the use of this term is not intended to change current District law.

RCC § 22E-1605. Sex Trafficking of a Minor or Adult Incapable of Consenting.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the sex trafficking of a minor or adult incapable of consenting offense for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). This offense criminalizes knowingly recruiting, enticing, housing, transporting, providing, obtaining, or maintaining another person, with intent that, as a result, the person will be caused to engage in a commercial sex act, and with recklessness as to that person being under the age of 18, or incapable of appraising the nature of the commercial sex act or communicating unwillingness to engage in the commercial sex act. The revised sex trafficking of a minor or adult incapable of consenting offense replaces the current sex trafficking of children statute,[1] attempt and penalty provisions relevant to that offense which are separately codified in the current D.C. Code,[2] and part of the abducting or enticing a child from his or her home for purposes of prostitution; harboring such child statute.[3] To the extent that certain statutory provisions authorizing extended periods of supervised release[4] apply to the current sex trafficking of children statute, these provisions are replaced in relevant part by the revised sex trafficking of a minor or adult incapable of consenting statute.

Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that sex trafficking of a minor or adult incapable of consenting requires that a person knowingly recruits, entices, houses, transports, provides, obtains, or maintains by any means, another person. The words "entice, transport, provide, obtain, and maintain by any means" are intended to have the same meaning as under current law. The word "houses" is intended to include provision of shelter, even if only temporarily. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that a "knowingly" culpable mental state applies, which requires that the actor was practically certain that he or she would entice, house, transport, provide, obtain, or maintain another person.

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies that sex trafficking of a minor or adult incapable of consenting requires that the actor acted "with intent that" the trafficked person, as a result, would be caused to engage in or submit to a commercial sex act with or for another person. The term "commercial sex act" is a defined term.[5] "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor was practically certain that the complainant would be caused to engage in a commercial sex act with another person. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent that" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that the trafficked person actually performs a commercial sex act, only that the actor believed to a practical certainty that he or she would do so. The words "as a result" require a nexus between the trafficking activity, and the commercial sex act that the trafficked person will perform. Housing, transporting, etc. a person in a manner that is unrelated to that person providing labor or services is not criminalized under this section, even if the actor was practically certain that the person would be caused to engage in a commercial sex act.[6]

This paragraph also specifies that the actor must cause the complainant to engage in a commercial sex act with or for another person.[7] This element may be satisfied if the actor causes the complainant to engage in a commercial sex act with a third party, or if the actor causes the complainant to engage in masturbatory conduct for a third party.[8]

Paragraph (a)(3) specifies that the actor was reckless as to the trafficked person satisfying one of the elements listed in subparagraphs (a)(3)(A)-(C). Subparagraph (a)(3)(A) requires that the complainant is under the age of 18. Subparagraph (a)(3)(B) requires that the complainant is incapable of appraising the nature of the commercial sex act or of understanding the right to give or withhold consent to the commercial sex act, either due to a drug, intoxicant, or other substance, or, due to an intellectual, developmental, or mental disability or mental illness when the actor has no similarly serious disability or illness. Subparagraph (a)(3)(C) requires that the complainant is incapable of communicating[9] unwillingness to engage in the commercial sex act, regardless of the complainant's state of mind. The "reckless" mental state in paragraph (a)(3) applies to subparagraphs (a)(3)(A)-(C), which requires that the actor consciously disregarded a substantial risk that the trafficked person is under the age of 18, incapable of appraising the nature of the commercial sex act or of understanding the right to give or withhold consent, or incapable of communicating unwillingness to engage in the commercial sex act.

Subsection (b)(1) specifies relevant penalties for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Paragraph (b)(2) provides a penalty enhancement applicable to this offense. If the actor recklessly held the complainant, or caused the complainant to provide commercial sex acts for a total of more than 180 days, the offense classification may be increased in severity by one class.[10] The penalty enhancement under paragraph (b)(2) shall be applied in addition to any general penalty enhancements in RCC §§ 22E-605-608.

[6] For example, if a taxi driver gives a ride to a person running an errand, knowing that the next day that person will be coerced into engaging in a commercial sex act, if there is no relationship between that errand and the commercial sex act, the taxi driver cannot be held liable for trafficking in forced commercial sex.

[7] An actor who traffics a person with intent that the person engage in a commercial sex act with the actor may be subject to liability under sex assault offenses defined under Chapter 13.

[8] Masturbation is not explicitly included in the definition of "commercial sex act." However, the term "commercial sex act" is defined to include any sexual act or sexual contact performed in exchange for anything of value. To the extent that conduct commonly understood as masturbation meets the definition of sexual act or sexual contact, if it performed in exchange for anything of value, it constitutes a "commercial sex act."

[9] If the complainant is unable to communicate verbally or orally, but is able to make gestures, facial expressions, or engage in other conduct, the person may be capable of communicating and this element may not be satisfied.

[10] This enhancement may apply if the combined time in which a person was held and engaged in commercial sex acts is greater than 180 days, even if the person did not engage in commercial sex acts for

Subsection (c) cross references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC's sex trafficking of a minor or adult incapable of consenting offense clearly changes current District law in one main way with respect to the current sex trafficking of children offense. To the extent it replaces current D.C. Code § 22-2704, the revised sex trafficking of a minor or adult incapable of consenting offense clearly changes current District law in five main ways. The revised statute also clearly changes current District law by explicitly criminalizing trafficking adults who are unable to consent to commercial sex acts.

First, the revised sex trafficking of a minor or adult incapable of consenting statute requires proof that a person was reckless as to the person trafficked being under 18. Subsection (a) of the current sex trafficking of children offense requires the actor to be "knowing or in reckless disregard of the fact that the person has not attained the age of 18 years," but does not define the culpable mental state terms.[11] However, subsection (b) of the current statute further states that "In a prosecution… in which the defendant had a reasonable opportunity to observe the person recruited, enticed… or maintained, the government need not prove that the defendant knew that the person had not attained the age of 18 years."[12] Consequently, the current statute's drafting is ambiguous as to whether "recklessness" always suffices to prove liability (as appears to be stated in subsection (a)) or whether a knowing culpable mental state always is required for liability except where there is a reasonable opportunity to view the complainant (as appears to be stated in subsection (b)). There is no case law on point, however legislative history indicates that the latter interpretation of the statute is correct,[13] and recklessness as to the complainant's age is insufficient for liability except when the actor has a reasonable opportunity to observe the complainant. Notably, D.C. Code § 22-2704 requires that the trafficked person is under the age of 18, but does not specify a culpable mental state for this element, and there is no relevant DCCA case law. In contrast, the RCC sex trafficking of a minor or adult incapable of consenting statute requires a culpable mental state of recklessness, a defined term, and omits the limitation about a reasonable opportunity to observe the child. It is not clear why reasonable observation, uniquely, is treated as being such strong evidence of age that a lower culpable mental state is required where there is such an opportunity.[14] Requiring recklessness as to a complainant being the entire time. If a person was held for 100 days, and engaged in commercial sex acts for 81 days, this penalty enhancement would apply.

[11] D.C. Code § 22-1834.

[12] D.C. Code § 22-1834 (b).

[13] Council of the District of Columbia Committee on Public Safety and the Judiciary Committee Report on Bill 18-70 "Prohibition Against Human Trafficking Amendment Act of 2010" at 8. March 9, 2010. ("Section 104 Creates the crime of sex trafficking of children. A child is defined as under the age of 18 for commercial sex. The prosecution does not have to prove that coercion was used or that the defendant had actual knowledge of the minor's age. However, if the defendant did not have an opportunity to observe the victim, the government needs to prove the defendant had actual knowledge of the victim's age.").

[14] On the one hand, a reasonable opportunity to observe the complainant does not mean that an actor still could not reasonably mistake the complainant's age as being significantly older than 17 years old. On the other hand, other circumstances may provide an actor equally strong evidence of the complainant's age, under 18 years of age is consistent with similar age-based circumstances required in other offenses in the RCC and current D.C. Code. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Second, the revised sex trafficking of a minor or adult incapable of consenting statute specifies that a "knowingly" mental state applies to result elements of the offense. A knowing culpable mental state already is required for the similar sex trafficking of children offense.[15] However, D.C. Code § 22-2704 also makes it a crime to "secrete" or "harbor" a child under the age of 18 "for the purposes of prostitution."[16] The current code does not specify any culpable mental state for these elements of D.C. Code § 22-2704, and there is no relevant D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) case law. In contrast, the revised sex trafficking of a minor or adult incapable of consenting statute specifies that the actor must knowingly recruit, entice, harbor, transport, provide, obtain, or maintain by any means, another person. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statutes.

Third, the revised sex trafficking of a minor or adult incapable of consenting statute specifies that the actor act "with intent" that the trafficked person will be caused to engage in a commercial sex act. A knowing culpable mental state is required for the current sex trafficking of children offense.[17] However, D.C. Code § 22-2704 requires that the actor secrete or harbor another person "for the purposes of prostitution." D.C. Code § 22-2704 does not further specify the meaning of "for the purposes" or specify (other) culpable mental states, and there is no relevant DCCA case law. In contrast, the revised sex trafficking of a minor or adult incapable of consenting statute specifies that the actor must act "with intent" that the person will be caused to engage in a commercial sex act. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statutes.

Fourth, the revised sex trafficking of a minor or adult incapable of consenting statute includes a penalty enhancement if the trafficked person was held or provides commercial sex acts for more a total of more than 180 days. The current sex trafficking of children offense contains this penalty enhancement.[18] However, D.C. Code § 22-2704 does not provide for heightened penalties. In contrast, the revised sex trafficking of a minor or adult incapable of consenting statute allows that the offense classification may be increased by one class if the trafficked person is held or caused to engage in commercial sex act for more than 180 days. This change improves the proportionality and consistency of the revised statutes.

Fifth, the revised statute criminalizes trafficking of an adult incapable of consenting to commercial sex acts. The current sex trafficking of a minor offense only applies to complainants under the age of 18.[19] Trafficking of an adult is criminalized even though he or she is never seen—e.g., a report from a trusted source as to the complainant apparently being a minor.

under the trafficking in labor or commercial sex acts statute.[20] However, that statute requires intent that the complainant will be caused to engage in a commercial sex act by means of "coercion" or debt bondage. The statute does not explicitly cover trafficking of adults who are unable to appraise the nature of the commercial sex act, or who are unable to communicate their consent to engage in or submit to a commercial sex act. By contrast, the revised statute clarifies that trafficking adults who are incapable of appraising the nature of the commercial sex act or of communicating unwillingness to engage in a commercial sex act is criminalized. This change closes a gap in current law, and improves the proportionality of the revise statute.

Beyond these five changes to current District law, two other aspects of the revised sex trafficking of a minor or adult incapable of consenting statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised sex trafficking of a minor or adult incapable of consenting statute requires that the actor had intent that the complainant would be caused to engage in a commercial sex act with or for another person. The current statute does not specify whether the actor must have intent that the complainant engage in a commercial sex act with someone other than the actor, and there is no relevant DCCA case law. To resolve this ambiguity, the revised statute specifies that the actor must have had intent that the complainant will engage in a commercial sex act with someone other than the actor. This change improves the clarity of the revised statute, and reduces unnecessary overlap.

Second, the revised statute allows for enhanced penalties if the actor recklessly held the complainant or caused the complainant to engage in commercial sex acts for a total of more than 180 days. The D.C. Code sex trafficking of children statute is subject to a penalty enhancement if "the victim is held or provides services for more than 180 days[.]"[21] However, the current statute does not specify any culpable mental state, nor does it clarify whether this 180 day threshold is based on the total of the days the complaint engaged in commercial sex acts in addition to the days the complainant was held. There is no relevant DCCA case law. To resolve these ambiguities the revised statute specifies that the enhancement applies if the actor recklessly holds the complainant, or causes the complainant to engage in commercial sex acts for a total number of days exceeds that 180. This change clarifies and may improve the proportionality of the revised statute.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

RCC § 22E-1606. Benefiting from Human Trafficking.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the benefitting from human trafficking offense for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). This offense criminalizes knowingly obtaining any benefit or property by participating in an association of two or more persons, with recklessness that the group is engaged in forced commercial sex, trafficking in forced commercial sex, sex trafficking of a minor or adult incapable of consenting, forced labor, or trafficking labor or services. The offense is divided into two penalty grades, depending on whether the benefit arose from a group's commission of forced commercial sex, sex trafficking, or sex trafficking of a minor or adult incapable of consenting; or forced labor or trafficking in labor. The benefitting from human trafficking offense replaces the benefitting financially from human trafficking statute[1] and attempt and penalty provisions relevant to that offense which are separately codified in the current D.C. Code.[2]

Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that first degree benefitting from human trafficking requires that the actor knowingly obtains any financial benefit or property. The term financial benefit includes services or intangible financial benefits. The term "property" is a defined term,[3] which includes anything of value. The paragraph specifies that a "knowingly" culpable mental state applies, which requires that the actor was practically certain that he or she would obtain a financial benefit or property.

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies that the actor must have obtained the property or financial benefit through participation in a group of two or more persons. The group may be comprised, at a minimum, of the actor and one other person.[4] The group need not have a united purpose and the members need not reach an agreement as would be required for a criminal conspiracy. The members must only be associated in fact. Per the rule of interpretation under RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" culpable mental state also applies to this element. The actor must be practically certain both that he or she is participating in a group of two or more persons, and that it is through that group association that he or she obtained the property or financial benefit.

Paragraph (a)(3) specifies that for first degree benefitting from human trafficking, the actor must have been reckless as to the group engaging in conduct that, in fact, constitutes either forced commercial sex under RCC § 22E-1602, trafficking in forced commercial sex under RCC 22E-1604, or sex trafficking of a minor or adult incapable of consenting under RCC § 22E-1605. The "reckless" culpable mental state requirement here means that the actor consciously disregarded a substantial risk that the group was engaged in the conduct that, in fact, constituting forced commercial sex, trafficking in forced commercial sex, or sex trafficking of a minor or adult incapable of consenting. The use of "in fact" indicates that the actor need not have any culpable mental state as to what the specific elements of the predicate crimes are or that they have been satisfied. It is not required that all members of the group, including the actor, actually engaged in conduct constituting either of these offenses.[5]

Paragraph (a)(4) specifies that the actor's participation in the group furthers, in any manner, the conduct constituting the human trafficking offense. Per the rule of interpretation under RCC § 22E-207, the term "in fact" also applies to this element. Although it is not required that all members of the group actually engaged in conduct constituting a human trafficking offense, the actor's participation in the group must further, in any manner, the conduct that constitutes forced commercial sex, trafficking in forced commercial sex, or sex trafficking of a minor or adult incapable of consenting.[6]

Paragraph (b)(1) specifies that second degree benefitting from human trafficking requires that the actor knowingly obtains any financial benefit or property. The term financial benefit includes services or intangible financial benefits. The term "property" is a defined term,[7] which includes anything of value. The paragraph specifies that a "knowingly" culpable mental state applies, which requires that the actor was practically certain that he or she would obtain a financial benefit or property.

Paragraph (b)(2) specifies that the actor must have obtained the property or financial benefit through participation in a group of two or more persons. The group may be comprised, at a minimum, of the actor and one other person. The group need not have a united purpose and the members need not reach an agreement as would be required for a criminal conspiracy. The members must only be associated in fact. Per the rule of interpretation under RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" culpable mental state also applies to this element. The actor must be practically certain both that he or she is participating in a group of two or more persons, and that it is through that group association that he or she obtained the property or financial benefit.

Paragraph (b)(3) specifies that for second degree benefitting from human trafficking, the actor must have been reckless as to the group engaging in conduct that, in fact, constitutes either forced labor under RCC 22E-1601 or trafficking in labor under RCC 22E-1603. The "reckless" culpable mental state requirement here means that the actor consciously disregarded a substantial risk that the group was engaged in the conduct that, in fact, constituting either forced labor or trafficking in labor. The use of "in fact" indicates that the actor need not have any culpable mental state as to what the specific elements of the predicate crimes are or that they have been satisfied. It is not required

Paragraph (b)(4) specifies that the actor's participation in the group furthers, in any manner, the conduct constituting the human trafficking offense. Subsection (d) cross references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised benefitting from human trafficking offense changes current District law in one main way.

The revised benefitting from human trafficking offense is divided into two penalty grades depending on whether the group engaged in conduct constituting forced commercial sex, sex trafficking, or sex trafficking of a minor or adult incapable of consenting; or forced labor or trafficking in labor. The current benefitting financially from human trafficking offense only has one penalty grade, regardless of the predicate conduct. By contrast, the revised offense distinguishes benefits obtained from forms of human trafficking that involve commercial sex, and those that involve labor or services. Dividing the offense into two penalty grades improves the proportionality of the revised offense. This change improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

Two changes to the benefitting from human trafficking offense statute are clarificatory in nature and is not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, the revised statute no longer refers to participation in a "venture," and instead requires that the actor participated in a group of two or more persons. Omission of the word "venture" is clarificatory in nature and is not intended to change current District law.

Second, the revised statute uses the term "actor" instead of the terms "individual or business," as used in the current forced labor statute.[10] "Actor" is a defined term[11], [8] For example, if a building owner receives rent payment from a customer, with recklessness that the other person is using the building to run a sweatshop in which people are coerced into providing labor, the building owner could be convicted of benefitting from human trafficking even though the hotel owner did not directly cause anyone to provide labor by means of coercive threats or debt bondage. See, Ricchio v. McLean, 853 F.3d 553, 556 (1st Cir. 2017) (motel owner was "associated" and obtained benefit when he rented a room to person who used that room to coerce women into performing commercial sex acts); see generally, John Cotton Richmond, Human Trafficking: Understanding the Law and Deconstructing Myths, 60 St. Louis U. L.J. 1, 9 (2015).

[9] For example, if A is on a sports team with B, who engages in forced labor, and B uses proceeds of the forced labor to pay for uniforms for the team, A is not guilty of benefitting from human trafficking even if he is aware that the uniforms were paid for by human trafficking. See, United States v. Afyare, 632 F. App'x 272, 286 (6th Cir. 2016) (unpublished opinion) (holding that the group of which the accused is a part must engage in human trafficking).

which means "a person accused of any offense." The term "person" is also a defined term[12], and includes a "partnership, company, corporation, association, organization[.]" The term "actor" includes both individuals and businesses, and the use of this term is not intended to change current District law.

RCC § 22E-1607. Misuse of Documents in Furtherance of Human Trafficking.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the misuse of documents in furtherance of human trafficking offense ("misuse of documents") for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). This offense requires that the accused knowingly destroys, conceals, removes, confiscates, or possesses any actual or purported government identification document of another person, with intent to restrict the person's liberty to move or travel in order to maintain the labor, services, or performance of a commercial sex act by that person. The misuse of documents in furtherance of human trafficking offense replaces the unlawful conduct with respect to documents in furtherance of human trafficking statute[1] and attempt and penalty provisions relevant to that offense which are separately codified in the current D.C. Code.[2]

Subsection (a) specifies the elements of first degree misuse of documents. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that first degree misuse of documents requires that the accused knowingly destroys, conceals, removes, confiscates, or possesses any actual or purported government identification document of another person, including a passport or other immigration document. The terms "destroys," "conceals," "removes," "confiscates," and "actual or purported government identification document" are intended to have the same meaning as under current law. "Possess" is a defined term per RCC § 22E-701 meaning "holds or carries on one's person; or has the ability and desire to exercise control over." The paragraph specifies that a "knowingly" culpable mental state applies, which requires that the accused was practically certain both that an actual or purported document was involved, and that he or she would destroy, conceal, remove, confiscate, or possesses the document.

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies that misuse of documents requires that the accused acted "with intent to" restrict the person's liberty to move or travel in order to maintain performance of a commercial sex act by that person. "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor was practically certain that he or she would restrict the person's liberty to move or travel. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that the actor actually succeeded in restricting the person's liberty to move or travel, only that he or she believed to a practical certainty that he or she would.

Subsection (b) specifies the elements of second degree misuse of documents. Subsection (b) specifies the penalty applicable to this offense. Paragraph (b)(1) specifies that first degree misuse of documents requires that the accused knowingly destroys, conceals, removes, confiscates, or possesses any actual or purported government identification document of another person, including a passport or other immigration document. The terms "destroys," "conceals," "removes," "confiscates," and "actual or purported government identification document" are intended to have the same meaning as under current law. "Possess" is a defined term per RCC § 22E-701 meaning "holds or carries on one's person; or has the ability and desire to exercise control over." The paragraph specifies that a "knowingly" culpable mental state applies, which requires that the accused was practically certain both that an actual or purported document was involved, and that he or she would destroy, conceal, remove, confiscate, or possesses the document.

Paragraph (b)(2) specifies that misuse of documents requires that the accused acted "with intent to" restrict the person's liberty to move or travel in order to maintain services by that person. "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor was practically certain that he or she would restrict the person's liberty to move or travel. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that the actor actually succeeded in restricting the person's liberty to move or travel, only that he or she believed to a practical certainty that he or she would.

Subsection (c) specifies the penalties applicable to this offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (d) cross references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised misuse of documents statute changes current District law in two main ways.

First, the revised misuse of documents offense is divided into two penalty grades depending on whether the actor misused documents to maintain a person's labor or services, or commercial sex acts. The current misuse of documents offense only has one penalty grade, regardless of whether the misuse of documents is related to forced labor or forced commercial sex. By contrast, the revised offense distinguishes misuse of documents in order to maintain a person's labor or services, or commercial sex acts. Dividing the offense into two penalty grades improves the proportionality of the revised offense. This change improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

Second, the revised misuse of documents offense requires that the accused destroys, conceals, removes, confiscates, or possesses any actual or purported government identification document, specifically including passports and immigration documents. The current statute refers broadly to "any actual or purported government identification document, including a passport or other immigration document, or any other actual or purported document."[3] There is no relevant DCCA case law construing these terms, although legislative history refers to "official papers."[4] By contrast, the revised offense clarifies that this offense only applies to government-issued identification documents, including immigration documents.[5] Misuse of other documents with intent to restrict someone's freedom of movement may constitute another crime under the RCC.[6] This change improves the clarity of the revised statute.

[3] D.C. Code §22-1835.
[4] Council of the District of Columbia Committee on Public Safety and the Judiciary Committee Report on Bill 18-70 "Prohibition Against Human Trafficking Amendment Act of 2010" at 8. March 9, 2010.
[5] For example, destroying a person's employee identification badge issued by a private employer does not constitute misuse of documents.
[6] See, e.g., § 22E-1402. Criminal Restraint (attempted); § 22E-2102 Unauthorized use of property.

Beyond these two changes, three aspects of the revised misuse of documents statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised misuse of documents offense specifies that the offense requires "knowingly" destroying, concealing, removing, confiscating, or possessing a government identification document. The current statute clearly requires that the destruction, concealing, etc. of a document be done "knowingly," but the statute is ambiguous whether the "knowingly" mental state applies also to the nature of the document as a form of government identification. D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) case law does not address the issue.[7] By contrast, the revised offense clarifies the culpable mental state as to the nature of the document. Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[8] This change improves the clarity of the revised statute.

Second, the revised misuse of documents offense specifies that the offense requires that that the accused acted "with intent" to restrict the person's liberty to move or travel in order to maintain the labor, services, or performance of a commercial sex acts by that person. The current statute does not specify any culpable mental state for this element, but merely requires that the accused acted "to prevent or restrict, or attempt to prevent or restrict . . . the person's liberty to move or travel[.]"[9] Case law does not address the issue. By contrast, the revised offense clarifies that the actor must act with intent to restrict movement. The phrase with intent to means that the person believes to a practical certainty that the complainant would be restricted in their movement, but actual proof of restriction is not required. "With intent" more clearly communicates the mental state requirement and encompasses the conduct indicated by the "attempt to" prong of the current statute. Anytime a person acts with intent to restrict a person's liberty, that person has also acted with intent to attempt to restrict a person's liberty. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Third, the revised statute omits the words "without lawful authority." The current statute's covered conduct is, "knowingly to destroy, conceal, … document, of any person to prevent or restrict, or attempt to prevent or restrict, without lawful authority, the person's liberty to move or travel…" There is no case law interpreting the phrase "without lawful authority." In the RCC, if a person actually has the lawful authority to engage in conduct covered by the revised statute, general defenses would apply to this conduct the same as any other conduct that otherwise would appear to be a crime. This change improves the clarity of the revised statute.

Two other changes are clarificatory and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

[7] Although the statute and DCCA case law do not specify a culpable mental state, the Redbook Jury Instruction states that defendant must have "knowingly" destroyed, concealed, removed, or possessed an identification document. D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 4-513.

[8] See, Elonis v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2001, 2009 (2015) ("[O]ur cases have explained that a defendant generally must 'know the facts that make his conduct fit the definition of the offense,' even if he does not know that those facts give rise to a crime. (Internal citation omitted)").

[9] D.C. Code § 22-1835.

First, the revised statute requires that the accused act with intent to restrict a person's liberty to move or travel. The current statute criminalizes acting with intent to prevent or "restrict . . . the person's liberty to move or travel[.]" It is unclear what it means to "prevent" a person's liberty to move or travel. The word "restrict" as used in the revised statute is intended to cover all conduct that would constitute "preventing" a person's freedom to move or travel.

Second, the revised statute uses the term "actor" instead of the terms "individual or business," as used in the current forced labor statute.[10] "Actor" is a defined term[11], which means "a person accused of any offense." The term "person" is also a defined term[12], and includes a "partnership, company, corporation, association, organization[.]" The term "actor" includes both individuals and businesses, and the use of this term is not intended to change current District law.

[12] RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-1608. Commercial Sex with a Trafficked Person.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the commercial sex with a trafficked person offense for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The commercial sex with a trafficked person offense is divided into two penalty gradations. Both grades require that the actor knowingly engage in a commercial sex act, and the penalty grades are distinguished based on the presence of one or more additional circumstances relating to whether the other party to the commercial sex act had been coerced or trafficked, and whether the other party was under the age of 18, or an adult incapable of consenting. There is no analogous offense under current District law. The current D.C. Code does not distinctly criminalize engaging in commercial sex acts with human trafficking victims.[1] To the extent that certain statutory provisions authorizing extended periods of supervised release[2] would apply to the commercial sex with a trafficked person, these provisions are replaced in relevant part by the revised commercial sex with a trafficked person statute.

Subsection (a) establishes the elements for first degree commercial sex with a trafficked person. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that the actor must engage in a "commercial sex act," a defined term.[3] The paragraph specifies that a "knowingly" culpable mental state applies, a defined term[4] which here requires that the actor was practically certain that he or she is engaged in a commercial sex act.

[1] It is possible that some conduct that constitutes first and second degree commercial sex with a trafficked person in the RCC could be prosecuted under the current D.C. Code as sexual abuse under an accomplice theory. Under this theory, by making a payment, the patron/accomplice would have encouraged the principal to coerce the commercial sex act, with the purpose to encourage the principal to succeed in coercing the commercial sex act.

It also is possible that some conduct that constitutes second degree commercial sex with a trafficked person in the RCC could also be prosecuted under the current D.C. Code as either first or second degree child sexual abuse, or first or second degree sexual abuse of a minor. A patron who engages in a commercial sex act with a person under 16 years of age would be guilty of either first degree child sexual abuse (if a sexual act) or second degree child sexual abuse (if a sexual contact). A patron who engages in a commercial sex act with a person 16 or 17 years of age would be guilty of sexual abuse of a minor, however, only if he or she is in a "significant relationship" (e.g., a teacher, religious leader, or uncle) to the minor. Conduct constituting second degree commercial sex with a trafficked person may also be prosecuted under a variety of other sex offenses (e.g., misdemeanor sexual abuse of a child or minor; sexual abuse of a secondary education student) in the current D.C. Code in some circumstances.

However, no current D.C. Code offenses distinctly account for the fact that a minor who engaged in commercial sex was trafficked, or that a person of any age engaged in commercial sex was trafficked by means of coercive threat or debt bondage.

[2] D.C. Code § 24-403.01(b)(4) (" In the case of a person sentenced for an offense for which registration is required by the Chapter 40 of Title 22, the court may, in its discretion, impose a longer term of supervised release than that required or authorized by paragraph (2) or (3) of this subsection, of: . . . (A) Not more than 10 years[.]" D.C. Code §22-4001(8) defines "registration offense" to include "Any offense under the District of Columbia Official Code that involved a sexual act or sexual contact without consent or with a minor[.]" To the extent the commercial sex with a trafficked person statute covers sexual acts or contacts without consent, D.C. Code § 22-403.01 would authorize an extended period of supervised release.

[4] RCC § 22E-206 (b).

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies that first degree commercial sex with a trafficked person requires that a coercive threat,[5] explicit or implicit, or debt bondage, both defined terms,[6] was used to cause the other person to engage in the commercial sex act with the actor. The paragraph specifies that a "knowingly" culpable mental state applies, a defined term[7] which here requires that the actor was practically certain that a coercive threat or debt bondage was used to cause the other person to engage in the commercial sex act.

Paragraph (a)(3) specifies that first degree commercial sex with a trafficked person requires that the actor was reckless as to whether the other person was under the age of 18, or, in fact, the complainant was under 12 years of age. "Recklessness," a defined term,[8] here requires that the actor consciously disregarded a substantial risk that that disregard of the risk was a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct that the other person was under the age of 18. "In fact" is a defined term that here means no culpable mental state need be proven if the complainant is under 12 years of age.

Subsection (b) establishes the elements for second degree commercial sex with a trafficked person. Paragraph (b)(1) specifies that the actor must engage in a commercial sex act. The paragraph specifies that a "knowingly" culpable mental state applies, a defined term[9] which here requires that the actor was practically certain that he or she is engaged in a commercial sex act.

Paragraph (b)(2) specifies that two forms of second degree commercial sex with a trafficked person. Subparagraph (b)(2)(A) requires that an explicit or implicit "coercive threat," or "debt bondage," both defined terms[10], was used to cause the other person to engage in the commercial sex act with the actor. The paragraph specifies that a "knowingly" culpable mental state applies, a defined term[11] which here requires that the actor was practically certain that a coercive threat or debt bondage was used to cause the other person to engage in the commercial sex act. Subparagraph (b)(2)(B) requires that the other person had been recruited, enticed, housed, transported, provided, obtained, or maintained for the purpose of causing the person to submit to or engage in the commercial sex act. The paragraph specifies that a "knowingly" culpable mental state applies, a defined term[12] which here requires that the actor was practically certain that the other person had been recruited, enticed, housed, transported, provided, obtained, or maintained for the purpose of causing the person to submit to or engage in the commercial sex act. Subparagraph (b)(2)(B) also requires that the actor was reckless that the complainant falls under one of the categories specified in sub-subparagraphs (b)(2)(B)(i)-(iii). Sub-subparagraph (b)(2)(B)(i) requires that the complainant is under the age of 18. Sub-subparagraph (b)(2)(B)(ii) requires that the complainant is incapable of appraising the nature of the commercial sex act or of understanding the right to give or withhold consent to the commercial sex act, either due to a drug, intoxicant, or other substance, or, due to an intellectual, developmental, or mental disability or mental illness when the actor has no similarly serious disability or illness. Sub-subparagraph (b)(2)(B)(iii) requires that the complainant was incapable of communicating[13] unwillingness to engage in the commercial sex act. In addition, sub-subparagraph (b)(2)(B)(iv) requires that the complainant was, in fact, under the age of 12. This sub-subparagraph uses the term "in fact," which specifies that no culpable mental state is required as to the complainant being under the age of 12.

[5] A coercive threat may come in the form of a verbal or written communication, however gestures or other conduct may also suffice. In addition, the statute specifies that the coercive threat need not be explicit. Communications and conduct that are implicitly threatening given the circumstances may satisfy this element. For example, if a person consistently beats people who refuse to comply with his demands, this pattern of conduct may constitute a coercive threat when that person makes similar demands of others. In addition, ongoing infliction of harm may constitute a coercive threat, if it communicates that harm will continue in the future.

Subsection (c) specifies the penalties applicable to this offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (d) cross references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The commercial sex with a trafficked person offense changes current District law by criminalizing the knowingly engaging in a commercial sex act with a victim of trafficking in forced commercial sex, forced commercial sex, or sex trafficking of a minor or adult incapable of consenting.

The RCC statute distinctly criminalizes and punishes as a form of human trafficking knowingly engaging in a commercial sex act with a trafficked person. Under the current D.C. Code, engaging in a commercial sex act with another person, with knowledge that the other person has been coerced into engaging in the commercial sex act, or was trafficked for the purposes of engaging in commercial sex acts, is not distinctly criminalized. In situations where the complainant is under 16 years of age or an adult incapable of consenting, an actor engaging in such conduct may be liable under various sexual abuse charges under Chapter 30 of Title 22.[14] Under current D.C. Code § 22–2701, such conduct may be prosecuted as solicitation of prostitution and subject to a maximum 90 days imprisonment for a first offense. In contrast, the revised statute distinctly treats such conduct as a type of human trafficking offense and provides a correspondingly more serious penalty. This change the proportionality of the revised statutes.

[13] If the complainant is unable to communicate verbally or orally, but is able to make gestures, facial expressions, or engage in other conduct, the person may be capable of communicating and this element may not be satisfied.

[14] If A engages in a commercial sex act with B, knowing that a third party coerced B into engage in the commercial sex act, A is not guilty of a sexual assault offense. However, B may be guilty of a sexual assault offense.

RCC § 22E-1609. Forfeiture.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes forfeiture rules for property involved in violations of offenses under this chapter. In addition to any penalties authorized by statutes in this chapter, a court may order any actor convicted of an offense under this chapter to forfeit property used or intended to be used to commit or facilitate commission of an offense under this chapter, or any property obtained as a result of commission of an offense under this chapter. The revised statute replaces the current forfeiture statute applicable to human trafficking offenses.[1]

Relation to Current District Law. The revised forfeiture statute makes changes current District law in one main way.

The revised statute provides judicial discretion in determining whether and to what extent to require forfeiture. The current statute states that "the court shall order…" forfeiture. There is no DCCA case law on point, although generally the DCCA has recognized constitutional restrictions on asset s that are excessive.[2] By contrast, the revised statute states that "the court may order…" forfeiture. Providing judicial discretion allows the court to determine a proportionate forfeiture, conscientious of constitutional and sub-constitutional considerations of what would be an excessive loss.

One change is clarificatory and is not intended to substantively change current District law.

The revised statute uses the term "actor" instead of the terms "individual or business," as used in the current forced labor statute.[3] "Actor" is a defined term[4], which means "a person accused of any offense." The term "person" is also a defined term[5], and includes a "partnership, company, corporation, association, organization[.]" The term "actor" includes both individuals and businesses, and the use of this term is not intended to change current District law.

RCC § 22E-1610. Reputation or Opinion Evidence.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes evidentiary rules that prohibits the use of reputation or opinion evidence of past sexual behavior of an alleged victim in prosecutions for forced commercial sex, as prohibited by RCC § 22E-1602, trafficking in forced commercial sex, as prohibited by RCC § 22E-1604; sex trafficking of a minor or adult incapable of consenting, as prohibited by § 22E-1605; benefitting from human trafficking, as prohibited by § 22E-1606; and commercial sex with a trafficked person, as prohibited by RCC § 22E-1608. This section is nearly identical to current D.C. Code § 22-1839, but has been amended to apply to prosecutions of forced commercial sex and commercial sex with a trafficked person, which are not currently criminalized under the human trafficking chapter.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised reputation or opinion evidence statute changes current District law in one main way.

The revised reputation or opinion evidence statute bars evidence of past sexual behavior of an alleged victim in prosecutions for forced commercial sex, as prohibited under RCC § 22E-1602 and commercial sex with a trafficked person, as prohibited under RCC § 22E-1608. Under current law, coercing a person to engage in a commercial sex act and engaging in a commercial sex act with a trafficked person are not separately criminalized. However, the current reputation or opinion evidence statute applies to prosecutions for "trafficking in commercial sex," "sex trafficking of children," and "benefitting financially from human trafficking[.]"[1] By contrast, the revised reputation or opinion evidence statute clarifies that it also applies to prosecutions of the RCC's forced commercial sex and commercial sex with a trafficked person offenses. It would be inconsistent to bar reputation or opinion evidence of an alleged victim's past sexual behavior in prosecutions for other offenses, but allow them in a prosecution for forced commercial sex or commercial sex with a trafficked person. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute.

One aspect of the revised reputation or opinion evidence statute may constitute a substantive change to current District law.

The revised statute states that when a "person" is accused of an offense listed in the statute, reputation or opinion evidence of the past sexual behavior of the alleged victim is not admissible. The RCC defines "person" to include businesses and other legal persons.[2] The current statute only refers to a person being accused of an offense, but that term is not defined.[3] It is unclear whether the current statute applies in cases in which a business is accused of an offense listed in the statute, and there is no relevant D.C. Court of Appeals case law on point. By contrast, the revised statute clarifies that the reputation or opinion evidence rules apply when a business is accused of offenses listed under the statute. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

One change to the revised statute is clarificatory in nature and is not intended to substantively change District law.

The current statute cross references statutes in the current D.C. Code. The revised statute changes the cross references other statutory provisions to match the revised human trafficking offenses in the RCC. The RCC evidentiary rule applies to RCC §§ 22E-1602, 22E-1604, 22E-1605, and 22E-1608, instead of current D.C. Code §§ 22-1833, 22-1834, and 22-1836. This is a technical change that does not otherwise change the reputation or opinion evidence statute.

RCC § 22E-1611. Civil Action.

Explanatory Note. This section authorizes victims of offenses under RCC § 22E-1601, § 22E-1602, § 22E-1603, § 22E-1604, § 22E-1605, § 22E-1606, § 22E-1607, or § 22E-1608 to bring a civil action in D.C. Superior Court for damages and injunctive relief. This section is nearly identical to current D.C. Code § 22-1840, but has been amended to authorize victims of all trafficking offenses included in the RCC to bring a civil action, and to change the statute of limitations.

This section authorizes a victim of any offense under RCC §§ 22E-1601, 22E-1602, 22E-1603, 22E-1604, 22E-1605, 22E-1606, 22E-1607, or 22E-1608 to bring a civil action against any person who may be charged as a perpetrator of that offense. It is not required that the defendant in the civil action has actually been charged or convicted of that offense. This language shall not be construed to limit civil liability for other entities that may be held vicariously liable, even if they did not directly engage in conduct constituting an offense under this chapter.[1]

Relation to Current District Law. The revised civil action statute changes current District law in two main ways.

First, the revised civil action authorizes victims of commercial sex with a trafficked person as defined under RCC § 22E-1608 to bring a civil action. There is no analogous offense under current law, and accordingly the current civil action statute does not authorize victims of this offense to bring a civil action. By contrast, the revised civil action statute allows victims of commercial sex with a trafficked person to bring civil actions. It would be inconsistent to authorize civil actions for violations of other human trafficking offenses, but not the victims of commercial sex with a trafficked person offense. This change improves the consistency of the revised statute.

Second, the revised civil action statute changes the statute of limitations for bringing civil actions under this section. The current statute says that the statute of limitations shall not begin to run until the plaintiff knew, or reasonably should have known, of any act constituting a human trafficking offense, or if the plaintiff is a minor, until the plaintiff reaches the age of majority, whichever is later. By contrast, the revised civil statute extends the time within which a victim can bring a civil action if the offense occurred when the victim was under the age of 35, and generally allows civil suits to be brought within 5 years of when the victim knew, or reasonably should have been aware, of the offense. This revision expands the period in which victims of trafficking offenses may bring civil actions in accordance with changes under the Sexual Abuse Statute of Limitations Elimination Amendment Act of 2017. This change improves the proportionality and consistency of the revised statute.

In addition to these two changes, two other revisions may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

[1] See, Boykin v. District of Columbia, 484 A.2d 560, 561–62 (D.C. 1984) ("Under the doctrine of respondeat superior, an employer may be held liable for the acts of his employees committed within the scope of their employment.") (citing Penn Central Transportation Co. v. Reddick, 398 A.2d 27, 29 (D.C.1979)).

The revised civil action authorizes victims of forced commercial sex as defined under RCC § 22E-1602 to bring a civil action. The current code does not explicitly criminalize forced commercial sex, and it is unclear whether the use of coercion or debt bondage to compel a person to engage in a commercial sex act constitutes forced labor or services under the current statute. Therefore, it is unclear whether the current civil action statute provides a civil cause of action if a person uses coercive threats or debt bondage to compel a person to engage in a commercial sex act. It would be inconsistent to authorize civil actions for violations of other human trafficking offenses, but not the victims of the forced commercial sex offense. This change improves the consistency of the revised criminal code.

Secondly, the revised civil action statute specifies that a victim of a trafficking offense may bring a civil action against any person who may be charged as a perpetrator of that offense. The current statute does not specify against whom civil actions may be brought, and there is no relevant DCCA case law. This revision clarifies that victims of an offense under this chapter may bring a civil action against a person who may be charged as a perpetrator of that offense.

In addition, one change to the revised statute is clarificatory in nature and is not intended to substantively change District law.

The revised statute changes cross references to other statutory provisions to match the revised human trafficking offenses in the RCC. The current statute cross references statutes in the current D.C. Code. The revised statute authorizes victims of offenses defined under RCC §§ 22E-1601, 22E-1602, 22E-1603, 22E-1604, 22E-1605, 22E-1606, 22E-1607, and 22E-1608. This is a technical change that does not otherwise change the civil action statute.

RCC § 22E-1612. Limitation on Liabilities and Sentencing for RCC Chapter 16 Offenses.

Explanatory Note. The Limitations on Liability and Sentencing for RCC Chapter 16 Offenses ("limitations on liability statute") provides two limitations on liability to offenses under this chapter. First, the limitations on liability statute bars charging a person as an accomplice to a Chapter 16 offense, if the principal had previously committed a Chapter 16 offense against that person within 3 years of the conduct by the principal constituting the offense. Second, the limitations on liability statute bars charging a person with conspiracy to commit a Chapter 16 offense if another party to the conspiracy had previously committed a Chapter 16 offense against that person within 3 years of the formation of the conspiracy.

Subsection (a) bars charging a person as an accomplice to a Chapter 16 offense if the principal had previously committed a Chapter 16 offense against that person. This subsection only bars accomplice liability, and victims of trafficking offenses may still be charged and convicted as principals.

Subsection (b) bars charging a person with conspiracy to commit a Chapter 16 offense if any party to the conspiracy had previously committed a Chapter 16 offense against that person. This subsection only bars charges of conspiracy to commit a Chapter 16 offense, and victims of trafficking offenses may still be charged and convicted with actually committing or attempting to commit a Chapter 16 offense.[1]

Relation to Current District Law. The limitations on liability statute changes current District law in two main ways.

First, the RCC's limitation on liability statute changes current law by barring charging a person as an accomplice to a Chapter 16 offense if prior to that offense, the principal committed a Chapter 16 offense against that person within 3 years prior to the conduct by the principal constituting the offense. Under current law, there are no restrictions on accomplice liability for victims of trafficking offenses. By contrast, this revision prevents criminal liability for victims of offenses under this chapter who subsequently aid or assist principals in committing additional offenses under this chapter. This subsection only bars accomplice liability, and victims of trafficking offenses may

[1] Subsections (b) and (c) recognize that in many instances, victims of human trafficking offenses are highly vulnerable and may be co-opted by perpetrators into assisting in committing further trafficking offenses. Although these victims may not necessarily be able to satisfy a common law duress defense, they often have diminished culpability, and imposing accomplice or conspiracy liability may be disproportionately severe. These subsections seek to balance protections for vulnerable victims of human trafficking offenses who are co-opted by perpetrators, while still permitting criminal liability for persons who commit trafficking offenses as principals. Other jurisdictions have enacted provisions limiting liability for victims of trafficking offenses. E.g., N.M. Stat. Ann. § 30-52-1 ("In a prosecution pursuant to this section, a human trafficking victim shall not be charged with accessory to the crime of human trafficking."). In addition, the Reporter's Notes accompanying the American Law Institute's draft for sexual assault and related offense for the Model Penal Code notes that some human trafficking victim's advocates say that "enforcement practices often traumatize victims and expose them to even greater hardship and danger." Council Draft No. 8 (Dec. 17, 2018). The note cites to 22 U.S.C. § 7101(b)(19) which states that "Victims of severe forms of trafficking should not be inappropriately incarcerated, fined, or otherwise penalized solely for unlawful acts committed as a direct result of being trafficked[.]" still be charged and convicted as principals. This change recognizes the vulnerability many victims of human trafficking have to further manipulation that may fall short of a general defense of duress. This revision improves the proportionality of the revised statute.

Second, the RCC's limitation on liabilities statute changes current law by barring charging a person with conspiracy to commit an offense under Chapter 16 if within 3 years prior to the formation of the conspiracy, a party to the conspiracy had committed a Chapter 16 offense against that person. Under current law, there are no restrictions on conspiracy liability for victims of trafficking offenses. By contrast, this revision prevents criminal liability for victims of offenses under this chapter who subsequently conspire with parties that previously committed a trafficking offense against that person. This subsection only bars charges of conspiracy to commit a Chapter 16 offense, and victims of trafficking offenses may still be charged and convicted with actually committing or attempting to commit a Chapter 16 offense. This change recognizes the vulnerability many victims of human trafficking have to further manipulation that may fall short of a general defense of duress. This revision improves the proportionality of the revised statute.

RCC § 22E-1613. Civil Forfeiture.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes civil asset forfeiture rules for conveyances and money that are planned to be used, or are used, to commit RCC human trafficking offenses. The RCC replaces all prostitution offenses that involve non-consensual commercial sex acts with human trafficking offenses. The civil forfeiture statute in part replaces the current forfeiture statute applicable to prostitution and related offenses,[1] and all seizures and forfeitures under this section shall be pursuant to D.C. Law § 20-278. This statute both changes current law by allowing asset forfeiture as to all human trafficking offenses, and preserves current District law by ensuring that offenses involving non-consensual prostitution are still subject to forfeiture.

Subsection (a) establishes the types of property that are subject to civil forfeiture under the revised statute. Paragraph (a)(1) applies to any property that is, in fact, a conveyance, including aircraft, vehicles, or vessels. "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state for a given element. Here, "in fact" means that there is no culpable mental state required for the fact that the property is a conveyance. There are two alternative bases for forfeiture of a conveyance in paragraph (a)(1). The first requires that the conveyance is possessed with intent to facilitate commission of an offense under Chapter 16 of the RCC. "Possess" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 as either to "hold or carry on one's person" or to "have the ability and desire to exercise control over." "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means a person was practically certain that a conveyance would be used to facilitate commission of an RCC human trafficking offense. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the person's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that the conveyance was used to facilitate commission of an RCC human trafficking offense, just that a person believed to a practical certainty [2]OBJ

The alternative basis for forfeiture of a conveyance in paragraph (a)(1) is a conveyance which is, "in fact," used to facilitate the commission of an RCC human trafficking offense. "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state for a given element. Here, "in fact" means that there is no culpable mental state required for the fact that the conveyance was used to facilitate the commission of an RCC human trafficking offense. Applying strict liability does not change the mental state requirements for forfeiture in D.C. Law 20-278.[3]

Paragraph (a)(2) applies to any property that is, "in fact," money, coins, and currency. "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state for a given element. Here, "in fact" means that there is no culpable mental state required for the fact that the property is money, coins, or currency. There are two alternative bases for forfeiture of money, coins, and currency in paragraph (a)(2). The first requires that the money, coins, or currency are possessed with intent to facilitate commission of an offense under Chapter 16 of the RCC. "Possess" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 as either to "hold or carry on one's person" or to "have the ability and desire to exercise control over." The culpable mental state requirement of "intent" and the strict liability requirements of "in fact" are the same in paragraph (a)(2) as they are in paragraph (a)(1).

The alternative basis for forfeiture of money, coins, or currency in paragraph (a)(2) is if it is, "in fact," used to facilitate the commission of an RCC human trafficking offense. "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state for a given element. Here, "in fact" means that there is no culpable mental state required for the fact that the money, coins or currency were used to facilitate the commission of an RCC human trafficking offense. Applying strict liability does not change the mental state requirements for forfeiture in D.C. Law 20-278.[4]

Paragraph (b) establishes that the seizures and forfeitures under this section shall be pursuant to the standards and procedures set forth in D.C. Law 20-278.

Subsection (c) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised forfeiture statute changes current District law in two main ways.

First, the revised human trafficking civil forfeiture statute specifies that human trafficking offenses are subject to civil asset forfeiture. The current D.C. Code generally specifies that alleged violations of a "forfeitable offense" can give rise to civil asset forfeiture.[5] Human trafficking offenses are not included in the definition of "forfeitable offense," and alleged violations of human trafficking offenses are not explicitly subject to civil forfeiture. However, the definition of "forfeitable offense" does include prostitution offenses, including prostitution offenses involving non-consensual conduct,[6] that can give rise to forfeiture under D.C. Code § 22-2723. In contrast, the revised forfeiture statute changes law by clarifying that all human trafficking offenses are subject to civil asset forfeiture. This change improves the proportionality and consistency of the revised statutes.

Second, the revised human trafficking forfeiture provision applies to money, coins, and currency which are used, or intended to be used, "to facilitate the commission" of an RCC human trafficking offense. The current D.C. Code prostitution forfeiture statute, which applies in part to prostitution offenses involving non-consensual conduct,[7]

[4] See, e.g., D.C. Code § 41-302(b) ("No property shall be subject to forfeiture by reason of an act or omission committed or omitted without the actual knowledge and consent of the owner, unless the owner was willfully blind to the knowledge of the act or omission.").

[5] D.C. Code § 41-301.

[6] Current Chapter 27 of the D.C. Code, which defines prostitution-related offenses, includes several offenses that criminalize nonconsensual commercial sex acts. For example, D.C. Code § 22-2706 makes it a crime to "[use] threats or duress, to detain any individual against such individual's will, for the purpose of prostitution or a sexual act or sexual contact[.]" Compelling a person to engage in or submit to nonconsensual commercial sex acts is criminalized as a human trafficking offense under Chapter 16 of the RCC, not as a prostitution-related offense.

[7] Current Chapter 27 of the D.C. Code, which defines prostitution-related offenses, includes several offenses that criminalize nonconsensual commercial sex acts. For example, D.C. Code § 22-2706 makes it a crime to "[use] threats or duress, to detain any individual against such individual's will, for the purpose of applies to conveyances that are used, or intended to be used, "to facilitate a violation" of the current D.C. Code prostitution statutes[8] and to currency that is used, or intended to be used, "in violation" of the current D.C. Code prostitution statutes.[9] "In violation" appears to be narrower than "to facilitate the commission," but there is no D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) case law on this issue. In contrast, the revised forfeiture provision applies to currency that is used, or possessed with intent to be used, "to facilitate the commission" of the RCC human trafficking offenses, which is consistent with the scope of conveyances subject to forfeiture. It is inconsistent to include in forfeiture conveyances that are used, or possessed with intent to be used, "to facilitate the commission" of a trafficking offense, but to limit forfeiture of currency to currency that is used, or possessed with intent to be used "in violation" of a trafficking offense. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Beyond these two substantive changes to current District law, two other aspects of the revised forfeiture statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the RCC definition of "intent to" applies to the revised forfeiture provision. The current D.C. Code prostitution forfeiture provision applies to conveyances and money that are "intended for use" in a prostitution offense.[10] The meaning of "intended to" is unclear and there is no DCCA case law on this issue.[11] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised human trafficking forfeiture provision applies the RCC definition of "intent" in RCC § 22E-206. "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor was practically certain that the property would be used in a prostitution offense.[12] prostitution or a sexual act or sexual contact[.]" Compelling a person to engage in or submit to nonconsensual commercial sex acts is criminalized as a human trafficking offense under Chapter 16 of the RCC, not as a prostitution-related offense.

[8] D.C. Code Ann. § 22-2723(a)(1) ("(a) The following are subject to forfeiture: (1) All conveyances, including aircraft, vehicles or vessels, which are used, or intended for use, to transport, or in any manner to facilitate a violation of a prostitution-related offense.").

[9] D.C. Code Ann. § 22-2723(a)(2) ("(a) The following are subject to forfeiture: . . . (2) All money, coins, and currency which are used, or intended for use, in violation of a prostitution-related offense.").

[10] D.C. Code § 22-2723(a)(1), (a)(2).

[11] The words "intended to" as used in the current prostitution forfeiture statute may refer to what was commonly known as "specific intent." However, even if this is the case, current District case law is unclear as to whether "specific intent" may be satisfied by mere knowledge, or if conscious desire is required. Compare, Logan v. United States, 483 A.2d 664, 671 (D.C. 1984) (""[a] specific intent to kill exists when a person acts with the purpose . . . of causing the death of another,") with Peoples v. United States, 640 A.2d 1047, 1055-56 (D.C. 1994) (proof that the appellant, who set fire to a building "knew" people inside a would suffer injuries sufficient to infer that the appellant "had the requisite specific intent to support his convictions of malicious disfigurement").

[12] Relying on the RCC definition of "intent" may produce an additional change in current District law. Under the RCC, the "intent" mental state may be satisfied by knowledge of a circumstance or result. The RCC also provides that knowledge of a circumstance may be imputed if a person is reckless as to whether the circumstance exists, and with the purpose of avoiding criminal liability, avoids confirming or fails to investigate whether the circumstance exists. Applied to this forfeiture provision, if an owner does not know that property is to be used to violate the trafficking in forced commercial sex offense, but was reckless as to this fact, and avoided investigating whether this circumstance exists in order to avoid criminal liability, the imputation rule may allow a fact finder to impute knowledge to the owner. It is unclear under current District law whether a similar rule of imputation would apply. Current D.C. Code §

Applying the RCC definition of "intent" does not change the mental state requirements for forfeiture in D.C. Law 20-278.[13] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Second, the RCC establishes that strict liability is a distinct basis for the forfeiture of property. The current D.C. Code prostitution forfeiture provision applies to conveyances and money that are "are used" in a prostitution offense.[14] It is unclear whether "are used" applies strict liability. There is no DCCA case law on this issue. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised human trafficking forfeiture provision, by use of the phrase "in fact," clarifies that strict liability is a distinct basis for the forfeiture of property. Applying strict liability does not change the mental state requirements for forfeiture in D.C. Law 20-278.[15] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statutes.

The remaining changes are clarificatory and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, the revised forfeiture provision deletes the language "to transport." The current D.C. Code prostitution forfeiture provision includes "[a]ll conveyances, including aircraft, vehicles, or vessels, which are used, or intended for use, to transport, or in any manner to facilitate a violation of a prostitution-related offense." The term "conveyances" sufficiently communicates an object designed to transport. The verb "to transport" is unnecessary and deleting it improves the clarity of the revised statutes.

Second, the revised forfeiture provision deletes the language "in any manner." The current D.C. Code prostitution forfeiture provision includes "[a]ll conveyances, including aircraft, vehicles, or vessels, which are used, or intended for use, to transport, or in any manner to facilitate a violation of a prostitution-related offense." "To facilitate" is sufficiently broad to encompass all methods of facilitation, particularly since the revised statute, as is discussed above, no longer specifies "to transport." Deleting "in any manner" improves the clarity of the revised statutes.

Third, the revised forfeiture provision deletes the term "property." The current D.C. Code prostitution forfeiture provision states that "All seizures and forfeitures of property under this section shall be pursuant to the standards and procedures set forth in D.C. Law 20-278."[16] The term "property" is unnecessary because paragraphs (a)(1) and 41-306 states that "[n]o property shall be subject to forfeiture by reason of an act or omission committed or omitted without the actual knowledge and consent of the owner, unless the owner was willfully blind to the knowledge of the act or omission." However, this provision applies when an actual act or omission is the basis for forfeiture. It is unclear whether an owner's willful blindness as to intended uses of property still authorizes civil forfeiture. If this provision does apply even when property has not yet been used, the term "willfully blind" is undefined, and it is unclear how it differs from the deliberate ignorance provision under the RCC.

---

[13] See, e.g., D.C. Code § 41-302(b) ("No property shall be subject to forfeiture by reason of an act or omission committed or omitted without the actual knowledge and consent of the owner, unless the owner was willfully blind to the knowledge of the act or omission.").

RCC § 22E-1801. Stalking.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the stalking offense for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The offense prohibits patterns of behavior that significantly intrude on a person's privacy or autonomy and threaten a long-lasting impact on a person's quality of life. The offense replaces the current stalking offense and related provisions in D.C. Code §§ 22-3131 - 3135.

Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that the accused must purposely engage in a course of conduct directed at a particular complainant. "Purposely," a term defined in RCC § 22E-206, here requires a conscious desire to engage in a pattern of misconduct.[1] A course of conduct does not have to consist of identical conduct, but the conduct must share an uninterrupted purpose[2] and must consist of one or more of the activities listed in subparagraphs (a)(1)(A) – (D).[3] The behavior must be directed at a specific person, not merely be disturbing to the general public.[4] The pattern may be established by any combination of conduct described in subparagraphs (a)(1)(A) – (D).

Subparagraph (a)(1)(A) provides that one means of committing stalking is physically following or physically monitoring a specific individual. The term "physically following" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and means maintaining close proximity to a person, near enough to see or hear the person's activities person as they move from one location to another.[5] "Physically monitoring" is also defined in RCC § 22E-701 and means appearing in close proximity to someone's residence, workplace, or school, to detect the person's whereabouts or activities. Such following or monitoring may be accomplished by means of a third party,[6] however, the revised stalking statute does not reach unauthorized electronic surveillance.[7] Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-

[1] A person does not commit a stalking offense by merely knowing that they are engaging in a pattern of conduct toward the complainant. Consider, for example, a person who communicates to a large audience, such as a television broadcast or an upload to YouTube. That person may be practically certain that the complainant will watch the broadcast, and negligent as to the fact that the complainant will be distressed by the content, but not consciously desire that the complainant watch. Consider also a divorced couple attending a family event, such as a wedding or a funeral. One former spouse may be practically certain that they are maintaining close proximity to the other as they move from the church to the reception hall, and negligent as to the fact that their very presence is distressing, but not consciously desire to physically follow them.

[2] A person does not commit a stalking offense by harming a complainant on two occasions that are unrelated or interrupted by a period of reconciliation. Consider, for example, in February of a given year Sister A and Sister B argue about what to watch on television and A assaults B; from March through September, they get along well; but in October they argue about who has to do the dishes and A assaults B again. Sister A has committed two assaults in violation of RCC § 22E-1202 but has not committed a stalking offense.

[3] The common purpose does not have to be nefarious. For example, a person might persistently follow someone with the goal of winning their affection.

[4] Conduct in a public place that causes a person to reasonably fear a crime is likely to occur may be punishable as disorderly conduct. RCC § 22E-4201.

[5] The phrase "close proximity" does not require that the defendant be near enough to reach the complainant. Distances may vary widely, depending on facts including crowd density, noise, and height. Examples may include walking a couple of stores down the street from the complainant or driving near the complainant in a vehicle.

[6] See RCC § 22E-211 (Liability for causing crime by an innocent or irresponsible person).

[7] Unauthorized electronic surveillance is addressed in RCC § 22E-1802, Electronic Stalking.

207, the "purposely" culpable mental state also applies to this element. The accused must consciously desire to physically follow or monitor the complainant.[8]

Subparagraph (a)(1)(B) provides that another means of committing stalking is falsely personating a complainant. For example, an actor may commit a stalking offense by falsely posing as the complainant in an online forum and making statements that intentionally or negligently inflict fear or emotional stress on that complainant. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "purposely" culpable mental state also applies to this element. The accused must consciously desire to falsely personate the complainant.

Subparagraph (a)(1)(C) provides that a third means of committing stalking is to persistently contact someone without their effective consent. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "purposely" culpable mental state requires that the accused consciously desire to contact the specific individual.[9] The method of communication is irrelevant, whether it be in person speech, electronic correspondence, or messages sent through a third party.[10] Subparagraph (a)(1)(C) does not reach communications about the specific individual to other (third) persons.[11] This restriction on communication is content-neutral, and prohibits all contact beyond the complainant's effective consent, irrespective of tenor and tone.

Subparagraph (a)(1)(D) provides that a fourth means of committing stalking is to commit, solicit, or attempt Criminal Threats,[12] Theft,[13] Identity Theft,[14] Arson,[15] Criminal Damage to Property,[16] Criminal Graffiti,[17] Trespass,[18] Breach of Home Privacy,[19] or Indecent Exposure.[20] "In fact," a defined term,[21] is used to indicate that [8] For example, the accused must act with the purpose of appearing at the target's home, office, or school and with the purpose of watching them. A person who does not know the location is one that the target frequents, or who knowingly but not purposely frequents, a location where the target is does not commit a stalking offense.

[9] Consider, for example, Person A calls a phone number intending to reach Person B and Person C unexpectedly answers the phone. Person A did not purposely engage in a pattern of stalking conduct.

[10] Consider, for example, Person A contacts Person B's family, friends, coworkers, and neighbors to complain about unpaid alimony. If Person A simply voices a negative opinion about Person B, that speech will not amount to stalking. However, if Person A repeatedly instructs Person B's friends to relay a message to Person B, with the intent or effect of frightening Person B, Person A has committed the offense of stalking.

[11] For example, a person who posts disparaging remarks about a former spouse on her own Facebook page, without tagging the subject of the post, does not commit stalking. But see Matter of Welfare of A.J.B., 910 N.W.2d 491 (Minn. Ct. App. 2018) (concluding that tweets tagging a specific individual are both public and specifically targeted because the act of tagging someone is intended so that the tagged individual sees the posts). Note, however, that communications about the specific individual that amount to a criminal threat may constitute a separate basis for finding stalking conduct per subparagraph (a)(1)(C).

there is no separate or additional culpable mental state required as to whether the accused committed one of the specified offenses. The use of "in fact" does not change the culpable mental states required in the specified offenses.

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies that the person must be negligent as to the fact that the course of conduct is without effective consent. The term "negligent" is defined in RCC § 22E-206 and here requires that the actor should be aware of a substantial risk that the contact[22] is without the complainant's effective consent[23] and that the actor's failure to perceive the risk was a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of care.[24] The term "effective consent" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and means consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception. The term "consent" is also defined in RCC § 22E-701.

Paragraph (a)(3) requires that the conduct described in paragraph (a)(1) have either the intent or the effect of causing the victim to experience fear or distress. Under (a)(3)(A), a person commits stalking when they act "with intent to" cause someone fear or significant distress. "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor was practically certain that his or her conduct would cause someone fear or significant distress. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that such fear or significant distress occurred, just that the defendant believed to a practical certainty that such fear or significant distress would result.[25] Under (a)(3)(B), a person commits stalking when they negligently cause fear or significant distress, even if they did not subjectively intend to do so.[26] "Negligently" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 and, applied here, means the actor should be aware of a substantial risk that the pattern of [22] It is the contact and not the content that must be without effective consent. Compare, for example, a complainant who notifies the defendant to cease all communication (e.g., "Do not call me again.") with a complainant who asks the defendant to cease certain offensive communication (e.g., "Do not call me 'a jerk' again.").

[23] Consider, for example, a person who is told by a love interest's parent, "Never contact my daughter again." If the person reasonable believes that this is the command only of the parent and not the love interest, disobeying the command will not amount to stalking.

[24] For example, a complainant may convey their desire to not be contacted either directly, by telling the person to stop, or indirectly through an attorney, government entity, or a third party. In some instances, blocking electronic communications may also suffice to notify to the accused that further communication is unwelcome. On some communication platforms, electronic blocking is obvious to the person who has been blocked. On other platforms, the user's profile may appear to vanish. On others, the blocking (or muting) is not made apparent to the person who was blocked at all.

[25] Consider, for example, Person A sends multiple messages to Person B threatening to "beat him up." Person B is unafraid because he has been specially trained as a fighter. Person A has, nevertheless, may have committed a stalking offense against Person B.

[26] Consider, for example, Person A secretly follows Person B from place to place, hoping Person B will not notice, but Person B does notice and becomes afraid. Person A has committed stalking, if Person B's fear was objectively reasonable. Consider also, a person incessantly contacts an ex-lover after being asked to stop, with the intention of reconciling. Although the person did not intend to cause any undue fear or distress, the unwanted communication nevertheless amounts to stalking, if it negligently does cause such a harm.

conduct will frighten or significantly distress that particular individual[27] and the actor's failure to perceive the risk was a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of care. Sub-subparagraphs (a)(3)(A)(i) and (a)(3)(B)(i) specify fear of physical harm or confinement to any person[28] is one of two alternative emotional injuries that may establish stalking liability. The term "safety" is defined in the statute to mean ongoing security from significant intrusions on one's bodily integrity or bodily movement. Sub-subparagraphs (a)(3)(A)(ii) and (a)(3)(B)(ii) also provide that "significant emotional distress" is a second type of emotional injury that may establish stalking liability. "Significant emotional distress" is a defined term that means substantial, ongoing mental suffering that may, but does not necessarily, require medical or other professional treatment or counseling. The distress must rise significantly above the level of uneasiness, nervousness, unhappiness, or similar feelings commonly experienced in day to day living.[29]

Paragraph (b)(1) specifically excludes from stalking liability certain speech about social issues that is usually constitutionally protected speech.[30] Paragraph (b)(1) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element, here the requirements in paragraph (b)(1). The term "public matter" has the meaning indicated in Supreme Court case law. Stalking statutes are often vulnerable to constitutional challenges, as written and as applied.[31] The paragraph makes clear that the stalking statute does not punish activities such as participating in a labor strike, advocating a boycott, publishing harsh reviews of a restaurant, acting as a whistleblower, or criticizing a city official's fitness for office. Although such applications of the stalking statute likely would be constitutionally invalid without this statutory language, codifying the exception provides better notice to the public and criminal justice system actors. Pursuant to (b)(1), a person who is a law enforcement officer,[32] District official, [33] candidate for elected office, or employee of a business that is open to the public is expected to tolerate the opinions of the community

[27] For example, if the actor reasonably but mistakenly believes that the victim of the stalking conduct will be unbothered by the pattern of conduct, the actor has not acted negligently. RCC § 22E-206. The fact that another reasonable person might find the same consequence alarming is inconsequential.

[28] This includes fear that the stalker will physically harm the victim, a member of the victim's family, or a stranger.

[29] RCC § 22E-701.

[30] Speech on public issues should be "uninhibited, robust, and wide-open…[because such] speech occupies the highest rung of the hierarchy of First Amendment values, and is entitled to special protection." Snyder v. Phelps, 562 U.S. 443, 444 (2011) (citing to New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964) and Connick v. Myers, 461 U.S. 138 (1983) (internal quotation marks omitted)).

[31] There are many instances when one may communicate with another with the intention of causing a slight annoyance in order to emphasize an idea or opinion, or to prompt a desired course of action that one is legitimately entitled to seek, but the "mere fact that expressive activity causes hurt feelings, offense, or resentment does not render the expression unprotected." R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, Minn., 505 U.S. 377, 414 (1992) (White, Blackmun, O'Connor & Stevens, JJ., concurring); see also State v. Brobst, 151 N.H. 420, 423 (2004); People v. Klick, 66 Ill. 2d 269, 273 (1977). The revised statute's prior notification requirement is not itself enough to render the statute constitutional as applied. See, e.g., State v. Pierce, 152 N.H. 790 (2005).

they serve, at least while they are on duty.[34] However, depending on the facts in a particular case, the First Amendment may offer broader or narrower protection than the speech highlighted in this special exception. Free speech on matters of public concern is not limited to speech directed at political figures and businesses nor is it limited to communications that occur while those persons are engaged in their official duties.[35]

Paragraph (b)(2) specifically excludes from stalking liability persons who are engaged in activities that are vital to a free press and to the fair administration of justice. Paragraph (b)(2) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element, here the requirements in paragraph (b)(2) and subparagraphs (b)(2)(A) and (b)(2)(B). A journalist, law enforcement officer, professional investigator (licensed or unlicensed), attorney, process server, pro se litigant, or compliance investigator who is acting within the reasonable scope of his or her professional duties or court obligations does not commit a stalking offense.[36]

Subsection (c) provides that where conduct is of a continuing nature, each 24-hour period constitutes one occasion.[37]

Subsection (d) provides the penalties for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Paragraph (d)(2) authorizes four penalty enhancements. If one or more of the enhancements is alleged and proven beyond a reasonable doubt,[38] the penalty classification is increased by one class. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the phrase "in fact" indicates that the accused is strictly liable with respect to whether the enhancement applies.

Subparagraph (d)(2)(A) authorizes an enhancement if the defendant violated a court order or condition of release prohibiting or restricting contact with the complainant by committing the stalking offense. The accused is strictly liable with respect to whether a court order or condition of release prohibited or restricted contact with the complaining witness.[39] The term "court order" includes any judicial directive, oral or written, that

> The Supreme Court has defined speech on a matter of public concern as speech that either can be fairly considered as relating to any matter of political, social, or other concern to the community or is on a subject of legitimate news interest; that is, a subject of general interest and of value and concern to the public.

[36] The revised statute anticipates that some legal pleadings, correspondence and negotiations will be distressing. Whether conduct exceeds the scope of a person's duties as an attorney or unrepresented litigant is fact-sensitive.

United States*, 98 A.3d 156, 158 (D.C. 2014) (finding that all conduct (1400 phone calls) that occurred before entry of a restraining order constituted one course of conduct, while all conduct that occurred after the entry of the restraining order (800 phone calls) constituted another).

[39] A good faith belief that the order was expired or vacated is not a defense.

restricts contact with the stalking victim.[40] A condition of release may be imposed by a court or by the United States Parole Commission.[41]

Subparagraph (d)(2)(B) authorizes an enhancement for any person who has a prior stalking or electronic stalking conviction within ten years of the instant offense. This includes any criminal offense against the District of Columbia, a state, a federally-recognized Indian tribe, or the United States and its territories, with elements that would necessarily prove the elements of stalking or electronic stalking under RCC § 22E-1801 and 1802.[42]

Subparagraph (d)(2)(C) authorizes an enhancement for stalking conduct that causes the affected persons to incur expenses that amount to more than $5,000. "Financial injury" is a defined term that includes all reasonable monetary costs, debts, or obligations that were sustained as a result of the stalking.[43] This provision does not affect the sentencing court's discretion with respect to ordering restitution. The government's decision to not seek a penalty enhancement does not preclude the government from seeking reimbursement under the restitution statute.[44]

Subparagraph (d)(2)(D) authorizes a minor victim enhancement, which includes two distinct culpable mental states. First, the actor is strictly liable as to whether he or she is an adult who is at least four years older than the complainant. It is not a defense to this enhancement that the accused believed, even reasonably, that the age difference was something less than four years. Second, the actor must recklessly disregard the fact that the victim is a minor. The term "recklessly" is defined in the revised code and here means the person must be aware of a substantial risk that the complainant is under 18 years of age and that the person's disregard of the risk is a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct.[45]

Paragraph (d)(3) disallows stacking a repeat offender penalty enhancement[46] on top of a penalty enhancement for a prior stalking conviction.

Paragraph (e)(1) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC.

Paragraph (e)(2) defines "safety" means ongoing security from significant intrusions on one's bodily integrity or bodily movement.[47]

[40] Examples include stay away orders, civil protection orders, family court orders, civil injunctions, and consent decrees. The order must clearly address prohibitions on contact with the specified person. An order to stay away from a particular location, without reference to the specific individual will not suffice.

[41] Regarding the legal authority to impose such conditions, see Hunt v. United States, 109 A.3d 620, 621-22 (D.C. 2014).

[42] The term "comparable offense" is defined in RCC § 22E-701.

[43] RCC § 22E-701.

[44] See D.C. Code § 16-711.

[45] See RCC § 22E-206. For example, a 20-year-old who knows that the target of the stalking conduct attends middle school has likely disregarded a substantial risk that the victim is less than 16 years old, absent evidence to the contrary. On the other hand, a person may engage in pattern of unwelcome communication toward an anonymous person online, without having any reason to suspect that it is operated by a child.

[46] RCC § 22E-606.

[47] Coleman v. United States, 202 A.3d 1127 (D.C. 2019) (explaining, "'Fear for safety' means fear of significant injury or a comparable harm...seriously troubling conduct, not mere unpleasant or mildly worrying encounters that occur on a regular basis in any community.").

Relation to Current District Law. The revised stalking statute clearly changes current District law in five main ways.

First, the revised statute limits stalking liability for non-threatening communications to those communications that occur without the complainant's effective consent. Given that current D.C. Code § 22-3133(a)(3) provides for stalking liability when the defendant does not have any subjective awareness of the impact of his or her non-threatening speech, the defendant may be guilty of stalking while never having been aware that their non-threatening speech was unwanted.[48] In contrast, the revised statute requires that, although the complaining witness does not have to affirmatively notify the actor to cease following, monitoring, falsely personating, or criminal behavior,[49] non-criminal speech does not become a predicate for stalking unless the defendant is at least negligent as to the fact that it is unwelcome. This requirement effectively transforms future communications into a verbal act of ignoring the victim's directive to be left alone and invading the victim's privacy. The revised statute thereby criminalizes behavior that is calculated to torment without reaching other legitimate speech.[50] This change improves the clarity, proportionality, and, perhaps, the constitutionality of the revised statutes.[51]

Second, the revised stalking statute provides as a possible basis of liability that a person negligently causes the targeted person to fear for his or her safety or that of another person, or to suffer significant emotional distress. Current D.C. Code § 22-3133(a) provides as one possible basis of liability that there be a course of conduct that "the person should have known would cause a reasonable person in the individual's circumstances" to experience fear for safety or emotional distress.[52] The DCCA has held [49] In these instances, "[r]ecommending that a victim confront or try to reason with the individual who is stalking him or her can be dangerous and may unnecessarily increase the victim's risk of harm." See Revised Model Code at page 52.

[50] The "mere fact that expressive activity causes hurt feelings, offense, or resentment does not render the expression unprotected." R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, Minn., 505 U.S. 377, 414 (1992) (White, Blackmun, O'Connor & Stevens, JJ., concurring). There are many instances when one may communicate with another with the intention of causing a slight annoyance in order to emphasize an idea or opinion, or to prompt a desired course of action that one is legitimately entitled to seek. See State v. Brobst, 151 N.H. 420, 423 (2004); People v. Klick, 66 Ill. 2d 269, 273 (1977). Bill collectors, global warming activists, well-intentioned family members, personal coaches, and religious leaders are among the many persons who may purposely make repeated communications to a specific individual, with messages that they know or should know will cause the hearer significant emotional distress.

[51] The revised statute's prior notification requirement is not itself enough to render the statute constitutional as applied. See, e.g., State v. Pierce, 152 N.H. 790 (2005).

[52] In People v. Relerford, 104 N.E.3d 341, 350 (Ill. 2017), the Supreme Court of Illinois held that identical language violates due process. The court explained:

> [T]he proscription against "communicat[ions] to or about" a person that negligently would cause a reasonable person to suffer emotional distress criminalizes certain types of speech based on the impact that the communication has on the recipient…Therefore, it is clear that the challenged statutory provision must be considered a content-based restriction because it cannot be justified without reference to the content of the prohibited that this element is satisfied where the defendant's conduct is "objectively frightening and alarming." [53] In contrast, under the revised statute an actor is liable for causing an unintended harm only if: (1) he or she should have been aware of a substantial risk that conduct would cause fear for safety or be distressing to the complainant and the actor's failure to perceive the risk is a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of care, and (2) the complainant did experience significant emotional distress.[54] This change applies the standard culpable mental state definition of "negligently" used throughout the RCC,[55] even though it is highly unusual to provide criminal liability for merely negligent conduct.[56] The lack of any subjective awareness by the accused, however, is offset to some degree by the new requirement that the complainant actually experience harm.[57] Requiring actual harm may also better reflect the Council's prior stated intent that stalking liability be focused on harms to targeted individuals rather than communications

App. 2007), a Louisiana court reversed a stalking conviction that was based on the defendant driving back and forth in front of the Wrights' house several times over the course of a day to collect firewood from a tree trimming crew, causing Mrs. Wright emotional distress. The trial court had found, "There's no prior contact whatsoever between these people; nobody knew one another here," but concluded, "[A]s I've stated before, the suspicious conduct in a neighborhood causes a certain amount of—degree of emotional distress especially with the womenfolk."

and behaviors that are inappropriate but do not actually cause distress.[58] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of District statutes and may ensure constitutionality.

Third, the revised statute limits liability for "monitoring" to in-person monitoring at a person's residence, workplace, or school. Current law defines a course of stalking conduct to include acts to "monitor" and "place under surveillance."[59] These terms are not defined and the DCCA has not interpreted their meaning.[60] In contrast, the revised stalking statute defines "physically monitoring" to mean being in the immediate vicinity of the person's residence, workplace, or school, with intent to detect the person's whereabouts or activities.[61] Limiting monitoring to locations where the specific individual is obliged to be and there is a heightened expectation of privacy avoids prosecutions for "mutual stalking"[62] and may help ensure first amendment protections for conduct in public spaces is not burdened.[63] The revised code punishes indirectly observing or recording someone's location or activities as a separate offense focused on nonconsensual electronic monitoring.[64] This change eliminates unnecessary gaps and overlap between criminal offenses.

Fourth, the revised statute does not specifically authorize multiple convictions for stalking and identity theft based on the same facts. Current D.C. Code § 22-3134(d) provides that, "A person shall not be sentenced consecutively for stalking and identify theft based on the same act or course of conduct." Although there is no case law on [58] D.C. Code § 22-3131 explains that the current stalking statute aims to protect victims of stalking from grief and violence, as opposed to protecting the public from conduct that is generally alarming or distressing.

> (a) The Council finds that stalking is a serious problem in this city and nationwide. Stalking involves severe intrusions on the victim's personal privacy and autonomy. It is a crime that can have a long-lasting impact on the victim's quality of life, and creates risks to the security and safety of the victim and others, even in the absence of express threats of physical harm…(b)…The Council recognizes that stalking includes a pattern of following or monitoring the victim, or committing violent or intimidating acts against the victim, regardless of the means.

(Emphasis added.) Notably, behavior that alarms the general public may be separately punished as disorderly conduct in D.C. Code § 22-1321 and corresponding RCC § 22E-4201.

[59] D.C. Code § 22-3132(8)(a).

[60] At least one other state has interpreted monitoring to include a wide variety of relatively conduct, including "keeping track of" an individual's online activity. See People v. Gauger, 2-15-0488, 2018 WL 3135087, at *3 (Ill. App. Ct. June 27, 2018) (affirming a stalking conviction where a defendant impersonated the victim's friends on Facebook and downloaded photographs of her family).

[61] RCC § 22E-1801(d).

[62] Consider, for example, a recently divorced couple that continues to attend the same church services, each experiencing significant emotional distress upon seeing the other. If the revised statute included churches, both people may be said to have committed stalking.

[63] Reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions may be imposed upon constitutionally protected speech in some circumstances, and several District statutes reflect these considerations. See, e.g., D.C. Code § 22-1314.02 (regarding obstruction of access to or disruption of medical facilities).

[64] RCC § 22E-1802. See also D.C. Code § 22-3531, Voyeurism, which makes it unlawful to secretly monitor a person who is (A) Using a bathroom or rest room; (B) Totally or partially undressed or changing clothes; or (C) Engaging in sexual activity.

point, this language appears to categorically authorize multiple convictions for identity theft and stalking based on the same act or course of conduct. In contrast, the revised stalking statute does not contain such a concurrent sentencing provision and treats identity theft the same as other criminal conduct that may subject a person to stalking liability. There is no apparent reason for specially treating identity theft in this manner, and there may be situations where convictions for identity theft and stalking based on the same acts or course of conduct should merge. The revised code includes a comprehensive merger provision in its general part that applies to charges for identity theft (and other predicate crimes) and stalking arising from the same act or course of conduct.[65] This change improves the proportionality of penalties and the consistency of the code.

Fifth, the revised statute provides a distinct penalty enhancement for having one prior stalking or electronic stalking conviction that increases the penalty by one class. The current D.C Code penalty provisions for stalking include distinct enhancements for a second offense[66] and a third offense.[67] The revised statute retains the second-strike enhancement but eliminates the third-strike enhancement. Instead, the RCC's general repeat offender penalty enhancement may apply when a defendant has two or more prior convictions for a comparable offense.[68] This change improves the consistency and proportionality of District statutes.

Beyond these five changes to current District law, eight other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised statute specifies that stalking may be committed by falsely personating the complainant or committing Criminal Threats,[69] Theft,[70] Identity Theft,[71] Arson,[72] Criminal Damage to Property,[73] Criminal Graffiti,[74] Trespass,[75] Breach of Home Privacy,[76] or Indecent Exposure.[77] Current D.C. Code § 22-3132(8) defines a "course of conduct" for the stalking statute and provides an extensive list of activities that already appear to be criminal, such as efforts to "threaten,"[78] "[i]nterfere with, damage, take, or unlawfully enter an individual's real or personal property or threaten or attempt to do so,"[79] and "[u]se another individual's personal identifying information."[80] The DCCA has not addressed whether the conduct listed in the current stalking statute's definition of a "course of conduct" requires proof equal to corresponding criminal offenses or how such conduct differs from corresponding criminal offenses. The revised statute specifies that only conduct constituting a criminal threat or a specified property offense in the RCC is predicate conduct for stalking, replacing the corresponding general references to threats, property damage, and misuse of personal information in the current statute.[81] This change improves the clarity and consistency of District statutes.

Second, the revised statute provides stalking liability for communications "about" a person only when such communications are otherwise criminal.[82] Current law defines a course of stalking conduct to include both communications to a person and communications about a person without distinction.[83] The current language appears to capture all speech that a person should know would cause an individual to feel alarmed, disturbed, or distressed.[84] However, the current stalking statute also states that it "does not apply to constitutionally protected activity."[85] To resolve ambiguities as to the constitutional scope of the offense, the revised stalking statute more narrowly proscribes speech that is not merely insensitive to the subject of the commentary but also has the intent or effect of tormenting the listener[86] or threatening bodily harm. This approach [81] For example, "threaten" in the current stalking statute generally corresponds to the criminal threat offense codified at RCC § 22E-1204. "Interfere with, damage, take, or unlawfully enter an individual's real or personal property or threaten or attempt to do so," generally corresponds to the offenses of theft (RCC § 22E-2101), unauthorized use of property (RCC § 22E-2102; arson (RCC § 22E-2501), damage to property (RCC § 22E-2503), graffiti (RCC § 22E-2504), trespass (RCC § 22E-2601), and trespass of motor vehicle (RCC § 22E-2602). "Use another individual's personal identifying information" generally corresponds with references to the offenses of forgery (RCC § 22E-2204) and identity theft (RCC § 22E-2205).

[82] Providing stalking liability for other communications "about" a person may criminalize publicizing matters of public concern, or "public shaming." For example, a victim who posts six signs to raise public awareness about the identity of her rapist may be liable for stalking under existing law if that victim knew that it would reasonably cause the perpetrator to suffer emotional distress. See Amy Brittain and Maura Judikis, 'The man who attacked me works in your kitchen': Victim of serial groper took justice into her own hands, Washington Post, January 31, 2019.

[84] D.C. Code § 22-3133(a)(3)(B). Consider, for example, a person who exposes another person's extramarital affair to several other people. Although the revelation may be disturbing or distressing, it is not the kind of behavior that is typically considered stalking behavior and it is likely protected as free speech. United States v. Stevens, 559 U.S. 460, 479 (2010) ("Most of what we say to one another lacks "religious, political, scientific, educational, journalistic, historical, or artistic value" (let alone serious value), but it is still sheltered from government regulation." (emphasis in original)). Civil tort remedies, including monetary damages and injunctive relief, exist for defamation, invasion of privacy – false light, tortious interference, intentional infliction of emotional distress, and negligent infliction of emotional distress.

App. 2018) (upholding a conviction where the defendant published tweets tagging a specific individual; concluding the tweets are both public and specifically targeted because the act of tagging someone is intended so that the tagged individual sees the posts) and People v. Relerford, 104 N.E.3d 341, 350 (Ill. 2017) (reversing a conviction where the defendant made several postings on Facebook about a specific individual but did not send the Facebook posts directly to her and, because she was not one of his Facebook friends, she could not view the posts through her own Facebook account, and only received the alarming posts via email from a colleague); *see also State v. may be more consistent with the Council's prior stated intent, as there are many distressing communications "about" an individual that do not amount to the "severe intrusions on the victim's personal privacy and autonomy" that the current statute aims to curtail.[87] This change improves the clarity, proportionality, and perhaps the constitutionality of the revised statutes.

Third, the revised statute excludes stalking liability for communications concerning political and public matters to on-duty law enforcement officers, District officials, candidates for elected office, or employees of businesses that serve the public.[88] The current stalking statute provides no specific exceptions for particular types of communications or recipients, but states that the statute "does not apply to constitutionally protected activity."[89] While the DCCA has not directly addressed First Amendment challenges to the stalking statute, the issue has been litigated in D.C. Superior Court in the context of communications to a member of the D.C. Council.[90] To resolve ambiguities as to the constitutional scope of the offense, the revised stalking statute explicitly recognizes an exercise of free speech that is especially common in Washington, D.C.: contacting elected representatives to urge or criticize political action.[91] The revised code provides that expressions of opinion about public issues are not a basis for stalking liability,[92] while cautioning the reader that harassing and insulting one-to-one communications[93] sent after hours may not enjoy the same protection.[94] The exception also applies to employees of businesses that serve the public, who may be the subject of distressing criticism of their goods or services. This change improves the clarity, proportionality, and perhaps the constitutionality of the revised statutes.

Fourth, the revised statute more precisely specifies the nature of the social harm in stalking to be a course of conduct that causes "ongoing" safety concerns or emotional distress. The current stalking statute requires proof that the defendant engaged in a "course of conduct," a defined term that refers to conduct "on 2 or more occasions" but is silent as to whether or how the conduct on these occasions is related.[95] The current stalking statute does not define the meaning of "safety" and its definition of "emotional distress"[96] is silent on whether such distress is of an ongoing nature. The DCCA has explained only that each term requires a severe degree of intrusion.[97] To resolve these ambiguities, the revised code defines the terms "safety" and "significant emotional distress" as ongoing fear or distress.[98] Because stalking is most commonly understood to mean an obsessive, protracted pursuit,[99] the revised statute's definitions refer to both the degree and the duration of the harm. This change improves the clarity of the revised statute.

Fifth, the revised definition of "financial injury" more precisely defines the types of expenses that will trigger a penalty enhancement. Current D.C. Code § 22-3132(5) includes expenses incurred by the complainant, member of the complainant's household, a person whose safety is threatened by the stalking, or a person who is financially responsible for the complainant. In contrast, the revised definition includes expenses incurred by any natural person,[100] but requires that the expenses be reasonably incurred by the criminal conduct. Additionally, the revised definition includes more examples in the non-exhaustive list of costs, such as the cost of clearing a debt and "lost compensation," which includes employment benefits and other earnings. These changes clarify and improve the consistency of District statutes.

[93] In contrast, blocking speech on a public forum constitutes viewpoint discrimination that violates the First Amendment. See Knight First Amendment Inst. at Columbia Univ. v. Trump, 302 F. [100] Expenses incurred by the court system or another entity are excluded from the calculation of financial injury.

Sixth, the revised stalking statute excludes liability for conduct that is authorized by a court order or District statute, regulation, rule, or license;[101] or that is reasonably within the scope of a person's specific, lawful commercial purpose or employment duty. Current D.C. Code § 22-3133(b) contains a general statement that the offense "does not apply to constitutionally protected activity," but otherwise is silent as to whether other activities are excluded. The DCCA has not addressed whether a person's bona fide action pursuant to their occupational duties is excepted from stalking liability.[102] However, to resolve these ambiguities as to the constitutional scope of the offense, the revised statute specifically excludes from stalking liability activities that, despite being distressing, are generally recognized as legitimate occupational activities. Even if the current and RCC stalking statutes' general statements regarding the protection of constitutional activities provide adequate notice that certain activities do not constitute stalking, such statements do not obviously extend to activities beyond the First Amendment.[103] Without a clear exclusion, such legitimate activities may constitute stalking.[104] This change improves the clarity, proportionality and perhaps the constitutionality of the revised offense.

Seventh, the revised statute extends jurisdiction for stalking only to instances where some aspect of the crime occurs in the District. Current D.C. Code § 22-3135(b) states that jurisdiction extends to communications if "the specific individual lives in the District of Columbia" and "it can be electronically accessed in the District of Columbia" (emphasis added). The DCCA has not interpreted the meaning of this phrase. The revised statute does not extend jurisdiction to harms where the accused and the complainant and all relevant action occurs outside the District, even though the complainant is a District resident.[105] Authority to exercise jurisdiction over acts that occur outside the District's physical borders has traditionally been limited to acts that occur in, or are intended to have, and actually do have, a detrimental effect within the District.[106] There is no clear precedent for states to extend jurisdiction based solely on the residency of the alleged victim,[107] and such an extension, if intended, may be [101] For example, a pro se litigant may need to send distressing communications in connection with a pending case. See, e.g., Eugene Volokh, How I Was a Criminal Defendant in a N.J. Harassment Case, REASON (August 22, 2019).

[102] Notably, in White v. Muller, 2017 D.C. Super. LEXIS 1, the court's analysis did not focus on the fact that Muller had duties as a member of the press so much as the status of White as a Councilmember.

[103] Many of the professional activities excepted in the RCC stalking statute, e.g., a private investigator, are not constitutionally protected activities. Notably, the District's current voyeurism statute contains an exception for monitoring by law enforcement. D.C. Code § 22-3531(e)(1).

[104] The intent requirements in the current and revised stalking statutes do not necessarily exempt persons engaged in bona fide, legitimate occupational activities. For example, a process server may need to repeatedly lie in wait near someone's home and workplace to hand-serve that person with a distressing pleading. Similarly, a business owner monitoring an employee's compliance with worker safety laws may cause the person some degree of emotional unrest.

[105] For example, Person A resides in Toronto and sends Person B a threatening text message each time she visits the Canada from her home in Washington, DC. Current law may be understood to mean that A has committed a stalking offense in the District, simply because the messages can be accessed here.

[107] Wayne R. LaFave, 1 Subst. Crim. L. § 4.4(c)(1) (3d ed.).

unconstitutional.[108] This change improves the clarity and perhaps the constitutionality of the revised statutes.

Eighth, the revised statute requires the actor engage in a course of conduct negligent as to the fact that it is without the complainant's effective consent. The current D.C. Code does not codify any general defenses and the DCCA has not decided whether an effective consent defense applies to the District's stalking statutes. In contrast, the RCC specifies that a person does not commit a stalking offense when non-criminal conduct was invited, welcomed, or consensual. This change clarifies and may improve the proportionality of the revised statute.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, the revised statute separately criminalizes only conduct that intends or causes another to experience fear for safety or emotional distress. Current D.C. Code § 22-3133(a) specifically refers to conduct that would cause another person to "feel seriously alarmed, disturbed, or frightened" without defining these terms. Current D.C. Code §22-3133(a) also refers to fear for "safety," undefined, and "emotional distress" which is defined.[109] The DCCA has explained that serious alarm, disturbance, and fright should be understood as mental harms comparable to fear for one's safety or significant emotional distress.[110] Accordingly, the revised stalking statute eliminates a distinct reference to conduct that causes a person to "feel seriously alarmed, disturbed, or frightened" because such results are adequately captured in the statute by other terminology.[111] This change improves the clarity of District statutes.

Second, the revised statute does not specially codify a statement of legislative intent for the stalking offense. Current D.C. Code § 22-3131 codifies a lengthy statement of legislative intent that, e.g., "urges intervention by the criminal justice system before stalking escalates into behavior that has serious or lethal consequences." [112] No other criminal offense in the current D.C. Code contains a comparable statement of legislative intent.[113] Instead, the DCCA routinely uses the Council's legislative documents (e.g., Committee reports) to determine legislative intent. The revised stalking statute relies upon the usual sources of legislative intent rather than a special codified statement. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statutes.

[112] The statement of legislative intent appears to be based on model language recommended by the National Center for Victims of Crime. See Revised Model Code, at page 24.

[113] The D.C. Council Office of General Counsel Legislative Drafting Manual at 7.1.1 specifies that "findings" and "purposes" sections are strongly discouraged because they may create confusion or ambiguity in the law.

Third, the revised statute applies standardized definitions for the "purposefully" and "with intent" culpable mental states required for stalking liability. The current stalking statute requires that the accused "purposefully engages in a course of conduct," and provides alternative culpable mental state requirements of acting "with the intent" or "[t]hat the person knows" would cause an individual a specified harm. However, the terms "purposely," "with the intent," and "knows," are not defined and it is unclear to what extent that mental state applies to the language that follows. There is no DCCA case law on point. The revised statute uses the RCC's general provisions that define "purposefully" and "with intent"[114] and specify that culpable mental states apply until the occurrence of a new culpable mental state in the offense.[115] These changes clarify and improve the consistency of District statutes.

Fourth, the definition of "safety" in the revised offense clarifies, but does not change, District law. The current statute uses the phrase "fear for safety" but does not define it. In Coleman v. United States, 202 A.3d 1127 (D.C. 2019), the District of Columbia Court of Appeals explained, "'Fear for safety' means fear of significant injury or a comparable harm...seriously troubling conduct, not mere unpleasant or mildly worrying encounters that occur on a regular basis in any community." This change applies consistent, clearly articulated definitions and improves the clarity of the revised offenses.

[114] RCC § 22E-206. Note that the RCC definition of "with intent" requires that a person "believes that conduct is practically certain to cause the result," which is the same standard as for "knowing." Also, proof that a person acts purposely, consciously desiring to cause the result, will meet the culpable mental state requirement that a person act "with intent" per RCC § 22E-206(e)(3). Consequently, the revised stalking statute's use of "with intent" appears to match the requirements of both "with the intent" and "knows" in current D.C. Code § 22-3133(a)(1) and (a)(2).

RCC § 22E-1802. Electronic Stalking.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the electronic stalking offense and penalty for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The offense prohibits patterns of behavior that significantly intrude on a person's privacy or autonomy and threaten a long-lasting impact on a person's quality of life. Together with the revised stalking offense,[1] the offense replaces the current stalking offense and related provisions in D.C. Code §§ 22-3131 - 3135.

Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that the accused must purposely engage in a course of conduct directed at a particular complainant. As applied here, "purposely," a term defined in RCC § 22E-206, requires a conscious desire to engage in a pattern of misconduct. A course of conduct does not have to consist of identical conduct, but the conduct must share an uninterrupted purpose[2] and must consist of one or both of the activities listed in subparagraphs (a)(1)(A) and (a)(1)(B). The behavior must be directed at a specific person, not merely surveilling the general public.

Subparagraph (a)(1)(A) provides that one means of committing electronic stalking is creating an original image or audio recording of a specific individual.[3] The term "image" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and means a visual depiction, other than a depiction rendered by hand, including a video, film, photograph, or hologram whether in print, electronic, magnetic, digital, or other format. The image may be created remotely.[4] Unlike the defined term "sound recording,"[5] the phrase "audio recording" does not require fixation onto a material object, and may include an electronic file. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "purposely" culpable mental state also applies to this element of the offense. That is, the accused must consciously desire to create an image or audio recording.

Subparagraph (a)(1)(B) provides that another means of committing electronic stalking is to access equipment or software that is designed to trace a complainant's movements from one location to another.[6] The term "monitoring equipment or software" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and means equipment or software with location tracking capability, including global positioning system and radio frequency identification technology. The equipment or software must be installed on property that is "property of another," which is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701.[7] Per the rules of interpretation in [2] It is the purpose, not the conduct, that must be uninterrupted. The common purpose does not have to be nefarious. For example, a person might persistently monitor someone with the goal of ensuring the they are not engaging in risking or dangerous behavior.

[1] RCC § 22E-1801. [Previously numbered RCC § 22E-1206.]

[3] The offense excludes creating a derivative image (e.g., taking a photograph of a photograph, capturing a screenshot) or hacking into a trove of pre-existing images. A person who takes a derivative image without permission may commit unauthorized use of property, in violation of RCC § 22E-2102. A person who commits a computer hacking crime may be subject to punishment under 18 U.S.C. § 1030. The word "derivative" has its common meaning: "having parts that originate from another source." Merriam-Webster.com, "derivative", 2020, available at https://www.merriam-webster.com/dictionary/derivative.

[4] For example, by using of a fixed camera, aerial drone, or a third person.

[5] RCC § 22E-701.

[6] A parent who overtly or covertly traces their child's movements may be able to avail herself of the parental defense in RCC § 22E-408(a)(1).

[7] Property of another may include a motor vehicle, bicycle, clothing, or accessory.

RCC § 22E-207, the "purposely" culpable mental state also applies to this element. That is, the accused must consciously desire to electronically track the complainant's location.

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies that the person must be negligent as to the fact that the course of conduct is without effective consent. The term "negligent" is defined in RCC § 22E-206 and here requires that the actor should be aware of a substantial risk that the contact[8] is without the complainant's effective consent[9] and that the actor's failure to perceive the risk is a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of care.[10] The term "effective consent" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and means consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception. The term "consent" is also defined in RCC § 22E-701.

Paragraph (a)(3) requires that the conduct described in paragraph (a)(1) be committed with either the intent or the effect of causing the victim to experience fear or distress. Under (a)(3)(A), a person commits electronic stalking when they act "with intent to" cause someone fear or significant emotional distress. "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that, applied here, means the actor was practically certain that his or her conduct would cause someone fear or significant emotional distress. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that such fear or significant distress occurred, just that the defendant believed to a practical certainty that such fear or significant emotional distress would result.[11] Under (a)(3)(B), a person commits electronic stalking when they negligently cause fear or significant distress, even if they did not subjectively intend to do so.[12] "Negligently" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that, applied here, means the actor should be aware of a substantial risk that the pattern of conduct will frighten or significantly distress that particular individual[13] and the actor's

[8] It is the contact and not the content that must be without effective consent. Compare, for example, a complainant who notifies the defendant to cease all communication (e.g., "Do not call me again.") with a complainant who asks the defendant to cease certain offensive communication (e.g., "Do not call me 'a jerk' again.").

[9] Consider, for example, a person who is told by a love interest's parent, "Never contact my daughter again." If the person reasonable believes that this is the command only of the parent and not the love interest, disobeying the command will not amount to stalking.

[10] For example, a complainant may convey their desire to not be contacted either directly, by telling the person to stop, or indirectly through an attorney, government entity, or a third party. In some instances, blocking electronic communications may also suffice to notify to the accused that further communication is unwelcome. On some communication platforms, electronic blocking is obvious to the person who has been blocked. On other platforms, the user's profile may appear to vanish. On others, the blocking (or muting) is not made apparent to the person who was blocked at all.

[11] Consider, for example, Person A livestreams video footage of Person B singing in her car, in the hopes of causing profound humiliation and emotional distress. Person B is surprised but overall enjoys the attention and praise she receives from the online audience. Person A, nevertheless, may have committed an electronic stalking offense against Person B.

[12] Consider, for example, Person A surreptitiously places a tracking device in Person B's shoe, hoping Person B will not notice, but Person B does notice and becomes afraid. Person A has attempted electronic stalking, if Person B's fear was objectively reasonable.

[13] For example, if the actor reasonably but mistakenly believes that the victim of the electronic stalking conduct will be unbothered by the pattern of conduct, the actor has not acted negligently. RCC § 22E-206. The fact that another reasonable person might find the same consequence alarming is inconsequential.

failure to perceive the risk is a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of care. Sub-subparagraphs (a)(3)(A)(i) and (a)(3)(B)(i) specify fear of physical harm or confinement to any person[14] is one of two alternative emotional injuries that may establish stalking liability. The term "safety" is defined in subsection (f) and refers to ongoing security from significant intrusions on one's bodily integrity or bodily movement. Sub-subparagraphs (a)(3)(A)(ii) and (a)(3)(B)(ii) also provide that "significant emotional distress" is a second type of emotional injury that may establish electronic stalking liability. "Significant emotional distress" is a defined term that means substantial, ongoing mental suffering that may, but does not necessarily, require medical or other professional treatment or counseling. The suffering must rise significantly above the level of uneasiness, nervousness, unhappiness or the like which is commonly experienced in day to day living.[15]

Subsection (b) clarifies that not all patterns of behavior that have the intent or effect of causing significant emotional distress are subject to prosecution.

Paragraph (b)(1) specifies that a person does not commit an electronic stalking offense if they are acting with the permission of one of the people depicted in an audio recording.[16] Paragraph (b)(1) specifies "in fact." "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element, here the elements in subparagraphs (b)(1)(A) and (b)(1)(B).

Paragraph (b)(2) specifically excludes from electronic stalking liability persons who are engaged in activities that are vital to a free press and to the fair administration of justice. Paragraph (b)(2) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element, here the requirements in paragraph (b)(2) and subparagraphs (b)(2)(A) and (b)(2)(B). A journalist, law enforcement officer, professional investigator (licensed or unlicensed), attorney, process server, pro se litigant, or compliance investigator who is acting within the reasonable scope of their professional duties or court obligations does not commit an electronic stalking offense.[17]

Subsection (c) provides that where conduct is of a continuing nature, each 24-hour period constitutes one occasion.[18]

Subsection (d) provides the penalties for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

---

[14] This includes fear that the stalker will physically harm the victim, a member of the victim's family, or a stranger.

[15] RCC § 22E-701; Coleman v. United States, 202 A.3d 1127, 1145 (D.C. 2019).

[16] For example, a person does not commit the offense by recording his or her own phone call. A conference calling company does not commit the offense by recording a call at the direction of the moderator. And, a security company does not commit the offense by hosting surveillance footage on its website at the request of the property owner.

[17] The revised statute anticipates that some legal pleadings, correspondence and negotiations will cause significant emotional distress. Determining whether conduct exceeds the scope of a person's duties as an attorney or unrepresented litigant is a fact-sensitive inquiry.

[18] See also Whylie v. United States, 98 A.3d 156, 158 (D.C. 2014) (finding that all 1400 phone calls that occurred before entry of a restraining order constituted one course of conduct, while all 800 phone calls that occurred after the entry of the restraining order constituted another).

Paragraph (d)(2) authorizes four penalty enhancements. If one or more of the enhancements is alleged and proven beyond a reasonable doubt,[19] the penalty classification is increased by one class. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the phrase "in fact" indicates that the accused is strictly liable with respect to whether the enhancement applies.

Subparagraph (d)(2)(A) authorizes an enhancement if the defendant violated a court order or condition of release prohibiting or restricting contact with the complainant by committing the electronic stalking offense. The accused is strictly liable with respect to whether a court order or condition of release prohibited or restricted contact with the complainant. A good faith belief that the order was expired or vacated is not a defense. The term "court order" includes any judicial directive, oral or written, that restricts contact with the stalking victim.[20] A condition of release may be imposed by a court or by the United States Parole Commission.[21]

Subparagraph (e)(2)(B) authorizes an enhancement for any person who has a prior stalking or electronic stalking conviction within ten years of the instant offense. This includes any criminal offense against the District of Columbia, a state, a federally-recognized Indian tribe, or the United States and its territories, with elements that would necessarily prove the elements of stalking or electronic stalking under RCC § 22E-1801 and 1802.[22]

Subparagraph (d)(2)(C) authorizes an enhancement for electronic stalking conduct that results in expenses amounting to more than $5,000. "Financial injury" is a defined term that includes all reasonable monetary costs, debts, or obligations that were sustained as a result of the electronic stalking.[23] This provision does not affect the sentencing court's discretion with respect to ordering restitution. The government's decision to not seek a penalty enhancement does not preclude the government from seeking reimbursement under the restitution statute.[24]

Subparagraph (d)(2)(D) authorizes a minor victim enhancement, which includes two distinct culpable mental states. First, the actor is strictly liable as to whether he or she is an adult who is at least four years older than the complainant. It is not a defense to this enhancement that the accused believed, even reasonably, that the age difference was something less than four years. Second, the actor must recklessly disregard the fact that the victim is a minor. The term "recklessly" is defined in the revised code and here means the person must be aware of a substantial risk that the complainant is under 18 [19] RCC § 22E-605 requires that an enhancement be charged and proven beyond a reasonable doubt.

[20] Examples include stay away orders, civil protection orders, family court orders, civil injunctions, and consent decrees. The order must clearly address prohibitions on contact with the specified person. An order to stay away from a particular location, without reference to the specific individual will not suffice.
[21] Regarding the legal authority to impose such conditions, see Hunt v. United States, 109 A.3d 620, 621-22 (D.C. 2014).

years of age and the person's disregard of the risk is a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct.[25]

Paragraph (d)(3) disallows stacking a repeat offender penalty enhancement[26] on top of a penalty enhancement for a prior stalking conviction.

Paragraph (e)(1) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC.

Paragraph (e)(2) defines "safety" to mean ongoing security from significant intrusions on one's bodily integrity or bodily movement.[27]

Relation to Current District Law. The revised electronic stalking statute clearly changes current District law in five main ways.

First, the revised code separately punishes electronic stalking as a stand-alone offense. Current D.C. Code § 22-3132 defines a course of stalking conduct to include acts that "monitor" and "place under surveillance."[28] However, these terms are not defined and the DCCA has not interpreted their meaning.[29] In contrast, the revised code distinguishes between "physically monitoring"[30] in violation of the revised stalking statute[31] and electronically stalking in violation of RCC § 22E-1802. Different exclusions from liability and penalties apply to each offense.[32] This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised offenses and eliminates unnecessary gaps and overlap in District law.

Second, the revised stalking and electronic stalking statutes provide as a possible basis of liability that a person negligently causes the targeted person to fear for his or her safety or that of another person, or to suffer significant emotional distress. Current D.C. Code § 22-3133(a) provides as one possible basis of liability that there be a course of conduct that "the person should have known would cause a reasonable person in the individual's circumstances" to experience fear for safety or emotional distress (emphasis added).[33] The DCCA has held that this element of stalking is satisfied where the

[33] In People v. Relerford, 104 N.E.3d 341, 350 (Ill. 2017), the Supreme Court of Illinois held that identical language violates due process. The court explained:

> [T]he proscription against "communicat[ions] to or about" a person that negligently would cause a reasonable person to suffer emotional distress criminalizes certain types of speech based on the impact that the communication has on the recipient…Therefore, it is defendant's conduct is "objectively frightening and alarming."[34] In contrast, under the revised statute an actor is liable for causing an unintended harm only if: (1) they should have been aware of a substantial risk that conduct would cause fear for safety or be distressing to the complainant and the actor's failure to perceive the risk is a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of care, and (2) the complainant did experience significant emotional distress.[35] This change applies the standard culpable mental state definition of "negligently" used throughout the RCC,[36] even though it is highly unusual to provide criminal liability for merely negligent conduct.[37] The broad scope of the offense due to the lack of any requirement of subjective awareness by the accused, however, is offset to some degree by the new requirement that the complainant actually experience harm.[38] Requiring actual harm may also better reflect the Council's prior stated intent that stalking liability be focused on harms to targeted individuals rather than communications and behaviors that are inappropriate but do not actually cause distress.[39] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of District statutes and may ensure constitutionality.

Third, the revised statutes do not specifically authorize multiple convictions for stalking and identity theft based on the same facts. Current D.C. Code § 22-3134(d) provides that, "A person shall not be sentenced consecutively for stalking and identify theft based on the same act or course of conduct." Although there is no case law on point, this language appears to categorically authorize multiple convictions for identity theft and stalking (or conduct constituting electronic stalking) based on the same act or course of conduct. In contrast, the revised stalking and electronic stalking statutes do not contain such a concurrent sentencing provision. There is no apparent reason for specially treating identity theft in this manner, and there may be situations where convictions for identity theft, stalking, and electronic stalking based on the same acts or course of conduct should merge.[40] The revised code includes a comprehensive merger provision in its general part that applies to charges for identity theft and stalking arising from the same act or course of conduct.[41] This change improves the proportionality of penalties and the consistency of the code.

Fourth, the revised statute provides a distinct penalty enhancement for having one prior stalking or electronic stalking conviction that increases the penalty by one class. The current D.C Code penalty provisions for stalking include distinct enhancements for a second offense[42] and a third offense.[43] The revised statute retains a repeat offender enhancement in the statute for when a person has one prior but eliminates the additional third-strike enhancement. Instead, the RCC's general repeat offender penalty enhancement may apply when a defendant has two or more prior convictions for a [39] D.C. Code § 22-3131 explains that the current stalking statute aims to protect victims of stalking from grief and violence, as opposed to protecting the public from conduct that is generally alarming or distressing.

> (a) The Council finds that stalking is a serious problem in this city and nationwide. Stalking involves severe intrusions on the victim's personal privacy and autonomy. It is a crime that can have a long-lasting impact on the victim's quality of life, and creates risks to the security and safety of the victim and others, even in the absence of express threats of physical harm…(b)…The Council recognizes that stalking includes a pattern of following or monitoring the victim, or committing violent or intimidating acts against the victim, regardless of the means.

(Emphasis added.) Notably, behavior that alarms the general public may be separately punished as disorderly conduct in D.C. Code § 22-1321 and corresponding RCC § 22E-4201.

[40] RCC § 22E-2205 (Identity Theft) prohibits possessing personal identifying information without effective consent. Personal identifying information, such as a credit card number, may be obtained by physically or electronically monitoring someone.

[41] See RCC § 22E-212. A stalking offense may reasonably account for the predicate offenses in some cases and not in others.

[42] D.C. Code § 22-3134(b)(2) increases the maximum penalty 5 times, from 12 months to 5 years when a person has one prior conviction within the last 10 years.

[43] D.C. Code § 22-3134(c) increases the maximum penalty 10 times, from 12 months to 10 years when a person has two prior convictions within the last 10 years, one or more of the convictions must have been jury-demandable.

comparable offense.[44] This change improves the consistency and proportionality of District statutes.

Fifth, the revised offense includes a one-party consent exclusion that is largely consistent with the District's wiretapping law. The current stalking statutes in D.C. Code §§ 22-3131 – 3135 do not carve out an exclusion from liability for a person who records their own communications with others. Although the District is a one-party consent jurisdiction,[45] self-recording may be punished as stalking if the actor knows it would reasonably cause the other party to suffer emotional distress.[46] In contrast, the revised electronic monitoring statute excepts conduct where there was one-party consent. This change corrects a misalignment of the stalking and wiretapping laws, a misalignment that is often overlooked or misunderstood by the general public.[47] The revised statute improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised code.

Beyond these five changes to current District law, six other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised statute more precisely specifies the nature of the social harm in electronic stalking to be a course of conduct that causes "ongoing" safety concerns or emotional distress. The current stalking statute requires proof that the defendant engaged in a "course of conduct," a defined term that refers to conduct "on 2 or more occasions" but is silent as to whether or how the conduct on these occasions is related.[48] The current stalking statute does not define the meaning of "safety" and its definition of "emotional distress"[49] is silent on whether such distress is of an ongoing nature. The DCCA has explained only that each term requires a severe degree of intrusion.[50] To resolve these ambiguities, the revised statute defines the terms "safety" and "significant emotional distress" as ongoing fear or distress.[51] Because stalking is most commonly understood to mean an obsessive, protracted pursuit,[52] the revised statutes' definition refers to both the degree and the duration of the harm. This change improves the clarity of the revised statutes.

Second, the revised definition of "financial injury" more consistently and precisely defines the types of expenses that will trigger a penalty enhancement. Current D.C. Code § 22-3132(5) includes all expenses incurred by the complainant, member of the complainant's household, a person whose safety is threatened by the stalking, or a person who is financially responsible for the complainant. It is unclear, however, whether there are any reasonableness limitations under the current statute to what may be considered financial injury.[53] To resolve this ambiguity, the revised definition includes expenses incurred by any natural person,[54] but requires that the expenses be reasonably incurred by the criminal conduct. Additionally, the revised definition includes more examples in the non-exhaustive list of costs, such as the cost of clearing a debt and "lost compensation," which includes employment benefits and other earnings. These changes clarify and improve the consistency of District statutes.

Third, the revised penalty enhancement requires $5,000 in financial injury. Current D.C. Code § 22-3134(b)(4) specifies that the maximum term of imprisonment for a stalking offense may be increased from one year to five years, if the person "caused more than $2,500 in financial injury." The revised code resets the dollar value thresholds for property offenses to include $500, $5,000, $50,000, and $500,000.[55] To improve the consistency of the revised stalking and electronic stalking offenses, the threshold for financial injury has been doubled from $2,500 to $5,000.

Fourth, the revised stalking and electronic stalking statutes exclude liability for conduct that is reasonably within the scope of a person's journalistic, law enforcement, legal, or other specified duties. Current D.C. Code § 22-3133(b) contains a general statement that the offense "does not apply to constitutionally protected activity," but otherwise is silent as to whether other activities are excluded. The DCCA has not addressed whether a person's bona fide action pursuant to their occupational duties is excepted from stalking liability.[56] To resolve these ambiguities as to the constitutional scope of the offense, the revised statutes specifically exclude from stalking and electronic stalking liability activities that, despite being distressing, are generally recognized as legitimate occupational activities. Even if the current and RCC stalking statutes' general statements regarding the protection of constitutional activities provide adequate notice that certain activities do not constitute stalking, such statements do not obviously extend to activities beyond the First Amendment.[57] Without a clear exclusion, such legitimate activities may constitute stalking or electronic stalking.[58] This change improves the clarity, proportionality and perhaps the constitutionality of the revised offenses.

Fifth, the revised statute limits jurisdiction for stalking and electronic stalking only to instances where some aspect of the crime occurs in the District. Current D.C.

[53] E.g., it is unclear whether the purchase of a new house or hiring a bodyguard would be included under the current statute, insofar as it may be "incurred as a result of the stalking" but not be objectively reasonable.

[54] Expenses incurred by the court system or another entity are excluded from the calculation of financial injury.

[55] See, e.g., RCC §§ 22E-2101 (Theft), 22E-2301 (Extortion), 22E-2401 (Possession of Stolen Property).

[56] Notably, in White v. Muller, 2017 D.C. Super. LEXIS 1, the court's analysis did not focus on the fact that Muller had duties as a member of the press so much as the status of White as a Councilmember.

[57] Many of the professional activities excepted in the RCC stalking statute, e.g., a private investigator, are not constitutionally protected activities. Notably, the District's current voyeurism statute contains an exception for monitoring by law enforcement. D.C. Code § 22-3531(e)(1).

[58] The intent requirements in the current and revised stalking statutes do not necessarily exempt persons engaged in bona fide, legitimate occupational activities. For example, a photojournalist may approach and photograph a defendant or victim leaving a courthouse, knowingly exacerbating their distress. Similarly, a business owner monitoring an employee's compliance with worker safety laws may knowingly cause the person some degree of emotional unrest.

Code § 22-3135(b) states that jurisdiction extends to communications if "the specific individual lives in the District of Columbia" and "it can be electronically accessed in the District of Columbia" (emphasis added). The DCCA has not interpreted the meaning of this phrase. The revised statute does not extend jurisdiction to harms where the accused and the complainant and all relevant action occurs outside the District, even though the complainant is a District resident.[59] Authority to exercise jurisdiction over acts that occur outside the District's physical borders has traditionally been limited by courts to acts that occur in, or are intended to have, and actually do have, a detrimental effect within the District.[60] There is no clear precedent for states to extend jurisdiction based solely on the residency of the alleged victim,[61] and such an extension, if intended, may be unconstitutional.[62] This change improves the clarity and perhaps the constitutionality of the revised statutes.

Sixth, the revised statute requires the actor engage in a course of conduct negligent as to the fact that it is without the complainant's effective consent. The current D.C. Code does not codify any general defenses and the DCCA has not decided whether an effective consent defense applies to the District's stalking statutes. In contrast, the RCC specifies that a person does not commit a stalking offense when non-criminal conduct was invited, welcome, or consensual. This change clarifies and may improve the proportionality of the revised statute.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, the revised statute separately criminalizes only conduct that intends or causes another to experience fear or emotional distress. Current D.C. Code § 22-3133(a) specifically refers to conduct that would cause another person to "feel seriously alarmed, disturbed, or frightened" without defining these terms. Current D.C. Code §22-3133(a) also refers to fear for "safety," undefined, and "emotional distress," which is defined.[63] The DCCA has explained that serious alarm, disturbance, and fright should be understood as mental harms comparable to fear for one's safety or significant emotional distress.[64] Accordingly, the revised stalking and electronic stalking statutes eliminate a distinct reference to conduct that causes a person to "feel seriously alarmed, disturbed, or frightened" because such results are adequately captured in the statute by other terminology.[65] This change improves the clarity of District statutes.

[59] For example, Person A resides in Toronto and sends Person B a threatening text message each time she visits the Canada from her home in Washington, DC. Current law may be understood to mean that A has committed a stalking offense in the District, simply because the messages can be accessed here.

[62] Wayne R. LaFave, 1 Subst. Crim. L. § 4.4(a) (3d ed.).

[63] Under D.C. Code § 22-3132(4), "emotional distress" means significant mental suffering or distress that may, but does not necessarily, require medical or other professional treatment or counseling.

Second, the revised statutes do not specially codify a statement of legislative intent for the stalking and electronic stalking offenses. Current D.C. Code § 22-3131 codifies a lengthy statement of legislative intent that, e.g., "urges intervention by the criminal justice system before stalking escalates into behavior that has serious or lethal consequences."[66] No other criminal offense in the current D.C. Code contains a comparable statement of legislative intent.[67] Instead, the DCCA routinely uses the Council's legislative documents (e.g., Committee reports) to determine legislative intent. The revised stalking and electronic stalking statutes rely upon the usual sources of legislative intent rather than a special codified statement. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statutes.

Third, the revised statutes apply standardized definitions for the "purposely" and "with intent" culpable mental states required for stalking and electronic stalking liability. The current stalking statute requires that the accused "purposely engages in a course of conduct," and provides alternative culpable mental state requirements of acting "with the intent" or "[t]hat the person knows" would cause an individual a specified harm. However, the terms "purposely," "with the intent," and "knows," are not defined and it is unclear to what extent that mental state applies to the language that follows. There is no DCCA case law on point. The revised statute uses the RCC's general provisions that define "purposefully" and "with intent"[68] and specify that culpable mental states apply until the occurrence of a new culpable mental state in the offense.[69] These changes clarify and improve the consistency of District statutes.

Fourth, the definition of "safety" in the revised offense clarifies, but does not change, District law. The current statute uses the phrase "fear for safety" but does not define it. In Coleman v. United States,[70] the District of Columbia Court of Appeals explained, "'Fear for safety' means fear of significant injury or a comparable harm...seriously troubling conduct, not mere unpleasant or mildly worrying encounters that occur on a regular basis in any community." This change applies consistent, clearly articulated definitions and improves the clarity of the revised offenses.

[66] The statement of legislative intent appears to be based on model language recommended by the National Center for Victims of Crime. See Revised Model Code, at page 24.

[67] The D.C. Council Office of General Counsel Legislative Drafting Manual at 7.1.1 specifies that "findings" and "purposes" sections are strongly discouraged because they may create confusion or ambiguity in the law.

[68] RCC § 22E-206. Note that the RCC definition of "with intent" requires that a person "believes that conduct is practically certain to cause the result," which is the same standard as for "knowing." Also, proof that a person acts purposely, consciously desiring to cause the result, will meet the culpable mental state requirement that a person act "with intent" per RCC § 22E-206(e)(3). Consequently, the revised stalking statute's use of "with intent" appears to match the requirements of both "with the intent" and "knows" in current D.C. Code § 22-3133(a)(1) and (a)(2).

RCC § 22E-1803. Voyeurism.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the voyeurism offense and penalty gradations for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The offense prohibits observing or recording a person who is privately undressing or engaging in sexual conduct without permission.[1] The offense replaces the current misdemeanor voyeurism offense in D.C. Code § 22-3531.[2]

Subsection (a) specifies the requirements of first degree voyeurism, which requires creating a recording of private behavior without permission.

Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that the person must act at least knowingly.[3] Subparagraphs (a)(1)(A) and (a)(1)(C) prohibit capturing visual images, whereas subparagraph (a)(1)(B) prohibits capturing visual images or audio recording. The term "image" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and means a visual depiction, other than a depiction rendered by hand, including a video, film, photograph, or hologram whether in print, electronic, magnetic, digital, or other format. The image may be created remotely.[4] Unlike the defined term "sound recording,"[5] the phrase "audio recording" does not require fixation onto a material object and may include an electronic file. The image or audio recording must be creating an original depiction of a specific individual.[6]

Subparagraph (a)(1)(A) prohibits capturing images of a someone's exposed private areas[7] or a person in their underwear.[8] Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the person must know—that is, be practically certain—that they are capturing an image of one the itemized areas.

Subparagraph (a)(1)(B) prohibits capturing images or audio recordings of a person while they are engaging in a sexual act or masturbation. The term "sexual act" is defined in RCC § 22E-701. Unlike the electronic stalking offense,[9] it is not a defense that one party consented to the recording. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the person must know—that is, be practically certain—that they are capturing an image or audio recording of one the itemized activities.

United States*, 180 A.3d 74, 76-77 (D.C. 2018) (explaining that the voyeurism statute's legislative aim is to "prohibit persons from spying on their neighbors, guests, tenants, or others in places and under circumstances where there is an expectation of privacy, that is, in a home, bedroom, bathroom, changing room, and similar locations and under one's clothing.")

[2] The felony voyeurism offense in D.C. Code § 22-3531(f)(2) is replaced by RCC § 22E-1804, Unauthorized Disclosure of a Sexual Recording.

[3] "Knowingly" is defined in RCC § 22E-206.

[4] For example, by using of a fixed camera, aerial drone, or a third person.

[5] RCC § 22E-701.

[6] The offense excludes creating a derivative image (e.g., taking a photograph of a photograph, capturing a screenshot) or hacking into a trove of pre-existing images. A person who takes a derivative image without permission may commit unauthorized use of property, in violation of RCC § 22E-2102. A person who commits a computer hacking crime may be subject to punishment under 18 U.S.C. § 1030. The word "derivative" has its common meaning: "having parts that originate from another source." Merriam-Webster.com, "derivative", 2020, available at https://www.merriam-webster.com/dictionary/derivative.

[7] The word "breast" includes a breast that has undergone a mastectomy and includes the breast of a transfeminine woman. It excludes the chest of a transmasculine man.

[8] The words "nude" and "undergarment-clad" modify each word in the list that follows. Consider, for example, a person who angles a camera to photograph underneath a woman's dress or skirt.

[9] RCC § 22E-1802.

Subparagraph (a)(1)(C) prohibits capturing images of someone while they are urinating or defecating. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the person must know—that is, be practically certain—that they are capturing an image of urination or defecation.

Paragraph (a)(2) requires that the person act without the complainant's effective consent to being recorded. The term "effective consent" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and means consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception. The term "consent" is also defined in RCC § 22E-701. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the person must know—that is, be practically certain—that the complainant has not given effective consent to being recorded.[10]

Paragraph (a)(3) uses the term "in fact" to specify that there is no culpable mental state required as to whether a person in the complainant's circumstances would reasonably expect that such a recording would not occur. A person does not commit an offense where it is objectively unreasonable to expect privacy under the circumstances.[11] Whether a person's expectation of privacy is reasonable depends on all of the surrounding circumstances,[12] including the time, place,[13] the complainant's manner of dress,[14] the complainant's body position,[15] and efforts to communicate that privacy is expected.[16] A person may know that they will be observed and nevertheless reasonably expect to not be recorded.[17]

[10] Consider, for example, a couple of exhibitionists who are having sex against a window that is visible from the street. A person does not commit second degree voyeurism by photographing the exhibition unless it is proven that the person is practically certain that the couple does not want to be recorded.

[11] Consider, for example, a couple of exhibitionists who are having sex against a window that is visible from the street. A person does not commit second degree voyeurism by photographing the exhibition unless it is proven that the couple has a reasonable expectation of privacy.

[12] This language is meaningfully distinct from the phrasing "while the person is in a place where he or she would have a reasonable expectation of privacy," that appears in other state statutes. See State v. Glas (2002) 147 Wash.2d 410, 54 P.3d 147 (holding that the voyeurism statute, as written, does not cover intrusions of privacy in public places and, thus, does not prohibit "upskirt" photography).

[13] See, e.g., State v. Frost, 634 N.E.2d 272 (Ohio Ct. App. 1994) (holding a defendant was not guilty of voyeurism by acts of observing bikini-clad women on public beach with binoculars from his vehicle, while engaging in masturbation).

[14] For example, a person who exposes their undergarment-clad buttocks by sagging their pants in a public place does not have a reasonable expectation that their buttocks will not be photographed.

[15] The more public the place and the more likely it is that people will take photographs there, the more conscientious and personally responsible one must be about what they do and do not expose. For example, a woman who exposes her underwear by sitting on the steps of the Lincoln Memorial knowing many people are photographing the historic landmark does not have a reasonable expectation that her underwear will not be photographed. Compare, Justin Jouvenal and Miles Parks, Voyeur charges dropped against photographer at Lincoln Memorial, WASHINGTON POST (October 9, 2014) with Perry Stein, Man charged with voyeurism after allegedly filming under a girl's dress at Whole Foods, WASHINGTON POST (October 1, 2019).

[16] For example, a person may post a "Do Not Disturb" sign on a hotel room door or call out "Occupied!" when a bathroom door will not lock, or put a sock on their doorknob to tell their roommate to come back later.

[17] For example, a person may not expect that a sexual partner will observe their body but not record it. See also Derek Hawkins, Former Playmate sentenced for Snapchat body-shaming of naked woman at gym, WASHINGTON POST (May 25, 2017).

Subsection (b) specifies the requirements of second degree voyeurism, which requires directly observing[18] private behavior without permission. The word "directly" includes observations made with the aid of a device such as binoculars, a telescope, or any nonrecording electronic device to enhance their ability to see. It does not include viewing an image that another person recorded.

Paragraph (b)(1) specifies that the person must act at least knowingly. "Knowingly" is a defined term[19] and applied here means that the person must be practically certain that they are looking at the complainant engaging in the specified private behavior. Paragraph (b)(1) prohibits observing a person's exposed private areas[20] or a person in their underwear.[21] It also prohibits observing a person while they are engaging in a sexual act or masturbation or while they are urinating or defecating. The term "sexual act" is defined in RCC § 22E-701.

Paragraph (b)(2) requires that the person act without the complainant's effective consent to being observed. The term "effective consent" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and means consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception. The term "consent" is also defined in RCC § 22E-701. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the person must know—that is, be practically certain—that the complainant has not given effective consent to being viewed.

Paragraph (b)(3) uses the term "in fact" to specify that there is no culpable mental state required as to whether a person in the complainant's circumstances would reasonably expect that such an observation would not occur. A person does not commit an offense where it is objectively reasonable to expect privacy under the circumstances.[22] Whether a person's expectation of privacy is reasonable depends on all of the surrounding circumstances, including the time, place, the complainant's manner of dress,[23] the complainant's body position,[24] and efforts to communicate that privacy is expected.[25]

[18] The word "observe" includes direct and indirect observations. For example, watching a livestream of a video feed, without recording it, is sufficient.

[19] "Knowingly" is defined in RCC § 22E-206.

[20] The word "breast" includes a breast that has undergone a mastectomy and includes the breast of a transfeminine woman. It excludes the chest of a transmasculine man.

[21] The words "nude" and "undergarment-clad" modify each word in the list that follows. Consider, for example, a person who angles a camera to photograph underneath a woman's dress or skirt.

[22] Consider, for example, a couple of exhibitionists who are having sex against a window that is visible from the street. A person does not commit third degree voyeurism by watching the exhibition unless it is proven that the couple has a reasonable expectation of privacy.

[23] For example, a person who exposes their undergarment-clad buttocks by sagging their pants in a public place does not have a reasonable expectation that their buttocks will not be viewed.

[24] For example, a woman who exposes her underwear by sitting on the steps of the Lincoln Memorial at a time when many people are photographing the historic landmark does not have a reasonable expectation that her underwear will not be seen. Compare, Justin Jouvenal and Miles Parks, Voyeur charges dropped against photographer at Lincoln Memorial, WASHINGTON POST (October 9, 2014) with Perry Stein, Man charged with voyeurism after allegedly filming under a girl's dress at Whole Foods, WASHINGTON POST (October 1, 2019).

[25] For example, a person may post a "Do Not Disturb" sign on a hotel room door or call out "Occupied!" when a bathroom door will not lock, or put a sock on their doorknob to tell their roommate to come back later.

Subsection (c) provides the penalty for each gradation of the revised offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.] Paragraph (c)(3) specifies that the penalty classification may be increased by one penalty class if it is proven beyond a reasonable doubt[26] that the defendant was reckless as to the fact that the complainant was a minor. The term "recklessly" is defined in the revised code and here means the person must be aware of a substantial risk that the complainant is under 18 years of age and the person's disregard of the risk is a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct.[27]

Subsection (d) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised voyeurism offense clearly changes current District law in eight main ways.

First, the revised voyeurism offense punishes observing a person's nude or undergarment-clad private area without their permission. Current D.C. Code § 22-3531(d) makes it unlawful to electronically record a person's private area without express and informed consent, under circumstances in which that person has a reasonable expectation of privacy. However, the statute does not provide any liability for merely observing a private area, without recording, unless the victim is also using the bathroom, undressing, or engaging in sexual activity. Accordingly, a person who strategically positions himself or angles a mirror to look up the skirts of passersby does not commit an offense. In contrast, the revised statute criminalizes all upskirting behavior that violates a reasonable expectation of privacy, even if the accused does not produce a recorded image. This change may eliminate an unnecessary gap in law.[28]

Second, the revised statute does not require that an observation be covert. Current D.C. Code § 22-3531(b) requires that the accused act with "the purpose of secretly or surreptitiously observing" the complainant. This requirement may exclude liability for a person who overtly views a complainant by intruding into a bedroom, peering over a bathroom stall,[29] or lifting a dress.[30] In contrast, the revised offense punishes any hostile observation that occurs without the complainant's effective consent, if the victim has a

[26] RCC § 22E-605.

[27] See RCC § 22E-206. For example, a 20-year-old who knows that the target of the stalking conduct attends middle school has likely disregarded a substantial risk that the victim is less than 16 years old, absent evidence to the contrary. On the other hand, a person may engage in pattern of unwelcome communication toward an anonymous person online, without having any reason to suspect that it is operated by a child.

[28] But see Valenzuela-Castillo v. United States, 180 A.3d 74, 85 (D.C. 2018) (J. Easterly, dissenting) (reasoning that the legislative history of the voyeurism statute indicates that it was not meant to encompass simple viewing).

[29] The DCCA has held that a person "occupies a hidden observation post" in violation of the statute when he furtively sneaks into a bathroom and looks underneath a stall, even if the victim is then able to see him. See Valenzuela-Castillo v. United States, 180 A.3d 74, 75 (D.C. 2018); but see Judge Easterly's dissent (reasoning that one does not "occupy" a "hidden" "post" by merely changing their body position in a public space). However, the court has not addressed whether a person who more overtly bursts into a bathroom or bedroom commits the offense.

[30] See, e.g., Dana Hedgpeth, Fairfax police seek man they say chased woman, tried to take photos by lifting her skirt, WASHINGTON POST (September 12, 2019). Chasing a woman and lifting her skirt would also be punished as offensive physical contact under RCC § 22E-1205.

reasonable expectation of privacy under the circumstances. This change eliminates an unnecessary gap in law and clarifies the revised offense.

Third, the revised voyeurism and unauthorized disclosure of a sexual recording[31] offenses establish four distinct penalties for attempting, observing, recording, and distributing. Current D.C. Code § 22-3531 includes only two sentencing gradations. Under current law, a person is subject to up to one year in jail if they "occupy a hidden observation post or to install or maintain a peephole, mirror, or any electronic device for the purpose of secretly or surreptitiously observing" the complainant using the bathroom, undressing, or engaging in sexual activity.[32] A person is subject to the same one-year penalty if they electronically record those observations[33] or create a recording of the complainant's private area.[34] And, a person is subject to a maximum penalty of five years in prison if they disseminate or attempt to disseminate any such recording "directly or indirectly, by any means."[35] In contrast, the revised statute punishes creating a recording more severely than observations alone and relies on the general part's common definition of attempt[36] and penalty for an attempt[37] to define and penalize attempts the same as for other revised offenses.[38] Distribution of a recording is punished as unauthorized disclosure of a sexual recording, under RCC § 22E-1804. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense.

Fourth, the revised offense includes an enhancement for recklessly committing voyeurism against a child. When the current voyeurism statute was enacted, the Council considered including a penalty enhancement for offenses against any person who is under 18 years of age.[39] At least one advocacy group recommended deferring the decision about enhancements to the Criminal Code Reform Commission.[40] The revised statute includes an enhancement but requires proof that the defendant was reckless as to the fact that the victim was underage.[41] A person who is practically certain that they are [38] Under the revised statute, using an observation post, peephole, or mirror is punished only if it amounts to attempted third degree voyeurism and attempting to disseminate a recording is punished as attempted first degree voyeurism. See, e.g., State v. Million, 63 Ohio App. 3d 349 (1989) (explaining, although evidence that defendant used hand-held mirror to look underneath stall did not support voyeurism conviction if adjacent stall was unoccupied, it might have supported attempted voyeurism conviction if the following stall was occupied).

observing or recording a child inflicts a more egregious social harm than a person who invades the privacy of an adult.[42] Similar enhancements appear in other RCC offenses against persons, such as sexual assault and related provisions in Chapter 13. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offenses.

Fifth, the revised statute applies the culpable mental state definitions in the RCC's general part. None of the mental states in the current statute are defined in the D.C. Code.[43] In contrast, the revised statute specifies a defined mental state for every conduct, result, and circumstance element of the offense. First, the revised statute requires that the person know—that is, be practically certain—that they are observing, recording, or distributing an image or audio recording of the complainant without the complainant's effective consent. Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[44] Second, the revised statute requires that a person who distributes an image or audio recording be at least reckless as to the fact that the image or audio recording was created unlawfully. Courts have also recognized that recklessness regarding a risk of serious harm is wrongful conduct.[45] Third, the revised statute holds an observer or recorder strictly liable with respect to whether the complainant has a reasonable expectation of privacy under the circumstances and holds a distributer strictly liable with respect to whether the conduct that created the image or recording amounts to second degree voyeurism. Although applying strict liability to statutory elements that behalf of the District of Columbia Association of Criminal Defense Attorneys ("It is not at all clear to us that such penalty enhancements based upon the age or other characteristic of the victim are [sic.] must necessarily be enshrined in statutes as opposed to factors to be considered at sentencing. However, we join PDS in believing that any such enhancements should be limited to situations in which that characteristic is foreseeable and/or contributes to the commission of the crime.").

[42] Some instances of voyeurism against children—i.e. possession and distribution of images that are sexual in nature—will overlap and merge with the offenses of possession of an obscene image of a minor and trafficking an obscene image of a minor. See RCC §§ 22E-214, 22E-1805, and 22E-1806.

[43] Current D.C. Code § 22-3531(b) specifies that a person who occupies a hidden observation post or who installs or maintains a mirror, peephole, or electronic device, must act with the purpose of secretly or surreptitiously observing another person. Current D.C. Code § 22-3531(c) does not specify a culpable mental state for a person who records another person engaging in private behavior. Current D.C. Code § 22-3531(d) specifies that a person who records another person's private area must capture the image intentionally, however, it is unclear whether the person must also intend to violate the subject's reasonable expectation of privacy or express and informed consent. Finally, current D.C. Code § 22-3531(f)(2) specifies that a person is guilty of a felony if they distribute or attempt to distribute a recording that they know or should know was taken in violation subsection (b), (c), or (d).

[44] There is a presumption that the legislature intends to require a defendant to possess a degree of knowledge sufficient to "mak[e] a person legally responsible for the consequences of his or her act or omission" regarding "each of the statutory elements that criminalize otherwise innocent conduct," even when the legislature does not specify any scienter in the statutory text. Rehaif v. United States, 139 S. Ct. 2191, 2195 (2019) (citing United States v. X-Citement Video, Inc., 513 U. S. 64, 72 (1994); Morissette v. United States, 342 U. S. 246, 256–258 (1952); Staples v. United States, 511 U. S. 600, 606 (1994); Black's Law Dictionary 1547 (10th ed. 2014)); see also Elonis v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2001, 2009 (2015) ("[O]ur cases have explained that a defendant generally must 'know the facts that make his conduct fit the definition of the offense,' even if he does not know that those facts give rise to a crime." (Internal citation omitted)).

[45] See Elonis v. United States," 135 S. Ct. 2001, 2015 (2015) (J. Alito, concurring) ("In a wide variety of contexts, we have described reckless conduct as morally culpable.").

distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is strongly disfavored by courts[46] and legal experts[47] for any non-regulatory crimes, it may be difficult or impossible in many cases to prove that a distributer knew the elements of second degree voyeurism or that an observer or recorder was practically certain that the victim reasonably expected privacy. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised offense.

Sixth, the revised offense narrows the exclusions from liability in four ways. First, D.C. Code § 22-3531(e)(1) excludes liability for "[a]ny lawful law enforcement, correctional, or intelligence observation or surveillance." The revised offense does not include an exclusion for law enforcement officers or investigators and instead relies on the general defense for execution of a public duty.[48] This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense. Second, D.C. Code § 22-3531(e)(2) excludes liability for "[s]ecurity monitoring in one's own home." This phrasing broadly exempts any person who places covert security cameras in a bathroom or guestroom and records guests engaging in private, sexual activity. In contrast, under the revised statute, offense liability attaches in any location in which the victim's expectation of privacy is reasonable under the circumstances.[49] Third, D.C. Code § 22-3531(e)(3) excludes liability for "[s]ecurity monitoring in any building where there are signs prominently displayed informing persons that the entire premises or designated portions of the premises are under surveillance." In contrast, under the revised statute, signage is one of many factors that the factfinder may consider when determining whether the complainant's expectation of privacy is reasonable under the circumstances. Fourth, D.C. Code § 22-3531(e)(4) excludes liability for "[a]ny electronic recording of a medical procedure which is conducted under circumstances where the patient is unable to give consent." This phrasing broadly exempts any person who records a patient, even if it is done without the doctor's permission and even if the patient expressly objects to the recording before being rendered unable to do so.[50] In contrast, the revised code includes an emergency health professional defense[51] which is available only to doctors and their

Ct. 2001, 2010 (2015) ("When interpreting federal criminal statutes that are silent on the required mental state, we read into the statute 'only that mens rea which is necessary to separate wrongful conduct from 'otherwise innocent conduct.'" Carter v. United States, 530 U.S. 255, 269, 120 S.Ct. 2159, 147 L.Ed.2d 203 (2000) (quoting X-Citement Video, 513 U.S., at 72, 115 S.Ct. 464).").

[47] See § 5.5(c)Pros and cons of strict-liability crimes, 1 Subst. Crim. L. § 5.5(c) (3d ed.) ("For the most part, the commentators have been critical of strict-liability crimes. 'The consensus can be summarily stated: to punish conduct without reference to the actor's state of mind is both inefficacious and unjust. It is inefficacious because conduct unaccompanied by an awareness of the factors making it criminal does not mark the actor as one who needs to be subjected to punishment in order to deter him or others from behaving similarly in the future, nor does it single him out as a socially dangerous individual who needs to be incapacitated or reformed. It is unjust because the actor is subjected to the stigma of a criminal conviction without being morally blameworthy. Consequently, on either a preventive or retributive theory of criminal punishment, the criminal sanction is inappropriate in the absence of mens rea.'") (quoting Packer, Mens Rea and the Supreme Court, 1962 Sup.Ct.Rev. 107, 109).

[48] RCC § 22E-402.

[49] For example, using a "nanny cam" to observe a house sitter in one's own kitchen may not amount to voyeurism whereas using that same camera to observe that same house sitter in one's own shower may constitute an offense.

[50] For example, a rogue hospital employee could install a hidden camera in an operating room.

[51] RC § 22E-408(a)(3).

designees during an in which it would be too difficult to obtain consent. These changes eliminate unnecessary gaps in law.

Seventh, the revised code defines the term "effective consent."[52] Current D.C. Code §§ 22-3531(c)(1) and (d) require that the person act without the victim's "express and informed consent." This phrase is not defined by statute and District case law has not interpreted its meaning in the context of the voyeurism statute. The RCC definition of "effective consent" does not require that consent be express or informed, only that it not be induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception.[53] This change improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

Eighth, the revised statute partially clarifies the appropriate unit of prosecution for the voyeurism offense. Although is not obvious from the organization of the D.C. Code whether the voyeurism offense is intended to protect individual victims or to ensure public order,[54] the DCCA has explained that its purpose is to protect the victim of the observation or recording.[55] The RCC classifies voyeurism as an offense against persons, clarifying that the statute permits separate punishments for separate victims[56] and does not permit separate punishments for each copy of an image or for each recipient. Other unit of prosecution issues[57] are not addressed in the statutory language or accompanying commentary but may be addressed in the RCC's general part.[58] This change clarifies and improves the proportionality the revised offense.

Beyond these eight changes to current District law, four other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, unlike current D.C. Code §§ 22-3531(b)(2) and (c)(1)(B), the revised offense does not separately criminalize observations of a person who is "[t]otally or partially undressed or changing clothes." The word "undressed" and the phrase

---

[52] RCC § 22E-701.

[53] "Consent" is also a defined term in RCC § 22E-701.

[54] Current D.C. Code § 22-3531 appears in Subtitle I of Title 22 of the D.C. Code, which is titled simply, "Criminal Offenses." The offense is sandwiched between property offenses such as trespass, repealed public order offenses such as vagrancy, and general provisions such as use of "District of Columbia" by certain persons and the fines for criminal offenses.

[55] See Freundel v. United States, 146 A.3d 375, 379 (D.C. 2016) (stating, "The provision by its terms is directed at protecting individual privacy.")

[56] See Freundel v. United States, 146 A.3d 375, 384 (D.C. 2016); see also State v. Mason, 410 P.3d 1173 (Wash. Ct. App. 2018).

[57] For example, creating a single recording of multiple people together in the nude may constitute a single offense or multiple offenses. See Freundel v. United States, 146 A.3d 375, 382-83 (D.C. 2016) ("Because each victim was recorded undressing separately, we need not decide whether multiple punishments would be permissible based on a single recording depicting more than one victim at the same time."). Watching two people engage in a single sex act together may constitute a single offense or multiple offenses. See, e.g., State v. Diaz-Flores, 148 Wash. App. 911 (2009). Taking multiple photos of the same person in succession or taking multiple videos of the same conduct from different angles may constitute a single offense or multiple offenses. See, e.g., State v. Boyd, 137 Wash. App. 910 (2007) (finding two photographs of the same victim did not establish multiple acts of voyeurism but rather a continuing course of conduct). Recording one person over multiple days may constitute a single offense or multiple offenses. See, e.g., RCC §§ 22E-1801(c) and 1802(c) which provide, "Where conduct is of a continuing nature, each 24-hour period constitutes one occasion."

[58] [Further Commission recommendations are forthcoming.]

"changing clothes" are not defined in the current statute and District case law has not addressed their meaning. Broadly construed, "undressed" may include a person who has removed their clothing but concealed their body using a blanket, robe, or towel. Broadly construed, "changing clothes" may include changing outerwear. The revised statute clarifies that photographing a person who is sleeping under the covers or changing their jacket does not amount to voyeurism.[59] This change improves the clarity of the revised offense.

Second, unlike current D.C. Code §§ 22-3531(b)(2) and (c)(1)(B), the revised offense does not separately criminalize observations of a person who is "using a bathroom or restroom." The phrase—which is commonly used as a euphemism for urinating or defecating—is not defined in the statute and District case law has not addressed its meaning. Broadly construed, the phrase may capture conduct that is not voyeuristic in nature.[60] The revised statute prohibits recording a person who is using the bathroom only if that person's nude or undergarment-clad private areas are exposed or if the person is urinating or defecating. Other private bathroom behaviors that involve sexual conduct, nudity, or the removal of clothing are separately protected under the other subsections of the revised code.

Third, the revised statute defines the term "image" and specifies that the creation of a derivative image does not amount to voyeurism. D.C. Code § 22-3531(d)(1) makes it unlawful to "capture an image" of a person's private area without permission. The term "image" is not defined in the statute and District case law has not addressed its meaning. It is unclear whether "capture an image" has the same meaning as "electronically record" in § 22-3531(c)(1). It is also unclear whether "image" includes both refers to both "visual" and "aural images."[61] It is also unclear whether the term "image" includes a "series of images"[62] or a derivative image (e.g., a photograph of a photograph, a screenshot). To resolve this ambiguity, the revised code defines the term "image" to mean a visual depiction, other than a depiction rendered by hand, including a video, film, photograph, or hologram whether in print, electronic, magnetic, digital, or other format. This definition broadens the offense by including images that are captured without an electronic device (such as those captured using a mechanical camera) but narrows the offense by excluding images that are hand-drawn or illustrated on an electronic device (such as a tablet). The definition also clarifies that a film or video constitutes a single image, not a series of images. And, the statutory language specifies that derivative images are not included. This change clarifies the revised offense and improves the consistency of the revised offenses.

[59] A person who places a recording device in a changing room but only captures people changing clothes without exposing their private areas or underwear may nevertheless commit attempted voyeurism. See generally RCC § 22E-301.

[60] E.g., posting a bathroom selfie that shows a stranger in the background applying makeup, filming a hallway that shows people entering and exiting a bathroom, creating an audio recording of a person singing in the shower or talking to herself. See, e.g., Charles V. Bagli and Vivian Yee, Robert Durst of HBO's 'The Jinx' Says He 'Killed Them All,' NEW YORK TIMES (March 15, 2015) (discussing documentary filmmakers recording a suspected murderer muttering inculpatory statements to himself in the bathroom).

[61] See § 22-3531(a)(1). The revised offense does not criminalize creating an "aural image" of a person's private areas or of a person undressing.

[62] See D.C. Code § 22-3531(f)(2).

Fourth, the revised statute defines the type of sexual activity that may not be viewed or recorded without permission. D.C. Code §§ 22-3531(b)(3) and (c)(1)(C) use the term "sexual activity," without defining it. District case law has not addressed its meaning. Broadly construed, the term may include conduct short of penetration, such as kissing or caressing. The revised code defines the term "sexual act" to include direct contact between one person's genitalia and another person's genitalia, mouth, or anus.[63] And, the revised voyeurism offense prohibits observing or recording a person who is engaging in a sexual act or masturbation. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised offense.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

The revised offense is prosecuted by the United States Attorney for the District of Columbia ("USAO"). Current D.C. Code § 22-3531(g) grants prosecutorial authority to the Attorney General for the District of Columbia. However, the DCCA has held that the offense must be prosecuted by USAO under the Home Rule Act.[64]

RCC § 22E-1804. Unauthorized Disclosure of a Sexual Recording.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the unauthorized disclosure of a sexual recording offense and penalty gradations for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The offense prohibits distributing sexually explicit images of a person without permission. The offense replaces the non-consensual pornography chapter in D.C. Code §§ 22-3051 – 3057 and the felony voyeurism offense in D.C. Code § 22-3531(f)(2).[1]

Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that a person must act at least knowingly with respect to a distribution or display. "Knowingly" is a defined term[2] and, applied here, means that the person must be practically certain that they are distributing, displaying, or making available online an image or audio recording to a third person who is not the complainant.[3] The word "distribute" requires granting another person the ability to exercise dominion and control over the image.[4] The phrase "make accessible on an electronic platform" does not require proof that the material was actually accessed or viewed.[5] The word "user" excludes technical administrators that have access to all files hosted on the website.[6]

Subparagraph (a)(1)(A) prohibits dissemination of images. The term "image" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and means a visual depiction, other than a depiction rendered by hand, including a video, film, photograph, or hologram whether in print, electronic, magnetic, or digital format. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the actor must know—that is, be practically certain—that what they are distributing or displaying is an image of the complainant's nude genitals or anus; or nude or undergarment-clad[7] pubic area, buttocks, or female breast[8] below the top of the areola.

Subparagraph (a)(1)(B) prohibits dissemination of images or audio recordings. The term "image" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and means a visual depiction, other than a depiction rendered by hand, including a video, film, photograph, or hologram whether in print, electronic, magnetic, digital, or other format. Unlike the defined term "sound recording,"[9] the phrase "audio recording" does not require fixation onto a material object and may include an electronic file. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the person must know—that is, be practically certain—that what they are distributing or displaying is an image or audio recording of the complainant engaging in or submitting to [3] See Roberts v. United States, 17-CF-431, 2019 WL 4678119, at *6 (D.C. Sept. 26, 2019) (holding a defendant must have disclosed a sexual image to a third party).

[4] Consider, for example, a person who brings a computer to a repairman for service, with an agreement or understanding that the repairman will not browse and open his private files.

[5] For example, a person may commit an offense by publishing the image on their own public website, on a peer-to-peer social networking platform, or on the dark web, even if no one else ever views the page.

[6] For example, a person who uploads an image of the complainant to their own cloud account, without granting access to any other user, does not commit an offense, even though a cloud service administrator or information technology specialist may have access to it.

[7] Although some swimwear, formal wear, or other garments may be more revealing than some underwear, the word "undergarment" does not include such garments.

[8] The word "breast" includes a breast that has undergone a mastectomy and includes the breast of a transfeminine woman. It excludes the chest of a transmasculine man.

a sexual act, masturbation, or sadomasochistic abuse.[10] The terms "sexual act" and "sadomasochistic abuse" defined in RCC § 22E-701.

Paragraph (a)(2) requires that the actor engage in conduct without the complainant's effective consent. A person does not commit an offense by distributing an image of herself or by distributing an image with permission from the person who is depicted. The term "effective consent" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and means consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the person must know—that is, be practically certain—that the complainant does not give effective consent to disseminating the image or recording.

Paragraph (a)(3) specifies two alternative requirements for liability.

Subparagraph (a)(3)(A) imposes liability where an actor and the complainant reached an explicit or implicit agreement that the image or audio recording would not be shared.[11] Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the person must know—that is, be practically certain—that such an agreement applied at the time of the distribution or display. Subparagraph (a)(3)(A) requires an intent to alarm[12] or to sexually abuse, humiliate, harass, or degrade the complainant,[13] or an intent to receive financial gain as a result of the distribution or display. "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that, applied here, means the actor was practically certain that his or her conduct would cause one of the specified harms to the complainant or result in a financial benefit. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that such harm or financial benefit occurred, just that the defendant believed to a practical certainty that it would result.

Subparagraph (a)(3)(B) imposes liability where a person obtains the image or recording by any of four unlawful means as defined in the RCC: voyeurism, theft, unauthorized use of property, or extortion. For example, a person who obtains a photograph by stealing a DVD, hacking a cloud server, texting an image from someone else's phone, or secretly recording a consensual encounter, commits a new offense by sharing the image or audio recording with others. Subparagraph (a)(3)(B) uses the term "in fact" to specify that there is no culpable mental state required as to whether the defendant's conduct constitutes a predicate offense. Subparagraph (a)(3)(B) does not require intent to harm or gain financially.

[10] Consider, for example, a woman who, upon noticing her boyfriend has a DVD with another woman's name on it, steals the DVD and asks her best friend to watch it for her. Because the woman was merely suspicious, and not practically certain, about the contents, she has not committed unauthorized disclosure of a sexual recording. But see RCC § 22E-2101, Theft.

[11] See Report on Bill 20-903, the "Criminalization of Non-Consensual Pornography Act of 2014," Council of the District of Columbia Committee on the Judiciary and Public Safety (November 12, 2014) at Page 5 ("Explicit warning not to share a sexual image is not necessary to create an understanding…within the context of a romantic or similarly close relationship where it is the norm to send these images between the parties... [However,] such an understanding does not exist where a sexual image is sent unsolicited without any prior agreement or understanding in place.").

[12] Per its ordinary meaning, "alarm" includes efforts to "disturb," "excite," or "strike with fear." Merriam-Webster.com, "alarm", 2020, available at https://www.merriam-webster.com/dictionary/alarm.

[13] For example, a person may commit an offense by posting a homemade sex tape out of revenge after a bad breakup, with intent to harass or humiliate their ex-partner.

Subsection (b) establishes two exclusions from liability for the unauthorized disclosure of a sexual recording offense. Paragraph (b)(1) provides that the statute does not apply to any licensee[14] under the Communications Act of 1934, such as a radio, television, or phone service provider.[15] Paragraph (b)(1) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element, here the fact that the actor is a specified licensee. Paragraph (b)(2) provides that the statute does not apply to any interactive computer service as defined in 47 U.S.C. § 230(f)(2).[16] Paragraph (b)(2) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element, here the fact that the actor is a specified interactive computer service.

Subsection (c) establishes an affirmative defense for the innocent display or distribution of a prohibited image.[17] The actor must have the intent "exclusively and in good faith, to report possible illegal conduct or seek legal counsel from any attorney."[18] Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. The recipient of the display or distribution must be someone that the actor reasonably believes[19] to be a "law enforcement officer, prosecutor, attorney, school administrator;" or someone with a responsibility for the health, welfare, or supervision of one of the people depicted or involved in the creation of the image or recording. "Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others."[20]

Subsection (d) provides the penalty for the revised offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.] Paragraph (d)(2) establishes a penalty enhancement of two classes for mass dissemination or publication online.

[14] The term "licensee" is defined in paragraph (e)(2) to have the same meaning specified in 47 U.S.C. § 153(30).

[15] See D.C. Code § 22-2201(d).

[16] The term "interactive computer service" means any information service, system, or access software provider that provides or enables computer access by multiple users to a computer server, including specifically a service or system that provides access to the Internet and such systems operated or services offered by libraries or educational institutions.

[17] Per RCC § 22E-201, the defendant has the burden of proving an affirmative defense by a preponderance of the evidence.

[18] In addition to criminal defense advice, legal advice can include civil proceedings such as custody and abuse and neglect.

[19] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist.

[20] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

Subsection (e) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC and the federal code.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised unauthorized disclosure of a sexual recording statute clearly changes current District law in eleven main ways.

First, the revised statute criminalizes disseminating images that were obtained unlawfully by the actor. The current non-consensual pornography offenses require that "[t]here was an agreement or understanding between the person depicted and the person disclosing that the sexual image would not be disclosed." [21] This requirement does not provide liability for distribution of an image that was taken without the victim's knowledge or permission.[22] In contrast, the revised statute provides liability for dissemination of images or audio recordings that were illegally obtained by specified means. Exposing intimate images or audio recordings against a person's will fundamentally deprives that person of her right to privacy.[23] A victim whose image has been disseminated without consent suffers the same privacy violation and negative consequences of exposure, regardless of the disseminator's objective.[24] The revised statute punishes exploiting a stranger as severely as exploiting a former partner.[25] This change eliminates an unnecessary gap in law.

Second, the revised statute specifies more precisely which types of audio and visual recordings are protected. First, the current non-consensual pornography offense prohibits distribution of "one or more sexual images,"[26] whereas the current felony voyeurism offense prohibits the distribution of any "image or series of images or sounds or series of sounds" of a "private area."[27] In contrast to the current non-consensual pornography statute, the revised statute recognizes a right to privacy in sexual audio recordings,[28] that is more consistent with the scope of the revised voyeurism statute.[29]

[22] For example, a person could snoop through a lover's smartphone, discover nude photographs from another suitor, steal a screenshot, and post it online without incurring any criminal liability. See, e.g., State v. VanBuren, 214 A.3d 791 (Vt. 2019). Or, a person could hack into a celebrity's cloud server and publish their nude photographs online, subject only to federal computer crime laws. See 18 U.S.C. § 1030; see also Laura M. Holson, Hacker of Nude Photos of Jennifer Lawrence Gets 8 Months in Prison, NEW YORK TIMES (August 30, 2018). This conduct does not amount to stalking (RCC § 22E-1801) or electronic stalking (RCC § 22E-1802), unless it occurs on multiple occasions with the intent or effect of causing significant emotional distress. This conduct does not amount to voyeurism (RCC § 22E-1803), unless it surreptitiously recorded by the same person who is distributing it. This conduct does not amount to extortion (RCC § 22E-2301), unless there is some demand for action in exchange for the recordings.

[28] For example, such recordings may be of sexual encounters and masturbation (e.g., phone sex), consistent with the current voyeurism offense.

[29] The revised offense does not refer to "one or more images" or to a "series of images" or "series of sounds," to avoid confusion with respect to the appropriate unit of prosecution. A series of images taken in rapid succession may constitute a single course of conduct whereas a compilation of images taken weeks or Second, the current non-consensual pornography offense defines the term "sexual image" to mean "a photograph, video, or other visual recording,"[30] whereas the current felony voyeurism statute does not define the term "image" but does require that the image be electronic.[31] It is unclear whether the current non-consensual pornography offense requires the image to be an electronic recording. To resolve this ambiguity, the revised statute applies the RCC's definition of "image,"[32] which excludes drawings and illustrations, consistent with the current non-consensual pornography offense. These changes improve the clarity and consistency of the revised offense and reduce unnecessary gaps in liability.

Third, the revised statute applies a more consistent definition of the type of sexual content that is protected. First, the current non-consensual pornography offense defines the term "sexual image" to include a depiction of "an unclothed private area"[33] and defines "private area" to mean "the genitals, anus, or pubic area of a person, or the nipple of a developed female breast, including the breast of a transgender female."[34] The current voyeurism statute defines "private area" differently as "the naked or undergarment-clad genitals, pubic area, anus, or buttocks, or female breast below the top of the areola."[35] In contrast to the current non-consensual pornography statute, the revised statute recognizes a privacy right warranting criminal sanction in the more expansive list of depictions of the human body described in the voyeurism statute. Second, the current non-consensual pornography statute protects depictions of "sexual conduct," including masturbation and "[s]adomasochistic sexual activity for the purpose of sexual stimulation,"[36] whereas the current felony voyeurism statute protects depictions of "sexual activity"[37] or "using a bathroom or restroom,"[38] without defining those terms. The meaning of the term "sexual activity" is unclear and may include conduct short of penetration, such as kissing or sadomasochistic contact. Similarly, the term "using a bathroom" is unclear and could include activities such as grooming, blowing one's nose, or applying makeup. Resolving these ambiguities, the revised statute includes depictions of a "sexual act," as defined in RCC § 22E-701,[39] masturbation, and sadomasochistic activity, that is more consistent with the detailed list in the current non-consensual pornography statute. The revised statute does not include depictions of urination or defecation unless they depict the complainant's nude or undergarment-clad private areas.

months apart may be appropriately charged as separate counts. See, e.g., State v. Boyd, 137 Wash. App. 910 (2007) (finding two photographs of the same victim on the same day did not establish multiple acts of voyeurism but rather a continuing course of conduct).

[39] The revised code defines the term "sexual act" to include direct contact between one person's genitalia and another person's genitalia, mouth, or anus.

These changes improve the clarity and consistency of the revised offense and reduce unnecessary gaps in liability.

Fourth, the revised statute clarifies the type of intended harm required for disclosure of an image that was lawfully obtained. The current nonconsensual pornography statutes in D.C. Code §§ 22-3052(a)(3) and 22-3053(a)(3) require a showing that the accused distributed the sexual image "with the intent to harm the person depicted" or for financial gain. The term "harm" is defined in the statute to mean "any injury, whether physical or nonphysical, including psychological, financial, or reputational injury."[40] To resolve these ambiguities, the revised statute more precisely requires intent to "alarm or sexually abuse, humiliate, harass, or degrade the complainant." These injuries are required in other RCC offenses.[41] This change improves the consistency of the revised statutes.

Fifth, the revised offense does not include a categorical exclusion from liability for commercial images. D.C. Code § 22-3055(a)(2) provides that the non-consensual pornography chapter shall not apply to "[a] person disclosing or publishing a sexual image that resulted from the voluntary exposure of the person depicted in a public or commercial setting." This blanket exception appears to eliminate any protection for people who agree to participate in a commercial recording, even if the recording was for a limited audience.[42] In contrast, the revised statute provides liability for commercial images if the other elements of the offense, including a reasonable expectation of privacy, are met. The revised offense recognizes that effective consent as to distribution may be limited and puts the privacy rights of models and sex workers on par with other citizens. This change eliminates an unnecessary gap in law.

Sixth, the revised offense does not punish attempts to commit unauthorized distribution as severely as a completed offense. The current felony voyeurism statute applies the same five-year penalty to a person who "distributes or disseminates, or attempts to distribute or disseminate."[43] Although the current non-consensual pornography offense requires this element, the statute nonetheless punishes "making a sexual image available for viewing even if the image is not actually viewed by anyone other than the defendant and the person depicted in the image."[44] In contrast, the revised statute requires that the person "distribute or display" the image to another person who actually views it. Attempts to distribute an image would remain criminal, but subject to a lower penalty. The revised statute relies on the general part's common definition of attempt[45] and penalty for an attempt[46] to define and penalize attempts the same as for other revised offenses. This change improves the consistency[47] and proportionality of the revised offense.

Seventh, under the revised statute, a person is not liable for redistributing an image that was disclosed by someone else. The current felony voyeurism statute makes it unlawful to distribute images "that the person knows or has reason to know were taken in violation of" the voyeurism statute.[48] The current non-consensual pornography chapter makes it unlawful to distribute an image "obtained from a third party or other source…with conscious disregard that the sexual image was obtained as a result of" a violation of the non-consensual pornography statute.[49] In contrast, the revised statute punishes redistribution only if the person acted as a co-conspirator or as an accomplice.[50] The revised statute's language avoids punishing a person who shares an image as severely as the person who is responsible for the original privacy intrusion.[51] This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Eighth, the revised offense expands liability for publication online. First, the current felony voyeurism punishes an actor who "distributes or disseminates, or attempts to distribute or disseminate" an image that was obtained through voyeurism.[52] The terms "distribute" and "disseminate" are not defined in the statute and District case law has not addressed their meaning. Second, the current non-consensual pornography statutes specify that it is unlawful to make pornographic material "available for viewing by uploading to the Internet"[53] and define "Internet" to mean "an electronically available platform by which sexual images can be disseminated to a wide audience."[54] The term "wide audience" is not defined in the statute and District case law has not addressed its meaning. In contrast, the revised statute clarifies that uploading material to any online forum that is accessible by a user other than the complainant or defendant is sufficient, even if no other person actually accesses or views it and the electronic platform is not accessible by a "wide audience." This change simplifies the revised offense and avoids litigation over whether an online forum is available to a "wide audience." It also improves the logical organization of the revised statute by making unauthorized disclosure of a sexual recording a lesser-included version of the enhanced offense.

[47] Similarly, in the revised criminal threats offense, the verb "communicates" is intended to be broadly construed, encompassing all speech and other messages that are received and understood by another person. RCC § 22E-1204. In Evans v. United States, 779 A.2d 891, 894-95 (D.C. 2001), the DCCA recognized that for there to be a communication of a threat the recipient must be able to access or comprehend it, at the most basic level. For example, there is no communication of a threat if the content of the threat is in a language that the recipient does not comprehend.

[51] Consider, for example, Classmate A posts a partially-nude locker room photograph of a student on Twitter, commenting, "How ugly! She should be ashamed!" Classmate B retweets it, commenting, "Wow, what an invasion of privacy! YOU should be ashamed!" Under current law, Classmates A and B face the same punishment.

[52] D.C. Code § 22-3531(f)(2).

[53] D.C. Code § 22-3051(5).

[54] D.C. Code § 22-3051(3). The definition includes "social media" and "smartphone applications" but excludes "text messages." In some cases, this may be a distinction without a difference. Many social media platforms and smartphone applications have a direct messaging feature that is virtually identical to Short Message Service.

Ninth, the revised statute establishes a penalty enhancement for large-scale unauthorized distribution of images. Under the current felony voyeurism statute, distribution of sexual images obtained through voyeurism is punishable by up to five years of in prison, irrespective of audience size.[55] Under the current non-consensual pornography statutes, distribution of sexual images obtained by consent is punishable by either 180 days in jail[56] or three years in prison,[57] depending on how widespread the disclosure is. Publication to six or more people or to the internet is punishable by three years. In contrast, the revised statute includes two penalty levels through the enhancement in subsection (d)(2), consistent with the current non-consensual pornography chapter's penalty distinction between distribution to a few people versus distribution to a large audience or online forum. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Tenth, the revised statute excludes liability for a licensee under the Communications Act of 1934 (47 U.S.C. § 151 et seq.) engaged in activities regulated pursuant to such Act. The current nonconsensual pornography statute, D.C. Code § 22-3055(b), provides that: "Nothing in this chapter shall be construed to impose liability on an interactive computer service, as defined in section 230(e)(2) of the Communications Act of 1934, approved February 8, 1996 (110 Stat. 139; 47 U.S.C. § 230(f)(2)), for content provided by another person." However, the current non-consensual pornography offenses do not include an exception for other telecommunications services provider such as radio stations, television broadcasters, and phone service providers, and the current felony voyeurism offense does not include an exception for any service provider. In contrast to these statutes' limited or absent exclusions for commercial service providers, the revised statute makes clear that there is no criminal liability for a company or employee who merely facilitates the transmission of an image or sound at a user's request. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense.

Eleventh, the revised code defines and uses the term "effective consent" instead of using other, undefined references to "consent." The current nonconsensual pornography offenses, through D.C. Code §§ 22-3052(a)(1), 22-3053(a)(1), and 22-3054(a)(1) require that "the person depicted did not consent to the disclosure of the sexual image." (Emphasis added.) The current voyeurism offense, in D.C. Code §§ 22-3531(c)(1) and (d), requires that the person act without the victim's "express and informed consent." The terms "consent" "express consent" and "informed consent" are not defined in the D.C. Code and District case law has not interpreted their meaning in the context of the non-consensual pornography and voyeurism statutes. In contrast, the revised statute uses the defined term "effective consent."[58] The RCC definition of "effective consent" does not require that consent be express or informed—however those terms are defined—only that the consent not be induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception.[59] This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense.

Beyond these eleven changes to current District law, three other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised statute applies standardized definitions as to the culpable mental states required for unauthorized disclosure liability. Current nonconsensual pornography statutes in D.C. Code §§ 22-3052 – 3054 specify that a person must "knowingly disclose" or "knowingly publish" a sexual image and require that the actor proceed "with the intent to harm the person depicted or to receive financial gain." However, the terms "knowingly" and "with intent" are not defined for the statute, and it is unclear whether the "knowingly" mental state applies to the elements that follow concerning agreement and consent. The current voyeurism statute, in D.C. Code § 22-3531(f)(2), does not specify any culpable mental state as to distribution, but it does require that "the person knows or has reason to know" the images were obtained unlawfully. To resolve these ambiguities, the revised statute uses the RCC's general provisions that define "knowingly" and "with intent"[60] and specify that there is no additional culpable mental state required with respect to an actor's underlying criminal conduct. Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[61] These changes clarify and improve the consistency of District statutes.

Second, the revised statute extends jurisdiction for unauthorized disclosure liability only to instances where some aspect of the crime occurs in the District. Current D.C. Code § 22-3057 states: "A violation of § 22-3052, § 22-3053, or § 22-3054 shall be deemed to be committed in the District of Columbia if any part of the violation takes place in the District of Columbia, including when either the person depicted or the person who disclosed or published the sexual image was a resident of, or located in, the District of Columbia at the time that the sexual image was made, disclosed, or published." (emphasis added.) However, authority to exercise jurisdiction over acts that occur outside the District's physical borders has traditionally been limited to acts that occur in, or are intended to have, and actually do have, a detrimental effect within the District.[62] There is no clear precedent for states to extend jurisdiction based solely on the residency of the alleged victim,[63] and the DCCA has not addressed the issue. To resolve this ambiguity, the revised statute does not extend jurisdiction to harms where the accused and the complainant and all relevant action occurs outside the District, even though the complainant is a District resident. Some authorities have questioned whether a purported extension of jurisdiction as in the current statute is unconstitutional.[64] This change improves the clarity and perhaps the constitutionality of the revised statutes.

[61] There is a presumption that the legislature intends to require a defendant to possess a degree of knowledge sufficient to "mak[e] a person legally responsible for the consequences of his or her act or omission" regarding "each of the statutory elements that criminalize otherwise innocent conduct," even when the legislature does not specify any scienter in the statutory text. Rehaif v. United States, 139 S. Ct. 2191, 2195 (2019) (citing United States v. X-Citement Video, Inc., 513 U. S. 64, 72 (1994); Morissette v. United States, 342 U. S. 246, 256–258 (1952); *Staples v. (Internal citation omitted)).

Third, the revised statute clarifies the scope of the affirmative defense. The current non-consensual pornography chapter establishes an affirmative defense that applies "if the disclosure or publication of a sexual image is made in the public interest, including the reporting of unlawful conduct, the lawful and common practices of law enforcement, or legal proceedings."[65] The current felony voyeurism statute does not include a comparable affirmative defense provision.[66] The phrase "in the public interest" is not defined in the statute and District case law has not yet addressed its meaning. To resolve this ambiguity, the revised affirmative defense requires that a defendant demonstrate they distributed the image or audio recording to someone they reasonably believed to be a law enforcement officer, prosecutor, attorney, school administrator, or person with a responsibility for the health, welfare, or supervision of someone depicted in the image or involved in the creation of the image. It also requires that the person intended only "to report possible illegal conduct or seek legal counsel from an attorney." This revised language recognizes that a person in public life enjoys a right to sexual privacy and protection.[67] This change clarifies the revised statute and may eliminate an unnecessary gap in law.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, the revised statute does not specify that the victim must be an "identified or identifiable person." The current nonconsensual pornography statutes in D.C. Code §§ 22-3052(a), 22-3053(a), and 22-3054(a) state: "It shall be unlawful in the District of Columbia for a person to knowingly [disclose or publish] one or more sexual images of another identified or identifiable person." However, this language does not appear in the current felony voyeurism statute, in D.C. Code § 22-3531(f)(2). Legislative history suggests that this phrase was included to make clear that a person is liable for non-consensual pornography whether the victim is named ("identified") or the victim's face is depicted ("identifiable").[68] However, District case law has held that a person is

[65] D.C. Code § 22-3056.
[66] D.C. Code § 22-3531(f)2).
[67] For example, a defendant might argue under the current statute that the public has an interest in viewing a sexual recording of a politician or a movie star that undermine that celebrity's public denials of infidelity. However, such conduct would not be covered by the revised statute's affirmative defense.
[68] See Report on Bill 20-903, the "Criminalization of Non-Consensual Pornography Act of 2014," Council of the District of Columbia Committee on the Judiciary and Public Safety (November 12, 2014) at Page 5 (providing a hypothetical and explaining, "The photo is a sexual image because it shows the nipple of [the victim's] developed female breast, who is identifiable by her face in the photo. If her face was cropped out of the photo, however, she would still be identified by the use of her first name in the email subject line and the reference to her employment at the school.").

"identified or identifiable" even if they are not named and even if they are not recognizable by others.[69] Because the revised statute already makes clear that it applies only to images of a specific complainant—and not anonymous images—the phrase "identified or identifiable" is stricken as superfluous. This change clarifies the revised offense.

Second, the revised statute does not specify that a person is liable for distributing images "directly or indirectly, by any means."[70] This language is surplusage.

[69] In Roberts v. United States, 216 A.3d 870, 880 (D.C. 2019), the DCCA explained, "it suffices that the person depicted in a sexual image can identify himself or herself in the image."

RCC § 22E-1805. Distribution of an Obscene Image.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the distribution of an obscene image offense and penalty for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The revised statute replaces subsection (a) of the obscenity statute, D.C. Code § 22-2201 (Certain obscene activities and conduct declared unlawful; definitions; penalties; affirmative defenses; exception).

Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that a person must at least knowingly engage in distribution or display of an image. "Knowingly" is a defined term[1] and, applied here, means that the person must be practically certain that they are distributing or displaying an image to another person. The word "distribute" requires granting another person the ability to exercise dominion and control over the image.[2] The term "image" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and means a visual depiction, other than a depiction rendered by hand, including a video, film, photograph, or hologram whether in print, electronic, magnetic, digital, or other format. The person must also be practically certain that the picture or video depicts an actual or simulated[3] sexual act; sadomasochistic abuse; masturbation; sexual or sexualized[4] display of the genitals, pubic area, or anus, when there is less than a full opaque covering; sexual contact; or sexualized[5] display of the breast[6] below the top of the areola, or buttocks, when there is less than a full opaque covering. The terms "sexual act," "sexual contact," and "sadomasochistic abuse" are defined in RCC § 22E-701.

Paragraph (a)(2) requires that the person act without the recipient's effective consent.[7] The term "effective consent" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and means consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception. The term "consent" is also defined in RCC § 22E-701. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the person must know—that is, be practically certain—that the complainant has not given effective consent to receiving the offensive image.[8]

[2] Consider, for example, a person who brings a computer to a repairman for service, with an agreement or understanding that the repairman will not browse and open his private files.

[3] The term "simulated" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and means feigned or pretended in a way that realistically duplicates the appearance of actual conduct.

[4] The word "sexualized" includes a display that may not have been sexual to the person in the image, but due to the actor's manipulation of the image a reasonable person would understand the display to be sexual.

[5] The word "sexualized" includes a display that may not have been sexual to the person in the image, but due to the actor's manipulation of the image a reasonable person would understand the display to be sexual.

[6] The word "breast" includes a breast that has undergone a mastectomy and includes the breast of a transfeminine woman. It excludes the chest of a transmasculine man.

[7] See Bolz v. Dist. of Columbia, 149 A.3d 1130, 1144 (D.C. 2016) (explaining, "[A]lthough courts have been willing to protect the rights of consenting adults to transmit and receive indecent materials, they have also permitted states to regulate the dissemination of some indecent materials to minors and nonconsenting adults.") (citing Ginsberg v. New York, 390 U.S. 629, 636, (1968)).

[8] A person does not commit distribution of an obscene image if they subjectively believe—reasonably or unreasonably—that the recipient consents to viewing the material. For example, a man does not commit an offense for sending a photograph of his erect penis by text message to a woman he is dating and, based on a prior conversation, believes the woman has agreed to such conduct. On the other hand, a man who, for example, sends a similar penis picture with intent to annoy, harass, or alarm someone, or with intent to seduce a stranger he knows nothing about (and, therefore, has not given any indication of agreement to such behavior) does commit the offense.

Paragraph (a)(3) specifies that a person must also be reckless as to the image being obscene.[9] The term "obscene" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and requires proof that the image: appeals to a prurient interest in sex, under contemporary community standards[10] and considered as a whole; is patently offensive; and is lacking serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value, considered as a whole.[11] "Reckless" is defined in the revised code,[12] and, applied here, means that the person must be aware of a substantial risk that the image is obscene, and the person's disregard of the risk is a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct.

Subsection (b) establishes four exclusions from liability for the distribution of an obscene image offense.[13] Paragraph (b)(1) provides that the statute does not apply to any licensee[14] under the Communications Act of 1934, such as a radio, television, or phone service provider.[15] Paragraph (b)(1) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element, here the fact that the actor is a specified licensee. Paragraph (b)(2) provides that the statute does not apply to any interactive computer service as defined in 47 U.S.C. § 230(f)(2).[16] Paragraph (b)(2) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element, here the fact that the actor is a specified interactive computer service.

Paragraph (b)(3) excludes liability for publishing an image in or on a public forum, unless the image is also knowingly distributed or displayed directly to a specific viewer[17] or with the purpose of reaching a specific viewer,[18] without that viewer's

The person may be practically certain that a film contains pornography based on the title, description, or other indicators. *See Kramer v. [16] The term "interactive computer service" means any information service, system, or access software provider that provides or enables computer access by multiple users to a computer server, including specifically a service or system that provides access to the Internet and such systems operated or services offered by libraries or educational institutions.

effective consent. Paragraph (b)(3) specifies "in fact." "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, "in fact" applies to every element that follows until the culpable mental states in subparagraphs (b)(3)(A) and (b)(3)(B) are specified. Paragraph (b)(4) excludes liability when the person reasonably believes[19] they are distributing the image to someone who created the image, appeared in the image, or is responsible for the wellbeing of someone who is.[20] "Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others."[21]

Paragraph (c)(1) establishes an affirmative defense for an employee of a school, museum, library, movie theater, or other venue, who is acting within the scope of their role. The term "movie theater" is defined in RCC § 22E-701.

Paragraph (c)(2) establishes an affirmative defense for the innocent display or distribution of a prohibited image.[22] The actor must have the intent "exclusively and in good faith, to report possible illegal conduct or seek legal counsel from any attorney."[23] Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. The recipient of the display or distribution must be someone that the actor reasonably believes[24] to be a "law enforcement officer, prosecutor, attorney, school administrator;" or someone with a responsibility for the health, welfare, or supervision of one of the people depicted or involved in the creation of the image or recording. "Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others."[25]

[19] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist.

[20] Consider, for example, a parent who discovers an obscene image of their teen engaged in a sexual act with another teen. If the parent sends the image to the other teen and their parents, to ensure the behavior is stopped, that conduct does not amount to an offense under RCC §§ 22E-1805 - 1806.

[21] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

[22] Per RCC § 22E-201, the defendant has the burden of proving an affirmative defense by a preponderance of the evidence.

[23] In addition to criminal defense advice, legal advice can include civil proceedings such as custody and abuse and neglect.

[24] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist.

Subsection (d) provides the penalty for the revised offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (e) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC and the federal code.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised distribution of an obscene image offense clearly changes current District law in eight main ways.

First, the revised statute applies the RCC standardized definitions of "knowingly" and "recklessly." The current obscenity statute in D.C. Code § 22-2201(a)(1) states at the beginning of the offense that, "It shall be unlawful in the District of Columbia for any person knowingly:" then, after the colon, describes all the prohibited conduct. The plain language of the statute thus appears to require a mental state of "knowingly" apply to all elements of the offense. Current D.C. Code § 22-2201(a)(2)(B) broadly defines "knowingly" to mean "having general knowledge of, or reason to know, or a belief or ground for belief which warrants further inspection or inquiry of, the character and content of" the obscene materials.[26] In contrast, the revised offense defines "knowingly" to require practical certainty and defines "recklessness" to require conscious disregard of a substantial risk.[27] The revised statute requires knowledge of the sexual nature of the image but only recklessness as to the image being of the sort that is criminally obscene. Application of the standardized RCC definitions here appears to be largely consistent with District case law interpreting the obscenity statute.[28] Moreover, applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence[29]and courts have also recognized that recklessness regarding a risk of traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

[27] RCC § 22E-206.

[28] See Kramer v. U. S., 293 A.2d 272, 274 (D.C. 1972) ("The officer's testimony regarding the nature of poses of nudes in the pictures readily visible on the magazine and box covers would be sufficient to indicate to a customer or a salesman the nature of the merchandise offered for sale. It is sufficient if the accused had such knowledge of the material that he should have suspected its sale might violate the law and inspected or inquired further as to its character and content.")

[29] There is a presumption that the legislature intends to require a defendant to possess a degree of knowledge sufficient to "mak[e] a person legally responsible for the consequences of his or her act or omission" regarding "each of the statutory elements that criminalize otherwise innocent conduct," even when the legislature does not specify any scienter in the statutory text. Rehaif v. United States, 139 S. Ct. 2191, 2195 (2019) (citing United States v. X-Citement Video, Inc., 513 U. S. 64, 72 (1994); Morissette v. United States, 342 U. S. 246, 256–258 (1952); Staples v. United States, 511 U. S. 600, 606 (1994); Black's Law Dictionary 1547 (10th ed. 2014)); see also Elonis v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2001, 2009 (2015) ("[O]ur cases have explained that a defendant generally must 'know the facts that make his conduct fit the definition of the offense,' even if he does not know that those facts give rise to a crime." (Internal citation omitted)).

serious harm is wrongful conduct.[30] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Second, the revised statute requires a distribution or display of an image. The current obscenity statute in D.C. Code § 22-2201(a)(1) makes it unlawful to participate in,[31] purchase,[32] possess,[33] materials that are obscene, indecent, filthy, or immoral.[34] The current statute also makes it unlawful to promote[35] or possess with intent to disseminate[36] obscene materials. D.C. Code § 22-2201(a)(2)(A) also contains a permissive inference that states, "[T]he creation, purchase, procurement, or possession of a mold, engraved plate, or other embodiment of obscenity specially adapted for reproducing multiple copies or the possession of more than 3 copies, of obscene, indecent, or filthy material shall be prima facie evidence of an intent to disseminate such material in violation of this subsection."

In contrast, the revised offense makes it unlawful to distribute or display obscene materials only if it is unsolicited, unwelcome, and unwanted, and in other situations where effective consent has not been given. Merely creating, possessing, or promoting depictions of sexual activity between consenting adults is not prohibited.[37] Due process confers a right to privately create and enjoy erotica, even if it is objectively offensive.[38] The United States Supreme Court has made clear that public morality cannot justify a law that regulates private sexual conduct that does not relate to prostitution, potential for injury or coercion, or public conduct.[39] It is not clear that the aspects of the current law that relate to the creation and possession of obscene pornography create a risk of harm to any of the participants or the general public. In addition, elimination of the permissive inference also may reduce the possibility of a constitutional challenge.[40] Moreover, the rationale for criminalizing conduct short of an attempt[41] is less compelling with respect to obscenity than it is for other contraband offenses such as weapons or controlled substances. The offensive material itself—which oftentimes exists in digital format only—does not create a health hazard, pose a risk of physical danger, or invite violence from rival distributors. This change improves the proportionality of the revised offense and may ensure its constitutionality.

Third, the revised statute criminalizes depictions only of specified parts of the body or types of conduct. Subsection (a) of D.C. Code § 22-2201 applies broadly to materials that are obscene, indecent, filthy, or immoral. The terms "obscene," "indecent," "filthy," and "immoral" are not defined in in the statute. However, District case law[42] has interpreted the terms to refer to the three criteria enumerated by the Supreme Court in Miller v. California.[43] Namely, to determine whether material is obscene, one must consider: (a) whether 'the average person,[44] applying contemporary community standards'[45] would find that the work, taken as a whole, appeals to the [42] D.C. Code § 22-2201 is largely absent from modern District case law, with only one published opinion mentioning it in the past twenty-five years. See Blackledge v. United States, 871 A.2d 1193, 1196 (D.C. 2005) (wherein the defendant was found not guilty on the obscenity charge at trial and the issue was not examined on appeal). Otherwise, the statute only appears in the occasional footnote. See, e.g., Hawkins v. United States, 119 A.3d 687, 691 n. 7 (D.C. 2015). Indeed, case law involving the statute has not been especially active since the late 1970s, following Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973), in which the Court established the constitutional baseline, per the First Amendment, for criminal laws prohibiting obscenity.

United States*, 363 A.2d 307, 309 (D.C. 1976) (stating that Miller made it clear that any vagueness defects in the statute's terminology may be cured by judicial construction); see also Hudson v. United States, 234 A.2d 903, 905 (D.C. 1967) (explaining that the word "obscene" is intended to have a meaning that varies from time to time as general notions of decency in attire and public entertainment tend to change).

[44] The phrase "average person" distinguishes the broader community from fetishists and persons with paraphilic disorders. See also 2 Modern Federal Jury Instructions-Criminal P 45.01 (2019) ("The test is not whether it would arouse sexual desires or sexually impure thoughts in those comprising a particular segment of the community—the young, the immature or the highly prudish—or, would leave another segment—the scientific or highly educated or so-called worldly wise and sophisticated—indifferent and unmoved.").

Washington*, 375 A.2d 20, 24 (D.C. 1977) (holding that the performance of a dancer, Miranda, in which she wore "sheer-type negligee with bikini-type panties" was not prohibited by the District's obscenity statute and noting that, "in a jurisdiction where complete nudity in playhouses as well as in burlesque theatres seems to be accepted, the Miranda dance can scarcely be described as offensive to community standards"); see also Hermann v. United States, 304 A.2d 22, n. 3 (D.C. 1973); see also Ed Bruske, Smut Work: Identifying Obscenity, Washington Post (Feb. 16, 1982), pg. C1.

prurient interest,[46] (b) whether the work depicts or describes, in a patently offensive way,[47] sexual conduct specifically defined by the applicable state law, and (c) whether the work, taken as a whole, lacks serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value. Although local and national community standards may be difficult to discern,[48] a person may be held criminally liable if they comprehend the material's content[49] or character,[50] even if they do not know it to be patently offensive. In contrast, the revised statute is more narrowly limited to depictions that are likely to or designed to appeal to the prurient interest, such as nudity and sexual activity. The revised statute only reaches body parts and conduct that are the subject of other sexual and privacy offenses: an actual or simulated sexual act; sadomasochistic abuse; masturbation; sexual or sexualized display of the genitals, pubic area, or anus, when there is less than a full opaque covering; sexual contact; or sexual or sexualized display of the breast below the top of the areola, or buttocks, when there is less than a full opaque covering. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense and may ensure its constitutionality.

> More than four years have gone by since the last time prosecutors showed pornographic films to a jury in the city. As a result, prosecutors have no "community standards"—the benchmark established by the U.S. Supreme Court—on which to judge what is obscene.

[47] In Parks v. United States, 294 A.2d 858, 859–60 (D.C. 1972), the court explained:

> [A] trial judge may rule, based on the 'autoptic' evidence, that a reasonable person could only conclude that the material affronts contemporary community standards relating to the description or representation of sexual matters, i. e., the material is obscene per se…[I]f the trial judge finds that the material is obscene per se on the Government's case-in-chief, the burden of going forward shifts to the defense. If the defense introduces no evidence, then…the Government prevails. However, it the defense introduces some evidence that the material does not violate contemporary national community standards, the finding of obscenity per se evaporates, much as a rebuttable presumption does, and the burden of proceeding shifts back to the Government to prove beyond a reasonable doubt a violation of contemporary national community standards…Once the burden of proceeding has shifted back to the Government and the Government introduces evidence on the contemporary national community standards, it is for the trier of fact to weigh the conflicting evidence.

United States*, 354 A.2d 238, 240 (D.C. 1976) (finding the trial court did not err in excluding testimony of proffered defense witness on community standards, since the subject of obscenity is not beyond the ken of the average layman).

Fourth, the revised statute criminalizes distribution or display of images only. Subsection (a) of current D.C. Code § 22-2201 criminalizes obscene[51] writings, pictures, sound recordings, plays, dances, motion pictures, performances, exhibitions, representations, devices, articles, and things. In contrast, the revised obscenity offense is limited to the defined term "image," which means a visual depiction, other than a depiction rendered by hand, including a video, film, photograph, or hologram whether in print, electronic, magnetic, or digital format.[52] Other mediums are less vivid, poignant, or memorable than visual representations, and it appears highly unlikely that they may be said to be "patently offensive" under modern community standards per Miller v. California.[53] A blanket prohibition of devices, articles, or things that are "intended for…immoral use"[54] also may be especially vulnerable to a substantive due process challenge.[55] This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense and may ensure its constitutionality.

Fifth, the revised statute excludes liability for any information service, system, or access software provider that provides or enables computer access by multiple users to a computer server, including specifically a service or system that provides access to the internet and such systems operated or services offered by libraries or educational institutions. Current D.C. Code § 22-2201(d) provides, "Nothing in this section shall apply to a licensee[56] under the Communications Act of 1934 (47 U.S.C. § 151 et seq.) while engaged in activities regulated pursuant to such Act." In contrast, the revised offense excludes liability for a wider array of commercial information technology providers. Unlike radio stations, television broadcasters, and phone service providers, internet service providers are not licensed under the federal communications act. The revised statute better aligns itself with the practicalities of the information age by excepting these service providers as well as other remote communications providers.[57] This change improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

Sixth, the revised statute limits liability for online posts of obscene images. Current D.C. Code § 22-2201 does not directly address publishing sexual material to an online public forum. The current statute was enacted in 1967, decades before the invention of smartphones equipped with cameras and internet access. In contrast, the revised statute limits liability for obscene online publication to conduct that targets an online user. Paragraph (b)(4) of the revised statute requires that either the obscene post be sent directly to another user without their effective consent (e.g., via direct message to that user) or purposely sent to the complainant without their effective consent (e.g., posting the image as a comment on that user's page,[58] tagging that user in the image or image caption[59]). A mere knowledge standard for online publication is insufficient because, in most instances a person who publishes pornography online can be said to be practically certain that they are displaying that pornography to every person who reaches that particular web address, whether the person consented to viewing sexual images or not. This change improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

[56] The term "licensee" is undefined and District case law has not addressed its meaning. 47 U.S.C. § 153(30) defines "licensee" to mean "the holder of a radio station license granted or continued in force under authority of this chapter." 47 U.S.C. § 153(49) defines "radio station license" to mean "that instrument of authorization required by this chapter or the rules and regulations of the Commission made pursuant to this chapter, for the use or operation of apparatus for transmission of energy, or communications, or signals by radio, by whatever name the instrument may be designated by the Commission."

Seventh, the revised statute revises the affirmative defense in current law for "individuals having scientific, educational, or other special justification for possession of such material." Current D.C. Code § 22-2201(c) states that it is an affirmative defense that "the dissemination was to institutions or individuals having scientific, educational, or other special justification for possession of such material." The term "special justification" is not defined and District case law has not addressed its meaning. In contrast, the revised offense establishes an affirmative defense for employees of schools, museums, libraries, movie theaters, and other venues who are acting within the reasonable scope of their professional duties.[60] Other general defenses in the RCC's general part may also apply to persons with special justification.[61] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised offense.

Eighth, the revised offense does not codify a special confiscation and disposal provision. Current D.C. Code § 22-2201(a)(3) provides: "When any person is convicted of a violation of this subsection, the court in its judgment of conviction may, in addition to the penalty prescribed, order the confiscation and disposal of any materials described in paragraph (1) of this subsection, which were named in the charge against such person and which were found in the possession or under the control of such person at the time of such person's arrest." In contrast, the revised offense does not require confiscation of obscene materials. Unlike dangerous articles such as firearms and explosives,[62] obscene images do not present a physical danger to public health or safety. Moreover, under the revised statute, a person is permitted to possess and enjoy obscene material without [58] For example, if a person posts a comment below a Washington Post article that includes a .gif of an obscene display of bestiality, that person may have committed distribution of an obscene image to the author of the article but has not committed an offense against every viewer of the article.

App. 2018) (concluding that tweets tagging a specific individual are both public and specifically targeted because the act of tagging someone is intended so that the tagged individual sees the posts) with People v. Relerford, 104 N.E.3d 341, 350 (Ill. 2017) (reversing a conviction where the defendant made several postings on Facebook about a specific individual but did not send the Facebook posts directly to her and, because she was not one of his Facebook friends, she could not view the posts through her own Facebook account, and only received the alarming posts via email from a colleague).

[60] The exclusions do not apply to a rogue employee who is acting ultra vires. For example, a projectionist in a movie theater who displays an obscene, X-rated film in lieu of a G-rated cartoon, commits an offense.

[61] RCC § 22E-408 includes defenses for parents, wards, and emergency health professionals. Consider, for example, a parent who gives a teenager a child birth video to warn them of the consequences of unprotected sexual intercourse. Such a parent may be able to avail themselves of the defense in RCC § 22E-408(a)(1).

distributing it inside the District. Accordingly, the revised statute does not authorize a sentencing court to order an offender to relinquish or destroy it. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense.

Beyond these eight changes to current District law, two other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised statute excludes liability for a person who reasonably believes they are distributing the image to someone who created the image, appeared in the image, or is responsible for the wellbeing of someone who is.[63] Current D.C. Code § 22-2201 does not include an exception for this conduct and it is unclear whether common law defenses would apply under these circumstances. The revised statute expressly excludes liability when the image is being distributed to someone who is already familiar with it or is responsible for someone who made it or is depicted in it. This change clarifies and improves the completeness of the revised statute.

Second, the revised statute includes an affirmative defense for a person who demonstrates they distributed the image or audio recording to someone they reasonably believed to be a law enforcement officer, prosecutor, attorney, school administrator, or person with a responsibility for the health, welfare, or supervision of someone depicted in the image or involved in the creation of the image. Current D.C. Code § 22-2201 does not include an exception for this conduct and it is unclear whether common law defenses would apply under these circumstances. The revised statute expressly includes a defense when the person intended only "to report possible illegal conduct or seek legal counsel from an attorney." This change clarifies and improves the completeness of the revised statute.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

The revised offense clarifies the term "licensee" has the meaning specified in 47 U.S.C. § 153(30). Current D.C. Code § 22-2201(d) provides: "Nothing in this section shall apply to a licensee under the Communications Act of 1934 (47 U.S.C. § 151 et seq.) while engaged in activities regulated pursuant to such Act. The term "licensee" is undefined and District case law has not addressed its meaning. However, Title 47 of the United States Code defines "licensee" to mean "the holder of a radio station license granted or continued in force under authority of this chapter"[64] and defines "radio station license" to mean "that instrument of authorization required by this chapter or the rules and regulations of the Commission made pursuant to this chapter, for the use or operation of apparatus for transmission of energy, or communications, or signals by radio, by whatever name the instrument may be designated by the Commission."[65] The revised statute adopts this definition to clarify the meaning of the revised offense.

[63] Consider, for example, a parent who discovers an obscene image of their teen engaged in a sexual act with another teen. If the parent sends the image to the other teen and their parents, to ensure the behavior is stopped, that conduct does not amount to an offense under RCC §§ 22E-1805 - 1806.

RCC § 22E-1806. Distribution of an Obscene Image to a Minor.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the distribution of an obscene image to a minor offense and penalty for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The revised statute replaces subsection (b) of the obscenity statute, D.C. Code § 22-2201 (Certain obscene activities and conduct declared unlawful; definitions; penalties; affirmative defenses; exception).

Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that a person must at least knowingly engage in distribution or display of an image. "Knowingly" is a defined term[1] and, applied here, means that the person must be practically certain that they are distributing or displaying an image to another person.[2] The word "distribute" requires granting another person the ability to exercise dominion and control over the image.[3] The term "image" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and means a visual depiction, other than a depiction rendered by hand, including a video, film, photograph, or hologram whether in print, electronic, magnetic, digital, or other format. The person must also be practically certain that the image depicts: a sexual act; sadomasochistic abuse; masturbation; a sexual or sexualized[4] display of the genitals, pubic area, or anus, when there is less than a full opaque covering; sexual contact; or a sexual or sexualized[5] display of the breast[6] below the top of the areola or buttocks, when there is less than a full opaque covering. The terms "sexual act," "sexual contact," and "sadomasochistic abuse" are defined in RCC § 22E-701.

Subparagraph (a)(2)(A) specifies that a person must also be reckless as to image being obscene.[7] The term "obscene" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and requires proof that the image: appeals to a prurient interest in sex, under contemporary community standards[8] and considered as a whole is patently offensive; and is lacking serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value, considered as a whole.[9] "Reckless" is defined in the [2] The government is not required to prove that the recipient viewed the picture or video, only that it was received.

[3] Consider, for example, a person who brings a computer to a repairman for service, with an agreement or understanding that the repairman will not browse and open his private files.

[4] The word "sexualized" includes a display that may not have been sexual to the person in the image, but due to the actor's manipulation of the image a reasonable person would understand the display to be sexual.

[5] The word "sexualized" includes a display that may not have been sexual to the person in the image, but due to the actor's manipulation of the image a reasonable person would understand the display to be sexual.

[6] The word "breast" includes a breast that has undergone a mastectomy and includes the breast of a transfeminine woman. It excludes the chest of a transmasculine man.

[7] The government is not required to prove that the person viewed the image. The person may be practically certain that a film contains pornography based on the title, description, or other indicators. See Kramer v. United States, 293 A.2d 272, 274 (D.C. 1972) (finding that for salesman to be convicted of knowingly selling an obscene film, the government need not prove that the salesman had actual knowledge of the contents of the particular film sold).

Washington*, 375 A.2d 20, 24 (D.C. 1977) (holding that the performance of a dancer, Miranda, in which she wore "sheer-type negligee with bikini-type panties" was not prohibited by the District's obscenity statute and noting that, "in a jurisdiction where complete nudity in playhouses as well as in burlesque theatres seems to be accepted, the Miranda dance can scarcely be described as offensive to community standards").

revised code,[10] and, applied here, means that the person must be aware of a substantial risk that the image is obscene, and the person's disregard of the risk must be a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct.

Subparagraph (a)(2)(B) specifies that a person must also be reckless as to the recipient being under 16 years old.[11] The term "recklessly" is defined in the revised code and here means the person must be aware of a substantial risk that the complainant is under 16 years of age and the person's disregard of the risk must be a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct.[12]

Paragraph (a)(3) requires that the person is at least 18 years old and at least four years older than the recipient. The term "in fact" indicates that a person is strictly liable as to their age and the relative age of the recipient.[13] It is not a defense to this enhancement that the accused believed, even reasonably, that the age difference was less than four years.

Subsection (b) establishes three exclusions from liability for the distribution of an obscene image to a minor offense. Paragraph (b)(1) provides that the statute does not apply to any licensee[14] under the Communications Act of 1934, such as a radio, television, or phone service provider.[15] Paragraph (b)(1) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element, here the fact that the actor is a specified licensee. Paragraph (b)(2) provides that the statute does not apply to any interactive computer service as defined in 47 U.S.C. § 230(f)(2).[16] Paragraph (b)(2) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element, here the fact that the actor is a specified interactive computer service.

Paragraph (b)(3) excludes liability for publishing an image in or on a public forum, unless the image is also distributed or displayed directly to a specific viewer.[17]

Paragraph (b)(3) specifies "in fact." "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, "in fact" applies to every element that follows until the culpable mental states in subparagraphs (b)(3)(A) and (b)(3)(B) are specified. Paragraph (b)(4) excludes liability when the person reasonably believes[18] they are distributing the image to someone who created the image, appeared in the image, or is responsible for the wellbeing of someone who is.[19] Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[20]

Paragraph (c)(1) establishes an affirmative defense for an employee of a school, museum, library, movie theater, or other venue, who is acting within the scope of their role.[21] The term "movie theater" is defined in RCC § 22E-701.

Paragraph (c)(2) establishes an affirmative defense if the actor and the complainant are, in fact, in a marriage, domestic partnership, or dating relationship. The actor must be married to, or in a domestic partnership with, the complainant, or be in a "romantic, dating, or sexual relationship" with the complainant and be no more than four years older than the complainant. The "romantic, dating, or sexual relationship" language tracks the language in the District's current definition of "intimate partner violence"[22] and is intended to have the same meaning. The actor and the complainant must be the only persons who are depicted in the image. The complainant must give "effective consent" to the prohibited conduct or the actor must reasonably believe[23] that the complainant gave "effective consent" to this conduct. Reasonableness is an objective friends, she could not view the posts through her own Facebook account, and only received the alarming posts via email from a colleague).

[18] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist.

[19] Consider, for example, a parent who discovers an obscene image of their teen engaged in a sexual act with another teen. If the parent sends the image to the other teen and their parents, to ensure the behavior is stopped, that conduct does not amount to an offense under RCC §§ 22E-1805 - 1806.

[21] The exclusion does not apply to an employee who is acting ultra vires. For example, a cashier who accepts a bribe from a 15-year-old to be admitted into an X-ray screening commits distribution of an obscene image to a minor offense.

[22] D.C. Code § 16-1001(7) ("'Intimate partner violence' means an act punishable as a criminal offense that is committed or threatened to be committed by an offender upon a person: (A) To whom the offender is or was married; (B) With whom the offender is or was in a domestic partnership; or (C) With whom the offender is or was in a romantic, dating, or sexual relationship.").

standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[24] "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception." The term "consent" is also defined in RCC § 22E-701.

Subsection (d) provides the penalty for the revised offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (e) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC and the federal code.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised distribution of obscene materials to a minor offense clearly changes current District law in eight main ways.

First, the revised statute applies the RCC standardized definitions of "knowingly" and "recklessly." The current obscenity statute in D.C. Code § 22-2201(b) states at the beginning of the offense that, "It shall be unlawful in the District of Columbia for any person knowingly:" then, after the colon, describes all the prohibited conduct. The plain language of the statute thus appears to require a mental state of "knowingly" apply to all elements of the offense. D.C. Code § 22-2201(b)(2)(F) broadly defines "knowingly" to mean "having a general knowledge of, or reason to know, or a belief or ground for belief which warrants further inspection or inquiry or both of: (i) The character and content of any material described in paragraph (1) of this subsection which is reasonably susceptible of examination by the defendant; and (ii) The age of the minor." In contrast, the revised offense defines "knowingly" to require practical certainty and defines "recklessness" to require conscious disregard of a substantial risk.[25] The revised statute requires knowledge of the sexual nature of the image but only recklessness as to the age of the minor and as to image being of the sort that is criminally obscene. The revised statute holds an actor strictly liable with respect to the age difference between the defendant and the complainant. Application of the standardized RCC definitions here appears to be largely consistent with District case law interpreting the obscenity statute.[26] Moreover, applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American

[24] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

[25] RCC § 22E-206.

[26] See Kramer v. United States, 293 A.2d 272, 274 (D.C. 1972) ("The officer's testimony regarding the nature of poses of nudes in the pictures readily visible on the magazine and box covers would be sufficient to indicate to a customer or a salesman the nature of the merchandise offered for sale. It is sufficient if the accused had such knowledge of the material that he should have suspected its sale might violate the law and inspected or inquired further as to its character and content.") jurisprudence[27] and courts have also recognized that recklessness regarding a risk of serious harm is wrongful conduct.[28] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Second, the revised statute criminalizes depictions only of specified parts of the body or types of conduct. Subsection (b) of current D.C. Code § 22-2201 applies broadly to offensive materials that either include "explicit and detailed verbal descriptions or narrative accounts of sexual excitement" or depict "nudity, sexual conduct, or sado-masochistic abuse." The term "nudity" is defined broadly to include the depiction of covered male genitals in a discernibly turgid state, a pubic area or buttocks with less than a full opaque covering, and the female breast with less than a full opaque covering of any portion below the top of the nipple.[29] The term "sexual conduct" is defined broadly to include homosexuality[30] and all physical contact with a person's clothed or unclothed genitals, pubic area, buttocks, or female breast.[31] And the term "sado-masochistic abuse" is defined broadly to include any flagellation or physical restraint of a person wearing undergarments, a mask, or a bizarre costume.[32] District case law[33] explains that the proscribed materials in the obscenity statute are limited to the three criteria enumerated in Miller v. California.[34] Namely, to determine whether material is obscene, one must [33] D.C. Code § 22-2201 is largely absent from modern District case law, with only one published opinion mentioning it in the past twenty-five years. See Blackledge v. United States, 871 A.2d 1193, 1196 (D.C. 2005) (wherein the defendant was found not guilty on the obscenity charge at trial and the issue was not examined on appeal). Otherwise, the statute only appears in the occasional footnote. See, e.g., Hawkins v. United States, 119 A.3d 687, 691 n. 7 (D.C. 2015). Indeed, case law involving the statute has not been especially active since the late 1970s, following Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973), in which the Court established the constitutional baseline, per the First Amendment, for criminal laws prohibiting obscenity.

United States*, 234 A.2d 903, 905 (D.C. 1967) (explaining that the word "obscene" is intended to have a meaning that varies from time to time as general notions of decency in attire and public entertainment tend to change).

Although local and national community standards may be difficult to discern,[39] a person may be held criminally liable if they comprehend the material's content[40] or character,[41] even if they do not know it to be patently offensive. In contrast, the revised statute is more narrowly limited to depictions that are likely to or designed to appeal to the prurient interest, such as nudity and sexual activity. The revised statute only reaches body parts and conduct that are the subject of other sexual and privacy offenses: an actual or simulated sexual act; sadomasochistic abuse; masturbation; sexual or sexualized display of the genitals, pubic area, or anus, when there is less than a full opaque covering; sexual contact; or sexual or sexualized display of the breast below the top of the areola, or buttocks, when there is less than a full opaque covering. Since 1967, when this language was adopted, social mores regarding promiscuous and licentious behavior and popular fashion have changed considerably.[42] In modern America, it commonplace for swimwear or evening wear to expose the lower part of the buttocks or breast. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense and may ensure its constitutionality.

> [A] trial judge may rule, based on the 'autoptic' evidence, that a reasonable person could only conclude that the material affronts contemporary community standards relating to the description or representation of sexual matters, i. e., the material is obscene per se…[I]f the trial judge finds that the material is obscene per se on the Government's case-in-chief, the burden of going forward shifts to the defense. If the defense introduces no evidence, then…the Government prevails. However, it the defense introduces some evidence that the material does not violate contemporary national community standards, the finding of obscenity per se evaporates, much as a rebuttable presumption does, and the burden of proceeding shifts back to the Government to prove beyond a reasonable doubt a violation of contemporary national community standards…Once the burden of proceeding has shifted back to the Government and the Government introduces evidence on the contemporary national community standards, it is for the trier of fact to weigh the conflicting evidence.

Third, the revised statute criminalizes distribution or display of images only. Subsection (b) of current D.C. Code § 22-2201 applies to any "picture, photograph, drawing, sculpture, motion picture film, or similar visual representation or image,"[43] "book, magazine, or other printed matter however reproduced or sound recording,"[44] "explicit and detailed verbal description[] or narrative account[],"[45] and "motion picture, show, or other presentation."[46] In contrast, the revised obscenity offense is limited to the defined term "image," which means a visual depiction, other than a depiction rendered by hand, including a video, film, photograph, or hologram whether in print, electronic, magnetic, digital, or other format.[47] Other mediums are less vivid, poignant, or memorable than visual representations, and it appears highly unlikely that they may be said to be "patently offensive" under modern community standards per Miller v. California.[48] This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense and may ensure its constitutionality.

Fourth, the revised offense applies to adults only. Current D.C. Code § 22-2201(b) makes it unlawful to distribute obscene materials to any person under 17 years old.[49] It makes no exception for one child who gives obscene materials to another child, though a child may not be sophisticated enough to judge whether an item "affronts prevailing standards in the adult community as a whole with respect to what is suitable material for minors."[50] In contrast, the revised statute applies only to a person who is over 18 years old who shares obscene materials with a person who is both under 16 years old and four years younger than the accused. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offenses.

Fifth, the revised statute excludes liability for any information service, system, or access software provider that provides or enables computer access by multiple users to a computer server, including specifically a service or system that provides access to the internet and such systems operated or services offered by libraries or educational institutions. Current D.C. Code § 22-2201(d) provides, "Nothing in this section shall apply to a licensee[51] under the Communications Act of 1934 (47 U.S.C. § 151 et seq.) while engaged in activities regulated pursuant to such Act." In contrast, the revised offense excludes liability for a wider array of commercial information technology providers. Unlike radio stations, television broadcasters, and phone service providers, internet service providers are not licensed under the federal communications act. The revised statute better aligns itself with the practicalities of the information age by excepting these service providers as well as other remote communications providers.[52] This change improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

Sixth, the revised statute limits liability for online posts of obscene images. Current D.C. Code § 22-2201 does not directly address publishing sexual material to an online public forum. In contrast, the revised statute limits liability for obscene online publication to conduct that targets an online user. Paragraph (b)(4) of the revised statute requires that either the obscene post be sent directly to another user without their effective consent (e.g., via direct message to that user) or purposely sent to the complainant without their effective consent (e.g., posting the image as a comment on that user's page,[53] tagging that user in the image or image caption[54]). A mere knowledge standard for online publication is insufficient because, in most instances a person who publishes pornography online can be said to be practically certain that they are displaying that pornography to every person who reaches that particular web address, whether the person consented to viewing sexual images or not. This change improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

[51] The term "licensee" is undefined and District case law has not addressed its meaning. 47 U.S.C. § 153(30) defines "licensee" to mean "the holder of a radio station license granted or continued in force under authority of this chapter." 47 U.S.C. § 153(49) defines "radio station license" to mean "that instrument of authorization required by this chapter or the rules and regulations of the Commission made pursuant to this chapter, for the use or operation of apparatus for transmission of energy, or communications, or signals by radio, by whatever name the instrument may be designated by the Commission."

Seventh, the revised statute revises the affirmative defense in current law for "individuals having scientific, educational, or other special justification for possession of such material." Current D.C. Code § 22-2201(c) states that it is an affirmative defense that "the dissemination was to institutions or individuals having scientific, educational, or other special justification for possession of such material." The term "special justification" is not defined and District case law has not addressed its meaning. In contrast, the revised offense establishes an affirmative defense for employees of schools, museums, libraries, movie theaters, and other venues who are acting within the reasonable scope of their professional duties.[55] Other general defenses in the RCC's general part may also apply to persons with special justification.[56] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised offense.

Eighth, the revised statute codifies an affirmative defense for marriage, domestic partnership, and other romantic relationships. The current obscenity statute[57] does not have a defense for actors that engage in the prohibited conduct with minors to whom they are married or with whom they are in a domestic partnership or romantic relationship. This is inconsistent with several of the current sex offense statutes[58] and the current sexual performance of a minor offense.[59] In contrast, the revised distribution of an obscene image to a minor statute makes it an affirmative defense that the actor is married to, or in a domestic partnership or "romantic, dating, or sexual relationship" with the complainant. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute.

[55] The exclusions do not apply to a rogue employee who is acting ultra vires. For example, a projectionist in a movie theater who displays an obscene, X-rated film in lieu of a G-rated cartoon, commits an offense.

[56] RCC § 22E-408 includes defenses for parents, wards, and emergency health professionals. Consider, for example, a parent who gives a teenager a child birth video to warn them of the consequences of unprotected sexual intercourse. Such a parent may be able to avail themselves of the defense in RCC § 22E-408(a)(1).

[57] D.C. Code § 22-2201.

[58] D.C. Code § 22-3011(b) ("Marriage or domestic partnership between the defendant and the child or minor at the time of the offense is a defense, which the defendant must establish by a preponderance of the evidence, to a prosecution under §§ 22-3008 to 22-3010.01, prosecuted alone or in conjunction with charges under § 22-3018 or § 22-403, involving only the defendant and the child or minor."). In the current sexual abuse statutes a "child" is a person under the age of 16 years and a "minor" is a person under the age of 18 years. D.C. Code § 22-3001(3), (5A). The marriage and domestic partnership defense applies to the current child sexual abuse statutes (D.C. Code §§ 22-3008 and 22-3009), the sexual abuse of a minor statutes (D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.01 and 22-3009.02), enticing a child or minor (D.C. Code § 22-3010), and misdemeanor sexual abuse of a child or minor (D.C. Code § 22-3010.01). These current sex offenses are based on the ages of the complainant and the defendant, as opposed to whether force, coercion, etc., was present.

[59] D.C. Code § 22-3102(c)(2) ("If the sexual performance consists solely of a still or motion picture, then this section: (2) Shall not apply to possession of a still or motion picture by…an adult not more than 4 years older than the minor or minors depicted in it, who receives it from a minor depicted in it unless the recipient knows that at least one of the minors depicted in the still or motion picture did not consent to its transmission.").

Beyond these eight changes to current District law, two other aspects of the revised statute may constitute a substantive change to current District law.

First, the revised statute does not criminalize non-purposefully providing a minor access to an obscene exhibition. Current D.C. Code § 22-2201(b)(1)(B) makes it unlawful to "provide to a minor an admission ticket to, or pass to, or to admit a minor to, premises whereon" patently offensive materials are exhibited. This language is ambiguous in at least three ways. In contrast, consistent with other RCC offenses, the revised statute provides liability for such conduct only when the actor's role meets the standards for accomplice liability under RCC § 22E-210, which requires a more direct causal link between the actor's conduct and the resulting harm. An actor is subject to accomplice liability for purposely encouraging or assisting another person who displays obscene materials to a minor. The revised language eliminates liability for museum workers[60] and other employees who may knowingly, but not purposely, admit a minor to a display of obscene material. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense and may ensure its constitutionality.

Second, the revised statute excludes liability for a person who reasonably believes they are distributing the image to someone who created the image, appeared in the image, or is responsible for the wellbeing of someone who is.[61] Current D.C. Code § 22-2201 does not include an exception for this conduct and it is unclear whether common law defenses would apply under these circumstances. The revised statute expressly excludes liability when the image is being distributed to someone who is already familiar with it or is responsible for someone who made it or is depicted in it. This change clarifies and improves the completeness of the revised statute.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, the revised offense clarifies the term "licensee" has the meaning specified in 47 U.S.C. § 153(30). Current D.C. Code § 22-2201(d) provides: "Nothing in this section shall apply to a licensee under the Communications Act of 1934 (47 U.S.C. § 151 et seq.) while engaged in activities regulated pursuant to such Act." The term "licensee" is undefined and District case law has not addressed its meaning. However, Title 47 of the United States Code defines "licensee" to mean "the holder of a radio station license granted or continued in force under authority of this chapter"[62] and defines "radio station license" to mean "that instrument of authorization required by this chapter or the rules and regulations of the Commission made pursuant to this chapter, for the use or operation of apparatus for transmission of energy, or communications, or signals by radio, by whatever name the instrument may be designated by the Commission."[63] The revised statute adopts this definition to clarify the meaning of the revised offense.

[60] For example, in 2018, the Smithsonian's Hirshhorn Museum and Sculpture Garden featured the work of Georg Baselitz, including "The Naked Man," which depicts a cadaverous man with a huge erection lying on his back on a table. The painting was confiscated by a state's attorney in 1963. See Sebastian Smee, Georg Baselitz is an overrated hack. Art collectors fell for him — but you don't have to, WASHINGTON POST (June 24, 2018).

[61] Consider, for example, a parent who discovers an obscene image of their teen engaged in a sexual act with another teen. If the parent sends the image to the other teen and their parents, to ensure the behavior is stopped, that conduct does not amount to an offense under RCC §§ 22E-1805 - 1806.

[62] 47 U.S.C. § 153(30).

Second, the revised statute defines the term "obscene" consistent with U.S. Supreme Court precedent. D.C. Code § 22-2201(b)(1)(B) makes it unlawful to exhibit to a minor "a motion picture, show, or other presentation which, in whole or in part, depicts nudity, sexual conduct, or sado-masochistic abuse and which taken as a whole is patently offensive because it affronts prevailing standards in the adult community as a whole with respect to what is suitable material for minors." (Emphasis added.) Current D.C. Code §§ 22-2201(b)(1)(A)(i), (A)(ii) contain similar language. District case law has not addressed the meaning of these phrases beyond stating generally[64] that the obscenity statute is to be interpreted consistent with the Supreme Court's ruling in Miller.[65] The Miller articulation of the standards for interpreting what is patently offensive and whether to assess obscenity in terms of the "whole" work varies[66] slightly from the current District statute. The revised statute, through use of the defined term "obscene," adopts the obscenity standard as articulated in the Miller opinion. This change clarifies the revised offense and may help ensure its constitutionality.

RCC § 22E-1807. Creating or Trafficking an Obscene Image of a Minor.

Explanatory Note.[1] The RCC creating or trafficking an obscene image of a minor offense prohibits creating, displaying, distributing, selling, or advertising images that depict complainants under the age of 18 years engaging in or submitting to specified sexual conduct. The offense also prohibits a person that is responsible under civil law for a complainant under the age of 18 years from giving effective consent for the recording, photographing, or filming of a complainant engaged in specified sexual conduct. The penalty gradations are based on the type of sexual conduct that is depicted, or will be depicted, in the image. The revised trafficking an obscene image of a minor statute has the same penalties as the RCC arranging a live sexual performance of a minor statute,[2] the main difference being that the RCC creating or trafficking an obscene image of a minor offense is limited to images. Along with the possession of an obscene image of a minor offense,[3] the arranging a live sexual performance of a minor offense,[4] and the attending or viewing a live sexual performance of a minor offense,[5] the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image of a minor statute replaces the current sexual performance using a minor offense[6] in the current D.C. Code, as well as the current definitions,[7] penalties,[8] and affirmative defenses[9] for that offense.

Subsection (a) specifies the various types of prohibited conduct in first degree creating or trafficking an obscene image of a minor, the highest gradation of the revised offense. The prohibited conduct is specific to an "image." An "image," as defined in RCC § 22E-701, is a visual depiction, other than a depiction rendered by hand, and includes videos and live broadcasts. Paragraph (a)(1) requires a culpable mental state of "knowingly," a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she will cause the prohibited result, i.e. creating a specified image. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" culpable mental state in paragraph (a)(1) applies to each type of prohibited conduct in subparagraphs (a)(1)(A), (a)(1)(B), (a)(1)(C), (a)(1)(D), and (a)(1)(E).

For subparagraph (a)(1)(A), the "knowingly" culpable mental state requires that the actor be "practically certain" that he or she creates an image, other than a derivative image, by recording, photographing, or filming the complainant or that he or she "produces" or "directs" the creation of such an image. "Derivative" is intended to have its common meaning as "having parts that originate from another source."[10] The exclusion of derivative images, in conjunction with the requirements in paragraph (a)(2), requires the defendant to record, photograph, or film the complainant engaged in live sexual conduct. There is no liability in subparagraph (a)(1)(A) for recording, photographing, or filming a pre-existing image of the complainant or creating a composite image of the complainant.[11] However, if the defendant records, photographs, or films a pre-existing image or creates a composite image of the complainant with intent to distribute that image, there may be liability under subparagraph (a)(1)(D).

These terms have distinct definitions in the current statute (D.C. Code § 22-3101(3), (6)), but the current statute does not use the terms consistently. Compare D.C. Code § 22-3102(a)(1), (b) (referring to a "sexual performance.") with (a)(2) (referring to "any performance which includes sexual conduct by a person under 18 years of age.").

Subparagraph (a)(1)(B) prohibits a "person with a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant" from giving "effective consent" for the complainant to engage in or submit to the recording, photographing, or filming of an image, other than a derivative image. The phrase "person with a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant" is identical to the language in the special defense in RCC § 22E-408, and has the same meaning as discussed in that commentary. The "knowingly" culpable mental state in paragraph (a)(1) here requires that the actor be "practically certain" that he or she is giving effective consent for the complainant to engage in or submit to the recording, photographing, or filming of an image, other than a derivative image.[12] In conjunction with the requirements in paragraph (a)(2), the exclusion on derivative images requires the defendant to give effective consent for the complainant to engage in or submit to the recording, photographing, or filming of live sexual conduct, as opposed to recording, photographing, or filming a pre-existing image or creating a composite image.[13] "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception." As is discussed in the commentary to the RCC definition of "consent," there are circumstances in which indirect types of agreement or inaction may be sufficient. There is no requirement for liability in subparagraph (a)(1)(B) that an image actually be created; it is sufficient that the actor give effective consent for the complainant to engage in or submit to the creation of an image.[14]

[11] A composite image of the complainant is comprised of sources other than recording, photographing, or filming live conduct, including sources such as: 1) pre-existing images or videos of the complainant; 2) images or videos of other individuals, regardless of whether they are adults or minors; and 3) computer-generated graphics or images, including graphics or images of "fake" minors.

[12] Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" culpable mental state also applies to the fact that the actor is a "person with a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant." The actor must be "practically certain" that he or she is such a person.

[13] A composite image of the complainant is comprised of sources other than recording, photographing, or filming live conduct, including sources such as: 1) pre-existing images or videos of the complainant; 2) images or videos of other individuals, regardless of whether they are adults or minors; and 3) computer-generated graphics or images, including graphics or images of "fake" minors.

[14] This provision is redundant in the case of a responsible individual who has a higher culpable mental state than "knowingly." In those cases, the RCC solicitation (RCC § 22E-302) and RCC accomplice (RCC § 22E-210) provisions would establish liability, as they would for any other defendant. However, the RCC solicitation and accomplice provisions require a culpable mental state of "purposely" and have other more stringent requirements. Subparagraph (a)(1)(B) is intended to provide liability for responsible individuals who are merely "practically certain" that they are giving effective consent to the complainant engaging in

For subparagraph (a)(1)(C), the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she will display, distribute, or manufacture an image. "Display" has its ordinary meaning and is intended to indicate ways of showing an image without distributing it—i.e. showing an image to another person without actually relinquishing it. "Distribute" has its ordinary meaning, involving a transfer of an item, more than a mere display.[15] Additionally, for manufacturing in subparagraph (a)(1)(D), the actor must have the "intent" to distribute the image. Manufacturing images for personal use is characterized as possession and is penalized under the less serious offense of possession of an obscene image of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1808). "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor was practically certain that he or she would distribute the image. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that the defendant distributed the manufactured image, only that the defendant believed to a practical certainty that he or she would do so. Unlike subparagraphs (a)(1)(A) and (a)(1)(B), subparagraph (a)(1)(C) applies to any image, including images derived from sources other than live conduct, such as a screenshot of a pre-existing video of the complainant, or a composite image of the complainant.[16]

For subparagraph (a)(1)(D), the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she will make an image accessible to another user on an electronic platform. An accidental posting to an electronic platform[17] is insufficient for liability under the trafficking statute. The phrase "accessible to another user on an electronic platform" includes peer-to-peer sharing sites and web sites where it may be difficult to determine site views or membership or whether the image was actually displayed or distributed. It is sufficient that only one other user has access to the image. The term "user" excludes network administrators and others that are not also users of the electronic platform. Unlike subparagraphs (a)(1)(A) and (a)(1)(B), subparagraph (a)(1)(D) applies to any image, including images derived from sources other than live conduct, such as a screenshot of a pre-existing video of the complainant, or a composite image of the complainant.[18] or submitting to the creation of an image. The lower culpable mental state is warranted because these responsible individuals are likely violating their duty of care to the complainant by giving effective consent. These responsible individuals may still claim that they are not violating their duty of care under the general special responsibility defenses in RCC § 22E-408.

[15] RCC § 22E-701 defines a "live broadcast" as "a streaming video, or any other electronically transmitted image for simultaneous viewing by one or more people." Thus, transmitting a live broadcast is sufficient for distribution of those images if the other requirements of the revised trafficking offense are met. If the individual that transmits a live broadcast is the same individual that is directing the live sexual conduct being broadcast, the individual could also have liability for directing or creating a live sexual performance under the RCC arranging a live sexual performance of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1809), which has the same penalties as the revised trafficking offense. However, due to the RCC merger provision in RCC § 22E-214, the actor cannot have liability for both trafficking and arranging the same live performance.

[16] A composite image of the complainant is comprised of sources other than recording, photographing, or filming live conduct, including sources such as: 1) pre-existing images or videos of the complainant; 2) images or videos of other individuals, regardless of whether they are adults or minors; and 3) computer-generated graphics or images, including graphics or images of "fake" minors.

[17] For example, accidentally uploading the wrong file.

[18] A composite image of the complainant is comprised of sources other than recording, photographing, or filming live conduct, including sources such as: 1) pre-existing images or videos of the complainant; 2)

For subparagraph (a)(1)(E), the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she sells or advertises an image. "Advertise" is not limited to commercial settings and includes promoting or drawing attention to an image without any expectation of financial gain. Unlike subparagraphs (a)(1)(A) and (a)(1)(B), subparagraph (a)(1)(E) applies to any image, including images derived from sources other than live conduct, such as a screenshot of a pre-existing video of the complainant, or a composite image of the complainant.[19]

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies additional requirements for the image. First, the image must depict, or will depict, in part or whole, the body of a real complainant under the age of 18 years. "Body" includes the face, as well as other parts of the body of a real complainant under the age of 18 years. Any depiction of a part of the complainant's body is sufficient. The complainant must be a real minor, but there is no requirement that the government prove the identity of the minor. Second, the image must depict, or will depict, the complainant engaging in or submitting to specific types of sexual conduct: 1) an actual "sexual act," actual "sadomasochistic abuse," or actual masturbation; 2) a "simulated" "sexual act," "simulated" "sadomasochistic abuse," or "simulated" masturbation; or 3) a sexual or sexualized display of the genitals, pubic area,[20] or anus, when there is less than a full opaque covering.[21] The terms "simulated," "sexual act" and "sadomasochistic abuse" are defined in RCC § 22E-701. There is no obscenity requirement for any of the prohibited sexual conduct in subparagraphs (a)(2)(A) through (a)(2)(D).

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies that the culpable mental state for the requirements in paragraph (a)(2) is "reckless." "Reckless" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor is aware of a substantial risk that the image depicts, or will depict, in part or whole, the body of a real complainant under the age of 18 years of age. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "reckless" culpable mental state also applies to the prohibited sexual conduct in subparagraphs (a)(2)(A) through (a)(2)(D). The actor must be aware of a substantial risk that the conduct that is depicted or will be depicted in the image is one of the types prohibited in subparagraphs (a)(2)(A) through (a)(2)(D), such as an actual sexual act or a prohibited sexualized display.

Subsection (b) specifies the prohibited conduct for second degree creating or trafficking an obscene image of a minor. Paragraph (b)(1), subparagraphs (b)(1)(A), (b)(1)(B), (b)(1)(C), (b)(1)(D), and (b)(1)(E), and paragraph (b)(2) have the same images or videos of other individuals, regardless of whether they are adults or minors; and 3) computer-generated graphics or images, including graphics or images of "fake" minors.

[19] A composite image of the complainant is comprised of sources other than recording, photographing, or filming live conduct, including sources such as: 1) pre-existing images or videos of the complainant; 2) images or videos of other individuals, regardless of whether they are adults or minors; and 3) computer-generated graphics or images, including graphics or images of "fake" minors.

[20] Reference to "pubic area" is intended to include liability for a frontal nude image of a minor where the groin is visible but not the external genitalia.

[21] If the genitals, pubic area, or anus of the minor have a full opaque covering, or will have a full opaque covering, there is no liability under first degree trafficking an obscene image. However, if the image depicts, or will depict, a minor engaging in a "sexual contact" that is also "obscene," there is liability under second degree of the revised trafficking an obscene image statute. The RCC definition of "sexual contact" prohibits the touching of genitalia, anus, groin, breast, inner thigh, or buttocks, whether clothed or unclothed (RCC § 22E-701).

requirements as paragraph (a)(1), subparagraphs (a)(1)(A), (a)(1)(B), (a)(1)(C), (a)(1)(D), and (a)(1)(E), and paragraph (a)(2) in first degree creating or trafficking an obscene image of a minor. However, the types of prohibited sexual conduct are different in second degree creating or trafficking an obscene image. Subparagraph (b)(2)(A) prohibits an "obscene" "sexual contact," and subparagraph (b)(2)(B) prohibits an "obscene" sexual or sexualized display of any breast below the top of the areola, or the buttocks, when there is less than a full opaque covering.[22] The terms "obscene" and "sexual contact" are defined in RCC § 22E-701. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "reckless" culpable mental state in paragraph (a)(2) applies to the prohibited sexual conduct and the actor must consciously disregard a substantial risk that the conduct is an "obscene sexual contact" or a specified "obscene" sexual display.

Subsection (c) establishes two exclusions from liability for the RCC trafficking an obscene image offense. Paragraph (c)(1) provides that the statute does not apply to any person that is a licensee[23] under the Communications Act of 1934, such as a radio, television, or phone service provider. Paragraph (c)(1) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element, here the fact that the actor is a specified licensee. Paragraph (c)(2) provides that the statute does not apply to any person that is an interactive computer service as defined in 47 U.S.C. § 230(f)(2).[24] Paragraph (c)(2) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element, here the fact that the actor is a specified interactive computer service.

Subsection (d) establishes several affirmative defenses for the RCC creating or trafficking an obscene image statute. The general provision in RCC § 22E-201 establishes the burdens of proof and production for all affirmative defenses in the RCC.

Paragraph (d)(1) establishes an affirmative defense to subsection (a) of the revised statute that the image has, or will have, serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value, when considered as a whole. This language matches one of the requirements for obscenity in Miller v. California,[25] but makes it an affirmative defense. The prohibited sexual conduct in subparagraphs (a)(2)(A) through (a)(2)(D), when it involves real complainants under the age of 18 years, is not subject to the First Amendment requirements set out in Miller v. California.[26] However, the affirmative defense recognizes that there may be rare situations where images of such conduct warrant First Amendment protection. Paragraph (d)(1) specifies "in fact." "In fact" is a defined term

[22] If the specified part of the breast or the buttocks has a full opaque covering, and the image does not depict or will not depict an "obscene sexual contact" as prohibited by subparagraph (b)(2)(B), there is no liability under second degree trafficking an obscene image. However, there may be liability for causing the minor to engage in the underlying sexual conduct in the RCC sexually suggestive conduct with a minor offense (RCC § 22E-1304).

[23] The term "licensee" is defined in paragraph (c)(2) to have the same meaning specified in 47 U.S.C. § 153(30).

[24] The term "interactive computer service" means any information service, system, or access software provider that provides or enables computer access by multiple users to a computer server, including specifically a service or system that provides access to the Internet and such systems operated or services offered by libraries or educational institutions.

[25] Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15, 24 (1973) ("A state [obscenity] offense must also be limited to works which . . . taken as a whole, do not have serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value.").

in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element, here the fact that the image has, or will have, serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value when considered as a whole.

Paragraph (d)(2) establishes an affirmative defense for an actor that is under the age of 18 years. Per paragraph (d)(2), the affirmative defense applies to subparagraphs (a)(1)(A), (a)(1)(B), (a)(1)(C), (a)(1)(D), (b)(1)(A), (b)(1)(B), (b)(1)(C), and (b)(1)(D) of the offense— all prohibited conduct in the offense except selling or advertising an image in subparagraphs (a)(1)(E) and (b)(1)(E). Paragraph (d)(2) specifies "in fact." "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, "in fact" applies to every element that follows unless a culpable mental state is specified. Here, the "in fact" specified in paragraph (d)(2) applies to subparagraphs (d)(2)(A) and (d)(2)(B) and sub-subparagraphs (d)(2)(B)(i) and (d)(2)(B)(ii) and there is no culpable mental state requirement for any of these elements. Subparagraph (d)(2)(A) requires that the actor is under the age of 18 years. There are two alternative requirements for the affirmative defense under subparagraph (d)(2)(B). Sub-subparagraph (d)(2)(B)(i) requires that the actor is the only person under the age of 18 years who is, or who will be, depicted in the image. In the alternative, sub-subparagraph (d)(2)(B)(ii) applies if there are multiple people under the age of 18 years who are, or who will be, depicted in the image. Under sub-subparagraph (d)(2)(B)(ii), the actor must reasonably believe[27] that every person under 18 years of age who is, or who will be, depicted in the image gives "effective consent" to the actor to engage in the conduct that constitutes the offense. The "in fact" specified in paragraph (d)(2) applies to sub-subparagraph (d)(2)(B)(ii) and no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to sub-subparagraph (d)(2)(B)(ii). However, sub-subparagraph (d)(2)(B)(ii) still requires that the actor subjectively believe that every person under 18 years of age who is, or who will be, depicted in the image gives "effective consent" to the actor to engage in the conduct that constitutes the offense, and that belief must be reasonable. Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[28] "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception."

Paragraph (d)(3) establishes an affirmative defense if the actor and the complainant are in a marriage, domestic partnership, or dating relationship. Per paragraph (d)(3), the affirmative defense applies to subparagraphs (a)(1)(A), (a)(1)(C), (a)(1)(D), (b)(1)(A), (b)(1)(C), and (b)(1)(D)) of the offense—all prohibited conduct in the offense except a person responsible for the complainant under civil law giving effective consent (subparagraphs (a)(1)(B) and (b)(1)(B)) and selling or advertising an image (subparagraphs (a)(1)(E) and (b)(1)(E)). Paragraph (d)(3) specifies "in fact." "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, "in fact" applies to every element that follows unless a culpable mental state is specified. Here, the "in fact" specified in paragraph (d)(3) applies to the remaining elements of the defense under subparagraphs (d)(3)(A) through (d)(3)(E) and there is no culpable mental state requirement for any of these elements.

[27] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist.

[28] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

There are several requirements to the affirmative defense under paragraph (d)(3). First, per subparagraph (d)(3)(A), the affirmative defense only applies if the actor is at least 18 years of age. An actor that is under the age of 18 years has the broader affirmative defense under paragraph (d)(2) that applies to any actor under the age of 18 years, regardless of the actor's relationship to the complainant. Under sub-subparagraphs (d)(3)(B)(i) and (d)(3)(B)(ii), the actor must either be married to, or in a domestic partnership with, the complainant, or be in a "romantic, dating, or sexual relationship" with the complainant (sub-subparagraph (d)(3)(B)(ii)). "Domestic partnership" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 and the reference to a "romantic, dating, or sexual relationship" is identical to the language in the District's current definition of "intimate partner violence"[29] and is intended to have the same meaning. There are additional requirements if the actor is in a "romantic, dating, or sexual relationship" with the complainant under sub-subparagraph (d)(3)(B)(ii). When the complainant is under 16 years of age, the actor must be less than four years older (sub-sub-subparagraph (d)(3)(B)(ii)(I)), and when the complainant is under 18 years of age and the actor is at least four years older, the actor must not be in a "position of trust with or authority over" the complainant (sub-sub-subparagraph (d)(3)(B)(ii)(II)). "Position of trust with or authority over" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701. The requirements in sub-sub-subparagraphs (d)(3)(B)(ii)(I) and (d)(3)(B)(ii)(II) mirror the requirements for liability in the RCC sexual abuse of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1302).

Second, per subparagraph (d)(3)(C), the complainant must be the only person who is depicted, or who will be depicted, in the image, or the actor and the complainant must be the only persons who are depicted, or who will be depicted in the image. The marriage or romantic partner defense is not available when the image shows, or will show, third persons. Third, per subparagraph (d)(3)(D), the actor must "reasonably believe"[30] that the complainant gives "effective consent" to the actor to engage in the conduct that constitutes the offense. "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception." Finally, for display, distribution, manufacturing with intent to distribute, or an electronic platform, subparagraph (d)(3)(E) requires that the actor "reasonably believe"[31] that the recipient, the planned recipient, or the user of the electronic platform is the complainant.

[29] D.C. Code § 16-1001(7) ("'Intimate partner violence' means an act punishable as a criminal offense that is committed or threatened to be committed by an offender upon a person: (A) To whom the offender is or was married; (B) With whom the offender is or was in a domestic partnership; or (C) With whom the offender is or was in a romantic, dating, or sexual relationship.").

[30] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist. As was stated earlier, the "in fact" specified in paragraph (d)(3) applies to subparagraph (d)(3)(D) and no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to subparagraph (d)(3)(D). However, subparagraph (d)(3)(D) still requires that the actor subjectively believe that the complainant gives "effective consent" to the actor to engage in the conduct that constitutes the

Paragraph (d)(4) establishes an affirmative defense for the innocent display or distribution of a prohibited image in certain socially beneficial situations. Per paragraph (d)(4), the defense applies to the display or distribution of an image under subparagraphs (a)(1)(C) and (b)(1)(C) of the offense. Subparagraph (d)(4)(A) requires that the actor must have the intent "exclusively and in good faith, to report possible illegal conduct or seek legal counsel from any attorney."[32] Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that the defendant successfully reported illegal conduct or sought legal counsel, only that the defendant believed to a practical certainty that he or she would do so. Subparagraph (d)(4)(B) specifies "in fact." "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, "in fact" applies to every element that follows unless a culpable mental state is specified. Here, "in fact" applies to subparagraphs (d)(4)(B) and sub-subparagraphs (d)(4)(B)(i) and (d)(4)(B)(ii) and there is no culpable mental state requirement for any of the elements in these subparagraphs and sub-subparagraphs. Subparagraph (d)(4)(B) requires that the actor display or distribute the image to a person the actor reasonably believes[33] is a person specified in sub-subparagraphs (d)(4)(B)(i) and (d)(4)(B)(ii), such as a law enforcement officer or a person responsible under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant that the actor reasonably believes is depicted in the image or involved in the creation of the image.

However, subparagraph (d)(3)(E) still requires that the actor subjectively believe that the complainant is the recipient, the planned recipient, or user of the electronic platform, and that belief must be reasonable. Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others. See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). [32] In addition to criminal defense advice, legal advice can include civil proceedings such as custody and abuse and neglect.

Paragraph (d)(5) establishes an affirmative defense for employees of a school, museum, library, movie theater, or other venue. "Movie theater" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701. The affirmative defense applies to subparagraphs (a)(1)(C), (a)(1)(D), (a)(1)(E), (b)(1)(C), (b)(1)(D), and (b)(1)(E).[34] Paragraph (d)(5) specifies "in fact." Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, "in fact" applies to every element that follows unless a culpable mental state is specified. Here, "in fact" applies to subparagraphs (d)(5)(A), (d)(5)(B), and (d)(5)(C) and there is no culpable mental state requirement for any of the elements in these subparagraphs. The employee must be acting in the reasonable scope of his or her employment and have no control over the creation or selection of the image. The defense is intended to shield from liability individuals who otherwise meet the elements of the offense, but only because it was part of the ordinary course of employment.

Subsection (e) specifies relevant penalties for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

[33] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist. As was stated earlier, the "in fact" specified in subparagraph (d)(4)(B) applies to sub-subparagraphs (d)(4)(B)(i) and (d)(4)(B)(ii) and no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to these sub-subparagraphs. However, the actor must subjectively believe that the person is one of the specified individuals in sub-subparagraphs (d)(4)(B)(i) and (d)(4)(B)(ii), and that belief must be reasonable. Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others. See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts.

[34] This defense does not apply to creating images derived from recording, photographing, or filming live sexual conduct (subparagraphs (a)(1)(A), and (b)(1)(A)) because such actions create child pornography directly from the sexual abuse of minors (as compared to creating a composite image from pre-existing photographs). However, there may be a separate defense for first degree creating or trafficking an obscene image for images that have serious artistic or other value (subsection (d)(1)), or an argument that the images are not "obscene" as required for second degree.

This defense also does not apply to individuals that are responsible for the complainant under civil law and give effective consent for the complainant to engage in the creation of an image derived from live sexual conduct (subparagraphs (a)(1)(B) and (b)(1)(B)) because these individuals are likely violating their duty of care to the complainant. These individuals can still argue that they are not violating their duty of care under the general special responsibility defenses in RCC § 22E-408.

Subsection (f) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC and the federal code.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised creating or trafficking an obscene image of a minor statute clearly changes current District law in twelve main ways.

First, the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute punishes creating, displaying, distributing, selling, or advertising a prohibited image more severely than possessing a prohibited image. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute has the same penalties for creating, displaying, distributing, selling, advertising, and possessing a prohibited image,[35] even though creating and distributing are direct forms of child abuse[36] and selling and advertising are "an integral part" of the market.[37] In contrast, the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute penalizes creating,[38] displaying, distributing, selling, or advertising a prohibited image more severely than possessing a prohibited image in the revised possession statute (RCC § 22E-1808). Having the same penalties for this wide spectrum of conduct is disproportionate and inconsistent with the penalty scheme in other current District offenses.[39] The revised creating or trafficking statute also prohibits in subparagraphs (a)(1)(D) and (b)(1)(D) making an image accessible to another user on an electronic platform because this kind of electronic access can be as harmful as actual distribution.

Code §§ 22-3102(a)(1), (a)(2), (b) (prohibiting "employs, authorizes, or induces a person under 18 years of age to engage in a sexual performance," "being the parent, legal guardian, or custodian of a minor, he or she consents to the participation by a minor in a sexual performance," "produces, directs, or promotes" any sexual performance, and "attend, transmit, or possess" any sexual performance), 22-3104 (punishing a first violation "of this chapter" with a maximum term of imprisonment of 10 years and a second or subsequent offense with a maximum term of imprisonment of 20 years).

[36] See, e.g., New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747, 758, (1982) ("The legislative judgment, as well as the judgment found in the relevant literature, is that the use of children as subjects of pornographic materials is harmful to the physiological, emotional, and mental health of the child."); id. at 759 ("The distribution of photographs and films depicting sexual activity by juveniles is intrinsically related to the sexual abuse of children in at least two ways. First, the materials produced are a permanent record of the children's participation and the harm to the child is exacerbated by their circulation. Second, the distribution network for child pornography must be closed if the production of material which requires the sexual exploitation of children is to be effectively controlled.").

[37] Ferber, 458 U.S. at 761 ("The advertising and selling of child pornography provide an economic motive for and are thus an integral part of the production of such materials, an activity illegal throughout the Nation.").

[38] The revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute prohibits two ways of creating an image. First, subparagraphs (a)(1)(A) and (b)(1)(A) prohibit creating an image by filming, recording, or photographing the complainant engaging in live sexual conduct. Second, subparagraphs (a)(1)(D) and (b)(1)(D) prohibit manufacturing "with intent to distribute" an image. This is not limited to recording live conduct, and includes taking a screenshot of a pre-existing image or video and making a composite image, whether from "real" images, computer-generated images, or a combination of both, as long as there is the intent to distribute.

[39] See, e.g., D.C. Code §§ 22-3231 and 22-3232 (trafficking in stolen property offense with a maximum term of imprisonment of 10 years and receiving stolen property offense with a maximum term of imprisonment of either seven years or 180 days, depending on the value of the property); 48-904.01(a)(1), (a)(2), (d)(1), (d)(2) (penalizing the manufacture, distribution, or possession with intent to manufacture or distribute a controlled substance with a maximum term of imprisonment of 30 years, 5 years, 3 years, or 1 year, depending on the type of controlled substance, but penalizing the possession of any drug other than liquid PCP with a maximum term of imprisonment of 180 days).

As part of this revision, the revised statute no longer uses the current D.C. Code statute's defined term "promote" and splits the conduct referred to in that definition between the revised trafficking an obscene image and possession of an obscene image offenses.[40] This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense.

Second, the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute grades penalties based upon the type of sexual conduct depicted in the image. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute prohibits images of "sexual conduct,"[41] a defined term including both penetration and lewd exhibition, with no distinction in penalty between the different types of sexual conduct. In contrast, the RCC creating or trafficking an obscene image statute reserves the first degree gradation for actual or simulated sexual acts, sadomasochistic abuse, or masturbation, as well as sexual displays of the genitals, pubic area, or anus, when there is less than a full opaque covering. Second degree of the revised trafficking an obscene image statute is limited to an "obscene," as defined in RCC § 22E-701, sexual contact or sexualized display of the breast below the top of the areola or the buttocks, when there is less than a full opaque covering. Having the same penalties for different types of sexual conduct is disproportionate and inconsistent with the penalty scheme in current District sex [40] The current statute prohibits "promot[ing]" any sexual performance of a minor and defines "promote" as "to procure, manufacture, issue, sell, give, provide, lend, mail, deliver, transfer, transmute, publish or distribute, circulate, disseminate, present, exhibit, or advertise, or to offer or agree to do the same." D.C. Code § 22-3102(a)(2), 22-3101(4). There is no DCCA case law on the scope of this definition. As is discussed in the commentary, the revised trafficking an obscene image statute retains "distribute," "sell," and "advertise." In addition, the revised trafficking statute prohibits "present" and "exhibit" in the prohibitions on display and electronic platforms in subparagraphs (a)(1)(C), (b)(1)(C), (a)(1)(D), (b)(1)(D). However, instead of "manufacture" and "transmute," the revised statute requires manufacturing with intent to distribute (subparagraphs (a)(1)(C) and (b)(1)(C)). Manufacturing or transmuting images, without more, is characterized as possession, and is criminalized by the less serious possession of an obscene image statute (RCC § 22E-1808). The remaining possessory aspect of the current definition, "procure," is criminalized in the less serious RCC possession of an obscene image offense.

"Offer or agree to do the same" is deleted from the current definition of "promote" because inchoate liability, such as attempt and conspiracy, provides more consistent and proportional punishment for this conduct. For example, under the current statute, a defendant that "offers" to "direct" and film a live sexual performance could be charged with attempted sexual performance of a minor, which, for a first offense, would have a maximum term of imprisonment of 180 days. D.C. Code §§ 22-1803; 22-3102(a)(2) (prohibiting "direct[ing]" a sexual performance of a minor); 22-3103(1). However, if this conduct were charged under the current definition of "promote" as offering to "manufacture" a film of a sexual performance, the defendant would face a maximum term of imprisonment of 10 years. D.C. Code §§ 22-3102(a)(2); 22-3103(1). In the RCC, the defendant would be charged with attempted trafficking of an obscene image (RCC § 22E-1807 (offers to "record[], photograph[], or film[]" the complainant).
The remainder of the current definition is deleted as redundant with distribution (issue, give, provide, lend, mail, deliver, transfer, publish, circulate, disseminate).

[41] D.C. Code §§ 22-3102(a)(1), (a)(2), (b) (prohibiting a "sexual performance" or a "performance which includes sexual conduct by a person under 18 years of age."), 22-3101(5), (6) (defining "sexual performance" as "any performance or part thereof which includes sexual conduct by a person under 18 years of age," and "sexual conduct" as "(A) Actual or simulated sexual intercourse: (i) Between the penis and the vulva, anus, or mouth; (ii) Between the mouth and the vulva or anus; or (iii) Between an artificial sexual organ or other object or instrument used in the manner of an artificial sexual organ and the anus or vulva; (B) Masturbation; (C) Sexual bestiality; (D) Sadomasochistic sexual activity for the purpose of sexual stimulation; or (E) Lewd exhibition of the genitals.").

offenses.[42] This change improves the consistency, proportionality, and constitutionality of the revised statute.

Third, the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute expands the prohibited sexual conduct to include "simulated" sadomasochistic abuse, "simulated" masturbation, and an obscene "sexual contact." The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute prohibits actual masturbation and sadomasochistic abuse,[43] but does not extend to "simulated" masturbation or sadomasochistic abuse, or to sexual touching beyond that required for masturbation or a "lewd exhibition of the genitals." The creation, distribution, or possession of images of minors engaging in "simulated" sadomasochistic abuse, "simulated" masturbation, and obscene "sexual contact" may be criminalized in the current D.C. Code obscenity statute.[44] The current D.C. Code obscenity statute is penalized as a misdemeanor for a first offense,[45] with no enhancements for the obscene materials depicting a minor.[46] In contrast, first degree of the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute includes "simulated" masturbation and "simulated" sadomasochistic abuse, and second degree includes an obscene "sexual contact." "Simulated," "obscene," and "sexual contact" are defined in RCC § 22E-701, consistent with other RCC offenses. As defined, such sexual conduct may be as graphic[47] as other conduct penalized by the current D.C. Code statute, such as "simulated" sexual penetration, as well as sexual contact involved in masturbation and a [42] The District's current sex offenses generally penalize a "sexual act," which requires penetration, more severely than "sexual contact." D.C. Code §§ 22-3001(8), (9), 22-3002 through 22-3005, 22-3008 through 22-3009.04, 22-3013 through 22-3016.

[43] D.C. Code § 22-3101(5) (defining "sexual conduct" as "(A) Actual or simulated sexual intercourse: (i) Between the penis and the vulva, anus, or mouth; (ii) Between the mouth and the vulva or anus; or (iii) Between an artificial sexual organ or other object or instrument used in the manner of an artificial sexual organ and the anus or vulva; (B) Masturbation; (C) Sexual bestiality; (D) Sadomasochistic sexual activity for the purpose of sexual stimulation; or (E) Lewd exhibition of the genitals.").

[44] The current obscenity statute, D.C. Code § 22-2201, generally criminalizes the creation, distribution, and possession of "obscene, indecent, or filthy" images without further specification of the relevant conduct. The current obscenity statute does not define the terms "obscene," "indecent," or "filthy," but the DCCA has stated that they must meet the standard for obscenity in Miller v. California. See Retzer v. United States, 363 A.2d 307, 309 (D.C. 1976) (stating that Miller made it clear that any vagueness defects in the statute's terminology may be cured by judicial construction).

[45] D.C. Code § 22-2201(e) ("A person convicted of violating subsection (a) or (b) of this section shall for the 1st offense be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not more than 180 days, or both. A person convicted of a 2nd or subsequent offense under subsection (a) or (b) of this section shall be fined not less than $1,000 and not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not less than 6 months or more than 3 years, or both.").

[46] Obscenity is not a "crime of violence," so there is no penalty enhancement for a minor victim under D.C. Code § 22–3611.

[47] Examples of "simulated" sadomasochistic abuse, "simulated" masturbation, and an obscene "sexual contact" that are not covered by the current sexual performance of a minor statute but would be covered under the revised trafficking an obscene image of a minor statute include: 1) an adult dressed in a sexual leather outfit wielding an actual whip towards a crying 9 year old, but, due to the camera angle, it is impossible to see if the whip is actually making contact; 2) A 12 year old sitting provocatively, legs spread, naked except for underwear, making rubbing gestures around his or her genitalia that suggest masturbation, but it is impossible to tell if there is actual contact with the genitalia; and 3) A prepubescent girl wearing skimpy lingerie or a sexual leather outfit that fully covers her breasts, but she is rubbing them and making suggestive facial expressions.

"lewd exhibition of the genitals."[48] Criminalization of this conduct is within the bounds of Supreme Court First Amendment case law.[49] This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute.

Fourth, the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute expands the prohibited sexual conduct to include a sexual display of the "pubic area or anus, when there is less than a full opaque covering" and an "obscene sexual or sexualized display of the breast below the top of the areola, or the buttocks, when there is less than a full opaque covering." The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute is limited to a "lewd exhibition of the genitals." However, the creation, distribution, or possession of images of minors engaging in a sexual display of the "pubic area or anus, when there is less than a full opaque covering" and an "obscene sexual or sexualized display of the breast below the top of the areola, or the buttocks, when there is less than a full opaque covering" may be criminalized in the current D.C. Code obscenity statute.[50] The current D.C. Code obscenity statute is punished as a misdemeanor for a first offense,[51] with no enhancements for the obscene materials depicting a minor.[52] In contrast, the RCC revised creating or trafficking an obscene image of a minor statute criminalizes the creation and distribution of certain depictions of the pubic area[53] and anus in first degree, and an "obscene sexual or sexualized display of the breast below the top of the areola, or the buttocks" in second degree.[54] As defined, display of the pubic

[48] See D.C. Code § 22-3101(5) (defining "sexual conduct.").

[49] In United States v. Williams, the Court held that a child pornography statute that defined "sexually explicit conduct" to include simulated masturbation and simulated sadistic or masochistic abuse was not overbroad. United States v. Williams, 553 U.S. 285, 288, 290, 307 (2008). The obscenity requirement for "obscene sexual contact" ensures that this provision is constitutional. See Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234, 250, 251 (2002) (stating that Ferber "reaffirmed that where the speech is neither obscene nor the product of sexual abuse, it does not fall outside the protection of the First Amendment.").

[50] The current obscenity statute, D.C. Code § 22-2201 generally criminalizes the creation, distribution, and possession of "obscene, indecent, or filthy" images without further specification of the relevant conduct. The current obscenity statute does not define the terms "obscene," "indecent," or "filthy," but the DCCA has stated that they must meet the standard for obscenity in Miller v. California. See Retzer v. United States, 363 A.2d 307, 309 (D.C. 1976) (stating that Miller made it clear that any vagueness defects in the statute's terminology may be cured by judicial construction).

[51] D.C. Code § 22-2201(e) ("A person convicted of violating subsection (a) or (b) of this section shall for the 1st offense be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not more than 180 days, or both. A person convicted of a 2nd or subsequent offense under subsection (a) or (b) of this section shall be fined not less than $1,000 and not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not less than 6 months or more than 3 years, or both.").

[52] Obscenity is not a "crime of violence," so there is no penalty enhancement for a minor victim under D.C. Code § 22–3611.

[53] Reference to "pubic area" is intended to include liability for a frontal nude image of a minor where the groin is visible but not the external genitalia.

[54] There is no obscenity requirement for the prohibited sexual displays of the pubic area or anus in first degree because the harm inflicted on the complainant in creating or distributing these images is sufficient under the First Amendment. Conversely, there is an obscenity requirement for the prohibited sexual display of the breast or buttocks in second degree because the conduct otherwise may not be sufficiently graphic to survive constitutional scrutiny. In New York v. Ferber, the Supreme Court established that live or visual sexual depictions of real children do not have to be "obscene" and are not entitled to First Amendment protection. Specifically, the Court held that a New York statute did not violate the First Amendment when the statute banned the production and distribution of live or visual depictions of specified sexual conduct with minors and had a mental state requirement for the defendant. New York v.

area or anus is as graphic as other conduct penalized by the current statute, such as a "lewd exhibition of the genitals," and obscene images of the breast or buttock of a minor warrant greater punishment than other forms of obscene materials concerning adults. The RCC criminalizes obscene displays of any breast, as opposed to only the female breast, to recognize that the display of a male breast may be sexualized to the point of being obscene under a Miller standard and, if that occurs, more severe punishment than other forms of obscene materials concerning adults is warranted. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute.

Fifth, the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute expands the current exception to liability for conduct by persons under 18 years of age and makes it an affirmative defense. In the current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute, minors that are depicted in prohibited images are not liable for possessing or distributing those images if the minor is the only minor depicted,[55] or, if there are multiple minors depicted, all of the minors consent.[56] A minor that is not depicted,[57] or an adult that is not more than four years older than the minor or minors depicted,[58] is not liable for Ferber, 458 U.S. 747, 764-66 (1982). The Supreme Court has not established bright line rules for what sexual conduct involving children, without an obscenity requirement, satisfies the First Amendment. However, in Ferber, the Court noted that the prohibited sexual conduct at issue "represent[s] the kind of conduct that, if it were the theme of a work, could render it legally obscene: actual or simulated sexual intercourse, deviate sexual intercourse, sexual bestiality, masturbation, sado-masochistic abuse, or lewd exhibition of the genitals." In United States v. Williams, the Court held that the child pornography statute at issue was not overbroad. United States v. Williams, 553 U.S. 285, 288, 307 (2008). In Williams, the federal statute at issue defined "sexually explicit conduct" as "actual or simulated—(i) sexual intercourse, including genital-genital, oral-genital, anal-genital, or oral-anal, whether between persons of the same or opposite sex; (ii) bestiality; (iii) masturbation; (iv) sadistic or masochistic abuse; or (v) lascivious exhibition of the genitals or pubic area of any person." Id. at 290. First degree of the RCC trafficking an obscene statute prohibits the same conduct as the statute in Williams with two exceptions: 1) It includes a sexualized display of the anus and for all sexualized displays in first degree, explicitly requires less than a full opaque covering; and 2) It does not extend "simulated" to a sexual or sexualized display. These are not significant differences. In sum, first degree of the RCC trafficking an obscene image statute prohibits sexual conduct that is graphic enough without an obscenity requirement. Second degree of the revised trafficking an obscene image statute prohibits conduct that is generally less graphic than the conduct in Ferber and Williams. However, the obscenity requirement ensures that the provision is constitutional. See Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234, 250, 251 (2002) (stating that Ferber "reaffirmed that where the speech is neither obscene nor the product of sexual abuse, it does not fall outside the protection of the First Amendment.") possessing an image that he or she receives from a depicted minor, unless he or she knows that at least one of the depicted minors did not consent. The current exclusion does not consistently require a "knowingly" culpable mental state as to a depicted minor's lack of consent,[59] and minors are still liable under the current statute for creating images of themselves or other minors[60] or engaging in sexual conduct.[61] There is no DCCA case law interpreting the current exclusion. In contrast, the revised trafficking an obscene image statute excludes from liability all persons under the age of 18 years,[62] applies to all images,[63] and applies to all prohibited conduct, except selling or advertising images (subparagraphs (a)(1)(E) and (b)(1)(E)). Legal scholarship has noted the inconsistencies and possible constitutional issues in statutes that criminalize minors producing images of otherwise legal sexual encounters.[64] The only requirements of the

Code § 22-3102(c)(1) ("If the sexual performance consists solely of a still or motion picture, then this section: (1) Shall not apply to the minor . . . depicted in a still or motion picture who possess it or transmit it to another person unless at least one of the minors depicted in it does not consent to its possession or transmission.").

(2) Shall not apply to possession of a still or motion picture by . . . an adult not more than 4 years older than the minor or minors depicted in it, who receives it from a minor depicted in it unless the recipient knows that at least one of the minors depicted in the still or motion picture did not consent to its transmission.").

[59] D.C. Code § 22-3102(c)(1) ("unless at least one of the minors depicted in it does not consent to its possession or transmission."), (c)(2) ("unless the recipient knows that at least one of the minors depicted in the still or motion picture did not consent to its transmission.").

[60] A minor that creates a prohibited image of himself or herself or of other minors has "produce[d], direct[ed], or promote[d]" a "performance which includes sexual conduct by a person under 18 years of age." D.C. Code §§ 22-3102(a)(2); 22-3101(4) (defining "promote," in part, as "to manufacture . . . transmute.").

[61] The current definition of "performance" extends to live conduct. D.C. Code § 22-3101(3) ("'Performance' means any play, motion picture, photograph, electronic representation, dance, or any other visual presentation or exhibition."). Thus, under a plain language reading, when a minor engages in "sexual conduct" with themselves, another minor, or an adult, they are "produc[ing], direct[ing], or promot[ing]" a "performance that includes sexual conduct by a person under 18 years of age" or "attend[ing]" a sexual performance by a minor. D.C. Code §§ 22-3102(a)(2), (b); 22-3101(4) (defining "promote," in part, as "to present [or] exhibit.").

[62] The revised creating or trafficking statute excludes from liability minors that have a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant. These minors would otherwise have liability under subparagraphs (a)(1)(B) and (b)(1)(B) for giving effective consent for another minor to engage in or submit to the recording, photographing, or filming of a non-derivative image. This exclusion ensures that the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute is reserved for predatory adults. However, such a minor may still have liability under the RCC criminal abuse and criminal neglect of a minor statutes (RCC §§ 22E-1501 and 22E-1502) and the RCC sex offenses. In addition, the revised exclusion only applies if the minor that is under the care of the responsible minor gives effective consent to the actions of the responsible minor.

[63] The current exclusion applies only to a "still or motion picture," but there is no substantive difference between the definition of "still or motion picture" and the RCC definition of "image." Compare D.C. Code § 22-3102(d)(2) (defining "still or motion picture" as "includ[ing] a photograph, motion picture, electronic or digital representation, video, or other visual depiction, however produced or reproduced.") with RCC § 22E-701 (defining "image" as a "a visual depiction, other than a depiction rendered by hand, including a video, film, photograph, or hologram whether in print, electronic, magnetic, or digital format."). The revised trafficking an obscene image statute deletes the current definition of "still or motion picture."

[64] See, e.g., Sarah Wastler, The Harm in "Sexting"?: Analyzing the Constitutionality of Child Pornography Statutes That Prohibit the Voluntary Production, Possession, and Dissemination of Sexually Explicit Images by Teenagers, 33 HARV. J. L. & GENDER 687, 688 (2010) ("These cases not only give rise to a contentious debate regarding the appropriate methods of prevention and response to adolescents who voluntarily produce and disseminate sexually explicit images of themselves, but also raise serious questions regarding the constitutionality of prosecuting such juveniles under existing child pornography

Per the revised statute, a minor still may be liable for selling or advertising images, even of himself or herself,[67] or for distribution or display of an image without the recipient's effective consent.[68] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised offense.

Sixth, the revised trafficking an obscene image statute expands the current affirmative defense for a librarian or motion picture theater employee to include similarly positioned museum, school, and other venue employees. The current D.C. Code statute has an affirmative defense to "produc[ing], direct[ing], or promot[ing]" any sexual performance of a minor[69] for a "librarian engaged in the normal course of his or her

To do so would expose minors to the severe stigma and penalties afforded by child pornography laws. It would also cause minors to be branded as registered sex offenders and to incur the onerous legal disabilities and restrictions that were passed with sexual predators in mind, not minors engaged in consensual sex with their peers."); Clay Calvert, Sex, Cell Phones, Privacy, and the First Amendment: When Children Become Child Pornographers and the Lolita Effect Undermines the Law, 18 COMMLAW CONSPECTUS 1, 6 (2009) ("Sexting constitutes a technologically-driven social phenomenon among minors that tests the boundaries of minors' First Amendment speech rights, as well as long-standing laws and judicial opinions that prohibit the manufacture, distribution, and possession of child pornography as a category of speech that, like obscenity, is not protected by the First Amendment.").

[65] If a minor is the only person under the age of 18 years that is depicted, or will be depicted, in the image, it is irrelevant under the exclusion if the image depicts, or will depict, an adult. However, depending on the facts and the specific conduct at issue, the minor may face liability under other RCC offenses, such as voyeurism (RCC § 22E-1802), electronic stalking (RCC § 22E-1803), unlawful disclosure of sexual recordings (RCC § 22E-1804), distribution of an obscene image (RCC § 22E-1805), or sexual assault (RCC § 22E-1301).

[66] If both minors and adults are depicted, or will be depicted, in the image, it is irrelevant under the defense if the adults give effective consent to the conduct. However, depending on the facts and the specific conduct at issue, the minor may face liability under other RCC offenses, such as voyeurism (RCC § 22E-1803), electronic stalking (RCC § 22E-1802), unlawful disclosure of sexual recordings (RCC § 22E-1804), distribution of an obscene image (RCC § 22E-1805), or sexual assault (RCC § 22E-1301).

[67] For example, a sixteen year old who sells images of himself or herself masturbating to an online buyer may be liable under the revised statute. Even if the minor's conduct in such situations appears to be consensual, when a minor sells or advertises sexual images such conduct supports the market for prohibited sexual images.

[68] The RCC distribution of an obscene image statute (RCC § 22E-1805) and RCC distribution of an obscene image to a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1806) prohibit the distribution or display of an image without the recipient's effective consent. The RCC distribution of an obscene image to a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1806) requires that the defendant be at least 18 years of age, but the general distribution of an obscene image statute does not, and applies if the recipient is a minor.

[69] The affirmative defense only applies to "D.C. Code § 22-3102(2)." D.C. Code § 22-3104(b)(1). However, "D.C. Code § 22-3102(2)" is not an accurate citation for the current sexual performance using a minor statute. Given the remainder of the current sexual performance using a minor statute and the additional requirements of this affirmative defense, the correct citation should be "D.C. Code § 22-employment"[70] and certain movie theater employees[71] if the librarian or movie theater employee does not have a financial interest in the sexual performance.[72] There is no DCCA case law interpreting this defense. In contrast, the revised trafficking an obscene image statute expands this affirmative defense to include employees at museums, schools, and other venues who may face similar situations, provided that the conduct is within the reasonable scope of employment and the employee has no control over the creation or selection of the image.[73] For reasons discussed the in explanatory note to this offense, the affirmative defense is limited to the conduct prohibited in subparagraphs (a)(1)(C), (a)(1)(D), (a)(1)(E), (b)(1)(C), (b)(1)(D), and (b)(1)(E). Practically, the expanded defense provides a clearer safe-harbor for these employees but may do little or no work in reducing liability beyond that provided by the revised statute's affirmative defense in paragraph (d)(1) to first degree for images with serious artistic or other value, or, in second degree, the argument that the images are not "obscene." This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Seventh, the revised trafficking an obscene image statute expands the "innocent possession" affirmative defense in the current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute to include conduct involving more images and display or distribution to authorities other than law enforcement, so long as the actor has a socially beneficial intent. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute has an affirmative defense for possessing five or fewer images or one motion picture and requires either that the defendant take reasonable steps to destroy the material or report the material to a law enforcement agency and afford that agency access.[74] There is no DCCA case law interpreting the current defense. In contrast, the RCC affirmative defense is available for the distribution or display of any number of images to any number of recipients, 3102(a)(2)." The organic act for the current sexual performance using a minor statute confirms this interpretation, and the omission of subsection (a) appears to be a codification error.

[71] The specific movie theater employees are a "motion picture projectionist, stage employee or spotlight operator, cashier, doorman, usher, candy stand attendant, porter, or in any other nonmanagerial or nonsupervisory capacity in a motion picture theater." D.C. Code § 22-3104(b)(1)(B).

[72] D.C. Code § 22-3104(b)(2) ("The affirmative defense provided by paragraph (1) of this subsection shall not apply if the person described therein has a financial interest (other than his or her employment, which employment does not encompass compensation based upon any proportion of the gross receipts) in: (A) The promotion of a sexual performance for sale, rental, or exhibition; (B) The direction of any sexual performance; or (C) The acquisition of the performance for sale, retail, or exhibition.").

[73] For example, the defense would not apply to the curator of an art museum who selects prohibited images for an exhibition and otherwise meets the elements of the revised offense. However, the defense would apply to an art museum usher who escorts patrons to the exhibition or sells prints of the prohibited images at the museum gift shop. It should be noted that for first degree of the revised offense, the curator would still be able to argue that the images had serious artistic value under the affirmative defense in paragraph (d)(1) and, in second degree of the revised offense, that the images are not "obscene," as defined in RCC § 22E-701.

[74] D.C. Code § 22-3104(c) ("It shall be an affirmative defense to a charge under § 22-3102 that the defendant: (1) Possessed or accessed less than 6 still photographs or one motion picture, however produced or reproduced, of a sexual performance by a minor; and (2) Promptly and in good faith, and without retaining, copying, or allowing any person, other than a law enforcement agency, to access any photograph or motion picture: (A) Took reasonable steps to destroy each such photograph or motion picture; or (B) Reported the matter to a law enforcement agency and afforded that agency access to each such photograph or motion picture.").

including a law enforcement officer or person with a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant that the actor reasonably believed to be depicted in the image or involved in the depiction when the actor has the intent "exclusively and in good faith, to report possible illegal conduct or seek legal counsel from any attorney." The current affirmative defense unnecessarily restricts the number of images or motion pictures and excludes well-intentioned individuals who seek legal advice or report images to authorities other than law enforcement. The expanded defense recognizes that parents, schools, and others have a vital interest in addressing wrongful creation, distribution, and sale of prohibited images, and good faith sharing of information such authorities should not be a crime.[75] The number of images or motion pictures an individual displays or distributes is not limited, but may be relevant to a fact finders' determination of the actor's intent. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute.

Eighth, the revised trafficking an obscene image statute codifies an affirmative defense for conduct that occurs in the context of marriage, domestic partnership, and other romantic relationships. The current sexual performance of a minor statute does not have a defense for actors that engage in the prohibited conduct with minors to whom they are married or with whom they are in a domestic partnership or romantic relationship. This approach differs from several of the current sexual abuse statutes, which have a marriage or domestic partnership defense that decriminalizes sexual conduct that only involves the defendant and the minor.[76] The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute does have a "sexting" exception that includes an adult not more than four years older than a minor, but it is limited to possessing an image and excludes marriages, domestic partnerships, and romantic relationships with a greater than four year age difference.[77] There is no DCCA case law interpreting the scope of this "sexting" exception. In contrast, the revised trafficking an obscene image statute makes it an affirmative defense that the actor is married to, or in a domestic partnership or "romantic, dating, or sexual relationship" with the complainant, with several additional requirements

[75] For example, if a parent discovers multiple video clips on their child's phone of what appear to be another minor engaging in sexual conduct at the child's school, the parent should be able to send the video to school administrators, the parents of the minor, and/or possibly an attorney for further investigation and resolution without having committed a crime.

[76] D.C. Code § 22-3011(b) ("Marriage or domestic partnership between the defendant and the child or minor at the time of the offense is a defense, which the defendant must establish by a preponderance of the evidence, to a prosecution under §§ 22-3008 to 22-3010.01, prosecuted alone or in conjunction with charges under § 22-3018 or § 22-403, involving only the defendant and the child or minor."). In the current sexual abuse statutes a "child" is a person under the age of 16 years and a "minor" is a person under the age of 18 years. D.C. Code § 22-3001(3), (5A). The marriage and domestic partnership defense applies to the current child sexual abuse statutes (D.C. Code §§ 22-3008 and 22-3009), the sexual abuse of a minor statutes (D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.01 and 22-3009.02), enticing a child or minor (D.C. Code § 22-3010), and misdemeanor sexual abuse of a child or minor (D.C. Code § 22-3010.01). These current sex offenses are based on the ages of the complainant and the defendant, as opposed to whether force, coercion, etc., was present.

[77] D.C. Code § 22-3102(c)(2) ("If the sexual performance consists solely of a still or motion picture, then this section: (2) Shall not apply to possession of a still or motion picture by . . . an adult not more than 4 years older than the minor or minors depicted in it, who receives it from a minor depicted in it unless the recipient knows that at least one of the minors depicted in the still or motion picture did not consent to its transmission.").

The defense only applies to creating an image by recording, photographing, or filming the complainant (subparagraphs (a)(1)(A) and (b)(1)(A)), displaying, distributing, or manufacturing with intent to distribute (subparagraphs (a)(1)(C) and (b)(1)(C)), and placing an image on an electronic platform (subparagraphs (a)(1)(D) and (b)(1)(D)). The prohibited conduct must be limited to the actor and the complainant or just the complainant, and the actor must reasonably believe that the actor has the complainant's effective consent. The "effective consent" requirements are consistent with the consent defense in the revised sexual assault statute (RCC § 22E-1301) and other RCC offenses. Without this defense, the revised trafficking statute would criminalize consensual sexual behavior between spouses and domestic partners that may not be criminal under the current or RCC age-based sexual abuse statutes. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute.

Ninth, the revised trafficking an obscene image statute has an affirmative defense for subsection (a) that the image has, or will have, serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value, when considered as a whole. The current sexual performance of a minor statute does not have any defense if the image has, or will have, serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value, when considered as a whole. As a result, the current D.C. Code statute appears to criminalize the creation, sale, promotion, or possession of materials like medical textbooks, pictures or videos of newsworthy events, or artistic films that display real minors engaging in the prohibited sexual conduct. There is no DCCA case law on whether the current statute would be unconstitutional in these and other similar situations, but Supreme Court case law indicates that the current statute may be unconstitutional as applied to images with serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value, when considered as a whole.[78] In contrast, first degree of the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute has an affirmative defense that the image has, or will have serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value when considered as a whole. This language is taken from the Miller standard for obscenity, which requires the absence of these characteristics to be proven as an element of an obscenity offense.[79] Despite this defense, however, there may still be liability under the RCC sex offenses for

[78] In Ferber, the Court acknowledged that some applications of the statute at issue would be unconstitutional:

> We consider this the paradigmatic case of a state statute whose legitimate reach dwarfs its arguably impermissible applications. . . .While the reach of the statute is directed at the hard core of child pornography, the Court of Appeals was understandably concerned that some protected expression, ranging from medical textbooks to pictorials in the National Geographic would fall prey to the statute. How often, if ever, it may be necessary to employ children to engage in conduct clearly within the reach of [the statute] in order to produce educational, medical, or artistic works cannot be known with certainty. Yet we seriously doubt, and it has not been suggested, that these arguably impermissible applications of the statute amount to more than a tiny fraction of the materials within the statute's reach.

Ferber, 458 U.S. at 773. The Court found that the statute was not substantially overbroad and any overbreadth that exists could be addressed through as-applied constitutional challenges. Id. at 773-74. The material at issue in Ferber was two films that "almost entirely" depicted prohibited sexual activity and the Court determined the statute was not overbroad as applied to the respondent. Id. at 752, 774 & n 28.

causing or attempting to cause a minor to engage in the prohibited sexual conduct.[80] This change improves the constitutionality of the revised statute.

Tenth, through the RCC definition of "image," the revised trafficking an obscene image statute excludes hand-rendered depictions. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute defines "performance" as "any play, motion picture, photograph, electronic representation, dance, or any other visual presentation or exhibition."[81] There is no DCCA case law on the precise scope of "any visual presentation or exhibition," but the legislative history for the current D.C. Code statute seems to indicate that paintings, sculptures, and other hand rendered depictions would be included.[82] The Supreme Court struck down as unconstitutionally overbroad a federal statute on sexual images of minors in part because it applied to "any visual depiction" without regard to whether it was obscene, however, the ruling did not turn on the medium or method visual representation.[83] In contrast, through the definition of "image" in RCC § 22E-701, the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute is limited to images that are not hand-rendered. Limiting the revised statute to images that are not hand-rendered helps ensure that the images feature "real" minors,[84] and, for second [80] For example, a defendant that causes minors to engage in sexual intercourse for an artistic film may have a successful affirmative defense under subsection (d)(1) of the RCC creating or trafficking offense. However, depending on the ages of the minors, causing them to engage in sexual intercourse may lead to liability for sexual abuse of a minor (RCC § 22-1302), or, independent of the ages of the minors, if there was force involved, there may be liability for sexual assault (RCC § 22E-1301). If the sexual activity doesn't actually occur, there may still be liability under enticing a minor into sexual conduct (RCC § 22E-1305) or arranging for sexual conduct with a minor or person incapable of consenting (RCC § 22E-1306).

[81] D.C. Code § 22-3101(3).

[82] See Council of the District of Columbia, Report of the Committee of the Judiciary, Bill 4-305, The "District of Columbia Protection of Minors Act of 1982" at 8 (stating that the definition of "performance" is mean to "to include any visual presentation or exhibition without regard to the medium.").

[83] In Aschcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, the Supreme Court held that a provision in a federal statute that extended to "any visual depiction" that "is, or appears to be a minor engaging in sexually explicit conduct" was unconstitutionally overbroad. Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234, 241, 256 (2002). However, most of the Court's analysis focused on the "appears to be language," and it was in this context that the Court also discussed the problematic scope of "any visual depiction," noting that "the literal terms of the statute embrace a Renaissance painting depicting a scene from classical mythology" because it is a "picture" that "appears to be, of a minor engaging in sexually explicit conduct." Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. at 241. The Court in Free Speech Coalition also noted that these images "do not involve . . . let alone harm any children in the production process," id. at 241, and, accordingly found the Government's arguments for the restriction unpersuasive, id. at 246-56, 256. Although not squarely addressed in the opinion, it seems clear that the medium of a visual depiction is not dispositive in the constitutional analysis. A watercolor painting that is derived from painting live conduct is still a product of child sexual abuse and may be prohibited. Id. at 249 ("Where the images are themselves the product of child sexual abuse, Ferber recognized that the State had an interest in stamping it out without regard to any judgment about its content. . . . The fact that a work contained serious literary, artistic, or other value did not excuse the harm to its child participants.").

[84] As is discussed elsewhere in this commentary, in New York v. Ferber, the Supreme Court established that live or visual sexual depictions of real children do not have to be "obscene" and are not entitled to First Amendment protection. However, for many hand-rendered depictions, such as paintings, it may be difficult to determine if the depiction was of a "real" minor or just an individual's artistic rendering. For example, a defendant that sells or shares a realistic painting of female genitalia falls within the scope of the current statute, but without additional information, it is impossible to know if the painting is of a "real" degree, that the images are "patently offensive" under modern community standards per Miller v. California.[85] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and constitutionality of the revised statute.

Eleventh, the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute no longer separately prohibits "employ[ing]," "authoriz[ing]," or "induc[ing]" a minor to engage in a sexual performance, instead penalizing such conduct under the RCC solicitation statute at half the penalty of the completed offense. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute specifically states that a person commits the offense if he "employs, authorizes, or induces" a minor to engage in a sexual performance.[86] The precise scope of conduct intended by these verbs, and whether such verbs are intended to equate with solicitation of a crime under common law, is unclear. There is no DCCA case law interpreting this provision. Regardless, although such conduct may be far-removed from an actual image, employing, authorizing, or inducing a minor to engage in a sexual performance has the same 10 year penalty as actually filming or directing a sexual performance.[87] In contrast, the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute removes employing, authorizing, and inducing as a discrete means of liability. Conduct that facilitates the minor engaging in the creation of an image instead is covered by the RCC solicitation offense (RCC § 22E-302),[88] defined in a manner consistent with other serious offenses against persons, and subject to a penalty one-half of the completed offense. "Employing" a minor to engage in a sexual performance may also make the actor subject to attempt liability[89] depending on the facts of the case. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Twelfth, the revised statute excludes liability for commercial telecommunications service providers. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute makes it unlawful to "transmit" a still or motion picture depicting a sexual performance by a minor "by any means, including electronically."[90] The crime makes no exception for a company or employee who merely facilitates the transmission of an image or sound at a user's request.[91] District case law has not addressed the issue. In contrast, the revised trafficking an obscene image offense excludes liability for any licensee under the Communications Act of 1934,[92] such as a radio station, television broadcaster, or phone service provider, consistent with the current and revised obscenity offenses.[93] The revised offense also excludes liability for any interactive computer service, as defined in Beyond these twelve changes to current District law, eight other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state for the prohibited conduct—creating an image, giving consent for a minor to create an image, displaying, distributing, or manufacturing an image, making an image accessible on an electronic platform, and selling or advertising an image. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute requires the defendant to "know[] the character and content" of the sexual performance.[96] The statute does not specify whether this culpable mental state extends to the prohibited conduct, such as creating the image, and the definition of "knowingly"[97] in the current statute is unclear. There is no DCCA case law on these issues. The current obscenity statute has a substantively identical definition of "knowingly,"[98] which the DCCA has interpreted as requiring subjective knowledge of the sexual nature of the material at issue.[99] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-206, for the prohibited

[95] See D.C. Code § 22-3055(b); RCC § 22E-1804.

[96] D.C. Code § 22-3102(a)(1) ("A person is guilty of the use of a minor in a sexual performance if knowing the character and content thereof, he or she employs, authorizes, or induces a person under 18 years of age to engage in a sexual performance or being the parent, legal guardian, or custodian of a minor, he or she consents to the participation by a minor in a sexual performance."), (a)(2) ("A person is guilty of promoting a sexual performance by a minor when, knowing the character and content thereof, he or she produces, directs, or promotes any performance which includes sexual conduct by a person under 18 years of age.").

[97] The current statute defines "knowingly" as "having general knowledge of, or reason to know or a belief or ground for belief which warrants further inspection or inquiry, or both." D.C. Code § 22-3101(1). It is unclear whether this definition requires the defendant to have subjective knowledge, or requires a lower culpable mental state akin to recklessness or negligence. There is no DCCA case law on this definition. The legislative history notes that the definition was used "as opposed to the more general definition of 'knowing or having reasonable grounds to believe'" and that the definition was used to "comport with the scienter requirement in [New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747 (1982)]." Council of the District of Columbia, Report of the Committee of the Judiciary, Bill 4-305, The "District of Columbia Protection of Minors Act of 1982" at 8. Ferber, however, did not state a specific mental state, only that "some element of scienter on the part of the defendant" was required. New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747, 765 (1982) (citing Smith v. California, 361 U.S. 147 (1959) and Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. 87 (1974)). Presumably then, per Ferber, the District's statutory definition of "knowledge" was not intended to equate to negligence, and requires some degree of subjective awareness by the actor, either recklessness or knowledge.

[98] D.C. Code § 22-2201(a)(2)(B) (defining "knowingly" as "having general knowledge of, or reason to know, or a belief or ground for belief which warrants further inspection or inquiry of, the character and content of any article, thing, device, performance, or representation described in paragraph (1) of this subsection which is reasonably susceptible of examination.").

[99] See Kramer v. U. S., 293 A.2d 272, 274 (D.C. 1972) ("The officer's testimony regarding the nature of poses of nudes in the pictures readily visible on the magazine and box covers would be sufficient to indicate to a customer or a salesman the nature of the merchandise offered for sale. conduct—creating an image, giving consent for a minor to create an image, displaying, distributing, or manufacturing an image, making an image accessible on an electronic platform, and selling or advertising an image. Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[100] A "knowingly" culpable mental state for the prohibited conduct is consistent with numerous other RCC offenses that apply a "knowingly" culpable mental state to prohibited conduct. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised offense.

Second, the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute requires recklessness as to the content of the image and, in second degree, as to whether the content is obscene. The current sexual performance of a minor statute requires the defendant to "know[] the character and content" of the sexual performance[101] and defines "knowingly" as "having general knowledge of, or reason to know or a belief or ground for belief which warrants further inspection or inquiry, or both."[102] There is no DCCA case law interpreting the definition of "knowingly"[103] or how it applies to the current statute. The current D.C. Code obscenity statute has a substantively identical definition of "knowingly,"[104] which the DCCA has interpreted as requiring subjective knowledge of the sexual nature of the material at issue.[105] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised

[103] The current statute defines "knowingly" as "having general knowledge of, or reason to know or a belief or ground for belief which warrants further inspection or inquiry, or both." D.C. Code § 22-3101(1). It is unclear whether this definition requires the defendant to have subjective knowledge, or requires a lower culpable mental state akin to recklessness or negligence. There is no DCCA case law on this definition. The legislative history notes that the definition was used "as opposed to the more general definition of 'knowing or having reasonable grounds to believe'" and that the definition was used to "comport with the scienter requirement in [New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747 (1982)]." Council of the District of Columbia, Report of the Committee of the Judiciary, Bill 4-305, The "District of Columbia Protection of Minors Act of 1982" at 8. Ferber, however, did not state a specific mental state, only that "some element of scienter on the part of the defendant" was required. New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747, 765 (1982) (citing Smith v. California, 361 U.S. 147 (1959) and Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. 87 (1974)). Presumably then, per Ferber, the District's statutory definition of "knowledge" was not intended to equate to negligence, and requires some degree of subjective awareness by the actor, either recklessness or knowledge.

[104] D.C. Code § 22-2201(a)(2)(B) (defining "knowingly" as "having general knowledge of, or reason to know, or a belief or ground for belief which warrants further inspection or inquiry of, the character and content of any article, thing, device, performance, or representation described in paragraph (1) of this subsection which is reasonably susceptible of examination.").

creating or trafficking an obscene image statute requires recklessness as to the content of the image,[106] and, in second degree, as to whether the content is "obscene," as defined in RCC § 22-701. Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence,[107] but courts have also recognized that recklessness regarding a risk of serious harm is wrongful conduct.[108] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute

Third, the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute requires that the image depicts, or will depict, at least part of a real complainant under the age of 18 years, and excludes purely computer-generated or other fictitious minors. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute does not specify whether the complainant that is depicted, or will be depicted, in an image must be a "real," i.e. not fictitious, complainant under the age of 18 years. The statute does define "minor," however, as "any person under 18 years of age,"[109] which arguably suggests that the complainant must be a "real," i.e. not fictitious, person. There is no DCCA case law on this issue. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute specifies that at least part[110] of a "real," i.e. not fictitious, complainant under the age of 18 years must be depicted or will be depicted. Requiring at least part of a "real" complainant under the age of 18 years ensures that the statute satisfies the First Amendment.[111] Distribution of obscene images of purely computer-generated or other accused had such knowledge of the material that he should have suspected its sale might violate the law and inspected or inquired further as to its character and content.")

[106] While the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute requires "recklessness" as to the content of the image (whether it depicts or will depict part or all of a real complainant under the age of 18 years engaging in the prohibited sexual conduct), the closely-related distribution of an obscene image statute (RCC § 22E-1805) and distribution of an obscene image to a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1806) require a higher "knowingly" culpable mental state for the equivalent element (whether an image depicts any person, real or fictitious, of any age, engaging in the prohibited sexual conduct). The higher culpable mental state in these offenses is warranted because they prohibit a much broader array of images.

[107] There is a presumption that the legislature intends to require a defendant to possess a degree of knowledge sufficient to "mak[e] a person legally responsible for the consequences of his or her act or omission" regarding "each of the statutory elements that criminalize otherwise innocent conduct," even when the legislature does not specify any scienter in the statutory text. Rehaif v. United States, 139 S. Ct. 2191, 2195 (2019) (citing United States v. X-Citement Video, Inc., 513 U. S. 64, 72 (1994); Morissette v. United States, 342 U. S. 246, 256–258 (1952); Staples v. United States, 511 U. S. 600, 606 (1994); Black's Law Dictionary 1547 (10th ed. 2014)); see also Elonis v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2001, 2009 (2015) ("[O]ur cases have explained that a defendant generally must 'know the facts that make his conduct fit the definition of the offense,' even if he does not know that those facts give rise to a crime." (Internal citation omitted)).

[108] See Elonis v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2001, 2015 (2015) (J. Alito, concurring) ("In a wide variety of contexts, we have described reckless conduct as morally culpable.").

[109] D.C. Code § 22-3101(2).

[110] The revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute includes composite images of minors if at least part of the composite is of a real minor, such as a real minor's head on an adult body, or an adult's head on a real minor's body. There is no requirement that the government prove the identity of a real minor.

[111] In New York v. Ferber, the Supreme Court established that live or visual sexual depictions of real children do not have to meet the Miller standard for obscenity. New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747, 764-65 (1982). Crucial to the Court's decision was its acceptance of several arguments and legislative findings, fictitious minors[112] may be prohibited under the RCC distribution of an obscene image statute (RCC § 22E-1805) or distribution of an obscene image to a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1806). This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Fourth, through use of the defined term "simulated" in RCC § 22E-701, the revised statute excludes liability for images of sexual conduct that is apparently fake. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute prohibits "simulated" sexual intercourse,[113] but does not define the term. It is unclear whether "simulated" includes suggestive but obviously staged sex scenes like one might find in a commercially screened "R" or "NC-17" movie, or theatrical or comic portrayals of a sexual act that are clearly fake. There is no DCCA case law on this issue. Resolving this ambiguity, the RCC defines "simulated" as "feigned or pretended in a way that realistically duplicates the appearance of actual conduct to the perception of an average person." Under this definition, only highly explicit depictions where it is unclear due to lighting, etc., if the prohibited conduct is actually occurring are included in the revised statute,[114] not other portrayals that are clearly staged. This definition is similar to another jurisdiction's definition[115] and is supported by Supreme Court case law.[116] Distribution including that "the use of children as subjects of pornographic materials is harmful to the psychological, emotional, and mental health of the child," id. at 758, and that "the materials are a permanent record of the children's participation and the harm to the child is exacerbated by their circulation," id. at 759. Ferber was not specific to images of minors where only part of the minor is real, but the Court stated in a later opinion that "[a]lthough morphed images may fall within the definition of virtual child pornography, they implicate the interests of real children and are in that sense closer to the images in Ferber." Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234, 242, (2002). The respondents in Ashcroft did not challenge the morphed images provision of the statute at issue and the Court did not discuss it further. The RCC requirement that the image is at least partially comprised of a real minor ensures the revised trafficking offenses is constitutional.

[112] Under Supreme Court case law, images of computer-generated minors and other fake minors retain First Amendment protection and can only be prohibited if they are also obscene. Ferber, 458 U.S. at 764-65 ("We note that the distribution of descriptions or other depictions of sexual conduct, not otherwise obscene, which do not involve live performance or photographic or other visual reproduction of live performances, retains First Amendment protection."). In Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, the Court held that a federal statute that prohibited "any visual depiction" that "is, or appears to be, of a minor engaging in sexually explicit conduct," without any obscenity requirement, was overbroad and unconstitutional. Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234, 241, 249, 256 (2002). The Court noted that unlike Ferber, where the images were "the record of sexual abuse, [the federal statute at issue] prohibits speech that records no crime and creates no victims by its production." Ashcroft, 535 U.S. at 250. The Court found unpersuasive the Government's arguments about the need for the statute and held that it was overbroad and unconstitutional. Id. 250-51, 252-56. In United States v. Williams, the Court stated that a federal statute that prohibited "an obscene visual depiction of a minor engaging in sexually explicit conduct" or "a visual depiction of an actual minor engaging in sexually explicit conduct," "precisely tracks the material held constitutionally proscribable in Ferber and Miller: obscene material depicting (actual or virtual) children engaged in sexually explicit conduct, and any other material depicting actual children engaged in sexually explicit conduct." United States v. Williams, 553 U.S. 285, 294 (2008).

[113] D.C. Code § 22-3101(5)(A).

[114] For example, a simulated sexual act may clearly show male genitalia, female genitalia, and movement between two actors but, due to the angle of the camera, not show whether there was penetration.

[115] Utah Code Ann. § 76-5b-103(11) ("'Simulated sexually explicit conduct' means a feigned or pretended act of sexually explicit conduct which duplicates, within the perception of an average person, the appearance of an actual act of sexually explicit conduct.").

of obscene images that do not satisfy the definition of "simulated" may be prohibited under the RCC distribution of an obscene image statute (RCC § 22E-1805) or distribution of an obscene image to a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1806). This change improves the clarity, consistency, and constitutionality of the revised statute.

Fifth, the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute provides liability for a person responsible for the complainant under civil law giving "effective consent" to the complainant's participation in the recording, photographing, or filming, and requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state for this element.[117] The current D.C. Code sexual performance using a minor statute prohibits a "parent, legal guardian, or custodian" of a minor from "consent[ing] to the participation by a minor in a sexual performance."[118] The statute does not define "consent" or specify a culpable mental state for this element and there is no DCCA case law on this issue. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised creating or trafficking statute requires that the individual responsible under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant give "effective consent," as defined in RCC § 22E-701, and requires a "knowing" culpable mental state for this element. The term "under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant" includes parents, legal guardians, and custodians who at the time have a legal duty of care for the complainant. "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception" and is used consistently throughout the RCC. Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[119] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

[116] In United States v. Williams, the Supreme Court stated that a federal statute that prohibited pandering or soliciting "an obscene visual depiction of a minor engaging in sexually explicit conduct" or "a visual depiction of an actual minor engaging in sexually explicit conduct," "precisely tracks the material held constitutionally proscribable in Ferber and Miller: obscene material depicting (actual or virtual) children engaged in sexually explicit conduct, and any other material depicting actual children engaged in sexually explicit conduct." United States v. Williams, 553 U.S. 285, 294 (2008). In dicta, the Court discussed the scope of "simulated sexual intercourse" in the statute's definition of "sexually explicit conduct":

> 'Sexually explicit conduct' connotes actual depiction of the sex act rather than merely the suggestion that it is occurring. And 'simulated' sexual intercourse is not sexual intercourse that is merely suggested, but rather sexual intercourse that is explicitly portrayed, even though (through camera tricks or otherwise) it may not actually have occurred. The portrayal must cause a reasonable viewer to believe that the actors actually engaged in that conduct on camera. Critically . . . [the statute's] requirement of a 'visual depiction of an actual minor' makes clear that, although the sexual intercourse may be simulated, it must involve actual children (unless it is obscene). This . . . eliminates any possibility that virtual child pornography or sex between youthful-looking adult actors might be covered by the term "simulated sexual intercourse.

Williams, 553 U.S. at 296–97.

[117] Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" culpable mental state in paragraph (a)(1) and paragraph (b)(1) also applies to the fact that the defendant is a "person with a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant."

[118] D.C. Code § 22-3102(a)(1).

[119] See Elonis, 135 S. Ct.at 2009 ("[O]ur cases have explained that a defendant generally must 'know the facts that make his conduct fit the definition of the offense,' even if he does not know that those facts give rise to a crime. (Internal citation omitted)").

Sixth, the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute requires recklessness as to the age of the complainant and deletes the current affirmative defense for reasonable mistake of age. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute requires that the defendant "know[] the character and content" of the sexual performance[120] and defines "knowingly" as "having general knowledge of, or reason to know or a belief or ground for belief which warrants further inspection or inquiry, or both."[121] It is unclear whether this definition requires the defendant to have subjective knowledge, or requires a lower culpable mental state akin to recklessness or negligence,[122] and it is also unclear whether the mental state applies to the age of the complainant.[123] There is no DCCA case law on these issues. However, the current statute has an affirmative defense for a reasonable mistake of age,[124] which suggests that negligence is not sufficient for liability and that "recklessly" or "knowingly" applies to the age of the complainant. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute requires recklessness as to the age of the complainant. A reckless culpable mental state preserves the substance of the affirmative defense[125] and [120] D.C. Code § 22-3102(a)(1) ("A person is guilty of the use of a minor in a sexual performance if knowing the character and content thereof, he or she employs, authorizes, or induces a person under 18 years of age to engage in a sexual performance or being the parent, legal guardian, or custodian of a minor, he or she consents to the participation by a minor in a sexual performance."), (a)(2) ("A person is guilty of promoting a sexual performance by a minor when, knowing the character and content thereof, he or she produces, directs, or promotes any performance which includes sexual conduct by a person under 18 years of age.").

[122] The legislative history notes that the definition of "knowingly" was used "as opposed to the more general definition of 'knowing or having reasonable grounds to believe'" and that the definition was used to "comport with the scienter requirement in [New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747 (1982)]." Council of the District of Columbia, Report of the Committee of the Judiciary, Bill 4-305, The "District of Columbia Protection of Minors Act of 1982" at 8. Ferber, however, did not state a specific mental state, only that "some element of scienter on the part of the defendant" was required. New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747, 765 (1982) (citing Smith v. California, 361 U.S. 147 (1959) and Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. 87 (1974)). Presumably then, per Ferber, the District's statutory definition of "knowledge" was not intended to equate to negligence, and requires some degree of subjective awareness by the actor, either recklessness or knowledge.

[123] The legislative history for the prohibition in the current statute against attending, transmitting or possessing a sexual performance by a minor (D.C. Code § 22-3102(b)), states that the defendant "must know that the performance will depict a minor." Council of the District of Columbia, Report of the Committee on Public Safety and the Judiciary on Bill 18-70, The "Prohibition Against Human Trafficking Amendment Act of 2010" at 10. This prohibition was added to the current statute in 2010 and there is no discussion of how the "knowing" culpable mental state in pre-existing parts of the statute applies to the age of the complainant. Regardless, it is persuasive authority that the defendant must "know" the age of the complainant in the other parts of the statute, although the meaning of that definition remains unclear.

[124] D.C. Code § 22-3104(a) ("Under this chapter it shall be an affirmative defense that the defendant in good faith reasonably believed the person appearing in the performance was 18 years of age or over.").

[125] The current affirmative defense is that "the defendant in good faith reasonably believed the person appearing in the performance was 18 years of age or over." D.C. Code § 22-3104(a). In the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute, it must be proven that an actor was reckless that the complainant was under the age of 18 years. As defined in RCC § 22E-206, "recklessness" requires that the actor must consciously disregard a substantial risk that the complainant was under the age of 18 years; and the risk must be of such a nature and degree that, considering the nature of and motivation for the actor's conduct and the circumstances the person is aware of, the actor's conscious disregard is a gross deviation clarifies that the defendant must have some subjective knowledge as to the age of the complainant. Requiring, at a minimum, a knowing culpable mental state for the elements of an offense that make otherwise legal conduct illegal is a generally accepted legal principle.[126] However, recklessness has been upheld in some cases as a minimal basis for punishing morally culpable crime.[127] Throughout the RCC, recklessness as to age is a consistent basis for penalty enhancement.[128] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Seventh, the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute does not criminalize a person with specified responsibility under civil law for the complainant giving effective consent for the complainant to aid the creation of derivative images. The definition of "performance"[129] in the current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute includes live conduct as well as images (e.g., photographs) of live conduct, and appears to include derivative images (e.g., photographs of photographs). The current statute prohibits a parent, guardian, or custodian from giving consent for "participation by a minor in a sexual performance,"[130] but it is unclear what "participation" means and if this provision extends to giving consent for the minor to create an image derived from a source other than live conduct. There is no DCCA case law on these issues. Resolving this ambiguity, subparagraphs (a)(1)(B) and (b)(1)(B) of the revised statute exclude a "derivative image." Read in conjunction with the requirements in subsections (a)(2) and (b)(2), these subparagraphs require the defendant to give effective consent for the minor to engage in or submit to the recording, photographing, or filming of live sexual conduct. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Eighth, the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute no longer separately prohibits producing or directing a derivative image. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute prohibits "produc[ing]" or "direct[ing]" a sexual performance of a minor.[131] The definition of "performance"[132] in the current sexual performance of a minor statute includes live conduct, as well as still images (e.g., photographs). There is no DCCA case law on the intended scope or meaning of "directing" or "producing," and whether the current statute criminalizes producing or from the ordinary standard of conduct. A reasonable mistake as to the complainant's age would negate the recklessness required. See RCC § 22E-208(b)(3) and accompanying commentary, providing that a reasonable mistake as to a circumstance element negates the existence of recklessness as to that element.

[128] RCC § 22E-701 defines "protected person" to include certain individuals under the age of 18 years or over the age of 65 years and several RCC offenses, like assault (RCC § 22E-1202), require a "reckless" culpable mental state for the fact that the complainant is a "protected person." In addition, several of the penalty enhancements for the RCC sexual assault offense (RCC § 22E-1301) require a "reckless" culpable mental state for the age of the complainant.

directing the creation of a derivative image.[133] The legislative history notes that "producing a performance [includes] giving financial backing, making background arrangements for a performance such as buying or leasing equipment for a sexual performance or purchasing equipment to film or exhibit a sexual performance."[134] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute eliminates separate liability for producing or directing a derivative image as a discrete means of liability. The revised trafficking an obscene image statute continues to criminalize knowingly producing or directing the creation of an image that involves recording, photographing, or filming the complainant.[135] "Produc[ing]" includes actions that facilitate the creation, sales, or advertising of a live performance, such as "giving financial backing" and "making background arrangements for a performance such as buying or leasing equipment for a sexual performance."[136] However, a person who produces or directs the creation of a derivative image is not criminally liable under the revised trafficking statute unless they satisfy the requirements under the RCC accomplice liability statute (RCC § 22E-210).[137] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, the revised statute deletes subsection (a) of the current D.C. Code statute: "It shall be unlawful in the District of Columbia for a person knowingly to use a minor in a sexual performance or to promote a sexual performance by a minor."[138] It is unclear whether this is a general statement or part of the actual offense for which a person can be charged and convicted.[139] The revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute

[134] Council of the District of Columbia, Report of the Committee of the Judiciary, Bill 4-305, The "District of Columbia Protection of Minors Act of 1982" at 9.

[135] For example, an actor that gives money to another individual, knowing that the individual is buying video equipment and filming prohibited images would have liability for "producing" the creation of an image derived from recording, photographing, or filming live conduct. Producing or directing a live performance under the RCC arranging a live sexual performance of a minor statute RCC § 22E-1809 may also provide similar liability.

[136] Council of the District of Columbia, Report of the Committee of the Judiciary, Bill 4-305, The "District of Columbia Protection of Minors Act of 1982" at 9.

[137] For example, if an actor knows that a person creates derivative images of minors engaging in sex acts on their computer, and purposely buys that person sophisticated software or pays the rent at their location to facilitate that conduct or to aid the distribution or sale of derivative, there may be accomplice liability for trafficking an obscene image under RCC § 22E-210.

[138] D.C. Code § 22-3102(a).

[139] The current statute substantively encompasses the "use" and "promot[ion] of a minor in a sexual performance, regardless of the meaning of subsection (a). D.C. Code §§ 22-3102(a)(1), (a)(2) ("(1) A person is guilty of the use of a minor in a sexual performance if knowing the character and content thereof, he or she employs, authorizes, or induces a person under 18 years of age to engage in a sexual performance or being the parent, legal guardian, or custodian of a minor, he or she consents to the participation by a minor in a sexual performance. (2) A person is guilty of promoting a sexual performance by a minor when, knowing the character and content thereof, he or she produces, directs, or promotes any performance which includes sexual conduct by a person under 18 years of age."); 22-3101(4) (defining "promote" as "to substantively encompasses the "use" of a minor in a sexual performance and "promot[ing]" a sexual performance by a minor, rendering current subsection (a) superfluous. This improves the clarity of the revised offense without changing the law.

Second, organizationally, the RCC has separate statutes for still images of minors and live performances of minors and no longer uses the general terms "performance" and "sexual performance." Due to the current D.C. Code definitions of "performance" and "sexual performance," the current sexual performance of a minor statute includes both still images and live performances.[140] However, it is counterintuitive to construe a "performance" as including a still image (e.g., a photograph). To clarify that both images and live performances fall within the revised statutes, the RCC creating or trafficking an obscene image of a minor and RCC possession of an obscene image of a minor statutes (RCC §§ 22E-1807 and 22E-1808) are specific to still images and the RCC arranging a live performance of a minor and attending a live performance of a minor statutes (RCC §§ 22E-1809 and 22E-1810) are specific to live sexual conduct. The two sets of statutes, however, have equivalent penalties—creating or trafficking an obscene image and arranging a live exhibition have the same penalty, and possessing an image and viewing an exhibition or broadcast have the same penalty. This change improves the clarity of the revised statutes without changing current District law.

Third, the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute no longer uses the defined term "minor."[141] Instead, consistent with the current statute's definition, the revised statute refers to a "complainant under the age of 18 years." Other statutes in the D.C. Code refer to a person under 18 years of age as a "child,"[142] and the use of different labels for persons of the same age is confusing. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute without changing current District law.

Fourth, the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute replaces "parent, legal guardian, or custodian of a minor" with a "person with a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant." The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute prohibits a "parent, legal guardian, or custodian of a minor" from "consent[ing] to the participation by a minor in a sexual performance."[143] There is no DCCA case law on the scope of "parent, legal guardian, or custodian" in the current statute. However, the legislative history for the current statute indicates a broad scope: "[A] parent, whether natural, or adoptive, or a foster parent, a legal guardian defined in D.C. Code, sec. 21-101 to 103 or custodian . . . [c]ustodian means any person who has responsibility for the care of a child without regard to whether procure, manufacture, issue, sell, give, provide, lend, mail, deliver, transfer, transmute, publish or distribute, circulate, disseminate, present, exhibit, or advertise, or to offer or agree to do the same.").

[140] D.C. Code § 22-3101(3), (6) (defining "performance" as "any play, motion picture, photograph, electronic representation, dance, or any other visual presentation of exhibition" and "sexual performance" as "any performance or part thereof which includes sexual conduct by a person under 18 years of age.").

[141] D.C. Code § 22-3101(2) (defining "minor" as "any person under 18 years of age."). Despite this definition, the current sexual performance using a minor statute inconsistently uses the term "minor" and instead refers to a "person under 18 years of age." D.C. Code § 22-3102.

[142] See, e.g., D.C. Code § 22-1101 (a) ("A person commits the crime of cruelty to children in the first degree if that person …willfully maltreats a child under 18 years of age….").

[143] D.C. Code § 22-3102(a)(1).

a formal legal arrangement exists."[144] The revised statute similarly uses a "person with a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant," which is used elsewhere in the RCC, such as the special defenses in RCC § 22E-408. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute without changing current District law.

Fifth, the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute requires that the complainant "engage in or submit to" the prohibited sexual conduct. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute prohibits inducing a minor to "engage in" a sexual performance,[145] but otherwise refers generally to the complainant's sexual conduct.[146] The revised creating or trafficking statute consistently refers to the complainant "engag[ing] in or submit[ing] to" the prohibited sexual conduct, which is consistent with the language in the RCC sex offenses and recognizes that the revised statute may apply in situations where the complainant is an active participant or a completely passive (e.g., unconscious) participant. This clarifies the scope of the revised statute without changing current District law.

Sixth, the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute uses the definition of "sexual act" in RCC § 22E-701. The RCC definition is substantively identical to the various forms of sexual penetration the current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute prohibits, including bestiality.[147] This change clarifies the revised statute.

Seventh, instead of prohibiting a "lewd" exhibition,[148] the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute prohibits a "sexual or sexualized display" when there is less than a full opaque covering. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute does not define "lewd," but the DCCA has approved a jury instruction for the offense that stated "lewd exhibition of the genitals means that the minor's genital or pubic area must be visibly displayed," that "mere nudity is not enough," and "the

[146] D.C. Code § 22-3102(a)(1) ("participation by a minor in a sexual performance."), (a)(2) ("any performance which includes sexual conduct by a person under 18 years."), (b) ("a sexual performance by a minor."). In addition to the variable statutory language, the definition of "sexual performance" merely requires that the performance "includes sexual conduct" by a minor. D.C. Code § 22-3101(6). The current definition of "sexual conduct" lists specific types of behavior, but does not define the precise requirements for the complainant.

[147] The current sexual performance of a minor statute prohibits "actual or simulated sexual intercourse: (i) Between the penis and the vulva, anus, or mouth; (ii) Between the mouth and the vulva or anus; or (iii) Between an artificial sex organ or other object or instrument used in the manner of an artificial sex organ and the anus or vulva" as well as "bestiality." D.C. Code § 22-3101(5) (defining "sexual conduct."). Subsection (A) of the RCC definition of "sexual act" encompasses penile penetration of the vulva or anus in subsection (i) of the current statutory language. Subsection (B) of the RCC definition of "sexual act" encompasses penile penetration of the mouth in subsection (ii) of the current statutory language as well as contact between the mouth and the vulva or anus in subsection (i) of the current statutory language. Subsection (C) of the RCC definition of "sexual act" encompasses the object sexual penetration described in subsection (iii) of the current statutory language. Finally, subsection (D) of the RCC definition of "sexual act" encompasses specific forms of bestiality.

[148] D.C. Code § 22-3101(5)(E) (definition of "sexual conduct" including a "lewd exhibition of the genitals.").

exhibition must have an unnatural or unusual focus on the minor's genitalia regardless of the minor's intention to engage in sexual activity or whether the viewer is sexually aroused."[149] The revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute's reference to "sexual or sexualized display" is intended to restate the meaning of "lewd exhibition" in more modern, plain language while preserving this DCCA case law. Mere nudity is not sufficient for a "sexual or sexualized display" in subparagraphs (a)(2)(D) or (b)(2)(D). There must be a visible display of the relevant body parts with an unnatural or unusual focus on them, regardless of the minor's intention to engage in sexual activity or the effect on the viewer. This change clarifies current law.

Eighth, the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute deletes the definitions of "transmit" and "transmission" in the current D.C. Code statute[150] because they are redundant with distribution. Deleting them clarifies the revised statute without changing current law.

Ninth, the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute clarifies that filming live conduct is a discrete means of liability. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute extends to filming live conduct, but it is not explicitly stated in the statute.[151] To better communicate in plain language the scope of the offense, the revised statute specifies that recording, photographing, or filming live conduct are all means of liability. This revision improves the clarity of the revised statute without changing current District law.

In addition, the DCCA noted that "some courts look to multiple factors to determine whether a photograph contains a lewd depiction of genitalia, [but] one of the factors routinely considered is whether the picture focuses on the genitalia in an unnatural way." Id. In particular, the DCCA cited a Tenth Circuit case, Wolf, listing factors such as "whether the focal point of the visual depiction is on the child's genitalia or pubic area;" "whether the child is fully or partially clothed, or nude;" and "whether the visual depiction is intended or designed to elicit a sexual response in the viewer." Id. (quoting *United States v. [151] The current definitions of "performance" and "sexual performance" include both still images and live performances. D.C. Code § 22-3101(3), (6) (defining "performance" as "any play, motion picture, photograph, electronic representation, dance, or any other visual presentation of exhibition" and "sexual performance" as "any performance or part thereof which includes sexual conduct by a person under 18 years of age."). Thus, each provision of the current statute extends to using a minor or giving consent for a minor to engage in or participate in live conduct. D.C. Code § 22-3102(a)(1), (a)(2) ("(1) A person is guilty of the use of a minor in a sexual performance if knowing the character and content thereof, he or she employs, authorizes, or induces a person under 18 years of age to engage in a sexual performance or being the parent, legal guardian, or custodian of a minor, he or she consents to the participation by a minor in a sexual performance. (2) A person is guilty of promoting a sexual performance by a minor when, knowing the character and content thereof, he or she produces, directs, or promotes any performance which includes sexual conduct by a person under 18 years of age.").

Tenth, the definition of "movie theater" in RCC § 22E-701[152] applies to the affirmative defense in paragraph (d)(5) of the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute has a similar affirmative defense[153] that applies to specified employees of a "motion picture theater," but does not define the term. There is no DCCA case law interpreting the term "motion picture theater" in this affirmative defense. The RCC definition of "motion picture theater" limits the affirmative defense to certain employees of a theater or other venue that is being utilized primarily for the exhibition of a motion picture to the public, which is consistent with the scope of the affirmative defense. This change improves the clarity of the revised statute.

[152] RCC § 22E-701 defines "movie theater" as "a theater, auditorium, or other venue that is being utilized primarily for the exhibition of a motion picture to the public."

[153] D.C. Code § 22-3104 (b)(1) ("Except as provided in paragraph (2) of this subsection, in any prosecution for an offense pursuant to § 22-3102(2) it shall be an affirmative defense that the person so charged was: (A) A librarian engaged in the normal course of his or her employment; or (B) A motion picture projectionist, stage employee or spotlight operator, cashier, doorman, usher, candy stand attendant, porter, or in any other nonmanagerial or nonsupervisory capacity in a motion picture theater.").

RCC § 22E-1808. Possession of an Obscene Image of a Minor.

Explanatory Note. [1] The RCC possession of an obscene image of a minor offense prohibits possessing images that depict complainants under the age of 18 years engaging in or submitting to specified sexual conduct. The penalty gradations are based on the type of sexual conduct that is depicted in the image. The revised possession of an obscene image of a minor statute has the same penalties as the RCC attending or viewing a live sexual performance of a minor statute,[2] the main difference being that the RCC possession of an obscene image of a minor offense is limited to images. Along with the creating or trafficking of an obscene image of a minor offense,[3] the arranging a live sexual performance of a minor offense,[4] and the attending or viewing a live sexual performance of a minor offense,[5] the revised possession of an obscene image of a minor statute replaces the current sexual performance using a minor offense[6] in the current D.C. Code, as well as the current definitions,[7] penalties,[8] and affirmative defenses[9] for that offense.

Paragraph (a)(1) specifies the prohibited conduct in first degree possession of an obscene image of a minor, the highest gradation of the revised possession offense—"possesses" an "image." An "image," as defined in RCC § 22E-701, is a visual depiction, other than a depiction rendered by hand, and includes videos and live broadcasts.[10] "Possesses" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 as either to "hold or carry on one's person" or to "have the ability and desire to exercise control over."[11] The RCC definition of "knowingly" in RCC § 22E-206 here means the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she will either hold or carry an image on his or her person or have the ability and desire to exercise control over an image.

[1] Unless otherwise noted, when discussing the current sexual performance of a minor statute, this commentary uses the terms "performance" and "sexual performance" interchangeably. These terms have distinct definitions in the current D.C. Code statute (D.C. Code § 22-3101(3), (6)), but the current statute does not use the terms consistently. Compare D.C. Code § 22-3102(a)(1), (b) (referring to a "sexual performance.") with (a)(2) (referring to "any performance which includes sexual conduct by a person under 18 years of age.").

[10] Depending on the facts of a given situation, there may also be liability for viewing a live broadcast under the RCC viewing a live performance of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1810). However, due to the RCC merger provision in RCC § 22E-214, an individual may not be convicted of both possessing and viewing the same live broadcast on the same occasion.

[11] Read in conjunction with the RCC trafficking an obscene image of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1807), the RCC possession of an obscene image characterizes as possession: 1) manufacturing an image without an intent to distribute that image; and 2) uploading or making available an image on an electronic platform that is available only to the actor and no other user, i.e. an actor e-mailing himself or herself a prohibited image.

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies additional requirements for the image. First, the image must depict, in part or whole, the body of a real complainant under the age of 18 years. "Body" includes the face, as well as other parts of the body of a real complainant under the age of 18 years. Any depiction of a part of the complainant's body is sufficient. The complainant must be a real minor but there is no requirement that the government prove the identity of the minor. Second, the image must depict the complainant engaging in or submitting to specific types of sexual conduct: 1) an actual "sexual act," actual "sadomasochistic abuse," or actual masturbation; 2) a "simulated" "sexual act," "simulated" "sadomasochistic abuse," or "simulated" masturbation; or 3) a sexual or sexualized display of the genitals, pubic area,[12] or anus, when there is less than a full opaque covering.[13] The terms "simulated," "sexual act" and "sadomasochistic abuse" are defined in RCC § 22E-701. There is no obscenity requirement for any of the prohibited sexual conduct in subparagraphs (a)(2)(A) through (a)(2)(D).

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies that the culpable mental state for the requirements in paragraph (a)(2) is "reckless." "Reckless" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor is aware of a substantial risk that the image depicts, in part or whole, the body of a real complainant under the age of 18 years of age. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "reckless" culpable mental state also applies to the prohibited sexual conduct in sub-paragraphs (a)(2)(A) through (a)(2)(D). The actor must be aware of a substantial risk that the conduct that is depicted in the image is one of the types prohibited in subparagraphs (a)(2)(A) through (a)(2)(D), such as an actual sexual act or a prohibited sexualized display.

Subsection (b) specifies the prohibited conduct for second degree possession of an obscene image of a minor. Paragraph (b)(1) and paragraph (b)(2) have the same requirements as paragraph (a)(1) and paragraph (a)(2) in first degree. However, the types of prohibited sexual conduct are different for second degree possession of an obscene image. Subparagraph (b)(2)(A) prohibits an "obscene" "sexual contact" and subparagraph (b)(2)(B) prohibits an "obscene" sexual or sexualized display of any breast below the top of the areola, or the buttocks, when there is less than a full opaque covering.[14] RCC § 22E-701 defines "obscene" and "sexual contact." Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "recklessly" culpable mental state in paragraph (b)(2) applies to the prohibited sexual conduct and the actor must consciously disregard a substantial risk that the conduct is an "obscene sexual contact" or a specified "obscene" sexual display.

Subsection (c) establishes two exclusions from liability for the RCC possession of an obscene image offense. Paragraph (c)(1) provides that the statute does not apply to any person that is a licensee[15] under the Communications Act of 1934, such as a radio, television, or phone service provider. Paragraph (c)(1) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element, here the fact that the actor is a specified licensee. Paragraph (c)(2) provides that the statute does not apply to any person that is an interactive computer service as defined in 47 U.S.C. § 230(f)(2).[16] Paragraph (c)(2) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element, here the fact that the actor is a specified interactive computer service.

[12] Reference to "pubic area" is intended to include liability for a frontal nude image of a minor where the groin is visible but not the external genitalia.

[13] If the genitals, pubic area, or anus of the minor have a full opaque covering, there is no liability under first degree of the revised possession statute. However, if the image depicts a minor engaging in a "sexual contact" that is also "obscene," there is liability under second degree of the revised possession of an obscene image statute. The RCC definition of "sexual contact" prohibits the touching of genitalia, anus, groin, breast, inner thigh, or buttocks, whether clothed or unclothed (RCC § 22E-701).

[14] If the specified part of the breast or the buttocks has a full opaque covering, and the image does not depict or will not depict an "obscene sexual contact" as prohibited by subparagraph (b)(2)(B), there is no liability under second degree possession of an obscene image.

Subsection (d) establishes several affirmative defenses for the RCC possession of an obscene image statute. The general provision in RCC § 22E-201 establishes the burdens of proof and production for all affirmative defenses in the RCC.

Paragraph (d)(1) establishes an affirmative defense to subsection (a) of the revised statute that the image has serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value when considered as a whole. This language matches one of the requirements for obscenity in Miller v. California,[17] but makes it an affirmative defense. The prohibited sexual conduct in subparagraphs (a)(2)(A) through (a)(2)(D), when it involves real complainants under the age of 18 years, are not subject to the First Amendment requirements set out in Miller v. California.[18] However, the affirmative defense recognizes that there may be rare situations where images of such conduct warrant First Amendment protection. Paragraph (d)(1) specifies "in fact." "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element, here the fact that the image has serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value when considered as a whole.

Paragraph (d)(2) establishes an affirmative defense for an actor that is under the age of 18 years. Paragraph (d)(2) specifies "in fact." "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, "in fact" applies to every element that follows unless a culpable mental state is specified. Here, the "in fact" specified in paragraph (d)(2) applies to subparagraphs (d)(2)(A) and (d)(2)(B) and sub-subparagraphs (d)(2)(B)(i) and (d)(2)(B)(ii) and there is no culpable mental state requirement for any of these elements. Subparagraph (d)(2)(A) requires that the actor is under the age of 18 years. There are two alternative requirements for the affirmative defense under subparagraph (d)(2)(B). Sub-subparagraph (d)(2)(B)(i) requires that the actor is the only person under the age of 18 years who is depicted in the image. In the alternative, sub-subparagraph (d)(2)(B)(ii) applies if there are multiple people under the age of 18 years who are depicted in the image. Under sub-subparagraph (d)(2)(B)(ii), the actor must reasonably believe that every person under 18 years of age who is depicted in [15] The term "licensee" is defined in paragraph (c)(2) to have the same meaning specified in 47 U.S.C. § 153(30).

[16] The term "interactive computer service" means any information service, system, or access software provider that provides or enables computer access by multiple users to a computer server, including specifically a service or system that provides access to the Internet and such systems operated or services offered by libraries or educational institutions.

[17] Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15, 24 (1973) ("A state [obscenity] offense must also be limited to works which . . . taken as a whole, do not have serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value.").

[18] Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15, 24 (1973).

the image gives "effective consent" to the actor to engage in the conduct that constitutes the offense. Under sub-subparagraph (d)(2)(B)(ii), the actor must reasonably believe[19] that every person under 18 years of age who is depicted in the image gives "effective consent" to the actor to engage in the conduct that constitutes the offense. The "in fact" specified in paragraph (d)(2) applies to sub-subparagraph (d)(2)(B)(ii) and no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to sub-subparagraph (d)(2)(B)(ii). However, sub-subparagraph (d)(2)(B)(ii) still requires that the actor subjectively believe that every person under 18 years of age who is depicted in the image gives "effective consent" to the actor to engage in the conduct that constitutes the offense, and that belief must be reasonable. Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[20] "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception."

Paragraph (d)(3) establishes an affirmative defense if the actor and the complainant are in a marriage, domestic partnership, or dating relationship. Paragraph (d)(3) specifies "in fact." "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, "in fact" applies to every element that follows unless a culpable mental state is specified. Here, the "in fact" specified in paragraph (d)(3) applies to the remaining elements of the defense under subparagraphs (d)(3)(A) through (d)(3)(D) and there is no culpable mental state requirement for any of these elements.

There are several requirements to the affirmative defense under paragraph (d)(3). First, per subparagraph (d)(3)(A), the affirmative defense only applies if the actor is at least 18 years of age. An actor that is under the age of 18 years has the broader affirmative defense under paragraph (d)(2) that applies to any actor under the age of 18 years, regardless of the actor's relationship to the complainant. Under sub-subparagraphs (d)(3)(B)(i) and (d)(3)(B)(ii), the actor must either be married to, or in a domestic partnership with, the complainant, or be in a "romantic, dating, or sexual relationship" with the complainant (sub-subparagraph (d)(3)(B)(ii)). "Domestic partnership" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 and the reference to a "romantic, dating, or sexual relationship" is identical to the language in the District's current definition of "intimate partner violence"[21] and is intended to have the same meaning. There are additional requirements if the actor is in a "romantic, dating, or sexual relationship" with the complainant under sub-subparagraph (d)(3)(B)(ii). When the complainant is under 16 years of age, the actor must be less than four years older (sub-sub-subparagraph (d)(3)(B)(ii)(I)), and when the complainant is under 18 years of age and the actor is at least four years older, the actor must not be in a "position of trust with or authority over" the complainant (sub-sub-subparagraph (d)(3)(B)(ii)(II)). "Position of trust with or authority over" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701. The requirements in sub-sub-subparagraphs (d)(3)(B)(ii)(I) and (d)(3)(B)(ii)(II) mirror the requirements for liability in the RCC sexual abuse of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1302).

There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

Second, per subparagraph (d)(3)(C), the complainant must be the only person who is depicted in the image, or the actor and the complainant must be the only persons who are depicted in the image. The marriage or romantic partner defense is not available when the image shows third persons. Third, per subparagraph (d)(3)(D), the actor must "reasonably believe"[22] that the complainant gives "effective consent" to the actor to engage in the conduct that constitutes the offense. "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception."

Paragraph (d)(4) establishes an affirmative defense for the innocent display or distribution of a prohibited image in certain socially beneficial situations. Subparagraph (d)(4)A requires that the actor must have the intent "exclusively and in good faith, to report possible illegal conduct or seek legal counsel from any attorney."[23] Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that the defendant successfully reported illegal conduct or sought legal counsel, only that the defendant believed to a practical certainty that he or she would do so. Subparagraph (d)(4)(B) specifies "in fact." "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC §

[23] In addition to criminal defense advice, legal advice can include civil proceedings such as custody and abuse and neglect.

22E-207, "in fact" applies to every element that follows unless a culpable mental state is specified. Here, "in fact" applies to subparagraphs (d)(4)(B), sub-subparagraphs (d)(4)(B)(i) and (d)(4)(B)(ii), and sub-subparagraphs (d)(4)(C)(i) and (d)(4)(C)(ii) and there is no culpable mental state requirement for any of the elements in these subparagraphs or sub-subparagraphs. Subparagraph (d)(4)(B) requires that the actor promptly contact a person the actor reasonably believes[24] is a person specified in sub-subparagraphs (d)(4)(C)(i) and (d)(4)(C)(ii), such as a "law enforcement officer" or a person responsible under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant that the actor reasonably believes[25] is depicted in the image or involved in the creation of the image. "Law enforcement officer" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701. Per sub-subparagraph (d)(4)(C)(i) and sub-subparagraph (d)(4)(C)(ii), the actor must also promptly distribute the image to one of the specified individuals or authorities, without making or retaining a copy, or allow a law enforcement agency access to the image.

Paragraph (d)(5) establishes an affirmative defense for employees of a school, museum, library, movie theater, or other venue. "Movie theater" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701. Paragraph (d)(5) specifies "in fact." Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, "in fact" applies to every element that follows unless a culpable mental state is specified. Here, "in fact" applies to subparagraphs (d)(5)(A), (d)(5)(B), and (d)(5)(C) and there is no culpable mental state requirement for any of the elements in these subparagraphs. The employee must be acting in the reasonable scope of his or her employment and have no control over the creation or selection of the image. The defense is intended to shield from liability individuals who otherwise meet the elements of the offense, but only because it was part of the ordinary course of employment.

Subsection (d)(6) establishes an affirmative defense for when the actor possesses the image, with intent, exclusively and in good faith, to permanently dispose of the item, and, in fact, the actor does not possess the item longer than is reasonably necessary to permanently dispose of the item.[26] Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's

[24] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist.

[25] As was stated earlier, the "in fact" specified in subparagraph (d)(4)(B) applies to sub-subparagraphs (d)(4)(B)(i) and (d)(4)(B)(ii), and no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to these sub-subparagraphs. However, the actor must subjectively believe that the person is one of the specified individuals in sub-subparagraphs (d)(4)(B)(i) and (d)(4)(B)(ii), and that belief must be reasonable. Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others. See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

[26] For example, the defense may arise if a person finds prints of images subject to prosecution under RCC § 22E-1808 in an outdoor location and carries them on their person for a short period of time with intent exclusively and in good faith to destroy the images.

culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that the defendant successfully disposed of the item, only that the defendant believed to a practical certainty that he or she would do so. "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that, applied here, specifies that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to whether the item was possessed no longer than reasonably necessary to dispose of it. This defense is substantially similar to the temporary possession defense in RCC § 22E-502.

Subsection (e) specifies relevant penalties for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (f) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC and the federal code.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised possession of an obscene image of a minor statute clearly changes current District law in twelve main ways.

First, the revised possession of an obscene image statute punishes possessing a prohibited image less severely than creating, displaying, distributing, selling, or advertising a prohibited image. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute has the same penalties for creating, displaying, distributing, selling, advertising, and possessing an image,[27] even though creating and distributing are direct forms of child abuse[28] and selling and advertising are "an integral part" of the market.[29] In contrast, the revised possession of a prohibited image statute punishes possessing a prohibited image less severely than creating, displaying, distributing, selling, or advertising an image in the RCC creating or trafficking an obscene image offense (RCC § 22E-1807). Having the same penalties for this wide spectrum of conduct is disproportionate and inconsistent with the penalty scheme in other current District offenses.[30] As part of this revision, the [27] D.C. Code §§ 22-3102(a)(1), (a)(2), (b) (prohibiting "employs, authorizes, or induces a person under 18 years of age to engage in a sexual performance," "being the parent, legal guardian, or custodian of a minor, he or she consents to the participation by a minor in a sexual performance," "produces, directs, or promotes" any sexual performance, and "attend, transmit, or possess" any sexual performance), 22-3104 (punishing a first violation "of this chapter" with a maximum term of imprisonment of 10 years and a second or subsequent offense with a maximum term of imprisonment of 20 years).

[28] See, e.g., New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747, 758, (1982) ("The legislative judgment, as well as the judgment found in the relevant literature, is that the use of children as subjects of pornographic materials is harmful to the physiological, emotional, and mental health of the child."); id. at 759 ("The distribution of photographs and films depicting sexual activity by juveniles is intrinsically related to the sexual abuse of children in at least two ways. First, the materials produced are a permanent record of the children's participation and the harm to the child is exacerbated by their circulation. Second, the distribution network for child pornography must be closed if the production of material which requires the sexual exploitation of children is to be effectively controlled.").

[29] Ferber, 458 U.S. at 761 ("The advertising and selling of child pornography provide an economic motive for and are thus an integral part of the production of such materials, an activity illegal throughout the Nation.").

[30] See, e.g., D.C. Code §§ 22-3231 and 22-3232 (trafficking in stolen property offense with a maximum term of imprisonment of 10 years and receiving stolen property offense with a maximum term of imprisonment of either seven years or 180 days, depending on the value of the property); 48-904.01(a)(1), (a)(2), (d)(1), (d)(2) (penalizing the manufacture, distribution, or possession with intent to manufacture or distribute a controlled substance with a maximum term of imprisonment of 30 years, 5 years, 3 years, or 1 revised statute no longer uses the term "promote" or its definition in the current statute and splits the conduct referred to in that definition between the revised creating or trafficking an obscene image and possession of an obscene image offenses.[31] This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense.

Second, the revised possession of an obscene image statute grades penalties based upon the sexual conduct depicted in the image. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute prohibits images of "sexual conduct,"[32] a defined term including both penetration and lewd exhibition, with no distinction in penalty between the different types of sexual conduct. In contrast, the RCC possession of an obscene image statute reserves first degree for actual or simulated sexual acts, sadomasochistic abuse, or masturbation, as well as sexual displays of the genitals, pubic area, or anus, when there is less than a full opaque covering. Second degree of the revised possession of an obscene image statute is limited to an "obscene," as defined in RCC § 22E-701, sexual contact or sexualized display of the breast below the top of the areola or the buttocks, when there is less than a full opaque covering. Having the same penalties for different types of sexual conduct is disproportionate and inconsistent with the penalty scheme in current District sex offenses.[33] This change improves the consistency, proportionality, and constitutionality of the revised statute.

Third, the revised possession of an obscene image statute expands the prohibited sexual conduct to include "simulated" sadomasochistic abuse, "simulated" masturbation, and an obscene "sexual contact." The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute prohibits actual masturbation and sadomasochistic abuse,[34] but does not extend to "simulated" masturbation or sadomasochistic abuse, or to sexual touching beyond that year, depending on the type of controlled substance, but penalizing the possession of any drug other than liquid PCP with a maximum term of imprisonment of 180 days).

[31] The current statute prohibits "promot[ing]" any sexual performance of a minor and defines "promote" as "to procure, manufacture, issue, sell, give, provide, lend, mail, deliver, transfer, transmute, publish or distribute, circulate, disseminate, present, exhibit, or advertise, or to offer or agree to do the same." D.C. Code §§ 22-3102(a)(2), 22-3101(4). There is no DCCA case law on the scope of this definition. The revised possession of an obscene image statute criminalizes as possession, with a lower penalty, certain aspects of the current definition of "promote": 1) "manufacture[s]" or "transmute[s]" an image; and 2) "procure"; and The commentary to the RCC trafficking an obscene image of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1807) discusses the remainder of the current definition of "promote."

[32] D.C. Code §§ 22-3102(b) ("It shall be unlawful in the District of Columbia for a person, knowing the character and content thereof, to attending, transmit, or possess a sexual performance by a minor."), 22-3101(5), (6) (defining "sexual performance" as "any performance or part thereof which includes sexual conduct by a person under 18 years of age," and "sexual conduct" as "(A) Actual or simulated sexual intercourse: (i) Between the penis and the vulva, anus, or mouth; (ii) Between the mouth and the vulva or anus; or (iii) Between an artificial sexual organ or other object or instrument used in the manner of an artificial sexual organ and the anus or vulva; (B) Masturbation; (C) Sexual bestiality; (D) Sadomasochistic sexual activity for the purpose of sexual stimulation; or (E) Lewd exhibition of the genitals.").

[33] The District's current sex offenses generally penalize a "sexual act," which requires penetration, more severely than "sexual contact." D.C. Code §§ 22-3001(8), (9), 22-3002 through 22-3005, 22-3008 through 22-3009.04, 22-3013 through 22-3016.

[34] D.C. Code § 22-3101(5) (defining "sexual conduct" as "(A) Actual or simulated sexual intercourse: (i) Between the penis and the vulva, anus, or mouth; (ii) Between the mouth and the vulva or anus; or (iii) Between an artificial sexual organ or other object or instrument used in the manner of an artificial sexual organ and the anus or vulva; (B) Masturbation; (C) Sexual bestiality; (D) Sadomasochistic sexual activity for the purpose of sexual stimulation; or (E) Lewd exhibition of the genitals.").

required for masturbation or a "lewd exhibition of the genitals." The possession of images of minors engaging in "simulated" sadomasochistic abuse, "simulated" masturbation, and obscene "sexual contact" may be criminalized in the current D.C. Code obscenity statute.[35] The current D.C. Code obscenity statute is penalized as a misdemeanor for a first offense,[36] with no enhancements for the obscene materials depicting a minor.[37] In contrast, first degree of the revised possession of an obscene image statute includes "simulated" masturbation and "simulated" sadomasochistic abuse, and second degree includes an obscene "sexual contact." "Simulated," "obscene," and "sexual contact" are defined in RCC § 22E-701, consistent with other RCC offenses. As defined, such sexual conduct may be as graphic[38] as other conduct penalized by the current statute, such as "simulated" sexual penetration, as well as sexual contact involved in masturbation and a "lewd exhibition of the genitals."[39] Criminalization of this conduct is within the bounds of Supreme Court First Amendment case law.[40] This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute.

Fourth, the revised possession of an obscene image statute expands the prohibited sexual conduct to include a sexual display of the "pubic area or anus, when there is less than a full opaque covering" and an "obscene sexual or sexualized display of the breast below the top of the areola, or the buttocks, when there is less than a full opaque covering." The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute is limited to a [35] The current obscenity statute, D.C. Code § 22-2201, generally criminalizes the possession of "obscene, indecent, or filthy" images without further specification of the relevant conduct. The current obscenity statute does not define the terms "obscene," "indecent," or "filthy," but the DCCA has stated that they must meet the standard for obscenity in Miller v. California. See Retzer v. United States, 363 A.2d 307, 309 (D.C. 1976) (stating that Miller made it clear that any vagueness defects in the statute's terminology may be cured by judicial construction).

[36] D.C. Code § 22-2201(e) ("A person convicted of violating subsection (a) or (b) of this section shall for the 1st offense be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not more than 180 days, or both. A person convicted of a 2nd or subsequent offense under subsection (a) or (b) of this section shall be fined not less than $1,000 and not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not less than 6 months or more than 3 years, or both.").

[37] Obscenity is not a "crime of violence," so there is no penalty enhancement for a minor victim under D.C. Code § 22–3611.

[38] Examples of "simulated" sadomasochistic abuse, "simulated" masturbation, and an obscene "sexual contact" that are not covered by the current sexual performance of a minor statute but would be covered under the revised possession of an obscene image of a minor statute include: 1) an adult dressed in a sexual leather outfit wielding an actual whip towards a crying 9 year old, but, due to the camera angle, it is impossible to see if the whip is actually making contact; 2) A 12 year old sitting provocatively, legs spread, naked except for underwear, making rubbing gestures around his or her genitalia that suggest masturbation, but it is impossible to tell if there is actual contact with the genitalia; and 3) A prepubescent girl wearing skimpy lingerie or a sexual leather outfit that fully covers her breasts, but she is rubbing them and making suggestive facial expressions.

[39] See D.C. Code § 22-3101(5) (defining "sexual conduct.").

[40] In United States v. Williams, the Court held that a child pornography statute that defined "sexually explicit conduct" to include simulated masturbation and simulated sadistic or masochistic abuse was not overbroad. United States v. Williams, 553 U.S. 285, 288, 290, 307 (2008). The obscenity requirement for "obscene sexual contact" ensures that this provision is constitutional. See Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234, 250, 251 (2002) (stating that Ferber "reaffirmed that where the speech is neither obscene nor the product of sexual abuse, it does not fall outside the protection of the First Amendment.").

"lewd exhibition of the genitals."[41] However, the possession of images of minors engaging in a sexual display of the "pubic area or anus, when there is less than a full opaque covering" and an "obscene sexual or sexualized display of the breast below the top of the areola, or the buttocks, when there is less than a full opaque covering" may be criminalized in the current D.C. Code obscenity statute.[42] The current D.C. Code obscenity statute is punished as a misdemeanor for a first offense,[43] with no enhancements for the obscene materials depicting a minor.[44] In contrast, the RCC revised possession of an obscene image statute criminalizes possessing certain depictions of the pubic area[45] and anus in first degree, and an "obscene sexual or sexualized display of the breast below the top of the areola, or the buttocks" in second degree.[46] As defined,

[41] D.C. Code § 22-3101(5)(E).

[42] The current obscenity statute, D.C. Code § 22-2201 generally criminalizes the possession of "obscene, indecent, or filthy" images without further specification of the relevant conduct. The current obscenity statute does not define the terms "obscene," "indecent," or "filthy," but the DCCA has stated that they must meet the standard for obscenity in Miller v. California. See Retzer v. United States, 363 A.2d 307, 309 (D.C. 1976) (stating that Miller made it clear that any vagueness defects in the statute's terminology may be cured by judicial construction).

[43] D.C. Code § 22-2201(e) ("A person convicted of violating subsection (a) or (b) of this section shall for the 1st offense be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not more than 180 days, or both. A person convicted of a 2nd or subsequent offense under subsection (a) or (b) of this section shall be fined not less than $1,000 and not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not less than 6 months or more than 3 years, or both.").

[44] Obscenity is not a "crime of violence," so there is no penalty enhancement for a minor victim under D.C. Code § 22–3611.

[45] Reference to "pubic area" is intended to include liability for a frontal nude image of a minor where the groin is visible but not the external genitalia.

[46] There is no obscenity requirement for the prohibited sexual displays of the pubic area or anus in first degree because the harm inflicted on the complainant in creating or distributing these images is sufficient under the First Amendment, even when the defendant only possesses these images. Conversely, there is an obscenity requirement for the prohibited sexual display of the breast or buttocks in second degree because the conduct otherwise may not be sufficiently graphic to survive constitutional scrutiny. In New York v. Ferber, the Supreme Court established that live or visual sexual depictions of real children do not have to be "obscene" and are not entitled to First Amendment protection. Specifically, the Court held that a New York statute did not violate the First Amendment when the statute banned the production and distribution of live or visual depictions of specified sexual conduct with minors and had a mental state requirement for the defendant. New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747, 764-66 (1982). Although Ferber was specific to the creation and distribution of visual sexual depictions of minors, the Court later held in Osborne v. Ohio that a state can constitutionally proscribe "the possession and viewing of child pornography" due, in part, to the same rationales the Court accepted in Ferber. Osborne v. Ohio, 459 U.S. 103, 111 (1990). The Supreme Court has not established bright line rules for what sexual conduct involving children, without an obscenity requirement, satisfies the First Amendment. However, in Ferber, the Court noted that the prohibited sexual conduct at issue "represent[s] the kind of conduct that, if it were the theme of a work, could render it legally obscene: actual or simulated sexual intercourse, deviate sexual intercourse, sexual bestiality, masturbation, sado-masochistic abuse, or lewd exhibition of the genitals." In United States v. Williams, the Court held that the child pornography statute at issue was not overbroad. United States v. Williams, 553 U.S. 285, 288, 307 (2008). In Williams, the federal statute at issue defined "sexually explicit conduct" as "actual or simulated—(i) sexual intercourse, including genital-genital, oral-genital, anal-genital, or oral-anal, whether between persons of the same or opposite sex; (ii) bestiality; (iii) masturbation; (iv) sadistic or masochistic abuse; or (v) lascivious exhibition of the genitals or pubic area of any person." Id. at 290. First degree of the RCC possession of an obscene image statute prohibits the same conduct as the statute in Williams with two exceptions: 1) It includes a sexualized display of the anus and for all sexualized displays display of the pubic area or anus is as graphic as other conduct penalized by the current statute, such as a "lewd exhibition of the genitals," and obscene images of the breast or buttock of a minor warrant greater punishment than other forms of obscene materials concerning adults. The RCC criminalizes obscene displays of any breast, as opposed to only the female breast, to recognize that the display of a male breast may be sexualized to the point of being obscene under a Miller standard and, if that occurs, more severe punishment than other forms of obscene materials concerning adults is warranted. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute.

Fifth, the revised possession of an obscene image statute expands the "innocent possession" affirmative defense in the current sexual performance of a minor statute to include conduct involving more images and display or distribution to authorities other than law enforcement, so long as the actor has a socially beneficial intent. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute has an affirmative defense for possessing five or fewer images or one motion picture and requires either that the defendant take reasonable steps to destroy the material or report the material to a law enforcement agency and afford that agency access.[47] There is no DCCA case law interpreting the current defense. In contrast, the RCC affirmative defense is available for possessing any number of images, if the actor also promptly contacts a specified individual, such as a law enforcement officer or person with a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant that the actor reasonably believed to be depicted in the image or involved in the depiction when the actor has the intent "exclusively and in good faith, to report possible illegal conduct or seek legal counsel from any attorney." The actor must also distribute the image to one of the specified authorities or afford a law enforcement agency access. The current affirmative defense unnecessarily restricts the number of images or motion pictures and excludes well-intentioned individuals who seek legal advice or report images to authorities other than law enforcement. The expanded defense recognizes that parents, schools, and others have a vital interest in addressing wrongful creation, distribution, and sale of prohibited images, and good faith sharing of information such authorities should not be a crime.[48] in first degree, explicitly requires less than a full opaque covering; and 2) It does not extend "simulated" to a sexual or sexualized display. These are not significant differences. In sum, first degree of the RCC possession of an obscene image statute prohibits sexual conduct that is graphic enough without an obscenity requirement. Second degree of the revised possession of an obscene image statute prohibits conduct that is generally less graphic than the conduct in Ferber and Williams. However, the obscenity requirement ensures that the provision is constitutional. See Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234, 250, 251 (2002) (stating that Ferber "reaffirmed that where the speech is neither obscene nor the product of sexual abuse, it does not fall outside the protection of the First Amendment.").

[47] D.C. Code § 22-3104(c) ("It shall be an affirmative defense to a charge under § 22-3102 that the defendant: (1) Possessed or accessed less than 6 still photographs or one motion picture, however produced or reproduced, of a sexual performance by a minor; and (2) Promptly and in good faith, and without retaining, copying, or allowing any person, other than a law enforcement agency, to access any photograph or motion picture: (A) Took reasonable steps to destroy each such photograph or motion picture; or (B) Reported the matter to a law enforcement agency and afforded that agency access to each such photograph or motion picture.").

[48] For example, if a parent discovers multiple video clips on their child's phone of what appear to be another minor engaging in sexual conduct at the child's school, the parent should be able to send the video to school administrators, the parents of the minor, and/or possibly an attorney for further investigation and resolution without having committed a crime.

The number of images or motion pictures an individual possesses is not limited, but may be relevant to a fact finders' determination of the actor's intent. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute.

Sixth, the revised possession of an obscene image statute codifies an affirmative defense for conduct that occurs in the context of marriage, domestic partnership, and other romantic relationships. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute does not have a defense for actors that engage in the prohibited conduct with minors to whom they are married or with whom they are in a domestic partnership or romantic relationship. This approach differs from several of the current sexual abuse statutes, which have a marriage or domestic partnership defense that decriminalizes sexual conduct that only involves the defendant and the minor.[49] The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute does have a "sexting" exception that includes an adult not more than four years older than a minor, but it is limited to possessing an image[50] and excludes marriages, domestic partnerships, and romantic relationships with a greater than four year age difference. There is no DCCA case law interpreting the scope of this "sexting" exception. In contrast, the revised possession of an obscene image statute makes it an affirmative defense that the actor is married to, or in a domestic partnership or "romantic, dating, or sexual relationship" with the complainant, with several additional requirements. The prohibited conduct must be limited to the actor and the complainant or just the complainant, and the actor must reasonably believe that the actor has the complainant's effective consent. The "effective consent" requirements are consistent with the consent defense in the revised sexual assault statute (RCC § 22E-1301) and other RCC offenses. Without this defense, the revised possession statute would criminalize possessing images of consensual sexual behavior between spouses and domestic partners that may not be criminal under the current or RCC age-based sexual abuse statutes. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute.

Seventh, the revised statute applies the current affirmative defense for a librarian or motion picture theater employee to possessing an image and expands the defense to include similarly positioned employees of museums, schools, and other venues. The current D.C. Code statute has an affirmative defense to "produc[ing], direct[ing], or

[49] D.C. Code § 22-3011(b) ("Marriage or domestic partnership between the defendant and the child or minor at the time of the offense is a defense, which the defendant must establish by a preponderance of the evidence, to a prosecution under §§ 22-3008 to 22-3010.01, prosecuted alone or in conjunction with charges under § 22-3018 or § 22-403, involving only the defendant and the child or minor."). In the current sexual abuse statutes a "child" is a person under the age of 16 years and a "minor" is a person under the age of 18 years. D.C. Code § 22-3001(3), (5A). The marriage and domestic partnership defense applies to the current child sexual abuse statutes (D.C. Code §§ 22-3008 and 22-3009), the sexual abuse of a minor statutes (D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.01 and 22-3009.02), enticing a child or minor (D.C. Code § 22-3010), and misdemeanor sexual abuse of a child or minor (D.C. Code § 22-3010.01). These current sex offenses are based on the ages of the complainant and the defendant, as opposed to whether force, coercion, etc., was present.

[50] D.C. Code § 22-3102(c)(2) ("If the sexual performance consists solely of a still or motion picture, then this section: (2) Shall not apply to possession of a still or motion picture by . . . an adult not more than 4 years older than the minor or minors depicted in it, who receives it from a minor depicted in it unless the recipient knows that at least one of the minors depicted in the still or motion picture did not consent to its transmission.").

promot[ing]"[51] any sexual performance of a minor[52] for a "librarian engaged in the normal course of his or her employment"[53] and certain movie theater employees[54] if the librarian or movie theater employee does not have a financial interest in the sexual performance.[55] There is no DCCA case law interpreting this defense. In contrast, the revised possession of an obscene image statute applies this defense to possessing a prohibited image and expands the defense to include employees at museums, schools, and other venues who may face similar situations, provided that the conduct is within the reasonable scope of employment and the employee has no control over the creation or selection of the image.[56] Practically, the expanded defense provides a clearer safe-harbor for these employees but may do little or no work in reducing liability beyond that provided by the revised statute's defense in paragraph (d)(1) to first degree for images with serious artistic or other value, or, in second degree, the argument that the images are not "obscene." This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Eighth, the revised possession of an obscene image statute has an affirmative defense for subsection (a) that the image has serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value, when considered as a whole. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute does not have any defense if the image has serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value, when considered as a whole. As a result, the current statute appears to criminalize the possession of materials like medical textbooks, pictures or videos of newsworthy events, or artistic films that display real minors engaging in the prohibited sexual conduct. There is no DCCA case law on whether the current statute would be unconstitutional in these and other similar situations, but Supreme Court case law indicates that the current statute may be unconstitutional as applied to images with [51] As is discussed elsewhere in this commentary, the current definition of "promote" appears to include purely possessory conduct, such as "procures." D.C. Code § 22-3101(4). Thus, it is possible that the current affirmative defense could be construed to include mere possession of prohibited images.

[52] The affirmative defense only applies to "D.C. Code § 22-3102(2)." D.C. Code § 22-3104(b)(1). However, "D.C. Code § 22-3102(2)" is not an accurate citation for the current sexual performance using a minor statute. Given the remainder of the current sexual performance using a minor statute and the additional requirements of this affirmative defense, the correct citation should be "D.C. Code § 22-3102(a)(2)." The organic act for the current sexual performance using a minor statute confirms this interpretation, and the omission of subsection (a) appears to be a codification error.

[53] D.C. Code § 22-3104(b)(1)(A).

[54] The specific movie theater employees are a "motion picture projectionist, stage employee or spotlight operator, cashier, doorman, usher, candy stand attendant, porter, or in any other nonmanagerial or nonsupervisory capacity in a motion picture theater." D.C. Code § 22-3104(b)(1)(B).

[55] D.C. Code § 22-3104(b)(2) ("The affirmative defense provided by paragraph (1) of this subsection shall not apply if the person described therein has a financial interest (other than his or her employment, which employment does not encompass compensation based upon any proportion of the gross receipts) in: (A) The promotion of a sexual performance for sale, rental, or exhibition; (B) The direction of any sexual performance; or (C) The acquisition of the performance for sale, retail, or exhibition.").

[56] For example, the defense would not apply to the curator of an art museum who selects prohibited images for an exhibition and otherwise meets the elements of the revised offense. However, the defense would apply to an art museum usher who possesses the images while constructing the exhibition or arranging for-sale prints of the image in the gallery gift shop. It should be noted that for first degree of the revised offense, the curator would still be able to argue that the images had serious artistic value under the affirmative defense in subsection (d)(1) and, in second degree of the revised offense, that the images are not "obscene," as defined in RCC § 22E-701.

serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value, when considered as a whole.[57] In contrast, first degree of the revised possession of an obscene image statute has an affirmative defense that the image has serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value when considered as a whole. This language is taken from the Miller standard for obscenity, which requires the absence of these characteristics to be proven as an element of an obscenity offense.[58] This change improves the constitutionality of the revised statute.

Ninth, through the RCC definition of "image," the revised possession of an obscene image statute excludes hand-rendered depictions. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute defines "performance" as "any play, motion picture, photograph, electronic representation, dance, or any other visual presentation or exhibition."[59] There is no DCCA case law on the precise scope of "any visual presentation or exhibition," but the legislative history for the current statute seems to indicate that paintings, sculptures, and other hand rendered depictions would be included.[60] The Supreme Court struck down as unconstitutionally overbroad a federal statute on sexual images of minors in part because it applied to "any visual depiction" without regard to whether it was obscene, however, the ruling did not turn on the medium or method visual representation.[61] In contrast, through the definition of "image" in RCC

[57] In Ferber, the Court acknowledged that some applications of the statute at issue would be unconstitutional:

> We consider this the paradigmatic case of a state statute whose legitimate reach dwarfs its arguably impermissible applications. . . .While the reach of the statute is directed at the hard core of child pornography, the Court of Appeals was understandably concerned that some protected expression, ranging from medical textbooks to pictorials in the National Geographic would fall prey to the statute. How often, if ever, it may be necessary to employ children to engage in conduct clearly within the reach of [the statute] in order to produce educational, medical, or artistic works cannot be known with certainty. Yet we seriously doubt, and it has not been suggested, that these arguably impermissible applications of the statute amount to more than a tiny fraction of the materials within the statute's reach.

Ferber, 458 U.S. at 773. The Court found that the statute was not substantially overbroad and any overbreadth that exists could be addressed through as-applied constitutional challenges. Id. at 773-74. The material at issue in Ferber was two films that "almost entirely" depicted prohibited sexual activity and the Court determined the statute was not overbroad as applied to the respondent. Id. at 752, 774 & n 28.
The statute in Ferber prohibited the production and distribution of prohibited images, but the Court in Osborne v. Ohio recognized that overbreadth is also an issue in statutes that ban the possession of child pornography. Osborne v. Ohio, 495 U.S. 103, 112, 113, 114 (1990) (stating that "in light of the statute's exemptions and 'proper purposes' provisions, the statute [at issue] may not be substantially overbroad in our cases" and that the appellant's "overbreadth challenge, in any event, fails" because the Ohio Supreme Court had construed the statute to "avoid[] penalizing persons for viewing or possessing innocuous photographs of naked children.").

[58] Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 14, 24 (1973).

[59] D.C. Code § 22-3101(3).

[60] See Council of the District of Columbia, Report of the Committee of the Judiciary, Bill 4-305, The "District of Columbia Protection of Minors Act of 1982" at 8 (stating that the definition of "performance" is mean to "to include any visual presentation or exhibition without regard to the medium.").

[61] In Aschcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, the Supreme Court held that a provision in a federal statute that extended to "any visual depiction" that "is, or appears to be a minor engaging in sexually explicit conduct" was unconstitutionally overbroad. Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234, 241, 256 (2002). However, most of the Court's analysis focused on the "appears to be language," and it was in this context

§ 22E-701, the revised trafficking an obscene image statute is limited to images that are not hand-rendered. Limiting the revised statute to images that are not hand-rendered helps ensure that the images feature "real" minors,[62] and, for second degree, that the images are "patently offensive" under modern community standards per Miller v. California.[63] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and constitutionality of the revised statute.

Tenth, the revised statute excludes liability for commercial telecommunications service providers. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute makes it unlawful to "transmit" a still or motion picture depicting a sexual performance by a minor "by any means, including electronically."[64] The statutes make no exception for a company or employee who merely facilitates the transmission of an image or sound at a user's request, and in doing so, possesses it. District case law has not addressed the issue. In contrast, the revised possession of an obscene image offense excludes liability for any licensee under the Communications Act of 1934,[65] such as a radio station, television broadcaster, or phone service provider, consistent with the current and revised obscenity offenses.[66] The revised offense also excludes liability for any interactive computer service, as defined in section 230(e)(2) of the Communications Act of 1934,[67] for content provided by another person, consistent with the current and revised nonconsensual pornography offenses.[68] This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense.

that the Court also discussed the problematic scope of "any visual depiction," noting that "the literal terms of the statute embrace a Renaissance painting depicting a scene from classical mythology" because it is a "picture" that "appears to be, of a minor engaging in sexually explicit conduct." Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. at 241. The Court in Free Speech Coalition also noted that these images "do not involve . . . let alone harm any children in the production process," id. at 241, and, accordingly found the Government's arguments for the restriction unpersuasive, id. at 246-56, 256. Although not squarely addressed in the opinion, it seems clear that the medium of a visual depiction is not dispositive in the constitutional analysis. A watercolor painting that is derived from painting live conduct is still a product of child sexual abuse and may be prohibited. Id. at 249 ("Where the images are themselves the product of child sexual abuse, Ferber recognized that the State had an interest in stamping it out without regard to any judgment about its content. . . . The fact that a work contained serious literary, artistic, or other value did not excuse the harm to its child participants.").

[62] The Supreme Court held in Osborne v. Ohio that a state can constitutionally proscribe "the possession and viewing of child pornography." Osborne v. Ohio, 459 U.S. 103, 111 (1990). Osborne did not explicitly state that the children must be "real" children, but in Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, the Court held that a federal statute that banned possession of images of what "is, or appears to be" minors engaged in prohibited sexual conduct was overbroad, in part because it could extend to "virtual child pornography" that does not use or harm real children. Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234, 239, 241, 256 (2002). However, for many hand-rendered depictions, such as paintings, it may be difficult to determine if the depiction was of a "real" minor or just an individual's artistic rendering. For example, a defendant that owns a realistic painting of female genitalia falls within the scope of the current statute, but without additional information, it is impossible to know if the painting is of a "real" minor. If the painting is not of a "real" minor, and is not otherwise obscene, it is unconstitutional to prohibit its creation, distribution, etc.

Eleventh, the revised possession of an obscene image statute extends liability to the knowing possession of an "electronically received or accessible" image the same as to any other prohibited image of a minor. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute states that possession "requires accessing the sexual performance if electronically received or available."[69] There is no DCCA case law on this language limiting possession liability. The definition does not impose any limitations on possession of any other type of image (i.e. not "electronically received or available"). In contrast, through use of the RCC definition of "possession,"[70] the revised offense includes liability for constructive possession of an "electronically received or accessible" image the same as other images. The plain language of the current statute appears to categorically exclude liability for a person who, "knowing the character and content thereof," retains possession of prohibited images without actually accessing them, regardless of the method of delivery.[71] Use of the standard RCC definition of "possession" and its constructive possession requirements to have "the ability and desire to exercise control over" the image assigns criminal liability consistent with other RCC and current D.C. law concerning contraband. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised offense, and closes a gap in liability.

Twelfth, the revised statute includes an affirmative defense to possession when the person does so with intent, exclusively and in good faith, to permanently destroy the image and does not possess the item longer than reasonably necessary to do so. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute does not have any defense for temporary possession with intent to destroy an image, and there is no case law on point. In contrast, the RCC defense recognizes the need to shield socially beneficial conduct intended to destroy an image subject to prosecution under RCC §22E-1808.[72] This affirmative defense is consistent with the requirements of the temporary possession defense, RCC § 22E-502. This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Beyond these twelve changes to current District law, six other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

[69] D.C. Code § 22-3102(d)(1) ("For the purposes of subsections (b) and (c) of this section, the term 'possess,' 'possession,' or 'possessing requires accessing the sexual performance if electronically received or available.").

[70] The definition of "possession" in RCC § 22E-701 requires a person to "hold or carry on one's person" or to "have the ability and desire to exercise control over."

[71] It is unclear why a person who knowingly receives a package containing prohibited images, and without opening the package, stores them for future viewing should be liable for possession, but a person who knowingly receives electronic files or a password to an online vault containing prohibited images and stores the file or password for future viewing is not.

[72] Note that the defense is not necessary when, for example, a person finds an image and immediately discards or abandons the image. Such a person has not met the basic elements of the statute as the possession was not "voluntary" within the meaning of § 22E-203. See commentary to § 22E-203. Moreover, the fact that a discarded image may reside in a trash can (a physical can or on a computer) in a location owned by the actor does not necessarily amount to proof of possession unless it is proven that, per the definition of "possession," the actor knowingly had "the ability and desire to exercise control over" the image. The need for the affirmative defense in RCC § 22E-1808 only arises when the actor has possession for a significant (but reasonable) amount of time with intent to permanently dispose of the image.

First, the revised possession of an obscene image statute clarifies the requirements for "possession" and requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state for this element. Additionally, although the current D.C. Code statute requires the defendant to "know[] the character and content" of the sexual performance,[73] it does not specify whether this culpable mental state extends to possession, and the definition of "knowingly"[74] in the current statute is unclear. There is no DCCA case law on these issues. The current D.C. Code obscenity statute has a substantively identical definition of "knowingly,"[75] which the DCCA has interpreted as requiring subjective knowledge of the sexual nature of the material at issue.[76] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised possession of an obscene image statute requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-206, for possessing an image. Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence[77] and is consistent with numerous other RCC offenses that apply a "knowingly" culpable mental state to prohibited conduct. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised offense.

Second, the revised possession of an obscene image statute requires recklessness as to the content of the image and, in second degree, as to whether the content is obscene. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute requires the defendant to "know[] the character and content" of the sexual performance[78] and defines "knowingly" as "having general knowledge of, or reason to know or a belief or ground for belief which warrants further inspection or inquiry, or both."[79] There is no DCCA case law interpreting the definition of "knowingly"[80] or how it applies to the current statute. The current obscenity statute has a substantively identical definition of "knowingly,"[81] which the DCCA has interpreted as requiring subjective knowledge of the sexual nature of the material at issue.[82] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised possession of an obscene image statute requires recklessness as to the content of the image,[83] and, in second degree, as to whether the content is "obscene," as defined in RCC § 22-701. Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence,[84] but courts have also recognized that recklessness regarding a risk of serious harm is wrongful conduct.[85] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

[74] The current statute defines "knowingly" as "having general knowledge of, or reason to know or a belief or ground for belief which warrants further inspection or inquiry, or both." D.C. Code § 22-3101(1). It is unclear whether this definition requires the defendant to have subjective knowledge, or requires a lower culpable mental state akin to recklessness or negligence. There is no DCCA case law on this definition. The legislative history notes that the definition was used "as opposed to the more general definition of 'knowing or having reasonable grounds to believe'" and that the definition was used to "comport with the scienter requirement in [New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747 (1982)]." Presumably then, per Ferber, the District's statutory definition of "knowledge" was not intended to equate to negligence, and requires some degree of subjective awareness by the actor, either recklessness or knowledge.

[83] While the revised possession of an obscene image statute requires "recklessness" as to the content of the image (whether it depicts part or all of a real complainant under the age of 18 years engaging in the prohibited sexual conduct), the closely-related distribution of an obscene image statute (RCC § 22E-1805) and distribution of an obscene image to a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1806) require a higher "knowingly" culpable mental state for the equivalent element (whether an image depicts any person, real or fictitious, of any age, engaging in the prohibited sexual conduct). The higher culpable mental state in these offenses is warranted because they prohibit a much broader array of images.

Third, the revised possession of an obscene image statute requires that the image depicts at least part of a real complainant under the age of 18 years, and excludes purely computer-generated or other fictitious minors. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute does not specify whether the complainant that is depicted in an image must be a "real," i.e. not fictitious, complainant under the age of 18 years. The statute does define "minor," however, as "any person under 18 years of age,"[86] which arguably suggests that the complainant must be a "real," i.e. not fictitious, person. There is no DCCA case law on this issue. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised possession of an obscene image statute specifies that at least part[87] of a "real," i.e. not fictitious, complainant under the age of 18 years must be depicted or will be depicted. Requiring at least part of a "real" complainant under the age of 18 years ensures that the statute satisfies the First Amendment.[88] The RCC does not ban possession of obscene images that depict entirely computer-generated or other fictitious minors, although there is liability for the distribution of these images under the RCC distribution of an obscene image to a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1805) or distribution of an obscene image to a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1806). This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Fourth, through use of the defined term "simulated" in RCC § 22E-701, the revised statute excludes liability for images of sexual conduct that is apparently fake. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute prohibits "simulated" sexual intercourse,[89] but does not define the term. It is unclear whether "simulated" includes suggestive but obviously staged sex scenes like one might find in a commercially screened "R" or "NC-17" movie, or theatrical or comic portrayals of a sexual act that are clearly fake. There is no DCCA case law on this issue. Resolving this ambiguity, the RCC defines "simulated" as "feigned or pretended in a way that realistically duplicates the appearance of actual conduct to the perception of an average person." Under this definition, only highly explicit depictions where it is unclear due to lighting, etc., if the prohibited conduct is actually occurring are included in the revised [85] See Elonis v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2001, 2015 (2015) (J. Alito, concurring) ("In a wide variety of contexts, we have described reckless conduct as morally culpable.").

[86] D.C. Code § 22-3101(2).
[87] The revised possession statute includes composite images of minors if at least part of the composite is of a real minor, such as a real minor's head on an adult body, or an adult's head on a real minor's body. There is no requirement that the government prove the identity of a real minor.
[88] The Supreme Court held in Osborne v. Ohio that a state can constitutionally proscribe "the possession and viewing of child pornography." Osborne v. Ohio, 459 U.S. 103, 111 (1990). Osborne was not specific to images of minors where only part of the minor is real, but the Court stated in a later opinion that "[a]lthough morphed images may fall within the definition of virtual child pornography, they implicate the interests of real children and are in that sense closer to the images in Ferber." Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234, 242, (2002). The respondents in Ashcroft did not challenge the morphed images provision of the statute at issue and the Court did not discuss it further. The RCC requirement that the image is at least partially comprised of a real minor ensures the revised possession offense is constitutional.

statute,[90] not other portrayals that are clearly staged. This definition is similar to another jurisdiction's definition[91] and is supported by Supreme Court case law.[92] Possession of suggestive or obscene images that do not satisfy the definition of "simulated" is not prohibited in the RCC. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and constitutionality of the revised statute.

Fifth, the revised possession of an obscene image statute requires recklessness as to the age of the complainant and deletes the current affirmative defense for reasonable mistake of age. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute requires that the defendant "know[] the character and content" of the sexual performance[93] and defines "knowingly" as "having general knowledge of, or reason to know or a belief or ground for belief which warrants further inspection or inquiry, or both."[94] The legislative history states that the defendant must "know that the performance will depict a minor,"[95] but it is unclear whether the current definition of "knowingly" requires the defendant to have subjective knowledge, or requires a lower culpable mental state akin to recklessness or negligence.[96] There is no DCCA case law on this issue. However, the current statute

[90] For example, a simulated sexual act may clearly show male genitalia, female genitalia, and movement between two actors but, due to the angle of the camera, not show whether there was penetration.

[91] Utah Code Ann. § 76-5b-103(11) ("'Simulated sexually explicit conduct' means a feigned or pretended act of sexually explicit conduct which duplicates, within the perception of an average person, the appearance of an actual act of sexually explicit conduct.").

[92] In United States v. Williams, the Supreme Court stated that a federal statute that prohibited pandering or soliciting "an obscene visual depiction of a minor engaging in sexually explicit conduct" or "a visual depiction of an actual minor engaging in sexually explicit conduct," "precisely tracks the material held constitutionally proscribable in Ferber and Miller: obscene material depicting (actual or virtual) children engaged in sexually explicit conduct, and any other material depicting actual children engaged in sexually explicit conduct." United States v. Williams, 553 U.S. 285, 294 (2008). In dicta, the Court discussed the scope of "simulated sexual intercourse" in the statute's definition of "sexually explicit conduct":

> 'Sexually explicit conduct' connotes actual depiction of the sex act rather than merely the suggestion that it is occurring. And 'simulated' sexual intercourse is not sexual intercourse that is merely suggested, but rather sexual intercourse that is explicitly portrayed, even though (through camera tricks or otherwise) it may not actually have occurred. The portrayal must cause a reasonable viewer to believe that the actors actually engaged in that conduct on camera. Critically . . . [the statute's] requirement of a 'visual depiction of an actual minor' makes clear that, although the sexual intercourse may be simulated, it must involve actual children (unless it is obscene). This . . . eliminates any possibility that virtual child pornography or sex between youthful-looking adult actors might be covered by the term "simulated sexual intercourse.

[96] The legislative history notes that the definition of "knowingly" was used "as opposed to the more general definition of 'knowing or having reasonable grounds to believe'" and that the definition was used to "comport with the scienter requirement in [New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747 (1982)]." Council of the District of Columbia, Report of the Committee of the Judiciary, Bill 4-305, The "District of Columbia Protection of Minors Act of 1982" at 8. Ferber, however, did not state a specific mental state, only that "some element of scienter on the part of the defendant" was required. New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747, has an affirmative defense for a reasonable mistake of age,[97] which suggests that negligence is not sufficient for liability. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised possession of an obscene image statute requires recklessness as to the age of the complainant. A reckless culpable mental state preserves the substance of the affirmative defense[98] and clarifies that the defendant must have some subjective knowledge as to the age of the complainant. Requiring, at a minimum, a knowing culpable mental state for the elements of an offense that make otherwise legal conduct illegal is a generally accepted legal principle.[99] However, recklessness has been upheld in some cases as a minimal basis for punishing morally culpable crime.[100] Throughout the RCC, recklessness as to age is a consistent basis for penalty enhancement.[101] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Sixth, the revised possession of an obscene image statute clarifies the current exception to liability for conduct by persons under 18 years of age and makes it an affirmative defense. Under the current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute, minors are exempt from liability for possessing prohibited still images or motion pictures when the minor is the only person under 18 years of age that is depicted,[102] or when all the minors depicted in the still or motion picture consent.[103] The current exclusion does 765 (1982) (citing Smith v. California, 361 U.S. 147 (1959) and Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. 87 (1974)). Presumably then, per Ferber, the District's statutory definition of "knowledge" was not intended to equate to negligence, and requires some degree of subjective awareness by the actor, either recklessness or knowledge.

[97] D.C. Code § 22-3104(a) ("Under this chapter it shall be an affirmative defense that the defendant in good faith reasonably believed the person appearing in the performance was 18 years of age or over.").

[98] The current affirmative defense is that "the defendant in good faith reasonably believed the person appearing in the performance was 18 years of age or over." D.C. Code § 22-3104(a). In the revised possession of an obscene image statute, it must be proven that an actor was reckless that the complainant was under the age of 18 years. As defined in RCC § 22E-206, "recklessness" requires that the actor must consciously disregard a substantial risk that the complainant was under the age of 18 years; and the risk must be of such a nature and degree that, considering the nature of and motivation for the actor's conduct and the circumstances the actor is aware of, the actor's conscious disregard is a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct. A reasonable mistake as to the complainant's age would negate the recklessness required. See RCC § 22E-208(b)(3) and accompanying commentary, providing that a reasonable mistake as to a circumstance element negates the existence of recklessness as to that element.

[99] Elonis v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2001, 2010, 192 L.Ed.2d 1 (2015).

[100] Elonis v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2001, 2015, 192 L.Ed.2d 1 (2015) (J. Alito, concurring) ("There can be no real dispute that recklessness regarding a risk of serious harm is wrongful conduct. In a wide variety of contexts, we have described reckless conduct as morally culpable.).

[101] RCC § 22E-701 defines "protected person" to include certain individuals under the age of 18 years or over the age of 65 years and several RCC offenses, like assault (RCC § 22E-1202), require a "reckless" culpable mental state for the fact that the complainant is a "protected person." In addition, several of the penalty enhancements for the RCC sexual assault offense (RCC § 22E-1301) require a "reckless" culpable mental state for the age of the complainant.

[102] D.C. Code § 22-3102(c)(1) ("If the sexual performance consists solely of a still or motion picture, then this section: (1) Shall not apply to the minor . . . depicted in a still or motion picture who possess it or transmit it to another person unless at least one of the minors depicted in it does not consent to its possession or transmission.").

[103] D.C. Code § 22-3102(c)(1), (c)(2) ("If the sexual performance consists solely of a still or motion picture, then this section: (1) Shall not apply to the . . . minors depicted in a still or motion picture who possess it or transmit it to another person unless at least one of the minors depicted in it does not consent to its possession or transmission; . . . (2) Shall not apply to possession of a still or motion picture by a minor . . .

not define "consent" and does not consistently require a "knowingly" culpable mental state as to a depicted minor's lack of consent.[104] There is no DCCA case law on the current exclusion. Resolving these ambiguities, the revised statute consistently requires that the minor reasonably believed that every person under the age of 18 years[105] depicted in the image[106] gave effective consent to the minor. The "effective consent" requirements are consistent with the consent defense in the revised sexual assault statute (RCC § 22E-1301) and other RCC offenses. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised offense.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, organizationally, the RCC has separate statutes for still images of minors and live performances of minors and no longer uses the general terms "performance" and "sexual performance." Due to the current D.C. Code definitions of "performance" and "sexual performance," the current sexual performance of a minor statute includes both still images and live performances.[107] However, it is counterintuitive to construe a "performance" as including a still image (e.g., a photograph). To clarify that both images and live performances fall within the revised statutes, the RCC trafficking an obscene image of a minor and RCC possession of an obscene image of a minor statutes (RCC §§ 22E-1807 and 22E-1808) are specific to still images and the RCC arranging a live performance of a minor and attending a live performance of a minor statutes (RCC §§ 22E-1809 and 22E-1810) are specific to live sexual conduct. The two sets of statutes, however, have equivalent penalties—trafficking an obscene image and arranging a live exhibition have the same penalty, and possessing an image and viewing an exhibition or broadcast have the same penalty. This change improves the clarity of the revised statutes without changing current District law.

who receives it from a minor depicted in it unless the recipient knows that at least one of the minors depicted in the still or motion picture did not consent to its transmission.").

[104] D.C. Code § 22-3102(c)(1) ("unless at least one of the minors depicted in it does not consent to its possession or transmission."), (c)(2) ("unless the recipient knows that at least one of the minors depicted in the still or motion picture did not consent to its transmission.").

[105] If both minors and adults are depicted in the image it is irrelevant under the defense if the adults give effective consent to the conduct. However, depending on the facts and the specific conduct at issue, the minor may face liability under other RCC offenses, such as voyeurism (RCC § 22E-1803), electronic stalking (RCC § 22E-1802), or unlawful disclosure of sexual recordings (RCC § 22E-1804).

[106] The current "sexting" exclusion applies only to a "still or motion picture," but there is no substantive difference between the definition of "still or motion picture" and the RCC definition of "image." Compare D.C. Code § 22-3102(d)(2) (defining "still or motion picture" as "includ[ing] a photograph, motion picture, electronic or digital representation, video, or other visual depiction, however produced or reproduced.") with RCC § 22E-701 (defining "image" as a "a visual depiction, other than a depiction rendered by hand, including a video, film, photograph, or hologram whether in print, electronic, magnetic, or digital format.").

[107] D.C. Code § 22-3101(3), (6) (defining "performance" as "any play, motion picture, photograph, electronic representation, dance, or any other visual presentation of exhibition" and "sexual performance" as "any performance or part thereof which includes sexual conduct by a person under 18 years of age.").

Second, the revised possession of an obscene image statute no longer uses the defined term "minor."[108] Instead, consistent with the current D.C. Code statute's definition, the revised statute refers to a "complainant under the age of 18 years." Other statutes in the D.C. Code refer to a person under 18 years of age as a "child,"[109] and the use of different labels for persons of the same age is confusing. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute without changing current District law.

Third, the revised possession of an obscene image statute uses the definition of "sexual act" in RCC § 22E-701. The RCC definition is substantively identical to the various forms of sexual penetration the current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute prohibits, including bestiality.[110] This change clarifies the revised statute.

Fourth, instead of prohibiting a "lewd" exhibition,[111] first degree of the revised possession of an obscene image statute prohibits a "sexual or sexualized display" when there is less than a full opaque covering. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute does not define "lewd," but the DCCA approved a jury instruction for the offense that stated "lewd exhibition of the genitals means that the minor's genital or pubic area must be visibly displayed," that "mere nudity is not enough," and "the exhibition must have an unnatural or unusual focus on the minor's genitalia regardless of the minor's intention to engage in sexual activity or whether the viewer is sexually aroused."[112] The revised possession of an obscene image statute's reference to "sexual or [108] D.C. Code § 22-3101(2) (defining "minor" as "any person under 18 years of age."). Despite this definition, the current sexual performance using a minor statute inconsistently uses the term "minor" and instead refers to a "person under 18 years of age." D.C. Code § 22-3102.

[109] See, e.g., D.C. Code § 22-1101 (a) ("A person commits the crime of cruelty to children in the first degree if that person …willfully maltreats a child under 18 years of age….").

[110] The current sexual performance of a minor statute prohibits "actual or simulated sexual intercourse: (i) Between the penis and the vulva, anus, or mouth; (ii) Between the mouth and the vulva or anus; or (iii) Between an artificial sex organ or other object or instrument used in the manner of an artificial sex organ and the anus or vulva" as well as "bestiality." D.C. Code § 22-3101(5) (defining "sexual conduct."). Subsection (A) of the RCC definition of "sexual act" encompasses penile penetration of the vulva or anus in subsection (i) of the current statutory language. Subsection (B) of the RCC definition of "sexual act" encompasses penile penetration of the mouth in subsection (ii) of the current statutory language as well as contact between the mouth and the vulva or anus in subsection (i) of the current statutory language. Subsection (C) of the RCC definition of "sexual act" encompasses the object sexual penetration described in subsection (iii) of the current statutory language. Finally, subsection (D) of the RCC definition of "sexual act" encompasses specific forms of bestiality.

[112] Green v. United States, 948 A.2d 554, 562 (D.C. 2008). The DCCA further noted that the jury instruction at issue was similar to instructions from other jurisdictions. Id. n. 10. In addition, the DCCA noted that "some courts look to multiple factors to determine whether a photograph contains a lewd depiction of genitalia, [but] one of the factors routinely considered is whether the picture focuses on the genitalia in an unnatural way." Id. In particular, the DCCA cited a Tenth Circuit case, Wolf, listing factors such as "whether the focal point of the visual depiction is on the child's genitalia or pubic area;" "whether the child is fully or partially clothed, or nude;" and "whether the visual depiction is intended or designed to elicit a sexual response in the viewer." Id. (quoting United States v. Wolf, 890 F.2d 241, 244 (10th Cir. 1989). The Wolf case, in turn, cites United States v. Dost, 636 F.Supp. 828, 831 (S.D.Cal. 1986)), which has an extensive list of factors.

The DCCA noted that the Wolf court held that an image "does not need to be meet every factor in order to be lewd," id., but also noted that the record in Green "contains evidence to support the presence of other sexualized display" is intended to restate the meaning of "lewd exhibition" in more modern, plain language while preserving this DCCA case law. Mere nudity is not sufficient for a "sexual or sexualized display" in subparagraphs (a)(2)(D) or (b)(2)(D). There must be a visible display of the relevant body parts with an unnatural or unusual focus on them, regardless of the minor's intention to engage in sexual activity or the effect on the viewer. This change clarifies current law.

Fifth, the revised possession of an obscene image statute requires that the image depict the complainant "engaging in or submitting to" the prohibited sexual conduct. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute prohibits possessing a "sexual performance by a minor,"[113] and refers generally to the complainant's sexual conduct."[114] The revised possession statute prohibits images that depict the complainant "engaging in or submitting to" the prohibited sexual conduct, which is consistent with the language in the RCC sex offenses and recognizes that the revised statute may apply to depictions of a complainant that is an active participant or a completely passive (e.g., unconscious) participant. This clarifies the scope of the revised statute without changing current District law.

Sixth, the definition of "movie theater" in RCC § 22E-701[115] applies to the affirmative defense in paragraph (d)(5) of the revised possession of an obscene image statute. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute has a similar affirmative defense[116] that applies to specified employees of a "motion picture theater," but does not define the term. There is no DCCA case law interpreting the term "motion picture theater" in this affirmative defense. The RCC definition of "motion picture theater" limits the affirmative defense to certain employees of a theater or other venue that is being utilized primarily for the exhibition of a motion picture to the public, which is consistent with the scope of the affirmative defense. This change improves the clarity of the revised statute.

RCC § 22E-1809. Arranging a Live Sexual Performance of a Minor.

Explanatory Note. [1] The RCC arranging a live performance of a minor offense prohibits creating, selling admission to, and advertising a live performance that depicts complainants under the age of 18 years engaging in or submitting to specified sexual conduct. The offense also prohibits a person that is responsible under civil law for a complainant under the age of 18 years from giving effective consent for the complainant to engage in a live performance the depicts the specified sexual conduct. The penalty gradations are based on the type of sexual conduct that is depicted, or will be depicted in the live performance. The revised arranging a live performance of a minor statute has the same penalties as the RCC creating or trafficking an obscene image of a minor statute,[2] the main difference being that the RCC arranging a live performance of a minor offense is limited to live performances. Along with the trafficking of an obscene image of a minor offense,[3] the possession of an obscene image of a minor offense,[4] and the attending a live performance of a minor offense,[5] the revised arranging a live performance of a minor statute replaces the current sexual performance using a minor offense[6] in the current D.C. Code, as well as the current definitions,[7] penalties,[8] and affirmative defenses[9] for that offense.

Subsection (a) specifies the various types of prohibited conduct in first degree arranging a live performance of a minor statute, the highest gradation of the revised offense. The prohibited conduct is specific to a "live performance." "Live performance" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 as a "play, dance, or other visual presentation or exhibition for an audience, including an audience of one person." Paragraph (a)(1) specifies a culpable mental state of "knowingly," a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she will cause the prohibited result, i.e. creating a live performance. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" culpable mental state in paragraph (a)(1) applies to each type of prohibited conduct in subparagraphs (a)(1)(A), (a)(1)(B), and (a)(1)(C).

For subparagraph (a)(1)(A), the "knowingly" culpable mental state requires, in part, that the actor be "practically certain" the he or she is "creat[ing], produc[ing], or direct[ing]" a "live performance." The "knowingly" culpable mental state applies to the RCC definition of "live performance" and requires that the actor is "practically certain" that the visual presentation is "for an audience, including an audience of one person." These terms have distinct definitions in the current statute (D.C. Code § 22-3101(3), (6)), but the current statute does not use the terms consistently. Compare D.C. Code § 22-3102(a)(1), (b) (referring to a "sexual performance.") with (a)(2) (referring to "any performance which includes sexual conduct by a person under 18 years of age.").

actor that "creates" or directs" a visual presentation will nearly always be sufficient for the audience requirement, even if the actor does not watch the presentation.[10] There may also be liability if the audience is not physically present for the presentation.[11] "Produc[ing]" a live performance in subparagraph (a)(1)(A) includes actions that facilitate the creation, sales, or advertising of a live performance, such as "giving financial backing" and "making background arrangements for a performance such as buying or leasing equipment for a sexual performance."[12]

Subparagraph (a)(1)(B) prohibits a "person with a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant" from giving "effective consent" for the complainant to engage in or submit to the creation of a live performance. "Person with a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant" is identical to the language in the special defense in RCC § 22E-408, and has the same meaning as discussed in that commentary. The "knowingly" culpable mental state in paragraph (a)(1) here requires that the actor be "practically certain" that he or she will give "effective consent" for the complainant to engage in or submit to the creation of a live performance.[13] "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception." As is discussed in the commentary to the RCC definition of "consent," there are circumstances in which indirect types of agreement or inaction may be sufficient. There is no requirement for liability in subparagraph (a)(1)(B) that a live performance actually occur; it is sufficient that the actor give effective consent for the complainant to engage in or submit to the creation of a live performance.[14]

[10] When the actor creates or directs a visual presentation and also watches the visual presentation, the actor is clearly the audience. However, an actor cannot avoid liability for creating or directing a visual presentation simply because the actor does not also watch the visual presentation. For example, an actor that directs the complainant to perform a striptease or sexual dance, but does not watch it, still has liability because the striptease or dance is "for" the actor. If an actor creates or directs a visual presentation in an area where other individuals are present and can watch, such as a bar or a park, there is liability if the actor is "practically certain" that those other individuals might watch the performance because the performance is "for" them (and likely also the actor).

[11] An actor is liable if he or she creates or directs a visual presentation and is "practically certain" that a third party could watch from a physically distant location. For example, an actor that directs a play, knowing that a third party may be able to watch or is watching from across the street or several blocks away through a telescope is liable because the actor is "practically certain" that the presentation is "for" an audience. In addition, as previously noted, the actor is likely sufficient for "an audience."

[12] Council of the District of Columbia, Report of the Committee of the Judiciary, Bill 4-305, The "District of Columbia Protection of Minors Act of 1982" at 9.

[13] Per the rule of construction, the "knowingly" culpable mental state also applies to the fact that the actor is a "person with a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant." The actor must be "practically certain" that he or she is such a person.

[14] This provision is redundant in the case of a responsible individual who has a higher culpable mental state than "knowingly." In those cases, the RCC solicitation (RCC § 22E-302) and RCC accomplice (RCC § 22E-210) provisions would establish liability, as they would for any other defendant. However, the RCC solicitation and accomplice provisions require a culpable mental state of "purposely" and have other more stringent requirements. Subparagraph (a)(1)(B) is intended to provide liability for responsible individuals who are merely "practically certain" that they are giving effective consent to the complainant engaging in or submitting to the creation of a live performance. The lower culpable mental state is warranted because these responsible individuals are likely violating their duty of care to the complainant by giving effective

For subparagraph (a)(1)(C), the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she will sell admission to[15] or advertise a live performance. "Advertise" is not limited to commercial settings and includes promoting or drawing attention to a live performance without any expectation of financial gain.

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies additional requirements for the live performance. First, the live performance must depict, or will depict, in part or whole, the body of a real complainant under the age of 18 years. "Body" includes the face, as well as other parts of the body of a real complainant under the age of 18 years. Any depiction of a part of the complainant's body is sufficient. The complainant must be a real minor but there is no requirement that the government prove the identity of the minor. Second, the live performance must depict, or will depict, the complainant engaging in or submitting to specific types of sexual conduct: 1) an actual "sexual act," actual "sadomasochistic abuse," or actual masturbation; 2) a "simulated" "sexual act," "simulated" "sadomasochistic abuse," or "simulated" masturbation; or 3) a sexual or sexualized display of the genitals, pubic area, or anus, when there is less than a full opaque covering.[16] The terms "simulated," "sexual act" and "sadomasochistic abuse" are defined in RCC § 22E-701. There is no obscenity requirement for any of the prohibited sexual conduct in subparagraphs (a)(2)(A) through (a)(2)(D).

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies that the culpable mental state for the requirements in paragraph (a)(2) is "recklessly." "Recklessly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor is aware of a substantial risk that the live performance depicts, or will depict, in part or whole, the body of a real complainant under the age of 18 years of age. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "recklessly" culpable mental state also applies to the prohibited sexual conduct in subparagraphs (a)(2)(A) through (a)(2)(D). The actor must be aware of a substantial risk that the conduct that is depicted or will be depicted in the live performance is one of the types prohibited in subparagraphs (a)(2)(A) through (a)(2)(D), such as an actual sexual act or a prohibited sexualized display.

Subsection (b) specifies the prohibited conduct for second degree arranging a live performance of a minor. Paragraph (b)(1), subparagraphs (b)(1)(A), (b)(1)(B), and (b)(1)(C), and paragraph (b)(2) have the same requirements as paragraph (a)(1), subparagraphs (a)(1)(A), (a)(1)(B), and (a)(1)(C), and paragraph (a)(2) in first degree. However, the types of prohibited sexual conduct are different. Subparagraph (b)(2)(A) prohibits an "obscene" "sexual contact," and subparagraph (b)(2)(B) prohibits an "obscene" sexual or sexualized display of any breast below the top of the areola, or the consent. These responsible individuals may still claim that they are not violating their duty of care under the general special responsibility defenses in RCC § 22E-408.

[15] If a live performance is filmed, recorded, or photographed, and the resulting film or photograph is sold or distributed, there may be liability for distributing an "image" under the RCC trafficking an obscene image of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1807).

[16] If the genitals, pubic area, or anus of the minor have a full opaque covering, or will have a full opaque covering, there is no liability under first degree arranging a live performance. However, if the live performance depicts, or will depict, a minor engaging in a "sexual contact" that is also "obscene," there is liability under second degree of the revised arranging a live performance statute. The RCC definition of "sexual contact" prohibits the touching of genitalia, anus, groin, breast, inner thigh, or buttocks, whether clothed or unclothed (RCC § 22E-701).

buttocks, when there is less than a full opaque covering.[17] The terms "obscene" and "sexual contact" are defined in RCC § 22E-701. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "recklessly" culpable mental state in paragraph (a)(2) applies to the prohibited sexual conduct and the actor must consciously disregard a substantial risk that the conduct is an "obscene sexual contact" or a specified "obscene" sexual display.

Subsection (c) establishes several affirmative defenses for the RCC arranging a live performance statute. The general provision in RCC § 22E-201 establishes the burdens of proof and production for all affirmative defenses in the RCC.

Paragraph (c)(1) establishes an affirmative defense to subsection (a) of the revised statute that the live performance has, or will have, serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value when considered as a whole. This language matches one of the requirements for obscenity in Miller v. California,[18] but makes it an affirmative defense. The prohibited sexual conduct in subparagraphs (a)(2)(A) through (a)(2)(D), when it involves real complainants under the age of 18 years, is not subject to the First Amendment requirements set out in Miller v. California.[19] However, the affirmative defense recognizes that there may be rare situations where live performances of such conduct warrant First Amendment protection. Paragraph (c)(1) specifies "in fact." "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element, here the fact that the live performance has, or will have, serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value when considered as a whole.

Paragraph (c)(2) establishes an affirmative defense for an actor that is under the age of 18 years. Per paragraph (c)(2), the affirmative defense applies to subparagraphs (a)(1)(A), (a)(1)(B), (b)(1)(A), and (b)(1)(B) of the offense—all prohibited conduct except selling admission to or advertising a live performance in subparagraphs (a)(1)(C) and (b)(1)(C). Paragraph (c)(2) specifies "in fact." "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, "in fact" applies to every element that follows unless a culpable mental state is specified. Here, the "in fact" specified in paragraph (c)(2) applies to subparagraphs (c)(2)(A) and (c)(2)(B) and sub-subparagraphs (c)(2)(B)(i) and (c)(2)(B)(ii) and there is no culpable mental state requirement for any of the elements in these subparagraphs or sub-subparagraphs. Subparagraph (c)(2)(A) requires that the actor is under the age of 18 years. There are two alternative requirements for the affirmative defense under subparagraph (c)(2)(B). Sub-subparagraph (c)(2)(B)(i) requires that the actor is the only person under the age of 18 years who is, or who will be, depicted in the live performance. In the alternative, sub-subparagraph (c)(2)(B)(ii) applies if there are multiple people under the age of 18 years who are, or who will be, depicted in the live performance. Under sub-subparagraph

[17] If the specified part of the breast or the buttocks has a full opaque covering, and the live performance does not depict or will not depict an "obscene sexual contact" as prohibited by subparagraph (b)(2)(B), there is no liability under second degree arranging a live performance. However, there may be liability for causing the minor to engage in the underlying sexual conduct in the RCC sexually suggestive conduct with a minor offense (RCC § 22E-1304).

[18] Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15, 24 (1973) ("A state [obscenity] offense must also be limited to works which . . . taken as a whole, do not have serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value.").

[19] Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15, 24 (1973).

(c)(2)(B)(ii), the actor must reasonably believe[20] that every person under 18 years of age who is, or who will be, depicted in the live performance gives "effective consent" to the actor. Under sub-subparagraph (c)(2)(B)(ii), the actor must reasonably believe that every person under 18 years of age who is, or who will be, depicted in the live performance gives "effective consent" to the actor to engage in the conduct that constitutes the offense. The "in fact" specified in paragraph (c)(2) applies to sub-subparagraph (c)(2)(B)(ii) and no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to sub-subparagraph (c)(2)(B)(ii). However, sub-subparagraph (c)(2)(B)(ii) still requires that the actor subjectively believe that every person under 18 years of age who is, or who will be, depicted in the live performance gives "effective consent" to the actor to engage in the conduct that constitutes the offense, and that belief must be reasonable. Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[21] "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception."

Paragraph (c)(3) establishes an affirmative defense if the actor and the complainant are in a marriage, domestic partnership, or dating relationship. Per paragraph (c)(3), the affirmative defense applies to subparagraphs (a)(1)(A) and (b)(1)(A) of the offense. Paragraph (c)(3) specifies "in fact." "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, "in fact" applies to every element that follows unless a culpable mental state is specified. Here, "in fact" applies to every element under subparagraph (c)(3)(A) through subparagraph (c)(3)(E) and there is no culpable mental state required for any of these elements.

There are several requirements to the affirmative defense under paragraph (c)(3). First, per subparagraph (c)(3)(A), the affirmative defense only applies if the actor is at least 18 years of age. An actor that is under the age of 18 years has the broader affirmative defense under paragraph (c)(2) that applies to any actor under the age of 18 years, regardless of the actor's relationship to the complainant. Under sub-subparagraphs c)(3)(B)(i) and (c)(3)(B)(ii), the actor must either be married to, or in a domestic partnership with, the complainant, or be in a "romantic, dating, or sexual relationship" with the complainant. "Domestic partnership" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 and the reference to a "romantic, dating, or sexual relationship" is identical to the language in the District's current definition of "intimate partner violence"[22] and is intended to have

When the complainant is under 16 years of age, the actor must be less than four years older (sub-sub-subparagraph (c)(3)(B)(ii)(I)), and when the complainant is under 18 years of age and the actor is at least four years older, the actor must not be in a "position of trust with or authority over" the complainant (sub-sub-subparagraph (c)(3)(B)(ii)(II)). "Position of trust with or authority over" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701. The requirements in sub-sub-subparagraphs (c)(3)(A)(ii)(I) and (c)(3)(A)(ii)(II) mirror the requirements for liability in the RCC sexual abuse of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1302).

Second, per subparagraph (c)(3)(C), the complainant must be the only person who is depicted, or who will be depicted, in the live performance, or the actor and the complainant must be the only persons who are depicted, or who will be depicted in the live performance. The marriage or romantic partner defense is not available when the live performance shows, or will show, third persons. Third, per subparagraph (c)(3)(D), the actor must reasonably believe[23] that the actor has the complainant's "effective consent" to the prohibited conduct. "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception." Fourth, per subparagraph (c)(3)(E), the actor must reasonably believe[24] that the actor is the only audience for the live performance, other than the complainant.[25]

[23] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist. As was stated earlier, the "in fact" specified in subparagraph (c)(3) applies to subparagraph (c)(3)(D) and no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to this subparagraph. However, the actor must subjectively believe that the complainant gives the actor "effective consent" to engage in the conduct that constitutes the offense, and that belief must be reasonable. Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others. See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

[24] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist. As was stated earlier, the "in fact" specified in subparagraph (c)(3) applies to subparagraph (c)(3)(E) and no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to this subparagraph. However, the actor must subjectively believe that the actor is the only audience for the live performance other than the complainant, and that belief must be reasonable. Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others. See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). Paragraph (c)(4) establishes an affirmative defense for employees of a school, museum, library, movie theater, or other venue. "Movie theater" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701. The affirmative defense applies to subparagraphs (a)(1)(C) and (b)(1)(C).[26] Paragraph (c)(4) specifies "in fact." Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, "in fact" applies to every element that follows unless a culpable mental state is specified. Here, "in fact" applies to subparagraphs (c)(4)(A), (c)(4)(B), and (c)(4)(C) and there is no culpable mental state requirement for any of the elements in these subparagraphs. The employee must be acting in the reasonable scope of his or her employment and have no control over the creation or selection of the image. The actor must not record, photograph, or film the live performance.[27] The defense is intended to shield from liability individuals who otherwise meet the elements of the offense, but only because it was part of the ordinary course of employment.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised arranging a live sexual performance of a minor statute clearly changes current District law in nine main ways.

First, the revised arranging a live performance statute punishes creating, selling, or advertising a live performance more severely than attending or viewing a live performance.[28] The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute has the same penalties for creating, selling, advertising, attending, and viewing a live heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

[25] The "reasonably believes" requirement parallels the requirements of subparagraphs (a)(1)(A) and (b)(1)(A) of the offense. As is discussed earlier in the explanatory note, those subparagraphs apply a "knowingly" culpable mental state to the "live performance" element and require that the actor be "practically certain" that the visual presentation is "for an audience." The "audience" can extend beyond the actor or the complainant to include other people that are watching or may watch the performance as long as the actor is "practically certain" of this fact. For the defense, if an actor reasonably believes that the actor, the complainant, or both of them, are the only audience for the performance, it is irrelevant that there may be other people watching.

[26] This defense does not apply to creating, producing, or directing a live performance (subparagraphs (a)(1)(A) and (b)(1)(A)) because such actions create child pornography directly from the sexual abuse of minors. However, there may be a separate defense for first degree arranging a live sexual performance of a minor image for live performances that have serious artistic or other value (paragraph (d)(1)), or an argument that the images are not "obscene" as required for second degree.

This defense also does not apply to individuals that are responsible for the complainant under civil law and give effective consent for the complainant to engage in the creation of an image derived from live sexual conduct (subparagraphs (a)(1)(B) and (b)(1)(B)) because these individuals are likely violating their duty of care to the complainant. These individuals can still argue that they are not violating their duty of care under the general special responsibility defenses in RCC § 22E-408.

[27] If an actor records, photographs, or films the live performance, he or she is creating a prohibited image of a minor and there may be liability under the RCC trafficking an obscene image offense (RCC § 22E-1807).

[28] The RCC attending a live performance of a minor statute (D.C. Code § 22E-1810) prohibits attending or viewing a live performance, as well as viewing a live broadcast. However, for simplicity, this discussion will refer to attending or viewing a "live performance" only.

performance,[29] even though creating a live performance is a direct form of child abuse[30] and selling and advertising are "an integral part" of the market.[31] In contrast, the revised arranging a live performance of a minor statute penalizes the creating, selling, or advertising of a live performance more severely than viewing or attending a live performance in RCC § 22E-1810. The different penalties recognize that this conduct harms children and supports the market and are consistent with the penalty scheme in other current and RCC offenses. Having the same penalties for this wide spectrum of conduct is disproportionate and inconsistent with the penalty scheme in other District offenses.[32] As part of this revision, the revised statute no longer uses the current statute's defined term "promote" and instead codifies directly in the revised statute the relevant conduct in that definition.[33] This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense.

[29] D.C. Code §§ 22-3102(a)(1), (a)(2), (b) (prohibiting "employs, authorizes, or induces a person under 18 years of age to engage in a sexual performance," "being the parent, legal guardian, or custodian of a minor, he or she consents to the participation by a minor in a sexual performance," "produces, directs, or promotes" any sexual performance, and "attend, transmit, or possess" any sexual performance), 22-3104 (punishing a first violation "of this chapter" with a maximum term of imprisonment of 10 years and a second or subsequent offense with a maximum term of imprisonment of 20 years).

[30] See, e.g., New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747, 758, (1982) ("The legislative judgment, as well as the judgment found in the relevant literature, is that the use of children as subjects of pornographic materials is harmful to the physiological, emotional, and mental health of the child.").

[31] Id. at 761 ("The advertising and selling of child pornography provide an economic motive for and are thus an integral part of the production of such materials, an activity illegal throughout the Nation.").

[32] See, e.g., D.C. Code §§ 22-3231 and 22-3232 (trafficking in stolen property offense with a maximum term of imprisonment of 10 years and receiving stolen property offense with a maximum term of imprisonment of either seven years or 180 days, depending on the value of the property); 48-904.01(a)(1), (a)(2), (d)(1), (d)(2) (penalizing the manufacture, distribution, or possession with intent to manufacture or distribute a controlled substance with a maximum term of imprisonment of 30 years, 5 years, 3 years, or 1 year, depending on the type of controlled substance, but penalizing the possession of any drug other than liquid PCP with a maximum term of imprisonment of 180 days).

[33] The current statute prohibits "promot[ing]" any sexual performance of a minor and defines "promote" as "to procure, manufacture, issue, sell, give, provide, lend, mail, deliver, transfer, transmute, publish or distribute, circulate, disseminate, present, exhibit, or advertise, or to offer or agree to do the same." D.C. Code § 22-3102(a)(2), 22-3101(4). There is no DCCA case law on the scope of this definition. As is discussed in the commentary, the revised trafficking an obscene image statute retains "sell" and "advertise." The revised arranging a live performance statute also prohibits creating, producing, or directing a live performance, which covers "present" and "exhibit" in the current definition. "Offer or agree to do the same" is deleted from the current definition of "promote" because inchoate liability, such as attempt and conspiracy, provides more consistent and proportional punishment for this conduct. For example, under the current statute, a defendant that "offers" to "direct" a live sexual performance could be charged with attempted sexual performance of a minor, which, for a first offense, would have a maximum term of imprisonment of 180 days. D.C. Code §§ 22-1803; 22-3102(a)(2) (prohibiting "direct[ing]" a sexual performance of a minor); 22-3103(1). However, if this conduct were charged under the current definition of "promote" as offering to "manufacture," "present," or "exhibit" a live performance, the defendant would face a maximum term of imprisonment of 10 years. D.C. Code §§ 22-3102(a)(2); 22-3103(1). In the RCC, the defendant would be charged with attempted arranging a live sexual performance of a minor (offers to "create[], produce[], or direct[]" a live performance).
The remainder of the current definition of "promote" is inapplicable to a live performance. The commentaries to the revised trafficking an obscene image of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1807) and revised possession of an obscene image of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1808) discuss this prohibited conduct.

Second, the revised arranging a live performance statute grades punishments based upon the sexual conduct depicted in the live performance. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute prohibits live performances of "sexual conduct,"[34] a defined term including both penetration and lewd exhibition, with no distinction in penalty between the different types of sexual conduct. In contrast, the RCC arranging a live performance statute reserves first degree for actual or simulated sexual acts, sadomasochistic abuse, or masturbation, as well as sexual displays of the genitals, pubic area, or anus, when there is less than a full opaque covering. Second degree of the revised arranging a live performance of a minor statute is limited to an "obscene," as defined in RCC § 22E-701, sexual contact or sexualized display of the breast below the top of the areola or the buttocks, when there is less than a full opaque covering. Having the same penalties for different types of sexual conduct is disproportionate and inconsistent with the penalty scheme in current District sex offenses.[35] This change improves the consistency, proportionality, and constitutionality of the revised statute.

Third, the revised arranging a live performance statute expands the prohibited sexual conduct to include "simulated" sadomasochistic abuse, "simulated" masturbation, and an obscene "sexual contact." The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute prohibits actual masturbation and sadomasochistic abuse,[36] but does not extend to "simulated" masturbation or sadomasochistic abuse, or to sexual touching beyond that required for masturbation or a "lewd exhibition of the genitals." However, creating, producing, or directing live performances that feature "simulated" sadomasochistic abuse, "simulated" masturbation, and obscene "sexual contact" may be criminalized in the current D.C. Code obscenity statute.[37] The current D.C. Code obscenity statute is penalized as a misdemeanor for a first offense,[38] with no enhancements for the obscene [34] D.C. Code §§ 22-3102(a)(1), (a)(2), (a)(3) (prohibiting a "sexual performance" or a "performance which includes sexual conduct by a person under 18 years of age."), 22-3101(5), (6) (defining "sexual performance" as "any performance or part thereof which includes sexual conduct by a person under 18 years of age," and "sexual conduct" as "(A) Actual or simulated sexual intercourse: (i) Between the penis and the vulva, anus, or mouth; (ii) Between the mouth and the vulva or anus; or (iii) Between an artificial sexual organ or other object or instrument used in the manner of an artificial sexual organ and the anus or vulva; (B) Masturbation; (C) Sexual bestiality; (D) Sadomasochistic sexual activity for the purpose of sexual stimulation; or (E) Lewd exhibition of the genitals.").

[35] The District's current sex offenses generally penalize a "sexual act," which requires penetration, more severely than "sexual contact." D.C. Code §§ 22-3001(8), (9), 22-3002 through 22-3005, 22-3008 through 22-3009.04, 22-3013 through 22-3016.

[36] D.C. Code § 22-3101(5) (defining "sexual conduct" as "(A) Actual or simulated sexual intercourse: (i) Between the penis and the vulva, anus, or mouth; (ii) Between the mouth and the vulva or anus; or (iii) Between an artificial sexual organ or other object or instrument used in the manner of an artificial sexual organ and the anus or vulva; (B) Masturbation; (C) Sexual bestiality; (D) Sadomasochistic sexual activity for the purpose of sexual stimulation; or (E) Lewd exhibition of the genitals.").

[37] The current obscenity statute, D.C. Code § 22-2201, generally criminalizes the creation, production, or direction of "obscene, indecent, or filthy" live performances without further specification of the relevant conduct. The current obscenity statute does not define the terms "obscene," "indecent," or "filthy," but the DCCA has stated that they must meet the standard for obscenity in Miller v. California. See Retzer v. United States, 363 A.2d 307, 309 (D.C. 1976) (stating that Miller made it clear that any vagueness defects in the statute's terminology may be cured by judicial construction).

[38] D.C. Code § 22-2201(e) ("A person convicted of violating subsection (a) or (b) of this section shall for the 1st offense be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not more than 180 days, or both. A person convicted of a 2nd or subsequent offense under subsection (a) or (b) of this materials depicting a minor.[39] In contrast, first degree of the revised arranging a live performance statute includes "simulated" masturbation and "simulated" sadomasochistic abuse, and second degree includes an obscene "sexual contact." "Simulated," "obscene," and "sexual contact" are defined in RCC § 22E-701. As defined, such sexual conduct may be as graphic[40] as other conduct penalized by the current statute, such as "simulated" sexual penetration, as well as sexual contact involved in masturbation and a "lewd exhibition of the genitals."[41] Criminalization of this conduct is within the bounds of Supreme Court First Amendment case law.[42] This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute.

Fourth, the revised arranging a live performance statute expands the prohibited conduct to include a sexual display of the "pubic area or anus, when there is less than a full opaque covering" and an "obscene sexual or sexualized display of the breast below the top of the areola, or the buttocks, when there is less than a full opaque covering." The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute is limited to a "lewd exhibition of the genitals." However, creating, producing, or directing live performances that feature minors engaging in a sexual display of the "pubic area or anus, when there is less than a full opaque covering" and an "obscene sexual or sexualized display of the breast below the top of the areola, or the buttocks, when there is less than a full opaque covering" may be criminalized in the current D.C. Code obscenity statute.[43] The current D.C. Code obscenity statute is punished as a misdemeanor for a first offense,[44] with no section shall be fined not less than $1,000 and not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not less than 6 months or more than 3 years, or both.").

[39] Obscenity is not a "crime of violence," so there is no penalty enhancement for a minor victim under D.C. Code § 22–3611.

[40] Examples of "simulated" sadomasochistic abuse, "simulated" masturbation, and an obscene "sexual contact" that are not covered by the current sexual performance of a minor statute but would be covered under the revised arranging a live performance of a minor statute include: 1) an adult dressed in a sexual leather outfit wielding an actual whip towards a crying 9 year old, but, due to the camera angle, it is impossible to see if the whip is actually making contact; 2) A 12 year old sitting provocatively, legs spread, naked except for underwear, making rubbing gestures around his or her genitalia that suggest masturbation, but it is impossible to tell if there is actual contact with the genitalia; and 3) A prepubescent girl wearing skimpy lingerie or a sexual leather outfit that fully covers her breasts, but she is rubbing them and making suggestive facial expressions.

[41] See D.C. Code § 22-3101(5) (defining "sexual conduct.").

[42] In United States v. Williams, the Court held that a child pornography statute that defined "sexually explicit conduct" to include simulated masturbation and simulated sadistic or masochistic abuse was not overbroad. United States v. Williams, 553 U.S. 285, 288, 290, 307 (2008). The obscenity requirement for "obscene sexual contact" ensures that this provision is constitutional. See Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234, 250, 251 (2002) (stating that Ferber "reaffirmed that where the speech is neither obscene nor the product of sexual abuse, it does not fall outside the protection of the First Amendment.").

[43] The current obscenity statute, D.C. Code § 22-2201, generally criminalizes the creation, production, or direction of "obscene, indecent, or filthy" live performances without further specification of the relevant conduct. The current obscenity statute does not define the terms "obscene," "indecent," or "filthy," but the DCCA has stated that they must meet the standard for obscenity in Miller v. California. See Retzer v. United States, 363 A.2d 307, 309 (D.C. 1976) (stating that Miller made it clear that any vagueness defects in the statute's terminology may be cured by judicial construction).

[44] D.C. Code § 22-2201(e) ("A person convicted of violating subsection (a) or (b) of this section shall for the 1st offense be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not more than 180 days, or both. A person convicted of a 2nd or subsequent offense under subsection (a) or (b) of this enhancements for the obscene materials depicting a minor.[45] In contrast, the RCC criminalizes creating, producing, and directing live performances featuring certain depictions of the pubic area[46] and anus in first degree, and an "obscene sexual or sexualized display of the breast below the top of the areola, or the buttocks" in second degree.[47] As defined, display of the pubic area or anus is as graphic as other conduct penalized by the current statute, such as a "lewd exhibition of the genitals," and obscene images of the breast or buttock of a minor warrant greater punishment than other forms of obscene materials concerning adults. The RCC criminalizes obscene displays of any breast, as opposed to only the female breast, to recognize that the display of a male breast may be sexualized to the point of being obscene under a Miller standard and, if that occurs, more severe punishment than other forms of obscene materials concerning adults is warranted. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute.

section shall be fined not less than $1,000 and not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not less than 6 months or more than 3 years, or both.").

[45] Obscenity is not a "crime of violence," so there is no penalty enhancement for a minor victim under D.C. Code § 22–3611.

[46] Reference to "pubic area" is intended to include liability for a frontal nude image of a minor where the groin is visible but not the external genitalia.

[47] There is no obscenity requirement for the prohibited sexual displays of the pubic area or anus in first degree because the harm inflicted on the complainant in creating or distributing these images is sufficient under the First Amendment. Conversely, there is an obscenity requirement for the prohibited sexual display of the breast or buttocks in second degree because the conduct otherwise may not be sufficiently graphic to survive constitutional scrutiny. In New York v. Ferber, the Supreme Court established that live or visual sexual depictions of real children do not have to be "obscene" and are not entitled to First Amendment protection. Specifically, the Court held that a New York statute did not violate the First Amendment when the statute banned the production and distribution of live or visual depictions of specified sexual conduct with minors and had a mental state requirement for the defendant. New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747, 764-66 (1982). The Supreme Court has not established bright line rules for what sexual conduct involving children, without an obscenity requirement, satisfies the First Amendment. However, in Ferber, the Court noted that the prohibited sexual conduct at issue "represent[s] the kind of conduct that, if it were the theme of a work, could render it legally obscene: actual or simulated sexual intercourse, deviate sexual intercourse, sexual bestiality, masturbation, sado-masochistic abuse, or lewd exhibition of the genitals." In United States v. Williams, the Court held that the child pornography statute at issue was not overbroad. United States v. Williams, 553 U.S. 285, 288, 307 (2008). In Williams, the federal statute at issue defined "sexually explicit conduct" as "actual or simulated—(i) sexual intercourse, including genital-genital, oral-genital, anal-genital, or oral-anal, whether between persons of the same or opposite sex; (ii) bestiality; (iii) masturbation; (iv) sadistic or masochistic abuse; or (v) lascivious exhibition of the genitals or pubic area of any person." Id. at 290. First degree of the RCC arranging a live performance statute prohibits the same conduct as the statute in Williams with two exceptions: 1) It includes a sexualized display of the anus and for all sexualized displays in first degree, explicitly requires less than a full opaque covering; and 2) It does not extend "simulated" to a sexual or sexualized display. These are not significant differences. In sum, first degree of the RCC arranging a live performance statute prohibits sexual conduct that is graphic enough without an obscenity requirement. Second degree of the revised arranging a live performance statute prohibits conduct that is generally less graphic than the conduct in Ferber and Williams. However, the obscenity requirement ensures that the provision is constitutional. See Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234, 250, 251 (2002) (stating that Ferber "reaffirmed that where the speech is neither obscene nor the product of sexual abuse, it does not fall outside the protection of the First Amendment.")

Fifth, the revised arranging a live performance statute expands the current exceptions to liability for conduct by persons under 18 years of age and makes it an affirmative defense. In the current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute, minors that are depicted in prohibited images are not liable for possessing or distributing those images if the minor is the only minor depicted,[48] or, if there are multiple minors depicted, all of the minors consent.[49] A minor that is not depicted,[50] or an adult that is not more than four years older than the minor or minors depicted,[51] is not liable for possessing an image that he or she receives from a depicted minor, unless he or she knows that at least one of the depicted minors did not consent. The current exclusion does not consistently require a "knowingly" culpable mental state as to a depicted minor's lack of consent,[52] and minors are still liable under the current statute for creating live performances with themselves or other minors[53] or engaging in sexual conduct.[54] There is no DCCA case law interpreting the current exclusion. In contrast, the revised arranging a live performance statute excludes from liability all persons under the age of 18 years,[55] and applies to all prohibited conduct, except selling admission to or

[48] D.C. Code § 22-3102(c)(1) ("If the sexual performance consists solely of a still or motion picture, then this section: (1) Shall not apply to the minor . . . depicted in a still or motion picture who possess it or transmit it to another person unless at least one of the minors depicted in it does not consent to its possession or transmission.").

[49] D.C. Code § 22-3102(c)(1) ("If the sexual performance consists solely of a still or motion picture, then this section:(1) Shall not apply to the . . . minors depicted in a still or motion picture who possess it or transmit it to another person unless at least one of the minors depicted in it does not consent to its possession or transmission.").

[50] D.C. Code § 22-3102(c)(2) ("If the sexual performance consists solely of a still or motion picture, then this section: . . . (2) Shall not apply to possession of a still or motion picture by a minor . . . who receives it from a minor depicted in it unless the recipient knows that at least one of the minors depicted in the still or motion picture did not consent to its transmission.").

[51] D.C. Code § 22-3102(c)(2) ("If the sexual performance consists solely of a still or motion picture, then this section: . . . (c) If the sexual performance consists solely of a still or motion picture, then this section: . . (2) Shall not apply to possession of a still or motion picture by . . . an adult not more than 4 years older than the minor or minors depicted in it, who receives it from a minor depicted in it unless the recipient knows that at least one of the minors depicted in the still or motion picture did not consent to its transmission.").

[52] D.C. Code § 22-3102(c)(1) ("unless at least one of the minors depicted in it does not consent to its possession or transmission."), (c)(2) ("unless the recipient knows that at least one of the minors depicted in the still or motion picture did not consent to its transmission.").

[53] A minor that creates a prohibited live performance involving himself or herself or other minors has "produce[d], direct[ed], or promote[d]" a "performance which includes sexual conduct by a person under 18 years of age." D.C. Code §§ 22-3102(a)(2); 22-3101(4) (defining "promote," in part, as "to manufacture . . . transmute.").

[54] The current definition of "performance" extends to live conduct. D.C. Code § 22-3101(3) ("'Performance' means any play, motion picture, photograph, electronic representation, dance, or any other visual presentation or exhibition."). Thus, under a plain language reading, when a minor engages in "sexual conduct" with themselves, another minor, or an adult, they are "produc[ing], direct[ing], or promot[ing]" a "performance that includes sexual conduct by a person under 18 years of age" or "attend[ing]" a sexual performance by a minor. D.C. Code §§ 22-3102(a)(2), (b); 22-3101(4) (defining "promote," in part, as "to present [or] exhibit.").

[55] The revised arranging a live performance statute excludes from liability minors that have a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant. These minors would otherwise have liability under subparagraphs (a)(1)(B) and (b)(1)(B) for giving effective consent for another minor to advertising live performance (subparagraphs (a)(1)(C) and (b)(1)(C)). Legal scholarship has noted the inconsistencies and possible constitutional issues in statutes that criminalize minors producing images of otherwise legal sexual encounters.[56] The only requirements of the revised exclusion are either: 1) The minor is the only person under the age of 18 years who is depicted, or who will be depicted, in the live performance;[57] or 2) The actor reasonably believes that the actor has the effective consent of every person under 18 years of age who is, or who will be, depicted in the live performance.[58] The "effective consent" requirements are consistent with the consent defense in the revised sexual assault statute (RCC § 22E-1301) and other RCC offenses. A minor may still be liable for selling admission to or advertising a live performance under the revised statute, even if the live performance is of himself or herself,[59] and there may be liability under the RCC indecent exposure statute (RCC § 22E-4206) for a live performance done without the effective consent of those that may view it. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised offense.

engage in or submit to the creation of a live performance. This exclusion ensures that the revised arranging a live performance statute is reserved for predatory adults. However, such a minor may still have liability under the RCC criminal abuse and criminal neglect of a minor statutes (RCC §§ 22E-1501 and 22E-1502) and the RCC sex offenses. In addition, the revised exclusion only applies if the minor that is under the care of the responsible minor gives effective consent to the actions of the responsible minor.

[56] See, e.g., Sarah Wastler, The Harm in "Sexting"?: Analyzing the Constitutionality of Child Pornography Statutes That Prohibit the Voluntary Production, Possession, and Dissemination of Sexually Explicit Images by Teenagers, 33 HARV. J. L. & GENDER 687, 688 (2010) ("These cases not only give rise to a contentious debate regarding the appropriate methods of prevention and response to adolescents who voluntarily produce and disseminate sexually explicit images of themselves, but also raise serious questions regarding the constitutionality of prosecuting such juveniles under existing child pornography frameworks."); Stephen F. Smith, Jail for Juvenile Child Pornographers?: A Reply to Professor Leary, 15 Va. J. Soc. Pol'y & L. 505, 544 (2008) ("To funnel into the criminal or juvenile justice systems cases of self-produced child pornography--material that, at its root, steps from the undeniable fact that today's teenagers are sexually active well before they turn eighteen--is unjustified. To do so would expose minors to the severe stigma and penalties afforded by child pornography laws. It would also cause minors to be branded as registered sex offenders and to incur the onerous legal disabilities and restrictions that were passed with sexual predators in mind, not minors engaged in consensual sex with their peers."); Clay Calvert, Sex, Cell Phones, Privacy, and the First Amendment: When Children Become Child Pornographers and the Lolita Effect Undermines the Law, 18 COMMLAW CONSPECTUS 1, 6 (2009) ("Sexting constitutes a technologically-driven social phenomenon among minors that tests the boundaries of minors' First Amendment speech rights, as well as long-standing laws and judicial opinions that prohibit the manufacture, distribution, and possession of child pornography as a category of speech that, like obscenity, is not protected by the First Amendment.").

[57] If a minor is the only person under the age of 18 years that is depicted, or will be depicted, in the live performance, it is irrelevant under the exclusion if the live performance depicts, or will depict, an adult. However, depending on the facts and the specific conduct at issue, the minor may face liability under other RCC offenses, such as voyeurism (RCC § 22E-1803) or sexual assault (RCC § 22E-1301).

[58] If both minors and adults are depicted, or will be depicted, in the live performance, it is irrelevant under the exclusion if the adults give effective consent to the conduct. However, depending on the facts and the specific conduct at issue, the minor may face liability under other RCC offenses, such as voyeurism (RCC § 22E-1803) or sexual assault (RCC § 22E-1301).

[59] For example, a sixteen year old who sells admission to an exhibition of himself or herself masturbating may be liable under the revised statute. Even if the minor's conduct in such situations appears to be consensual, when a minor sells or advertises sexual performance such conduct supports the market for prohibited sexual performances.

Sixth, the revised arranging a live performance statute expands the current affirmative defense for a librarian or motion picture theater employee to include similarly positioned museum, school, and other venue employees. The current D.C. Code statute has an affirmative defense to "produc[ing], direct[ing], or promot[ing]" any sexual performance of a minor[60] for a "librarian engaged in the normal course of his or her employment"[61] and certain movie theater employees[62] if the librarian or movie theater employee does not have a financial interest in the sexual performance.[63] There is no DCCA case law interpreting this defense. In contrast, the revised arranging a live performance statute expands this affirmative defense to include employees at museums, schools, and other venues who may face similar situations, provided that the conduct is within the reasonable scope of employment and the employee has no control over the creation or selection of the image.[64] For reasons discussed the in explanatory note to this offense, the affirmative defense is limited to the conduct prohibited in subparagraphs (a)(1)(C) and (b)(1)(C) provided that the actor does not record, film, or photograph the live performance. Practically, the expanded defense provides a clearer safe-harbor for these employees but may do little or no work in reducing liability beyond that provided by the revised statute's defense in paragraph (c)(1) to first degree for images with serious artistic or other value, or, in second degree, the argument that the images are not "obscene." This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Seventh, the revised arranging a live performance statute codifies an affirmative defense for conduct that occurs in the context of marriage, domestic partnership, and other romantic relationships. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute does not have a defense for actors that engage in the prohibited conduct with minors to whom they are married or with whom they are in a domestic partnership or romantic relationship. This approach differs from several of the current sexual abuse statutes, which have a marriage or domestic partnership defense that decriminalizes

---

[60] The affirmative defense only applies to "D.C. Code § 22-3102(2)." D.C. Code § 22-3104(b)(1). However, "D.C. Code § 22-3102(2)" is not an accurate citation for the current sexual performance using a minor statute. Given the remainder of the current sexual performance using a minor statute and the additional requirements of this affirmative defense, the correct citation should be "D.C. Code § 22-3102(a)(2)." The organic act for the current sexual performance using a minor statute confirms this interpretation, and the omission of subsection (a) appears to be a codification error.

[61] D.C. Code § 22-3104(b)(1)(A).

[62] The specific movie theater employees are a "motion picture projectionist, stage employee or spotlight operator, cashier, doorman, usher, candy stand attendant, porter, or in any other nonmanagerial or nonsupervisory capacity in a motion picture theater." D.C. Code § 22-3104(b)(1)(B).

[63] D.C. Code § 22-3104(b)(2) ("The affirmative defense provided by paragraph (1) of this subsection shall not apply if the person described therein has a financial interest (other than his or her employment, which employment does not encompass compensation based upon any proportion of the gross receipts) in: (A) The promotion of a sexual performance for sale, rental, or exhibition; (B) The direction of any sexual performance; or (C) The acquisition of the performance for sale, retail, or exhibition.").

[64] For example, the defense would not apply to the curator of an art museum who decides to feature an exhibition of prohibited sexual conduct and otherwise meets the elements of the revised offense. However, the defense would apply to an art museum usher who escorts patrons to the exhibition. It should be noted that for first degree of the revised offense, the curator would still be able to argue that the images had serious artistic value under the affirmative defense in subsection (d)(1) and, in second degree of the revised offense, that the images are not "obscene," as defined in RCC § 22E-701.

sexual conduct that only involves the defendant and the minor.[65] The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute does have a "sexting" exception that includes an adult not more than four years older than a minor, but it is limited to possessing an image[66] and excludes marriages, domestic partnerships, and romantic relationships with a greater than four year age difference.[67] There is no DCCA case law interpreting the scope of this "sexting" exception. In contrast, the revised arranging a live performance statute makes it an affirmative defense that the actor is married to, or in a domestic partnership or "romantic, dating, or sexual relationship" with the complainant, with several additional requirements. The defense only applies to creating, producing, or directing a live performance (sub-paragraphs (a)(1)(A) and (b)(1)(B)). The live performance must be limited to the actor and the complainant or just the complainant, and the actor must reasonably believe that the actor has the complainant's effective consent. The "effective consent" requirements are consistent with the consent defense in the revised sexual assault statute (RCC § 22E-1301) and other RCC offenses. Finally, the actor must reasonably believe that he or she is the only audience for the live performance, other than the complainant. Without this defense, the revised arranging a live performance statute would criminalize consensual sexual behavior between spouses and domestic partners that may not be criminal under the current or RCC age-based sexual abuse statutes. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute.

Eighth, the revised arranging a live performance statute has an affirmative defense for subsection (a) that the live performance has, or will have, serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value, when considered as a whole. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute does not have any defense if the performance has, or will have, serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value, when considered as a whole. As a result, the current statute appears to criminalize the creation, sale, or promotion, of artistic films, or newsworthy events that display real minors engaging in the prohibited

Code § 22-3011(b) ("Marriage or domestic partnership between the defendant and the child or minor at the time of the offense is a defense, which the defendant must establish by a preponderance of the evidence, to a prosecution under §§ 22-3008 to 22-3010.01, prosecuted alone or in conjunction with charges under § 22-3018 or § 22-403, involving only the defendant and the child or minor."). In the current sexual abuse statutes a "child" is a person under the age of 16 years and a "minor" is a person under the age of 18 years. D.C. Code § 22-3001(3), (5A). The marriage and domestic partnership defense applies to the current child sexual abuse statutes (D.C. Code §§ 22-3008 and 22-3009), the sexual abuse of a minor statutes (D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.01 and 22-3009.02), enticing a child or minor (D.C. Code § 22-3010), and misdemeanor sexual abuse of a child or minor (D.C. Code § 22-3010.01). These current sex offenses are based on the ages of the complainant and the defendant, as opposed to whether force, coercion, etc., was present.

[66] D.C. Code § 22-3102(c)(2) ("If the sexual performance consists solely of a still or motion picture, then this section: (2) Shall not apply to possession of a still or motion picture by . . . an adult not more than 4 years older than the minor or minors depicted in it, who receives it from a minor depicted in it unless the recipient knows that at least one of the minors depicted in the still or motion picture did not consent to its transmission.").

[67] D.C. Code § 22-3102(c)(2) ("If the sexual performance consists solely of a still or motion picture, then this section: (2) Shall not apply to possession of a still or motion picture by . . . an adult not more than 4 years older than the minor or minors depicted in it, who receives it from a minor depicted in it unless the recipient knows that at least one of the minors depicted in the still or motion picture did not consent to its transmission.").

sexual conduct. There is no DCCA case law on whether the current statute would be unconstitutional in these and other similar situations, but Supreme Court case law indicates that the current statute may be unconstitutional as applied to live performances with serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value, when considered as a whole.[68] In contrast, the revised arranging a live performance statute has an affirmative defense that the live performance has, or will have serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value when considered as a whole. This language is taken from the Miller standard for obscenity, which requires the absence of these characteristics to be proven as an element of an obscenity offense.[69] Despite this defense, however, there may still be liability under the RCC sex offenses for causing or attempting to cause a minor to engage in the prohibited sexual conduct.[70] This change improves the constitutionality of the revised statute.

Ninth, the revised arranging a live performance statute no longer separately prohibits "employ[ing]," "authoriz[ing]," or "induc[ing]" a minor to engage in a sexual performance, instead penalizing such conduct under the RCC solicitation statute at half the penalty of the completed offense. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute specifically states that a person commits the offense if he "employs, authorizes, or induces" a minor to engage in a sexual performance.[71] The precise scope of conduct intended by these verbs, and whether such verbs are intended to equate with solicitation of a crime under common law, is unclear. There is no DCCA case law interpreting this provision. Regardless, although such conduct may be far-removed from an actual live performance, employing, authorizing, or inducing a minor to engage in a live performance has the same 10 year penalty as actually creating or directing a live performance.[72] In contrast, the revised arranging a live performance statute removes employing, authorizing, and inducing as a discrete means of liability. Conduct that [68] In Ferber, the Court acknowledged that some applications of the statute, which extended to live performances, at issue would be unconstitutional:

> While the reach of the statute is directed at the hard core of child pornography, the Court of Appeals was understandably concerned that some protected expression, ranging from medical textbooks to pictorials in the National Geographic would fall prey to the statute. How often, if ever, it may be necessary to employ children to engage in conduct clearly within the reach of [the statute] in order to produce educational, medical, or artistic works cannot be known with certainty. Yet we seriously doubt, and it has not been suggested, that these arguably impermissible applications of the statute amount to more than a tiny fraction of the materials within the statute's reach.

Ferber, 458 U.S. at 773. The Court found that the statute was not substantially overbroad and any overbreadth that exists could be addressed through as-applied constitutional challenges. Id. at 773-74. The material at issue in Ferber was two films that "almost entirely" depicted prohibited sexual activity and the Court determined the statute was not overbroad as applied to the respondent. Id. at 752, 774 & n. 28.

[70] For example, a defendant that causes minors to engage in sexual intercourse for a live play may have a successful affirmative defense under the RCC arranging a live performance offense or RCC attending a live performance offense. However, depending on the ages of the minors, causing them to engage in sexual intercourse may lead to liability for sexual abuse of a minor (RCC § 22-1302), or, independent of the ages of the minors, if there was force involved, there may be liability for sexual assault (RCC § 22E-1301), as either a principal or an accomplice (RCC § 2E-210).

facilitates the minor engaging in the creation of a live performance instead is covered by the RCC solicitation offense (RCC § 22E-302),[73] defined in a manner consistent with other serious offenses against persons, and subject to a penalty one-half of the completed offense. "Employing" a minor to engage in a live performance may also make the actor subject to attempt liability[74] depending on the facts of the case. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Beyond these nine changes to current District law, seven other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised arranging a live performance statute requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state for the prohibited conduct—creating a live performance, giving consent for a minor to engage in a live performance, or selling or advertising a live performance. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute requires the defendant to "know[] the character and content" of the sexual performance.[75] The statute does not specify whether this culpable mental state extends to the prohibited conduct, such as creating the live performance, and the definition of "knowingly"[76] in the current statute is unclear. There is no DCCA case law on these issues. The current D.C. Code obscenity statute has a substantively identical definition of "knowingly,"[77] which the DCCA has interpreted as requiring subjective knowledge of the sexual nature of the material at issue.[78] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised arranging a live performance

[73] Depending on the facts of the case, there may also be accomplice liability under RCC § 22E-210 or conspiracy liability under § 22E-301 for one who "employs, authorizes, or induces" in concert with others.
[74] RCC § 22E-301.
[75] D.C. Code § 22-3102(a)(1) ("A person is guilty of the use of a minor in a sexual performance if knowing the character and content thereof, he or she employs, authorizes, or induces a person under 18 years of age to engage in a sexual performance or being the parent, legal guardian, or custodian of a minor, he or she consents to the participation by a minor in a sexual performance."), (a)(2) ("A person is guilty of promoting a sexual performance by a minor when, knowing the character and content thereof, he or she produces, directs, or promotes any performance which includes sexual conduct by a person under 18 years of age.").
[76] The current statute defines "knowingly" as "having general knowledge of, or reason to know or a belief or ground for belief which warrants further inspection or inquiry, or both." D.C. Code § 22-3101(1). It is unclear whether this definition requires the defendant to have subjective knowledge, or requires a lower culpable mental state akin to recklessness or negligence. There is no DCCA case law on this definition. The legislative history notes that the definition was used "as opposed to the more general definition of 'knowing or having reasonable grounds to believe'" and that the definition was used to "comport with the scienter requirement in [New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747 (1982)]." Council of the District of Columbia, Report of the Committee of the Judiciary, Bill 4-305, The "District of Columbia Protection of Minors Act of 1982" at 8. Ferber, however, did not state a specific mental state, only that "some element of scienter on the part of the defendant" was required. New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747, 765 (1982) (citing Smith v. California, 361 U.S. 147 (1959) and Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. 87 (1974)). Presumably then, per Ferber, the District's statutory definition of "knowledge" was not intended to equate to negligence, and requires some degree of subjective awareness by the actor, either recklessness or knowledge.
[77] D.C. Code § 22-2201(a)(2)(B) (defining "knowingly" as "having general knowledge of, or reason to know, or a belief or ground for belief which warrants further inspection or inquiry of, the character and content of any article, thing, device, performance, or representation described in paragraph (1) of this subsection which is reasonably susceptible of examination.").
[78] See Kramer v. U. S., 293 A.2d 272, 274 (D.C. 1972) ("The officer's testimony regarding the nature of poses of nudes in the pictures readily visible on the magazine and box covers would be sufficient to indicate to a customer or a salesman the nature of the merchandise offered for sale. It is sufficient if the statute requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-206, for the prohibited conduct—creating a live performance, giving consent for a minor to engage in a live performance, or selling or advertising a live performance. Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[79] A "knowingly" culpable mental state for the prohibited conduct is consistent with numerous other RCC offenses that apply a "knowingly" culpable mental state to prohibited conduct. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised offense.

Second, the revised arranging a live performance statute requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state for the fact that a visual presentation is "for an audience," as required by the RCC definition of "live performance." The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute requires the defendant to "know[] the character and content" of the sexual performance,[80] but neither the statute nor the current definition of "sexual performance"[81] specifies whether the visual presentation must be for an audience.[82] In addition, the definition of "knowingly"[83] in the current statute is unclear. There is no DCCA case law on these issues. The current D.C. Code obscenity statute has [79] See Elonis, 135 S. Ct.at 2009 ("[O]ur cases have explained that a defendant generally must 'know the facts that make his conduct fit the definition of the offense,' even if he does not know that those facts give rise to a crime. (Internal citation omitted)").

[80] D.C. Code § 22-3102(a)(1) ("A person is guilty of the use of a minor in a sexual performance if knowing the character and content thereof, he or she employs, authorizes, or induces a person under 18 years of age to engage in a sexual performance or being the parent, legal guardian, or custodian of a minor, he or she consents to the participation by a minor in a sexual performance."), (a)(2) ("A person is guilty of promoting a sexual performance by a minor when, knowing the character and content thereof, he or she produces, directs, or promotes any performance which includes sexual conduct by a person under 18 years of age.").

[82] D.C. Code § 22-3102(a)(1) ("A person is guilty of the use of a minor in a sexual performance if knowing the character and content thereof, he or she employs, authorizes, or induces a person under 18 years of age to engage in a sexual performance or being the parent, legal guardian, or custodian of a minor, he or she consents to the participation by a minor in a sexual performance."), (a)(2) ("A person is guilty of promoting a sexual performance by a minor when, knowing the character and content thereof, he or she produces, directs, or promotes any performance which includes sexual conduct by a person under 18 years of age.").

[83] The current statute defines "knowingly" as "having general knowledge of, or reason to know or a belief or ground for belief which warrants further inspection or inquiry, or both." D.C. Code § 22-3101(1). It is unclear whether this definition requires the defendant to have subjective knowledge, or requires a lower culpable mental state akin to recklessness or negligence. There is no DCCA case law on this definition. The legislative history notes that the definition was used "as opposed to the more general definition of 'knowing or having reasonable grounds to believe'" and that the definition was used to "comport with the scienter requirement in [New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747 (1982)]." Council of the District of Columbia, Report of the Committee of the Judiciary, Bill 4-305, The "District of Columbia Protection of Minors Act of 1982" at 8. Ferber, however, did not state a specific mental state, only that "some element of scienter on the part of the defendant" was required. *New York v. Presumably then, per Ferber, the District's statutory definition of "knowledge" was not intended to equate to negligence, and requires some degree of subjective awareness by the actor, either recklessness or knowledge.

a substantively identical definition of "knowingly,"[84] which the DCCA has interpreted as requiring subjective knowledge of the sexual nature of the material at issue.[85] Resolving these ambiguities, the revised arranging a live performance statute requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-206, for the fact that the visual presentation is a "live performance" as defined in RCC § 22E-701.[86] The RCC definition of "live performance" requires that the visual presentation be "for an audience," and read in conjunction with the RCC definition of "knowingly," requires that the defendant be "practically certain" that the presentation is "for an audience."[87] Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[88] A "knowingly" culpable mental state for the prohibited conduct is consistent with numerous other RCC offenses that apply a "knowingly" culpable mental state to prohibited conduct. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised offense.

Third, the revised arranging a live performance statute requires recklessness as to the content of the live performance and, in second degree, as to whether the content is obscene. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute requires the defendant to "know[] the character and content" of the sexual performance[89] and defines "knowingly" as "having general knowledge of, or reason to know or a belief or ground for belief which warrants further inspection or inquiry, or both."[90] There is no DCCA case law interpreting the definition of "knowingly" or how it applies to the current [84] D.C. Code § 22-2201(a)(2)(B) (defining "knowingly" as "having general knowledge of, or reason to know, or a belief or ground for belief which warrants further inspection or inquiry of, the character and content of any article, thing, device, performance, or representation described in paragraph (1) of this subsection which is reasonably susceptible of examination.").

[85] See Kramer v. U. S., 293 A.2d 272, 274 (D.C. 1972) ("The officer's testimony regarding the nature of poses of nudes in the pictures readily visible on the magazine and box covers would be sufficient to indicate to a customer or a salesman the nature of the merchandise offered for sale. It is sufficient if the accused had such knowledge of the material that he should have suspected its sale might violate the law and inspected or inquired further as to its character and content.").

[86] The RCC definition of "live performance" is substantively identical to the current definition of "performance" as it pertains to live conduct, differing only in the explicit requirement that the presentation be "for an audience, including an audience of one person." Compare D.C. Code § 22-3101(3) (defining "performance" as "any play . . . electronic representation, dance, or any other visual presentation or exhibition.") with RCC § 22E-701 (defining "live performance" as a "play, dance, or other visual presentation or exhibition for an audience.").

[87] This requirement is discussed further in the explanatory note for the revised offense.

[88] See Elonis, 135 S. Ct.at 2009 ("[O]ur cases have explained that a defendant generally must 'know the facts that make his conduct fit the definition of the offense,' even if he does not know that those facts give rise to a crime. (Internal citation omitted)").

[89] D.C. Code § 22-3102(a)(1) ("A person is guilty of the use of a minor in a sexual performance if knowing the character and content thereof, he or she employs, authorizes, or induces a person under 18 years of age to engage in a sexual performance or being the parent, legal guardian, or custodian of a minor, he or she consents to the participation by a minor in a sexual performance."), (a)(2) ("A person is guilty of promoting a sexual performance by a minor when, knowing the character and content thereof, he or she produces, directs, or promotes any performance which includes sexual conduct by a person under 18 years of age.").

statute.[91] However, the current obscenity statute has a substantively identical definition of "knowingly,"[92] which the DCCA has interpreted as requiring subjective knowledge of the sexual nature of the material at issue.[93] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised arranging a live performance statute requires recklessness as to the content of the live performance, and, in second degree, as to whether the content is "obscene," as defined in RCC § 22-701. Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence,[94] but courts have also recognized that recklessness regarding a risk of serious harm is wrongful conduct.[95] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute

Fourth, the revised arranging a live performance statute requires recklessness as to the age of the complainant and deletes the current affirmative defense for reasonable mistake of age. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute requires that the defendant "know[] the character and content" of the sexual performance[96] and

[91] The current statute defines "knowingly" as "having general knowledge of, or reason to know or a belief or ground for belief which warrants further inspection or inquiry, or both." D.C. Code § 22-3101(1). It is unclear whether this definition requires the defendant to have subjective knowledge, or requires a lower culpable mental state akin to recklessness or negligence. There is no DCCA case law on this definition. The legislative history notes that the definition was used "as opposed to the more general definition of 'knowing or having reasonable grounds to believe'" and that the definition was used to "comport with the scienter requirement in [New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747 (1982)]." Ferber*, 458 U.S. 747, 765 (1982) (citing Smith v. California, 361 U.S. 147 (1959) and Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. 87 (1974)). Presumably then, per Ferber, the District's statutory definition of "knowledge" was not intended to equate to negligence, and requires some degree of subjective awareness by the actor, either recklessness or knowledge.

[92] D.C. Code § 22-2201(a)(2)(B) (defining "knowingly" as "having general knowledge of, or reason to know, or a belief or ground for belief which warrants further inspection or inquiry of, the character and content of any article, thing, device, performance, or representation described in paragraph (1) of this subsection which is reasonably susceptible of examination.").

It is sufficient if the accused had such knowledge of the material that he should have suspected its sale might violate the law and inspected or inquired further as to its character and content.").

[94] There is a presumption that the legislature intends to require a defendant to possess a degree of knowledge sufficient to "mak[e] a person legally responsible for the consequences of his or her act or omission" regarding "each of the statutory elements that criminalize otherwise innocent conduct," even when the legislature does not specify any scienter in the statutory text. Rehaif v. United States, 139 S. Ct. 2191, 2195 (2019) (citing United States v. X-Citement Video, Inc., 513 U. S. 64, 72 (1994); Morissette v. United States, 342 U. S. 246, 256–258 (1952); *Staples v. Code § 22-3102(a)(1) ("A person is guilty of the use of a minor in a sexual performance if knowing the character and content thereof, he or she employs, authorizes, or induces a person under 18 years of age to engage in a sexual performance or being the parent, legal guardian, or custodian of a minor, he or she defines "knowingly" as "having general knowledge of, or reason to know or a belief or ground for belief which warrants further inspection or inquiry, or both."[97] It is unclear whether this definition requires the defendant to have subjective knowledge, or requires a lower culpable mental state akin to recklessness or negligence,[98] and it is also unclear whether the mental state applies to the age of the complainant.[99] There is no DCCA case law on these issues. However, the current statute has an affirmative defense for a reasonable mistake of age,[100] which suggests that negligence is not sufficient for liability and that "recklessly" or "knowingly" applies to the age of the complainant. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised arranging a live performance statute requires recklessness as to the age of the complainant. A reckless culpable mental state preserves the substance of the affirmative defense[101] and clarifies that the defendant must have some subjective knowledge as to the age of the complainant. Requiring, at a minimum, a knowing culpable mental state for the elements of an offense that make otherwise legal conduct illegal is a generally accepted legal principle.[102] However, recklessness has been upheld

[98] The legislative history notes that the definition of "knowingly" was used "as opposed to the more general definition of 'knowing or having reasonable grounds to believe'" and that the definition was used to "comport with the scienter requirement in [*New York v. Presumably then, per Ferber, the District's statutory definition of "knowledge" was not intended to equate to negligence, and requires some degree of subjective awareness by the actor, either recklessness or knowledge.

[99] The legislative history for the prohibition in the current statute against attending, transmitting or possessing a sexual performance by a minor (D.C. Code § 22-3102(b)), states that the defendant "must know that the performance will depict a minor." Council of the District of Columbia, Report of the Committee on Public Safety and the Judiciary on Bill 18-70, The "Prohibition Against Human Trafficking Amendment Act of 2010" at 10. This prohibition was added to the current statute in 2010 and there is no discussion of how the "knowing" culpable mental state in pre-existing parts of the statute applies to the age of the complainant. Regardless, it is persuasive authority that the defendant must "know" the age of the complainant in the other parts of the statute, although the meaning of that definition remains unclear.

[100] D.C. Code § 22-3104(a) ("Under this chapter it shall be an affirmative defense that the defendant in good faith reasonably believed the person appearing in the performance was 18 years of age or over.").

[101] The current affirmative defense is that "the defendant in good faith reasonably believed the person appearing in the performance was 18 years of age or over." D.C. Code § 22-3104(a). In the revised arranging a live performance statute, it must be proven that an actor was reckless that the complainant was under the age of 18 years. As defined in RCC § 22E-206, "recklessness" requires that the actor must disregard a substantial risk that the complainant was under the age of 18 years; and the risk must be of such a nature and degree that, considering the nature and motivation of the actor's conduct and the circumstances the person is aware of, the actor's conscious disregard is a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct. A reasonable mistake as to the complainant's age would negate the recklessness required. See RCC § 22E-208(b)(3) and accompanying commentary, providing that a reasonable mistake as to a circumstance element negates the existence of recklessness as to that element.

in some cases as a minimal basis for punishing morally culpable crime.[103] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Fifth, the revised arranging a live performance statute requires that the live performance depicts, or will depict, at least part of a real complainant under the age of 18 years and excludes purely computer-generated or other fictitious minors. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute does not specify whether the complainant that is depicted, or will be depicted, in a live performance must be a "real," i.e. not fictitious, complainant under the age of 18 years. The statute does define "minor," however, as "any person under 18 years of age,"[104] which arguably suggests that the complainant must be a "real," i.e. not fictitious, person. There is no DCCA case law on this issue. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised arranging a live performance statute specifies that at least part[105] of a "real," i.e. not fictitious, complainant under the age of 18 years must be depicted or will be depicted. Requiring at least part of a "real" complainant under the age of 18 years ensures that the statute satisfies the First Amendment.[106] The RCC does not criminalize an obscene live performance with computer-generated minors or other "fake" minors, such as youthful looking adults, although there may be liability under the RCC indecent exposure statute (RCC § 22E-4206).[107] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Sixth, through the use of the defined term "simulated" in RCC § 22E-701, the revised statute excludes liability for live performances of sexual conduct that is apparently fake. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute prohibits "simulated" sexual intercourse,[108] but does not define the term. It is unclear whether "simulated" includes suggestive but obviously staged sex scenes like one might find in a commercially screened "R" or "NC-17" movie, or theatrical or comic portrayals of a [103] Elonis v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2001, 2015, 192 L.Ed.2d 1 (2015) (J. Alito, concurring) ("There can be no real dispute that recklessness regarding a risk of serious harm is wrongful conduct. In a wide variety of contexts, we have described reckless conduct as morally culpable.).

[104] D.C. Code § 22-3101(2).

[105] The revised arranging a live performance statute includes performances that show at least part of a real minor, such as a real minor's head that seems to be attached to an adult body, or an adult's head that seems to be attached to a real minor's body. There is no requirement that the government prove the identity of a real minor.

[106] In New York v. Ferber, the Supreme Court established that live or visual sexual depictions of real children do not have to meet the Miller standard for obscenity. New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747, 764-65 (1982). Crucial to the Court's decision was its acceptance of several arguments and legislative findings, including that "the use of children as subjects of pornographic materials is harmful to the psychological, emotional, and mental health of the child," id. at 758, and that "the materials are a permanent record of the children's participation and the harm to the child is exacerbated by their circulation," id. at 759. The opinion was not specific to images of minors where only part of the minor is real, but the Court stated in a later opinion that "morphed images may fall within the definition of virtual child pornography, [but] they implicate the interests of real children and are in that sense closer to the images in Ferber." Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234, 242, (2002). The respondents in Ashcroft did not challenge the morphed images provision of the statute at issue and the Court did not discuss it further.

[107] The actor would have to meet the requirements of the RCC indecent exposure statute, as well an RCC inchoate offense, such as solicitation (RCC § 22E-302) or accomplice liability (RCC § 22E-210), unless the actor was also directly involved in the performance.

[108] D.C. Code § 22-3101(5)(A).

sexual act that are clearly fake. There is no DCCA case law on this issue. Resolving this ambiguity, the RCC defines "simulated" as "feigned or pretended in a way that realistically duplicates the appearance of actual conduct to the perception of an average person." Under this definition, only highly explicit depictions where it is unclear due to lighting, etc., if the prohibited conduct is actually occurring are included in the revised statute,[109] not other portrayals that are clearly staged. This definition is similar to another jurisdiction's definition[110] and is supported by Supreme Court case law.[111] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and constitutionality of the revised statute.

Seventh, the revised arranging a live performance statute provides liability for a person responsible for the complainant under civil law giving "effective consent" to the complainant's participation in the live performance, and requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state for this element.[112] The current D.C. Code sexual performance using a minor statute prohibits a "parent, legal guardian, or custodian" of a minor from "consent[ing] to the participation by a minor in a sexual performance."[113] The statute does not define "consent" or specify a culpable mental state for this element and there is no DCCA case law on this issue. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised arranging a live performance statute requires that the individual responsible under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant give "effective consent," as defined in RCC § 22E-701, and requires a "knowing" culpable mental state for this element. The term "under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant" includes parents, legal guardians, and custodians who at the time have a legal duty of care for the complainant. "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means [109] For example, a simulated sexual act may clearly show male genitalia, female genitalia, and movement between two actors but, due to the angle of the camera, not show whether there was penetration.

[110] Utah Code Ann. § 76-5b-103(11) ("'Simulated sexually explicit conduct' means a feigned or pretended act of sexually explicit conduct which duplicates, within the perception of an average person, the appearance of an actual act of sexually explicit conduct.").

[111] In United States v. Williams, the Supreme Court stated that a federal statute that prohibited pandering or soliciting "an obscene visual depiction of a minor engaging in sexually explicit conduct" or "a visual depiction of an actual minor engaging in sexually explicit conduct," "precisely tracks the material held constitutionally proscribable in Ferber and Miller: obscene material depicting (actual or virtual) children engaged in sexually explicit conduct, and any other material depicting actual children engaged in sexually explicit conduct." United States v. Williams, 553 U.S. 285, 294 (2008). In dicta, the Court discussed the scope of "simulated sexual intercourse" in the statute's definition of "sexually explicit conduct":

> 'Sexually explicit conduct' connotes actual depiction of the sex act rather than merely the suggestion that it is occurring. And 'simulated' sexual intercourse is not sexual intercourse that is merely suggested, but rather sexual intercourse that is explicitly portrayed, even though (through camera tricks or otherwise) it may not actually have occurred. The portrayal must cause a reasonable viewer to believe that the actors actually engaged in that conduct on camera. Critically . . . [the statute's] requirement of a 'visual depiction of an actual minor' makes clear that, although the sexual intercourse may be simulated, it must involve actual children (unless it is obscene). This . . . eliminates any possibility that virtual child pornography or sex between youthful-looking adult actors might be covered by the term "simulated sexual intercourse.

Williams, 553 U.S. at 296–97.

[112] Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" culpable mental state in paragraph (a)(1) and paragraph (b)(1) also applies to the fact that the defendant is a "person with a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant."

[113] D.C. Code § 22-3102(a)(1).

"consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception" and is used consistently throughout the RCC. Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[114] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, the revised statute deletes subsection (a) of the current D.C. Code statute: "It shall be unlawful in the District of Columbia for a person knowingly to use a minor in a sexual performance or to promote a sexual performance by a minor."[115] It is unclear whether this is a general statement or part of the actual offense for which a person can be charged and convicted.[116] The revised arranging a live performance statute substantively encompasses the "use" of a minor in a sexual performance and "promot[ing]" a sexual performance by a minor, rendering current subsection (a) superfluous. This improves the clarity of the revised offense without changing the law.

Second, organizationally, the RCC has separate statutes for still images of minors and live performances of minors and no longer uses the general terms "performance" and "sexual performance." Due to the current D.C. Code definitions of "performance" and "sexual performance," the current sexual performance of a minor statute includes both still images and live performances.[117] However, it is counterintuitive to construe a "performance" as including a still image (e.g., photograph). To clarify that both images and live performances fall within the revised statutes, the RCC creating or trafficking an obscene image of a minor and RCC possession of an obscene image of a minor statutes (RCC §§ 22E-1807 and 22E-1808) are specific to still images and the RCC arranging a live performance of a minor and viewing a live performance of a minor statutes (RCC §§ 22E-1809 and 22E-1810) are specific to live sexual conduct. The two sets of statutes, however, have equivalent penalties—trafficking an obscene image and arranging a live exhibition have the same penalty, and possessing an image and viewing an exhibition or [116] The current statute substantively encompasses the "use" and "promot[ion] of a minor in a sexual performance, regardless of the meaning of subsection (a). D.C. Code §§ 22-3102(a)(1), (a)(2) ("(1) A person is guilty of the use of a minor in a sexual performance if knowing the character and content thereof, he or she employs, authorizes, or induces a person under 18 years of age to engage in a sexual performance or being the parent, legal guardian, or custodian of a minor, he or she consents to the participation by a minor in a sexual performance. (2) A person is guilty of promoting a sexual performance by a minor when, knowing the character and content thereof, he or she produces, directs, or promotes any performance which includes sexual conduct by a person under 18 years of age."); 22-3101(4) (defining "promote" as "to procure, manufacture, issue, sell, give, provide, lend, mail, deliver, transfer, transmute, publish or distribute, circulate, disseminate, present, exhibit, or advertise, or to offer or agree to do the same.").

[117] D.C. Code § 22-3101(3), (6) (defining "performance" as "any play, motion picture, photograph, electronic representation, dance, or any other visual presentation of exhibition" and "sexual performance" as "any performance or part thereof which includes sexual conduct by a person under 18 years of age.").

broadcast have the same penalty. This change improves the clarity of the revised statutes without changing current District law.

Third, the revised arranging a live performance statute no longer uses the defined term "minor."[118] Instead, consistent with the current D.C. Code statute's definition, the revised statute refers to a "complainant under the age of 18 years." Other statutes in the D.C. Code refer to a person under 18 years of age as a "child,"[119] and the use of different labels for persons of the same age is confusing. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute without changing current District law.

Fourth, the revised arranging a live performance statute replaces "parent, legal guardian, or custodian of a minor" with a "person with a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant." The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute prohibits a "parent, legal guardian, or custodian of a minor" from "consent[ing] to the participation by a minor in a sexual performance."[120] There is no DCCA case law on the scope of "parent, legal guardian, or custodian" in the current statute. However, the legislative history for the current statute indicates a broad scope: "[A] parent, whether natural, or adoptive, or a foster parent, a legal guardian defined in D.C. Code, sec. 21-101 to 103 or custodian . . . [c]ustodian means any person who has responsibility for the care of a child without regard to whether a formal legal arrangement exists."[121] The revised statute uses a "person with a responsibility under District civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant," which is used elsewhere in the RCC, such as the special defenses in RCC § 22E-408. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute without changing current District law.

Fifth, the revised arranging a live performance statute requires that the complainant "engage in or submit to" the prohibited sexual conduct. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute prohibits inducing a minor to "engage in" a sexual performance,[122] but otherwise refers generally to the complainant's actions.[123] The revised arranging a live performance statute consistently refers to the complainant "engag[ing] in or submit[ing] to" the prohibited sexual conduct, which is consistent with the language in the RCC sex offenses and recognizes that the revised statute may apply in situations where the complainant is an active participant or a completely passive (e.g., [118] D.C. Code § 22-3101(2) (defining "minor" as "any person under 18 years of age."). Despite this definition, the current sexual performance using a minor statute inconsistently uses the term "minor" and instead refers to a "person under 18 years of age." D.C. Code § 22-3102.

[119] See, e.g., D.C. Code § 22-1101 (a) ("A person commits the crime of cruelty to children in the first degree if that person …willfully maltreats a child under 18 years of age….").

Code § 22-3102(a)(1) ("participation by a minor in a sexual performance."), (a)(2) ("any performance which includes sexual conduct by a person under 18 years."), (b) ("a sexual performance by a minor."). In addition to the variable statutory language, the definition of "sexual performance" merely requires that the performance "includes sexual conduct" by a minor. D.C. Code § 22-3101(6). The current definition of "sexual conduct" lists specific types of behavior, but does not define the precise requirements for the complainant.

unconscious) participant. This clarifies the scope of the revised statute without changing current District law.

Sixth, the revised arranging a live performance statute uses the definition of "sexual act" in RCC § 22E-701. The RCC definition is substantively identical to the various forms of sexual penetration the current sexual performance of a minor statute prohibits and includes bestiality.[124] This change clarifies the revised statute.

Seventh, instead of prohibiting a "lewd" exhibition,[125] the revised arranging a live performance statute prohibits a "sexual or sexualized display" of certain body parts when there is less than a full opaque covering. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute does not define "lewd," but the DCCA approved a jury instruction for the offense that stated "lewd exhibition of the genitals means that the minor's genital or pubic area must be visibly displayed," that "mere nudity is not enough," and "the exhibition must have an unnatural or unusual focus on the minor's genitalia regardless of the minor's intention to engage in sexual activity or whether the viewer is sexually aroused."[126] The revised arranging a live performance statute's reference to "sexual or sexualized display" is intended to restate the meaning of "lewd exhibition" in more modern, plain language while preserving this DCCA case law. Mere nudity is not sufficient for a "sexual or sexualized display" in subparagraphs (a)(2)(D) or (b)(2)(D). There must be a visible display of the relevant body parts with an unnatural or unusual focus on them, regardless of the minor's intention to engage in sexual activity or the effect on the viewer. This change clarifies current law.

[124] The current sexual performance using a minor statute prohibits "actual or simulated sexual intercourse: (i) Between the penis and the vulva, anus, or mouth; (ii) Between the mouth and the vulva or anus; or (iii) Between an artificial sex organ or other object or instrument used in the manner of an artificial sex organ and the anus or vulva" as well as "bestiality." D.C. Code § 22-3101(5) (defining "sexual conduct."). Subsection (A) of the RCC definition of "sexual act" encompasses penile penetration of the vulva or anus in subsection (i) of the current statutory language. Subsection (B) of the RCC definition of "sexual act" encompasses penile penetration of the mouth in subsection (ii) of the current statutory language as well as contact between the mouth and the vulva or anus in subsection (i). Subsection (C) of the RCC definition of "sexual act" encompasses the object sexual penetration described in subsection (iii) of the current statutory language. Finally, subsection (D) of the RCC definition of "sexual act" encompasses specific forms of bestiality.

[125] D.C. Code § 22-3101(5)(E) (definition of "sexual conduct" including a "lewd exhibition of the genitals.").

[126] Green v. United States, 948 A.2d 554, 562 (D.C. 2008). The DCCA further noted that the jury instruction at issue was similar to instructions from other jurisdictions. Id. n. 10. In addition, the DCCA noted that "some courts look to multiple factors to determine whether a photograph contains a lewd depiction of genitalia, [but] one of the factors routinely considered is whether the picture focuses on the genitalia in an unnatural way." Id. In particular, the DCCA cited a Tenth Circuit case, Wolf, listing factors such as "whether the focal point of the visual depiction is on the child's genitalia or pubic area;" "whether the child is fully or partially clothed, or nude;" and "whether the visual depiction is intended or designed to elicit a sexual response in the viewer." Id. (quoting United States v. Wolf, 890 F.2d 241, 244 (10th Cir. 1989). The Wolf case, in turn, cites United States v. Dost, 636 F.Supp. 828, 831 (S.D.Cal. 1986)), which has an extensive list of factors.

The DCCA noted that the Wolf court held that an image "does not need to be meet every factor in order to be lewd," id., but also noted that the record in Green "contains evidence to support the presence of other enumerated factors, such as the children being naked and the pictures being taken to elicit a sexual response from appellant." Green, 948 A.2d 562 n.10.

Eighth, the revised arranging a live performance statute prohibits selling "admission to" a live performance. The current sexual performance of a minor statute prohibits "sell[ing]" a live performance,[127] but in the context of a live sexual performance, it is more accurate to say selling "admission to."[128] This change improves the clarity of the revised statute without changing current District law.

Sixth, the definition of "movie theater" in RCC § 22E-701[129] applies to the affirmative defense in paragraph (d)(4) of the revised arranging a live performance statute. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute has a similar affirmative defense[130] that applies to specified employees of a "motion picture theater," but does not define the term. There is no DCCA case law interpreting the term "motion picture theater" in this affirmative defense. The RCC definition of "motion picture theater" limits the affirmative defense to certain employees of a theater or other venue that is being utilized primarily for the exhibition of a motion picture to the public, which is consistent with the scope of the affirmative defense. This change improves the clarity of the revised statute.

[127] D.C. Code §§ 22-3102(a)(2) (prohibiting "promotes" any sexual performance with a minor); 22-3101(4) (defining "promote" to include "sell.").

[128] If a live performance is filmed, photographed, etc., and the resulting image is sold, there is liability under the RCC creating or trafficking an obscene image statute (RCC § 22E-1807).

[129] RCC § 22E-701 defines "movie theater" as "a theater, auditorium, or other venue that is being utilized primarily for the exhibition of a motion picture to the public."

[130] D.C. Code § 22-3104 (b)(1) ("Except as provided in paragraph (2) of this subsection, in any prosecution for an offense pursuant to § 22-3102(2) it shall be an affirmative defense that the person so charged was: (A) A librarian engaged in the normal course of his or her employment; or (B) A motion picture projectionist, stage employee or spotlight operator, cashier, doorman, usher, candy stand attendant, porter, or in any other nonmanagerial or nonsupervisory capacity in a motion picture theater.").

RCC § 22E-1810. Attending or Viewing a Live Sexual Performance of a Minor.

Explanatory Note.[1] The RCC attending or viewing a live sexual performance of a minor offense prohibits attending or viewing a live performance or live broadcast that depicts complainants under the age of 18 years engaging in or submitting to specified sexual conduct. The penalty gradations are based on the type of sexual conduct that is depicted in the live performance or live broadcast. The revised attending or viewing a live sexual performance of a minor statute has the same penalties as the RCC possession of an obscene image of a minor statute,[2] the main difference being that the RCC possession of an obscene image of a minor offense is limited to images. Along with the creating or trafficking of an obscene image of a minor offense,[3] the possession of an obscene image of a minor offense,[4] and the arranging a live sexual performance of a minor offense,[5] the revised attending or viewing a live sexual performance of a minor statute replaces the current sexual performance using a minor offense[6] in the current D.C. Code, as well as the current definitions,[7] penalties,[8] and affirmative defenses[9] for that offense.

Subsection (a) specifies the various types of prohibited conduct in first degree attending or viewing a live sexual performance of a minor statute, the highest gradation of the revised offense. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies the prohibited conduct—attending or viewing a "live performance" or "live broadcast."[10] "Live performance" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 as a "play, dance, or other visual presentation or exhibition for an audience, including an audience of one person." "Live broadcast" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 as "a streaming video, or any other electronically transmitted image for viewing by an audience, including an audience of one person." Paragraph (a)(1) specifies a culpable mental state of "knowingly," a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor must be "practically certain" that he or she attends or views a "live performance" or "live broadcast."[11] As applied to the elements "live performance" and

These terms have distinct definitions in the current D.C. Code statute (D.C. Code § 22-3101(3), (6)), but the current statute does not use the terms consistently. Compare D.C. Code § 22-3102(a)(1), (b) (referring to a "sexual performance.") with (a)(2) (referring to "any performance which includes sexual conduct by a person under 18 years of age.").

[10] It is arguably redundant to prohibit attending or viewing a "live broadcast" because an actor that attends or views a "live broadcast" has likely also attended or viewed a "live performance." As defined in the RCC § 22E-701, a "live broadcast" is essentially a "live performance" that is streamed or electronically transmitted. However, the revised statute includes both live performances and live broadcasts for clarity.

[11] The revised statute prohibits both attending and viewing a live performance or live broadcast because it is possible to attend such a visual presentation without viewing it. An actor that is "practically certain" that he or she is attending a live performance or live broadcast cannot avoid liability by not watching the "live broadcast," the "knowingly" culpable mental state requires that the actor be "practically certain" that the visual presentation is for an audience or one or more people."[12]

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies additional requirements for the live performance or live broadcast. First, the live performance or live broadcast must depict the body of a real complainant under the age of 18 years. "Body" includes the face, as well as other parts of the body of a real complainant under the age of 18 years. Any depiction of a part of the complainant's body is sufficient. The complainant must be a real minor but there is no requirement that the government prove the identity of the minor. Second, the live performance or live broadcast must depict the complainant engaging in or submitting to specific types of sexual conduct: 1) an actual "sexual act," actual "sadomasochistic abuse," or actual masturbation; 2) a "simulated" "sexual act," "simulated" "sadomasochistic abuse," or "simulated" masturbation; or 3) a sexual or sexualized display of the genitals, pubic area, or anus, when there is less than a full opaque covering.[13] The terms "simulated," "sexual act" and "sadomasochistic abuse" are defined in RCC § 22E-701. There is no obscenity requirement for any of the prohibited sexual conduct in subparagraphs (a)(2)(A) through (a)(2)(D).

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies that the culpable mental state for the requirements in paragraph (a)(2) is "recklessly." "Recklessly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor is aware of a substantial risk that the live performance or live broadcast depicts, in part or whole, the body of a real complainant under the age of 18 years of age. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "recklessly" culpable mental state also applies to the prohibited sexual conduct in subparagraphs (a)(2)(A) through (a)(2)(D). The actor must be aware of a substantial risk that the conduct that is depicted in the live performance or live broadcast is one of the types prohibited in performance, i.e. closing his or her eyes, or leaving the room, but staying in reasonably close physical proximity to the performance or broadcast. In addition, an actor cannot avoid liability for being in reasonably close physical proximity to the live performance or live broadcast, but in another part of the facility, venue, or area if the other requirements of the offense are met.

[12] The actor must be "practically certain" that the live performance or live broadcast is "for" an audience, including an audience of one person, and the visual presentation must, in fact, be "for" an audience. It is a fact-specific inquiry as to whether a live performance or live broadcast is "for" an audience. For example, a couple having sex in the privacy of their bedroom, or the relative privacy of a car or their backyard, is likely not having sexual activity "for" an audience. An actor that spies on the couple may be liable for voyeurism under RCC § 22E-1803, but there is no liability for attending or viewing a live performance. In contrast, if the actor views a live performance that is happening openly in a public park, or if he or she has to pay for admission or seek permission to enter a venue or area where the performance occurs, the presentation likely is "for" an audience and likely satisfies the RCC definition of "live performance." It should be noted that in many instances, the actor is the only "audience" and is the same individual that creates, produces, or directs the live performance or live broadcast. Due to the RCC merger provision in RCC § 22E-214, the actor cannot have liability for creating, producing, directing, and attending the same live performance.

[13] If the genitals, pubic area, or anus of the minor have a full opaque covering, there is no liability under first degree of the revised attending a live performance statute. However, if the live performance depicts a minor engaging in a "sexual contact" that is also "obscene," there is liability under second degree of the revised attending a live performance statute. The RCC definition of "sexual contact" prohibits the touching of genitalia, anus, groin, breast, inner thigh, or buttocks, whether clothed or unclothed (RCC § 22E-701).

subparagraphs (a)(2)(A) through (a)(2)(D), such as an actual sexual act or a prohibited sexualized display.

Subsection (b) specifies the prohibited conduct for second degree attending or viewing a live sexual performance of a minor. Paragraph (b)(1) and paragraph (b)(2) have the same requirements as paragraph (a)(1) and paragraph (a)(2) in first degree. However, the types of prohibited sexual conduct are different in second degree. Subparagraph (b)(2)(A) prohibits an "obscene" "sexual contact," and subparagraph (b)(2)(B) prohibits an "obscene" sexual or sexualized display of any breast below the top of the areola, or the buttocks, when there is less than a full opaque covering.[14] "Obscene" and "sexual contact" are defined in RCC § 22E-701. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "recklessly" culpable mental state in paragraph (a)(2) applies to the prohibited sexual conduct and the actor must consciously disregard a substantial risk that the conduct is an "obscene" "sexual contact" or a specified "obscene" sexual display. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "recklessly" culpable mental state in paragraph (a)(2) applies to the prohibited sexual conduct and the actor must consciously disregard a substantial risk that the conduct is an "obscene sexual contact" or a specified "obscene" sexual display.

Subsection (c) establishes several affirmative defenses for the RCC attending or viewing a live performance statute. The general provision in RCC § 22E-201 establishes the burdens of proof and production for all affirmative defenses in the RCC.

Paragraph (c)(1) establishes an affirmative defense to subsection (a) of the revised statute that the live performance or live broadcast has serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value when considered as a whole. This language matches one of the requirements for obscenity in Miller v. California,[15] but makes it an affirmative defense. The prohibited sexual conduct in subparagraphs (a)(2)(A) through (a)(2)(D), when it involves real complainants under the age of 18 years, is not subject to the First Amendment requirements set out in Miller v. California.[16] However, the affirmative defense recognizes that there may be rare situations where live performances or live broadcasts of such conduct warrant First Amendment protection. Paragraph (c)(1) specifies "in fact." "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element, here the fact that the live performance or live broadcast has serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value when considered as a whole.

Paragraph (c)(2) establishes an affirmative defense for an actor that is under the age of 18 years. Paragraph (c)(2) specifies "in fact." "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, "in fact" applies to every element that follows unless a culpable mental state is specified. Here, the "in fact"

[14] If the specified part of the breast or the buttocks has a full opaque covering, and the live performance does not depict an "obscene sexual contact" as prohibited by subparagraph (b)(2)(A), there is no liability under second degree attending a live performance. However, there may be liability if the actor caused the minor to engage in the underlying sexual conduct in the RCC sexually suggestive conduct with a minor offense (RCC § 22E-1304).

[15] Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15, 24 (1973) ("A state [obscenity] offense must also be limited to works which . . . taken as a whole, do not have serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value.").

specified in paragraph (c)(2) applies to subparagraphs (c)(2)(A) and (c)(2)(B) and sub-subparagraphs (c)(2)(B)(i) and (c)(2)(B)(ii) and there is no culpable mental state requirement for any of the elements in these subparagraphs or sub-subparagraphs. Subparagraph (c)(2)(A) requires that the actor is under the age of 18 years. There are two alternative requirements for the affirmative defense under subparagraph (c)(2)(B). Sub-subparagraph (c)(2)(B)(i) requires that the actor is the only person under the age of 18 years who is depicted in the live performance or live broadcast. In the alternative, sub-subparagraph (c)(2)(B)(ii) applies if there are multiple people under the age of 18 years who are depicted in the live performance or live broadcast. Under sub-subparagraph (c)(2)(B)(ii), the actor must reasonably believe[17] that every person under 18 years of age who is depicted in the live performance or live broadcast gives "effective consent" to the actor to engage in the conduct that constitutes the offense. The "in fact" specified in paragraph (c)(2) applies to sub-subparagraph (c)(2)(B)(ii) and no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to sub-subparagraph (c)(2)(B)(ii). However, sub-subparagraph (c)(2)(B)(ii) still requires that the actor subjectively believe that every person under 18 years of age who is depicted in the live performance or live broadcast gives "effective consent" to the actor to engage in the conduct that constitutes the offense, and that belief must be reasonable. Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[18] "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception.

Paragraph (c)(3) establishes an affirmative defense if the actor and the complainant are in a marriage, domestic partnership, or dating relationship. Paragraph (c)(3) specifies "in fact." "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, "in fact" applies to every element that follows unless a culpable mental state is specified. Here, "in fact" applies to every element under subparagraph (c)(3)(A) through subparagraph (c)(3)(E) and there is no culpable mental state required for any of these elements.

There are several requirements to the affirmative defense under paragraph (c)(3). First, per subparagraph (c)(3)(A), the affirmative defense only applies if the actor is at least 18 years of age. An actor that is under the age of 18 years has the broader affirmative defense under paragraph (c)(2) that applies to any actor under the age of 18 years, regardless of the actor's relationship to the complainant. Under sub-subparagraphs c)(3)(B)(i) and (c)(3)(B)(ii), the actor must either be married to, or in a domestic

If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. partnership with, the complainant, or be in a "romantic, dating, or sexual relationship" with the complainant. "Domestic partnership" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 and the reference to a "romantic, dating, or sexual relationship" is identical to the language in the District's current definition of "intimate partner violence"[19] and is intended to have the same meaning. There are additional requirements if the actor in a "romantic, dating, or sexual relationship" with the complainant under sub-subparagraph (c)(3)(B)(ii). When the complainant is under 16 years of age, the actor must be less than four years older (sub-sub-subparagraph (c)(3)(B)(ii)(I)), and when the complainant is under 18 years of age and the actor is at least four years older, the actor must not be in a "position of trust with or authority over" the complainant (sub-sub-subparagraph (c)(3)(B)(ii)(II)). "Position of trust with or authority over" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701. The requirements in sub-sub-subparagraphs (c)(3)(A)(ii)(I) and (c)(3)(A)(ii)(II) mirror the requirements for liability in the RCC sexual abuse of a minor statute (RCC § 22E-1302).

Second, per subparagraph (c)(3)(C), the complainant must be the only person who is depicted in the live performance or live broadcast, or the actor and the complainant must be the only persons who are depicted in the live performance or live broadcast. The marriage or romantic partner defense is not available when the live performance or live broadcast shows third persons. Third, per subparagraph (c)(3)(D), the actor must reasonably believe[20] that the actor has the complainant's "effective consent" to the prohibited conduct. "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception." Fourth, per subparagraph (c)(3)(E), the actor must reasonably believe[21] that the actor is the only audience for the live performance or live broadcast, other than the complainant.[22]

[20] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist. As was stated earlier, the "in fact" specified in subparagraph (c)(3) applies to subparagraph (c)(3)(D) and no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to this subparagraph. However, the actor must subjectively believe that the complainant gives the actor "effective consent" to engage in the conduct that constitutes the offense, and that belief must be reasonable. Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others. See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). [21] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist. As was stated earlier, the "in fact" specified in subparagraph (c)(3) applies to subparagraph (c)(3)(E) and no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to this subparagraph. However, the actor must subjectively believe that the actor is the only audience for the live performance or live broadcast other than the complainant, and that belief must be reasonable. Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but

Paragraph (c)(4) establishes an affirmative defense for employees of a school, museum, library, movie theater, or other venue. "Movie theater" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701. Paragraph (c)(4) specifies "in fact." Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, "in fact" applies to every element that follows unless a culpable mental state is specified. Here, "in fact" applies to subparagraphs (c)(4)(A), (c)(4)(B), (c)(4)(C), and (c)(4)(D) and there is no culpable mental state requirement for any of the elements in these subparagraphs. The employee must be acting in the reasonable scope of his or her employment and have no control over the creation or selection of the live performance or live broadcast. The actor must not record, photograph, or film the live performance or live broadcast.[23] The defense is intended to shield from liability individuals who otherwise meet the elements of the offense, but only because it was part of the ordinary course of employment.

Subsection (d) specifies relevant penalties for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (e) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised attending or viewing a live sexual performance of a minor statute clearly changes current District law in eight main ways.

First, the revised attending a live performance statute punishes attending or viewing a live performance or live broadcast less severely than the creating, selling, or advertising a live performance. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute has the same penalties for creating, selling, advertising, attending, and viewing a live performance,[24] even though creation of a live performance is a direct form of child not others. See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

[22] The "reasonably believes" requirement parallels the requirements of paragraphs (a)(1) and (b)(1) of the offense. As is discussed earlier in the explanatory note, those subparagraphs apply a "knowingly" culpable mental state to the "live performance" and "live broadcast" elements and require that the actor be "practically certain" that the visual presentation is "for" an audience. The "audience" can extend beyond the actor or the complainant to include other people that are watching or may watch the performance as long as the actor is "practically certain" of this fact. For the defense, if an actor reasonably believes that the actor, the complainant, or both of them, are the only audience for the performance, it is irrelevant that there may be other people watching.

[23] If an actor records, photographs, or films the live performance, he or she is creating a prohibited image of a minor and there may be liability under the RCC creating or trafficking an obscene image offense (RCC § 22E-1807).

[24] D.C. Code § 22-3102(a)(1), (a)(2), (b) (prohibiting "employ[ing], authoriz[ing], or induc[ing] a person under 18 years of age to engage in a sexual performance, the parent, legal guardian, or custodian giving such consent, "produc[ing], direct[ing], or promot[ing]" any sexual performance, and "attend[ing], direct[ing], or promot[ing] any sexual performance"), 22-3104 (punishing a first violation with a maximum term of imprisonment of 10 years and a second or subsequent offense with a maximum term of imprisonment of 20 years).

abuse[25] and selling and advertising are "an integral part" of the market.[26] In contrast, the revised attending a live performance statute penalizes attending or viewing a live performance or a live broadcast less severely than creating, selling or advertising a live performance or a live broadcast in the revised arranging a live performance statute (RCC § 22E-1809) or revised creating or trafficking an obscene image statute (RCC § 22E-1807). The different penalties recognize that creating, selling, or advertising a live performance directly harms children and supports the market. Having the same penalties for this wide spectrum of conduct is disproportionate and inconsistent with the penalty scheme in other District offenses.[27] This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense.

Second, the revised attending a live performance statute grades punishments based upon the sexual conduct depicted in the live performance or live broadcast. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute prohibits attending live performances of "sexual conduct,"[28] a defined term including both penetration and lewd exhibition, with no distinction in penalty between the different types of sexual conduct. In contrast, the RCC attending a live performance statute reserves first degree for actual or simulated sexual acts, sadomasochistic abuse, or masturbation, as well as sexual displays of the genitals, pubic area, or anus, when there is less than a full opaque covering. Second degree of the revised attending a live performance is limited to an "obscene," as defined in RCC § 22E-701, sexual contact or sexualized display of the breast below the top of the areola or the buttocks, when there is less than a full opaque covering. Having the same penalties for different types of sexual conduct is disproportionate and inconsistent with the penalty scheme in other District offenses.[29] This change improves the consistency, proportionality, and constitutionality of the revised statute.

Code §§ 22-3231 and 22-3232 (trafficking in stolen property offense with a maximum term of imprisonment of 10 years and receiving stolen property offense with a maximum term of imprisonment of either seven years or 180 days, depending on the value of the property); 48-904.01(a)(1), (a)(2), (d)(1), (d)(2) (penalizing the manufacture, distribution, or possession with intent to manufacture or distribute a controlled substance with a maximum term of imprisonment of 30 years, 5 years, 3 years, or 1 year, depending on the type of controlled substance, but penalizing the possession of any drug other than liquid PCP with a maximum term of imprisonment of 180 days).

[28] D.C. Code §§ 22-3102(b) (prohibiting a attending a "sexual performance by a minor."), 22-3101(5), (6) (defining "sexual performance" as "any performance or part thereof which includes sexual conduct by a person under 18 years of age," and "sexual conduct" as "(A) Actual or simulated sexual intercourse: (i) Between the penis and the vulva, anus, or mouth; (ii) Between the mouth and the vulva or anus; or (iii) Between an artificial sexual organ or other object or instrument used in the manner of an artificial sexual organ and the anus or vulva; (B) Masturbation; (C) Sexual bestiality; (D) Sadomasochistic sexual activity for the purpose of sexual stimulation; or (E) Lewd exhibition of the genitals.").

[29] The District's current sex offenses generally penalize a "sexual act," which requires penetration, more severely than "sexual contact." D.C. Code §§ 22-3001(8), (9), 22-3002 through 22-3005, 22-3008 through 22-3009.04, 22-3013 through 22-3016.

Third, the revised attending a live performance statute expands the prohibited sexual conduct to include "simulated" sadomasochistic abuse, "simulated" masturbation, and an obscene "sexual contact." The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute prohibits actual masturbation and sadomasochistic abuse,[30] but does not extend to "simulated" masturbation or sadomasochistic abuse, or to sexual touching beyond that required for masturbation or a "lewd exhibition of the genitals." However, attending or viewing a live performance or live broadcast that features "simulated" sadomasochistic abuse, "simulated" masturbation, and obscene "sexual contact" may be criminalized in the current D.C. Code obscenity statute.[31] The current D.C. Code obscenity statute is penalized as a misdemeanor for a first offense,[32] with no enhancements for the obscene materials depicting a minor.[33] In contrast, first degree of the revised attending a live performance statute includes "simulated" masturbation and "simulated" sadomasochistic abuse, and second degree includes an obscene "sexual contact." "Simulated," "obscene," and "sexual contact" are defined in RCC § 22E-701. As defined, such sexual conduct may be as graphic[34] as other conduct penalized by the current statute, such as "simulated" sexual penetration, as well as sexual contact involved in masturbation and a "lewd exhibition of the genitals."[35] Criminalization of this conduct is within the bounds of Supreme Court First Amendment case law.[36] This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute.

[30] D.C. Code § 22-3101(5) (defining "sexual conduct" as "(A) Actual or simulated sexual intercourse: (i) Between the penis and the vulva, anus, or mouth; (ii) Between the mouth and the vulva or anus; or (iii) Between an artificial sexual organ or other object or instrument used in the manner of an artificial sexual organ and the anus or vulva; (B) Masturbation; (C) Sexual bestiality; (D) Sadomasochistic sexual activity for the purpose of sexual stimulation; or (E) Lewd exhibition of the genitals.").

[31] The current obscenity statute, D.C. Code § 22-2201, generally criminalizes "participat[ing] in the preparation or presentation" of "obscene, indecent, or filthy" live performances without further specification of the relevant conduct. The current obscenity statute does not define the terms "obscene," "indecent," or "filthy," but the DCCA has stated that they must meet the standard for obscenity in Miller v. California. See Retzer v. United States, 363 A.2d 307, 309 (D.C. 1976) (stating that Miller made it clear that any vagueness defects in the statute's terminology may be cured by judicial construction).

[32] D.C. Code § 22-2201(e) ("A person convicted of violating subsection (a) or (b) of this section shall for the 1st offense be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not more than 180 days, or both. A person convicted of a 2nd or subsequent offense under subsection (a) or (b) of this section shall be fined not less than $1,000 and not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not less than 6 months or more than 3 years, or both.").

[33] Obscenity is not a "crime of violence," so there is no penalty enhancement for a minor victim under D.C. Code § 22–3611.

[34] Examples of "simulated" sadomasochistic abuse, "simulated" masturbation, and an obscene "sexual contact" that are not covered by the current sexual performance of a minor statute but would be covered under the revised arranging a live performance of a minor statute include: 1) an adult dressed in a sexual leather outfit wielding an actual whip towards a crying 9 year old, but, due to the camera angle, it is impossible to see if the whip is actually making contact; 2) A 12 year old sitting provocatively, legs spread, naked except for underwear, making rubbing gestures around his or her genitalia that suggest masturbation, but it is impossible to tell if there is actual contact with the genitalia; and 3) A prepubescent girl wearing skimpy lingerie or a sexual leather outfit that fully covers her breasts, but she is rubbing them and making suggestive facial expressions.

[35] See D.C. Code § 22-3101(5) (defining "sexual conduct.").

[36] In United States v. Williams, the Court held that a child pornography statute that defined "sexually explicit conduct" to include simulated masturbation and simulated sadistic or masochistic abuse was not overbroad. United States v. Williams, 553 U.S. 285, 288, 290, 307 (2008). The obscenity requirement for

Fourth, the revised attending a live performance statute includes a sexual display of the "pubic area or anus, when there is less than a full opaque covering" and an "obscene sexual or sexualized display of the breast below the top of the areola, or the buttocks, when there is less than a full opaque covering." The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute is limited to a "lewd exhibition of the genitals," and does not include a lewd exhibition of the pubic area, anus, breast, or buttocks. However, attending or viewing a live performance or live broadcast that features "simulated" sadomasochistic abuse, "simulated" masturbation, and obscene "sexual contact" may be criminalized in the current D.C. Code obscenity statute.[37] The current D.C. Code obscenity statute is penalized as a misdemeanor for a first offense,[38] with no enhancements for the obscene materials depicting a minor.[39] In contrast, the RCC criminalizes attending or viewing live performances or live broadcasts that feature certain depictions of the pubic area[40] and anus in first degree, and an "obscene sexual or sexualized display of the breast below the top of the areola, or the buttocks" in second degree.[41] As defined, display of the pubic area or anus is as graphic as other conduct

"obscene sexual contact" ensures that this provision is constitutional. See Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234, 250, 251 (2002) (stating that Ferber "reaffirmed that where the speech is neither obscene nor the product of sexual abuse, it does not fall outside the protection of the First Amendment.").

[37] The current obscenity statute, D.C. Code § 22-2201, generally criminalizes "participat[ing] in the preparation or presentation" of "obscene, indecent, or filthy" live performances without further specification of the relevant conduct. The current obscenity statute does not define the terms "obscene," "indecent," or "filthy," but the DCCA has stated that they must meet the standard for obscenity in Miller v. California. See Retzer v. United States, 363 A.2d 307, 309 (D.C. 1976) (stating that Miller made it clear that any vagueness defects in the statute's terminology may be cured by judicial construction).

[38] D.C. Code § 22-2201(e) ("A person convicted of violating subsection (a) or (b) of this section shall for the 1st offense be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not more than 180 days, or both. A person convicted of a 2nd or subsequent offense under subsection (a) or (b) of this section shall be fined not less than $1,000 and not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not less than 6 months or more than 3 years, or both.").

[39] Obscenity is not a "crime of violence," so there is no penalty enhancement for a minor victim under D.C. Code § 22–3611.

[40] Reference to "pubic area" is intended to include liability for a frontal nude image of a minor where the groin is visible but not the external genitalia.

[41] There is no obscenity requirement for the prohibited sexual displays of the pubic area or anus in first degree because the harm inflicted on the complainant in creating or distributing these images is sufficient under the First Amendment. Conversely, there is an obscenity requirement for the prohibited sexual display of the breast or buttocks in second degree because the conduct otherwise may not be sufficiently graphic to survive constitutional scrutiny. In New York v. Ferber, the Supreme Court established that live or visual sexual depictions of real children do not have to be "obscene" and are not entitled to First Amendment protection. Specifically, the Court held that a New York statute did not violate the First Amendment when the statute banned the production and distribution of live or visual depictions of specified sexual conduct with minors and had a mental state requirement for the defendant. New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747, 764-66 (1982). Although Ferber was specific to the creation and distribution of visual sexual depictions of minors, the Court later held in Osborne v. Ohio that a state can constitutionally proscribe "the possession and viewing of child pornography" due, in part, to the same rationales the Court accepted in Ferber. Osborne v. Ohio, 459 U.S. 103, 111 (1990). It is unclear if the Court intended "viewing" to include viewing a live performance. At the time Osborne was decided, the relevant Ohio statute prohibited possessing or viewing "any material or performance," but it is unclear whether the statute then defined "performance" to include live conduct, like it does now. Ohio Rev. Code Ann. § 2907.01(K) ("'Performance' means any motion picture, preview, trailer, play, show, skit, dance, or other exhibition penalized by the current statute, such as a "lewd exhibition of the genitals," and obscene images of the breast or buttock of a minor warrant greater punishment than other forms of obscene materials concerning adults. The RCC criminalizes obscene displays of any breast, as opposed to only the female breast, to recognize that the display of a male breast may be sexualized to the point of being obscene under a Miller standard and, if that occurs, more severe punishment than other forms of obscene materials concerning adults is warranted. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute.

Fifth, the revised attending a live performance statute expands the current exceptions to liability for conduct by persons under 18 years of age. In the current D.C. Coode sexual performance of a minor statute, minors that are depicted in prohibited images are not liable for possessing or distributing those images if the minor is the only minor depicted,[42] or, if there are multiple minors depicted, all of the minors consent.[43] A minor that is not depicted,[44] or an adult that is not more than four years older than the performed before an audience."). Regardless, it seems unlikely that the Court would strike down a state law that prohibits viewing a live sexual performance of minors after upholding Ohio's ban on possessing images of that conduct.

The Supreme Court has not established bright line rules for what sexual conduct involving children, without an obscenity requirement, satisfies the First Amendment. However, in Ferber, the Court noted that the prohibited sexual conduct at issue "represent[s] the kind of conduct that, if it were the theme of a work, could render it legally obscene: actual or simulated sexual intercourse, deviate sexual intercourse, sexual bestiality, masturbation, sado-masochistic abuse, or lewd exhibition of the genitals." In United States v. Williams, the Court held that the child pornography statute at issue was not overbroad. United States v. Williams, 553 U.S. 285, 288, 307 (2008). In Williams, the federal statute at issue defined "sexually explicit conduct" as "actual or simulated—(i) sexual intercourse, including genital-genital, oral-genital, anal-genital, or oral-anal, whether between persons of the same or opposite sex; (ii) bestiality; (iii) masturbation; (iv) sadistic or masochistic abuse; or (v) lascivious exhibition of the genitals or pubic area of any person." Id. at 290. First degree of the RCC arranging a live performance statute prohibits the same conduct as the statute in Williams with two exceptions: 1) It includes a sexualized display of the anus and for all sexualized displays in first degree, explicitly requires less than a full opaque covering; and 2) It does not extend "simulated" to a sexual or sexualized display. These are not significant differences. In sum, first degree of the RCC attending a live performance statute prohibits sexual conduct that is graphic enough without an obscenity requirement. Second degree of the revised arranging a live performance statute prohibits conduct that is generally less graphic than the conduct in Ferber and Williams. However, the obscenity requirement ensures that the provision is constitutional. See Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234, 250, 251 (2002) (stating that Ferber "reaffirmed that where the speech is neither obscene nor the product of sexual abuse, it does not fall outside the protection of the First Amendment.")

Code § 22-3102(c)(1) ("If the sexual performance consists solely of a still or motion picture, then this section: (1) Shall not apply to the minor . . . depicted in a still or motion picture who possess it or transmit it to another person unless at least one of the minors depicted in it does not consent to its possession or transmission.").

Code § 22-3102(c)(1) ("If the sexual performance consists solely of a still or motion picture, then this section: (1) Shall not apply to the . . . minors depicted in a still or motion picture who possess it or transmit it to another person unless at least one of the minors depicted in it does not consent to its possession or transmission.").

minor or minors depicted,[45] is not liable for possessing an image that he or she receives from a depicted minor, unless he or she knows that at least one of the depicted minors did not consent. The current exclusion does not consistently require a "knowingly" culpable mental state as to a depicted minor's lack of consent,[46] and minors are still liable under the current statute for creating or viewing live performances or live broadcasts with themselves or other minors[47] or engaging in sexual conduct.[48] There is no DCCA case law interpreting the current exclusion. In contrast, the revised attending a live performance statute excludes from liability all persons under the age of 18 years from attending or viewing a live performance or a live broadcast. Legal scholarship has noted the inconsistencies and possible constitutional issues in statutes that criminalize minors producing images of otherwise legal sexual encounters.[49] The minor must be the only person under the age of 18 years who is depicted in the live performance or live

(2) Shall not apply to possession of a still or motion picture by . . . an adult not more than 4 years older than the minor or minors depicted in it, who receives it from a minor depicted in it unless the recipient knows that at least one of the minors depicted in the still or motion picture did not consent to its transmission.").

[46] D.C. Code § 22-3102(c)(1) ("unless at least one of the minors depicted in it does not consent to its possession or transmission."), (c)(2) ("unless the recipient knows that at least one of the minors depicted in the still or motion picture did not consent to its transmission.").

[47] A minor that creates a live performance of himself or herself or of other minors has "produce[d], direct[ed], or promote[d]" a "performance which includes sexual conduct by a person under 18 years of age." D.C. Code §§ 22-3102(a)(2); 22-3101(4) (defining "promote," in part, as "to manufacture . . . transmute.").

[48] The current definition of "performance" extends to live conduct. D.C. Code § 22-3101(3) ("'Performance' means any play, motion picture, photograph, electronic representation, dance, or any other visual presentation or exhibition."). Thus, under a plain language reading, when a minor engages in "sexual conduct" with themselves, another minor, or an adult, they are "produc[ing], direct[ing], or promot[ing]" a "performance that includes sexual conduct by a person under 18 years of age" or "attend[ing]" a sexual performance by a minor. D.C. Code §§ 22-3102(a)(2), (b); 22-3101(4) (defining "promote," in part, as "to present [or] exhibit.").

It would also cause minors to be branded as registered sex offenders and to incur the onerous legal disabilities and restrictions that were passed with sexual predators in mind, not minors engaged in consensual sex with their peers."); Clay Calvert, Sex, Cell Phones, Privacy, and the First Amendment: When Children Become Child Pornographers and the Lolita Effect Undermines the Law, 18 COMMLAW CONSPECTUS 1, 6 (2009) ("Sexting constitutes a technologically-driven social phenomenon among minors that tests the boundaries of minors' First Amendment speech rights, as well as long-standing laws and judicial opinions that prohibit the manufacture, distribution, and possession of child pornography as a category of speech that, like obscenity, is not protected by the First Amendment.").

broadcast,[50] or the minor must reasonably believe that he or she has the effective consent of every person under 18 years who is depicted in the live performance or live broadcast.[51] The "effective consent" requirements are consistent with the consent defense in the revised sexual assault statute (RCC § 22E-1301) and other RCC offenses. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised offense.

Sixth, the revised attending a live performance statute applies the current affirmative defense for a librarian or motion picture theater employee to attending or viewing a live performance or live broadcast and expands it to include similarly positioned museum, school, and other venue employees. The current D.C. Code statute has an affirmative defense to "produc[ing], direct[ing], or promot[ing]" any sexual performance of a minor[52] for a "librarian engaged in the normal course of his or her employment"[53] and certain movie theater employees[54] if the librarian or movie theater employee does not have a financial interest in the sexual performance.[55] There is no DCCA case law interpreting this defense. In contrast, the revised attending a live performance statute applies this defense to attending or viewing a live performance or a live broadcast and expands this affirmative defense to include employees at museums, schools, and other venues who may face similar situations, provided that the conduct is within the reasonable scope of employment and the employee has no control over the creation or selection of the live performance or live broadcast.[56] Practically, the [50] If a minor is the only person under the age of 18 years that is depicted in the live performance or live broadcast, it is irrelevant under the exclusion if the live performance or live broadcast depicts an adult. However, depending on the facts and the specific conduct at issue, the minor may face liability under other RCC offenses, such as voyeurism (RCC § 22E-1803) or sexual assault (RCC § 22E-1301).

[51] If both minors and adults are depicted in the live performance or live broadcast, it is irrelevant under the exclusion if the adults give effective consent to the conduct. However, depending on the facts and the specific conduct at issue, the minor may face liability under other RCC offenses, such as voyeurism (RCC § 22E-1803) or sexual assault (RCC § 22E-1301).

[52] The affirmative defense only applies to "D.C. Code § 22-3102(2)." D.C. Code § 22-3104(b)(1). However, "D.C. Code § 22-3102(2)" is not an accurate citation for the current sexual performance using a minor statute. Given the remainder of the current sexual performance using a minor statute and the additional requirements of this affirmative defense, the correct citation should be "D.C. Code § 22-3102(a)(2)." The organic act for the current sexual performance using a minor statute confirms this interpretation, and the omission of subsection (a) appears to be a codification error.

[53] D.C. Code § 22-3104(b)(1)(A).

[54] The specific movie theater employees are a "motion picture projectionist, stage employee or spotlight operator, cashier, doorman, usher, candy stand attendant, porter, or in any other nonmanagerial or nonsupervisory capacity in a motion picture theater." D.C. Code § 22-3104(b)(1)(B).

[55] D.C. Code § 22-3104(b)(2) ("The affirmative defense provided by paragraph (1) of this subsection shall not apply if the person described therein has a financial interest (other than his or her employment, which employment does not encompass compensation based upon any proportion of the gross receipts) in: (A) The promotion of a sexual performance for sale, rental, or exhibition; (B) The direction of any sexual performance; or (C) The acquisition of the performance for sale, retail, or exhibition.").

[56] For example, the defense would not apply to the curator of an art museum who decides to feature an exhibition of prohibited sexual conduct and otherwise meets the elements of the revised offense. However, the defense would apply to an art museum employee who attends the live performance as an usher. It should be noted that for first degree of the revised offense, the curator would still be able to argue that the live performance or live broadcast had serious artistic value under the affirmative defense in subsection (d)(1) and, in second degree of the revised offense, that the images are not "obscene," as defined in RCC § 22E-701.

expanded defense provides a clearer safe-harbor for these employees but may do little or no work in reducing liability beyond that provided by the revised statute's defense in subsection (c)(1) to first degree for live performances or live broadcasts with serious artistic or other value, or, in second degree, the argument that the live performances or live broadcasts are not "obscene." This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Seventh, the revised attending a live performance statute codifies an affirmative defense for conduct that occurs in the context of marriage, domestic partnership, and other romantic relationships. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute does not have a defense for actors that engage in the prohibited conduct with minors to whom they are married or with whom they are in a domestic partnership or romantic relationship. This approach differs from several of the current sexual abuse statutes, which have a marriage or domestic partnership defense that decriminalizes sexual conduct that only involves the defendant and the minor.[57] The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute does have a "sexting" exception that includes an adult not more than four years older than a minor, but it is limited to possessing an image[58] and excludes marriages, domestic partnerships, and romantic relationships with a greater than four year age difference. There is no DCCA case law interpreting the scope of this "sexting" exception. In contrast, the revised attending a live performance statute makes it an affirmative defense that the actor is married to, or in a domestic partnership or "romantic, dating, or sexual relationship" with the complainant, with several additional requirements. The live performance or live broadcast must be limited to the actor and the complainant or just the complainant, and the actor must reasonably believe that the complainant gave effective consent to the conduct. The actor must reasonably believe that the actor is the only person that attended or viewed the live performance or live broadcast, other than the complainant. The "effective consent" requirements are consistent with the consent defense in the revised sexual assault statute (RCC § 22E-1301) and other RCC offenses. Without this defense, the revised attending a live performance statute would criminalize consensual sexual behavior between spouses and domestic partners that may not be criminal under the current or RCC age-based sexual abuse statutes. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute.

[57] D.C. Code § 22-3011(b) ("Marriage or domestic partnership between the defendant and the child or minor at the time of the offense is a defense, which the defendant must establish by a preponderance of the evidence, to a prosecution under §§ 22-3008 to 22-3010.01, prosecuted alone or in conjunction with charges under § 22-3018 or § 22-403, involving only the defendant and the child or minor."). In the current sexual abuse statutes a "child" is a person under the age of 16 years and a "minor" is a person under the age of 18 years. D.C. Code § 22-3001(3), (5A). The marriage and domestic partnership defense applies to the current child sexual abuse statutes (D.C. Code §§ 22-3008 and 22-3009), the sexual abuse of a minor statutes (D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.01 and 22-3009.02), enticing a child or minor (D.C. Code § 22-3010), and misdemeanor sexual abuse of a child or minor (D.C. Code § 22-3010.01). These current sex offenses are based on the ages of the complainant and the defendant, as opposed to whether force, coercion, etc., was present.

[58] D.C. Code § 22-3102(c)(2) ("If the sexual performance consists solely of a still or motion picture, then this section: (2) Shall not apply to possession of a still or motion picture by . . . an adult not more than 4 years older than the minor or minors depicted in it, who receives it from a minor depicted in it unless the recipient knows that at least one of the minors depicted in the still or motion picture did not consent to its transmission.").

Eighth, the revised attending a live performance statute has an affirmative defense for subsection (a) that the live performance or live broadcast has serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value, when considered as a whole. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute does not have any defense if the performance has serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value, when considered as a whole. As a result, the current statute appears to criminalize attending or viewing artistic films or newsworthy events that display real minors engaging in the prohibited sexual conduct. There is no DCCA case law on whether the current statute would be unconstitutional in these and other similar situations, but Supreme Court case law indicates that the current statute may be unconstitutional as applied to live performances or live broadcasts with serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value, when considered as a whole.[59] In contrast, the revised attending a live performance statute has an affirmative defense that the live performance or live broadcast has serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value when considered as a whole. This language is taken from the Miller standard for obscenity, which requires the absence of these characteristics to be proven as an element of an obscenity offense.[60] Despite this defense, however, there may still be liability under the RCC sex offenses for causing or attempting to cause a minor to engage in the prohibited sexual conduct.[61] This change improves the constitutionality of the revised statute.

Beyond these eight changes to current District law, five other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

[59] In Ferber, the Court acknowledged that some applications of the statute at issue, which extended to live performances would be unconstitutional:

> We consider this the paradigmatic case of a state statute whose legitimate reach dwarfs its arguably impermissible applications. . . .While the reach of the statute is directed at the hard core of child pornography, the Court of Appeals was understandably concerned that some protected expression, ranging from medical textbooks to pictorials in the National Geographic would fall prey to the statute. How often, if ever, it may be necessary to employ children to engage in conduct clearly within the reach of [the statute] in order to produce educational, medical, or artistic works cannot be known with certainty. Yet we seriously doubt, and it has not been suggested, that these arguably impermissible applications of the statute amount to more than a tiny fraction of the materials within the statute's reach.

Ferber, 458 U.S. at 773. The Court found that the statute was not substantially overbroad and any overbreadth that exists could be addressed through as-applied constitutional challenges. Id. at 773-74. The material at issue in Ferber was two films that "almost entirely" depicted prohibited sexual activity and the Court determined the statute was not overbroad as applied to the respondent. Id. at 752, 774 & n. 28.

[61] For example, a defendant that causes minors to engage in sexual intercourse for a live play may have a successful affirmative defense under the RCC arranging a live performance offense or RCC attending a live performance offense. However, depending on the ages of the minors, causing them to engage in sexual intercourse may lead to liability for sexual abuse of a minor (RCC § 22-1302), or, independent of the ages of the minors, if there was force involved, there may be liability for sexual assault (RCC § 22E-1301), as either a principal or an accomplice (RCC § 2E-210).

First, the revised attending a live performance statute requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state for the prohibited conduct—attending or viewing a live performance or live broadcast. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute requires the defendant to "know[] the character and content" of the sexual performance.[62] The statute does not specify whether this culpable mental state extends to attending or viewing a live performance or live broadcast, and the definition of "knowingly"[63] in the current statute is unclear. There is no DCCA case law on these issues. The current D.C. Code obscenity statute has a substantively identical definition of "knowingly,"[64] which the DCCA has interpreted as requiring subjective knowledge of the sexual nature of the material at issue.[65] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised attending a live performance statute requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-206, for the prohibited conduct—attending or viewing a live performance or live broadcast. Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[66] A "knowingly" culpable mental state for the prohibited conduct is consistent with numerous other RCC offenses that apply a "knowingly" culpable mental state to prohibited conduct. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised offense.

Second, the revised attending a live performance statute requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state for the fact that a visual presentation is "for" an audience, as required by the RCC definitions of "live performance" and "live broadcast." The current sexual performance of a minor statute requires the defendant to "know[] the character and

[63] The current statute defines "knowingly" as "having general knowledge of, or reason to know or a belief or ground for belief which warrants further inspection or inquiry, or both." D.C. Code § 22-3101(1). It is unclear whether this definition requires the defendant to have subjective knowledge, or requires a lower culpable mental state akin to recklessness or negligence. There is no DCCA case law on this definition. The legislative history notes that the definition was used "as opposed to the more general definition of 'knowing or having reasonable grounds to believe'" and that the definition was used to "comport with the scienter requirement in [New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747 (1982)]." Council of the District of Columbia, Report of the Committee of the Judiciary, Bill 4-305, The "District of Columbia Protection of Minors Act of 1982" at 8. Ferber, however, did not state a specific mental state, only that "some element of scienter on the part of the defendant" was required. New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747, 765 (1982) (citing Smith v. California, 361 U.S. 147 (1959) and Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. 87 (1974)). Presumably then, per Ferber, the District's statutory definition of "knowledge" was not intended to equate to negligence, and requires some degree of subjective awareness by the actor, either recklessness or knowledge.

Code § 22-2201(a)(2)(B) (defining "knowingly" as "having general knowledge of, or reason to know, or a belief or ground for belief which warrants further inspection or inquiry of, the character and content of any article, thing, device, performance, or representation described in paragraph (1) of this subsection which is reasonably susceptible of examination.").

content" of the sexual performance,[67] but neither the statute nor the current definition of "sexual performance"[68] specifies whether the visual presentation must be for an audience.[69] In addition, the definition of "knowingly"[70] in the current statute is unclear. There is no DCCA case law on these issues. The current D.C. Code obscenity statute has a substantively identical definition of "knowingly,"[71] which the DCCA has interpreted as requiring subjective knowledge of the sexual nature of the material at issue.[72] Resolving these ambiguities, the revised attending a live performance statute requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-206, for the fact that the visual presentation is a "live performance"[73] or "live broadcast" as defined in RCC § 22E-701.

[70] The current statute defines "knowingly" as "having general knowledge of, or reason to know or a belief or ground for belief which warrants further inspection or inquiry, or both." D.C. Code § 22-3101(1). It is unclear whether this definition requires the defendant to have subjective knowledge, or requires a lower culpable mental state akin to recklessness or negligence. It is sufficient if the accused had such knowledge of the material that he should have suspected its sale might violate the law and inspected or inquired further as to its character and content.").

[73] The RCC definition of "live performance" is substantively identical to the current definition of "performance" as it pertains to live conduct, differing only in the explicit requirement that the presentation be "for an audience, including an audience of one person." Compare D.C. Code § 22-3101(3) (defining "performance" as "any play . . . electronic representation, dance, or any other visual presentation or exhibition.") with RCC § 22E-701 (defining "live performance" as a "play, dance, or other visual presentation or exhibition for an audience.").

The RCC definitions of "live performance" and "live broadcast" require that the visual presentation be "for" an audience and read in conjunction with the RCC definition of "knowingly," requires that the defendant be "practically certain" that the live performance is "for" an audience or the live broadcast is "for" one or more people.[74] Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[75] A "knowingly" culpable mental state for the prohibited conduct is consistent with numerous other RCC offenses that apply a "knowingly" culpable mental state to prohibited conduct. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised offense.

Third, the revised attending a live performance statute requires recklessness as to the content of the live performance or live broadcast and, in second degree, as to whether the content is obscene. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute requires the defendant to "know[] the character and content" of the sexual performance[76] and defines "knowingly" as "having general knowledge of, or reason to know or a belief or ground for belief which warrants further inspection or inquiry, or both."[77] There is no DCCA case law interpreting the definition of "knowingly" or how it applies to the current statute.[78] However, the current obscenity statute has a substantively identical definition of "knowingly,"[79] which the DCCA has interpreted as requiring subjective knowledge of the sexual nature of the material at issue.[80] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised

Code § 22-2201(a)(2)(B) (defining "knowingly" as "having general knowledge of, or reason to know, or a belief or ground for belief which warrants further inspection or inquiry of, the character and content of any article, thing, device, performance, or representation described in paragraph (1) of this subsection which is reasonably susceptible of examination.").

[80] See Kramer v. U. S., 293 A.2d 272, 274 (D.C. 1972) ("The officer's testimony regarding the nature of poses of nudes in the pictures readily visible on the magazine and box covers would be sufficient to indicate to a customer or a salesman the nature of the merchandise offered for sale. It is sufficient if the accused had such knowledge of the material that he should have suspected its sale might violate the law and inspected or inquired further as to its character and content.") attending a live performance statute requires recklessness as to the content of the live performance or live broadcast, and, in second degree, as to whether the content is "obscene," as defined in RCC § 22-701. Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence,[81] but courts have also recognized that recklessness regarding a risk of serious harm is wrongful conduct.[82] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Fourth, the revised attending a live performance statute requires that the live performance or live broadcast depicts at least part of a real complainant under the age of 18 years and excludes purely computer-generated or other fictitious minors. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute does not specify whether the complainant that is depicted in a live performance must be a "real," i.e. not fictitious, complainant under the age of 18 years. The statute does define "minor," however, as "any person under 18 years of age,"[83] which arguably suggests that the complainant must be a "real," i.e. not fictitious, person. There is no DCCA case law on this issue. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised attending a live performance statute specifies that at least part[84] of a "real," i.e. not fictitious, complainant under the age of 18 years must be depicted. Requiring at least part of a "real" complainant under the age of 18 years ensures that the statute satisfies the First Amendment.[85] The RCC does not criminalize attending or viewing an obscene live performance or live broadcast with computer-

[81] There is a presumption that the legislature intends to require a defendant to possess a degree of knowledge sufficient to "mak[e] a person legally responsible for the consequences of his or her act or omission" regarding "each of the statutory elements that criminalize otherwise innocent conduct," even when the legislature does not specify any scienter in the statutory text. Rehaif v. United States, 139 S. Ct. 2191, 2195 (2019) (citing United States v. X-Citement Video, Inc., 513 U. S. 64, 72 (1994); Morissette v. United States, 342 U. S. 246, 256–258 (1952); Staples v. United States, 511 U. S. 600, 606 (1994); Black's Law Dictionary 1547 (10th ed. 2014)); see also Elonis v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2001, 2009 (2015) ("[O]ur cases have explained that a defendant generally must 'know the facts that make his conduct fit the definition of the offense,' even if he does not know that those facts give rise to a crime." (Internal citation omitted)).

[82] See Elonis v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2001, 2015 (2015) (J. Alito, concurring) ("In a wide variety of contexts, we have described reckless conduct as morally culpable.").

[83] D.C. Code § 22-3101(2).

[84] The revised attending a live performance statute includes performances that show at least part of a real minor, such as a real minor's head that seems to be attached to an adult body, or an adult's head that seems to be attached to a real minor's body. There is no requirement that the government prove the identity of a real minor.

[85] In New York v. Ferber, the Supreme Court established that live or visual sexual depictions of real children do not have to meet the Miller standard for obscenity. New York v. Ferber, 458 U.S. 747, 764-65 (1982). Crucial to the Court's decision was its acceptance of several arguments and legislative findings, including that "the use of children as subjects of pornographic materials is harmful to the psychological, emotional, and mental health of the child," id. at 758, and that "the materials are a permanent record of the children's participation and the harm to the child is exacerbated by their circulation," id. at 759. The opinion was not specific to images of minors where only part of the minor is real, but the Court stated in a later opinion that "morphed images may fall within the definition of virtual child pornography, [but] they implicate the interests of real children and are in that sense closer to the images in Ferber." Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234, 242, (2002). The respondents in Ashcroft did not challenge the morphed images provision of the statute at issue and the Court did not discuss it further.

generated minors or other "fake" minors, such as youthful looking adults. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Fifth, through the use of the defined term "simulated" in RCC § 22E-701, the revised statute excludes liability for live performances of sexual conduct that is apparently fake. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute prohibits "simulated" sexual intercourse, but does not define the term.[86] It is unclear whether "simulated" includes suggestive but obviously staged sex scenes like one might find in a commercially screened "R" or "NC-17" movie, or theatrical or comic portrayals of a sexual act that are clearly fake. There is no DCCA case law on this issue. Resolving this ambiguity, the RCC defines "simulated" as "feigned or pretended in a way that realistically duplicates the appearance of actual conduct to the perception of an average person." Under this definition, only highly explicit depictions where it is unclear due to lighting, etc., if the prohibited conduct is actually occurring are included in the revised statute,[87] not other portrayals that are clearly staged. This definition is similar to another jurisdiction's definition[88] and is supported by Supreme Court case law.[89] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and constitutionality of the revised statute.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change District law.

First, the revised attending a live performance statute clarifies that viewing a "live performance" is a discrete form of liability.[90] The current D.C. Code sexual performance

[86] D.C. Code § 22-3101(5)(A).

[87] For example, a simulated sexual act may clearly show male genitalia, female genitalia, and movement between two actors but, due to the angle of the camera, not show whether there was penetration.

[88] Utah Code Ann. § 76-5b-103(11) ("'Simulated sexually explicit conduct' means a feigned or pretended act of sexually explicit conduct which duplicates, within the perception of an average person, the appearance of an actual act of sexually explicit conduct.").

[89] In United States v. Williams, the Supreme Court stated that a federal statute that prohibited pandering or soliciting "an obscene visual depiction of a minor engaging in sexually explicit conduct" or "a visual depiction of an actual minor engaging in sexually explicit conduct," "precisely tracks the material held constitutionally proscribable in Ferber and Miller: obscene material depicting (actual or virtual) children engaged in sexually explicit conduct, and any other material depicting actual children engaged in sexually explicit conduct." United States v. Williams, 553 U.S. 285, 294 (2008). In dicta, the Court discussed the scope of "simulated sexual intercourse" in the statute's definition of "sexually explicit conduct":

> 'Sexually explicit conduct' connotes actual depiction of the sex act rather than merely the suggestion that it is occurring. And 'simulated' sexual intercourse is not sexual intercourse that is merely suggested, but rather sexual intercourse that is explicitly portrayed, even though (through camera tricks or otherwise) it may not actually have occurred. The portrayal must cause a reasonable viewer to believe that the actors actually engaged in that conduct on camera. Critically . . . [the statute's] requirement of a 'visual depiction of an actual minor' makes clear that, although the sexual intercourse may be simulated, it must involve actual children (unless it is obscene). This . . . eliminates any possibility that virtual child pornography or sex between youthful-looking adult actors might be covered by the term "simulated sexual intercourse.

Williams, 553 U.S. at 296–97.

[90] For example, an actor that views from across the street a live sexual performance that is taking place in a park could be said to have "viewed" the performance without also attending it. Similarly, an actor several blocks away that views a live sexual performance in a park through a telescope has also "viewed" the performance without attending it.

of a minor statute prohibits "attend[ing]" or "possess[ing]" a sexual "performance."[91] There is no DCCA case law or legislative history interpreting the scope of "attending." However, limiting "attending" to being physically in the immediate vicinity of a live performance would lead to counterintuitive results and disproportionate penalties for similar conduct.[92] This change clarifies current law without changing it.

Second, the revised attending a live performance statute clarifies that attending or viewing a "live broadcast" is a discrete form of liability. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute prohibits "attend[ing]" or "possess[ing]" a sexual "performance."[93] The current definition of "performance" includes any "visual representation or exhibition,"[94] which would appear to include live broadcasts. This change clarifies current law without changing it.

Third, organizationally, the RCC has separate statutes for still images of minors and live performances of minors and no longer uses the general terms "performance" and "sexual performance." Due to the current D.C. Code definitions of "performance" and "sexual performance," the current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute includes both still images and live performances.[95] However, it is counterintuitive to construe a "performance" as including a still image (e.g., photograph). To clarify that both images and live performances fall within the revised statutes, the RCC creating or trafficking an obscene image of a minor and RCC possession of an obscene image of a minor statutes (RCC §§ 22E-1807 and 22E-1808) are specific to still images and the RCC arranging a live performance of a minor and viewing a live performance of a minor statutes (RCC §§ 22E-1809 and 22E-1810) are specific to live sexual conduct. The two sets of statutes, however, have equivalent penalties—creating or trafficking an obscene image and arranging a live exhibition have the same penalty, and possessing an image and viewing an exhibition or broadcast have the same penalty. This change improves the clarity of the revised statutes without changing current District law.

[91] D.C. Code § 22-3102(b).

[92] For the purposes of the possession offense, the current sexual performance of a minor statute defines "still or motion picture" to "include[] a photograph, motion picture, electronic or digital representation, video, or other visual depiction, however produced or reproduced." D.C. Code § 22-3102(d)(2). In addition, for possession of an "electronically received or available" still image or motion picture, the current statute requires that the defendant "access" the still image or motion picture. D.C. Code § 22-3102(b), (d)(3). Thus, a defendant that views a live sexual performance that is being streamed over the Internet would be liable for possessing the resulting images or the motion picture. However, if the defendant were watching the live sexual performance through means other than electronic transmission, such as from across the street or several blocks away through a telescope, it is arguable that the defendant has not "attended" that performance and there would be no liability under the current statute.

[93] D.C. Code § 22-3102(b).

[94] D.C. Code § 22-3101(3). In addition to the general definition of "performance," the current sexual performance of a minor statute, for the possession and attendance prongs, defines a "still or motion picture" to "include[] a photograph, motion picture, electronic or digital representation, video, or other visual depiction, however produced or reproduced." D.C. Code § 22-3102(d)(2).

[95] D.C. Code § 22-3101(3), (6) (defining "performance" as "any play, motion picture, photograph, electronic representation, dance, or any other visual presentation of exhibition" and "sexual performance" as "any performance or part thereof which includes sexual conduct by a person under 18 years of age.").

Fourth, the revised attending a live performance statute no longer uses the defined term "minor."[96] Instead, consistent with the current D.C. Code statute's definition, the revised statute refers to a "complainant under the age of 18 years." Other statutes in the D.C. Code refer to a person under 18 years of age as a "child,"[97] and the use of different labels for persons of the same age is confusing. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute without changing current District law.

Fifth, the revised attending a live performance statute requires that the complainant "engage in or submit to" the prohibited sexual conduct. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute prohibits inducing a minor to "engage in" a sexual performance,[98] but otherwise refers generally to the complainant's actions.[99] The revised attending a live performance statute consistently refers to the complainant "engag[ing] in or submit[ing] to" the prohibited sexual conduct, which is consistent with the language in the RCC sex offenses and recognizes that the revised statute may apply in situations where the complainant is an active participant or a completely passive (e.g., unconscious) participant. This clarifies the scope of the revised statute without changing current District law.

Sixth, the revised attending a live performance statute uses the definition of "sexual act" in RCC § 22E-701. The RCC definition is substantively identical to the various forms of sexual penetration the current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute prohibits and includes bestiality.[100] This change clarifies the revised statute.

Seventh, instead of prohibiting a "lewd" exhibition,[101] the revised attending a live performance statute prohibits a "sexual or sexualized display" of certain body parts when there is less than a full opaque covering. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute does not define "lewd," but the DCCA approved a jury instruction for the [96] D.C. Code § 22-3101(2) (defining "minor" as "any person under 18 years of age."). Despite this definition, the current sexual performance using a minor statute inconsistently uses the term "minor" and instead refers to a "person under 18 years of age." D.C. Code § 22-3102.

[97] See, e.g., D.C. Code § 22-1101 (a) ("A person commits the crime of cruelty to children in the first degree if that person …willfully maltreats a child under 18 years of age….").

[98] D.C. Code § 22-3102(a)(1).

[99] D.C. Code § 22-3102(a)(1) ("participation by a minor in a sexual performance."), (a)(2) ("any performance which includes sexual conduct by a person under 18 years."), (b) ("a sexual performance by a minor."). In addition to the variable statutory language, the definition of "sexual performance" merely requires that the performance "includes sexual conduct" by a minor. D.C. Code § 22-3101(6). The current definition of "sexual conduct" lists specific types of behavior, but does not define the precise requirements for the complainant.

[100] The current sexual performance using a minor statute prohibits "actual or simulated sexual intercourse: (i) Between the penis and the vulva, anus, or mouth; (ii) Between the mouth and the vulva or anus; or (iii) Between an artificial sex organ or other object or instrument used in the manner of an artificial sex organ and the anus or vulva" as well as "bestiality." D.C. Code § 22-3101(5) (defining "sexual conduct."). Subsection (A) of the RCC definition of "sexual act" encompasses penile penetration of the vulva or anus in subsection (i) of the current statutory language. Subsection (B) of the RCC definition of "sexual act" encompasses penile penetration of the mouth in subsection (ii) of the current statutory language as well as contact between the mouth and the vulva or anus in subsection (i). Subsection (C) of the RCC definition of "sexual act" encompasses the object sexual penetration described in subsection (iii) of the current statutory language. Finally, subsection (D) of the RCC definition of "sexual act" encompasses specific forms of bestiality.

[101] D.C. Code § 22-3101(5)(E) (definition of "sexual conduct" including a "lewd exhibition of the genitals.").

offense that stated "lewd exhibition of the genitals means that the minor's genital or pubic area must be visibly displayed," that "mere nudity is not enough," and "the exhibition must have an unnatural or unusual focus on the minor's genitalia regardless of the minor's intention to engage in sexual activity or whether the viewer is sexually aroused."[102] The revised attending a live performance statute's reference to "sexual or sexualized display" is intended to restate the meaning of "lewd exhibition" in more modern, plain language while preserving this DCCA case law. Mere nudity is not sufficient for a "sexual or sexualized display" in subparagraphs (a)(2)(D) or (b)(2)(D). There must be a visible display of the relevant body parts with an unnatural or unusual focus on them, regardless of the minor's intention to engage in sexual activity or the effect on the viewer. This change clarifies current law.

Eighth, the definition of "movie theater" in RCC § 22E-701[103] applies to the affirmative defense in paragraph (d)(4) of the revised attending a live performance statute. The current D.C. Code sexual performance of a minor statute has a similar affirmative defense[104] that applies to specified employees of a "motion picture theater," but does not define the term. There is no DCCA case law interpreting the term "motion picture theater" in this affirmative defense. The RCC definition of "motion picture theater" limits the affirmative defense to certain employees of a theater or other venue that is being utilized primarily for the exhibition of a motion picture to the public, which is consistent with the scope of the affirmative defense. This change improves the clarity of the revised statute.

In addition, the DCCA noted that "some courts look to multiple factors to determine whether a photograph contains a lewd depiction of genitalia, [but] one of the factors routinely considered is whether the picture focuses on the genitalia in an unnatural way." Id. In particular, the DCCA cited a Tenth Circuit case, Wolf, listing factors such as "whether the focal point of the visual depiction is on the child's genitalia or pubic area;" "whether the child is fully or partially clothed, or nude;" and "whether the visual depiction is intended or designed to elicit a sexual response in the viewer." Id. (quoting *United States v. The DCCA noted that the Wolf court held that an image "does not need to be meet every factor in order to be lewd," id., but also noted that the record in Green "contains evidence to support the presence of other enumerated factors, such as the children being naked and the pictures being taken to elicit a sexual response from appellant." Green, 948 A.2d 562 n.10.

[103] RCC § 22E-701 defines "movie theater" as "a theater, auditorium, or other venue that is being utilized primarily for the exhibition of a motion picture to the public."

Code § 22-3104 (b)(1) ("Except as provided in paragraph (2) of this subsection, in any prosecution for an offense pursuant to § 22-3102(2) it shall be an affirmative defense that the person so charged was: (A) A librarian engaged in the normal course of his or her employment; or (B) A motion picture projectionist, stage employee or spotlight operator, cashier, doorman, usher, candy stand attendant, porter, or in any other nonmanagerial or nonsupervisory capacity in a motion picture theater.").

RCC § 22E-2001. Aggregation to Determine Property Offense Grades.

Explanatory Note. For specified property offenses in the RCC, this section permits the government to aggregate the values, amounts of damage, or quantities of property involved in a single scheme or systematic course of conduct in order to bring one charge of a more serious grade, instead of multiple charges of a less serious grade. Aggregation is permitted regardless of whether the property was taken, transferred, etc. from one person or several, provided that the taking, transferring, etc. was pursuant to one scheme or systematic course of conduct. The words "scheme or systematic course of conduct" have the same meaning as under current law, and includes separate acts that are nonetheless part of a common plan or pattern of behavior.[1] The revised aggregation to determine property offense grades statute ("aggregation statute") replaces the "Aggregation of amounts received to determine grade of offense" statute[2] in the current D.C. Code.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised aggregation statute clearly changes current District law in one main way.

The revised aggregation statute expands the number of offenses for which values and quantities of property may be aggregated to fourteen. Under the current D.C. Code aggregation statute, only six statutes are subject to aggregation.[3] The nine RCC offenses[4] added to the revised aggregation statute comprise all the property offenses in the RCC which have more than one gradation based on the quantity, value, or damage done to property. Some of the added offenses seem particularly likely to involve a scheme or systematic course of conduct involving multiple properties.[5] The expansion of offenses subject to the aggregation statute improves the administrative efficiency and proportionality of these offenses.

Beyond this change to current District law, one other aspect of the revised statute may constitute a substantive change to current District law.

The revised aggregation statute refers generally to "the values, amounts of damage, or quantities of the property involved in" the scheme or systematic course of conduct. The Code § 22-3202 ("Amounts or property received pursuant to a single scheme or systematic course of conduct in violation of § 22-3211 (Theft), § 22-3221 (Fraud), § 22-3223 (Credit Card Fraud), § 22-3227.02 (Identity Theft), § 22-3231 (Trafficking in Stolen Property), or § 22-3232 (Receiving Stolen Property) may be aggregated in determining the grade of the offense and the sentence for the offense.").

[4] The nine offenses are: § 22E-2105 Unlawful Creation or Possession of a Recording; § 22E-2203 Check Fraud; § 22E-2204 Forgery; § 22E-2206 Unlawful Labeling of a Recording; § 22E-2208 Financial Exploitation of a Vulnerable Adult; § 22E-2301 Extortion; § 22E-2401 Possession of Stolen Property; § 22E-2403 Alteration of Motor Vehicle Identification Number; and § 22E-2503 Criminal Damage to Property.

[5] E.g., § 22E-2403 Alteration of Motor Vehicle Identification Number, which specifically applies not only to motor vehicles but to motor vehicle parts, in part targets fences of stolen property similar to the trafficking in stolen property offense.

current D.C. Code aggregation statute refers to "amounts or property received" pursuant to a single scheme or systematic course of conduct. There is no case law interpreting this phrase in the current D.C. Code statute. The revised aggregation statute's reference to "the values, amounts of damage, or quantities of the property involved in" the scheme or systematic course of conduct is intended to cover all the ways in which property may be the subject of one of the listed offenses, not just "receives."[6] In many RCC property offenses, it is the values of the relevant property that may be aggregated.[7] For some offenses, however, it is the quantity of property, not the value, which may be aggregated.[8] In still other offenses, it is the amount of damage that may be aggregated.[9] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

The revised aggregation statute states that "[W]hen a single scheme or systematic course of conduct could give rise to multiple charges of" an offense listed in subsection (b), aggregation may determine "the grade of the offense." The current D.C. Code aggregation statute refers to aggregation for "determining the grade of the offense and the sentence for the offense" (emphasis added).[10] The revised statute clarifies that only property involved in a scheme or systematic course of conduct for one offense may be aggregated. This revision clarifies the aggregation statute and improves the proportionality of the referenced offenses.

[6] There is no indication in the legislative history or otherwise that the use of the word "receives" was intended to omit property that was stolen or part of a fraudulent scheme that a person exercised control over, transferred, paid for, etc., but never "received."

[7] For example, if an actor watching an unattended table walks by and commits theft under RCC § 22E-2101 by taking a coat and a laptop left at the table, those items may be aggregated as being stolen pursuant to the same act or course of conduct. The value of those items would be added together to determine the appropriate grade of theft.

[8] For example, a person who, in violation of unlawful creation or possession of a recording (UCPR) per RCC § 22E-2105, one afternoon unlawfully makes 60 copies of one sound recording and 60 copies of different sound recording as part of the same act or course of conduct, may be charged with felony UCPR instead of two misdemeanor charges of UCPR pursuant to the revised aggregation statute. The number of recordings would be added together to determine the appropriate grade of UCPR.

[9] For example, if a person throws a rock through a display case, breaking multiple glass objects in violation of criminal damage to property (CDP) per RCC § 22E-2503, those items may be aggregated as being damaged pursuant to the same act or course of conduct. The amount of damage to each item would be added together to determine the appropriate grade of CDP. (See Commentary to RCC § 22E-2503).

[10] D.C. Code § 22-3202 ("Amounts or property received pursuant to a single scheme or systematic course of conduct in violation of § 22-3211 (Theft)… or § 22-3232 (Receiving Stolen Property) may be aggregated in determining the grade of the offense and the sentence for the offense."(emphasis added)). There is non DDCA case law interpreting this language.

RCC § 22E-2101. Theft.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the revised theft offense and penalty gradations for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The offense proscribes a broad range of conduct in which there is an intent to deprive another of property without an owner's consent. The penalty gradations are primarily based on the value of the property involved in the crime. The revised theft offense replaces the theft statute,[1] the theft penalty statute,[2] and the breaking and entering a vending machine and similar devices statute[3] in the current D.C. Code.

Paragraph (a)(1) specifies the prohibited conduct for first degree theft—takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over the property of another. "Property" is a defined term in in RCC § 22E-701 that means an item of value and includes goods, services, and cash. "Property of another" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 which means that some other person has a legal interest in the property at issue that the defendant cannot infringe upon, regardless of whether the defendant also has an interest in that property. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies a culpable mental state of "knowingly." Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" mental state in paragraph (a)(1) applies to all of the elements in paragraph (a)(1)—takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over the property of another. "Knowingly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here requires the defendant to be aware to a practical certainty that his or her conduct takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over property that is "property of another."

Paragraph (a)(2) states that the proscribed conduct must be done "without the consent of an owner." "Consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "a word or action that indicates, explicitly or implicitly, agreement to particular conduct or a particular result" and given by a person that is generally competent to do so. Any indication of agreement that satisfies the definition of "consent," even if obtained by deception, coercive threat, or physical force, negates the element "without the consent of an owner" and the accused is not guilty of theft. However, there may be liability under the RCC fraud offense (RCC § 22E-2101) or the RCC extortion offense (RCC § 22E-2301) if the taking was committed by deception, a coercive threat, or physical force. "Owner" is defined to mean a person holding an interest in property with which the actor is not privileged to interfere. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" mental state in paragraph (a)(1) also applies to paragraph (a)(2), here requiring the accused to be aware to a practical certainty that he or she lacks the consent of an owner.

Paragraph (a)(3) requires that the defendant had an "intent to deprive" an owner of property. "Deprive" is a defined term meaning that the other person is unlikely to recover the property, or that it will be withheld permanently or long enough to lose a substantial portion of its value or benefit. "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the defendant was practically certain that he or she would "deprive" the other person of the property. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective

Code § 22-601 (Whoever in the District of Columbia breaks open, opens, or enters, without right, any parking meter, coin telephone, vending machine dispensing goods or services, money changer, or any other device designed to receive currency, with intent to carry away any part of such device or anything contained therein, shall be sentenced to a term of imprisonment of not more than 3 years or to a fine of not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, or both.).

element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that such a deprivation actually occurred, only that the defendant believed to a practical certainty that a deprivation would result.

The requirements for liability in paragraphs (b)(1) - (b)(3) (second degree theft), paragraphs (c)(1) - (c)(3) (third degree theft), paragraphs (d)(1) - (d)(3) (fourth degree theft), and paragraphs (e)(1) - (e)(3) (fifth degree theft) are the same as those in paragraphs (a)(1) - (a)(3) for first degree theft. The theft gradations differ only in the requirements as to the amount and type of property at issue.

The various gradation requirements for theft are in paragraph (a)(4) (first degree theft), in paragraph (b)(4) (second degree theft), under paragraph (c)(4) (third degree theft), under paragraph (d)(4) (fourth degree theft), and in paragraph (e)(4) (fifth degree theft). Paragraphs (a)(4), (b)(4), (c)(4), (d)(4), and (e)(4) specify "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element. Per RCC § 22E-207, "in fact" applies to any result element or circumstance element that follows the phrase "in fact" unless a culpable mental state is specified. Each gradation of theft refers to "value," a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that generally means the fair market value of property, although, as will be discussed, some gradations of the RCC theft offense have additional bases for liability.

Paragraph (a)(4) specifies that first degree theft requires that "in fact" the property has a value of $500,000 or more. The defendant is strictly liable as to the value of the property.

Paragraph (b)(4) specifies that second degree theft requires that "in fact" the property has a value of $50,000 or more. The defendant is strictly liable as to the value of the property.

For third degree theft, paragraph (c)(4) and subparagraph (c)(4)(A) require "in fact" that the property has a value of $5,000 or more. The defendant is strictly liable as to the value of the property. Paragraph (c)(4) and subparagraph (c)(4)(B) specify an alternative basis for liability for third degree theft—that the property "in fact" is a motor vehicle. "Motor vehicle" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 as a vehicle designed to be propelled only by an internal-combustion engine or electricity. The defendant is strictly liable as to whether the property is a motor vehicle.

For fourth degree theft, paragraph (d)(4) and subparagraph (d)(4)(A) require that "in fact" the property has a value of $500 or more. The defendant is strictly liable as to the value of the property. Paragraph (d)(4) and subparagraph (d)(4)(B) specify an alternative basis for liability for fourth degree theft—that the property "in fact" is taken from a complaint who "possesses" the property within the complainant's immediate physical control. "Possesses" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 as to "[h]old or carry on one's person or [h]ave the ability and desire to exercise control over." The defendant is strictly liable as to whether the complainant holds or carries the property on his or her person[4] or the complainant has the ability and desire to exercise control over property within his or her immediate physical control.

[4] When to "hold or carry on one's person" in the RCC definition of "possesses" is inserted into subparagraph (d)(4)(B), the gradation requires that the property is taken from a complainant who "holds or carries on one's person the property within the complainant's immediate physical control." However, when a complainant holds or carries the property on the complainant's person, it will also be within the complainant's immediate physical control. Thus, the requirement in subparagraph (d)(4)(B) that the property be within the complainant's immediate physical control only applies to constructive possession—defined in the RCC as when the complainant has the ability and desire to exercise control over the property.

Paragraph (e)(4) specifies that fifth degree theft requires that "in fact" the property has any value. The defendant is strictly liable as to the property having any value.

Subsection (f) codifies an exception to liability for fare evasion. Conduct that violates D.C. Code § 35-252 is not a violation of theft. Subsection (f) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element. Here, there is no culpable mental state required for the fact that the conduct constitutes a violation of D.C. Code § 35-252.

Subsection (g) specifies relevant penalties for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (h) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised theft statute clearly changes current District law in five main ways.

First, the revised theft offense no longer includes conduct that constitutes "obtaining property by trick," "false pretense," "deception," "false token," or "larceny by trick."[5] Under District current law, such conduct is criminalized both as theft[6] and fraud.[7] Currently, a defendant may be convicted of both theft and fraud based on the same act or course of conduct, even though he or she must be concurrently sentenced for these convictions.[8] In contrast, in the RCC, conduct that constitutes "obtaining property by trick," "false pretense," "deception," or "larceny by trick" is criminalized only in RCC § 22E-2201, the revised fraud offense. Conduct previously known as "larceny by trust," "embezzlement," or obtaining property by "tampering" remains part of theft, except insofar as such conduct involves obtaining consent by deception and is therefore part of the revised fraud statute (RCC § 22E-2201). This revision reduces unnecessary overlap among offenses and improves the proportionality of the revised theft and fraud statutes.

Second, the revised theft offense eliminates as a separate means of proving liability for theft that the defendant have an intent to "appropriate"[9] property. The current D.C. Code defines "appropriate" as "to take or make use of without authority or right."[10] As applied to the current D.C. Code theft statute, the definition of "appropriate" means that any unauthorized taking or use of property, no matter how brief, can suffice for a theft conviction and is punishable the same as the more serious intent to interfere with property that is required by "with intent to deprive."[11] In contrast, in the RCC, conduct that is punishable under "with intent to appropriate" in the current theft statute instead will be punished under the revised unauthorized use of property offense in section RCC § 22E-2102. This revision improves the proportionality of the revised theft offense and reduces the overlap that currently exists between theft and theft-related offenses such as unauthorized use of a motor vehicle,[12] receiving stolen property,[13] and taking property without right,[14] which either require a lesser intent or no intent with regards to the defendant's level of interference with property.

Third, the revised theft statute increases the number and type of grade distinctions, grading primarily based on the value of the property. The current D.C. Code theft offense is limited to two gradations based solely on value.[15] In contrast, the revised theft offense has a total of five gradations which span a much greater range in value, with a value of $500,000 or more being the most serious grade, and include a gradation for theft of a motor vehicle. Third degree theft includes theft of any motor vehicle, allowing for theft of low-value motor vehicles to be treated as higher value property, with correspondingly greater penalties than they would otherwise receive if treated as fourth or fifth degree theft. This special treatment of low-value motor vehicles recognizes that such vehicles are often targeted for theft. The increase in gradations, differentiated by offense seriousness, improves the proportionality of the offense. The gradations in the revised offense also create consistency with the dollar-value distinctions in related theft and fraud offenses.

Fourth, the revised theft statute criminalizes as property crimes the non-violent taking of a motor vehicle (third degree) and most[16] non-violent takings of any property[17] from the actual possession of another person or from within his or her immediate physical control (fourth degree). The current D.C. Code robbery[18] and carjacking[19] statutes criminalize takings of property from the immediate actual possession of another person[20] "by force or violence, whether against resistance or by sudden or stealthy seizure or snatching, or by putting in fear." The DCCA has interpreted the current D.C. Code robbery statute to include taking property that was not on the complainant's person[21] and taking property without the complainant's knowledge,[22] when the only "force or violence"

[15] First degree theft involves property with a value of $1,000 or more and is punished as a serious felony; second degree theft involves property valued at less than $1,000 and is a misdemeanor. D.C. Code § 22-3212.
[16] The RCC robbery statute prohibits removing property from the "hand or arms of the complainant." This conduct overlaps with the theft from a person gradation in subparagraph (d)(4)(B) of the revised theft statute. If a defendant were charged with both robbery and theft for this conduct based on the same course of conduct, the convictions would merge under the RCC merger provision (RCC § 22E-214).
[17] "Property" in subparagraph (d)(4)(B) of fourth degree theft would include a motor vehicle. However, the theft of any motor vehicle, including from the complainant's actual possession or immediate physical control, is a basis of liability for third degree theft under subparagraph (c)(4)(B).
[18] D.C. Code § 22-2801.
[19] D.C. Code § 22-2803.
[20] The DCCA has defined "immediate actual possession" under the robbery statute as "the area within which the victim can reasonably be expected to exercise some physical control over the property." Sutton v. United States, 988 A.2d 478, 485 (D.C. 2010). See also, Beaner v. United States, 845 A.2d 525, 532-33 (D.C. 2004) (holding that the term "immediate actual possession," as used in the carjacking statute was borrowed from the robbery statute, includes a car that was several feet from the owner when it was taken).

[22] Spencer v. United States, 73 App. D.C. 98 (D.C. Cir. 1940) (affirming robbery conviction when defendant took cash from person's pants, which were resting on a chair at the foot of a bed that defendant was using at the time); Ulmer v. United States, 649 A.2d 295, 298 (D.C. 1994).

involved was the force of moving the object taken.[23] It appears that the current D.C. Code carjacking statute has a similar scope.[24] While the DCCA has suggested that there is a limit to sudden or stealthy seizures or snatchings under the current robbery statute due to the statutory "by force or violence" requirement, the precise contours of this limit have not been articulated.[25] In contrast, the RCC criminalizes as a property crime non-violent takings of a motor vehicle (third degree) and most[26] non-violent takings of any property[27] from the actual possession of another person or from within his or her immediate physical control (fourth degree), instead of as robbery or carjacking offenses against persons. Such non-violent takings merit less severe punishment as theft as opposed to robbery.

This revision leads to several additional changes to current District law. First, under the revised theft statute, non-violent takings of motor vehicles and non-violent [23] District case law states that any taking from the immediate actual possession of another person satisfies the "by force or violence" requirement in the current robbery statute. See, e.g., Turner v. United States, 16 F.2d 535, 536 (D.C. Cir. 1926) ("[T]he requirement for force is satisfied within the sense of the statute by an actual physical taking of the property from the person of another, even though without his knowledge and consent, and though the property be unattached to his person.").

[24] Unlike the clear case law on robbery, whether current District law on carjacking extends liability to takings that occur without a threat or use of force is not firmly established in District case law. However, the statutory language regarding "sudden or stealthy seizure, or snatching" that requires no use of force or criminal menace is identical in the current robbery and carjacking statutes. And, in at least one case, the DCCA, ruling on other issues, appears to have upheld a carjacking conviction on facts that involved a sudden and stealthy seizure with no apparent threat, use of physical force, or bodily injury. See Young v. United States, 111 A.3d 13, 14 (D.C. 2015) (affirming multiple convictions for carjacking, first degree theft, and unauthorized use of a motor vehicle based on the defendant's taking a car with keys in it while the owner was standing nearby).

[25] In a 2017 case, in response to an argument in the dissent, the DCCA rejected the proposition that any taking from the immediate actual possession of another person is robbery instead of theft because "[s]uch a principle would completely nullify the 'by force or violence' element of robbery." Gray v. United States, 155 A.3d 377, 386 (D.C. 2017); see also id. at 386 n.18 (recognizing that "there are passages in opinions . . . that, divorced from context, could be read as supporting the broad proposition advanced by the dissent" that any theft from a person or from his or her immediate possession constitutes a robbery, but stating that "[w]e are unaware of any opinion binding on us that actually holds that this is the case."). However, this discussion about the limits of sudden or stealthy seizure or snatching under the current robbery statute is dicta. The jury was not instructed on sudden or stealthy seizure or snatching, id. at 382 & n. 13, and this provision of the current robbery statute was not addressed in the court's holding. The issue in Gray was whether the trial court erred in refusing to instruct the jury on the lesser included offense of second degree theft. Id. at 382. The court stated that "[o]ur earlier opinions glossed 'by force or violence' as 'using force or violence' or 'accomplished by force of by putting the victim in fear' . . . suggesting that we understood the statute to require proof of some sort of purposeful employment or at least knowing exploitation of force or violence." Id. at 384 (internal citations omitted). The DCCA held that the trial court did err because, under the "unusual" facts of the case, "the jury rationally could have doubted that [appellant] assaulted the women intending to effectuate the theft or that, in taking [complainant's] money, [appellant] was conscious of any fear (and lowered resistance) [complainant] might have experienced from the assaults." Id. at 383.

[26] The RCC robbery statute prohibits removing property from the "hand or arms of the complainant." This conduct overlaps with the theft from a person gradation in subparagraph (d)(4)(B) of the revised theft statute. If a defendant were charged with both robbery and theft for this conduct based on the same course of conduct, the convictions would merge under the RCC merger provision (RCC § 22E-214).

[27] "Property" in subparagraph (d)(4)(B) of fourth degree theft would include a motor vehicle. However, the theft of any motor vehicle, including from the complainant's actual possession or immediate physical control, is a basis of liability for third degree theft under subparagraph (c)(4)(B).

takings of any property[28] from the actual possession of another person or from within his or her immediate physical control are no longer subject to the "while armed" penalty enhancement in D.C. Code § 22-4502[29] or to penalty enhancements for the status of the complainant[30] as they are under current law. These enhanced penalties are unnecessary for non-violent conduct that constitutes theft, although there may be liability for possession of a dangerous weapon in such circumstances under other provisions in the RCC.[31] Second, the revised theft statute punishes attempted non-violent takings of property from the actual possession of another person or from within his or her immediate physical control consistent with other criminal attempts. The D.C. Code currently codifies a penalty for attempted robbery[32] that differs from the general penalty for attempted crimes, but there is no clear rationale for such special attempt penalties in robbery as compared to other offenses. Under the revised theft statute, the RCC attempt

[28] "Property" in subparagraph (d)(4)(B) of fourth degree theft would include a motor vehicle. However, the theft of any motor vehicle, including from the complainant's actual possession or immediate physical control, is a basis of liability for third degree theft under subparagraph (c)(4)(B).

[29] The current robbery statute is subject to enhanced penalties for committing robbery "while armed" with or "having readily available" a dangerous weapon. D.C. Code § 22-4502. In most non-violent takings of property from the actual possession of another person or from within his or her immediate physical control, the defendant will not be "armed" with a dangerous weapon and will only have it "readily available." Regardless, under current law, the entire enhancement in D.C. Code § 22-4502 applies to the current robbery statute. The current D.C. Code has a separate armed carjacking offense for committing carjacking "while armed with or having readily available any pistol or other firearm (or imitation thereof) or other dangerous or deadly weapon (including a sawed-off shotgun, shotgun, machine gun, rifle, dirk, bowie knife, butcher knife, switch-blade knife, razor, blackjack, billy, or metallic or other false knuckles)." D.C. Code § 22-2803(b)(1). Despite this offense, both carjacking and armed carjacking are subject to the additional penalty in D.C. Code § 22-4502 for committing the offenses "while armed" or "having readily available" a dangerous weapon.

However, DCCA case law in the context of the District's current assault with a dangerous weapon offense (ADW) suggests that the while armed enhancement in D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(1) may not be applied to the current armed carjacking offense because it overlaps with an element of the offense. The DCCA has held that ADW may not be enhanced with the current "while armed" enhancement in D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(1) because each provision requires the use of a "dangerous weapon." McCall v. United States, 449 A.2d 1095, 1096 (D.C. 1982) ("The government concedes that [current D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(1)] may not apply to ADW since [ADW] provides for enhancement and is a more specific and lenient provision."); see also Gathy v. United States, 754 A.2d 912, 916 n.5 (D.C. 2000) ("In McCall we held that section [current D.C. Code § 22-4502(a)(1)] could not be applied to a charge of ADW because the use of 'a dangerous weapon' is already included as an element of that offense, so that 'ADW while armed'-i.e. assault with a dangerous weapon while armed with a dangerous weapon-would be redundant.").

[30] The District's protection of District public officials statute penalizes various actions, including taking the property of any District official or employee while in the course of his or her duties or on account of those duties. D.C. Code § 22-851(c). The District has penalty enhancements for robbery when the complainant is: a minor (D.C. Code §§ 22-3611; 23-1331(4)); a senior citizen (D.C. Code § 22-3601); a taxicab driver (D.C. Code §§ 22-3751; 22-3752); a transit operator or Metrorail station manager (D.C. Code §§ 22-3751.01; 22-3752); or a member of a citizen patrol (D.C. Code § 22-3602). The District has penalty enhancements for carjacking when the complainant is: a minor (D.C. Code §§ 22-3611; 23-1331(4)); a senior citizen (D.C. Code § 22-3601); a taxicab driver (D.C. Code §§ 22-3751.01; 22-3752); and a transit operator or Metrorail station managers (D.C. Code §§ 22-3751.01; 22-3752).

[31] See, e.g., RCC § 7-2502.01, Possession of an Unregistered Firearm, Destructive Device, or Ammunition. In addition, an actor may face an enhanced penalty under RCC § 22E-608, the hate crime penalty enhancement, if he or she targets the complainant because of a characteristic such as his or her sex.

[32] D.C. Code § 22-2802 (making attempted robbery punishable with a maximum term of imprisonment of three years).

provision (RCC § 22E-301) specifies what must be proven to establish attempt liability and establish penalties for attempted theft consistent with other offenses. Third, the revised theft statute requires a person to act "knowingly" with respect to taking or exercising control over a motor vehicle and whether the motor vehicle satisfies the RCC definitions of "property" and "property of another." The current carjacking statute requires only that a person acts "recklessly" with respect to the taking or exercise of control over the motor vehicle,[33] although it is unclear in the legislative history whether the Council intended this culpable mental state.[34] DCCA case law and current District practice suggest that the offense requires the property to be of another.[35] Requiring a "knowingly" culpable mental state is consistent with the culpable mental state in other RCC property offenses,[36] which generally require that the defendant act knowingly with respect to the elements of the offense, as is requiring that the motor vehicle be "property" and "property of another," as those terms are defined in the RCC.[37] Collectively, these

[34] The legislative history of the current carjacking statute does not discuss why a recklessly mental state was adopted. The committee report makes no mention of recklessness, and actually states that the statute "[d]efines the offenses of carjacking and armed carjacking as the knowing and/or forceful taking from another the possession of that person's motor vehicle." Committee Report to the Carjacking Prevention Act of 1993, Bill 10-16 at 3.

[35] Redbook 4.302 ("S/he took [attempted to take] the [insert type of motor vehicle] without right to it;") ("The 'without right to it' language refers to the defendant's lack of a lawful claim to the motor vehicle, such as ownership. See Allen v. United States, 697 A.2d 1 (D.C. 1997) (listing as one of the elements of carjacking as the taking "of a person's vehicle," implying the taking of a vehicle owned by someone other than the defendant); see also Pixley v. United States, 692 A.2d 438 (D.C. 1997) (making no distinction between robbery and carjacking on the issue of actual ownership; thus, implying that a defendant could not be guilty of carjacking if he was the lawful owner of the motor vehicle).").

[36] There are two additional changes in current District law for carjacking that are related to culpable mental states. First, the revised theft statute requires an intent to deprive. Current District law does not have such a requirement for carjacking. In the RCC, a non-violent taking of a motor vehicle without intent to deprive would be criminalized under either the unauthorized use of property statute (RCC § 22E-2102) or unauthorized use of a motor vehicle statute (RCC § 22E-2103). Second, the revised theft statute requires that the defendant know that he or she lack the consent of the owner. As this commentary discusses later, District practice supports requiring lack of consent as an element of carjacking. The current carjacking statute requires a "knowingly or recklessly" culpable mental state, but it is unclear how the DCCA would construe these mental states in relation to the lack of consent of the owner, particularly when this element is not in the current statute. The current unauthorized use of a motor vehicle statute, for example, requires "without the consent of the owner," but does not contain any culpable mental states. D.C. Code § 22-3215(b). DCCA case law for UUV, however, requires a "knowing" mental state for this element. Moore v. United States, 757 A.2d 78, 82 (D.C. 2000) (stating as an element "at the time the appellant took, used, operated or removed the vehicle he knew he that he did so without the consent of the owner.") (citations omitted); Mitchell v. United States, 985 A.2d 1136 (D.C. 2009); Jackson v. United States, 600 A.2d 90, 93 (D.C. 1991) ("[T]here is a fourth element of the offense which requires the government to prove at the time the defendant used the vehicle, he knew he did so without the consent of the owner." (emphasis in original).

[37] RCC § 22E-701 defines property as "anything of value" which would include a motor vehicle. The RCC definition of "property of another" clarifies when property is subject to the theft offense, such as when the accused takes property in which he or she has a joint ownership. The relevant language in the RCC definition of "property of another" is "any property that a person has an interest with which the actor is not privileged to interfere, regardless of whether the actor also has an interest in that property." The second requirement of the RCC definition of "property of another" is that the definition does not include "any property in the possession of the accused that the other person has only a security interest in." The definition of "property of another" is discussed in the commentary to RCC § 22E-701.

revisions improve the consistency of the revised theft statute with other offenses and the proportionality of penalties.

Fifth, the revised theft offense eliminates the special recidivist theft penalty consistent with other nonviolent revised offenses in the RCC.[38] The current D.C. Code recidivist theft penalty in D.C. Code § 22-3212(c) provides that a defendant convicted of first or second degree theft who has two or more prior convictions for theft not committed on the same occasion shall be sentenced to a term of imprisonment of not more than 15 years and is subject to a mandatory minimum term of imprisonment of one year. In contrast, the revised theft statute is no longer subject to a recidivist penalty enhancement. The RCC general recidivism enhancement (RCC § 22E-606) is limited to RCC offenses against persons and enhanced burglary, which requires the presence of a dangerous weapon or imitation firearm. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Beyond these five changes to current District law, four other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised theft statute eliminates the evidentiary provision for theft of services that is in subsection (c) of the current D.C. Code theft statute.[39] The evidentiary provision states that "proof" of certain facts "shall be prima facie evidence that the person had committed the offense of theft." The provision neither specifies the government's burden of proof for those facts nor states whether the finding of prima facie evidence is a mandatory presumption that the trier of fact must make or a permissive presumption that the trier of fact may, but is not required, to make. There is no District case law concerning the theft of services provision. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised theft statute eliminates this evidentiary provision for theft of services. It appears that the language in the theft of services provision is superfluous[40] and deletion of the provision clarifies the revised theft offense.

[38] D.C. Code § 22-3212:

> (c) A person convicted of theft in the first or second degree who has 2 or more prior convictions for theft, not committed on the same occasion, shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned for not more than 15 years and for a mandatory-minimum term of not less than one year, or both. A person sentenced under this subsection shall not be released from prison, granted probation, or granted suspension of sentence, prior to serving the mandatory-minimum.
>
> (d) For the purposes of this section, a person shall be considered as having 2 or more prior convictions for theft if he or she has been convicted on at least 2 occasions of violations of:
>
> (1) § 22-3211;
>
> (2) A statute in one or more jurisdictions prohibiting theft or larceny; or
>
> (3) Conduct that would constitute a violation of § 22-3211 if committed in the District of Columbia.

[39] D.C. Code § 22-3211(c).

[40] In practice, it is unclear whether there are fact patterns where it could be said the government would satisfy the requirements of the theft of services provision and not also established a prima facie case for theft. Indeed, the theft of services evidentiary provision requires the government to establish additional facts beyond what the theft offense requires—for example that the services were rendered "in circumstances where payment is ordinarily made immediately upon the rendering of services or prior to departure from the place where the services were obtained."

Second, the revised theft offense requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state for whether the accused's conduct constituted taking, obtaining, transferring, or exercising control over the property, and whether the property met the definitions of "property" and "property of another." The current D.C. Code theft statute does not specify a culpable mental state for these elements and no case law exists directly on point. The current D.C. Code robbery statute does not refer to "property" or "property of another," but the statute and case law support using these elements as they are defined in the RCC,[41] and applying a culpable mental similar to that of theft.[42] Resolving these ambiguities, the revised theft statute requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state whether the accused's conduct constituted taking, obtaining, transferring, or exercising control over the property, and whether the property met the definitions of "property" and "property of another." Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[43] Requiring a knowing culpable mental state also makes the revised theft offense consistent with the revised fraud statute and other property offenses, which generally require that the defendant act knowingly with respect to the elements of the offense.[44]

Third, the revised theft gradations, by use of the phrase "in fact," codify that no culpable mental state is required as to the value of the property, as to whether the property is a "motor vehicle," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701, and as to the fact that the property was taken from the actual possession of another person or from within his or her immediate physical control. The current D.C. Code theft, robbery, and carjacking statutes are silent as to what culpable mental state applies to these elements and there is no District case law on point. However, District practice does not appear to apply a mental state to the values in the current theft gradations.[45] In addition, the current D.C. Code carjacking statute does not define "motor vehicle" and there is no relevant case law, making the scope of the offense unclear as compared to other offenses in Title 22 that define "motor [41] The current robbery statute requires that the defendant "take" "anything of value." D.C. Code § 22-2801. RCC § 22E-701 defines property as "anything of value." In addition, the DCCA has held that the current robbery statute incorporates the elements of "larceny," Lattimore, 684 A.2d at 359, which requires that property belong to another person. See, e.g., Lattimore, 684 A.2d at 360 ("An individual has committed larceny if that person "without right took and carried away property of another with the intent to permanently deprive the rightful owner thereof.") (quoting Durphy v. United States, 235 A.2d 326, 327 (D.C.1967)).

The definition of "property of another" clarifies when property is subject to the theft offense, such as when the accused takes property in which he or she has a joint ownership. The relevant language in the RCC definition of "property of another" is "any property that a person has an interest in that the accused is not privileged to interfere with, regardless of whether the accused also has an interest in that property." The second requirement of the RCC definition of "property of another" is that the definition does not include "any property in the possession of the accused that the other person has only a security interest in." The definition of "property of another" is discussed in the commentary to RCC § 22E-701.

[42] The DCCA has stated that robbery consists of larceny and an assault, and requires a "felonious taking," similar to the current and revised theft statutes. Lattimore v. United States, 684 A.2d 357, 359 (D.C. 1996) (citing United States v. McGill, 487 F.2d 1208, 1209 (U.S.App. D.C. 1973)).

[43] See Elonis v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2001, 2009 (2015) ("[O]ur cases have explained that a defendant generally must 'know the facts that make his conduct fit the definition of the offense,' even if he does not know that those facts give rise to a crime. (Internal citation omitted)").

[44] See, e.g., RCC § 22E-2201.

vehicle."[46] Resolving these ambiguities, the revised theft offense, by use of the phrase "in fact," applies strict liability to the value of the property, to whether the property is a "motor vehicle," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701, and to the fact that the property was taken from the actual possession of another person or from within his or her immediate physical control. Applying strict liability to statutory elements that do not distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is an accepted practice in American jurisprudence.[47] Clarifying that these elements are matters of strict liability in the revised theft gradations clarifies and potentially fills a gap in District law, as does applying the RCC definition of "motor vehicle."

Fourth, third degree of the revised theft statute does not require asportation of the property for the non-violent taking of property from the actual possession of another person or from within his or her immediate physical control. The current D.C. Code robbery statute does not include an asportation element. However, the DCCA has stated that robbery requires that the defendant "possess the item being stolen and move it."[48] Asportation is a minimal requirement under current robbery law that may be satisfied by "the slightest moving of an object from its original location."[49] Resolving this ambiguity, third degree of the revised theft statute eliminates the asportation requirement as redundant to liability for non-violent taking of property from the actual possession of another person or from within his or her immediate physical control. It is unclear how a defendant could "take" property without also slightly moving it and satisfying any asportation requirement. However, to the extent that eliminating an asportation requirement expands the scope of current District law, such expansion reflects the gravamen of the gradation—invading the space of the complainant.[50] Eliminating the asportation requirement is also consistent with the revised robbery statute (RCC § 22E-1201) and revised unauthorized use of property statute (RCC § 22E-2102), neither of which requires asportation. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, the revised theft offense no longer uses the phrase "wrongfully obtains or uses" that is in the current D.C. Code theft statute,[51] and eliminates superfluous language[52] in the long list of predicate conduct. These changes in wording do not affect the limited District case law interpreting this part of the current D.C. Code definition of "wrongfully obtains or uses," such as In re D.D.[53] and Dobyns v. United States.[54] No change to the scope of the theft statute is intended by these changes.

Second, the revised theft statute requires that the defendant act "without the consent of an owner." This element is intended to clarify the meaning of the ambiguous phrase "without authority or right" in current theft law. The current D.C. Code theft statute does not distinguish "without authority or right" as a separate element, but "without authority or right" is part of one of the statutorily specified means of committing theft.[55] Regardless of the status of "without authority or right" as a separate element in the theft statute, both the legislative history[56] and current practice as reflected by the Redbook jury instruction[57] acknowledge that theft requires an additional element similar to "without authority or right," although they each use different language to discuss it. The current D.C. Code robbery statute[58] and carjacking statute[59] do not state as an element that the actor lacks the [52] Superfluous terms are: "making an unauthorized use" or unauthorized "disposition," and "interest in or possession of property." However, in at least one instance the DCCA has suggested that proof that a defendant act "without authority or right" also is required when the defendant committed theft by an "intent to deprive." Russell v. United States, 65 A.3d 1177, 1181 (D.C. 2013) ("[W]e are satisfied that appellants 'wrongfully obtained' [Federal Aviation Administration] property, 'without authority or right,' specifically intending at the time to deprive the [Federal Aviation Administration] of property that the evidence shows had value. consent of an owner, but case law[60] and current District practice[61] support requiring such an element.

Resolving these ambiguities, the revised theft statute requires that the defendant lack the "consent" of an "owner," as those terms are defined in RCC § 22E-701. "Consent" has been recognized in DCCA case law as providing a grant of authority or right which negates theft[62] and it seems as though it would similarly negate robbery and carjacking. However, under the RCC a person may have a defense to depriving another of their property without consent of an owner, such as in the case of a police seizure of contraband or other government operations.[63] No change in the scope of liability is intended by requiring that the defendant lack the "consent of an owner." The definitions of "consent" and "owner" are discussed in more detail in the commentary to RCC § 22E-701.

Third, the revised theft statute requires that the defendant act "with intent to deprive the other of the property." The current D.C. Code theft statute requires an "intent to deprive the other of a right to the property or a benefit of the property."[64] The revised theft statute deletes the language "a right to the property or a benefit of the property as surplusage, given that the definition of "deprive" in RCC § 22E-701 refers to the property's "value" and "benefit." The current D.C. Code robbery statute does not specify an intent to deprive, but the DCCA has held that the statute incorporates the elements of "larceny,"[65] which requires an intent to deprive.[66] No change to current District law is intended by this change.

Fourth, the revised theft statute specifies a "knowingly" culpable mental state as to the fact that the accused lacked an owner's consent. Although the current D.C. Code theft statute is silent as to the applicable culpable mental state, DCCA case law has applied a knowledge requirement to a similar element.[67] The current D.C. Code robbery statute does not state as an element that the actor lacks the consent of an owner, but case law supports such a requirement[68] and applying a culpable mental similar to that of theft.[69] Requiring a knowing culpable mental state also makes the revised theft offense consistent with the revised fraud statute and other property offenses, which generally require that the defendant act knowingly with respect to the elements of the offense.[70]

Fifth, subsection (f) of the revised theft statute codifies an exclusion from liability for fare evasion. This exception codifies recent law.[71]

RCC § 22E-2102. Unauthorized Use of Property.

Explanatory Note*. This section establishes the unauthorized use of property (UUP) offense in the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). UUP covers conduct that results in the taking, obtaining, transferring, or exercising of control over property of another without an owner's effective consent. UUP criminalizes behavior that does not rise to the level of conduct "with intent to deprive an owner of the property" in the revised theft offense (RCC § 22E- 2101), the revised fraud offense (RCC § 22E-2201), or the revised extortion offense (RCC § 22E-2301). The revised UUP offense replaces the taking property without right (TPWR) statute[1] in the current D.C. Code.*

Paragraph (a)(1) specifies the prohibited conduct—takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over the property of another. "Property" is a defined term in in RCC § 22E-701 that means an item of value and includes goods, services, and cash. "Property of another" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 which means that some other person has a legal interest in the property at issue that the defendant cannot infringe upon, regardless of whether the defendant also has an interest in that property. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies a culpable mental state of "knowingly." Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" mental state in subsection (a)(1) applies to all of the elements in paragraph (a)(1)—takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over the property of another. "Knowingly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here requires the defendant to be aware to a practical certainty that his or her conduct takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over property that is "property of another."

Paragraph (a)(2) states that the proscribed conduct must be done "without the effective consent of an owner." The term "consent," as defined in RCC § 22E-701, requires some indication (by word or action) of agreement given by a person generally competent to do so. "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception." Lack of effective consent means there was no agreement, or the agreement was obtained by means of physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception. "Owner" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 to mean a person holding an interest in property that the accused is not privileged to interfere with. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" mental state in paragraph (a)(1) also applies to paragraph (a)(2). "Knowingly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206, here requiring the accused to be aware to a practical certainty that he or she lacks effective consent of an owner.

Subsection (b) codifies an exclusion from liability for fare evasion. Conduct that constitutes a violation of D.C. Code § 35-252 is not a violation of UUP. Subsection (b) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element. Here, there is no culpable mental state required for the fact that the conduct constitutes a violation of D.C. Code § 35-252.

Subsection (c) codifies a defense to the unauthorized use of property offense when the defendant intends to return the property to a lawful owner. The general provision in RCC § 22E-201 establishes the burdens of proof and production for all defenses in the RCC. There are two requirements for the defense. First, per paragraph (c)(1), the actor must reasonably believe[2] that the property is lost or was stolen by a third party. Per the rule of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "in fact" specified in subsection (c) applies to all elements in paragraph (c)(1). "In fact" is a defined term in term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to a given element, here that the actor reasonably believes that the property is lost or was stolen by a third party. It is not necessary to prove that the actor desired or was practically certain that the property is lost or was stolen by a third party. However, the actor must subjectively believe, and that belief must be reasonable, that the property is lost or was stolen by a third party. Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[3] There is no defense under paragraph (c)(1) when the actor makes an unreasonable mistake as to the property being lost or stolen by a third party.

The second requirement for the defense is in paragraph (c)(2). The actor must engage in the conduct constituting the offense "with intent" to return the property to a lawful owner. "Owner" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 to mean a person holding an interest in property that the accused is not privileged to interfere with. "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor was practically certain that the actor was returning the property to a lawful owner. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that the actor actually returned the property to a lawful owner, only that the actor believed to a practical certainty that the actor would do so.

Subsection (d) specifies relevant penalties for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (e) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised unauthorized use of property statute clearly changes current District law in four main ways.

First, the revised UUP offense eliminates the current D.C. Code taking property without right (TPWR) statute's asportation requirement[4] and extends liability if the defendant merely "takes," "obtains," "transfers," or "exercises control" over the property without carrying it away. The DCCA has never interpreted the scope of the asportation requirement in the current D.C. Code TPWR statute, but in the context of other offenses has stated it is a minimal requirement.[5] In contrast, the revised UUP statute requires only that the defendant take, obtain, transfer, or exercise control over the property of another. It is unclear why a slight physical movement of property should make the difference between an unauthorized, temporary action being criminal and non-criminal. This revision improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute.

[2] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist.

[3] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

[4] D.C. Code § 22-3216 (requiring takes and "carries away" the property of another).

Second, the revised UUP statute applies a "knowingly" culpable mental state to the elements "property of another" and "without the effective consent of an owner." The current D.C. Code TPWR statute merely requires that the defendant engage in conduct "without right" and does not specify a mental state for this element.[6] Case law interpreting the current D.C. Code TPWR statute has construed the phrase "without right" to mean without the consent of the owner, but has not required a knowledge culpable mental state as to the lack of consent.[7] Similarly, case law suggests that something less than a knowledge culpable mental state is necessary for the element that the property is "property of another."[8] In contrast, the revised UUP statute applies a "knowingly" culpable mental state to the elements "property of another" and "without the effective consent of an owner." Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[9] Requiring a knowing culpable mental state also makes the revised UUP offense consistent with the revised theft statute and other property offenses, which generally require that the defendant act knowingly with respect to the elements of the offense.[10]

Third, the revised UUP statute, through the general culpability principles for self-induced intoxication in RCC § 22E-209, allows a defendant to claim he or she did not act "knowingly" due to his or her self-induced intoxication. The current statute is silent as to the effect of intoxication. However, the DCCA has held that the current D.C. Code TPWR statute is a general intent crime,[11] which would preclude a defendant from receiving a jury instruction on whether intoxication prevented the defendant from forming the necessary intent for the crime.[12] At the same time, the DCCA has also interpreted the current statute to incorporate a negligence-like culpable mental state, which is not a form of culpability that is susceptible to being negated by self-induced intoxication.[13] As a result, a defendant charged under the current statute would have no basis for even raising—let alone presenting evidence in support of—a claim that he or she, due to his or her self-induced intoxicated state, lacked the necessary intent. By contrast, per the revised UUP offense, a defendant would both have a basis for, and be allowed to raise, a claim of this nature since the revised UUP offense is subject to a more demanding culpable mental state of knowledge.[14] Likewise, where appropriate, under the revised UUP offense the defendant would be entitled to a jury instruction clarifying that a not guilty verdict is necessary if the defendant's intoxicated state precludes the government from meeting its burden of proof with respect to the culpable mental state of knowledge at issue in UUP. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the offense.

Fourth, subsection (b) of the revised UUP statute codifies an exception for liability for fare evasion. Such an exception exists in current law for the theft statute,[15] but not TPWR. Conduct that satisfies the current theft statute could also be charged as TPWR.[16] Codifying the same exclusion from liability for fare evasion improves the consistency of the revised UUP statute and further clarifies the lesser included relationship between theft and UUP.

Beyond these four changes to current District law, four other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised UUP offense is made a lesser included offense[17] of the revised theft (RCC § 22E-2101), fraud (RCC § 22E-2201), and extortion (RCC § 22E-2301)

On the other hand, if the government has proved beyond a reasonable doubt that [name of defendant] could and did form the intent to [^], along with every other element of the offense, then you must find him/her guilty of the offense of [^] .").

[14] This result is a product of the logical relevance principle set forth in RCC § 22E-209(a) and the fact that knowledge is a mental state susceptible to negation by self-induced intoxication. See RCC § 22E-209(b).

[15] Fare Evasion Decriminalization Amendment Act of 2018 (Act 22-592).

[16] The current theft statute can be satisfied with an intent to "appropriate," which is defined as "to take or make use of without authority or right." D.C. Code §§ 22-3211(b)(2); 22-3201. Since the current TPWR statute does not require any intent to interfere with the property, an intent to "appropriate" could satisfy TPWR.

[17] By being a lesser included offense, a person cannot be convicted of both UUP and theft or UUP and fraud, or UUP and extortion for the same act or course of conduct under either the RCC merger provision (RCC § 22E-214) or current District case law. See, e.g., Mooney v. United States, 938 A.2d 710, 723 (D.C. 2007) (discussing how multiple punishments that result from convictions of a greater and a lesser-included offense are prohibited by the Double Jeopardy Clause unless there is clear legislative intent that punishment should be imposed for both offenses). In addition, the defendant is on notice from the time of indictment for theft, fraud, or extortion, that he may be convicted of the lesser included offense. See Woodard v. United States, 738 A.2d 254, 259 n. 10 (D.C. 1999) ("the law is settled that an indictment on a greater offense puts the indictee on notice that the prosecution might also press a lesser-included charge"); see also Schmuck v. United States, 489 U.S. 705, 718, 109 S. Ct. 1443, 1452, 103 L. Ed. 2d 734 (1989) ("The elements test . . . permits lesser offense instructions only in those cases where the indictment contains the elements of both offenses and thereby gives notice to the defendant that he may be convicted on either charge."). Upon a showing of offenses. The current D.C. Code TPWR statute is silent as to whether it constitutes a lesser included offense of the current D.C. Code theft,[18] fraud,[19] and extortion[20] offenses. Based on legislative history,[21] the DCCA has recognized that the current D.C. Code TPWR statute is a lesser included offense of theft,[22] although the current D.C. Code TPWR statute appears to fail the DCCA's current "elements test" as to whether it is a lesser included offense of theft.[23] There is no case law on point with respect to fraud or extortion and these offenses also appear to fail the DCCA's current "elements test."[24] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised UUP statute is clearly a lesser included offense of the revised theft, fraud, and extortion statutes insofar as it has no elements not included in these offenses.[25] This revision removes an unnecessary gap in liability for temporary takings and improves the overall proportionality of these statutes.

Second, the revised UUP offense requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state for "takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over the property of another." The current statute does not specify a culpable mental state for the comparable elements[26] and no case law exists directly on point.[27] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised UUP statute requires some evidence, the defendant may demand an instruction to the jury on the lesser included offense of UUP to accompany theft, fraud, or extortion charges. Woodward v. United States, 738 A.2d at 261 ("Any evidence, however weak, is sufficient to support a lesser-included instruction so long as a jury could rationally convict on the lesser-included offense after crediting the evidence.").

[21] The legislative history for the 1982 Theft Act indicates that the Council of the District of Columbia intended for TPWR to be a lesser included offense of theft. Chairperson Clarke of the Judiciary Committee, Extension of Comments on Bill No. 4-193: The District of Columbia Theft and White Collar Crimes Act of 1982 (July 20, 1982) (hereinafter Extension of Comments on Bill No. 4-193) at 36 ("[I]t is intended that the offense of taking property without right continue to be treated as a lesser included offense of the consolidated theft offense.").

[23] Moorer v. United States, 868 A.2d at 140 ("Under the elements test, one offense is included within another if "(1) the lesser included offense consists of some, but not every element of the greater offense; and (2) the evidence is sufficient to support the lesser charge."). Because the asportation element of the current TPWR statute is not required by the current theft, fraud, or extortion statutes, the current TPWR statute does not appear to be a lesser included offense of the current theft, fraud, or extortion statutes.

[24] See Byrd v. United States, 598 A.2d 386, 390 (D.C. 1991) (en banc).

[25] The revised UUP statute requires "without the effective consent of the owner." RCC § 22E-701 defines "effective consent" as "consent other than consent induced by the physical force, a coercive threat, or deception." RCC § 22E-701 defines "consent" as "a word or action that indicates, explicitly or implicitly, agreement to particular conduct or a particular result" given by a person generally competent to do so. Thus, in requiring that the defendant lack "effective consent," the revised UUP statute requires either that there is no consent at all, or that there is consent but it is obtained by physical force, coercive threat, or deception, and is not valid. These requirements mirror the requirements in the RCC theft offense ("without the consent of the owner"), fraud ("with the consent of the owner; the consent being obtained by deception), and extortion ("with the consent of the owner; the consent being obtained by a coercive threat.").

[26] D.C. Code § 22-3216 ("A person commits the offense of taking property without right if that person takes and carries away the property of another without right to do so.").

[27] Insofar as the current TPWR offense has been held to be a "general intent crime," courts have consistently held that there must be an "intent to commit the proscribed act" which here consists of the taking. See, e.g., Fogle v. United States, 336 A.2d 833, 835 (D.C. 1975). However, case law provides no greater specificity as to the nature of the required intent for TPWR.

a "knowingly" culpable mental state for "takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over the property of another." Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[28] A knowingly culpable mental state also makes the revised UUP offense consistent with the revised theft statute and other property offenses, which generally require that the defendant act knowingly with respect to the elements of the offense.[29] This revision improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Third, the revised UUP offense requires that the person act "without the effective consent of an owner." The current D.C. Code TPWR statute requires that the defendant act "without right." This phrase has been interpreted by the DCCA to refer to "consent of the owner, or one authorized to consent on his behalf,"[30] and to exclude instances where the consent was "the product of trickery" or where the person had consent to take the item for one purpose but then exceeded the terms of that consent.[31] The revised UUP requirement that the person act "without the effective consent of an owner," uses definitions in RCC § 22E-701 for "consent," "effective consent," and "owner" that are consistent across property offenses and also appears to be consistent with existing case law on the current TPWR statute. The change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised UUP offense.

Fourth, the revised UUP statute codifies a defense for intent to return the property to a lawful owner. The current D.C. Code TPWR statute does not codify any such defense.[32] DCCA case law recognizes Good Samaritan[33] and abandoned property[34] defenses to some offenses, but the requirements of the defenses are unclear and the older case law frames the defense in terms of a reasonable mistake of fact as to ownership, which does not reflect the current D.C. Code definition of "property of another."[35] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised TPWR statute codifies a defense when the actor reasonably believes that the property is lost or stolen by a third party and engages in the conduct constituting the offense with intent to return the property to a lawful owner. Without such a defense, a person that takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over the property of another without the owner's effective consent, but with the intent to return the property to its lawful owner, would be guilty of the offense. Under the revised UUP statute, a defendant's belief that property is lost or stolen would generally not be a mistake of fact defense if the defendant "knows" that it is "property of another" and that he or she lacks the "effective

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

RCC § 22E-2103. Unauthorized Use of a Motor Vehicle.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the unauthorized use of a motor vehicle (UUV) offense and penalty gradations for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The offense proscribes the use of a motor vehicle without the effective consent of an owner. The offense has a single penalty gradation. The revised UUV offense replaces portions of the unauthorized use of motor vehicles statute[1] in the current D.C. Code.

Paragraph (a)(1) specifies the prohibited conduct—operating a motor vehicle. "Motor vehicle" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that includes any vehicle designed to be propelled only by an internal-combustion engine or electricity. Paragraph (a)(1) also specifies a culpable mental state of "knowingly," a term defined at RCC § 22E-206 that here means the accused must be aware to a practical certainty that his or her conduct is operating a "motor vehicle," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701.

Paragraph (a)(2) states that the proscribed conduct must be done "without the effective consent of an owner." The term "consent," as defined in RCC § 22E-701, requires some indication (by word or action) of agreement given by a person generally competent to do so. "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception." Lack of effective consent means there was no agreement, or the agreement was obtained by means of physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception. "Owner" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that means a person holding an interest in property that the accused is not privileged to interfere with. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" mental state in paragraph (a)(1) also applies to paragraph (a)(2), and here requires that the accused be aware to a practical certainty that he or she lacks effective consent of an owner.

Subsection (b) codifies a defense to the unauthorized use of a motor vehicle offense when the defendant intends to return the motor vehicle to a lawful owner. The general provision in RCC § 22E-201 establishes the burdens of proof and production for all defenses in the RCC. There are two requirements for the defense. First, per paragraph (b)(1), the actor must reasonably believe[2] that the motor vehicle is lost or was stolen by a third party. Per the rule of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "in fact" specified in subsection (b) applies to all elements in paragraph (b)(1). "In fact" is a defined term in term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates no culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205, applies to a given element, here that the actor reasonably believes that the motor vehicle is lost or was stolen by a third party. It is not necessary to prove that the actor desired or was practically certain that the motor vehicle is lost or was stolen by a third party. However, the actor must subjectively believe, and that belief must be reasonable, that the motor vehicle is lost or was stolen by a third party. Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[3]

[1] D.C. Code § 22-3215. Specifically, the revised UUV offense replaces D.C. Code § 22-3215 (b), (d)(1)-(d)(3). The remaining portions of D.C. Code § 22-3215, concerning rented and leased cars under certain conditions, are not part of the RCC and will remain in D.C. Code § 22-3215, subject to conforming amendments as necessary.

[2] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist.

[3] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the

There is no defense under paragraph (b)(1) when the actor makes an unreasonable mistake as to the motor vehicle being lost or stolen by a third party.

The second requirement for the defense is in paragraph (b)(2). The actor must engage in the conduct constituting the offense "with intent" to return the motor vehicle to a lawful owner. "Owner" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 to mean a person holding an interest in property that the accused is not privileged to interfere with. "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor was practically certain that the actor was returning the motor vehicle to a lawful owner. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that the actor actually returned the motor vehicle to a lawful owner, only that the actor believed to a practical certainty that the actor would do so.

Subsection (c) specifies the penalties for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (d) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised unauthorized use of a motor vehicle statute clearly changes current District law in six main ways.

First, through the revised definition of "motor vehicle" in RCC § 22E-701, the revised UUV offense includes liability with respect to any vehicle that is "designed to be propelled only by an internal-combustion engine or electricity." The definition of "motor vehicle" in the current D.C. Code UUV offense, and thus the scope of the current D.C. Code UUV offense, is limited to "any automobile, self-propelled mobile home, motorcycle, truck, truck tractor, truck tractor with semitrailer or trailer, or bus."[4] In contrast, the revised definition of "motor vehicle" in RCC § 22E-701 broadens the revised UUV offense to include any watercraft, aircraft, or land vehicle that is "designed to be propelled only by an internal-combustion engine or electricity." The "designed to be" language includes vehicles that happen to be moved by human exertion in a given case, but are "designed" to be propelled only by an internal-combustion engine or electricity. This revision eliminates possible gaps in the offense and clarifies the statute.

Second, through the revised definition of "motor vehicle" in in RCC § 22E-701, the revised UUV offense no longer includes vehicles like mopeds that are designed to be propelled, in whole or in part, by human exertion. The definition of "motor vehicle" in the current D.C. Code UUV offense, and thus the scope of the current D.C. Code UUV offense, is limited to "any automobile, self-propelled mobile home, motorcycle, truck, truck tractor, truck tractor with semitrailer or trailer, or bus,"[5] although the DCCA has held explicitly situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

held that mopeds[6] fall within the current definition of "motor vehicle." In contrast, the revised definition of "motor vehicle" requires that the vehicle that be "designed to be propelled only by an internal-combustion engine or electricity." These types of vehicles are generally more expensive, heavier, and pose more severe safety risks to others than a vehicle that is designed to be propelled, in whole or in part, by human exertion. Unauthorized use of vehicles such as mopeds,[7] that fall outside the RCC definition of "motor vehicle" and the revised UUV offense, remains criminalized by the RCC unauthorized use of property offense (RCC § 22E-2102). This revision improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised definition.

Third, the revised UUV offense eliminates the special recidivist penalty in the current D.C. Code UUV statute, consistent with nonviolent revised statutes in the RCC.[8] The revised UUV statute is no longer subject to a recidivist penalty enhancement. The RCC general recidivism enhancement (RCC § 22E-606) is limited to RCC offenses against persons and enhanced burglary, which requires the presence of a dangerous weapon or imitation firearm. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Fourth, the revised UUV offense eliminates the special penalty for committing UUV during a crime of violence or to facilitate a crime of violence that is in the current D.C. Code UUV statute.[9] This enhancement is particularly unusual in current District law

[6] In United States v. Stancil, the DCCA held that "[a]fter considering the language and history of the UUV statute, and the characteristics of the vehicle in question, we hold that a moped is a 'motor vehicle' for the purposes" of the then-current UUV statute." Stancil v. United States, 422 A.2d 1285, 1286 (D.C. 1980). Stancil was decided under an earlier version of the UUV statute, but the definition of "motor vehicle" in this earlier statute is substantively identical to the current definition of "motor vehicle" and the case is still good law. The jury instruction for UUV adopts the holding in Stancil and includes "moped" in the definition of "motor vehicle." D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 5.302 cmt. at 5-42.

[7] Similarly, a bicycle or scooter designed to run on either an electric motor or bodily propulsion would not constitute a "motor vehicle."

[8] D.C. Code § 22-3215(d)(3).

> (3)(A) A person convicted of unauthorized use of a motor vehicle under subsection (b) of this section who has 2 or more prior convictions for unauthorized use of a motor vehicle or theft in the first degree, not committed on the same occasion, shall be fined not less than $5,000 nor more than $15,000, or imprisoned for not less than 30 months nor more than 15 years, or both.
>
> (B) For the purposes of this paragraph, a person shall be considered as having 2 prior convictions for unauthorized use of a motor vehicle or theft in the first degree if the person has been twice before convicted on separate occasions of:
>
> (i) A prior violation of subsection (b) of this section or theft in the first degree;
>
> (ii) A statute in one or more other jurisdictions prohibiting unauthorized use of a motor vehicle or theft in the first degree;
>
> (iii) Conduct that would constitute a violation of subsection (b) of this section or a violation of theft in the first degree if committed in the District of Columbia; or
>
> (iv) Conduct that is substantially similar to that prosecuted as a violation of subsection (b) of this section or theft in the first degree.

[9] D.C. Code § 22-3215(d)(2):

> (2)(A) A person convicted of unauthorized use of a motor vehicle under subsection (b) of this section who took, used, or operated the motor vehicle, or caused the motor vehicle to be taken, used, or operated, during the course of or to facilitate a crime of violence, shall be:

for requiring consecutive sentencing. In contrast, the RCC deletes this special penalty for committing UUV during a crime of violence or to facilitate a crime of violence. There is no clear basis for singling out UUV for a crime of violence enhancement as compared to other offenses of equal seriousness. The RCC reserves theft of a motor vehicle for the RCC theft statute and limits the RCC UUV statute to temporary unauthorized use of a motor vehicle that is a true "joy ride." If an individual uses the motor vehicle during a crime of violence or to facilitate a crime of violence, the defendant will be liable for either theft or UUV, as well as the crime of violence, ensuring that there is added liability for the use of a motor vehicle in conjunction with a crime of violence. This change improves the proportionality and consistency of the revised UUV and theft offenses.

Fifth, the revised UUV offense eliminates the separate offense of "UUV passenger" that currently is recognized in DCCA case law. The current D.C. Code UUV statute is limited to a single gradation,[10] and does not specifically address whether or in what manner it reaches a passenger in a motor vehicle. However, the DCCA has held that riding in a motor vehicle as a passenger with knowledge of its unlawful operation is sufficient for liability.[11] In contrast, the revised UUV offense penalizes only knowingly operating a motor vehicle without the effective consent of an owner. A passenger riding in a motor vehicle, with knowledge of its unlawful operation, is not, without more, sufficient for UUV liability in the RCC. However, a passenger that satisfies the requirements of accomplice liability (RCC § 22E-210) may be liable as an accomplice to UUV and consequently receive the same penalty as the driver of the vehicle. The revised UUV statute does not change District case law establishing that mere presence in the vehicle is insufficient to prove knowledge, such as In re Davis[12] and Stevens v. United States,[13] nor does it change the requirement in existing case law that a passenger is not liable for aiding and abetting UUV if he or she does not have a reasonable opportunity to exit the vehicle upon gaining knowledge that its operation is unauthorized.[14] To the extent that District case law holds that riding as a passenger in a motor vehicle with knowledge of its unlawful operation is sufficient for UUV, the revised UUV statute is a change in law.[15] This revision clarifies current law and improves the proportionality of the revised UUV statute.

Sixth, under the revised UUV statute the general culpability principles for self-induced intoxication in RCC § 22E-209 allow a defendant to claim he or she did not act "knowingly" due to his or her self-induced intoxication. The current statute is silent as to the effect of intoxication. However, the DCCA has held that the current statute is a general intent crime,[16] which would preclude a defendant from receiving a jury instruction on whether intoxication prevented the defendant from forming the necessary intent for the crime.[17] The DCCA holding would also likely mean that a defendant would be precluded from directly raising—though not necessarily presenting evidence in support of[18]—the claim that, due to his or her self-induced intoxicated state, the defendant not possess the knowledge required for any element of UUV.[19] In contrast, per the revised UUV offense, a defendant would both have a basis for, and will be able to raise and present relevant and admissible evidence in support of, a claim of that voluntary intoxication prevented the defendant from forming the knowledge required to prove UUV. Likewise, where appropriate, the defendant would be entitled to an instruction, which clarifies that a not guilty verdict is necessary if the defendant's intoxicated state precludes the government from meeting its burden of proof with respect to the culpable mental state of knowledge at issue in UUV.[20] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the offense.

Beyond these six changes to current District law, two other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised UUV statute requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state for "operat[ing]" a "motor vehicle." The current statute does not clearly specify a culpable mental state for these elements. No case law exists directly on point, although the DCCA does require for UUV that the defendant know he lack the consent of the owner.[21] Instead of this ambiguity, the revised UUV statute requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state for operating a motor vehicle. Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[22] This revision is consistent with the DCCA requirement of knowledge as to the lack of consent of an owner. It also makes the revised UUV offense consistent with the revised theft statute and other property offenses, which generally require that the defendant act knowingly with respect to the elements of the offense.[23]

On the other hand, if the government has proved beyond a reasonable doubt that [name of defendant] could and did form the intent to [^], along with every other element of the offense, then you must find him/her guilty of the offense of [^] .").

[19] This is so, moreover, notwithstanding the fact that the defendant, due to his or her self-induced intoxicated state, may not have actually possessed the knowledge required for any element of UUV.

[20] These results are a product of the logical relevance principle set forth in RCC § 22E-209(a) and the fact that knowledge is a mental state susceptible to negation by self-induced intoxication. See RCC § 22E-209(b).

Second, the revised UUV statute codifies a defense for intent to return the motor vehicle to a lawful owner. The current D.C. Code UUV statute does not codify any such defense, but requires that the defendant act "without the consent of the owner" and for the defendant's "own profit, use, or purpose."[24] It is unclear whether the current D.C. Code UUV statute would include an individual that operates a motor vehicle with intent to return it to a lawful owner, such that the individual is liable for the offense. There is no DCCA case law on this issue. DCCA case law recognizes Good Samaritan[25] and abandoned property[26] defenses to some offenses, but the requirements of the defenses are unclear. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised UUV statute codifies a defense when the actor reasonably believes that the motor vehicle is lost or stolen by a third party and engages in the conduct constituting the offense with intent to return the motor vehicle to a lawful owner. Without such a defense, a person that operates a motor vehicle without the owner's effective consent, but with the intent to return the motor vehicle to its lawful owner, would be guilty of the offense. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute. Under the revised UUV statute, a defendant's belief that the motor vehicle is lost or stolen would generally not be a mistake of fact defense if the defendant "knows" that he or she lacks the "effective consent" of the owner. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, "takes" and "uses" have been deleted from the revised UUV offense. Deleting "takes" does not change the scope of the UUV offense because, practically, a "taking" of a motor vehicle necessarily involves its operation. "Uses" has been deleted because it is unclear exactly what conduct constitutes "use" of a motor vehicle but does not constitute "operating" it. Possible examples of "use"—but not operation—might include passively sitting in or on a motor vehicle, but, to the extent a person can "use" a motor vehicle without also operating it, that conduct is more proportionally penalized as third degree trespass involving a motor vehicle (RCC § 22E-2601). This change clarifies the revised statute.

Second, the revised UUV offense deletes "for his or her own profit, use, or purpose" that is in the current UUV offense. It appears this language does not actually narrow the scope of the UUV offense, as even a person whose ostensible motive is to benefit another would have as his or her own purpose the unauthorized use of the car to benefit that other person. Deleting "for his or her own profit, use, or purpose" clarifies the scope of the revised UUV offense.

Third, "causes a motor vehicle to be taken, used or operated" has been deleted from the revised statute. It is unclear what this language could mean other than codifying liability for aiding and abetting, conduct addressed generally for all offenses in section RCC § 22E-210. Deleting the language is not intended to change the scope of the revised offense.

Fourth, the revised UUV statute requires that the defendant act without the "effective consent of an owner." The current UUV statute simply requires that the defendant act "without the consent of the owner."[27] However, DCCA case law for UUV expands "consent of the owner" to an "authorized" person" to give consent,[28] and indicates that a person who uses deception to obtain consent to use a motor vehicle commits UUV.[29] Using "effective consent" in the revised UUV statute ensures that the specialized type of property at issue in the statute has the same protection afforded other property in theft and theft-related offenses in Chapter 21 of the RCC. The definitions of "effective consent" and "owner" are discussed in the commentary to RCC § 22E-701. The RCC relies on civil law for determining agency and it is unnecessary to specify that consent may be given by authorized persons. The change improves the clarity and consistency of definitions throughout property offenses.

Fifth, the revised UUV statute requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state as to the fact that the defendant lacked effective consent of an owner. The current UUV statute requires acting "without the consent of the owner," but does not specify a mental state for the element. DCCA case law, however, requires a "knowing" mental state for this element.[30] This change clarifies the revised statute.

RCC § 22E-2104. Shoplifting.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the revised shoplifting offense and penalty for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). Shoplifting addresses theft-like conduct specific to stores and retail establishments, but does not require an intent to deprive an owner of property. There are no penalty gradations. The revised shoplifting offense replaces the existing shoplifting statute[1] in the current D.C. Code.

Subparagraph (a)(1)(A), subparagraph (a)(1)(B), and subparagraph (a)(1)(C) specify the prohibited conduct—conduct that conceals, removes, transfers, etc. an item. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that the culpable mental state for this conduct is "knowingly." Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" culpable mental state in paragraph (a)(1) applies to the elements in subparagraph (a)(1)(a), subparagraph (a)(1)(B), and subparagraph (a)(1)(c). "Knowingly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the accused must be aware to a practical certainty that his or her conduct is concealing, removing, transferring, etc. an item.

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies several requirements for the item that the defendant must conceal, remove, transfer, etc. First, the item must be "property," a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 meaning an item of value which includes goods, services, and cash. Second, the property must be "property of another," a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 which means that some other person has a legal interest in the property at issue that the defendant cannot infringe upon, regardless of whether the defendant also has an interest in the property. Third, the item must be the "personal" property of another, which excludes property such as real estate. Fourth, the item must be either "displayed or offered for sale" (subparagraph (a)(2)(A)) or "held or stored on the premises in reasonably close proximity to the customer sales area for future display or sale" (subparagraph (a)(2)(B)). Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" mental state in paragraph (a)(1) also applies to the elements in paragraph (a)(2), here requiring the accused to be aware to a practical certainty that the item is personal property of another that is displayed, held, stored, or offered for sale in the required manner.

Paragraph (a)(3) states that the proscribed conduct must be done "with intent to take or make use of without complete payment." This is a lesser intent than "with intent to deprive an owner of the property" that the revised theft offense requires in RCC § 22E-2101. "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the defendant was practically certain that he or she would take or make use of the property without complete payment. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that the defendant actually took or made use of the property without complete payment, only that the defendant believed to a practical certainty that this would occur.

Subsection (b) prohibits charging attempted shoplifting. Conduct constituting attempted shoplifting may be chargeable as attempted theft or attempted unauthorized use of property, however.

Subsection (c) specifies the penalty for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

[1] D.C. Code § 22-3213.

Subsection (d) provides qualified immunity to specified individuals for detention, false imprisonment, malicious prosecution, defamation, and false arrest in any proceedings arising from the detention or arrest of a person suspected of shoplifting. The subsection lists requirements for the detention or arrest that must be met for the immunity to apply. Subsection (d) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element. Per the rule of construction in RCC § 22E-207, "in fact" applies to all the requirements that follow in paragraphs (d)(1) through (d)(4), and there is no culpable mental state for these requirements.

Subsection (e) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised shoplifting statute clearly changes current District law in one main way.

The language in subparagraph (a)(1)(C) has been simplified to refer to transfer from any container or package (regardless of the purpose of the container). The current D.C. Code shoplifting statute limits the container involved to those concerning sale or display.[2] There is no case law interpreting the scope of this language. In contrast, the revised language in subparagraph (a)(1)(C), in combination with the requirements that the property be "displayed or offered for sale" (subparagraph (a)(2)(A)) or "held or stored on the premises in reasonably close proximity to the customer sales area for future display or sale" (subparagraph (a)(2)(B)), effectively broadens the revised offense to include transfers between containers that store or otherwise hold property. The nature of the container is irrelevant if the action is done with intent to take or make use of the property without complete payment per paragraph (a)(3). This revision clarifies the statute and reduces possible litigation over whether a given container may be a display or sales container.

Beyond this change to current District law, three other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised shoplifting statute is limited to engaging in the specified conduct "with intent to take or make use of the property without complete payment" and no longer includes with intent to "defraud." The current D.C. Code shoplifting statute requires either "with intent to appropriate without complete payment"[3] or "with intent to defraud an owner of the value of the property."[4] The current D.C. Code defines "appropriate" for theft offenses as "to take or make use without authority or right,"[5] but does not define "defraud." There is no DCCA case law interpreting intent to defraud for shoplifting. As a result, it is unclear in the current D.C. Code shoplifting statute how an intent to defraud differs from an intent to appropriate. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised shoplifting statute replaces "appropriate" with "to take or make use" from the current D.C. Code definition of that term and requires "with intent to take or make use of the property without complete payment." The revised statute also eliminates the intent to defraud alternative. "Defraud" is a common law term with an unclear meaning. In the context of shoplifting, it is unclear what the use of "defraud" would criminalize that is not already covered by conduct undertaken "with intent to take or make use of the property without complete payment." This change in the revised shoplifting statute clarifies the offense.

Second, the revised shoplifting statute deletes from the qualified immunity provision in paragraph (d)(1) the requirement that the offense be "committed in that person's presence." The qualified immunity provision in the current D.C. Code shoplifting statute requires that the "person detaining or causing the arrest had, at the time thereof, probable cause to believe that the person detained or arrested had committed in that person's presence, an offense described in this section."[6] There is no case law interpreting the scope of "committed in that person's presence," and it is unclear if it includes the use of technology such as surveillance equipment and anti-theft devices to identify an alleged shoplifter. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised qualified immunity provision deletes the requirement "committed in that person's presence" and relies on the probable cause requirement to ensure that that detention or ensuing arrest is reasonable. This revision clarifies the provision and fills a potential gap in current District law.

Third, the revised shoplifting statute replaces "within a reasonable time" with "as soon as practicable" in paragraph (d)(3) and paragraph (d)(4) of the qualified immunity provision. The qualified immunity provision in the current D.C. Code shoplifting statute requires that "[l]aw enforcement authorities were notified within a reasonable time"[7] and "[t]he person detained or arrested was released within a reasonable time of the detention or arrest, or was surrendered to law enforcement authorities within a reasonable time."[8] The scope of "within a reasonable time" is unclear and there is no DCCA case law on point. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised qualified immunity provision requires "as soon as practicable. This revision improves the clarity of the revised statute.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, paragraph (a)(1) of the revised shoplifting offense applies a culpable mental state of "knowingly" to each type of proscribed conduct in sub paragraph (a)(1)(A), sub paragraph (a)(1)(B), and subparagraph (a)(1)(C) and to whether the property is "displayed or offered for sale" (subparagraph (a)(2)(A)) or "held or stored on the premises in reasonably close proximity to the customer sales area for future display or sale" (subparagraph (a)(2)(B)). The current D.C. Code shoplifting statute[9] requires, in part, a "knowingly" culpable mental state,[10] but it is unclear to which elements the culpable mental state applies. However, it would be difficult for a defendant to satisfy either of the "with intent to" requirements in the current D.C. Code statute without knowing that it was the personal property of another that is offered for sale. The requirement of a "knowingly" culpable mental state for paragraphs (a)(1) and (a)(2) is not intended to change existing law on shoplifting.

[10] D.C. Code § 22-3213(a) ("A person commits the offense of shoplifting if, with intent to appropriate without complete payment any personal property of another that is offered for sale or with intent to defraud the owner of the value of the property, that person: (1) Knowingly conceals or takes possession of any such property; (2) Knowingly removes or alters the price tag, serial number, or other identification mark that is imprinted on or attached to such property; or (3) Knowingly transfers any such property from the container in which it is displayed or packaged to any other display container or sales package.").

Second, in subparagraph (a)(1)(B), "transfers" has been added so that the subsection prohibits conduct which "removes, alters, or transfers" price tags or other specified marks. The current D.C. Code shoplifting statute is limited to "removes or alters" price tags or other specified marks. There is no case law interpreting the scope of this language. Transferring a price tag is accomplished by removing or altering the price tag, an action already covered in the current statute. Adding "transfers" to the statute merely clarifies the scope of the revised shoplifting offense in a common situation.

Third, the revised shoplifting statute clarifies the type of property at issue by requiring either that the property is "displayed or offered for sale" (subparagraph (a)(2)(A)) or "held or stored on the premises in reasonably close proximity to the customer sales area for future display or sale" (subparagraph (a)(2)(B)). The current D.C. Code shoplifting statute requires that the property be "offered for sale."[11] However, in Harris v. United States, the DCCA held that the current shoplifting statute extended "at least to merchandise held . . . in reasonably close proximity to the customer area and intended for prompt availability to customers when and as needed."[12] The addition of "displayed or offered for sale" (subparagraph (a)(2)(A)) and "held or stored on the premises in reasonably close proximity to the customer sales area for future display or sale" (subparagraph (a)(2)(B)) codifies Harris as to the scope of "offered for sale" in the current shoplifting statute and is not intended to change District law on shoplifting. Under the revised element in paragraph (a)(2), the property should be in "reasonably close proximity" to the customer area and readily available to customers as needed. Merchandise on a truck in a loading dock, for example, would not fall within the scope of the revised offense.

Lastly, there are two minor changes to the language in the qualified immunity provision in subsection (d). The current qualified immunity subsection refers to "A person who offers tangible personal property for sale to the public."[13] The term "offers" is not defined in the statute and there is no case law on point. The revised subsection (d) expands "offers" to "displays, holds, stores, or offers for sale" in order to match the scope of the revised elements in subparagraph (a)(2). Similarly, the revised shoplifting statute no longer refers to "tangible personal property." Instead, it refers to "personal property" as specified in subsection (a)(2) so that the qualified immunity provision matches the element.

RCC § 22E-2105. Unlawful Creation or Possession of a Recording.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the unlawful creation or possession of a recording (UCPR) offense and penalty gradations for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The revised offense proscribes making, obtaining, or possessing a sound recording that is a copy of an original sound recording fixed before February 15, 1972, or a sound recording or audiovisual recording of a live performance, without the effective consent of an owner and with intent to derive commercial gain or advantage. The revised offense is structured to avoid criminalizing conduct that is preempted by federal legislation protecting copyright. The revised offense is graded based on the number of recordings that the defendant made, obtained, or possessed. The revised UCPR offense replaces the commercial piracy statute[1] in the current D.C. Code.

Paragraph (a)(1) specifies the prohibited conduct for first degree UCPR—making, obtaining, or possessing an item. Paragraph (a)(1) also specifies the culpable mental state for paragraph (a)(1) to be "knowingly," a term defined at RCC § 22E-206 that here requires the accused be aware to a practical certainty that the actor is making, obtaining, or possessing an item.

Subparagraph (a)(1)(A) and subparagraph (a)(1)(B) state that the accused must make, obtain, or possess either a sound recording that is a copy of an original sound recording that was fixed prior to February 15, 1972, or a sound recording or audiovisual recording of a live performance. "Sound recording," "audiovisual recording," and "live performance" are defined terms in RCC § 22E-701. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" culpable mental state in paragraph (a)(1) also applies to the elements in subparagraph (a)(1)(A) and subparagraph (a)(1)(B), here requiring the accused to be aware to a practical certainty that the item is the specified kind of audiovisual or sound recording.

Paragraph (a)(2) states that the prohibited conduct must be done "without the effective consent of an owner." The term "consent," as defined in RCC § 22E-701, requires some indication of agreement given by a person generally competent to do so. "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception." Lack of effective consent means there was no consent, or the consent was obtained by means of physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception. "Owner" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 to mean a person holding an interest in property that the accused is not privileged to interfere with. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" mental state in paragraph (a)(1) also applies to paragraph (a)(2), and here requires the accused to be aware to a practical certainty that he or she lacks effective consent of an owner.

Paragraph (a)(3) requires proof of "with intent to" sell, rent, or otherwise use the recording for commercial gain or advantage. "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the defendant was practically certain that he or she would sell, rent, or otherwise use the recording for commercial gain or advantage. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that such a use actually occurred, only that the defendant believed to a practical certainty that such a use would result.

Paragraph (a)(4) requires that "in fact," the number of recordings made, obtained, or possessed was 100 or more for first degree UCPR. "In fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement for the fact the number of recordings made, obtained, or possessed was 100 or more.

Subsection (b) specifies the requirements for second degree UCPR. The requirements in paragraph (b)(1), subparagraphs (b)(1)(A) and (b)(1)(B), paragraph (b)(2), and paragraph (b)(3) are identical to those in paragraph (a)(1), subparagraphs (a)(1)(A) and (a)(1)(B), paragraph (a)(2), and paragraph (a)(3) for first degree unlawful creation or possession of a recording. Paragraph (b)(4) requires that, "in fact," "any number" of recordings were made obtained, or possessed for second degree UCPR. "In fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement for the fact that "any number" of recordings were made, obtained, or possessed.

Subsection (c) contains two exclusions from liability under the revised UCPR statute. Under the exclusion in paragraph (c)(1), the actor does not commit an offense under this section when the actor copies or reproduces a sound recording or audiovisual recording in the manner specifically permitted by Title 17 of the United States Code. Under the exclusion in paragraph (c)(2), the actor does not commit an offense under this section if the actor copies or reproduces a sound recording that is made by a licensed radio or television station or a cable broadcaster solely for broadcast or archival use. Subsection (c) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element. Per the rule of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207 applies to the elements in paragraphs (c)(1) and (c)(2) and there is no required mental state for these elements.

Subsection (d) specifies relevant penalties for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (e) provides judicial discretion to order the forfeiture and destruction or other disposition of all sound recordings, audiovisual recordings, and equipment used, or attempted to be used, in violation of this section.

Subsection (f) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised UCPR offense clearly changes current District law in six main ways.

First, the revised UCPR offense no longer includes proprietary information within its scope. The current D.C. Code commercial piracy statute concerns not only sound recordings, but "proprietary information" which is broadly defined to include "any [] information, the primary commercial value of which may diminish if its availability is not restricted."[2] In contrast, the revised UCPR offense eliminates the current statute's definition of "proprietary information" as well as references to "proprietary information" in the offense elements. This revision improves the clarity of the revised UCPR offense and reduces unnecessary overlap that currently exists between commercial piracy, theft, and other property offenses in the D.C. Code.[3]

[2] D.C. Code § 22-3214(a)(2) ("'Proprietary information' means customer lists, mailing lists, formulas, recipes, computer programs, unfinished designs, unfinished works of art in any medium, process, program, invention, or any other information, the primary commercial value of which may diminish if its availability is not restricted.").

Second, the revised UCPR offense applies a "knowingly" mental state to the element that the defendant acted "without the effective consent of an owner." The current commercial piracy statute requires "knowing or having reason to believe" for the "without the consent of the owner" element. There is no case law interpreting "having reason to believe" in the current commercial piracy statute, however legislative history suggests that it may be intended to be a lesser culpable mental state than "knowingly."[4] In contrast, the revised UCPR offense applies a "knowingly" culpable mental state to the element that the defendant acted "without the effective consent of an owner." Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[5] Requiring a knowing culpable mental state also makes the revised UCPR offense consistent with the revised theft statute and other property offenses, which generally require that the defendant act knowingly with respect to the elements of the offense.[6] This revision improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute.

Third, the revised UCPR offense increases the number and type of grades of the offense. The current commercial piracy offense is a misdemeanor, regardless of the number of recordings the defendant at issue.[7] In contrast, the revised UCPR statute has two gradations, depending on the number of recordings the defendant makes, obtains, or possesses. This revision improves the proportionality of the offense and creates consistency with the gradations in the revised unlawful labeling of a recording statute.[8]

Fourth, subsection (f) of the revised UCPR offense permits the Superior Court for the District of Columbia to order the forfeiture and destruction or other disposition of all recordings, equipment used, or attempted to be used, in violation of this section. The current commercial piracy offense does not contain a forfeiture provision. In contrast, the [3] This overlap exists because the current definition of "property" is "anything of value," D.C. Code § 22-3201(3), which would appear to include intellectual property. Per this broad definition of "property," the current theft, taking property without right, and other property offenses create liability for taking proprietary information, independent of the inclusion of "proprietary information" in the current commercial piracy statute. Since the RCC retains the broad definition of "property" as "anything of value" (RCC § 22E-701), multiple property offenses will continue to cover takings of proprietary information without effective consent or consent.

It should also be noted that federal law makes theft or misappropriation of trade secrets a federal offense, but allows for state action. U.S. Economic Espionage Act of 1996, effective January 1, 1997.

[4] The legislative history suggests that a mistake as to whether or not a person has permission must be reasonable. Chairperson Clarke of the Judiciary Committee, Extension of Comments on Bill No. 4-193: The District of Columbia Theft and White Collar Crimes Act of 1982 (July 20, 1982) (hereinafter Extension of Comments on Bill No. 4-193) at 28.

revised statute allows judges to order forfeiture in order to destroy illegal copies and potentially deter large-scale prohibited copying. The current[9] and revised[10] unlawful labeling of a recording statute and several other offenses[11] under current District law contain similar forfeiture provisions. This revision improves the consistency and proportionality of the offense.

Fifth, the provision in RCC § 22E-2001, "Aggregation of Property Value to Determine Property Offense Grades," allows aggregation of the number of recordings based on a single scheme or systematic course of conduct to determine the gradation of the revised UCPR offense. The current commercial piracy offense is not part of the current aggregation of value provision for property offenses.[12] This revision improves the proportionality of the revised statute.

Sixth, the revised UCPR offense eliminates any statutory presumption of intent. The current commercial piracy statute states that, "A presumption of the requisite intent arises if the accused possesses 5 or more unauthorized phonorecords either of the same sound recording or recording of a live performance."[13] The legislative history does not clearly state whether the presumption is mandatory or permissive, although some language suggests a mandatory presumption.[14] There is no case law on point. In contrast, the revised UCPR statute eliminates the presumption because it may run afoul of District and Supreme Court case law requiring that even permissive (non-mandatory) inferences be "more likely than not to flow from the proved fact"[15] of possession of 5 or more copies of a recording. While possession of a large number of copies of a recording appears more likely than not to indicate an intent to distribute the copies, the number of recordings alone indicates nothing regarding the purpose of distribution. Without other evidence, such possession also is consistent with a desire to gift or share for purposes other than commercial gain or advantage. This revision improves the proportionality, and perhaps the constitutionality, of the revised statute.

Beyond these six changes to current District law, four other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes of law.

[15] Statutes, or parts of statutes, authorizing the inference of one fact from the proof of another in criminal cases "must be regarded as 'irrational' or 'arbitrary,' and hence unconstitutional, unless it can at least be said with substantial assurance that the presumed fact is more likely than not to flow from the proved fact on which it is made to depend." Reid v. United States, 466 A.2d 433, 435 (D.C. 1983) (citing Leary v. United States, 395 U.S. 6, 36, 89 S.Ct. 1532, 1548, 23 L.Ed.2d 57 (1969)).

First, the revised UCPR offense explicitly applies to audiovisual recordings for live performances. The current commercial piracy statute, through its definition of "phonorecords,"[16] excludes sound recordings of audiovisual works. However, the current commercial piracy statute separately criminalizes obtaining a copy of "proprietary information"[17] without consent, which may cover illicit audiovisual recordings. State protection of live musical performances is not limited by federal copyright law[18] and the current deceptive labeling statute[19] and the revised deceptive labeling statute[20] extend to audiovisual recordings. RCC § 22E-701 defines "live performance" as a "play, dance, or other visual presentation or exhibition for an audience, including an audience of one person." Including audiovisual recordings for live performances in the revised UCPR statute potentially fills a gap in existing law or, to the extent there is liability in current law, improves the clarity and consistency of the offense.[21]

Second, the revised statute requires a culpable mental state of "knowingly" as to the elements "makes, obtains, or possesses" and to the requirements for the unlawful sound recording (subparagraphs (a)(1)(A), (a)(1)(B), (b)(1)(A), and (b)(1)(B)). No mental state is provided in the current statute regarding these elements, and there is no clear case law on point. Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[22] Requiring a knowing culpable mental state also makes the revised UCPR offense consistent with the revised theft statute and other property offenses, which generally require that the defendant act knowingly with respect to the elements of the offense.[23] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Third, the revised UCPR offense uses a new definition of "owner," the same definition consistently applied to other RCC property offenses.[24] The current D.C. Code [21] It should be noted that nothing about expanding the unlawful creation or possession of a recording statute to included audiovisual recordings of live performances changes the offense's limited protection of sound recordings. As under the current commercial piracy statute, D.C. Code § 22-3214(e), the unlawful creation or possession of a recording statute is limited to sound recordings fixed prior to February 15, 1972. This limitation exists to avoid preemption by federal copyright law. 17 U.S.C. § 301(c).

[22] See Elonis v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2001, 2009 (2015) ("[O]ur cases have explained that a defendant generally must 'know the facts that make his conduct fit the definition of the offense,' even if he does not know that those facts give rise to a crime. (Internal citation omitted)").

[24] RCC § 22E-701 ("'Owner' means a person holding an interest in property with which the actor is not privileged to interfere without consent.").

commercial piracy offense's definition of "owner"[25] is very specific, referring either to the person who owns the original fixation, the exclusive licensee with reproduction and distribution rights, or in the case of a live performance, the performer. No case law exists construing this definition. However, the definition's rigid categories may lead to unintuitive outcomes in some fact patterns.[26] The revised UCPR statute is intended to more broadly identify the relevant person whose consent must be obtained. Ordinarily, it is expected that the parties specified under the current statute would be the relevant owners, but the revised definition provides flexibility where property rights are not arranged in the manner anticipated by the current statute. The revised UCPR is intended to reduce potential gaps in the offense and improve the consistency of definitions across property offenses.

Fourth, the revised UCPR offense, by use of the phrase "in fact," codifies that no culpable mental state is required as to the number of recordings made, obtained, or possessed. The current statute is silent as to what culpable mental state applies to these circumstances. There is no District case law on what mental state, if any, applies to the current gradations based on the number of recordings. Applying no culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that do not distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is an accepted practice in American jurisprudence.[27] Clarifying that the number of unlawful recordings is a matter of strict liability in the revised UCPR gradations clarifies District law.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, the revised UCPR statute requires that the defendant "makes, obtains, or possesses." This language, particularly "possesses," is intended to include all the conduct prohibited by "reproduces or otherwise copies, possesses, buys or otherwise obtains" in the current commercial piracy statute. "Possesses" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and discussed further in the commentary to that statute.

Second, the revised UCPR statute requires that the defendant act without the "effective consent of an owner." The current commercial piracy statute simply requires that the defendant act "without the consent of the owner."[28] There is no legislative history or District case law discussing the scope of "consent" in the current commercial piracy

> (1) "Owner", with respect to phonorecords or copies, means the person who owns the original fixation of the property involved or the exclusive licensee in the United States of the rights to reproduce and distribute to the public phonorecords or copies of the original fixation. In the case of a live performance the term "owner" means the performer or performers.

[26] E.g., a person who has reproduction but not distribution rights (the current statute refers to a licensee with rights to "reproduce and distribute"), or a person who by contractual agreement with someone other than the performer has the rights to reproduce recordings of a live performance, may not be considered an "owner" under the current definition.

statute, or how the statute operates when there is more than one owner. The revised statute uses standardized definitions, discussed more fully in RCC § 22E-701, that exclude UCPR liability where consent is improperly gained and extend UCPR liability for unlawful conduct with respect to any owner where there are several. Using "effective consent" and "an owner" in the revised UCPR statute ensures that the specialized type of property at issue in the statute has the same protection afforded other property in theft and theft-related offenses in Chapter 21 of the RCC. The change in language improves the clarity and consistency of definitions throughout property offenses.

Third, the revised UCPR statute requires that the actor's conduct be "with intent to sell, rent, or otherwise use the sound recording for commercial gain or advantage." By contrast, the wording in the current commercial piracy statute is "with the intent to sell, to derive commercial gain or advantage, or to allow another person to derive commercial gain or advantage." The revised UCPR statute's addition of "rent" clarifies a common way of gaining commercial advantage. Deletion of the current statute's intent "to allow another person to derive commercial gain or advantage" prong reflects the fact that ordinary aiding and abetting or conspiracy liability applies to the offense. Consistent with prior legislative history,[29] the revised UCPR statute's language "sell, rent, or otherwise use the recording for commercial gain or advantage" is to be broadly construed.

[29] Extension of Comments on Bill No. 4-193 at 29 ("The phrase 'derive commercial gain or advantage' is intended to encompass any transaction where the person reproducing or possessing the unauthorized phonorecord or copy of proprietary information surrenders ownership and control over it for consideration or any related form of compensation. RCC § 22E-2106. Unlawful Operation of a Recording Device in a Movie Theater.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the unlawful operation of a recording device in a movie theater offense (revised unlawful recording offense) and penalty gradations for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The revised offense proscribes operating a recording device within a movie theater without the effective consent of an owner and with the intent to record a motion picture, or any part of it. The revised offense has a single penalty gradation. The revised unlawful recording offense replaces the unlawful operation of a recording device in a motion picture theater statute[1] in the current D.C. Code.

Paragraph (a)(1) specifies the prohibited conduct—operating a recording device within a movie theater. "Recording device" and "movie theater" are defined terms in RCC § 22E-701. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that the culpable mental state for this conduct is "knowingly." Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" culpable mental state in paragraph (a)(1) applies to all the elements in paragraph (a)(1). "Knowingly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the accused must be practically certain this his or her conduct will operate a recording device within a movie theater.

Paragraph (a)(2) states that the proscribed conduct must be done "without the effective consent of an owner." The term "consent," as defined in RCC § 22E-701, requires some indication (by word or action) of agreement given by a person generally competent to do so. "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception." Lack of effective consent means there was no agreement, or the agreement was induced by means of physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception. "Owner" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means a person holding an interest in property with which the accused is not privileged to interfere without consent. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" mental state in paragraph (a)(1) also applies to paragraph (a)(2), and here requires that the accused be practically certain that he or she lacks effective consent of an owner of the movie theater.

Paragraph (a)(3) requires "with the intent" to record a motion picture, or any part of it. "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the defendant was practically certain that he or she would record a motion picture, or any part of it. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that a motion picture, or any part of it, was actually recorded, only that the defendant believed to a practical certainty that a motion picture, or any part of it, would be recorded.

Subsection (b) specifies the penalty for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (c) provides qualified immunity to specified individuals for detention, false imprisonment, malicious prosecution, defamation, and false arrest in any proceedings arising from the detention or arrest of a person suspected of unlawfully operating a recording device within a movie theater. The subsection lists requirements for the detention or arrest that must be met for the immunity to apply. Subsection (c) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element. Per the rule of construction in RCC § 22E-207, "in fact" applies to all the requirements that follow in paragraphs (c)(1) through (c)(4), and there is no culpable mental state for these requirements.

Subsection (d) provides judicial discretion to order the forfeiture and destruction or other disposition of any recordings that might be produced in violation of the offense and all equipment used, or attempted to be used, in violation of this section.

Subsection (e) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised unlawful operation of a recording device in a movie theater statute clearly changes current District law in two main ways.

First, the revised unlawful recording statute requires conduct be "with the intent to record a motion picture, or any part of it." The current D.C. Code unlawful recording statute does not have such an intent requirement and broadly prohibits "operat[ing] a recording device" within the premises of a motion picture theater.[2] The current statute would appear to include the use of a recording device (including a cell phone's audio, photo, or video recording features) in a movie theater, even if someone or something other[3] than the motion picture being exhibited is recorded. In contrast, the revised unlawful recording statute requires that the defendant have the intent to record a motion picture, or any part of it. This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised statute.

Second, subsection (d) of the revised unlawful recording statute permits the court to order the forfeiture and destruction or other disposition of any recordings and all equipment used, or attempted to be used, in violation of this section. The current D.C. Code unlawful recording offense does not contain a forfeiture provision. In contrast, the revised unlawful recording statute allows judges to order forfeiture in order to destroy illegal copies and potentially deter large-scale prohibited copying. The current D.C. Code[4] and revised[5] unlawful labeling of a recording statutes and several other offenses[6] under current District law contain similar forfeiture provisions. This revision improves the consistency and proportionality of the offense.

Beyond these two changes to current District law, eight other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised unlawful recording statute requires that the defendant operate the recording device "within a movie theater." The current D.C. Code unlawful recording statute requires that the defendant operate a recording device "within the premises of a motion picture theater."[7] It is unclear if "within the premises" is meant to include areas of a motion picture theater where a motion picture is not being exhibited—for example, a

[2] D.C. Code § 22-3214.02(b).
[3] For example, taking a photo or video chatting with someone while within a movie theater waiting for a movie to start would appear to satisfy the plain language of the current offense.
[4] D.C. Code § 22-3214.01(e) ("Upon conviction under this section, the court shall, in addition to the penalties provided by this section, order the forfeiture and destruction or other disposition of all sound recordings, audiovisual works, and equipment used, or attempted to be used, in violation of this section.").
[5] RCC § 22E-2207.

lobby or a restroom of a motion picture theater. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised unlawful recording statute requires that the defendant operate the recording device within a movie theater. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Second, through the revised definition of "movie theater" in RCC § 22E-701, the revised unlawful recording statute includes venues they may not qualify as a "theater" or "other auditorium" under the current definition. The current D.C. Code definition of "motion picture theater" is limited to a "theater or other auditorium in which a motion picture is exhibited."[8] It is unclear whether this definition extends to other venues where a movie may be exhibited, such as a drive-in theater or a concert hall. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised definition of "movie theater" in RCC § 22E-701 includes "other venue[s]" that are "being utilized primarily for the exhibition of a motion picture to the public." This change improves the clarity and completeness of the revised statute.

Third, through the revised definition of "movie theater" in RCC § 22E-701, the revised unlawful recording statute excludes the use of a recording device in venues where a motion picture is exhibited, but such an exhibition is not the primary purpose of the venue. The current D.C. Code definition of "motion picture theater" is limited to a "theater or other auditorium in which a motion picture is exhibited."[9] Due to this definition, it is unclear whether the current D.C. Code unlawful recording statute extends to the operation of a recording device in venues where a motion picture may be exhibited, incidental to the primary purpose of the venue—such as a salesperson at an electronics store who records portions of a movie being shown to demonstrate the capabilities of a widescreen television. The revised definition of "movie theater," and, by extension, the revised unlawful recording offense, require that the primary purpose of the venue is to exhibit a motion picture to the public. This change is consistent with the legislative history of the current unlawful recording statute[10] and a comparable federal offense.[11] This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised offense.

Fourth, through the revised definition of "movie theater" in RCC § 22E-701, the revised unlawful recording statute excludes the use of a recording device in venues where a motion picture is being exhibited, but the exhibition is not open to the public. The current D.C. Code definition of "motion picture theater" is limited to a "theater or other auditorium

[10] The legislative history for the current unlawful recording statute indicates that the statute was part of an effort to combat "film and video piracy" on a "local level." Committee on the Judiciary, Report on Bill 11-125, The "Commercial Piracy and Deceptive Labeling Amendment Act of 1995," (April 19, 1995) at 1, 2.
[11] A substantively similar federal offense exists in 18 U.S.C. § 2319B, enacted after the District's current statute. The legislative history for the federal statute notes that "the bill is not intended to permit a prosecution of . . . a salesperson at a store who uses a camcorder to record portions of a movie playing to demonstrate the capabilities of a widescreen television" or "a university student who records a short segment of a film being show in film class." Family Entertainment and Copyright Act of 2005, House Committee on the Judiciary, H. Rpt. 109-33 Part I, April 12, 2005, Cong. Session 109-1, at 3. In these instances, the venue is not being used "primarily" to exhibit a motion picture. Id. The legislative history for the federal statute notes that it "deals with the very specific problem of illicit 'camcording' of motion pictures in motion picture exhibition facilities. Typically, an offender attends a pre-opening 'screening' or a first-weekend theatric release, and uses sophisticated digital equipment to record the movie. A camcorded version is then sold to a local production factory or to an overseas producer where it is converted into DVDs or similar products and sold on the street for a few dollars per copy." Id. at 2.

in which a motion picture is exhibited."[12] Due to this definition, it is unclear whether the current D.C. Code unlawful recording statute extends to the operation of a recording device in venues where a motion picture may be exhibited, but the exhibition is not open to the public—such as a person who records movies off the television screen in his or her home. The revised definition of "movie theater," and, by extension, the revised unlawful recording offense, require that the primary purpose of the venue is to exhibit a motion picture to the public. This change is consistent with the legislative history of the current unlawful recording statute[13] and a comparable federal offense.[14] This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised offense.

Fifth, the revised unlawful recording statute requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state for "operating a recording device in a movie theater." The current unlawful recording statute does not have a mental state for these elements, and there is no case law on point. The current D.C. Code statute would appear to criminalize a person with a recording device that is "on" even if the person does not know the device is "on." Resolving this ambiguity, the revised unlawful recording statute requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state for "operating a recording device in a movie theater." Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[15] Requiring a knowing culpable mental state also makes the revised unlawful recording offense consistent with the revised theft statute and other property offenses, which generally require that the defendant act knowingly with respect to the elements of the offense.[16] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Sixth, the revised unlawful recording statute requires that the defendant act without the "effective consent" of an owner of a movie theater and requires a "knowingly" culpable mental state for this element. The current D.C. Code unlawful recording statute requires that the defendant act "without authority or permission" of the owner.[17] There is no case law interpreting the meaning of "without authority or permission" in the current statute. The revised unlawful recording statute instead requires that the defendant lack the "effective consent" of an owner. "Effective consent" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and is consistently used in the RCC property offenses. Using "effective consent" in the revised statute ensures that the specialized type of property at issue in the statute has the same protection afforded other property in theft and theft-related offenses in Chapter 21 of the RCC. This change improves the clarity and consistency of definitions throughout property offenses.

Seventh, the revised unlawful recording statute deletes from the qualified immunity provision in paragraph (c)(1) the requirement that the offense be "committed in that person's presence." The current qualified immunity provision requires that the owner had at the time, probable cause to believe that the person detained or arrested had committed "in [the owner's] presence, an offense described in this section."[18] There is no case law interpreting the scope of "committed in [the owner's] presence," and it is unclear if it includes the use of technology such as surveillance equipment. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised qualified immunity provision deletes the requirement "committed in [the owner's] presence" and relies on the probable cause requirement to ensure that that detention or ensuing arrest is reasonable. This revision clarifies the provision and fills a potential gap in current District law.

Eighth, the revised unlawful recording statute replaces "within a reasonable time" with "as soon as practicable" in paragraph (c)(3) and paragraph (c)(4) of the qualified immunity provision. The current qualified immunity provision requires that "[l]aw enforcement authorities were notified within a reasonable time"[19] and "[t]he person detained or arrested was released within a reasonable time of the detention or arrest, or was surrendered to law enforcement authorities within a reasonable time."[20] The scope of "within a reasonable time" is unclear and there is no DCCA case law on point. Instead of this ambiguity, the revised qualified immunity provision requires "as soon as practicable." This revision improves the clarity of the revised statute.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, the revised unlawful recording statute uses the definition of "owner" in RCC § 22E-701, the same definition that is consistently applied to other RCC property offenses. The current recording statute does not define the term "owner"[21] and there is no DCCA case law on the issue. "Owner" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 as a person holding an interest in property with which the actor is not privileged to interfere without consent. The definition establishes that there may be multiple owners of property, in this case, a movie theater. This change clarifies the revised statute.

Second, the revised unlawful recording statute deletes the reference to "or his or her agent" in the offense definition.[22] The RCC relies on civil law for determining agency and it is unnecessary to specify that consent may be given by authorized persons. The definitions of "effective consent" and "owner" are discussed in the commentary to RCC § 22E-701. This change improves the clarity of the revised statute.

RCC § 22E-2201. Fraud.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the fraud offense and penalty gradations for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The offense criminalizes a broad range of conduct in which a person obtains property of another by means of deception. The penalty gradations are based on the value of the property involved in the crime. The revised fraud offense is closely related to the revised theft and extortion offenses.[1] It differs from theft because theft requires the lack of the owner's consent to take, obtain, transfer or exercise control over the property. It differs from extortion because extortion requires obtaining the owner's consent by use of a coercive threat, instead of deception. The revised fraud offense replaces both the general fraud statute[2] and, to the extent it criminalizes deceptive forms of theft, the theft statute,[3] as well as the statute specifying penalties for fraud[4] in the current D.C. Code.

Subsection (a) specifies the elements of first degree fraud. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies alternative elements that a person must engage in—conduct that takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over property of another.[5] "Property," is a term defined in RCC § 22E-701, means something of value which includes goods, services, and cash. Further, the property must be "property of another," a term defined in RCC § 22E-701, which means that some other person has a legal interest in the property at issue that the accused cannot infringe upon without consent. Paragraph (a)(1) also specifies a culpable mental state of knowledge, a term defined in RCC § 22E-206 which here requires that the accused must be aware to a practical certainty that he or she would take, obtain, transfer, or exercise control over property of another.

Paragraph (a)(2) states that the proscribed conduct must be done with "consent" of an owner. The term consent requires some words or actions that indicate an owner's agreement to allow the accused to take, obtain, transfer, or exercise control over the property. "Owner" is also defined to mean a person holding an interest in property that the accused is not privileged to interfere with without consent.[6] Per the rule of interpretation in 22E-207, the "knowingly" mental state in paragraph (a)(1) also applies to the element "with the consent of an owner" in paragraph (a)(2), which requires that the accused was practically certain that he or she had an owner's consent.

Paragraph (a)(2) also codifies the element that distinguishes fraud from the revised theft and extortion offenses—that the consent of an owner be obtained by deception, a term defined in RCC § 22E-701. Deception includes a variety of ways of creating or reinforcing false impressions as to material information. Per the rule of interpretation in 22E-207, the [3] Id. Conduct in the current theft statute that constitutes "obtaining property by trick, false pretense [] or deception" is replaced by the revised fraud offense.

[4] D.C. Code §22-3222.
[5] This conduct includes "causing" the taking, obtaining, transfer, etc. of property by indirect means, that meets the RCC § 22E-204 provisions regarding causation.
[6] The determination of who an owner is depends on civil law, including agency law regarding which persons are authorized to act on behalf of another. Thus, for example, a store employee who is authorized to sell merchandise may be an "owner" for purposes of the statute although the merchandise is in fact owned by the store company itself.

"knowingly" mental state in paragraph (a)(1) also applies to the element, which here requires that the accused was practically certain that the misimpression was actually false. In addition, fraud requires reliance; the deception must have caused the owner to provide consent, and the accused must have known that the deception caused the owner to provide consent. If the deception does not cause the owner to provide consent, there is no fraud.[7]

Paragraph (a)(3) requires that the defendant act "with intent to" deprive an owner of property. "Deprive" is a defined term meaning that the other person is unlikely to recover the property, or that it will be withheld permanently or long enough to lose a substantial portion of its value or benefit. "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the defendant was practically certain that he or she would "deprive" the other person of the property. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that such a deprivation actually occurred, only that the defendant believed to a practical certainty that a deprivation would result.

Paragraph (a)(4) requires that the property other than labor or services was, in fact, valued at $500,000 or more; or that the property, in fact, was more than 2080 hours of labor or services. When fraud involves taking labor or services, the market value of the labor or services is not used to determine the property penalty grade. "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, and indicates that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to the value of the property, or the number of hours of labor or services.

Subsections (b)-(e) specify the elements for second, third, fourth, and fifth degree fraud. The elements of each grade of fraud are identical to the elements of first degree fraud, except for the value of the property. Each subsection specifies a minimum required property value or number of hours of labor or services, except for fifth degree fraud, which has no specific minimum value.[8] As with first degree fraud, strict liability applies to value of the property other than labor or services, or the hours of labor or services in each grade of fraud.

Subsection (f) specifies penalties for each grade of the fraud offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (g) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised fraud statute changes current District law in five main ways.

First, the revised fraud statute requires that the accused "takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over" the property of another. The current D.C. Code fraud statute requires proof that the accused "obtains property of another or causes another to lose property"[9] and the current theft statute refers to "obtaining property by trick, false pretense,

[7] For example, if a person sells a watch falsely claiming that the watch is made of gold, but the buyer did not care at all what the watch was made of, and would have purchased it regardless, the seller has not committed fraud.

[8] However, as defined in RCC § 22E-701, "property" means "anything of value" and includes services. Therefore, although fifth degree fraud does not specify any minimum value or number of hours of labor or services, as defined in the RCC, the "property" (including labor or services) must have some value.

[9] D.C. Code § 22-3221.

false token . . . or deception[.]"[10] These terms are not statutorily defined, and there is no relevant D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) case law. In contrast, the revised statute lists conduct that is consistent with the revised theft and extortion offenses. The revised statute is broader insofar as the accused is liable for many actions besides actually gaining the property himself, the typical meaning of "obtain."[11] The phrase "takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over" is identical to language in the revised theft statute, which is to be construed broadly to include any unauthorized use or disposition of property.[12] Less clear is whether the revised statute's various alternate elements cover all the possibilities covered by the current "causes another to lose property." For instance, the revised statute would reach conduct that causes the transfer of the victim's property (and otherwise satisfies the elements of the offense), whether or not the transfer is to the accused or received by the accused.[13] The breadth of the new language in practice may cover all or nearly all fact patterns covered under the prior "causes another to lose" language. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Second, the revised offense defines and punishes attempted fraud consistent with attempt liability and penalties in other revised offenses. The current D.C. Code first degree fraud statute requires that the accused either obtains property or causes another to lose property, but second degree fraud, identical in every other element, requires neither.[14] In other words, second degree fraud in the current D.C. Code is akin to an attempt to commit first degree fraud. In contrast, under the revised fraud statute, if a person fails to obtain property, that person cannot be convicted of the completed offense but still may be convicted of an attempt under the RCC general attempt statute.[15] The elimination of the inchoate version of fraud does not decriminalize any behavior. Rather the change makes the revised fraud offense consistent with other property offenses in how attempt liability affects the scope and punishment for the offense. This change improves the completeness, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Third, the revised offense provides liability for a single fraudulent act. The current D.C. Code statute refers to a "scheme or systematic course of conduct,"[16] but does not define these terms. Construing this language, the D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) has held that a scheme or systematic course of conduct requires "at least two acts calculated to deceive, cheat or falsely obtain property."[17] There is no case law as to what minimal conduct would satisfy the current "two acts" requirement. In contrast, the revised fraud statute does not require proof of two or more acts constituting a scheme or systematic course of conduct. The practical effect of this change is unclear given the possibility that the two acts referred to in the current statute might be robustly construed to require what [11] https://www.merriam-webster.com/dictionary/obtain.

[12] As described in the commentary to the revised theft statute, language such as "unauthorized use" or "disposition" were not used in the current theft statute as duplicative and unnecessary, not to substantively change the broad scope of the offense.
[13] For example, a door-to-door salesman who uses deception to induce a customer to purchase items from the company the salesman works for not only has caused a loss to the homeowner, but has knowingly engaged in conduct that causes the transfer of funds from the homeowner to the company.

would amount to two separate instances of theft by deception,[18] or could be minimally construed so as to constitute separate acts only in the most technical sense.[19] In either case, because the revised fraud statute is replacing theft by deception, the revised offense preserves the theft offense's requirement that only one act is sufficient to establish liability for fraud. This is not to say that each act that satisfies the requirements for fraud liability, however slight in distinction, must be charged separately, but they may be so charged if the harms are distinct.[20] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Fourth, the revised fraud statute increases the number and type of gradations based on the value of the property or number of hours of labor or services lost. The current D.C. Code fraud offense is divided into two grades, with first degree fraud requiring that the accused actually obtained property or caused another to lose property.[21] Each grade of fraud is then divided into felony and misdemeanor versions. Felony first degree fraud requires that the accused obtained property, or caused another to lose property, valued at $1,000 or more. Felony second degree fraud requires that the object of the fraud is $1,000 or more, and there is no requirement that the accused actually obtained the property, or caused anyone to lose property. Misdemeanor versions of first and second degree fraud require that the property gained, property lost, or the object of fraud had any value, and have identical maximum allowable sentences.[22] In contrast, the revised fraud offense has a total of five gradations which span a much greater range in value or loss of labor or services, with a value of $250,000 or more, or 2080 hours of labor, required for the most

---

[18] Notably, in Warner v. United States, 124 A.3d 79, 86 (D.C. 2015) the DCCA held that "one cannot commit second degree fraud without also committing attempted second degree theft by deception." The implication is that every fraud charge could, in the alternative, be charged as theft by deception. Lending support to this notion that fraud may be viewed as two instances of theft by deception, the legislative history of the current fraud statute states that, "[t]he gravamen of the offense of fraud which distinguishes it from theft, is that fraud involves a scheme or systematic course of conduct to defraud or obtain property of another." Committee Report to the Theft and White Collar Crime Act of 1982 at 40.

[19] Under a longstanding fork-in-the-road test, a defendant's momentary, entirely subjective consideration of another matter may be sufficient to break the defendant's conduct into two acts, cognizable as fraud. For example, a defendant convincing a victim to purchase unneeded home repair services (based on defendant's lie about the condition of the home) who pauses momentarily to mention the hot weather before resuming the conversation may be deemed to have engaged in a fresh, second act by continuing the conversation, thereby incurring liability for a "scheme."

[20] The holding in Youssef v. United States, to the extent it relied on the requirement of a scheme to determine the relevant unit of prosecution, is no longer compelled under the revised fraud statute. In Youssef, the defendant deposited several checks into his Chevy Chase bank account at several locations throughout the city. The accounts he drew on had insufficient funds to cover the checks. However, before the checks cleared, Chevy Chase still allowed him to draw funds from his Chevy Chase account. The defendant ultimately made twenty-nine withdrawals from his Chevy Chase account over a one week period. This scheme was prosecuted as a single count of first degree fraud, as it constituted a single scheme or systematic course of conduct. Under the revised fraud statute, it is possible that these distinct withdrawals could be prosecuted as separate counts. However, if these incidents were prosecuted as separate counts, the Youssef holding as to a special unanimity instruction would also no longer apply. On appeal, the defendant argued that because the single count of fraud was premised on allegations of several withdrawals, the trial judge should have instructed the jury that in order to convict, it must be unanimous as to which particular fraudulent transactions it believed occurred. The DCCA rejected this argument, holding that he jury need not be unanimous as to which facts satisfy the elements of the offense. Youssef, 27 A.3d at 1207.

serious grade. In addition, by eliminating the inchoate version of fraud criminalized currently in the D.C. Code as second degree fraud, the penalty gradations for the revised offense will penalize attempted fraud more consistently under the general attempt penalty provision,[23] the same as in other offenses. The change improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

Fifth, the revised fraud statute's grades conduct that involves taking labor or services by the number of hours of labor or services taken. The current D.C. Code fraud offense is graded on the market value of property, not on the number of hours of labor or services. In contrast, the revised statute's separate calculation for the fraudulent taking of labor or services does not distinguish between the harm to persons with different hourly income levels.[24] Grading fraud based on market value risks disproportionately severe penalties in cases involving the fraudulent taking of high cost labor, and disproportionately lenient penalties in cases involving the fraudulent taking of minimum wage or near minimum wage labor. This change improves the proportionality of the revised criminal code.

Beyond these five main changes to current District law, five other aspects of the revised fraud statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised fraud offense eliminates the "intent to defraud" means of proving fraud, and therefore requires that the accused obtain property of another for liability as a completed[25] fraud offense. The current D.C. Code fraud statute criminalizes engaging in a scheme "with intent to defraud or to obtain property of another[.]"[26] The use of the word "or" suggests that "intent to defraud" could include conduct other than obtaining property by deception. However, neither District statutory nor case law provides a definition of "defraud" and the DCCA has not determined whether the current fraud statute criminalizes conduct beyond obtaining property by deception.[27] Federal courts and courts in other jurisdictions have interpreted fraud statutes with "intent to defraud" elements to include conduct that arguably goes beyond the scope of the revised fraud offense.[28] However, it is unclear if these types of cases would be covered under current District law. Moreover, [24] For example, if a person defrauds a person of 10 hours of labor, this constitutes fourth degree fraud, even if the market value of the labor would be sufficient for a higher grade of fraud.

[23] RCC § 22E-301(c).

[25] Attempted fraud liability may exist, per RCC § 22E-301, where the actor does not succeed in obtaining property of another.

[26] D.C. Code § 22-3221.

[27] But see, United States v. Lewis, 716 F.2d 16 (D.C. Cir. 1983) (affirming convictions under prior version of D.C. Code § 22-1805a for conspiracy to defraud the District of Columbia, on theory that the defendants deprived the District of Columbia of right to "faithful services").

[28] So-called "honest services frauds" do not involve deceptive taking of property, but involve a public official, executive, or other person with a fiduciary duty, depriving another person of a right to honest services. For example, if a public official awards a government contract to a bidder, in exchange for a kickback, the official would have deprived the public to its right to honest services, but did not obtain property by deception. See Skilling v. United States, 561 U.S. 358 (2010) (holding that honest services frauds are limited to kick back or bribery schemes); see generally Judge Pamela Mathy, Honest Services Fraud After Skilling, 42 St. Mary's L.J. 645, 704 (2011). Second, obtaining property by means that do not involve deception as defined under the statute would also not constitute fraud. See e.g., People v. Reynolds, 667 N.Y.S.2d 591 (Sup. Ct. 1997) (defendants convicted of fraud had engaged in a scheme in which plaintiffs' attorneys who had won personal injury judgments paid kickbacks to expedite payment of the judgments by an insurance adjustor).

some DCCA fraud case law indicates that the current fraud offense should be construed to cover only deceptive thefts.[29] To resolve these ambiguities, the revised fraud statute eliminates separate liability for "intent to defraud," focusing the statute on conduct to obtain property of another by deception. This change improves the clarity of the revised statute.

Second, by reference to the term "deception," the revised fraud statute specifies particular means of committing fraud. The current D.C. Code fraud statute generally refers to conduct that obtains property "by means of a false or fraudulent pretense, representation, or promise" in the current fraud statute. The phrase is undefined in current District statutory or case law, however there is scant District case law applying the phrase.[30] To resolve these ambiguities, the revised statute refers to a standardized statutory definition of "deception," defined under RCC § 22E-701[31] and broadly provides fraud liability to cover conduct that historically was criminalized at common law as "larceny by trick . . . , and false pretenses."[32] The revised definition of "deception" is consistent with the limited case law applying the fraud statute's requirement that conduct be "by means of a false or fraudulent pretense, representation, or promise," and is consistent with numerous other revised statutes.[33] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Third, the revised fraud statute requires that the accused act knowingly with respect to the elements in paragraphs (a)(1)-(a)(2), (b)(1)-(b)(2), (c)(1)-(c)(2), (d)(1)-(d)(2), and (e)(1)-(e)(2). The current D.C. Code fraud statute requires the conduct be committed "with intent to defraud or to obtain property of another" and explicitly references knowledge or intent in a separate provision in the fraud statute explaining liability for a false promise as to future performance.[34]

However, the fraud statute is silent as to the applicable culpable mental state requirements for other elements of the offense. The DCCA has recognized a knowledge [29] See Warner v. United States, 124 A.3d 79, 86 (D.C. 2015) holding that "one cannot commit second degree fraud without also committing attempted second degree theft by deception." Although the DCCA was not considering the outer bounds of the current fraud statute, the Warner holding implies that schemes to deprive others of honest services or to obtain property by wrongful, but not deceptive conduct, are not covered by the current fraud statute.

[30] For example Youssef v. United States, 27 A.3d 1202, 1207 (D.C. 2011) (noting that fraud requires acts "calculated to deceive, cheat, or falsely obtain property"; Cf. Bennett v. Kiggins, 377 A.2d 57, 59 (D.C. 1977) (holding that elements of common law civil fraud are "(1) a false representation (2) in reference to material fact, (3) made with knowledge of its falsity, (4) with the intent to deceive, and (5) action is taken in reliance upon the representation"); see also, Committee Report for the Theft and White Collar Crime Act of 1982 at 40 (The language 'intent to defraud' expresses the concept of an intent to deceive or cheat someone.").

[31] For a detailed description of the definition of "deception," see the commentary entry to RCC § 22E-701.

[32] Conduct previously known as larceny by trust or embezzlement remains part of theft, except insofar as such conduct operates by means of deception and is therefore part of the revised fraud statute (22E-2201).

[33] See, e.g., RCC § 22E-1401 (kidnapping, including as one form an interference with another's freedom of movement by deception, under specified circumstances) and the many revised offenses that use a definition of "effective consent" in RCC § 22E-701, which in relevant part refers to consent other than consent obtained by deception.

[34] D.C. Code 22-3221(c) ("Fraud may be committed by means of false promise as to future performance which the accused does not intend to perform or knows will not be performed. An intent or knowledge shall not be established by the fact alone that one such promise was not performed").

requirement in the context of a false promise,[35] but there is no other case law on point. Current practice in the District may apply a less stringent culpable mental state of recklessness, based on case law in other jurisdictions.[36] To resolve these ambiguities, the revised statute requires knowing culpable mental states as to the elements of "takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over property of another" and acting "with the consent of an owner obtained by deception." Requiring knowing culpable mental states for these fraud elements is consistent with the current theft statute, which requires that the accused knew he or she lacked consent to take property of another,[37] and the revised theft and other property offenses. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and completeness of the revised statute.

Fourth, the gradations of the revised statute use the term "in fact," to specify that no culpable mental state is required as to the value of the property or number of hours of labor or services. The current statute is silent as to what culpable mental state, if any, applies to the value of property. There is no DCCA case law on point, although District practice does not appear to require a culpable mental state as to the monetary values in the current gradations.[38] To resolve these ambiguities, the revised statute specifies that strict liability applies to the elements regarding the value of the property or the number of hours of labor or services. Applying no culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that do not distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is an accepted practice in American jurisprudence.[39] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and completeness of the revised statute.

Fifth, the revised statute extends jurisdiction for fraud only to instances where some aspect of the crime occurs in the District. Current D.C. Code § 22-3224.01 states that jurisdiction extends to cases in which "[t]he person who was defrauded is a resident of, or located in, the District of Columbia at the time of the fraud;" or "[t]he loss occurred in the District of Columbia[.]" The revised statute does not extend jurisdiction to cases in which all relevant conduct occurs outside the District, even though the complainant is a District resident, or was located in the District at the time of the fraud.[40] Authority to exercise jurisdiction over acts that occur outside the District's physical borders has traditionally been limited to acts that occur in, or are intended to have, and actually do have, a detrimental effect within the District.[41] There is no clear precedent for states to extend jurisdiction based solely on the residency of the alleged victim,[42] and such an extension, if intended, may be unconstitutional.[43] This change improves the clarity and perhaps the constitutionality of the revised statutes.

[35] See Warner v. United States, 124 A.3d 79 (D.C. 2015) (the trial judge noted that whether a promise is fraudulent or not depended on "whether or not at the time the defendant made the promise, he knew he was going to [fail to perform the promise.]"

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

The revised fraud statute eliminates the special fine enhancement which provides an alternative fine of "twice the value of the property obtained or lost, whichever is greater" for first and second degree fraud of property worth $1,000 or more does not affect available punishments. An equivalent provision in RCC § 22E-604(c) provides an alternate maximum fine of not more than twice the pecuniary gain or loss caused.

[40] For example, a District resident while on vacation in Florida is deceived into buying a fake gold watch. Under the revised statute, District courts would not have jurisdiction in this case since the relevant conduct occurred entirely outside the District.

RCC § 22E-2202. Payment Card Fraud.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the payment card fraud offense and penalty gradations for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). This offense criminalizes the use of a payment card, typically a credit card, to pay for or obtain property without the consent of the person to whom the card was issued, or the use of a payment card with knowledge that the card has already been canceled or revoked, or that the card had never actually been issued. It is also payment card fraud if the person uses for his or her own purposes a card that was issued to that person by an employer or contractor for the employer's purposes. The penalty gradations are determined by the value of the property obtained or amount paid using the payment card. The revised offense replaces the current credit card fraud[1] statute in the current D.C. Code.

Subsection (a) specifies the elements for first degree payment card fraud. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies the element that the accused must obtain or pay for property by using a payment card. The term "property" is a defined in RCC § 22E-701 to mean "something of value," including goods and services. "Payment card" is a defined in § 22E-701 as an instrument of any kind issued for use of the cardholder for obtaining or paying for property, or the number inscribed on such a card.[2] Paragraph (a)(1) also specifies a culpable mental state of knowledge, a term defined in RCC § 22E-206 which here requires that the accused must be aware to a practical certainty that he or she would obtain or pay for property by using a payment card.

Paragraph (a)(1) also specifies four additional alternate elements, at least one of which must be proven beyond a reasonable doubt. Subparagraph (a)(1)(A) states that the accused must use the payment card "without the effective consent of the owner." The term "consent," as defined in RCC § 22E-701, requires some indication (by word or action) of agreement given by a person generally competent to do so. "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "consent other than consent induced by physical force, a coercive threat, or deception." Lack of effective consent means there was no agreement, or the agreement was obtained by means of physical force, a coercive threat, or deception. "Owner" is defined in § 22E-701 to mean a person holding an interest in property that the accused is not privileged to interfere with, without consent. Per the rule of interpretation in 22E-207, the "knowingly" mental state in paragraph (a)(1) also applies to subsection (a)(1)(A), here requiring the accused to be aware to a practical certainty that he or she lacked effective consent of the owner to use the payment card.

Subparagraph (a)(1)(B) states that the accused must use the payment card after the card was revoked or canceled. The term "revoked or canceled" is defined in RCC § 22E-701, to means that notice, in writing, of revocation or cancellation either was received by the named holder, as shown on the payment card, or was recorded by the issuer. Per the rule of interpretation in 22E-207, the "knowingly" mental state in paragraph (a)(1) also applies to subsection (a)(2)(B), here requiring the accused to be aware to a practical certainty that the card had been revoked or canceled.

[1] D.C. Code § 22-3223. The statute also replaces the jurisdictional provision under D.C. Code § 22-3224.01.

[2] The definition includes not only credit and debit cards, but common items such as gift cards, membership cards, and metro cards used to obtain or pay for goods, services, or any kind of property.

Subparagraph (a)(1)(C) states that the accused must use a payment card that had never actually been issued. Per the rule of interpretation in 22E-207, the "knowingly" mental state in paragraph (a)(1) also applies to subsection (a)(1)(C), here requiring the accused to be aware to a practical certainty that the card had never actually been issued.

Subparagraph (a)(1)(D) states that the accused must use the payment card for his or her own purposes, when the person is an employee or contractor, and the payment card was issued to the accused for the employer's purposes.[3] Per the rule of interpretation in 22E-207, the "knowingly" mental state in paragraph (a)(1) also applies to subparagraph (a)(1)(D), here requiring the accused to be aware to a practical certainty that the card had been issued to or provided for the employer's purposes, and that the accused was using the card for his or her own purposes.

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies that the property a person pays for or obtains was, in fact, valued at $500,000 or more. "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, and indicates that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to the value of the property.

Subsections (b)-(e) specify the elements for second, third, fourth, and fifth degree payment card fraud. The elements of each grade of fraud are identical to the elements of first degree payment card fraud, except for the value of the property. Each subsection specifies a minimum required property value, except for fifth degree fraud, which has no specific minimum value.[4] As with first degree fraud, strict liability applies to value of the property other than labor or services, or the hours of labor or services in each grade of fraud.

Subsection (f) specifies relevant penalties for each grade of payment card fraud. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (g) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised payment card fraud statute changes current District law in one main way.

The revised payment card fraud statute increases the number of grade distinctions and dollar value cutoffs. Under the current D.C. Code statute, first degree payment card fraud involves property with a value of $1,000 or more and is punished as a serious felony; second degree payment card fraud involves property valued at less than $1,000 and is a misdemeanor.[5] By contrast, the revised payment card fraud offense has a total of five gradations which span a much greater range in value, with a value of $500,000 or more being the most serious grade. The revised offense's gradations are consistent with other revised property offense gradations. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense.

---

[3] For example, if a payment card is issued to an employee and that employee is authorized to use the card for the employer's purposes, if that employee uses the card to purchase goods or services for his own personal use, that employee may be found guilty of payment card fraud.

[4] However, as defined in RCC § 22E-701, "property" means "anything of value."

[5] D.C. Code § 22-3223(d) ("(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2) of this subsection, any person convicted of credit card fraud shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, imprisoned for not more than 180 days, or both. (2) Any person convicted of credit card fraud shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, imprisoned for not more than 10 years, or both, if the value of the property or services obtained or paid for is $1,000 or more.").

Beyond this one main change to current District law, five other aspects of the revised payment card fraud statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised statute eliminates the current statute's requirement that the accused act "with intent to defraud."[6] The current statute does not define the term "defraud," and the D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) has never defined the meaning of the language in the credit card fraud statute. Current District practice does not appear to include an "intent to defraud" element.[7] To resolve this ambiguity, the revised statute eliminates the term. An additional "intent to defraud" element is not necessary to distinguish innocent from criminal conduct in the revised offense because the revised statute requires the accused actually pay for the property, and the accused must know one of the elements in subparagraphs (a)(1)(A)-(D) and comparable provisions in other paragraphs were satisfied. This change clarifies the revised statute.

Second, the revised statute requires that the accused act knowingly with respect to the elements in paragraphs (a)(1), (b)(1), (c)(1), (d)(1), and (e)(1). The current statute itself is silent as to the applicable culpable mental state requirement, and no case law exists on point. Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[8] Requiring a knowing culpable mental state also makes the elements of payment card fraud consistent with the revised fraud statute and other property offenses, which generally require that the accused act knowingly with respect to the elements of the offense.[9] This change clarifies the revised statute.

Third, the revised statute does not expressly criminalize using a "falsified, mutilated or altered" card as provided in the current D.C. Code statute.[10] The current statute does not define these terms, and there is no case law interpreting the provision. To clarify the revised statute, specific reference to use of a "falsified, mutilated or altered" card is removed. The other provisions of the revised offense in subparagraphs (a)(1)(A)-(D) and comparable provisions in other paragraphs cover many instances apparently criminalized under the eliminated "falsified, mutilated or altered" provision. Knowing uses of a "falsified mutilated or altered" card may also be criminalized under the revised forgery offense, RCC § 22E-2204. This change clarifies and reduces unnecessary overlap between revised offenses.

Fourth, subsections (a)-(e), by use of the phrase "in fact," codify that no culpable mental state is required as to the value of the property obtained or paid for by using the payment card. The current D.C. Code statute is silent as to what culpable mental state applies to these elements. There is no District case law on what mental state, if any, applies to the current payment card fraud value gradations, although District practice does not appear to apply a mental state to the monetary values in the current gradations.[11] To resolve this ambiguity, the revised statute specifies that the value of the property is a matter of strict liability. Applying no culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that do not distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is an accepted practice in American jurisprudence.[12] This change improves the clarity and completeness of the revised statute.

Fifth, the revised statute extends jurisdiction for payment card fraud only to instances where some aspect of the crime occurs in the District. Current D.C. Code § 22-3224.01 states that jurisdiction extends to cases in which "1) The person to whom a credit card was issued or in whose name the credit card was issued is a resident of, or located in, the District of Columbia; (2) The person who was defrauded is a resident of, or located in, the District of Columbia at the time of the fraud; (3) The loss occurred in the District of Columbia[.]" The revised statute does not extend jurisdiction to cases in which all relevant conduct occurs outside the District, even though the complainant is a District resident, or was located in the District at the time of the fraud.[13] Authority to exercise jurisdiction over acts that occur outside the District's physical borders has traditionally been limited to acts that occur in, or are intended to have, and actually do have, a detrimental effect within the District.[14] There is no clear precedent for states to extend jurisdiction based solely on the residency of the alleged victim,[15] and such an extension, if intended, may be unconstitutional.[16] This change improves the clarity and perhaps the constitutionality of the revised statutes.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

[13] For example, person A resides in Florida, and while on vacation in the District, a person in Florida uses A's credit card to fraudulently purchase items from a store in Florida without A's permission. Under the revised statute, District courts would not have jurisdiction in this case.

RCC § 22E-2203. Check Fraud.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the check fraud offense and penalty gradations for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The offense criminalizes using a check to obtain or pay for property, with intent that the check will not be honored in full. The penalty gradations are determined by the value of the loss to the check holder. The revised offense replaces the current making, drawing, or uttering check, draft, or order with intent to defraud[1] statute in the current D.C. Code.

Subsection (a) specifies the elements of first degree check fraud. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that a person must obtain or pay for "property," a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 meaning anything of value.[2] The accused must obtain or pay for the property by using a check. "Check" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701, and includes any written instrument for payment of money by a financial institution. Paragraph (a)(1) also specifies a culpable mental state of knowledge, a term defined in RCC § 22E-206 which here requires that the accused must be aware to a practical certainty that he or she obtains or pays for property by a check.

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies that the use of the check must be "with intent that" the check not be honored in full upon presentation to the bank or depository institution. "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 meaning here that the defendant was practically certain that a bank or depository institution would not honor the check in full. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent that" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that the bank or financial institution did not actually honor the check in full, just that the defendant believed to a practical certainty, or desired, that the check would not be honored in full. The specific basis for why a person believes the bank or depository institution will not honor the check is not specified in the offense, and all that must be proven is the actor's belief at the time that the check will not be honored, whatever the basis.[3] This element requires that the accused believe to a practical certainty that the bank or depository institution will not honor the check when it is presented to the bank or depository institution, which may occur after the check is actually used to pay for property.[4]

---

[1] D.C. Code § 22-1510.

[2] E.g., the property received may be cash, goods, or services.

[3] For example, a person may believe that their check will not be honored because they have insufficient funds or credit, but other bases for expecting a check will not be honored may include having a hold on an account.

[4] For example a person who knowingly tries to cash a check at his bank that draws upon his overdrawn account would be simultaneously "presenting" the check at the same time as he uses it to obtain property (cash). However, perhaps more typically, the accused would use the check to obtain property (goods) at a business which only later would present the check to the bank for deposit. The possibility of a time lapse between the time of using the check and it being presented to the financial institution may be important to proving the offense, because it may indicate the defendant did not have a culpable mental state. For example, a person would not be liable when that person presents a check to a business owner that draws upon his overdrawn account, but lacks knowledge that the check will not be honored upon presentation to the financial institution because he or she plans to immediately go make a deposit in the account to cover the check. Similarly, a person who spoke with a merchant and was told her check wouldn't be deposited for two weeks would not be liable for check fraud if she then used a check that she knew would not be

Paragraph (a)(3) specifies that there must be a loss to the check holder that is, in fact, $5,000 or more. Paragraph (a)(3) uses the term "in fact," which is defined in RCC § 22E-207, and indicates that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to the amount of loss to the check holder. The amount of the loss to the check holder may differ from the face value of the check.[5] A person who pays for or obtains property with the necessary intent need not be aware that the check holder actually experienced a loss, or the amount of the loss. Practically, very high value checks are unlikely to be accepted by a person without bank verification, resulting in few or no completed instances of very high value check fraud.[6]

Subsection (b) specifies the elements of second degree check fraud. The elements of second degree check fraud are identical to the elements of first degree check fraud, except that that there must be a loss to the check holder that is, in fact, $500 or more.

Subsection (c) specifies the elements of third degree check fraud. The elements of third degree check fraud are identical to the elements of first degree check fraud, except that that there is no minimum required amount of loss to the check holder. Any amount of loss to a check holder is sufficient for third degree check fraud.

Subsection (d) specifies penalties for each grade of the check fraud offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (e) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised check fraud statute changes current District law in five main ways.

First, the revised statute requires that the accused obtain or pay for property or services with a check. Under the current D.C. Code statute, merely making, drawing, uttering, or delivering a bad check is sufficient.[7] Such language is not defined by the current statute,[8] and case law provides no precise definition either. However, the plain language of the current statute appears to include a broad range of conduct that ordinarily would be considered inchoate in most property offenses because no actual harm to anyone is required.[9] In contrast, the revised check fraud statute requires that the accused actually honored by the financial institution if presented that day, but she planned to take action to ensure the check would be honored in two weeks.

[5] E.g., if a person writes a check to a merchant for $2500 dollars, but upon presentation to the financial institution the bank honors the check for a value of $1000 and there is a $20 fee by the bank on the check holder based on the fact that the account drawn upon was insufficient, the loss for purposes of grading would be $1520.

When a check is not honored in full, typically the amount of loss to the check holder will be equal to the sale price, or the face value of the check.

[6] However, a person may be liable for attempt check fraud per RCC § 22E-301 even when there is no loss to the check holder.

[7] D.C. Code § 22-1510 ("Any person within the District of Columbia who…shall make, draw, utter, or deliver…").

[8] However, "utter" is statutorily defined in the District's forgery statute. See D.C. CODE § 22-1510 ("Utter" means to issue, authenticate, transfer, publish, sell, deliver, transmit, present, display, use, or certify.").

[9] E.g., the ordinary meaning of "drawing" a check is to "create and sign" a check. Black's Law Dictionary (10th ed. 2014). Such conduct, when done with intent to defraud, knowing that insufficient funds are obtains or pays for property by using a check. By requiring that the accused actually obtain or pay for property or services, the revised offense significantly narrows liability for the completed offense to situations where the harm has been completed (i.e. the bad check has been used to obtain something of value) or is very nearly completed (i.e. payment is made, whether or not the property is obtained). Additional liability for attempted check fraud would continue to exist, potentially covering much of the conduct criminalized under the current statute.[10] This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute.

Second, the revised check fraud statute does not provide an evidentiary inference regarding the check user's bad intent based on their failure to timely repay a bounced check. The current D.C. Code statute specifies that, "it shall be prima facie evidence of the intent to defraud . . . [if the accused] shall not have paid the holder thereof the amount due thereon, together with the amount of protest fees, if any, within 5 days after receiving notice in person, or writing, that such check, draft, order, or other instrument has not been paid."[11] There is no DCCA case law interpreting this provision.[12] In contrast, the RCC omits this statutory inference of intent because it appears to be unconstitutional.[13] However, even with this language omitted, the government may still present evidence of the accused's failure to pay the check holder after receiving notice that the check was not honored, and a fact finder may consider this evidence in determining whether the accused knew at the time the check was used that it would not be honored in full. This change improves the proportionality of the revised statute.

Third, the revised check fraud statute increases the number of penalty gradations, changes the dollar value cutoffs, and specifies that it is the value of the loss to the check available to cover the check would complete the existing offense—even if the accused did it while at home alone one evening, communicating the drawn check to no one.

[10] E.g., Drawing a check, with intent to defraud, knowing that insufficient funds are available to cover the check may well constitute attempted check fraud if the accused did so at the counter of a check cashing business while waiting for the clerk. See, generally, RCC § 22E-301 Criminal Attempt.

[11] D.C. Code § 22-1510.

[12] However, the D.C. Court of Municipal Appeals, the pre-cursor to the DCCA, has held that the "the presumption of fraudulent intent created by the statute" may still apply even when the check was used to "in payment of an antecedent debt." Clarke v. United States, 140 A.2d 181, 182 (D.C. 1958), aff'd, 263 F.2d 269 (D.C. Cir. 1959).

[13] In Reid v. United States, 466 A.2d 433 (D.C. 1983), the DCCA considered whether part of a statute criminalizing obliterating identifying marks on a pistol was constitutional. The statute in part, read "Possession of any pistol, machine gun, or sawed-off shotgun upon which any such mark shall have been changed, altered, removed, or obliterated shall be prima facie evidence that the possessor has changed, altered, removed, or obliterated the same within the District of Columbia[.]" D.C. Code § 22-4512. The DCCA stated that "Statutes, or parts of statutes, authorizing the inference of one fact from the proof of another in criminal cases 'must be regarded as 'irrational' or 'arbitrary,' and hence unconstitutional, unless it can at least be said with substantial assurance that the presumed fact is more likely than not to flow from the proved fact on which it is made to depend.'" Id. (quoting Leary v. United States, 395 U.S. 6, 36 (1969)).

Although the issue has not been litigated before the DCCA, it appears that the portion of the current uttering statute which allows an inference of "intent to defraud" would similarly fail. It does not seem that it can be said "with substantial assurance" that it is "more likely than not" that a person who fails to pay back the check holder within 5 days of learning that the check was not honored had "intent to defraud" at the time the check was used. For example, a person may use a check to pay for property, genuinely believing that the check would be honored, and simply not have enough money to pay the check holder in full within 5 days of learning that the check was not honored.

holder that should be used to determine gradations. The current D.C. Code check fraud offense is divided into two penalty grades, and turns on the amount of the check, being a three-year felony if the offense is $1,000 or more, otherwise a misdemeanor.[14] The current statute's grading based on the amount of the check may lead to counterintuitive liability in instances where there are nearly, but not fully, sufficient funds to cover a large value check.[15] By contrast, the revised check fraud offense is divided into three penalty grades based on the actual loss to the check holder, and the threshold values are set at $500 and $5,000. The $5.000 threshold for first degree check fraud is consistent with other revised property offenses, which generally adopt a $5,000 threshold for property offenses to be subject to felony penalties. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute.

Fourth, the provision in RCC § 22E-2001, "Aggregation To Determine Property Offense Grades," allows aggregation of value for the revised check fraud offense based on a single scheme or systematic course of conduct. In the current D.C. Code, the statutory provision that allows for aggregation of value across many property offenses[16] does not include the current check fraud offense, which is located in another chapter of the D.C. Code. In contrast, the revised check fraud statute permits aggregation for determining the appropriate grade of check fraud to ensure penalties are proportional to the accused's actual conduct. This change improves the consistency, and proportionality of the revised offense.

Fifth, the revised statute makes liability turn on a person's belief that his or her check will not be honored by the bank or depository institution. The current D.C. Code statute requires, more narrowly, that the accused know that he or she has insufficient funds or credit to cover the check.[17] There is no case law interpreting the scope of this element. In contrast, the revised statute provides liability in instances where the accused knows of other reasons[18]—besides insufficient funds or credit—why the bank or depository institution will deny payment and cause a loss to the check holder. This change may fill a gap in existing law.

[14] D.C. Code § 22-1510 ("Any person…shall, if the amount of such check, draft, order, or other instrument is $1,000 or more, be guilty of a felony and fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned for not less than 1 year nor more than 3 years, or both; or if the amount of such check, draft, order, or other instrument has some value, be guilty of a misdemeanor and fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not more than 180 days, or both.").

[15] E.g., a person who writes a check for $1,001, knowing there is only $1,000 available to cover the check (and otherwise satisfying the elements of the offense) would be subject to a three year felony under current law. By contrast, a person who writes a check for $999, knowing there is no money available to cover the check (and otherwise satisfying the elements of the offense) would be subject to a 180-day misdemeanor under current law.

[16] D.C. Code § 22-3202. Aggregation of amounts received to determine grade of offense. ("Amounts or property received pursuant to a single scheme or systematic course of conduct in violation of § 22-3211 (Theft), § 22-3221 (Fraud), § 22-3223 (Credit Card Fraud), § 22-3227.02 (Identity Theft), § 22-3231 (Trafficking in Stolen Property), or § 22-3232 (Receiving Stolen Property) may be aggregated in determining the grade of the offense and the sentence for the offense.")

[17] D.C. Code § 22-1510 ("…knowing at the time of such making, drawing, uttering, or delivering that the maker or drawer has not sufficient funds in or credit with such bank or other depository for the payment of such check, draft, order, or other instrument….").

[18] E.g., if an account is frozen for legal or investigatory reasons, or the accused has closed the type of account the check purports to draw upon.

Beyond these five main changes to current District law, three other aspects of the revised check fraud statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised statute requires that the accused act knowingly with respect to obtaining or paying for property by using a check. The current statute is silent as to the culpable mental state requirements applicable to the clause "make, draw, utter, or deliver any check, draft, order, of other instrument for the payment of money upon any bank or other depository,"[19] and no case law exists on point.[20] To resolve this ambiguity, the revised statute applies a knowledge culpable mental state requirement. Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[21] Requiring a knowing culpable mental state also makes check fraud consistent with the revised fraud statute and other property offenses, which generally require that the accused act knowingly with respect to the elements of the offense.[22] The change improves the clarity and completeness of the revised offense.

Second, the revised statute requires that the accused acted with intent that the check not be honored in full upon presentation to the bank or depository institution drawn upon. The current statute requires that the actor "with intent to defraud,"[23] and that the person act "knowing at the time of such making, drawing, uttering, or delivering that the maker or drawer has not sufficient funds in or credit with such bank or other depository for the payment of such check, draft, order, or other instrument in full upon its presentation."[24] The current statute does not define the terms "defraud" or "knowing" and the DCCA has never defined the meaning of the language in the uttering a check, draft, or order with intent to defraud statute. To resolve these ambiguities, the revised statute applies a "with intent" culpable mental state requirement to the element that the check not be honored in full. A person who believes to that the check they are using to gain property will not be honored in full has an intent to deceive the recipient, and belief to a practical certainty appears to be equivalent to the level of certainty ordinarily associated with knowledge. The revised statute's "with intent" requirement is consistent with the revised fraud[25] statute and other property offenses, using the RCC's standardized definition. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Third, first degree check fraud uses the phrase "in fact," to codify that no culpable mental state is required as to the value of the loss to the check holder. The current statute is silent as to what culpable mental state, if any, applies to this element. There is no District case law on what mental state, if any, applies to the current check fraud value gradations, although District practice does not appear to apply a mental state to the monetary values in the current gradations.[26] To resolve this ambiguity, the revised statute applies strict liability as to the amount of loss. Applying no culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that do not distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is an accepted practice in American jurisprudence.[27] This change clarifies and potentially fills a gap in the revised statute.

---

[19] D.C. Code § 22-1510.

[20] There is a DCCA case suggesting that the culpable mental state of the current uttering offense is one of "specific intent." Zanders v. United States, 678 A.2d 556, 565–66 (D.C. 1996). However, in that case, the DCCA quoted the Redbook Jury Instructions, and did not make a ruling based on the offense being a specific intent crime.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

RCC § 22E-2204. Forgery.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the forgery offense and penalty gradations for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The offense criminalizes making, completing, altering, using, or transmitting falsified written instruments, when the accused has intent to use the written instrument to obtain property by deception, or to otherwise harm another person. The revised offense replaces the current forgery[1] statutes and the recordation of deed, contract, or conveyance with intent to extort money[2] in the current D.C. Code.

Subsection (a) specifies the elements of first degree forgery. First degree forgery requires that the accused commits third degree forgery, and in addition the written instrument falls into one of the categories specified in subparagraphs (a)(2)(A)-(E). These subparagraphs describe various public records or documents of legal import, such as wills and contracts, as well as any written instrument with a value of more than $50,000. Paragraph (a)(2) uses the term "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, which indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to the type or value of written instrument.

Subsection (b) specifies the elements of second degree forgery. Second degree forgery requires that the accused commits third degree forgery, and in addition the written instrument falls into one of the categories specified in subparagraphs (b)(2)(A)-(C). These subparagraphs describe various prescriptions and tokens, fair cards, public transportation transfer certificates, or other articles intended as symbols of value for use as payment for goods and services, as well as any written instrument with a value of more than $5,000. Paragraph (b)(2) uses the term "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, which indicates that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to the type or value of written instrument.

Subsection (c) specifies three alternate means of committing third degree forgery. Paragraph (c)(1) specifies that the accused knowingly does any of the acts described in subparagraphs (c)(1)(A)-(C). Subparagraph (c)(1)(A) provides that the accused alters a written instrument without authorization, and the written instrument is reasonably adapted to deceive a person into believing it is genuine. Subsection (c)(1) specifies that a knowingly culpable mental state applies, a term defined in RCC § 22E-207, which here requires that the accused was practically certain that he or she altered was a written instrument, that he or she lacked authority to do so, and that the alteration was reasonably adapted to deceive a person into believing it is genuine. This subsection covers unauthorized alterations to written instruments even if they were originally genuine.

Subparagraph (c)(1)(B) requires that that the accused make or complete a written instrument. In addition, when making or completing the item, the written instrument must appear: to be the act of someone who did not authorize the making or creating; to have been made or completed at a time or place or in a numbered sequence other than was in fact the case; or to be a copy of an original when no such original existed. Further, under subparagraph (c)(1)(B)(ii), the written instrument must be reasonably adapted to deceive a person into believing the written instrument is genuine. Per the rule of interpretation in

[1] D.C. Code §§ 22-3241 - 22-3242.
[2] D.C. Code §22-1402.

RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" mental state in paragraph (c)(1) also applies to all of the elements in subparagraph (c)(1)(B).

Subparagraph (c)(1)(C) requires that that the accused transmits or uses a written instrument that was made, signed, or altered as described in subparagraphs (c)(1)(A) or (c)(1)(B). The accused must have known he was transmitting or using the instrument, and known that the instrument was altered, made, or completed in a manner listed under subparagraphs (c)(1)(A) or (c)(1)(B). Subparagraph (c)(1)(C) codifies conduct previously known as "uttering."[3]

Paragraph (c)(2) further requires that, whichever alternative means of committing forgery occurs, the accused also must act "with intent to" obtain property of another by deception, or to otherwise harm another person. "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the accused was practically certain he or she would obtain property by deception or harm another person. The word harm does not require bodily injury and should be construed more broadly to include causing an array of adverse outcomes.[4] Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that the accused actually obtained property or harmed another, only that the accused believed to a practical certainty that he or she would do so. In a forgery prosecution predicated on intent to obtain property by deception, the deception must relate to the genuineness of the written instrument, not false information contained within the instrument.[5]

Subsection (d) specifies penalties for each grade of the forgery offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (e) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised forgery statute changes current District law in four main ways.

First, the revised offense makes forgery, by any means, one offense. Despite the fact that its text makes no indication of the matter, the current forgery statute has been recognized by the D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) as codifying two separate legal offenses—forgery and uttering a forged document.[6] Under current law, a person can be convicted of both forgery and uttering, based on forging and then using a single written instrument.[7] In contrast, although multiple forgery convictions with respect to a single

[3] D.C. Code § 22-3241(a)(2).

[4] For example, forging business documents with intent to harm the business reputation of a business rival would constitute forgery.

[5] See Lafave, Wayne, 3 Subst. Crim. L. § 19.7 (2d ed.) ("Though forgery, like false pretenses, requires a lie, it must be a lie about the document itself: the lie must relate to the genuineness of the document."); Commentary to MPC § 224.1 at 289 ("Where the falsity lies in the representation of facts, not in the genuineness of the execution, it is not forgery.)

[6] White v. United States, 582 A.2d 774, 778 (D.C. 1990) ("it should be noted that forgery and uttering constitute two distinct offenses, albeit contained in a single statutory provision") aff'd 613 A.2d 869, 872 (D.C. 1992) (en banc). The DCCA ruling on this point follows apparent legislative intent. See COMMENTARY TO THEFT AND WHITE COLLAR CRIME ACT of 1982 at 60.

[7] Id. at 872 n.4 (D.C. 1992) (rejecting claim that uttering and forgery convictions should merge); see also, Driver v. United States, 521 A.2d 254, 256 (D.C. 1987) (defendant convicted of both forgery and uttering based on forging, and attempting to cash a single check).

written instrument may still occur under the revised statute,[8] the revised statute would change current law by barring convictions for both creating and using a forged document as part of the same act or course of conduct. The combined, revised offense eliminates unnecessary overlap in the revised statute.

Second, the revised statute replaces the "intent to defraud" element in the current statute with "intent to obtain property of another by deception." The current statute does not define the term "defraud," and DCCA has never defined the meaning of the language in forgery.[9] Consequently, the precise effect of the revision is unclear. In contrast, the revised statute requires that the accused act with intent to obtain property by deception. This revised language is intended to be broad enough to cover all, or nearly all, [10] the wrongful intentions that currently fall under the "intent to defraud" language in the current statute. Moreover, there remains the alternative element of committing the offense "with intent to harm another person," which broadly criminalizes forgery with ill-intent. The revised offense improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Third, the revised statute no longer grades forgery of payroll checks as first degree forgery. Under current law, forging payroll checks is subject to the highest maximum penalties allowed for forgery.[11] By contrast, under the revised statute, if a person commits forgery involving a payroll check, or an instrument that appears to be a payroll check, the gradation would be determined by the value of that instrument. This revision treats the forgery of payroll checks the same as forgeries of any other kinds of checks. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense.

Fourth, the provision in RCC § 22E-2001, "Aggregation To Determine Property Offense Grades," allows aggregation of value for the revised forgery offense based on a single scheme or systematic course of conduct. The current forgery offense is not part of the current D.C. Code aggregation of value provision for property offenses.[12] In contrast, the revised forgery statute permits aggregation for determining the appropriate grade of forgery. This change improves the proportionality of the revised statute.

Beyond these four main changes to current District law, two other aspects of the revised forgery statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

[8] E.g., If a person forges a written instrument, and uses it to obtain property from another, then as part of a different act or course of conduct, uses the same forged written instrument to obtain different property, then multiple convictions might be warranted. Multiple convictions with respect to a single forged instrument may or may not be appropriate depending on the facts of a particular case.

[9] Note though that other jurisdictions have held that intent to defraud includes "the purpose of causing financial loss to another," and to "prejudice . . . the rights of another[.]" People v. Lawson, 28 N.E.3d 210, 215–16 (Ill. Ct. App. 2015); State v. Bourgeois, 113 So. 3d 225, 230 (La. Ct. App. 2013).

[10] For example, a person could conceivably commit an "honest services fraud" by using forged documents. "Honest services fraud" does not involve obtaining property by deception, but instead involves depriving another of a right to honest or fair services. For example, if a public official used a forged document in an act of nepotism, this could constitute an honest services fraud, but would not involve obtaining property by deception. It is unclear if this type of conduct is covered by the current statute, but it would be excluded under the revised statute, except to the extent that it constituted an "intent to harm" another person.

[11] D.C. Code § 22-3242 (5).

[12] D.C. Code § 22-3202. Aggregation of amounts received to determine grade of offense. ("Amounts or property received pursuant to a single scheme or systematic course of conduct in violation of § 22-3211 (Theft), § 22-3221 (Fraud), § 22-3223 (Credit Card Fraud), § 22-3227.02 (Identity Theft), § 22-3231 (Trafficking in Stolen Property), or § 22-3232 (Receiving Stolen Property) may be aggregated in determining the grade of the offense and the sentence for the offense.")

First, the revised statute requires that the accused act knowingly with respect to the elements in subparagraphs (c)(1)(A)-(C).[13] The current D.C. Code forgery statute is silent as to the applicable culpable mental state requirements, and no case law exists on point.[14] To resolve this ambiguity, the revised statute applies a culpable mental state requirement of knowledge. Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[15] Requiring knowing culpable mental states also makes forgery consistent with the fraud statute, which requires that the accused knew that he or she used deception to obtain consent to take property.[16]

Second, the revised statute clarifies that a person is strictly liable as to the type or value of written instrument for purposes of grading forgery. Under the current D.C. Code statute and case law it is unclear what culpable mental state, if any, is required as to the type or value of written instrument involved in the forgery, and no case law exists on point. To resolve this ambiguity, the revised statute specifies that there is no culpable mental state required as to the type or value of written instrument. While applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence,[17] the presumption that the accused must have a subjective intent has not typically been applied to facts that merely distinguish the degree of wrongdoing.[18] The particular type of written instrument that has been forged does not distinguish innocent from criminal conduct, so no culpable mental state is assumed to apply to that fact. Applying no culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that do not distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is an accepted practice in American jurisprudence.[19] [13] There is some DCCA case law suggesting that the culpable mental state of the current forgery offense is one of "specific intent." Zanders v. United States, 678 A.2d 556, 565 (D.C. 1996). However, in this case, the DCCA was quoting the Redbook Jury Instructions, and not making an actual holding.

---

[14] There is one possible exception. In Ashby v. United States, 363 A.2d 685 (D.C. 1976), the defendant was convicted of forgery for signing a false name to a check. On appeal, the defendant argued that there was insufficient to find that he had the requisite "intent to defraud." Although the D.C. Court of Appeals did not specifically define what is required for "intent to defraud," it noted that the defendant's "awareness that the name he affixed to the check for the purpose of cashing it was not his own" served as evidence of his "intent to defraud." Ashby, 363 A.2d at 687. At least in regards to the element under subsection (a)(1)(B)(i), there is some case law suggesting that a culpable mental state of "knowing" is appropriate.

[15] See Elonis v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2001, 2009 (2015) ("[O]ur cases have explained that a defendant generally must 'know the facts that make his conduct fit the definition of the offense,' even if he does not know that those facts give rise to a crime. (Internal citation omitted)").

[16] RCC § 22E-2201.

[17] See Elonis v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2001, 2009 (2015) ("[O]ur cases have explained that a defendant generally must 'know the facts that make his conduct fit the definition of the offense,' even if he does not know that those facts give rise to a crime. (Internal citation omitted)").

[18] See Darryl K. Brown, Criminal Law Reform and the Persistence of Strict Liability, 62 DUKE L.J. 285, 325 (2012) ("State and federal courts frequently cite the U.S. Supreme Court for this point. Relying on United States v. X-Citement Video, Inc., courts emphasize 'the presumption in favor of a scienter requirement should apply to each of the statutory elements [of an offense] that criminalize otherwise innocent conduct'--but no elements beyond those.").

[19] Elonis v. United States," 135 S. Ct. 2001, 2010, 192 L.Ed.2d 1 (2015) ("When interpreting federal criminal statutes that are silent on the required mental state, we read into the statute "only that mens rea which is necessary to separate wrongful conduct from 'otherwise innocent conduct.'" " Carter v. United States, 530 U.S. 255, 269, 120 S.Ct. 2159, 147 L.Ed.2d 203 (2000) (quoting X–Citement Video, 513 U.S., at 72, 115 S.Ct. 464).").

Other changes to the revised forgery statute are clarificatory and are not intended to substantively change District law.

First, the revised forgery statute deletes the definition of "forged written instrument" and instead separately specifies conditions in which altering, making, completing, transmitting, or using a written instrument constitutes forgery. The current statute defines "forged written instrument" to include written instruments that have "been falsely made, altered, signed, or endorsed[.]"[20] The DCCA has clarified however that an instrument is falsely made, altered, or signed, when the person making, altering, or signing the instrument lacked authority to do so.[21] The revised statute includes this requirement; when a forgery prosecution is premised on altering an instrument, the accused must have lacked authority to do so. The current definition of "forged written instrument" also includes instruments that "contain[] a false addition or insertion."[22] Again, the revised statute's reference to altering a written instrument without authorization is intended to cover all instruments that "contain a false addition or insertion" under the current statute. Finally, the current definition of "forged written instrument" also includes instruments that are a "combination of parts of 2 or more genuine written instruments."[23] Correspondingly, the revised statute's reference to making or completing a written instrument that appears to have been made or completed at a time or place or in a numbered sequence other than was in fact the case, is intended to cover cases in which two otherwise genuine instruments are combined. The DCCA has not precisely defined when an instrument has been falsely made, altered, signed, or endorsed, or when an addition or insertion is false. The direct integration into the revised offense of elements in the current definition of "forged written instrument," and the clarification of those requirements, is not intended to substantively alter the scope of the offense.

Second, the revised statute requires that the accused "alters," "makes," "completes," "transmits," or "uses" a written instrument. These verbs are intended to encompass the words "makes, draws," or "utters"—the last being a term defined to mean, "to issue, authenticate, transfer, publish, sell, deliver, transmit, present, display, use, or certify."[24] The verbs "draws," and "issue, authenticate, transfer, publish, sell, deliver, transmit, present, display, [], or certify," appear to be duplicative[25] and their elimination is intended only to clarify, not change, current law.

Third, the revised statute requires that the forged instruments be "reasonably adapted to deceive a person into believing it is genuine." Although the current forgery statute does not include this language, the requirement is based on current DCCA case law.

[25] E.g., anytime a person "endorses," a written instrument, that person would also have necessarily either altered, made, completed, transmitted, or otherwise used the written instrument.

The DCCA has held that forgery requires that the forged written instrument "must be apparently capable of effecting a fraud."[26] The "reasonably adapted" language in the revised statute is intended to codify this element recognized in case law.

Fourth, the revised statute eliminates as a separate offense the current offense of recordation of deed, contract, or conveyance with intent to extort money under D.C. Code § 22-1402.[27] Under that statute, it is a crime for a person to cause any instrument purporting to convey or relate to land in the District to be recorded in the office of the Recorder of Deeds, when that person has no title or color of title to the land, and with intent to extort money or anything of value from the true owner. Insofar as it involves use of a forged instrument with intent to harm another, the conduct constituting an offense under D.C. Code § 22-1402 would necessarily satisfy the elements under the revised forgery statute. Due to the complete overlap between D.C. Code § 22-1402 and the revised forgery statute, D.C. Code § 22-1402 is deleted as redundant.

RCC § 22E-2205. Identity Theft.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the identity theft offense and penalty gradations for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The offense proscribes possessing, using, or creating a wide array of personal identifying information, without consent of the owner, for specified wrongful ends. The penalty gradations are based on the value of property obtained, payment avoided, or the financial loss caused, by the identity theft. The revised identity theft offense replaces the criminal identity theft[1] statutes in the current D.C. Code.

Subsection (a) specifies the elements of first degree identity theft. First degree identity theft requires that the accused commits fifth degree identity theft, and in addition, the value of the property intended to be obtained or the amount of the payment intended to be avoided or the financial injury, whichever is greatest, in fact, is $500,000 or more. The term "financial injury" is defined in RCC § 22E-701, which includes a variety of monetary costs, debts, or obligations incurred as a result of a criminal act.[2] Subsection (a) uses the term "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, which specifies that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to the value of the property intended to be obtained or the amount of the payment intended to be avoided, or the financial injury.

Subsection (b) specifies the elements of second degree identity theft. Second degree identity theft requires that the accused commits fifth degree identity theft, and in addition, the value of the property intended to be obtained or the amount of the payment intended to be avoided or the financial injury, whichever is greatest, in fact, is $50,000 or more. The term "financial injury" is defined in RCC § 22E-701, which includes a variety of monetary costs, debts, or obligations incurred as a result of a criminal act.[3] Subsection (b) uses the term "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, which specifies that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to the value of the property intended to be obtained or the amount of the payment intended to be avoided, or the financial injury.

Subsection (c) specifies the elements of third degree identity theft. Third degree identity theft requires that the accused commits fifth degree identity theft, and in addition, the value of the property intended to be obtained or the amount of the payment intended to be avoided or the financial injury, whichever is greatest, in fact, is $5,000 or more. The term "financial injury" is defined in RCC § 22E-701, which includes a variety of monetary costs, debts, or obligations incurred as a result of a criminal act.[4] Subsection (c) uses the term "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, which specifies that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to the value of the property intended to be obtained or the amount of the payment intended to be avoided, or the financial injury.

Subsection (d) specifies the elements of fourth degree identity theft. Fourth degree identity theft requires that the accused commits fifth degree identity theft, and in addition, the value of the property intended to be obtained or the amount of the payment intended to be avoided or the financial injury, whichever is greater, in fact, is $500 or more. The term "financial injury" is defined in RCC § 22E-701, which includes a variety of monetary costs, debts, or obligations incurred as a result of a criminal act.[5] Subsection (d) uses the term "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, which specifies that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to the value of the property intended to be obtained or the amount of the payment intended to be avoided, or the financial injury.

Subsection (e) specifies the elements of fifth degree identity theft. Paragraph (e)(1) requires that the accused knowingly created, possessed, or used "personal identifying information" belonging to or pertaining to another person. Possess is a term defined in RCC § 22E-701 to mean to "hold or carry on one's person," or to "have the ability and desire to exercise control over." The term "personal identifying information" is defined in RCC § 22E-701. This subsection specifies that a "knowingly" culpable mental state applies, a term defined in RCC § 22E-207, which here requires that the accused was practically certain that he or she would create, possess, or use personal identifying information belonging or pertaining to another person.

Paragraph (e)(2) requires that the accused must have created, possessed, or used personal identifying information belonging to or pertaining to another person without that person's effective consent. The term "consent," as defined in RCC § 22E-701, requires some indication (by word or action) of agreement given by a person generally competent to do so. "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "consent other than consent induced by physical force, a coercive threat, or deception." Lack of effective consent means there was no agreement, or the agreement was obtained by means of physical force, a coercive threat, or deception. Per the rule of interpretation in § 22E-207, the "knowingly" mental state in paragraph (e)(1) also applies to paragraph (e)(2), here requiring the accused to be aware to a practical certainty that he or she lacks effective consent of the other person.

Paragraph (e)(3) requires that the accused acted "with intent to" use the identifying information accomplish one of three goals: obtain property of another by deception; avoid payment due for any property, fines, or fees by deception; or give, sell, transmit, or transfer the information to a third person to facilitate the use of the identifying information by that third person to obtain property by deception and without that victim's consent. "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 meaning the accused was practically certain that he or she would achieve one of the goals listed in (e)(3)(A)-(C). Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that the accused actually achieved any of the goals listed in (e)(3)(A)-(C), just that the accused consciously desired, or was practical certain, that he or she would achieve one of them.

Subsection (f) clarifies jurisdictional rules for prosecution of identity theft.

Subsection (g) clarifies that obtaining, creating, or possessing a single person's identifying information constitutes a single violation of this statute. A person who possesses multiple pieces of identifying information pertaining to a single person, with a required criminal purpose, is still only liable for one count of identity theft. Subsection (g) also specifies for purposes of the statute of limitations under D.C. Code § 23-113 that an identity theft offense is deemed to have been committed after the course of conduct has been completed or terminated.

[5] For further discussion of the definition of "financial injury," see Commentary to RCC § 22E-701.

Subsection (h) specifies penalties for each grade of the identity theft statute. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (i) specifically requires the Metropolitan Police Department to report each complaint of identity theft and provide copies of such reports.

Subsection (j) cross references other terms defined elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised identity theft statute changes current District law in three main ways.

First, the revised statute eliminates reference to use of another person's identifying information to falsely identify himself at an arrest, to facilitate or conceal his commission of a crime, or to avoid detection, apprehension or prosecution for a crime—conduct included in the current identity theft statute.[6] The current identity theft statute includes using identifying information to avoid detection, apprehension or prosecution for a crime. In contrast, the revised identity theft statute does not criminalize this conduct. Most such conduct already is criminalized under other offenses, including the obstructing justice,[7] false or fictitious reports to Metropolitan Police,[8] and false statements.[9] All such conduct is criminalized under other offenses in the RCC, including the revised obstructing justice[10] and revised false statements offenses.[11] This change eliminates unnecessary overlap, and improves the proportionality of the revised statute.

Second, the revised statute criminalizes creating, possessing, or using another person's identifying information, without effective consent, with intent to avoid payment due for any property, fines, or fees by deception. The current D.C. Code identity theft statute does not criminalize use of identifying information with intent to avoid payments. In contrast, the revised statute explicitly criminalizes possessing, creating, possessing, or using identifying information with intent to avoid payments. This change improves the proportionality of the revised statute and fills a possible gap in offense liability.

Third, the revised statute increases the number of penalty grades. The current identity theft offense is limited to two gradations based solely on value of the property obtained, attempted to be obtained, or amount of the financial injury. The current first degree identity theft offense involves property with a value, or a financial injury, of $1,000 or more and is punished as a serious felony; second degree identity theft offense involves property with a value, or a financial injury, of less than $1,000 and is a misdemeanor. In contrast, the revised identity theft offense has a total of five gradations which span a much greater range in value, with a value or financial injury of $500,000 or more being the most serious grade. This change improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

Notably, while the current identity theft statute purports to criminalize use of another's personal identifying information without consent to identify himself at arrest, conceal a crime, etc., current D.C. Code § 22-3227.03(b) only provides a penalty for such conduct in the limited circumstance where it results in a false accusation or arrest of another person.

[10] RCC § 22E-XXXX.

[11] RCC § 22E-XXXX.

Beyond these three main changes to current District law, three other aspect of the revised identity theft statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised identity theft offense specifies that there is no culpable mental state required as to the value of property obtained or intended to be obtained, amount of payment intended to be avoided, or the amount of financial injury. The current D.C. Code statute is silent as to what culpable mental state applies to these elements. There is no District case law on what mental state, if any, applies to the value of property of financial injury caused, although District practice does not appear to apply a mental state to the monetary values in the current gradations.[12] To resolve this ambiguity, the revised statute specifies that the value of the property is a matter of strict liability. Applying no culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that do not distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is an accepted practice in American jurisprudence.[13] This change improves the clarity and completeness of the revised statute.

Second, by referencing the RCC's "financial injury" definition, the revised identity theft may change how the offense is graded. Under current law, "financial injury" is defined as "all monetary costs, debts, or obligations incurred by a person [as a result of violation of the identity theft statute.]"[14] It is unclear if the current definition of financial injury would include truly unreasonable costs incurred, or costs incurred by a non-natural person. To resolve this ambiguity, the revised statute defines financial injury as the "reasonable monetary costs, debts, or obligations incurred by a natural person as a result of a criminal act[.]"[15] The RCC's definition improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised offense.

Third, the revised statute extends jurisdiction for identity theft only to instances where some aspect of the crime occurs in the District. Current D.C. Code § 22-3227.06 states that jurisdiction extends to cases in which "The person whose personal identifying information is improperly obtained, created, possessed, or used is a resident of, or located in, the District of Columbia[.]" The revised statute does not extend jurisdiction to cases in which all relevant conduct occurs outside the District, even though the complainant is a District resident, or was located in the District at the time the identity theft occurred.[16] Authority to exercise jurisdiction over acts that occur outside the District's physical borders has traditionally been limited to acts that occur in, or are intended to have, and actually do have, a detrimental effect within the District.[17] There is no clear precedent for states to extend jurisdiction based solely on the residency of the alleged victim,[18] and such an extension, if intended, may be unconstitutional.[19] This change improves the clarity and perhaps the constitutionality of the revised statutes.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, the revised statute no longer explicitly refers to "obtaining" identifying information of another. "Obtaining" is not defined in the current statute or case law. Instead the revised statute requires that the accused "creates, possesses, or uses" identifying information. "Obtaining" appears to be superfluous,[20] and no change in the scope of the statute is intended by omitting the word from the revised statute.

Second, the revised statute no longer explicitly refers to using identifying information to obtain property "fraudulently." "Fraudulently" is not defined in the statute or, for this offense, in case law. Instead the revised statute refers only to intent to obtain property by deception, avoid payment due fine by deception, or facilitate another person in obtaining property by deception. "Fraudulently" appears to be unnecessarily ambiguous and superfluous. No change in the scope of the statute is intended by that word's elimination from the revised statute.

Third, the revised statute does not explicitly criminalize using identifying information to obtain property of another.[21] The current statute criminalizes using identifying information to "obtain, or attempt to obtain, property[.]"[22] This provision of the current statute is duplicative given that it provides as an alternative basis of liability merely using identifying information to attempt to obtain property of another. There is no penalty difference in the current statute between actually obtaining or attempting to obtain property of another in this manner.

Fourth, the revised statute eliminates references in the current identity theft statutes to restitution[23] and fines at twice the amount of the financial injury.[24] Both provisions are superfluous under both current law[25] and the RCC.[26] No change in the scope of the statute is intended by elimination of these provisions.

RCC § 22E-2206. Identity Theft Civil Provisions.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the identity theft offense civil provisions concerning record correction for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The revised identity theft civil provisions are nearly identical to the identity theft corrections of police records[1] statute in the current D.C. Code. The only change to the statute is to refer to the mental disability affirmative defense, instead of being found not guilty "by reason of insanity."

[1] D.C. Code § 22-3227.05.

RCC §22E-2207. Unlawful Labeling of a Recording.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the unlawful labeling of a recording (ULR) offense and penalty gradations for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The offense criminalizes possession of a recording with a label that fails to identify the true manufacturer, with intent to sell or rent the recording. The penalty gradations are based on the number of recordings that the accused possessed. The revised unlawful labeling of a recording offense replaces the deceptive labeling offense in the current D.C. Code.[1]

Subsection (a) specifies the elements of first degree ULR. Paragraph (a)(1) requires that the accused knowingly possesses 100 or more sound recordings or audiovisual recordings that do not clearly and conspicuously disclose the true name and address of the manufacturer on their labels, covers, or jackets. This subsection specifies that a "knowingly" culpable mental state applies to most elements, a term defined in RCC § 22E-207, which here requires that the accused was practically certain that he or she possessed sound recordings or audiovisual recordings, and that those recordings did not conspicuously disclose the true name and address of the manufacturer on their labels, covers, or jackets. Possess is a term defined in RCC § 22E-701 to mean to "hold or carry on one's person," or to "have the ability and desire to exercise control over." The terms "sound recording" and "audiovisual recording" are defined in RCC § 22E-701. Sound and audiovisual recordings are discrete physical objects upon which sounds or images are fixed. The term "manufacturer" is defined for the purposes of this section to mean the person or entity who actually affixed the sounds or images to the sound or audiovisual recording. The term "manufacturer" does not refer to the original artist, or person who holds the copyrights to the sound or audiovisual work. This paragraph uses the term "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, which specifies that there is no culpable mental state required as to the total number of sound or audiovisual recordings being 100 or more.

Paragraph (a)(2) requires that the accused possessed the recordings "with intent to" sell or rent the recordings. "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206, here meaning that the accused was practically certain that he would sell or rent the recordings. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that the accused actually sold or rented the recordings, only that the accused was practically certain that he or she would sell or rent them.

Subsection (b) specifies the elements of second degree ULR. The elements of second degree ULR are identical to the elements of first degree ULR, except that there is no requirement as to the number of sound or audiovisual recordings. Possession of just a single sound or audiovisual recording is sufficient for second degree ULR.

Subsection (c) provides an exception from liability if a person transfers a recording as part of a broadcast transmission or for the purposes of archival preservation, or transfers recordings at home for personal use.[2] Subsection (c) uses the term "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, which specifies that there is no culpable mental state required as to

[1] D.C. Code § 22-3214.01.

[2] The exclusion regarding a person at home acting for personal use improves the notice of the statute, but is not otherwise necessary. As described below, any person who acts for his or her personal use rather than with intent to sell or rent the recording, would not satisfy the offense's elements.

whether the recordings were transferred for as part of a radio or television broadcast transmission, or for the purposes of archival preservation, or in their home for personal use.

Subsection (d) specifies penalties for both grades of ULR. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (e) provides that courts may order forfeiture of certain assets related to violation of this statute in addition to penalties otherwise authorized.

Subsection (f) cross reference definitions found elsewhere in the RCC, and defines the term "manufacturer" as used in this section.

Relation to Current District Law. The unlawful labeling of a recording statute changes current District law in five main ways.

First, ULR requires that the accused had intent to rent or sell the recordings. Any other intended uses of the recordings do not constitute ULR. The current statute uses broader language, covering conduct committed for "commercial advantage or private financial gain[.]"[3] The statute does not define these terms and there is no relevant D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) case law. However, the current statute's language could arguably include possessing a sound recording for commercial advantage or financial gain by means that do not involve selling or renting the recording.[4] In contrast, the revised statute requires intent to sell or rent the recordings, and intent to use the recordings for other purposes are not covered. To the extent that the current statute is broad enough to cover these uses of recordings, the revised statute is narrower than the current statute. The revision improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

Second, the revised ULR statute changes the penalty structure to equate penalties for ULR with respect to sound or audiovisual recordings. Under the current statute, a person commits a felony if he or she possessed 1,000 or more sound recordings, or 100 or more audiovisual recordings; and the person commits a misdemeanor if he or she possessed fewer than 1,000 sound recordings, or fewer than 100 audiovisual recordings. In contrast, under the revised statute, sound recordings and audiovisual recordings are no longer treated differently, either for determining the unit of prosecution or for the penalty. A person who possesses 100 improperly labeled sound recordings is subject the same penalties as a person who possesses 100 improperly labeled audiovisual recordings. In addition, the revised statute does not permit multiple convictions simply because the accused possessed two different types of recordings, contrary to the DCCA's holding in Plummer v. United States, [5] which allowed for two convictions based on the accused's possession of both sound and audiovisual recordings. Also, penalties are the same whether the recordings are sound or audiovisual recordings. The revision improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute.

Third, the penalty provisions of the revised ULR do not allow the number of recordings to be aggregated across a 180 day period. Under the current statute, the penalty gradations are based on the number of sound or audiovisual recordings possessed "during any 180 day period."[6] There is no case law regarding how the 180 day period is to be determined, and there is no legislative history on the provision. In contrast, under the revised statute, the penalty gradations are based solely on the number of recordings possessed at a single point in time, or as described immediately below, where the government aggregates the number of recordings involved in a single scheme or systematic course of conduct per RCC § 22E-2002, Aggregation To Determine Property Offense Grades. This revision improves the proportionality of the revised statute.

[3] D.C. Code § 22-3214.01(b).

[4] E.g., conduct covered under the current statute might include possession of improperly labeled recordings with intent to play them in a store to entertain customers.

[5] 43 A.3d 260 (D.C. 2012). In Plummer, the DCCA reasoned that two convictions were warranted because the statute "explicitly treats audiovisual works as different from sound recordings" for sentencing purposes. Id. at 274.

Fourth, the provision in RCC § 22E-2002, "Aggregation To Determine Property Offense Grades," allows aggregation of value for the revised ULR offense based on a single scheme or systematic course of conduct. The current ULR offense is not part of the current aggregation of value provision for property offenses,[7] however, as discussed immediately above, the current ULR statute has a special provision allowing the number of recordings to be aggregated across a 180 day period. In contrast, the revised ULR statute permits aggregation for determining the appropriate grade of ULR to ensure penalties are proportional to the accused's actual conduct. This change improves the proportionality of the revised statute.

Fifth, subsection (e) of the revised ULR offense permits a court to order the forfeiture and destruction or other disposition of all recordings, equipment used, or attempted to be used, in violation of this section. The current D.C. Code deceptive labeling offense contains a forfeiture provision that is mandatory.[8] In contrast, the revised statute allows, but does not require, judges to order forfeiture in order to destroy illegally labeled copies and potentially deter large-scale prohibited copying. The revised unlawful creation or possession of a recording statute[9] and several other offenses[10] under current District law contain similar forfeiture provisions. This revision improves the consistency and proportionality of the offense.

Beyond these five main changes to current District law, one other aspect of the revised ULR statute may constitute a substantive change of law.

The revised statute eliminates the phrase "that person knowingly advertises, offers for sale, resale, or rental, or sells, resells, rents, distributes, or transports" a sound or audiovisual recording. The verbs in this phrase are not statutorily defined and there is no relevant DCCA case law. Nonetheless, this language appears to be redundant, given that the revised statute requires that the accused possesses a recording, with intent to sell or rent it. However, insofar as the current language creates liability for knowingly advertising or offering recordings for sale, but without actually possessing them, a person engaged in such conduct could likely be prosecuted for ULR as an accomplice or for attempted ULR. It is also possible that a person who advertises or offers for sale such recordings will have committed a conspiracy to commit ULR. Practically, there appears to be little or no change to current law in relying solely on conduct that results in possession of an improperly labeled recording. This revision improves the clarity of the revised offense.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

The revised statute simplifies the definition of manufacturer to refer to "the person who affixes, or authorizes the affixation of, sounds or images to a sound recording or audiovisual recording." The current statute refers to "the person who authorizes or causes the copying, fixation, or transfer of sounds or images to sound recordings or audiovisual works subject to this section."[11] The elimination of "copying" and "transfer" is not intended to change the definition. Since a recording, as defined in the statute, is a material object, any copying or transfer that is relevant to the statute is necessarily a form of affixation.

RCC § 22E-2208. Financial Exploitation of a Vulnerable Adult or Elderly Person.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the financial exploitation of vulnerable adults or elderly person offense (FEVA) and penalty gradations for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The offense criminalizes acquisition or use of the property of a vulnerable adult by means of undue influence and with intent to deprive the person of the property, with recklessness as to the complainant being a vulnerable adult or elderly person. The offense also includes committing theft, extortion, forgery, fraud, or identity theft with recklessness as to the complainant being a vulnerable adult or elderly person. The penalty gradations are based on the value of the property involved in the crime, or by the amount of financial injury inflicted. The revised FEVA offense replaces the financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult offense in the current D.C. Code.[1]

Subsection (a) specifies the elements of first degree FEVA. First degree FEVA requires that the accused commits fifth degree FEVA, and in addition, the value of the property or the amount of financial injury, whichever is greater, in fact, is $500,000 or more. The term "financial injury" is defined in RCC § 22E-701, which includes a variety of monetary costs, debts, or obligations incurred as a result of a criminal act.[2] Subsection (a) uses the term "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, which specifies that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to the value of the property or the amount of the payment intended to be avoided or the financial injury.

Subsection (b) specifies the elements of second degree FEVA. Second degree FEVA requires that the accused commits fifth degree FEVA, and in addition, the value of the property or the amount of financial injury, whichever is greater, in fact, is $50,000 or more. The term "financial injury" is defined in RCC § 22E-701, which includes a variety of monetary costs, debts, or obligations incurred as a result of a criminal act.[3] Subsection (a) uses the term "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, which specifies that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to the value of the property or the amount of the payment intended to be avoided or the financial injury.

Subsection (c) specifies the elements of third degree FEVA. Third degree FEVA requires that the accused commits fifth degree FEVA, and in addition, the value of the property or the amount of financial injury, whichever is greater, in fact, is $5,000 or more. The term "financial injury" is defined in RCC § 22E-701, which includes a variety of monetary costs, debts, or obligations incurred as a result of a criminal act.[4] Subsection (a) uses the term "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, which specifies that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to the value of the property or the amount of the payment intended to be avoided or the financial injury.

Subsection (d) specifies the elements of fourth degree FEVA. Fourth degree FEVA requires that the accused commits fifth degree FEVA, and in addition, the value of the property or the amount of financial injury, whichever is greater, in fact, is $500 or more. The term "financial injury" is defined in RCC § 22E-701, which includes a variety of monetary costs, debts, or obligations incurred as a result of a criminal act.[5] Subsection (a) uses the term "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, which specifies that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to the value of the property or the amount of the payment intended to be avoided or the financial injury.

Subsection (e) specifies the elements of fifth degree FEVA. Paragraph (e)(1) requires that the accused knowingly takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over property of another. The term "property" is defined in RCC § 22E-701, and means anything of value. Further, the property must be "property of another," a term defined in in RCC § 22E-701, which means that some other person has a legal interest in the property at issue that the accused cannot infringe upon. Paragraph (e)(1) specifies that a "knowingly" culpable mental state applies, a term defined in RCC § 22E-207, which here requires that the accused was practically certain that he or she would take, obtain, transfer, or exercise control over property of another.

Subparagraph (e)(1)(A) requires that the accused act with consent of an owner. The term "consent" is defined in RCC § 22E-791, and requires some indication (by words or actions) of an owner's agreement to allow the accused to take the property. The term "owner" is also defined in RCC § 22E-701, and means a person holding an interest in property that the accused is not privileged to interfere with, and it specifically includes those persons who are authorized to act on behalf of another.[6] Per the rule of interpretation in 22E-207, the "knowingly" mental state in paragraph (e)(1) also applies to subparagraph (e)(1)(A), which requires that the accused be practical certain that he or she had the consent of an owner.

Subparagraph (e)(1)(A) also requires that the consent of the owner was obtained by "undue influence." "Undue influence" is defined subsection (h) to mean "mental, emotional, or physical coercion that overcomes the free will or judgment of a vulnerable adult or elderly person and causes the vulnerable adult or elderly person to act in a manner that is inconsistent with his or her financial, emotional, mental, or physical well-being." Per the rule of interpretation in 22E-207, the "knowingly" mental state in paragraph (e)(1) also applies to subparagraph (a)(1)(A), which here requires that the accused was practically certainty or owner's consent is obtained by undue influence.

Subparagraph (e)(1)(B) specifies that the owner must be to a "vulnerable adult or elderly person", terms defined in RCC § 22E-701 to mean a person who is either 18 years of age or older and has one or more substantial physical or mental impairments, or 65 years of age or older. This subparagraph specifies that a "recklessness" mental state applies a term defined in RCC § 22E-206, which here requires the accused consciously disregarded a substantial risk that the owner was a "vulnerable adult or elderly person."

Subparagraph (e)(1)(C) requires that the accused act "with intent to" deprive an owner of the property. "Deprive" is a defined term meaning that the other person is unlikely to recover the property, or that it will be withheld permanently or long enough to lose a substantial portion of its value or benefit. "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the defendant was practically certain that he or she would "deprive" the other person of the property. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that such a deprivation actually occurred, only that the defendant believed to a practical certainty that a deprivation would result.

[6] The definition of "owner" specifically includes specifically includes those persons who are authorized to act on behalf of another. For example, a store employee who is authorized to sell merchandise is an "owner," although the merchandise is in fact owned by the store company itself.

Subparagraph (e)(1)(D) requires that, in fact, the property has any value. The term "in fact" specifies that there is no culpable mental state required as to whether the property has any value.

Paragraph (e)(2) defines FEVA to include committing one or more of the offenses listed in subparagraphs (e)(2)(A)-(G). This paragraph specifies that a "reckless" mental state applies a term defined in RCC § 22E-207, which here requires the accused consciously disregarded a substantial risk that the complainant was a "vulnerable adult or elderly person." Paragraph (e)(2) also uses the term "in fact" which specifies that there is no culpable mental state as to whether the actor's conduct constitutes one or more of the offenses under subparagraphs (e)(2)(A)-(G).

Subsection (f) specifies penalties for each grade of FEVA [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (g) specifies that if any restitution is ordered, the accused must pay the restitution before paying any criminal or civil fines imposed for violation of this section.

Subsection (h) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised FEVA statute changes current District law in six main ways.

First, the revised FEVA statute applies a "reckless" culpable mental state as to the complainant being a vulnerable adult or elderly person. The current statute does not specify any required mental state as to whether the person was an elderly or vulnerable adult, and there is no case law on point. However, the current statute provides an affirmative defense if the accused "knew or reasonably believed the victim was not a vulnerable adult or elderly person at the time of the offense, or could not have known or determined that the victim was a vulnerable adult or elderly person because of the manner in which the offense was committed."[7] Further, the statute states that "[t]his defense shall be established by a preponderance of the evidence."[8] In contrast, under the revised statute, the government would bear the burden of proving that the accused was reckless as to the complainant being a vulnerable adult or elderly person. This requires that the accused consciously disregarded a substantial risk that the complainant was 65 years or older, or was at least 18 years of age, and had one or more physical or mental limitations that substantially impair his or her ability to independently provide for his or her daily needs or safeguard his or her person, property, or legal interests. Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[9] However, a reckless culpable mental state requirement is consistent with other circumstances regarding victims that are aggravators in the RCC.[10] This change improves the clarity and completeness of the revised statute.

[10] See, e.g., RCC § 22E-1202 Assault.

Second, the revised FEVA statute increases the number of penalty grade distinctions. The current FEVA statute is limited to two gradations based on the value of the property or legal obligation.[11] In contrast, the revised FEVA offense has a total of five gradations which span a much greater range in value, with a value of $250,000 or more being the most serious grade. The increase in gradations, differentiated by offense seriousness, improves the proportionality of the offense. In addition, the revised FEVA statute also grades penalties based on the value of the property involved, or the amount of financial injury caused, whichever is greater. This change improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

Third, the revised FEVA statute includes committing payment card fraud and check fraud, with recklessness that the complainant is a vulnerable adult or elderly person. The current FEVA statute includes committing other property and fraud-related offenses, but does not include payment card fraud or check fraud. In contrast, the revised FEVA statute includes these offenses as vulnerable adults and elderly persons may be particularly vulnerable to these types of fraudulent offenses. This change improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

Fourth, the revised FEVA statute eliminates the special recidivist penalty authorized under current law, consistent with other nonviolent revised offenses in the RCC. Under current law,[12] if a person with two prior FEVA convictions is convicted of FEVA, the maximum allowable sentence is 15 years, regardless of the value of property involved in either of the convictions. In contrast, the revised FEVA statute is no longer subject to a recidivist penalty enhancement. The RCC general recidivism enhancement (RCC § 22E-606) is limited to RCC offenses against persons and enhanced burglary, which requires the presence of a dangerous weapon or imitation firearm. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Fifth, by referencing the RCC's "financial injury" definition, the revised FEVA statute changes how the offense is graded. Under current law, FEVA is graded based on the value of the property obtained, or the legal obligation incurred by the complainant. In contrast, by referencing the RCC's "financial injury" definition,[13] FEVA may be graded based on reasonable costs incurred as a result of the offense.[14] The RCC's definition improves the proportionality of the revised offense by excluding unreasonable costs incurred from affecting penalty gradations.

Sixth, the provision in RCC § 22E-2002, "Aggregation To Determine Property Offense Grades," allows aggregation of value for the revised FEVA offense based on a single scheme or systematic course of conduct. The current FEVA offense is not part of the current aggregation of value provision for property offenses.[15] In contrast, the revised

[15] D.C. Code § 22-3202. Aggregation of amounts received to determine grade of offense. ("Amounts or property received pursuant to a single scheme or systematic course of conduct in violation of § 22-3211 (Theft), § 22-3221 (Fraud), § 22-3223 (Credit Card Fraud), § 22-3227.02 (Identity Theft), § 22-3231

FEVA statute permits aggregation for determining the appropriate grade of FEVA to ensure penalties are proportional to the accused's actual conduct.

Beyond these six substantive changes to current District law, five other aspects of the revised FEVA statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, paragraph (e)(1) specifies a culpable mental state of "knowingly" for all offense elements other than value of the property involved or the amount of financial loss, or the complainant's status as an elderly person or vulnerable adult. The current statute requires that the accused acted "intentionally and knowingly[.]"[16] The current statute does not define "intentionally" or "knowingly," and there is no case law on point. By applying a culpable mental state of "knowingly," the revised FEVA statute requires that the accused was practically certain that he or she would take, obtain, or exercise control over property of another, with consent obtained by undue influence. Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[17] Requiring a knowing culpable mental state also makes the revised theft offense consistent with the revised fraud and extortion statutes, and other property offenses, which generally require that the accused act knowingly with respect to the elements of the offense.[18] This change improves the clarity and completeness of the revised offense.

Second, the revised statute provides liability only for conduct with intent to deprive the vulnerable adult or elderly person of property. The current D.C. Code statute provides liability for conduct with intent to use the property "for the advantage of anyone other than the vulnerable adult or elderly person[.]"[19] There is no case law regarding this phrase. However, the revised statute refers to an intent to deprive where the term "deprive" is defined in the RCC to include withholding property permanently for "so extended a period or under such circumstances that a substantial portion of its value or a substantial portion of its benefit is lost" or "to dispose of the property, or use or deal with the property so as to make it unlikely that the owner will recover it."[20] Consequently, taking property with intent to benefit another person is already within the scope of the RCC's definition of "deprive" if doing so would deny the owner a substantial benefit of the property. The primary effect of the revised FEVA offense eliminating liability for acting with intent to use property "for the advantage of anyone other than the vulnerable adult or elderly person" is to bar prosecution for temporary unauthorized uses of the property. However, the revised unauthorized use of property[21] criminalizes even temporary uses of a person's property without effective consent. This change clarifies the revised statute and reduces unnecessary overlap among offenses.

(Trafficking in Stolen Property), or § 22-3232 (Receiving Stolen Property) may be aggregated in determining the grade of the offense and the sentence for the offense.")

[17] See Elonis v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2001, 2009 (2015) ("[O]ur cases have explained that a defendant generally must 'know the facts that make his conduct fit the definition of the offense,' even if he does not know that those facts give rise to a crime. (Internal citation omitted)").

[18] See, e.g., RCC § 22E-2201.

[19] D.C. Code § 22-933.01.

[20] RCC § 22E-701.

[21] RCC § 22E-2102.

Third, the revised offense no longer specifically criminalizes causing a vulnerable adult or elderly person to assume a legal obligation. The current D.C. Code statute specifically criminalizes causing a vulnerable adult or elderly person to assume a legal obligation on behalf of, or for the benefit of, anyone other than the vulnerable adult or elderly person.[22] However, the revised FEVA statute already provides liability for engaging in conduct (with consent obtained by undue influence) that causes a transfer of property or involves exercising control over property with intent to deprive the owner. And the term "property" as defined in RCC § 22E-701 includes anything of value, including real property and interests in real property, as well as credit.[23] Consequently, it appears that most, if not all, instances of causing a vulnerable adult or elderly person to assume a detrimental legal obligation (with consent obtained by undue influence) are criminalized under the currents statute are also covered by the revised FEVA statute.[24] This change clarifies and reduces unnecessary overlap in provisions of the revised offense.

Fourth, subsections (a)-(d) of the revised offense, by use of the phrase "in fact," codify that no culpable mental state is required as to the value of the property or the amount of financial loss. The current statute is silent as to what culpable mental state applies to these elements, and there is no relevant D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) case law. To resolve this ambiguity the revised statute makes the amount of loss or value of property a matter of strict liability. Requiring no culpable mental state to statutory elements that do not distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is an accepted practice in American jurisprudence.[25] This change clarifies the revised offense.

Fifth, the definition of "person" in RCC § 22E-701 is applicable to all RCC property offenses and provisions, including the definitions of "actor," "complainant," "owner," and "property of another," which in turn rely on the definition of "person" in the RCC property offenses. The definition of "person" in RCC § 22E-701 establishes that "person" categorically includes both natural persons and non-human legal entities such as trusts, estates, companies, etc. The RCC definition of "person" is substantively identical to the definition of "person" in current D.C. Code § 22-3201(2A), which is limited to the Theft, Fraud, Stolen Property, Forgery, and Extortion offenses and other provisions in Chapter 32 of the current D.C. Code Title 22. The current D.C. Code § 22-3201(2A) definition of "person" does not apply to property offenses codified outside of current Chapter 32 of Title 22 despite a similar scope of conduct.[26] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised statute uses [24] For example, a person who knowingly uses undue influence to cause an elderly person to take out a second mortgage and give over the proceeds may well be guilty under the revised FEVA statute. Such a defendant would have caused the transfer (subsection (a)(1)) of an interest in real property (subsection (a)(2)) with the consent of the owner (subsection (a)(3)), who is elderly (subsection (a)(4)), using undue influence (subsection (a)(5)), believing that in doing so he or she will cause the owner to lose a substantial portion of the property's value (subsection (a)(6)).

[26] It should be noted that there is a definition of "person" in D.C. Code § 45-604 that applies to the current D.C. Code. See D.C. Code §§ 45-601 (rule of construction stating that "[i]n the interpretation and construction of this Code the following rules shall be observed."); 45-604 (stating that "person" "shall be the definition of "person" in RCC § 22E-701. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, the revised statute requires that the accused use "undue influence" to obtain, take, transfer, or exercise control over property, but does not separately include use of "deception" or "intimidation" as does the current statute.[27] However, omitting these words is not intended to change current law. Obtaining property of a vulnerable adult or elderly person by use of deception or intimidation will still be covered by the revised FEVA statute. First, the definition of "undue influence" includes "mental, emotional, or physical coercion[.]"[28] This definition is broad enough to cover any use of "intimidation." Second, FEVA is also defined as committing theft, extortion, forgery, fraud, or identity theft, with recklessness that the complainant is a vulnerable adult or elderly person. Under the RCC, fraud is defined as taking, obtaining, transferring, or exercising control over property, with consent of the owner obtained by deception.[29] Taking property of a vulnerable adult or elderly person by deception is therefore still criminalized under the revised FEVA statute. Second, the term "undue influence," which is defined under RCC § 22E-701 does not require that the other person be a vulnerable adult or elderly person. This change to the definition of undue influence does not alter the scope of the FEVA statute, which still requires that the complainant was a vulnerable adult or elderly person.

held to apply to partnerships and corporations, unless such construction would be unreasonable, and the reference to any officer shall include any person authorized by law to perform the duties of his office, unless the context shows that such words were intended to be used in a more limited sense."). However, this definition is not dispositive and in some D.C. Code property offenses outside Chapter 32 of Title 22, the term "person" is not used at all (e.g., the current malicious destruction of property statute, D.C. Code § 22-303, does not use the term "person," instead referring to "whoever").

RCC § 22E-2209. Financial Exploitation of a Vulnerable Adult or Elderly Person Civil Provisions

Explanatory Note. RCC § 22E-2209 is a combination of two current statutes, D.C. Code §§ 22-937 and 22-938. The text from the two current D.C. Code statutes has been copied verbatim, with the exception of technical changes to update cross-references, and to add headings to some subsections. RCC § 22E-2209 also omits a requirement that restitution under RCC § 22E-2208 shall be paid before payment of any fines or civil penalties. This requirement is separately included in § 22E-2208, and is unnecessary in § 22E-2209. These changes are purely technical, and do not substantively alter current District law.

RCC § 22E-2210. Trademark Counterfeiting.

Explanatory Note. The section establishes the trademark counterfeiting offense for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The offense criminalizes manufacturing, possessing with intent to sell, or offering for sale property bearing or identified by a counterfeit mark. The term "counterfeit mark" is defined in the statute. The revised trademark counterfeiting statute replaces the trademark counterfeiting statute,[1] definitions for the trademark counterfeiting statute[2], and forging or imitating brands or packaging of goods[3] statute in the current D.C. Code.

Subsection (a) specifies the elements of first degree trademark counterfeiting. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that first degree trademark counterfeiting requires that the accused knowingly manufactures for sale, possesses with intent to sell, or offers for sale, property. "Sell" is an undefined term, intended to include any exchange of property for anything of value. "Knowingly" is a defined term[4] and applied here means that the person must be practically certain that he or she is manufacturing, possessing with intent to sell, or offering for sale. The term "property" is defined in RCC § 22E-701, to mean "anything of value" and can include tangible or intangible property, and services. Paragraph (a)(1) also requires that the property bears, or is identified by, a counterfeit mark. The term "counterfeit mark" is defined in RCC § 22E-701. It is not necessary that the counterfeit mark is on the property, as long as the property is identified by the counterfeit mark.[5] Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, a person must know—that is be practically certain—that what is being manufactured, sold, etc. is something of value and that it bears a counterfeit mark.

Paragraph (a)(2) requires that the property, in fact, consists of 100 or more items, or has a total retail value of $5,000 or more.[6] The term "retail value" is defined in RCC § 22E-701. "In fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to the number of items or value of the property involved in the offense.

Subsection (b) specifies the elements of second degree trademark counterfeiting. The elements of second degree trademark counterfeiting are identical to the elements of first degree trademark counterfeiting, except that there is no quantity or value requirement as to the property involved in the offense.

Subsection (c) provides an exclusion to liability under this section if the use of the counterfeit mark would be legal under civil law.[7] There are numerous uses of valid trademarks without the permission of the owner of the trademark, service mark, trade

[4] "Knowingly" is defined in RCC § 22E-206.
[5] For example, if a person places a counterfeit mark on a storefront and sells goods within that do not bear the counterfeit mark, the person may still be guilty of trademark counterfeiting if the goods are identified by the counterfeit mark on the storefront.
[6] The relevant value is of the property bearing the counterfeit mark. For example, if an item is contained in packaging that includes a counterfeit mark, the value of the item shall be used to determine the appropriate penalty grade, not the value of the packaging.

name, label, term, picture, seal, word, or advertisement that meet the definition of a "counterfeit mark" but do not constitute trademark infringement.[8] Any use of a valid trademark that does not constitute trademark infringement is not criminalized under this section.[9] This subsection uses the term "in fact," which is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, and indicates that there is no culpable mental state requirement for this exclusion to liability.

Subsection (d) specifies rules for seizure and disposal of items seized that bear counterfeit marks, and property used in conjunction with violation of this section. Under this provision, items that bear counterfeit marks must be seized, and must be released to the owner of the trademark upon request. If the trademark owner does not request that the items be destroyed, the items must be destroyed or disposed of in a manner requested by the owner. Seizure of other items employed or used in conjunction with violation of this section is discretionary. These items may be seized in accordance with the rules set forth in D.C. Code § 48-905.02.

Subsection (e) specifies that any state or federal certificate of registration of any trademark, service mark, trade name, label, term, picture, seal, word, or advertisement shall be prima facie evidence of the facts stated therein.

Subsection (f) specifies penalties for each grade of the trademark counterfeiting offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (g) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised trademark counterfeiting statute changes current District law in six main ways.

First, the revised statute only includes two penalty gradations based on whether the property, in fact, has a total retail value of $5,000 or more. The current D.C. Code statute includes three penalty grades, with each penalty grade applicable depending on the number of items, the aggregate value of the items, and the number of prior convictions for trademark counterfeiting.[10] By contrast, the revised statute only includes two penalty gradations, eliminating the top gradation and making a $5,000 value the threshold for first degree liability. This change distinguishes between low and high volume conduct and aligns the number of gradations with other current D.C. Code and RCC offenses

[8] For example, using a trademark for satirical purposes constitutes fair use. E.g., Mattel, Inc. v. Walking Mountain Productions, 353 F.3d 792, 807 (9th Cir. 2003) (affirming grant of summary judgment denying trademark infringement claim against photographer who produced and sold images of Barbie dolls in absurd positions and situations).

[9] In addition to non-infringing uses recognized under trademark law, this exclusion to liability applies to any uses of trademarks that are legal under civil law. For example, if a trademark owner authorizes another party to use the trademark under terms of a contract, but the owner disputes the validity of the contract, if the contract is upheld, use of the trademark would not constitute an offense under this section.

[10] Under the current statute, the lowest penalty grade has no minimum number or value of items or services bearing or identified by a counterfeit mark. The second penalty grade requires that the offense involved at least 100, but fewer than 1,000, items bearing a counterfeit mark; items with a total retail value of more than $1,000, but less than $10,000; or that the defendant has one prior conviction for trademark counterfeiting. The highest penalty grade requires that the offense involved at least 1,000 or more items bearing a counterfeit mark; items with a retail value of $10,000 or more; or that the defendant has two or more prior convictions for trademark counterfeiting.

criminalizing the creation and possession of illicit copies of an item.[11] A $5,000 threshold is consistent with other RCC property offense gradations. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised criminal code.

Second, the revised statute does not codify an evidentiary presumption regarding intent to sell or distribute. The current D.C. Code statute contains a "rebuttable presumption" in subsection (a) that a person having possession, custody, or control of more than fifteen items bearing a counterfeit mark had intent to sell or distribute the items. There is no D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) case law on point. By contrast, the RCC omits this statutory inference of intent because it is of questionable constitutionality.[12] However, even with this language omitted, the government may still present evidence of the accused's intent to sell or distribute where there are more than fifteen items and, depending on the nature of the items at issue and other circumstances, an inference of an intent to sell or distribute may well be warranted. This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised statute.

Third, the revised statute eliminates the special recidivist penalty for the offense, consistent with other nonviolent revised offenses in the RCC. The current D.C. Code statute is divided into three penalty grades determined, in part, by the total number of items, or the aggregate value of the property. However, regardless of the number or value of the items, a person may be liable under the second highest penalty grade if the actor has one prior conviction for trademark counterfeiting, and the highest penalty grade if the actor has two or more prior convictions for trademark counterfeiting.[13] In contrast, the revised statute is no longer subject to a recidivist penalty enhancement. The RCC general recidivism enhancement (RCC § 22E-606) is limited to RCC offenses against persons and enhanced burglary, which requires the presence of a dangerous weapon or imitation firearm. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Fourth the revised statute does not specify a minimum fine for this offense. The current D.C. Code statute requires that criminal fines imposed "shall be no less than twice the value of the retail value of the items bearing, or services identified by, a counterfeit mark, unless extenuating circumstances are shown by the defendant."[14] The meaning of "extenuating circumstances" in this provision is unclear, and there is no DCCA case law

[11] RCC § 22E-2105, Unlawful Creation or Possession of a Recording; RCC § 22E-220. Unlawful Labeling of a Recording.

[12] In Reid v. United States, 466 A.2d 433 (D.C. 1983), the DCCA considered whether part of a statute criminalizing obliterating identifying marks on a pistol was constitutional. The statute in part, read "Possession of any pistol, machine gun, or sawed-off shotgun upon which any such mark shall have been changed, altered, removed, or obliterated shall be prima facie evidence that the possessor has changed, altered, removed, or obliterated the same within the District of Columbia[.]" D.C. Code § 22-4512. The DCCA stated that "Statutes, or parts of statutes, authorizing the inference of one fact from the proof of another in criminal cases 'must be regarded as 'irrational' or 'arbitrary,' and hence unconstitutional, unless it can at least be said with substantial assurance that the presumed fact is more likely than not to flow from the proved fact on which it is made to depend.'" Id. (quoting Leary v. United States, 395 U.S. 6, 36 (1969)).

Although the issue has not been litigated before the DCCA, it may be that the portion of the current trademark counterfeiting statute which allows an inference of "intent to sell or distribute" would similarly fail. It is questionable whether it can be said "with substantial assurance" that it is "more likely than not" that a person who possesses more than 15 items had "intent to sell or distribute" them. For example, a person may have a box of more than 15 superhero toy figurines, a set of dinnerware, or t-shirts bearing the counterfeit marking of a brand name for their own personal use.

on point. By contrast, the revised statute provides for possible fines in a manner consistent with other offenses, using the standard RCC penalty classifications. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised criminal code.

Fifth, the revised statute does not include a mandatory seizure and forfeiture provision regarding all personal property used in conjunction with violation of this section. The current D.C. Code statute states that any items bearing a counterfeit mark and all personal property used in connection with a violation of this chapter shall be seized and be subject to forfeiture.[15] There is no DCCA case law on point. By contrast, the revised statute does not mandate that personal property used in connection with violations of this section be seized or subject to forfeiture.[16] However, omitting this language does not preclude such items from being seized or subject to forfeiture. Omitting this language improves the proportionality of the revised criminal code.[17]

Sixth, the revised trademark counterfeiting statute replaces the separate forging or imitating brands or packaging of goods offense under D.C. Code § 22-1502 and, in doing so, eliminates liability for mere use of a counterfeit mark. The forging or imitating brands offense makes it a crime to "forge[], or counterfeit[], or make[] use of any imitation calculated to deceive the public, though with colorable difference or deviation therefrom, of the private brand, wrapper, label, trademark, bottle, or package usually affixed or used by any person to or with the goods, wares, merchandise, preparation, or mixture of such person, with intent to pass off any work, goods, manufacture, compound, preparation, or mixture as the manufacture or production of such person which is not really such[.]"[18] There is no DCCA case law interpreting the current forging or imitating brands or packaging of goods statute. By contrast, under the RCC, conduct constituting forging or imitating brands or packaging is only criminalized if it falls under the revised trademark counterfeiting statute. By contrast, the revised statute clarifies that merely using a counterfeit mark, without intent to sell property bearing or identified by a counterfeit mark, is not criminalized. Omitting this conduct from the revised statute improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised criminal code.

[15] D.C. Code §22-902 (e) ("Any items bearing a counterfeit mark and all personal property, including any items, objects, tools, machines, equipment, instrumentalities, or vehicles of any kind, employed or used in connection with a violation of this chapter shall be seized by any law enforcement officer, including any designated civilian employee of the Metropolitan Police Department, in accordance with the procedures established by § 48-905.02. (1) All seized personal property shall be subject to forfeiture pursuant to the standards and procedures set forth in D.C. Law 20-278.").

[16] In the revised offense items bearing a counterfeit mark still must be seized.

[17] The DCCA has recognized that under the excessive fines clause of the 8th Amendment, asset forfeiture must be proportional. One 1995 Toyota Pick-Up Truck v. District of Columbia, 718 A.2d 558, 560-561 (D.C. 1998) (citing United States v. Bajakajian, 524 U.S. 321 (1998)). The DCCA noted that under the proportionality requires that "the amount of the forfeiture must bear some relationship to the gravity of the offense that it is designed to punish." Id. at 565. Given that many offenses more serious than trademark counterfeiting do not have mandatory forfeiture provisions, it is unnecessary to include one in this statute.

[18] The statute reads in its entirety: "Whoever wilfully forges, or counterfeits, or makes use of any imitation calculated to deceive the public, though with colorable difference or deviation therefrom, of the private brand, wrapper, label, trademark, bottle, or package usually affixed or used by any person to or with the goods, wares, merchandise, preparation, or mixture of such person, with intent to pass off any work, goods, manufacture, compound, preparation, or mixture as the manufacture or production of such person which is not really such, shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not more than 180 days, or both."

Beyond these six substantive changes to current District law, six other aspects of the revised trademark counterfeiting statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised trademark counterfeiting statute specifies that the actor must "knowingly" manufacture, possess, or offer property for sale. Both the current trademark counterfeiting and forging or imitating brands statutes require that the actor must act "willfully."[19] The term "willfully" is not defined in either statute, and there is no DCCA case law on point with respect to either statute. To resolve this ambiguity, the revised statute requires the actor engage in conduct "knowingly," a defined term in the RCC. Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[20] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised criminal code.

Second, under the revised trademark counterfeiting statute, prosecutions based on manufacturing property bearing or identified with a counterfeit mark require that the property be for commercial sale. The current D.C. Code statutory language clearly covers manufacturing property bearing or identified by a counterfeit mark, but it is unclear whether manufacturing property not for commercial sale constitutes a violation of the statute.[21] There is no relevant DCCA case law. To resolve this ambiguity, the revised statute clarifies that manufacturing that is not for commercial sale is not prohibited. The property loss to the rightful holder of a trademark appears to be extremely low or negligible for an actor's misuse of the trademark in making property not offered for sale. This change improves the proportionality of the revised criminal code.

Third, the revised trademark counterfeiting statute replaces the separate forging or imitating brands or packaging of goods offense under D.C. Code § 22-1502 and, in doing so, does not specifically include reference to imitations of a "wrapper," "bottle," or "package." The current forging or imitating brands or packaging of goods statute refers to the use of a wrapper, bottle, or package,[22] although it is unclear whether the current forging or imitating brands or packaging of goods covers the use of wrappers, bottles, or packages that do not include any trademarks, trade names, labels, or other information that would constitute a "counterfeit mark." There is no relevant DCCA case law. To resolve this ambiguity, the definition of "counterfeit mark" does not specifically include wrappers, bottles or packages. Use of wrappers, bottles, or packaging may be covered by the revised

[19] D.C. Code §§ 22-902, 22-1502.

[20] See Elonis v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2001, 2009 (2015) ("[O]ur cases have explained that a defendant generally must 'know the facts that make his conduct fit the definition of the offense,' even if he does not know that those facts give rise to a crime. (Internal citation omitted)").

[21] For example, if a person makes a handbag or t-shirt with a counterfeit trademark drawn on it, for his or her own personal use, it is unclear if that constitutes a violation of the current statute.

[22] The statute reads in its entirety: "Whoever wilfully forges, or counterfeits, or makes use of any imitation calculated to deceive the public, though with colorable difference or deviation therefrom, of the private brand, wrapper, label, trademark, bottle, or package usually affixed or used by any person to or with the goods, wares, merchandise, preparation, or mixture of such person, with intent to pass off any work, goods, manufacture, compound, preparation, or mixture as the manufacture or production of such person which is not really such, shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not more than 180 days, or both."

statute only if they constitute a "counterfeit mark."[23] Omitting reference to wrappers, bottles, or packages improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised criminal code.

Fourth, the revised trademark counterfeiting statute replaces the separate forging or imitating brands or packaging of goods offense under D.C. Code § 22-1502 and, in doing so, does not specify that it includes counterfeits with "colorable difference or deviation" from the original. The forging or imitating brands or packaging of goods statute specifies that it covers "any imitation calculated to deceive the public, though with colorable difference or deviation therefrom, of the private brand, wrapper, label, trademark, bottle, or package…." It is unclear what constitutes a "colorable difference or deviation," and whether it is possible that use of a mark that significantly differs from a valid trademark is covered by the forging or imitating brands statute. There is no DCCA case law on point. To resolve this ambiguity, the revised statute extends liability only for a "counterfeit mark" and does not define "counterfeit mark" as including (or excluding) items with a colorable difference or deviation from the original. Omitting this language improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised criminal code.

Fifth, the revised statute codifies an exclusion from liability if the use of a trademark does not constitute infringement under civil law. The current statute does not include any reference to non-infringing uses of trademarks. However, under current civil law, in certain circumstances a person may copy or use a valid trademark without permission, even for commercial purposes.[24] There is no DCCA case law on point. To resolve this ambiguity, the revised statute clarifies that uses of trademarks that are legal under civil law are not criminalized. This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised criminal code.

Sixth, the definition of "person" in RCC § 22E-701 is applicable to all RCC property offenses and provisions, including the definitions of "actor," "complainant," "owner," and "property of another," which in turn rely on the definition of "person" in the RCC property offenses. The definition of "person" in RCC § 22E-701 establishes that "person" categorically includes both natural persons and non-human legal entities such as trusts, estates, companies, etc. The RCC definition of "person" is substantively identical to the definition of "person" in current D.C. Code § 22-3201(2A), which is limited to the Theft, Fraud, Stolen Property, Forgery, and Extortion offenses and other provisions in Chapter 32 of the current D.C. Code Title 22. The current D.C. Code § 22-3201(2A) definition of "person" does not apply to property offenses codified outside of current Chapter 32 of Title 22 despite a similar scope of conduct.[25] Resolving this ambiguity, the [23] Many wrappers, bottles or packages have trademarks, trade names, or labels affixed to them. Use of such wrappers, bottles, or packages could constitute trademark counterfeiting.

[24] E.g., Mattel, Inc. v. Walking Mountain Productions, 353 F.3d 792, 807 (9th Cir. 2003) (affirming grant of summary judgment denying trademark infringement claim against photographer who produced and sold images of a Barbie doll in absurd positions and situations).

[25] It should be noted that there is a definition of "person" in D.C. Code § 45-604 that applies to the current D.C. Code. See D.C. Code §§ 45-601 (rule of construction stating that "[i]n the interpretation and construction of this Code the following rules shall be observed."); 45-604 (stating that "person" "shall be held to apply to partnerships and corporations, unless such construction would be unreasonable, and the reference to any officer shall include any person authorized by law to perform the duties of his office, unless the context shows that such words were intended to be used in a more limited sense."). However, this definition is not dispositive and in some D.C. Code property offenses outside Chapter 32 of Title 22, revised statute uses the definition of "person" in RCC § 22E-701. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, under the revised statute, the definition of the term "counterfeit mark" replaces the current definitions for both "counterfeit mark" and "intellectual property." However, the revised definition is not intended to substantively change current District law. The current definition of "counterfeit mark" includes "any unauthorized reproduction or copy of intellectual property" or "intellectual property affixed to any item knowingly sold, offered for sale, manufactured, or distributed, or identifying services offered or rendered without the authority of the owner of the intellectual property[.]"[26] In turn, "intellectual property" is defined as "any trademark, service mark, trade name, label, term, picture, seal, word, or advertisement or any combination of these adopted or used by a person to identify such person's goods or services and which is lawfully filed for record in the Office of the Secretary of State of any state or which the exclusive right to reproduce is guaranteed under the laws of the United States or the District of Columbia."[27] The revised definition of "counterfeit mark" incorporates the current definition of "intellectual property," and requires that the mark be used "without the permission of the owner[.]" The term "without the permission" is intended to have the same meaning as "without authority" or "unauthorized." The revised definition of "counterfeit mark" is not intended to substantively change current District law.

Second, the revised statute does not specify that the value of the items involved in the offense be determined by the aggregate value of the items or services bearing or identified by a counterfeit mark. This change is not intended to change current District law. The general aggregation of value statute[28] will apply to the revised trademark counterfeiting statute.

the term "person" is not used at all (e.g., the current malicious destruction of property statute, D.C. Code § 22-303, does not use the term "person," instead referring to "whoever").

RCC § 22E-2301. Extortion.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the extortion offense and penalty gradations for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The offense punishes taking another person's property by inducing their consent by means of coercive threat. The penalty gradations are based on the value of the property involved in the crime. The revised extortion offense is closely related to the revised theft and fraud offenses.[1] It differs from theft because in extortion the defendant has the owner's consent obtained by using a coercive threat. It differs from fraud because in fraud the defendant uses deception, rather than a coercive threat, to obtain the owner's consent. The revised extortion offense replaces the extortion;[2] recordation of deed, contract, or conveyance with intent to extort money;[3] and to the extent that it involves conduct with intent to obtain property, blackmail[4] statutes in the current D.C. Code.

Subsection (a) specifies the elements of first degree extortion. Paragraph (a)(1) requires that the defendant takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over property of another. "Property," a term defined in RCC § 22E-701, means something of value and includes goods, services, and cash. Further, the property must be "property of another," a term defined in RCC § 22E-701 which means that some other person has a legal interest in the property at issue that the accused cannot infringe upon without consent. Paragraph (a)(1) also specifies a culpable mental state of knowledge, a term defined in RCC § 22E-206 which here requires that the accused must be aware to a practical certainty that he or she would take, obtain, transfer, or exercise control over property of another.

Paragraph (a)(2) states that the must take, obtain, transfer, or exercise control over property with "consent" of an owner. The term consent is defined in RCC § 22E-701, and chiefly requires some words or actions that indicate an owner's agreement to allow the accused to take, obtain, transfer, or exercise control over the property. "Owner" is also defined to mean a person holding an interest in property that the accused is not privileged to interfere with without consent.[9] Per the rule of interpretation in 22E-207, the "knowingly" mental state in paragraph (a)(1) also applies to the element "with the consent of an owner" in paragraph (a)(2), which requires that the accused was practically certain that he or she had an owner's consent.

Paragraph (a)(2) also codifies the element that distinguishes extortion from the revised theft and fraud offenses—that the consent in paragraph (a)(2) be obtained by an explicit or implicit coercive threat, a term defined in RCC § 22E-701.[5] Coercive threats a variety of threats that pressure a person to agree to give the defendant the property.[6] The definition of "coercive threat" prohibits "communicat[ing]" specified harms such as

[1] RCC § 22E-2101 and RCC § 22E-2201, respectively.
[2] D.C. Code § 22-3251.
[3] D.C. Code § 22-1402.
[4] D.C. Code § 22-3252.
[5] A coercive threat may come in the form of a verbal or written communication, however gestures or other conduct may also suffice. In addition, the statute specifies that the coercive threat need not be explicit. Communications and conduct that are implicitly threatening given the circumstances may satisfy this element. For example, depending on the context, saying "it would be a shame if anything happened to your store," may constitute an implicit threat of property damage.
[6] See, Commentary to definition of "coercive threat" accompanying RCC § 22E-701.

accusing someone of a criminal offense, as well as sufficiently serious harms that would cause a reasonable person to comply. The verb "communicates" is intended to be broadly construed, encompassing all speech[7] and other messages,[8] which includes gestures or other conduct,[9] that are received and understood by another person. Per the rule of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" mental state in paragraph (a)(1) also applies to paragraph (a)(2), requiring the defendant to be aware to a practical certainty that victim's consent is obtained by coercive threat.

Paragraph (a)(3) requires that the defendant acted "with intent to" deprive an owner of property. "Deprive" is a defined term meaning that the other person is unlikely to recover the property, or that it will be withheld permanently or long enough to lose a substantial portion of its value or benefit. "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the defendant was practically certain that he or she would "deprive" an owner of the property. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that such a deprivation actually occurred, only that the defendant believed to a practical certainty that a deprivation would result.

Paragraph (a)(4) requires that the property, in fact, has a value of more than $500,000. "Value" is a defined elsewhere in RCC § 22E-701. "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, and indicates that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to the value of the property.

Subsections (b)-(e) specify the elements for second, third, fourth, and fifth degree extortion. The elements of each grade of extortion are identical to the elements of first degree extortion, except for the value of the property. Each subsection specifies a minimum value required for the property, except for fifth degree extortion, which has no specific minimum value.[10] As with first degree extortion, strict liability applies to value of the property in each grade of extortion.

Subsection (f) specifies penalties for each grade of the extortion offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (g) cross references definitions found elsewhere in the RCC.

[7] The term "speech" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and means oral or written language, symbols, or gestures.

[8] A person may communicate through non-verbal conduct such as displaying a weapon. See State v. Murphy, 545 N.W.2d 909, 915 (Minn. 1996) ("Many physical acts considered in context communicate a terroristic threat. We may find our examples in the case law, such as drawing a finger across one's throat or discharging a firearm over the telephone; in the movies, such as boiling a rabbit on the stove in the tranquil setting of former paramour's new family home, or placing a severed horse's head in a bed; or as here, depositing dead animals at a residence or planting a fake bomb. Life is replete with such examples, and whatever the source, the principle is the same: physical acts communicate a threat that its originator will act according to its tenor." (Internal quotations omitted.)).

[9] For example, if a person consistently beats people who refuse to comply with his demands, this pattern of conduct may constitute a coercive threat when that person makes similar demands of others. In addition ongoing infliction of harm may constitute communication, if it communicates that harm will continue in the future.

[10] However, as defined in RCC § 22E-701, "property" means "anything of value[.]" Therefore, although fifth degree extortion does not specify any minimum value, as defined in the RCC, "property" must have some value.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised extortion statute changes current District law in five main ways.

First, the revised extortion statute no longer specially punishes attempts to commit the offense the same as the completed offense. The current extortion statute[11] states that it is an offense if the person "obtains or attempts to obtain" property, and the current blackmail statute[12] is an inchoate offense that does not require the defendant to actually obtain property. There is no clear rationale for such a special attempt provision for extortion as compared to other offenses. Under the revised extortion statute, the General Part's attempt provisions[13] will establish liability for attempted extortion consistent with other offenses. Differentiating conduct that does and does not result in depriving someone of property improves the proportionality of the offense.

Second, by its use of the new definition of coercive threat in RCC § 22E-701 the revised extortion statute makes several changes to the means by which the defendant induces the owner's consent. The current extortion statute prohibits four means of obtaining consent: (1) the use of actual force or violence, (2) the threatened use of force or violence, (3) a wrongful threat of economic injury, and (4) under color or pretense of official right.[14] The current blackmail offense[15] prohibits additional means of obtaining consent, including threats "to accuse any person of a crime; to expose a secret or publicize an asserted fact, whether or true or false, tending to subject any person to hatred, contempt, or ridicule; or to impair the reputation of any person, including a deceased person."[16] In contrast, the revised extortion statute is somewhat narrower than the current extortion and blackmail offenses insofar as actual use of force has been eliminated from the statute as a means of obtaining property to reduce overlap with robbery.[17] However, the revised extortion offense also is broader than either the current extortion or blackmail statutes by including new conduct—threatening to "[n]otify a federal, state, or local government agency or official of, or publicize, another person's immigration or citizenship status" or to "[c]ause harm that is sufficiently serious, under all the surrounding circumstances, to compel a reasonable person of the same background and in the same circumstances as the complainant to comply."[18] Otherwise, the means by which the defendant induces the victim's consent in revised extortion offense is generally the same as the current extortion and blackmail offenses. The current "threatened use of force or violence" prong is covered by the revised offense's inclusion of threats to engage in conduct constituting an "offense against persons" or a "property offense."[19] And the final alternative in the current statute, involving obtaining property under color or pretense of right, also remains in the revised statute.[20] The revised extortion includes each of these forms of conduct via the definition of coercive threat. These changes reduce unnecessary gaps and overlap among revised offenses.

Third, the revised extortion statute requires that the defendant has intent to deprive an owner of the property. Neither the current extortion statute nor the current blackmail statute has comparable provisions;[21] and there is no relevant D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) case law. Instances where the defendant extorts property for temporary use or causes the owner to lose a slight benefit are covered by the revised unauthorized use of property offense,[22] which is a lesser-included offense of extortion. Inclusion of the "intent to deprive" element reduces unnecessary overlap between offenses, creates consistent offense definitions across extortion, theft,[23] and fraud,[24] and improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

Fourth, the revised extortion statute increases the number and type of grade distinctions, grading based on the value of the property extorted. The current extortion and blackmail offenses are not graded at all, and give a flat penalty that does not vary based on whether the offender obtains expensive property or merely attempts to obtain or intends to obtain an item of trivial value.[25] By contrast, the revised extortion offense has a total of five gradations based on the value of the property involved, with a value of $250,000 or more being the most serious grade. The increase in gradations, differentiated by offense seriousness, improves the proportionality of the offense.[26] The gradations in the revised offense also create consistency with the dollar-value distinctions in related theft[27] and fraud[28] offenses.

Fifth, the provision in RCC § 22E-2001, "Aggregation to Determine Property Offense Grades," allows aggregation of value for the revised extortion offense based on a single scheme or systematic course of conduct. The current extortion and blackmail offenses are not part of the current aggregation of value provision for property offenses.[29]

Code § 22-3252(b) ("Any person convicted of blackmail shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned for not more than 5 years, or both.") [26] Under the revised extortion statute and both the current extortion and blackmail statutes, a wide range of behavior is punished equally. E.g., threats of both a trivial amount of property damage and threats of serious bodily harm equally satisfy the current and revised extortion statutes. However, grading based on the value of property involved may not only improve proportionality with respect to the property loss, but, indirectly, the seriousness of the coercion. Relatively minor forms of coercion would seem inherently unlikely to be successful in causing a person to consent to giving up very high value property.

As noted above, the current extortion and blackmail offenses are not graded based on value of the property involved. The revised extortion statute permits aggregation for determining the appropriate grade of extortion to ensure penalties are proportional.

Beyond these five main changes to current District law, four other aspects of the revised extortion statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised extortion offense requires a culpable mental state of knowledge for paragraphs (a)(1)-(a)(3), (b)(1)-(b)(3), etc. The current extortion statute does not specify a culpable mental state and the blackmail statute only refers to an "intent to obtain property of another or to cause another to do or refrain from doing any act."[30] No case law exists on point, although legislative history suggests that the Council expected some mental state would apply via the use of the term "wrongful" in the current extortion statute's text.[31] Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[32] Requiring a knowing culpable mental state also makes the revised extortion offense consistent with the revised fraud statute and other property offenses, which generally require that the defendant act knowingly with respect to the elements of the offense.[33]

Second, the revised extortion offense uses the phrase "takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over property of another[.]"[34] The current extortion[35] and blackmail[36] statutes require proof of an attempt to, or intent to, "obtain" the property of another. The term "obtain" is not statutorily defined, nor is there any relevant DCCA case law. It is possible that the current term "obtain" does not include all conduct that constitutes transferring or exercising control over property.[37] Using the revised language of "takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over" improves the clarity of the statute, reduces possible unnecessary gaps, and makes the revised extortion offense consistent with the revised fraud statute and other property offenses.

Third, the revised extortion statute does not explicitly include making a "wrongful threat of economic injury." The current extortion statute[38] includes the phrase "wrongful threat of economic injury," but the phrase is not defined in the statute, and there is no

[37] For example, if a defendant uses a coercive threat to compel another person to transfer funds to a bank account that the defendant does not control, under the current statute it is unclear whether the defendant has "obtained" those funds.

relevant DCCA case law. The legislative history notes that this language was "not intended to cover the threat of labor strikes or other labor activities," or "consumer boycotts,"[39] but is intended to cover "a leader of an organization [who] threatens to strike or boycott in order to extort anything of value for his personal benefit, unrelated to the interest of the group he represents."[40] However, the RCC's definition of "coercive threats" does not specifically include a "wrongful threat of economic injury." While the revised extortion statute is not intended to criminalize threats of labor strikes or consumer boycotts, certain types of threats of economic injury may still satisfy the catch-all provision in the "coercive threat" definition.[41] However, because it is not clear exactly what constitutes a "wrongful threat of economic injury under current law," it is unclear whether the catch-all provision would necessarily cover all such threats. This change clarifies and improves the consistency of the revised statute.

Fourth, by reference to the RCC's definition of coercive threat, the revised extortion statute includes threats to "distribute a photograph, video or audio recording . . . that tends to subject another person to, or perpetuate: Hatred, contempt, ridicule, or other significant injury to personal reputation; [or] significant injury to credit or business reputation."[42] The current blackmail statute covers threatening to "expose a secret or publicize an asserted fact, whether true or false, tending to subject any person to hatred, contempt, ridicule, embarrassment, or other injury to reputation[.]"[43] The current blackmail statute does not specify whether distributing photographs, videos, or audio recordings, constitutes "expos[ing] a secret or publiciz[ing] an asserted fact[.]"[44] The current blackmail statute also does not specify whether threatening to expose secrets or assert facts that perpetuate hatred, contempt, or ridicule[45] are covered. There is no relevant DCCA case law addressing either issue. By contrast, through reference to the definition of "coercive threat," the revised extortion statute clarifies that the revised offense includes threats to distribute photographs, videos, or audio recordings, and to expose or publicize information that would subject a person to, or perpetuate, hatred, contempt, ridicule, or other significant injury to personal reputation, or significant injury to credit or business reputation. This change improves the clarity of the revised offense and may close gaps in current law.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

The revised extortion offense uses the phrase "consent of an owner". The phrase "the other's consent" is used in the current extortion statute,[46] and is implicit in the blackmail statute insofar as it supposes the threat will cause a person to engage in conduct that results in the defendant obtaining property.[47] The term "consent" is not defined in the current statute. Per RCC § 22E-701, "consent" is a defined term, here chiefly meaning that the owner of the property gives words or actions that indicate a preference for particular conduct. Reference to this definition is not intended to change current District law.

RCC § 22E-2401. Possession of Stolen Property.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the possession of stolen property (PSP) offense and penalty gradations for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The offense proscribes knowingly buying or possessing property, believing the property to be stolen, with intent to deprive an owner of the property. The five penalty gradations vary based on the value of the property. The revised PSP offense replaces the receiving stolen property[1] statute in the current D.C. Code.

Subsection (a) specifies the elements of first degree PSP. Paragraph (a)(1) requires that the accused knowingly buys or possesses property. Possess is a term defined in RCC § 22E-701 to mean to "hold or carry on one's person," or to "have the ability and desire to exercise control over." Property is a term defined in RCC § 22E-701, to mean something of value which includes goods, services, and cash. Paragraph (a)(1) also specifies that a "knowingly" culpable mental state applies, a term defined in RCC § 22E-206 which here requires that the accused was practically certain that he or she would buy or possess property.

Paragraph (a)(2) requires that the accused acted "with intent that" the property be stolen. "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206, here meaning that the accused was practically certain that the property was stolen. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent that" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that the property was actually stolen, just that the accused believed to a practical certainty that the property was stolen.

Paragraph (a)(3) requires that the accused acted with intent to deprive an owner of property. "Deprive" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 meaning an owner is unlikely to recover the object or it is withheld permanently or long enough to lose a substantial part of its value or benefit. "Intent" also is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 meaning the accused was practically certain he or she would "deprive" an owner of the property. It is not necessary to prove that such a deprivation actually occurred, just that the accused was practically certain that a deprivation would result. If a person only intends to temporarily possess the stolen property, or to return it to its rightful owner or to law enforcement, he has not committed PSP.

Paragraph (a)(4) requires that the property, in fact, has a value of more than $500,000. "Value" is a defined elsewhere in RCC § 22E-701. "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, and indicates that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to the value of the property.

Subsections (b)-(e) specify the elements for second, third, fourth, and fifth degree PSP. The elements of each grade of PSP are identical to the elements of first degree PSP, except for the value of the property. Each subsection specifies a minimum required property value, except for fifth degree PSP, which has no specific minimum value.[2] As with first degree PSP, strict liability applies to value in each grade of PSP.

[2] However, as defined in RCC § 22E-701, "property" means "anything of value[.]" Therefore, although fifth degree PSP does not specify any minimum value, as defined in the RCC, "property" must have some value.

Subsection (f) specifies penalties for each grade of the PSP offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (g) cross references definitions found elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised PSP statute changes current District law in two main ways.

First, the revised PSP statute requires that the defendant have "intent to deprive" an owner of the property. The current D.C. Code statute does not require intent to deprive.[3] Consequently, appears that a person commits a crime even if he or she only intends to temporarily possess the stolen property, or intends to return the stolen property to its rightful owner. Case law has not directly addressed the matter.[4] In contrast, by including intent to deprive as a statutory element, the revised offense ensures that a person who possesses stolen property with intent to return it to its rightful owner is not liable for PSP and places the burden of proof as to the element of intent on the government.[5] Under the RCC definition of "deprive,"[6] the PSP offense's intent to deprive element requires that the accused possessed or bought the property intending to permanently deprive an owner of the property or of a substantial benefit of the property. This change clarifies and improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

Second, the revised statute increases the number of penalty gradations. The current D.C. Code receiving stolen property offense is limited to two gradations based solely on value—first degree receiving stolen property involves property with a value of $1,000 or more and is punished as a felony; second degree receiving stolen property involves property valued at less than $1,000 and is a misdemeanor. In contrast, the revised PSP offense has a total of five gradations which span a much greater range in value, with a value of $500,000 or more being the most serious grade. The increase in gradations, differentiated by offense seriousness, improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

[3] Although requiring intent to deprive is a departure from current District law, it is worth noting that up until 2012, the District's receiving stolen property offense included an intent to deprive element. RECEIVING STOLEN PROPERTY AND PUBLIC SAFETY AMENDMENT ACT of 2011. D.C. Law 19-120. D.C. Act 19-262.

[4] The D.C. Court of Appeals, in interpreting the prior version of the statute, had held that receiving stolen property is a "specific intent" crime. Lihlakha v. United States, 89 A.3d 479, 489 n.26 (D.C. 2014). In Lihlakha, the DCCA discussed whether there was sufficient evidence for "finding that, at the time appellant acted in receiving the stolen property, she intended to deprive Banks of the right to her computer or a related benefit." 89 A.3d at 484. The Court noted that although the "intent to deprive" element had been deleted from the receiving stolen property statute after the defendant's alleged conduct at issue, under the Ex Post Facto Clause, the prior statute's "intent to deprive" element was still required. This suggests that under the current statute, which does not include an intent to deprive element, a person could be convicted of receiving stolen property, even if he possesses the stolen property with intent to return it. However, the DCCA has never squarely addressed this issue for the current statute, since its holding in Lihlakha.

[5] Including an intent to deprive element is also intended to codify the return-for-reward defense recognized by the DCCA in Lihlakha v. United States, 89 A.3d 479, 786-87 (D.C. 2014) (Four conditions must be satisfied for the accused to have a valid defense that he or she intended to return the property for a reward: (1) The reward had been announced, or was believed to have been announced, before the property was possessed or agreed to be possessed; (2) the person claiming the reward had nothing to do with the theft; (3) the possessor returned the property without unreasonable delay to the rightful owner or to a law enforcement officer; and (4) the possessor imposed no condition on return of the property.).

[6] RCC § 22E-701.

Beyond these two main changes to current District law, one other aspect of the revised PSP statute may constitute a substantive change of law.

The revised PSP offense requires that the accused knowingly buys or possesses property. The current receiving stolen property statute does not specify a culpable mental state for these elements and there is no D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) case law on point. However, given the current and revised offenses' requirements that the accused at least believe the property to be stolen, a knowing culpable mental state as to buying or possessing property appears appropriate. Requiring a knowing culpable mental state also makes the revised PSP offense consistent with the revised trafficking stolen property statute and other property offenses, which generally require that the accused act knowingly with respect to the elements of the offense.[7] This change improves the clarity, completeness, and consistency of the revised offense.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, the revised statute criminalizes buying or possessing stolen property, but omits the words "receives" or "obtains control over." Omission of these words is not intended to change the scope of the offense. The words "buys" and "possesses" are intended to be broad enough to cover every instance in which a person receives or obtains control over property.

Second, using the inchoate "with intent" mental state with respect to whether the property is stolen is intended to clarify that the accused must have had an actual subjective belief that the property was stolen, but that the property need not have actually been stolen. The current statute requires that the accused either knew, or "[had] reason to believe that the property has been stolen[.]"[8] Although this language could be interpreted to mean that the accused should have known that the property was stolen, and a negligence mental state could suffice, the DCCA has rejected this interpretation. Instead, the DCCA has held that this language requires that the accused had an actual subjective belief, even if erroneous, that the property was stolen.[9] Using the "with intent" inchoate mental state is consistent with this case law. The current statute's subsection (b) also specifies that the "stolen property" need not be actually stolen if the accused otherwise committed the elements of the crime and he or she "believed" the property to be stolen.[10] The elimination of the current offense's subsection (b) is consistent with the revised definition's use of "intent" to indicate that the property need not actually be stolen so long as the accused was practically certain that it was stolen.

RCC § 22E-2402. Trafficking of Stolen Property.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the trafficking in stolen property (TSP) offense and penalty gradations for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The offense criminalizes knowingly buying or possessing stolen property, on two or more occasions, with intent to sell, trade, or pledge the property in exchange for anything of value. The five penalty gradations are based on the aggregate value of the property involved in the crime. The revised TSP offense replaces the trafficking stolen property[1] statute in the current D.C. Code.

Subsection (a) specifies the elements of first degree TSP. Paragraph (a)(1) requires that the accused knowingly buys or possesses property. Possess is a term defined in RCC § 22E-701 to mean "to mean to "hold or carry on one's person," or to "have the ability and desire to exercise control over." Property," is a term defined in RCC § 22E-701, means something of value which includes goods, services, and cash. Paragraph (a)(1) also specifies that a "knowingly" culpable mental state applies, a term defined in RCC § 22E-206 which here requires that the accused must be aware to a practical certainty that he or she would buy or possess property.

Paragraph (a)(1) also specifies that the accused must have bought or possessed property on two or more occasions, an element that distinguishes TSP from the possession of stolen property (PSP) revised offense. TSP is directed at the conduct of habitual fences, who provide a market for stolen goods and thereby create further incentive for theft. An isolated incident of possessing stolen property with intent to sell, trade, or pledge it does not constitute a violation of this section. Even if a person sells multiple pieces of stolen property in a single transaction, this does not constitute two separate occasions required under the revised statute. The two occasions must be based on possession of different pieces of property at different points in time.[2] The "knowingly" mental state also applies to the "two or more separate occasions" element.

Paragraph (a)(2) requires that the accused acted "with intent that" the property be stolen. "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206, here meaning that the accused was practically certain that the property was stolen. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent that" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that the property was actually stolen, just that the accused believed to a practical certainty that the property was stolen.

Paragraph (a)(3) requires that the accused possessed the property with intent to sell, pledge as consideration, or trade the property. It is not required that the accused actually sells, pledges, or trades the property, but he or she must have consciously desired, or been practically certain that he or she would do so. If the accused possesses or buys stolen property on two separate occasions, but in only one of those occasions had intent to sell, pledge, or trade the property, that is insufficient for a TSP conviction.

Paragraph (a)(4) requires that the property, in fact, has a value of more than $250,000. "Value" is a defined in RCC § 22E-701. "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, and indicates that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to the value of the property.

[1] D.C. Code § 22-3231.

[2] See also D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 5-305.

Subsections (b)-(e) specify the elements for second, third, fourth, and fifth degree TSP. The elements of each grade of TSP are identical to the elements of first degree TSP, expect for the value of the property. Each subsection specifies a minimum required property value, except for fifth degree TSP, which has no specific minimum value.[3] As with first degree TSP, strict liability applies to value in each grade of TSP.

Subsection (f) specifies the penalties for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.] Subsection (f) grades TSP according to the value of the total property trafficked.[4] The value of the property that the defendant bought or possessed with intent to sell or trade may be aggregated to determine the appropriate grade of the offense.[5] The words "in fact" are a defined term in the RCC, and are used in every penalty gradation to specify that there is no culpable mental state as to the aggregated value of the property. The defendant is strictly liable as to the aggregated value of the property.

Subsection (g) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised TSP statute changes current District law in one main way.

The revised statute increases the number and type of grade distinctions. The current TSP offense is limited to one penalty grade, irrespective of the value of the property involved.[6] In contrast, the revised TSP offense has a total of five gradations which span the same range in value as the possession of stolen property offense and other property offenses, with a value of $500,000 or more being the most serious grade. The increase in gradations, differentiated by offense seriousness, improves the proportionality of the offense.

Beyond this main change to current District law, one other aspect of the revised TSP statute may constitute a substantive change of law.

---

[3] However, as defined in RCC § 22E-701, "property" means "anything of value[.]" Therefore, although fifth degree TSP does not specify any minimum value, as defined in the RCC, "property" must have some value.

[4] For example, if the value of the property is less than $250, it is fifth degree TSP; if the value of the property is $250,000 or more, it is first degree TSP.

[5] RCC § 22E-2001. The revised TSP statute allows for considerable prosecutorial discretion in determining how many counts to charge if the defendant has trafficked in stolen property on several occasions. For example, if a person traffics in stolen property on four separate occasions, and the value of the stolen property in each occasion is $525, the defendant could be charged with a single count of fourth degree TSP, since the aggregate value of the property is $2100, which falls within the value threshold for fourth degree TSP. This person at most could be convicted of a single count with a maximum [] sentence. However, the defendant could also be charged with two counts of fourth degree TSP, with each count relying on two occasions of trafficking stolen property with an aggregate value of $1050, which also falls within the value threshold for fourth degree TSP. Due to charging decisions, the person could face two convictions, and a maximum allowable sentence of six years. In these cases, even if the government could prove each occasion of trafficking and obtain two convictions, the sentencing judge would still retain discretion to merge the convictions if a single conviction were sufficient given the severity of the defendant's conduct. Alternatively, even if the defendant were convicted and sentenced on multiple counts, the sentencing judge could also order that the sentences be served concurrently.

[6] D.C. Code § 22-3231(d). Whether a person traffics in $1 stolen pens, or $1000 stolen watches, the current statute authorizes a ten year maximum sentence.

The revised TSP offense requires that the accused knowingly buys or possesses property on two or more separate occasions. The current statute does not specify a culpable mental state for these elements and there is no relevant D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) case law. However, given the current and revised offenses' requirements that the accused at least believe the property to be stolen, a knowing culpable mental state as to buying or possessing property appears appropriate. Requiring a knowing culpable mental state also makes the revised TSP offense consistent with the revised possession of stolen property statute and other property offenses, which generally require that the accused act knowingly with respect to the elements of the offense.[7] This change improves the clarity, completeness, and consistency of the revised offense.

First, the revised statute requires that the accused either possess or buy property, with intent to sell, pledge as consideration, or trade the property. This is in contrast to the current statute, which, in part, defines "traffics" as "to buy, receive, possess, or obtain control of property with intent to [sell, pledge, transfer, distribute, dispense, or otherwise dispose of property to another]."[8] The revised offense eliminates redundant wording. The words "sell, pledge as consideration, or trade" in the revised statute are intended to be broad enough to cover conduct covered by "transfer, distribute, dispense, or otherwise dispose of property" as used in the current statute. Similarly, "buys" and "possesses" in the revised offense are intended to be broad enough to cover every instance in which a person receives or obtains control over property. The RCC's definition of possession requires that the person exercises control over property, whether or not the property is on one's person, for a period of time sufficient to allow the actor to terminate his or her control of the property. However, reference to this definition does not change the scope of the offense. Any time a person engages in conduct to "transfer, distribute, dispense, or otherwise dispose of property" that person necessarily exercises control over property for a period of time sufficient to allow the actor to terminate his or her control of the property.[9] The revised offense makes no change to the statute's scope by only requiring proof the accused buys or possesses property with intent to sell, pledge as consideration, or trade it.

Second, using the inchoate "with intent" mental state with respect to whether the property is stolen is intended to clarify that the accused must have had an actual subjective belief that the property was stolen, but that the property need not have actually been stolen. The current statute requires that the accused either knew, or "[had] reason to believe that the property has been stolen[.]"[10] Although this language could be interpreted to mean that the accused should have known that the property was stolen, and a negligence mental state could suffice, the DCCA has rejected this interpretation for identical language in the current receiving stolen property statute.[11] The DCCA held that such language requires that the accused had an actual subjective belief, even if erroneous, that the property was stolen.[12] Using the "with intent" inchoate mental state is consistent with this case law. The current TSP statute's subsection (c) also specifies that the "stolen property" need not be actually stolen if the accused otherwise committed the elements of the crime and he or she "believed" the property to be stolen.[13] The elimination of the current statute's subsection (c) is consistent with the revised statute's use of "intent" to indicate that the property need not actually be stolen so long as the accused believed it was stolen.

RCC § 22E-2403. Alteration of a Motor Vehicle Identification Number.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the alteration of a vehicle identification number (AVIN) offense and penalty for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). This offense criminalizes knowingly altering a vehicle identification number (VIN) with intent to conceal or misrepresent the identity of the motor vehicle or motor vehicle part. The revised AVIN offense replaces the existing offense of altering or removing motor vehicle identification numbers[1] in the current D.C. Code.

Subsection (a) specifies the elements of first degree AVIN. Paragraph (a)(1) requires that the accused knowingly alters an identification number of a motor vehicle or motor vehicle part. "Alters" is an undefined term, intended to be broadly construed. "Motor vehicle" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701, and includes any vehicle designed to be propelled only by an internal-combustion engine or electricity.[2] The term "vehicle identification number" is also a defined term in RCC § 22E-701, and means "a number or symbol that is originally inscribed or affixed by the manufacturer to a motor vehicle or motor vehicle part for purposes of identification." Paragraph (a)(1) also specifies that a "knowingly" culpable mental state applies, a term defined in RCC § 22E-206 which here requires that the accused must be aware to a practical certainty that he or she would alter an identification number of a motor vehicle or motor vehicle part.

Paragraph (a)(2) further specifies that the accused must alter a VIN "with intent to" conceal or misrepresent the identity of the motor vehicle or motor vehicle part. "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206, which here means the accused was practically certain that he or she would conceal or misrepresent the identity of the motor vehicle or motor vehicle part. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not required that the accused actually conceals or misrepresents the identity of the motor vehicle or motor vehicle part, only that the accused was practically certain that he or she would do so.

Paragraph (a)(3) requires that the value of such motor vehicle or motor vehicle part, in fact, is $5,000 or more. The reference in paragraph (a)(3) to "such" motor vehicle or motor vehicle part refers to paragraph (a)(2) and the object that the actor intended to conceal or misrepresent, be it a part or the whole motor vehicle. When the accused acts with intent to conceal or misrepresent the identity of a motor vehicle part, the value of that part, not the vehicle from which it was taken, shall be used to determine if this element is satisfied.[3] The term "in fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, and indicates that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to the value of the motor vehicle or part.

Subsection (b) specifies the elements of second degree AVIN. The elements of second degree AVIN are identical to the elements of first degree AVIN, expect that there is no value requirement for the motor vehicle or motor vehicle part.

---

[1] D.C. Code § 22-3233.

[2] RCC § 22E-701. For example, an electric bicycle that is designed to be propelled both by electricity and human effort does not constitute a "motor vehicle."

[3] For example, if a person alters a VIN, with intent to conceal the identity of that part, the value of the motor vehicle is irrelevant—it is the value of the part that determines whether the conduct can be charged as first degree AVIN.

Subsection (c) specifies penalties for each grade of the AVIN offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (d) cross references penalties found elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised AVIN statute changes current District law in four main ways.

First, the revised AVIN statute requires that the accused have intent to conceal or misrepresent the identity of the motor vehicle or motor vehicle part. Under the current D.C. Code statute, it appears that a person commits an offense by knowingly altering a VIN, regardless of the purpose for doing so.[4] No case law exists as to whether a person would be guilty under the current statute for altering a VIN for some other purpose. In contrast, the revised statute eliminates liability for a person who alters[5] a VIN for purposes besides concealing or misrepresenting identity. The change improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

Second, the provision in RCC § 22E-2001, "Aggregation to Determine Property Offense Grades," allows aggregation of value for the revised AVIN offense based on a single scheme or systematic course of conduct. The current AVIN offense is not part of the current aggregation of value provision for property offenses.[6] The revised AVIN statute permits aggregation for determining the appropriate grade of AVIN to ensure penalties are proportional to the accused's actual conduct.[7]

Third, by reference to the RCC's definition of "motor vehicle," the revised AVIN statute changes the scope of the offense. The term "motor vehicle" as used in the current AVIN statute is defined to include a "vehicle propelled by an internal-combustion engine, electricity, or steam[.]"[8] In contrast, the RCC's definition of "motor vehicle" requires that the vehicle be "designed to be propelled only by an internal-combustion engine or electricity."[9] This language excludes vehicles like mopeds that are designed to be propelled, in part, by human exertion, as well as steam powered vehicles. Vehicles that are designed to be propelled in part by human exertion are generally not as expensive and do not pose the same safety risks to others that a "motor vehicle" does. Steam powered vehicles have fallen out of use, and it is unnecessary to include them in the definition of "motor vehicle." This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised statute.

Fourth, the threshold value of the motor vehicle or motor vehicle part that determines liability for first degree AVIN is $2,500. The current statute sets the value

---

[4] D.C. Code § 22-3233.

[5] E.g., knowingly painting over or cutting off an automobile part with a VIN from one's own vehicle is criminal under the plain language of the current statute, but, without evidence of intent to conceal or misrepresent the identity thereof, such conduct would not be criminal under the revised offense.

[6] D.C. Code § 22-3202. Aggregation of amounts received to determine grade of offense. ("Amounts or property received pursuant to a single scheme or systematic course of conduct in violation of § 22-3211 (Theft), § 22-3221 (Fraud), § 22-3223 (Credit Card Fraud), § 22-3227.02 (Identity Theft), § 22-3231 (Trafficking in Stolen Property), or § 22-3232 (Receiving Stolen Property) may be aggregated in determining the grade of the offense and the sentence for the offense.")

[7] Inclusion of AVIN in RCC § 22E-2001 does not suggest however that multiple convictions are categorically barred when the accused alters multiple VINs, on multiple motor vehicles or motor vehicles parts, even when the alterations occur as part of a single act or course of conduct.

[8] D.C. Code § 22-3233.

[9] RCC § 22E-701.

threshold for the higher grade of AVIN at $1,000.[10] In contrast, the revised statute's $2,500 aligns with the grading differences in value in the RCC theft,[11] criminal damage to property,[12] possession of stolen property,[13] and other comparable offenses. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense.

Beyond these four changes to current District law, two other aspects of the revised AVIN statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, by reference to the RCC's definition of "motor vehicle," the revised AVIN statute may change the scope of the offense as compared to current law. The current statute defines "motor vehicle" to include "any non-operational vehicle that is being restored or repaired." The RCC's "motor vehicle" definition omits this language, and is intended to include non-operational vehicles regardless of whether they are being restored or repaired, if they meet the other requirements of the definition. It is unclear whether the current definition of motor vehicle excludes non-operational vehicles that are not being restored or repaired, and there is no relevant DCCA case law. This change clarifies the revised statute.

Second, determination of value for the revised first degree AVIN statute depends on the object that the actor intended to conceal or misrepresent, be it a part or the whole motor vehicle. The current D.C. Code statute says a person is subject to the higher gradation "if the value of the motor vehicle or motor vehicle part is $1,000 or more…."[14] There is no case law interpreting this provision. To resolve ambiguities about the relevant value when a car contains a part with an obliterated identification number, paragraph (a)(3) of the first degree AVIN statute refers to "such" motor vehicle or motor vehicle (in paragraph (a)(2)) that the actor intended to conceal or misrepresent. Consequently, when the accused acts with intent to conceal or misrepresent the identity of just a motor vehicle part, the value of that part, not the vehicle from which it was taken, shall be used to determine valuation. This change clarifies the revised statute.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

The current statute makes it a crime to "remove, obliterate, tamper with, or alter" a VIN.[15] The revised statute only uses the word "alter," omitting the words "remove," "obliterate," or "tamper with." The word "alter" is intended to be broadly construed to cover removing, obliterating, or tampering with a VIN. The change is not intended to narrow the scope of the offense.

RCC § 22E-2404. Alteration of Bicycle Identification Number.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the alteration of a bicycle identification number (ABIN) offense and penalty for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). This offense criminalizes knowingly altering a bicycle identification number (BIN), with the intent to conceal or misrepresent the identity of the bicycle or bicycle part. The revised ABIN offense replaces the current altering or removing bicycle identification numbers[1] statute in the current D.C. Code.

Paragraph (a)(1) requires that the accused knowingly alters an identification number of a bicycle or bicycle part. "Alters" is an undefined term, intended to be broadly construed. The terms "identification number" and "bicycle" are defined in D.C. Code § 50-1609. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that a "knowingly" culpable mental state applies, a term defined in RCC § 22E-206 which here requires that the accused must be practically certainty that he or she would alter an identification number of a bicycle or bicycle part.

Paragraph (a)(2) further specifies that the accused must alter a BIN "with intent to" conceal or misrepresent the identity of the bicycle or bicycle part. "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206, here meaning the accused was practically certain that he or she would conceal or misrepresent the identity of the bicycle or bicycle part. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that the accused actually concealed or misrepresented the identity of the bicycle or bicycle part, only that the accused was practically certain that he or she would do so.

Subsection (b) specifies relevant penalties for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.] There is only one grade of ABIN, and the value of the bicycle or bicycle part is irrelevant.

Subsection (c) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC and the current D.C. Code.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised ABIN statute changes current District law in one main way.

The revised ABIN statute requires that the accused act with intent to conceal or misrepresent the identity of the bicycle or bicycle part. Under the current statute, it appears that a person commits an offense by merely knowingly altering a BIN, regardless of the purpose for doing so.[2] No case law exists as to whether a person would be guilty under the current statute for altering a BIN for some other purpose. In contrast, the revised statute eliminates liability for a person who alters[3] a BIN for purposes besides concealment or misrepresentation of identity. The change improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

The current statute makes it a crime to "remove, obliterate, tamper with, or alter" a BIN.[4] The revised statute only uses the word "alter," omitting the words "remove," "obliterate," or "tamper with." The word "alter" is intended to be broadly construed to cover removing, obliterating, or tampering with a BIN. The change is not intended to narrow the scope of the offense.

[4] D.C. Code § 22-3234.

RCC § 22E-2501. Arson.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the revised arson offense and penalty gradations for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The offense proscribes knowingly starting a fire, or causing an explosion, that damages or destroys a dwelling or building. The penalty gradations are based on the harm or risk of harm to human life. The revised arson offense, in conjunction with the RCC reckless burning offense, replaces the current arson offense,[1] and the closely-related offenses of burning one's own property with intent to injure or defraud another person[2] and placing explosives with intent to destroy or injure property.[3]

Paragraph (a)(1) states the prohibited conduct for first degree arson—starting a fire, or causing an explosion, that damages or destroys a dwelling or building. "Dwelling" and "building" are defined terms in RCC § 22E-701. Paragraph (a)(1) also specifies the culpable mental state for paragraph (a)(1) to be "knowingly," a term defined at RCC § 22E-206 which here requires the accused to be aware to a practical certainty that his or her conduct starts a fire or causes an explosion that damages or destroys a "dwelling" or "building."

Paragraph (a)(2) and paragraph (a)(3) specify two additional requirements for first degree arson. Paragraph (a)(2) requires that the accused is "reckless" as to the fact that a person who is not a participant in the crime is present in the dwelling or building. "Reckless" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the accused must consciously disregard a substantial risk that the dwelling or building is occupied by someone not a participant in the crime. Paragraph (a)(3) requires that the fire or explosion "in fact" cause death or serious bodily injury to another person who is not a participant in the crime. "Serious bodily injury" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701. Subject to causation limitations, paragraph (a)(3) may also include harm to first responders. "In fact," a term defined in RCC § 22E-207, is used to indicate here that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to whether the fire or explosion caused death or serious bodily injury to another person who is not a participant in the crime.

Subsection (b) specifies the requirements for second degree arson. The requirements in paragraph (b)(1) and sub paragraph section (b)(2) are the same as the requirements in paragraph (a)(1) and paragraph (a)(2) for first degree arson. There are no additional requirements for second degree arson.

Subsection (c) specifies the requirements for third degree arson. The requirements in third degree arson are the same as the requirements in paragraph (a)(1) for first degree arson. There are no additional requirements for third degree arson.

Subsection (d) establishes an affirmative defense that applies only to third degree arson. The general provision in RCC § 22E-201 establishes the requirements for the burden of production and the burden of proof for all affirmative defenses in the RCC. It is an affirmative defense that the defendant, in fact, had a valid blasting permit issued by the District of Columbia Fire and Emergency Medical Services Department, and that he or she complied with all the rules and regulations governing the use of the permit. "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element. Per RCC § 22E-207, "in fact" applies to any result element or circumstance element that follows the phrase "in fact" unless a culpable mental state is specified. In subsection (d), "in fact" means that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to whether the defendant had a valid blasting permit issued by the District of Columbia Fire and Emergency Medical Services Department, and that he or she complied with all the rules and regulations governing the use of the permit.

Subsection (e) specifies relevant penalties for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (f) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC

Relation to Current District Law. The revised arson statute clearly changes current District law in nine main ways.

First, the revised arson statute specifies culpable mental states of knowledge, recklessness, and strict liability with respect to various elements. "Maliciously" is the only culpable mental state specified in the current D.C. Code arson statute,[4] and it is unclear whether all or just some of the current arson statute elements are modified by the term. The DCCA has stated that the malice culpable mental state in the current D.C. Code arson statute requires the government to "prove that appellant acted intentionally, and not merely negligently or accidentally, while consciously disregarding the risk of endangering human life and offending the security of habitation or occupancy."[5] Beyond this, District case law holds that the meaning of malice in the current D.C. Code arson and current malicious destruction of property (MDP) offenses is the same.[6] And, in the context of MDP, the DCCA has recently clarified that as compared to the Model Penal Code (MPC) definitions of culpable mental states, malice either requires the defendant act "purposely" or with a blend of "knowingly" and "recklessly" culpable mental states.[7] In addition, the DCCA has held that use of the culpable mental state of malice requires "the absence of all elements of justification, excuse or recognized mitigation," which creates various defenses typically recognized in the context of murder.[8]

In contrast, the revised arson statute provides definitions for each culpable mental state and specifies the relevant culpable mental states for each of the elements of the revised offense—knowledge as to starting a fire, or causing an explosion, that damages or destroys a dwelling or building, recklessness as to occupancy, and strict liability as to causing death

[5] Phenis v. United States, 909 A.2d 138, 164 (D.C. 2006) (internal citations omitted). The DCCA has further stated that the culpable mental state of the current arson offense is one of "general intent." Phenis v. United States, 909 at 163-64. "General intent" is not used in or defined in the current arson statute, but the DCCA has said that it is frequently defined as the "intent to do the prohibited act" which requires "the absence of an exculpatory state of mind." Morgan v. District of Columbia, 476 A.2d 1128, 1132 (D.C. 1984).

[8] In the District, "[r]ecognized circumstances of mitigation" include, most notably, provocation: i.e. a situation "where the killer has been provoked or is acting in the heat of passion, with the latter including fear, resentment and terror, as well as rage and anger." Comber, 584 A.2d at 41. In addition to provocation, however, DCCA case law also recognizes imperfect justifications and excuses (i.e. defenses based upon unreasonable mistakes of fact and/or law), "such as when excessive force is used in self-defense or in defense of another and a killing is committed in the mistaken belief that one may be in mortal danger," as mitigating circumstances that preclude the formation of malice. Id.

or serious bodily injury. The "knowingly" culpable mental state is consistent with, but somewhat narrower than existing DCCA case law insofar as malice is a blend of reckless and knowledge culpable mental states. However, applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[9] The "reckless" culpable mental state that the revised statute applies to whether the building or dwelling is occupied also approximates, but is somewhat lower than existing DCCA case law insofar as malice is a blend of reckless and knowledge culpable mental states. A recklessness requirement still requires subjective awareness of the critical facts that distinguish innocent from criminal conduct,[10] and provides liability for reckless behavior that may result in serious property damage. Finally, the strict liability requirement reflects the fact that the accused has already engaged in serious criminal conduct and no further mental state appears necessary for liability as to the consequences based on his or her recklessness at placing a person risk. In fact, if the defendant had a culpable mental state as to such harm, it may also constitute assault or murder. Applying no culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that do not distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is an accepted practice in American jurisprudence.[11] Eliminating malice from the revised arson statute also eliminates the special mitigation defenses applicable to the current arson offense.[12] This revision improves the clarity, completeness, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Second, the revised arson statute requires, in part, that the defendant "causes an explosion." The current D.C. Code arson statute merely requires that the defendant "burn or attempt to burn,"[13] and there is no case law on whether this would include all explosions. At common law, explosions were excluded from arson if they did not burn the property.[14] In contrast, the revised arson statute requires, in part, that the defendant "causes an explosion." Explosions can be as dangerous, if not more dangerous, than fire and raise

Ct. 2001, 2015 (2015) (Alito, J., concurring in part, dissenting in part) ("And when Congress does not specify a mens rea in a criminal statute, we have no justification for inferring that anything more than recklessness is needed. It is quite unusual for us to interpret a statute to contain a requirement that is nowhere set out in the text. Once we have reached recklessness, we have gone as far as we can without stepping over the line that separates interpretation from amendment.").

Ct. 2001, 2010, 192 L.Ed.2d 1 (2015) ("When interpreting federal criminal statutes that are silent on the required mental state, we read into the statute 'only that mens rea which is necessary to separate wrongful conduct from 'otherwise innocent conduct.'" *Carter v. REV. 295, 362 (1986) ("At common law, it was not arson to damage a dwelling house by means of an explosion unless it caused the house to burn rather than first being torn apart by the blast . . . Yet explosions, like fires, entail the likelihood of extensive property damage accompanied by extreme risks to human life and limb.").

similar concerns about occupancy of the location where the explosion takes place. This revision eliminates a possible gap in liability in current District law.[15]

Third, the revised arson statute applies only to railroad cars and watercraft that satisfy the RCC definition of "dwelling" in RCC § 22E-701. The current D.C. Code arson statute was enacted in 1901 and specifies a lengthy list of property,[16] including "any steamboat, vessel, canal boat, or other watercraft" and "any railroad car." The current D.C. Code arson statute also clearly applies to "dwellings" and "houses."[17] In contrast, the revised arson offense includes a railroad car or watercraft only when that railroad car or watercraft satisfies the definition of "dwelling" in § 22E-701.[18] Fires in railroad cars and watercraft that are not dwellings do not endanger human life the same as fires in buildings and dwellings. Damaging or destroying with fire or explosion railroad cars and watercraft that do not satisfy the definition of "dwelling" in RCC § 22E-701 is criminalized by the RCC criminal damage to property offense (RCC § 22E-2503). This revision clarifies and improves the proportionality of the revised statute.

Fourth, the revised arson statute eliminates the requirement that the dwelling or building be another person's property. The current D.C. Code arson statute requires that the property is "in whole or in part, of another person."[19] The limited DCCA case law construing this phrase merely asserts that the element is satisfied if a person other than the defendant legally owns the property.[20] In contrast, the revised arson statute removes the requirement that the property is "in whole, or in part, of another person." It is inconsistent to permit a defendant who otherwise satisfies the requirements of arson to avoid liability because another person owned all or part of the property. Under the revised arson statute, ownership of the property is irrelevant. This change clarifies the revised arson statute and eliminates a gap in liability under current law.

Fifth, the revised arson statute provides a new affirmative defense, in subsection (d), to third degree arson where a government permit has been issued regarding the actor's conduct and the actor complied with all the rules and regulations governing the use of such a permit. No comparable statute or case law exists in current District law regarding such a defense. As there is less potential risk to human life in third degree arson, it is appropriate to permit a defendant to avoid liability when acting with property authority. This revision improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

[15] As described below, another offense in the current D.C. Code also addresses explosives. D.C. Code § 22-3305 prohibits placing, or causing to be placed, near certain property explosives "with intent to destroy, throw down, or injure the whole or any part thereof."

[16] D.C. Code § 22-301 ("any dwelling, or house, barn, or stable adjoining thereto, or any store, barn, or outhouse, or any shop, office, stable, store, warehouse, or any other building, or any steamboat, vessel, canal boat, or other watercraft, or any railroad car.").

[17] Id.

[18] Similarly, the revised arson statute includes a "motor vehicle," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701, only when it serves as a dwelling.

[19] D.C. Code § 22-301.

[20] Posey v. United States, 26 App. D.C. 302, 304-05 (D.C. Cir. 1906) (affirming the attempted arson conviction of a defendant that tried to burn down a building he was renting and noting that "the appellant was occupying the building as a tenant does not take it out of the terms of this section."); Chaconas v. United States, 326 A.2d 792, 793, 797 (D.C. 1974) (upholding the appellant's conviction for burning a store that his corporation rented); Byrd v. United States, 705 A.2d 629, 631, 635 (affirming appellant's conviction for arson and finding that appellant's testimony that is parents owned the house was sufficient for the house to be "in whole or in part, of another person.").

Sixth, the revised arson statute punishes attempted arson differently than a completed arson. The current arson statute includes both an "attempt to burn" and "burn"[21] and case law appears to construe this language to mean that attempted arson is punished the same as completed arson.[22] In contrast, under the revised arson statute, the General Part's attempt provisions[23] establish liability for attempted arson consistent with other offenses. There is no clear rationale for such a special attempt provision in arson as compared to other offenses. This revision improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

Seventh, the revised arson statute creates three gradations of arson based primarily upon the actual harm or risk of harm to human life. The current D.C. Code arson statute does not have any gradations and makes no provision for instances where a person suffers serious injury or death as a result of the arson. Case law requires arson to endanger human life to some degree.[24] However, case law also suggests that liability for firefighters and first responders who are seriously injured or killed while responding to the fire or explosion is not covered in current District law.[25] In contrast, the revised arson statute has three gradations that differ on the seriousness of risk to human life. First degree arson provides liability when a defendant, in fact, caused serious bodily injury or death to any person that is not a participant in the crime. Subject to causation limitations, this would also include harm experienced by first responders.[26] No culpable mental state is required for this element because the defendant has already engaged in serious criminal conduct.[27] The revised arson statute excludes participants in the crime because their presence is unrelated to the risk the fire or explosion poses to the occupants or residents of the dwelling or building. In addition, the RCC provides liability under the RCC assault and homicide statutes if a defendant starts a fire or causes an explosion that injures or kills a participant in the crime. Second degree arson requires that the defendant is reckless as to the fact that [25] In Lewis v. United States, the government argued that "by setting a fire which he knew would require the intervention of firefighters to extinguish, [the appellant] consciously disregarded a substantial risk to the lives of the firefighters." Lewis v. United States, 10 A.3d 646, 661 n.8 (D.C. 2010). The DCCA acknowledged that "there is some merit to this argument," but noted that in states in which "a risk to a firefighter safety satisfies an element of arson, this decision has been made by the legislature." Id. The court stated "[i]n light of these statutes applicable in other states, we refrain from extending the 'risk of harm to human life' element to include a risk to responding emergency personnel since we believe the legislature is more apt to make such a change in our arson law." Id.

[26] Where the harm to a first responder is by an unrelated or in no way a foreseeable event, for example an airplane crash landing at the location where the fire occurred, the causal connection between setting a fire to an occupied dwelling and the harm may be too tenuous to sustain liability. See commentary to RCC § 22E-204 Causation, for further explanation of causation requirements in the RCC.
[27] Applying no culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that do not distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is an accepted practice in American jurisprudence. Elonis v. United States," 135 S. Ct. 2001, 2010, 192 L.Ed.2d 1 (2015) ("When interpreting federal criminal statutes that are silent on the required mental state, we read into the statute 'only that mens rea which is necessary to separate wrongful conduct from 'otherwise innocent conduct.'" *Carter v. a person who is not a participant in the crime is present in the dwelling or building. Third degree arson applies to dwellings or buildings with no additional requirements and recognizes the heightened risk to human life at these properties even if they happen to be unoccupied at the time of the offense.[28] This revision improves the proportionality of the revised offense by distinguishing more and less culpable conduct.

Eighth, the RCC arson statute replaces two D.C. Code statutes that are closely related to the current arson statute: burning one's own property with intent to defraud or injure another person,[29] and placing explosives with intent to destroy or injure property.[30] In the RCC, conduct currently prohibited by burning one's own property with intent to defraud or injure another person is criminalized under multiple revised statutes, including the revised arson statute which now applies to property belonging to anyone.[31] Similarly, in the RCC, conduct currently prohibited by placing explosives with intent to injure or destroy property is criminalized under multiple statutes, including arson which now explicitly includes use of explosives to cause damage.[32] This revision reduces unnecessary overlap with the revised arson offense, the revised reckless burning offense in RCC § 22E-2502, and other offenses.

Ninth, under the revised arson statute the general culpability principles for self-induced intoxication in RCC § 22E-209 allow a defendant to claim he or she did not act "knowingly" due to his or her self-induced intoxication. The current statute is silent as to the effect of intoxication. However, the DCCA has held that the current arson statute is a general intent crime,[33] which would preclude a defendant from receiving a jury instruction on whether intoxication prevented the defendant from forming any of the culpable mental [28] All buildings, as enclosed spaces, pose greater risks of harm from a fire than open areas or business yards.

[29] D.C. Code § 22-302 ("Whoever maliciously burns or sets fire to any dwelling, shop, barn, stable, store, or warehouse or other building, or any steamboat, vessel, canal boat, or other watercraft, or any goods, wares, or merchandise, the same being his own property, in whole or in part, with intent to defraud or injure any other person, shall be imprisoned for not more than 15 years. In addition to any other penalty provided under this section, a person may be fined an amount not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01.").

[30] D.C. Code § 22-3305 ("Whoever places, or causes to be placed, in, upon, under, against, or near to any building, car, vessel, monument, statue, or structure, gunpowder or any explosive substance of any kind whatsoever, with intent to destroy, throw down, or injure the whole or any part thereof, although no damage is done, shall be punished by a fine not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 and by imprisonment for not less than 2 years or more than 10 years.").

[31] Burning one's own property with intent to defraud or injure another person would be subject to the revised arson statute if the property was one of the specific property types covered by arson (dwelling or building) or the revised criminal damage to property statute if the property satisfied the definition of "property of another" in RCC § 22E-701. This conduct may also satisfy the RCC reckless burning offense, although with a significantly lower penalty than under the revised arson statute. In addition to these property damage offenses, such conduct may well constitute an attempt (RCC § 22E-301) to commit fraud (RCC § 22E-2201), assault (RCC § 22E-1202), or murder (RCC § 22E-1101) depending on the facts of the case.

[32] Placing explosives with intent to injure or destroy property would constitute an attempt (RCC § 22E-301) to commit arson if the property was one of the specific property types covered by the revised arson statute (dwelling or building) or criminal damage to property if the property satisfied the definition of "property of another" in RCC § 22E-701. This conduct could also satisfy an attempt (RCC § 22E-301) to commit reckless burning, although with a significantly lower penalty than under the revised arson statute.

[33] See Carter v. United States, 531 A.2d 956, 963 (D.C. 1987) (citing Barrett v. United States, 377 A.2d 62 (D.C. 1977); Charles v. United States, 371 A.2d 404 (D.C. 1977)).

state requirements for the offense.[34] This DCCA holding would also likely mean that a defendant would be precluded from directly raising—though not necessarily presenting evidence in support of[35]—the claim that, due to his or her self-induced intoxicated state, the defendant did not possess any of the culpable mental state requirements for arson. By contrast, per the revised arson offense, a defendant would both have a basis for, and will be able to raise and present relevant and admissible evidence in support of, a claim that self-induced intoxication prevented the defendant from forming the knowledge required for various elements of arson. Likewise, where appropriate, the defendant would be entitled to an instruction, which clarifies that a not guilty verdict is necessary if the defendant's intoxicated state precludes the government from meeting its burden of proof with respect to the culpable mental state of knowledge at issue in arson.[36] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the offense.

Beyond these nine main changes to current District law, two other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised arson statute requires a defendant, in relevant part, to "start[] a fire." The current D.C. Code arson statute requires that the defendant "burn" the specified property.[37] Several DCCA arson cases refer to conduct to "set" the fire or "set fire to" as if this language were equivalent to "burn,"[38] but no decision is directly on point. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised arson statute requires "start[] a fire." This revision clarifies the revised statute.

Second, the definition of "person" in RCC § 22E-701 is applicable to all RCC property offenses and provisions, including the definitions of "actor," "complainant," "owner," and "property of another," which in turn rely on the definition of "person" in the RCC property offenses. The definition of "person" in RCC § 22E-701 establishes that "person" categorically includes both natural persons and non-human legal entities such as trusts, estates, companies, etc. The RCC definition of "person" is substantively identical to the definition of "person" in current D.C. Code § 22-3201(2A), which is limited to the Theft, Fraud, Stolen Property, Forgery, and Extortion offenses and other provisions in Chapter 32 of the current D.C. Code Title 22. The current D.C. Code § 22-3201(2A)

[34] See D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 9.404 ("If evidence of intoxication gives you a reasonable doubt about whether [name of defendant] could or did form the intent to [^] , then you must find him/her not guilty of the offense of [^] . On the other hand, if the government has proved beyond a reasonable doubt that [name of defendant] could and did form the intent to [^], along with every other element of the offense, then you must find him/her guilty of the offense of [^] .").

[35] Whether intoxication evidence may be presented when it cannot negate intent is less clear. Compare Carter v. United States, 531 A.2d 956, 963 (D.C. 1987) with Cooper v. United States, 680 A.2d 1370, 1372 (D.C. 1996); Parker v. United States, 359 F.2d 1009, 1012–13 (D.C. Cir. 1966)); see also Buchanan v. United States, 32 A.3d 990, 996 (D.C. 2011) (Ruiz, J., concurring) (discussing Parker).

[36] These results are a product of the logical relevance principle set forth in RCC § 22E-209(a) and the fact that knowledge is a mental state susceptible to negation by self-induced intoxication. See RCC § 22E-209(b).

[37] D.C. Code § 22-301.

[38] Lewis v. United States, 10 A.3d 646, 657 (D.C. 2010) (holding "there is sufficient evidence to prove that Lewis acted maliciously when he set the fire") and noting that the issue was whether "Lewis acted with the required mens rea of malice when he set fire to the house.") (emphasis added); Phenis v. United States, 909 A.2d 138, 164 (D.C. 2006) (concluding, in part, that the evidence was sufficient that the appellant "intentionally set fire to" his mother's apartment."); In re D.M., 993 A.2d 535, 543 (D.C. 2010) ("the trial judge reasonably could find, as she did, that appellant intentionally set the fire . . .").

definition of "person" does not apply to property offenses codified outside of current Chapter 32 of Title 22 despite a similar scope of conduct.[39] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised statute uses the definition of "person" in RCC § 22E-701. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

The revised arson statute requires that the fire or explosion "damage[] or destroy[]" the specified property. The current arson statute requires only that the defendant "burn" (or attempt to burn) the property specified in the statute.[40] Insofar as burning constitutes some kind of damage or destruction to the property at issue, this change merely clarifies the revised offense.

[39] It should be noted that there is a definition of "person" in D.C. Code § 45-604 that applies to the current D.C. Code. See D.C. Code §§ 45-601 (rule of construction stating that "[i]n the interpretation and construction of this Code the following rules shall be observed."); 45-604 (stating that "person" "shall be held to apply to partnerships and corporations, unless such construction would be unreasonable, and the reference to any officer shall include any person authorized by law to perform the duties of his office, unless the context shows that such words were intended to be used in a more limited sense."). However, this definition is not dispositive and in some D.C. Code property offenses outside Chapter 32 of Title 22, the term "person" is not used at all (e.g., the current malicious destruction of property statute, D.C. Code § 22-303, does not use the term "person," instead referring to "whoever").

[40] D.C. Code § 22-301.

RCC § 22E-2502. Reckless Burning.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the reckless burning offense and penalty for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The offense proscribes knowingly starting a fire or causing an explosion with recklessness as to the fact that the fire or explosion damages or destroys a dwelling or building. Reckless burning is a lesser included offense of all the gradations of the revised arson offense (RCC § 22E-2401). It differs from the revised arson offense because it is limited to recklessly damaging or destroying the property at issue, whereas the revised arson statute requires knowingly damaging or destroying the property at issue. Along with the revised arson offense, the reckless burning offense replaces the current arson statute,[1] as well as the closely-related offenses of burning one's own property with intent to injure or defraud another person[2] and placing explosives with intent to destroy or injure property.[3]

Paragraph (a)(1) states the prohibited conduct—starting a fire or causing an explosion. Paragraph (a)(1) also specifies the culpable mental state for paragraph (a)(1) to be "knowingly," a term defined at RCC § 22E-206 which here requires the accused to be at least aware to a practical certainty that his or her conduct starts a fire or causes an explosion.

Paragraph (a)(2) states that the fire or explosion must damage or destroy a "dwelling" or a "building" as those terms are defined in RCC § 22E-701. Paragraph (a)(2) specifies a culpable mental state of "reckless," a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the accused must consciously disregard a substantial risk that the fire or explosion damages or destroys a "dwelling" or "building." It must be proven both that the fire or explosion damaged or destroyed the building and that the actor had a reckless culpable mental state as to that result.[4]

Subsection (b) establishes an affirmative defense to the reckless burning offense. The general provision in RCC § 22E-201 establishes the requirements for the burden of production and the burden of proof for all affirmative defenses in the RCC. It is an affirmative defense that the defendant, in fact, had a valid blasting permit issued by the District of Columbia Fire and Emergency Medical Services Department, and that he or she complied with all the rules and regulations governing the use of the permit. "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element. Per RCC § 22E-207, "in fact" applies to any result element or circumstance element that follows the phrase "in fact" unless a culpable mental state is specified. In subsection (b), "in fact" means that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to whether the defendant had a valid blasting permit issued by the District of Columbia Fire and Emergency Medical Services Department, and that he or she complied with all the rules and regulations governing the use of the permit.

Subsection (c) specifies the penalty for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Relation to Current District Law. The revised reckless burning statute clearly changes current District law in seven main ways.

First, the RCC reckless burning statute specifies culpable mental states of knowledge and recklessness with respect to various elements. "Maliciously" is the only culpable mental state specified in the current D.C. Code arson statute,[5] and it is unclear whether all or just some of the current arson statute elements are modified by the term. The DCCA has stated that the malice culpable mental state in the current D.C. Code arson statute requires the government to "prove that appellant acted intentionally, and not merely negligently or accidentally, while consciously disregarding the risk of endangering human life and offending the security of habitation or occupancy."[6] Beyond this, District case law holds that the meaning of malice in the current D.C. Code arson and current malicious destruction of property (MDP) offenses is the same.[7] And, in the context of MDP, has recently clarified that as compared to the Model Penal Code (MPC) definitions of culpable mental states, malice either requires the defendant act "purposely" or with a blend of "knowingly" and "recklessly" culpable mental states.[8] In addition, the DCCA has held that use of the culpable mental state of malice requires "the absence of all elements of justification, excuse or recognized mitigation," which creates various defenses typically recognized in the context of murder.[9]

In contrast, the RCC reckless burning statute provides definitions for each culpable mental state and specifies the relevant culpable mental states for each of the elements of the revised offense—knowledge as to starting a fire or causing an explosion and recklessness as to the fact that the fire or explosion damages or destroys a dwelling or building. The "knowingly" culpable mental state is consistent with, but somewhat narrower than existing DCCA case law insofar as malice is a blend of reckless and knowledge culpable mental states. However, applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[10] The "reckless" culpable mental

United States,* 909 A.2d 138, 163-64 (D.C. 2006). "General intent" is not used in or defined in the current arson statute, but the DCCA has said that it is frequently defined as the "intent to do the prohibited act" which requires "the absence of an exculpatory state of mind." Morgan v. District of Columbia, 476 A.2d 1128,1132 (D.C. 1984).

[9] In the District, "[r]ecognized circumstances of mitigation" include, most notably, provocation: i.e. a situation "where the killer has been provoked or is acting in the heat of passion, with the latter including fear, resentment and terror, as well as rage and anger." Comber, 584 A.2d at 41. In addition to provocation, however, DCCA case law also recognizes imperfect justifications and excuses (i.e. defenses based upon unreasonable mistakes of fact and/or law), "such as when excessive force is used in self-defense or in defense of another and a killing is committed in the mistaken belief that one may be in mortal danger," as mitigating circumstances that preclude the formation of malice. Id.

[10] See Elonis v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2001, 2009 (2015) ("[O]ur cases have explained that a defendant generally must 'know the facts that make his conduct fit the definition of the offense,' even if he does not know that those facts give rise to a crime. (Internal citation omitted)").

state that applies to the fact that the fire or explosion damages or destroys and that the property is a dwelling or building approximates, but is somewhat lower than, existing DCCA case law insofar as malice is a blend of reckless and knowledge culpable mental states. A recklessness requirement still requires subjective awareness of the critical facts that distinguish innocent from criminal conduct,[11] and provides liability for reckless behavior that may result in serious property damage. As a lesser included offense of arson, penalized at a lower level, the lower culpable mental state in the RCC reckless burning offense creates a wider range of conduct and punishments for arson-type behavior. Eliminating malice from the RCC reckless burning statute also eliminates the special mitigation defenses applicable to the current arson offense.[12] This revision improves the clarity, completeness, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Second, the RCC reckless burning statute requires, in part, that the defendant "cause an explosion." The current D.C. Code arson statute merely requires that the defendant "burn or attempt to burn,"[13] and there is no case law on whether this would include all explosions. At common law, explosions were excluded from arson if they did not burn the property.[14] In contrast, the RCC reckless burning statute requires, in part, that the defendant "causes an explosion." Explosions can be as dangerous, if not more dangerous, than fire and raise similar concerns about occupancy of the location where the explosion takes place. This revision eliminates a possible gap in liability in current District law.[15]

Third, the revised arson statute applies only to railroad cars and watercraft that satisfy the RCC definition of "dwelling" in RCC § 22E-701. The current D.C. Code arson statute was enacted in 1901 and specifies a lengthy list of property,[16] including "any steamboat, vessel, canal boat, or other watercraft" and "any railroad car." The current D.C. Code arson statute also clearly applies to "dwellings" and "houses."[17] In contrast, the RCC reckless burning offense includes a railroad car or watercraft only when that railroad car or watercraft satisfies the definition of "dwelling" in § 22E-701.[18] Fires in railroad cars and watercraft that are not dwellings do not endanger human life the same as fires in buildings

REV. 295, 362 (1986) ("At common law, it was not arson to damage a dwelling house by means of an explosion unless it caused the house to burn rather than first being torn apart by the blast . . . Yet explosions, like fires, entail the likelihood of extensive property damage accompanied by extreme risks to human life and limb.").

[15] As described below, another offense in the current D.C. Code also addresses explosives. D.C. Code § 22-3305 prohibits placing, or causing to be placed, near certain property explosives "with intent to destroy, throw down, or injure the whole or any part thereof."

[16] D.C. Code § 22-301 ("any dwelling, or house, barn, or stable adjoining thereto, or any store, barn, or outhouse, or any shop, office, stable, store, warehouse, or any other building, or any steamboat, vessel, canal boat, or other watercraft, or any railroad car.").

[17] Id.

[18] Similarly, the revised arson statute includes a "motor vehicle," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701, only when it serves as a dwelling.

and dwellings. Damaging or destroying with fire or explosion railroad cars and watercraft that do not satisfy the definition of "dwelling" in RCC § 22E-701 is criminalized by the RCC criminal damage to property offense (RCC § 22E-2503). This revision clarifies and improves the proportionality of the revised statute.

Fourth, the RCC reckless burning statute eliminates the requirement that the dwelling, or building be another person's property. The current D.C. Code arson statute requires that the property is "in whole or in part, of another person."[19] The limited DCCA case law construing this phrase merely asserts that the element is satisfied if a person other than the defendant legally owns the property.[20] In contrast, the RCC reckless burning statute removes the requirement that the property is "in whole, or in part, of another person." It is inconsistent to permit a defendant who otherwise satisfies the requirements of reckless burning to avoid liability because another person owned all or part of the property. Under the RCC reckless burning statute, ownership of the property is irrelevant. This change clarifies the RCC reckless burning statute and eliminates a gap in liability under current law.

Fifth, the revised reckless burning statute provides a new affirmative defense in subsection (b) where a government permit has been issued regarding the actor's conduct and the actor complied with all the rules and regulations governing the use of such a permit. No comparable statute or case law exists in current District law regarding such a defense. As there is less risk to human life in reckless burning, in these circumstances it is appropriate to permit a defendant to avoid liability when acting with property authority. This change improves the proportionality of the RCC reckless burning offense.

Sixth, the revised reckless burning statute punishes attempted reckless burning differently than a completed reckless burning. The current D.C. Code arson statute includes both an "attempt to burn" and "burn"[21] and case law appears to construe this language to mean that attempted arson is punished the same as completed arson.[22] In contrast, under the RCC reckless burning statute, the General Part's attempt provisions[23] will establish liability for attempted reckless burning consistent with other offenses. There is no clear rationale for such a special attempt provision in arson or reckless burning as compared to other offenses. This revision improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

Seventh, in codifying a reckless burning offense, the RCC replaces two D.C. Code statutes that are closely related to the current arson statute: burning one's own property with intent to injure or defraud another person,[24] and placing explosives with intent to

[23] RCC § 22E-301.

[24] D.C. Code § 22-302 ("Whoever maliciously burns or sets fire to any dwelling, shop, barn, stable, store, or warehouse or other building, or any steamboat, vessel, canal boat, or other watercraft, or any goods, wares, or merchandise, the same being his own property, in whole or in part, with intent to defraud or injure destroy or injure property.[25] In the RCC, conduct currently prohibited by burning one's own property with intent to defraud or injure another person is criminalized under multiple revised statutes, including the revised arson statute which now applies to property belonging to anyone.[26] Similarly, in the RCC, conduct currently prohibited by placing explosives with intent to injure or destroy property is criminalized under multiple statutes, including arson which now explicitly includes use of explosives to cause damage.[27] This revision reduces unnecessary overlap with the revised arson offense, the revised reckless burning offense in RCC § 22E-2502, and other offenses.

Beyond these seven changes to current District law, two other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the RCC reckless burning statute requires a defendant, in relevant part, to "start[]a fire." The current D.C. Code arson statute requires that the defendant "burn" the specified property.[28] Several DCCA arson cases refer to conduct to "set" the fire or "set fire to" as if this language were equivalent to "burn,"[29] but no decision is directly on point. Instead of this ambiguity, the revised arson statute requires "start[] a fire." This revision clarifies the revised statute.

Second, the definition of "person" in RCC § 22E-701 is applicable to all RCC property offenses and provisions, including the definitions of "actor," "complainant," "owner," and "property of another," which in turn rely on the definition of "person" in the RCC property offenses. The definition of "person" in RCC § 22E-701 establishes that "person" categorically includes both natural persons and non-human legal entities such as trusts, estates, companies, etc. The RCC definition of "person" is substantively identical any other person, shall be imprisoned for not more than 15 years. In addition to any other penalty provided under this section, a person may be fined an amount not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01.").

[25] D.C. Code § 22-3305 ("Whoever places, or causes to be placed, in, upon, under, against, or near to any building, car, vessel, monument, statue, or structure, gunpowder or any explosive substance of any kind whatsoever, with intent to destroy, throw down, or injure the whole or any part thereof, although no damage is done, shall be punished by a fine not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 and by imprisonment for not less than 2 years or more than 10 years.").

[26] Burning one's own property with intent to defraud or injure another person would be subject to the revised arson statute if the property was one of the specific property types covered by arson (dwelling or building) or the revised criminal damage to property statute if the property satisfied the definition of "property of another" in RCC § 22E-701. This conduct may also satisfy the RCC reckless burning offense, although with a significantly lower penalty than under the revised arson statute. In addition to these property damage offenses, such conduct may well constitute an attempt (RCC § 22E-301) to commit fraud (RCC § 22E-2201), assault (RCC § 22E-1202), or murder (RCC § 22E-1101) depending on the facts of the case.

[27] Placing explosives with intent to injure or destroy property would constitute an attempt (RCC § 22E-301) to commit arson if the property was one of the specific property types covered by the revised arson statute (dwelling or building) or criminal damage to property if the property satisfied the definition of "property of another" in RCC § 22E-701. This conduct could also satisfy an attempt (RCC § 22E-301) to commit reckless burning, although with a significantly lower penalty than under the revised arson statute.

[28] D.C. Code § 22-301.

[29] Lewis v. United States, 10 A.3d 646, 657 (D.C. 2010) (holding "there is sufficient evidence to prove that Lewis acted maliciously when he set the fire") and noting that the issue was whether "Lewis acted with the required mens rea of malice when he set fire to the house.") (emphasis added); Phenis v. United States, 909 A.2d 138, 164 (D.C. 2006) (concluding, in part, that the evidence was sufficient that the appellant "intentionally set fire to" his mother's apartment."); In re D.M., 993 A.2d 535, 543 (D.C. 2010) ("the trial judge reasonably could find, as she did, that appellant intentionally set the fire . . .").

to the definition of "person" in current D.C. Code § 22-3201(2A), which is limited to the Theft, Fraud, Stolen Property, Forgery, and Extortion offenses and other provisions in Chapter 32 of the current D.C. Code Title 22. The current D.C. Code § 22-3201(2A) definition of "person" does not apply to property offenses codified outside of current Chapter 32 of Title 22 despite a similar scope of conduct.[30] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised statute uses the definition of "person" in RCC § 22E-701. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

The revised reckless burning statute requires that the fire or explosion damage or destroy a dwelling or building. The current arson statute requires only that the defendant "burn" (or attempt to burn) the property specified in the statute.[31] Insofar as burning constitutes some kind of damage or destruction to the property at issue, this change merely clarifies the revised offense.

[30] It should be noted that there is a definition of "person" in D.C. Code § 45-604 that applies to the current D.C. Code. See D.C. Code §§ 45-601 (rule of construction stating that "[i]n the interpretation and construction of this Code the following rules shall be observed."); 45-604 (stating that "person" "shall be held to apply to partnerships and corporations, unless such construction would be unreasonable, and the reference to any officer shall include any person authorized by law to perform the duties of his office, unless the context shows that such words were intended to be used in a more limited sense."). However, this definition is not dispositive and in some D.C. Code property offenses outside Chapter 32 of Title 22, the term "person" is not used at all (e.g., the current malicious destruction of property statute, D.C. Code § 22-303, does not use the term "person," instead referring to "whoever").

RCC § 22E-2503. Criminal Damage to Property.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the criminal damage to property (CDP) offense and penalty gradations for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The CDP offense proscribes damaging or destroying property without the effective consent of an owner. The penalty gradations are based on the amount of damage to the property, as well as the type of property and the defendant's culpable mental state in causing the damage or destruction. The CDP offense is closely related to the revised arson,[1] revised reckless burning,[2] and revised criminal graffiti offenses.[3] The CDP offense replaces the current malicious destruction of property (MPD) offense[4] and multiple statutes[5] in the current D.C. Code that concern damage to particular types of property.

Paragraph (a)(1) specifies the prohibited conduct for first degree CDP—damaging or destroying the property of another. "Property" is a defined term in in RCC § 22E-701 that means an item of value and includes real property and tangible or intangible personal property. "Property of another" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 which means that some other person has a legal interest in the property at issue that the defendant cannot infringe upon without consent, regardless of whether the defendant also has an interest in that property. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies a culpable mental state of "knowingly." Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" mental state in paragraph (a)(1) applies to all of the elements in subsection (a)(1)—damages or destroys the property of another. "Knowingly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here requires the defendant to be aware to a practical certainty that his or her conduct damages or destroys the "property of another."

Paragraph (a)(2) states that the proscribed conduct must be done "without the effective consent of an owner." The term "consent," as defined in RCC § 22E-701, requires an indication of agreement given by a person generally competent to do so. "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception." Lack of effective consent means there was no agreement, or the agreement was obtained by means of physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception. "Owner" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 to mean a person holding an interest in property with which the accused is not privileged to interfere. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" mental state in paragraph (a)(1) also applies to paragraph (a)(2). "Knowingly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206, here requiring the accused to be aware to a practical certainty that he or she lacks effective consent of an owner.

Paragraph (a)(3) requires that the amount of damage to the property for first degree CDP "in fact" be $500,000 or more. "Amount of damage" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that generally depends on whether the property was completely destroyed or partially damaged. "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element, here the amount of damage to the property.

Paragraph (b)(1) and paragraph (b)(2) specify the prohibited conduct for second degree CDP. The requirements in paragraph (b)(1) and paragraph (b)(2) are the same as those in paragraph (a)(1) and paragraph (a)(2) for first degree CDP. Paragraph (b)(3) requires that the amount of damage to the property for second degree CDP "in fact" be $50,000 or more. "Amount of damage" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that generally depends on whether the property was completely destroyed or partially damaged. "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element, here the amount of damage to the property.

There are two alternative means of committing third degree CDP in subsection (c). Paragraph (c)(1) specifies one type of prohibited conduct for third degree CDP. The requirements in paragraph (c)(1) and subparagraph (c)(1)(A) are the same as those in paragraph (a)(1) and paragraph (a)(2) for first degree CDP. Sub-subparagraph (c)(1)(B)(i), sub-subparagraph (c)(1)(B)(ii), and sub-subparagraph (c)(1)(B)(iii) specify the gradation requirements for this type of third degree CDP. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, "in fact" in subparagraph (c)(1)(B) applies to the elements in sub-subparagraph (c)(1)(B)(i), sub-subparagraph (c)(1)(B)(ii), and sub-subparagraph (c)(1)(B)(iii). "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element. Here, there is no culpable mental state as to the amount of damage ($5,000 or more in sub-subparagraph (c)(1)(B)(i)) or the type of property that is damaged or destroyed (cemetery, grave, other place for the internment of human remains, place of worship, or public monument in sub-subparagraphs (c)(1)(B)(ii) and (c)(1)(B)(iii)).[6] "Amount of damage" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that generally depends on whether the property was completely destroyed or partially damaged.

Paragraph (c)(2) establishes an alternative set of requirements for third degree CDP that requires only recklessness as to the damage or destruction, but requires a higher amount of damage than the first alternative set of requirements under paragraph (c)(1). Paragraph (c)(2) specifies the prohibited conduct for this type of third degree CDP—damages or destroys property. "Property" is a defined term in in RCC § 22E-701 that means an item of value and includes real property and tangible or intangible personal property. "Recklessly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here requires that the defendant consciously disregard a substantial risk that his or her conduct damages or destroys "property."[7] Subparagraph (c)(2)(A) further requires that the property be "property of another." "Property of another" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 which means that some other person has a legal interest in the property at issue that the defendant cannot infringe upon, regardless of whether the defendant also has an interest in that property. Subparagraph (c)(2)(A) specifies a culpable mental state of "knowing."

[6] Harm to the specific types of property described gradations in third degree CDP—a "cemetery, grave, or other place for the internment of human remains" (sub-subparagraph (c)(1)(B)(ii)) and a "place of worship or a public monument" (sub-subparagraph (c)(1)(B)(iii))—may be charged at least as third degree CDP. However, depending on the amount of damage, damage or destruction of these types of property may also be charged as a higher gradation of CDP. Prosecutors are also able to charge conduct involving these types of property under a lower, lesser gradation than third degree CDP.

[7] Although paragraph (c)(2) initially requires only a culpable mental state of "recklessly" for the fact that the item at issue is "property," subparagraph (c)(2)(A) requires a culpable mental state of "knowingly" for "property of another." The definition of "property of another" in RCC § 22E-701 incorporates the term "property" and its RCC definition. Thus, for this type of third degree CDP, a "knowing" culpable mental state ultimately applies to the fact that the item at issue is "property," consistent with the other gradations.

"Knowing" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here requires that the defendant is practically certain that the property is "property of another." Subparagraph (c)(2)(B) requires that the prohibited conduct be "without the effective consent of an owner." The term "consent," as defined in RCC § 22E-701, requires an indication of agreement given by a person generally competent to do so. "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception." Lack of effective consent means there was no agreement, or the agreement was obtained by means of physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception. "Owner" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 to mean a person holding an interest in property with which the accused is not privileged to interfere. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowing" mental state in subparagraph (c)(2)(A) also applies to subparagraph (c)(2)(B). "Knowing" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206, here requiring the accused to be aware to a practical certainty that he or she lacks effective consent of an owner. Finally, subparagraph (c)(2)(C) requires that the amount of damage "in fact" be $50,000 or more for this type of third degree CDP. "Amount of damage" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that generally depends on whether the property was completely destroyed or partially damaged. "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element, here the amount of damage to the property.

Paragraph (d)(1), paragraph (d)(2), and paragraph (d)(3) specify the prohibited conduct for fourth degree CDP. These requirements are the same as the same requirements for third degree CDP in paragraph (c)(2), subparagraph (c)(2)(A), and subparagraph (c)(2)(C).[8] Paragraph (d)(4) requires that the amount of damage to the property for fourth degree CDP "in fact" be $500 or more. "Amount of damage" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that generally depends on whether the property was completely destroyed or partially damaged. "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element, here the amount of damage to the property.

Paragraph (e)(1), paragraph (e)(2), and paragraph (e)(3) specify the prohibited conduct for fifth degree CDP. These requirements are the same as the requirements for third degree CDP in paragraph (c)(2), subparagraph (c)(2)(A), and subparagraph (c)(2)(C).[9] Paragraph (e)(4) requires that the amount of damage to the property for fifth degree CDP is "any amount." "Amount of damage" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that generally depends on whether the property was completely destroyed or partially damaged. "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element, here the amount of damage to the property.

[8] Although paragraph (d)(1) initially requires only a culpable mental state of "recklessly" for the fact that the item at issue is "property," paragraph (d)(2) requires a culpable mental state of "knowing" for "property of another." The definition of "property of another" in RCC § 22E-701 incorporates the term "property" and its RCC definition. Thus, for fourth degree CDP, a "knowing" culpable mental state ultimately applies to the fact that the item at issue is "property," consistent with the other gradations.

[9] Although paragraph (e)(1) initially requires only a culpable mental state of "recklessly" for the fact that the item at issue is "property," paragraph (e)(2) requires a culpable mental state of "knowing" for "property of another." The definition of "property of another" in RCC § 22E-701 incorporates the term "property" and its RCC definition. Thus, for fifth degree CDP, a "knowing" culpable mental state ultimately applies to the fact that the item at issue is "property," consistent with the other gradations.

Subsection (g) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC

Relation to Current District Law. The revised CDP statute clearly changes current District law in eight main ways.

First, the revised CDP statute specifies culpable mental states of knowledge, recklessness, and strict liability with respect to various elements. "Maliciously" is the only culpable mental state specified in the current D.C. Code MDP statute,[10] and it is unclear whether all or just some of the current MDP statute elements are modified by the term. The DCCA has defined malice to mean: "(1) the absence of all elements of justification, excuse or recognized mitigation, and (2) the presence of either (a) an actual intent to cause the particular harm which is produced or harm of the same general nature, or (b) the wanton and willful doing of an act with awareness of a plain and strong likelihood that such harm may result."[11] Per the first part of this holding, MDP is subject to various defenses more typically recognized in the context of murder.[12] Per the second part of this holding, the DCCA has further clarified that, as compared to the Model Penal Code (MPC) definitions of culpable mental states, malice in MDP either requires the defendant act "purposely" (corresponding to an "actual intent to cause the particular harm") or with a blend of "knowingly" and "recklessly" culpable mental states (corresponding to a mental state of "wanton and willful…with awareness of a plain and strong likelihood").[13]

In contrast, the RCC provides standardized definitions for each culpable mental state and specifies the relevant culpable mental states for the revised CDP offense: knowledge or recklessness as to damaging or destroying property, knowledge for the fact that the item at issue is "property" and "property of another," as those terms are defined in RCC § 22E-701,[14] and knowledge for lacking the effective consent of an owner. The DCCA has further stated that the culpable mental state of the current MDP offense is one of "general intent." Carter v. United States, 531 A.2d 956, 962 (D.C. 1987). "General intent" is not used in or defined in the current MDP statute, but the DCCA has said that it is frequently defined as the "intent to do the prohibited act" which requires "the absence of an exculpatory state of mind." Morgan v. District of Columbia, 476 A.2d 1128, 1132 (D.C. 1984).

[12] In the District, "[r]ecognized circumstances of mitigation" include, most notably, provocation: i.e. a situation "where the killer has been provoked or is acting in the heat of passion, with the latter including fear, resentment and terror, as well as rage and anger." Comber, 584 A.2d at 41. In addition to provocation, however, DCCA case law also recognizes imperfect justifications and excuses (i.e. defenses based upon unreasonable mistakes of fact and/or law), "such as when excessive force is used in self-defense or in defense of another and a killing is committed in the mistaken belief that one may be in mortal danger," as mitigating circumstances that preclude the formation of malice. Id.

[13] Harris v. United States, 125 A.3d 704, 708 n. 3 (D.C. 2015).

[14] The CDP statute consistently requires a culpable mental state of knowledge for the fact that the item at issue satisfies the RCC definitions of "property" and "property of another" in RCC § 22E-701, but the drafting varies. Paragraph (a)(1) of first degree CDP, paragraph (b)(1) of second degree CBP, and paragraph (c)(1) of third degree CDP each specify a "knowingly" culpable mental state for the element "property of another." Since the definition of "property of another" in RCC § 22E-701 incorporates the term "property," also defined in RCC § 22E-701, the "knowingly" culpable mental state also applies to the fact that the item is "property."

addition, the RCC specifies strict liability as to the amount of damage required, as well as to the type of property specified in some of the alternative requirements for third degree CDP. The "knowingly" culpable mental state is consistent with, but somewhat narrower than, existing DCCA case law insofar as malice is a blend of reckless and knowledge culpable mental states. However, applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[15] The "reckless" culpable mental state that the revised CDP statute applies to lower grades of the statute is somewhat lower than existing DCCA case law insofar as malice is a blend of reckless and knowledge culpable mental states. However, the recklessness requirement still requires subjective awareness of the critical facts that distinguish innocent from criminal conduct,[16] and provides liability for reckless behavior that may result in serious property damage. The strict liability requirement as to the amount of damage or type of property reflects the fact that the accused has already engaged in serious criminal conduct, and no further mental state appears necessary for liability as to the consequences based on his or her recklessly (or knowingly) damaging property. Applying no culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that do not distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is an accepted practice in American jurisprudence.[17] Finally, eliminating malice from the revised CDP statute also eliminates the special mitigation defenses applicable to MDP.[18] This revision improves the clarity, completeness, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Paragraph (c)(2) of third degree CDP, paragraph (d)(1) of fourth degree CDP, and paragraph (e)(1) of fifth degree CDP require that the defendant "recklessly" damage or destroy "property." Although the "recklessly" culpable mental state applies to the element that the item at issue is "property," subparagraph (c)(2)(A) of third degree CDP, paragraph (d)(2) of fourth degree CDP, and paragraph (e)(2) of fifth degree CDP require that the defendant know that the item is "property of another," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701. Thus, given that the definition of "property of another" incorporates the definition of "property," these gradations ultimately require a "knowing" culpable mental state for the fact the item at issue is "property."

[15] See Elonis v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2001, 2009 (2015) ("[O]ur cases have explained that a defendant generally must 'know the facts that make his conduct fit the definition of the offense,' even if he does not know that those facts give rise to a crime. (Internal citation omitted)").

United States*, 584 A.2d 537, 539 (D.C. 1990) ("Thus, provocation is a proper defense to the charge of malicious destruction of property, and we look to the doctrine of provocation as it has developed in the context of homicide, and elsewhere, to guide us in deciding this case."); see also D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 5.400 (requiring as an element of MDP that the defendant "acted without mitigation" and defining mitigation, in part, as "when a person acts in the heat of passion caused by adequate provocation" and "when a person actually believes that s/he is in danger of serious bodily injury, and actually believes that the use of force that was likely to cause serious bodily harm was necessary to defend against that danger, but one or both of those beliefs are not reasonable.").

Second, the revised CDP statute grades the offense, in part, based upon the "amount of damage" done to the property, a defined term in RCC § 22E-701. The current MDP statute states that it is the "value" of the property that determines the gradation. DCCA case law has interpreted "value" for MDP to mean the fair market value of the object when the object is completely destroyed, or the "reasonable cost of the repairs necessitated" where an item is only partly damaged.[19] The DCCA further noted that where the cost of repair exceeds the fair market value of the item as a whole, the value would simply be the fair market value of the whole before the damage occurred.[20] In contrast, the revised CDP statute is graded simply on the "amount of damage"—not the value of the property as in the current MDP statute. The RCC definition of "amount of damage" is intended to be consistent with existing case law and is discussed in the commentary to RCC § 22E-701. This revision improves the proportionality of the revised statute.

Third, the revised CDP statute punishes an attempted offense the same as most other criminal attempts. The current D.C. Code MDP statute includes "attempts to injure or break or destroy" as well as "injur[es] or break[s] or destroy[s]"[21] and there is no District case law construing this "attempt" language. The current D.C. Code MDP statute penalizes an attempted offense the same as a completed offense. In contrast, under the revised CDP statute, the general attempt provision in RCC § 22E-301 will establish liability and penalties for attempted CDP consistent with other RCC offenses. Under RCC § 22E-301, the penalty for an attempted offense is one-half the maximum penalty of the completed offense, consistent with several of the more recently revised D.C. Code offenses.[22] There is no clear rationale for attempts to be treated differently in MDP as compared to other offenses, or for penalizing attempted MDP the same as the completed offense. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Fourth, the CDP statute increases the number and type of gradations for the offense. The current D.C. Code MDP offense is limited to two gradations based solely on the value of the property.[23] First degree MDP is for property that has a "value" of $1,000 or more, and is punished as a serious felony. Second degree MDP involves property valued at less than $1,000 and is a misdemeanor. In contrast, the revised CDP offense has a total of five gradations, which span a much greater range of loss in value to the property, including distinctions for destruction of property that is of special significance and distinctions based upon the defendant's mental state as to the damage or destruction. The dollar value cutoffs in the revised CDP are consistent with other revised offenses and the increase in gradations, differentiated by offense seriousness, improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

Fifth, the revised CDP offense consolidates most prohibited conduct in the D.C. Code that involves damage to or destruction of property, and deletes multiple statutes that are closely related to the current MDP statute. The revised CDP statute will cover the vast majority of prohibited conduct pertaining to damaging property in these deleted statutes.[24] The only apparent exceptions are causing damage to boundary markers that are on one's own property[25] and placing excrement or filth on property in a manner that does not damage it,[26] but it is disproportionate to impose liability for criminal damage to property in these situations. Attempted CDP under the general attempt provision in RCC § 22E-301, the RCC arson offense,[27] and the RCC reckless burning offense[28] cover the conduct prohibited in current D.C. Code § 22-3305 pertaining to placing explosive substances near property.[29] In addition to property damage, several of these deleted statutes prohibit removing or concealing property[30] and there may be liability for this conduct in the RCC theft (RCC §

[20] That is, in the instance that the value of the entire item or property is less than $200 (the then-current threshold for MDP) but the cost of repair is $200 or more, it would be "unjust to measure the value of the damaged portion by the cost of restoration." Id. at n.3.

The statute appears to include boundary markers regardless of ownership, unlike the revised CDP offense, which requires that the property be "property of another," as that term is defined in RCC § 22E-701.

The remaining prohibited conduct in D.C. Code § 22-3312.01 appears to be covered by the revised CDP statute or revised criminal graffiti statute in 22E-2404. D.C. Code § 22-3312.01 ("It shall be unlawful for any person or persons willfully and wantonly to disfigure, cut, chip . . . to write, mark, or print obscene or indecent figures representing obscene or objects upon; to write, mark, draw, or paint, without the consent of the owner or proprietor thereof, or, in the case of public property, of the person having charge, custody, or control thereof, any word, sign, or figure upon . . . . 22E-2101), unauthorized use of property (RCC § 22E-2102), and fraud (RCC § 22E-2201) offenses. This change removes unnecessary overlap among criminal statutes and improves the proportionality of the revised statutes.

Sixth, the provision in RCC § 22E-2001, "Aggregation of Property Value to Determine Property Offense Grades," allows aggregation of value for the revised CDP offense based on a single scheme or systematic course of conduct. The current MDP offense is not part of the current aggregation of value provision for property offenses.[31] In contrast, the provision in RCC § 22E-2001, "Aggregation of Property Value to Determine Property Offense Grades," applies to the revised CDP statute. This change improves the proportionality of the revised statute.

Seventh, under the revised CDP statute the general culpability principles for self-induced intoxication in RCC § 22E-209 allow a defendant to claim he or she did not act "knowingly" due to his or her self-induced intoxication.[32] The current D.C. Code MDP statute is silent as to the effect of intoxication. However, the DCCA has held that the current MDP statute is a general intent crime,[33] which would preclude a defendant from receiving a jury instruction on whether intoxication prevented the defendant from forming any of the culpable mental state requirements for the offense.[34] This DCCA holding would also likely mean that a defendant would be precluded from directly raising—though not necessarily presenting evidence in support of[35]—the claim that, due to his or her self-induced intoxicated state, the defendant did not possess any of the culpable mental state requirements for MDP. By contrast, per the revised CDP offense, a defendant would both have a basis for, and will be able to raise and present relevant and admissible evidence in support of, a claim of that self-induced intoxication prevented the defendant from forming the knowledge required for various elements of CDP. Likewise, where appropriate, the defendant would be entitled to an instruction, which clarifies that a not guilty verdict is of another person); D.C. Code § 22-3313 ("It shall not be lawful for any person or persons to . . . remove" any building materials, materials intended for the improvement of streets, avenues, highways, similar modes of passage, and inclosures, or any scaffolding, ladder, or other similar object).

[31] D.C. Code § 22-3202 ("Amounts or property received pursuant to a single scheme or systematic course of conduct in violation of § 22-3211 (Theft), § 22-3221 (Fraud), § 22-3223 (Credit Card Fraud), § 22-3227.02 (Identity Theft), § 22-3231 (Trafficking in Stolen Property), or § 22-3232 (Receiving Stolen Property) may be aggregated in determining the grade of the offense and the sentence for the offense.").

[32] With respect to those elements of CDP subject to a culpable mental state of recklessness, the Revised Criminal Code effectively precludes an intoxication defense where the intoxication is self-induced. See RCC § 209(c)("Imputation of Recklessness for Self-Induced Intoxication. When a culpable mental state of recklessness applies to a result or circumstance in an offense, recklessness is established if: (1) The person, due to self-induced intoxication, fails to perceive a substantial risk that the person's conduct will cause that result or that the circumstance exists; and (2) The person is negligent as to whether the person's conduct will cause that result or as to whether that circumstance exists.").

[33] See Carter v. United States, 531 A.2d 956, 962 (D.C. 1987).

[34] See D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 9.404 ("If evidence of intoxication gives you a reasonable doubt about whether [name of defendant] could or did form the intent to [^] , then you must find him/her not guilty of the offense of [^] . On the other hand, if the government has proved beyond a reasonable doubt that [name of defendant] could and did form the intent to [^], along with every other element of the offense, then you must find him/her guilty of the offense of [^] .").

[35] Whether intoxication evidence may be presented when it cannot negate intent is less clear. Compare Carter v. United States, 531 A.2d 956, 963 (D.C. 1987) with Cooper v. United States, 680 A.2d 1370, 1372 (D.C. 1996); Parker v. United States, 359 F.2d 1009, 1012–13 (D.C. Cir. 1966)); *see also Buchanan v. necessary if the defendant's intoxicated state precludes the government from meeting its burden of proof with respect to the culpable mental state of knowledge at issue in CDP.[36] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the offense.

Eighth, the revised CDP statute requires a result element of "damages or destroys." The current MDP statute refers to "injures or breaks,"[37] but does not define these terms. The DCCA has twice made rulings that depended on the definition of "injury," and in doing so referred to a dictionary definition of the term as meaning: "detriment to, or violation of, person, character, feelings, rights, property, or interests, or value of the thing."[38] In one of these rulings the DCCA suggested that temporary disassembly of an object which does not involve loss or destruction of a part of the object constitutes injury so long as the immediate, ordinary purpose of the object is substantially affected.[39] In contrast, under the revised statute, damage does not include mere temporary disassembly of an object which does not involve loss or destruction of a part.[40] Instead, such a temporary disassembly would be a violation of the revised unauthorized use of property (UUP) offense in RCC § 22E-2102. This change clarifies and improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

Beyond these eight changes to current District law, four other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised CDP statute requires the property be "property of another," defined in RCC § 22E-701, in part, as any property with which the actor is not privileged to interfere without consent, regardless of whether the actor also has an interest in that property. The current D.C. Code MDP statute refers to the affected property as being "not his or her own," and does not further define the meaning of this phrase. The DCCA has stated that the phrase "not his or her own" is "ambiguous" because "it could either refer to property that is fully owned by an individual or property that is at least partially owned."[41] However, the DCCA has found that a co-owner of property can be found liable under the current MDP for destroying jointly-owned property.[42] The use of the RCC defined term

[36] These results are a product of the logical relevance principle set forth in RCC § 22E-209(a) and the fact that knowledge is a mental state susceptible to negation by self-induced intoxication. See RCC § 22E-209(b).

[38] Baker v. United States, 891 A.2d 208, 215 (D.C. 2006) ("Second, using black spray paint to inscribe obscenities on walls and on an automobile causes damage sufficient under the statute. "Injury" is defined as "detriment to, or violation of, person, character, feelings, rights, property, or interests, or value of the thing." WEBSTER'S NEW INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY (2d ed.1947). Applying this definition to the facts here demonstrates that the graffiti, although temporary, caused sufficient "injury." In order to repair Boggs' vehicle, the paint had to be removed and then replaced with a new layer of paint, otherwise, the vehicle would have been significantly devalued."); *Thomas v. [40] This meaning of "damage" may affect the rulings in Baker v. United States, 891 A.2d 208 (D.C. 2006) and Thomas v. United States, 985 A.2d 409 (D.C. 2009) which relied upon a dictionary definition of "injury" to decide the case.

"property of another" in the revised CDP offense is consistent with case law holding that a person may be liable for destroying jointly-owned property without consent of the other where the joint owner has an interest the other joint owner is not privileged to infringe upon.[43] However, the revised CDP offense, by use of "property of another," excludes liability for damaging or destroying property in which the only sense in which the property belongs to another is that another has a security interest in the property. This is because the revised definition of "property of another" specifically excludes "property in the possession of the accused that the other person has only a security interest in." No case law has interpreted whether the current MDP statute's reference to "not his or her own" would include property in the possession of, and owned by, the accused except for a security interest held by another. This change in the revised CDP statute clarifies the offense and applies a consistent definition across theft and theft-related offenses in Chapter 20 of Subtitle III of the RCC through the definition of "property of another."

Second, by use of the phrase "in fact," the revised CDP statute codifies that no culpable mental state is required as to the amount of damage in all gradations of the offense or as to the type of property required in some of the alternative variations of third degree CDP. The current D.C. Code MDP statute is silent as to what culpable mental state, if any, applies to the current MDP value gradations. There is no District case law on what mental state, if any, applies to the current MDP value gradations, although District practice does not appear to apply a mental state to the monetary values in the current gradations.[44] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised CDP statute applies strict liability to the amount of damage in all gradations of the offense and to the type of property required in some of the alternative variations of third degree CDP. Applying no culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that do not distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is an accepted practice in American jurisprudence.[45] Clarifying that the amount of the loss in value is a matter of strict liability in the revised CDP gradations clarifies and potentially fills a gap in District law.

Third, the revised CDP statute requires that the defendant act without the "effective consent of an owner" and applies a culpable mental state of "knowingly" to this element. The current D.C. Code MDP statute does not reference the defendant's lack of consent, although it does require that the property be "not his or her own," which may suggest that the defendant lack consent. DCCA case law interpreting the phrase "not his or her own" is limited to determining issues of joint ownership.[46] More broadly, it seems as though consent would negate the malice requirement in the current MDP statute, given that malice

[45] D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 5.400.

[46] The DCCA has stated that the phrase "not his or her own" is "ambiguous" because "it could either refer to property that is fully owned by an individual or property that is at least partially owned." Jackson v. United States, 819 A.2d 963, 965 (D.C. 2003). However, the DCCA has found that a co-owner of property can be found liable under the current MDP for destroying jointly-owned property. Id. at 964. Since the court determined the statutory language was ambiguous, it first looked to the legislative history. Id. at 965. The legislative history "provid[ed] no assistance," so the court then looked at case law from other jurisdictions, academic commentators, and the link between destruction of property and domestic violence. Id. at 965-67.

generally requires the absence of "justification, excuse, or mitigation."[47] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised CDP statute requires that the defendant lack the "effective consent of an owner" and applies a "knowingly" culpable mental state to this element. This revision improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised statute and improves its consistency with other RCC property offenses that require that the defendant know that he or she lack the consent or effective consent of an owner, such as the criminal graffiti statute (RCC § 22E-2504).

Fourth, the definition of "person" in RCC § 22E-701 is applicable to all RCC property offenses and provisions, including the definitions of "actor," "complainant," "owner," and "property of another," which in turn rely on the definition of "person" in the RCC property offenses. The definition of "person" in RCC § 22E-701 establishes that "person" categorically includes both natural persons and non-human legal entities such as trusts, estates, companies, etc. The RCC definition of "person" is substantively identical to the definition of "person" in current D.C. Code § 22-3201(2A), which is limited to the Theft, Fraud, Stolen Property, Forgery, and Extortion offenses and other provisions in Chapter 32 of the current D.C. Code Title 22. The current D.C. Code § 22-3201(2A) definition of "person" does not apply to property offenses codified outside of current Chapter 32 of Title 22 despite a similar scope of conduct.[48] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised statute uses the definition of "person" in RCC § 22E-701. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

For example, the revised CDP statute deletes "by fire or otherwise" and "any public or private property, whether real or personal" that are in the current MDP statute.[49] The language is surplusage and deleting it will not change the scope of the offense.

[47] See, e.g., Thomas v. United States, 985 A.2d 409, 412 (D.C. 2009).

[48] It should be noted that there is a definition of "person" in D.C. Code § 45-604 that applies to the current D.C. Code. See D.C. Code §§ 45-601 (rule of construction stating that "[i]n the interpretation and construction of this Code the following rules shall be observed."); 45-604 (stating that "person" "shall be held to apply to partnerships and corporations, unless such construction would be unreasonable, and the reference to any officer shall include any person authorized by law to perform the duties of his office, unless the context shows that such words were intended to be used in a more limited sense."). However, this definition is not dispositive and in some D.C. Code property offenses outside Chapter 32 of Title 22, the term "person" is not used at all (e.g., the current malicious destruction of property statute, D.C. Code § 22-303, does not use the term "person," instead referring to "whoever").

RCC § 22E-2504. Criminal Graffiti.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the revised criminal graffiti offense and penalty for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The revised criminal graffiti offense prohibits placing any inscription, writing, drawing, marking, or design on the property of another without the effective consent of an owner. There is a single penalty gradation for the offense. The revised criminal graffiti offense is closely related to the revised criminal damage to property offense (CDP).[1] The two offenses share several elements, but the revised criminal graffiti offense addresses a specific type of damage to property. The revised criminal graffiti offense replaces the current graffiti offense,[2] the current graffiti definitions,[3] the current graffiti penalty provisions,[4] the current possessing graffiti material offense,[5] and the current defacing public or private property offense.[6]

Paragraph (a)(1) states the proscribed conduct—placing any inscription, writing, drawing, marking, or design on the property of another. "Property" is a defined term in in RCC § 22E-701 that means an item of value and includes real property and tangible or intangible personal property. "Property of another" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 which means that some other person has a legal interest in the property at issue that the defendant cannot infringe upon, regardless of whether the defendant also has an interest in that property. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies a culpable mental state of "knowingly." Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" mental state in paragraph (a)(1) applies to all of the elements in paragraph (a)(1)—placing any inscription, writing, drawing, marking, or design on the property of another. "Knowingly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here requires the defendant to be aware to a practical certainty that his or her conduct places any inscription, writing, drawing, marking or design on the "property of another."

Paragraph (a)(2) states that the proscribed conduct must be done "without the effective consent of an owner." The term "consent," as defined in RCC § 22E-701, requires an indication of agreement given by a person generally competent to do so. "Effective consent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that means "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception." Lack of effective consent means there was no agreement, or the agreement was obtained by means of physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception. "Owner" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 to mean a person holding an interest in property that the accused is not privileged to interfere with. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" mental state in paragraph (a)(1) also applies to paragraph (a)(2). "Knowingly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206, here requiring the accused to be aware to a practical certainty that he or she lacks effective consent of an owner.

Subsection (b) specifies the penalty for the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (c) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised criminal graffiti statute clearly changes current District law in four main ways.

First, the revised criminal graffiti punishes attempted criminal graffiti differently than a completed criminal graffiti offense. District law currently codifies a separate, attempt-type offense for graffiti that prohibits, in part, possessing graffiti material with the intent to place graffiti,[7] in addition to providing liability under the current general attempt statute.[8] In contrast, the revised criminal graffiti statute relies solely on the General Part's attempt provisions[9] to establish liability for attempts to place graffiti, consistent with other offenses. The General Part's attempt provisions differ from the current attempt-type offense for graffiti chiefly by requiring the person to be "dangerously close" to committing the offense for there to be liability. Such a requirement reflects longstanding District case law regarding criminal attempts generally.[10] There is no clear rationale for such a special attempt-type offense for graffiti as compared to other offenses. This revision improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised offense.

Second, the revised criminal graffiti offense specifies a culpable mental state of "knowingly" for all elements of the offense. The current D.C. Code graffiti offense[11] specifies a culpable mental state of "willfully." The current D.C. Code graffiti offense does not define the term "willfully" and there is no generally applicable definition in the District's current criminal code. No case law exists interpreting the culpable mental state of the graffiti statute. In contrast, the revised criminal graffiti offense specifies a culpable mental state of "knowingly" for all elements of the offense. Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[12] Requiring a knowing culpable mental state also makes the revised criminal graffiti offense consistent with the elements of higher gradations of the revised CDP statute and other property offenses, which generally require that the defendant act knowingly with respect to the elements of the offense.[13] This revision improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Third, the revised criminal graffiti statute does not require that the graffiti be visible from a public right-of-way. The current D.C. Code statute defines "graffiti," in part, as requiring that the inscription, etc., be visible from a "public right-of-way."[14] There is no

[14] D.C. Code § 22-3312.05(4) ("'Graffiti' means an inscription, writing, drawing, marking, or design that is painted, sprayed, etched, scratched, or otherwise placed on structures, buildings, dwellings, statues, monuments, fences, vehicles, or other similar materials that are on public or private property without the

DCCA case law interpreting this requirement and it appears to have been included for an abatement of graffiti provision that has since been repealed.[15] In contrast, the revised criminal graffiti offense does not require that the graffiti be visible from a public right-of-way. This requirement unnecessarily restricts the scope of the offense to places visible to the public, even though the harm to a property owner is the same whether or not the location is visible to the public. The requirement also is inconsistent with the revised criminal damage to property offense (RCC § 22E-2504), which applies to "property of another." This revision improves the proportionality and consistency of the revised statute.

Fourth, the revised criminal graffiti statute does not provide for mandatory restitution provision or have a specific parental liability provision. The current D.C. Code graffiti statute mandates restitution in addition to any fine or imprisonment,[16] and makes parents and guardians civilly liable for fines and abatement fees that their minor cannot pay.[17] However, there also is a substantially similar provision in D.C. Code § 16-2320.01 that states the court "may" enter a judgment of restitution in any case in which the court finds a child has committed a specified delinquent act and it also provides that the court may order the parent or guardian of a child, a child, or both to make such restitution.[18] consent of the owner, manager, or agent in charge of the property, and the graffiti is visible from a public right-of-way.").

[15] Subsection (c) of D.C. Code § 22-3312.04 establishes the current graffiti offense. Subsection (c) was added to D.C. Code § 22-3312.04 by the Anti-Graffiti Amendment Act of 2000 (Act 13-560). The Anti-Graffiti Amendment Act of 2000 also codified the definitions in D.C. Code § 22-3312.05, including the current definition of "graffiti," as well as an abatement of graffiti provision in former D.C. Code § 22-3312.03a. The abatement provisions in former D.C. Code § 22-3312.03a appear to depend, in part, on whether the graffiti is visible from a public right-of-way, as required in the definition of "graffiti" and as specified in the abatement provision. D.C. Code § 22-3312.03a(a), (b) ("(a) Any person applying graffiti on public or private property shall have the duty to abate the graffiti within 24 hours after notice by the Director, the Chief of Police, or the private owner of the property involved. Abatement shall be done in a manner prescribed by the Director. Any person applying the graffiti shall be responsible for the abatement or payment for the abatement. When graffiti is applied by a minor, the parents or legal guardian shall also be responsible for the abatement or payment for the abatement if the minor is unable to pay. (b) Subject to the availability of annual appropriations for that purpose, the Mayor shall provide graffiti removal services to abate graffiti on public property. The Mayor shall provide, subject to appropriations, graffiti removal services for the abatement of graffiti on private property that is visible from the public right-of-way without charge to the property owner if the property owner first executes a waiver of liability in the form prescribed by the Mayor."). (repl.).

The Anti-Graffiti Act of 2010 repealed the abatement provision in D.C. Code § 22-3312.03a and codified in Title 42 a new abatement provision and definition of "graffiti" that requires visibility from a public right-of-way. Anti-Graffiti Act of 2010 (Law 18-219). Despite the repeal of the abatement provision in D.C. Code § 22-3312.03a, the definition of "graffiti" in D.C. Code § 22-3312.05 was not repealed. The legislative history for the Anti-Graffiti Act of 2010 does not discuss whether the Council intentionally kept the visibility requirement in the definition of "graffiti" in D.C. Code § 22-3312.05.

[16] D.C. Code § 22-3312.04(f) ("In addition to any fine or sentence imposed under this section, the court shall order the person convicted to make restitution to the owner of the property, or to the party responsible for the property upon which the graffiti has been placed, for the damage or loss caused, directly or indirectly, by the graffiti, in a reasonable amount and manner as determined by the court.").

[17] D.C. Code § 22-3312.04(g) ("The District of Columbia courts shall find parents or guardians civilly liable for all fines imposed or payments for abatement required if the minor cannot pay within a reasonable period of time established by the court.").

[18] D.C. Code § 16-2320.01(a) ("(a)(1) Upon request of the Corporation Counsel, the victim, or on its own motion, the Division may enter a judgment of restitution in any case in which the court finds a child has committed a delinquent act and during or as a result of the commission of that delinquent act has: (A) Stolen,

With respect to adults, D.C. Code § 16-711 provides judicial authority for (but does not require) ordering restitution. In contrast, the revised criminal graffiti statute deletes both the mandatory restitution provision and parental liability provision that apply to the current graffiti offense. Instead, matters of adult restitution are left to judicial discretion per D.C. Code § 16-711[19] and juvenile restitution and parental liability to judicial discretion per D.C. Code § 16-2320.01. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute, and removes unnecessary overlap with other penalty provisions in the D.C. Code.

Beyond these four changes to current District law, three other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised criminal damage to property statute requires that the "inscription, writing, drawing, marking, or design" be placed on the "property of another" and applies the definition of "property of another" in RCC § 22E-701. The current D.C. Code graffiti offense does not specify any ownership requirements for the property, although it does require the defendant to act "without consent of the owner." The definition of "property of another" in RCC § 22E-701 specifies that "property of another" is any property with which the actor is not privileged to interfere without consent, regardless of whether the actor also has an interest in that property. The definition of "property of another" also excludes from the revised criminal graffiti offense property that is in the possession of the accused in which the other person has only a security interest. This narrow exclusion for security interests is the same exclusion that applies to the revised criminal damage to property offense (RCC § 22E-2504) and other property offenses in Chapter 20 of Subtitle III of the RCC. As with the other offenses, the exclusion is justified because civil remedies such as contract liability, rather than criminal liability, address the situation when a debtor damages property and the other party has only a security interest in that property. However, under RCC the definition of "property of another," a third party could be criminally liable for damaging property that is in the possession of the debtor because the debtor has a possessory interest in that property. Given the nature of the revised criminal graffiti offense, it is unlikely that the security interest exclusion will often apply. However, the consistency of the RCC improves if the criminal damage to property and the revised criminal graffiti offenses cover the same range of property interests.

Second, the revised criminal graffiti statute requires a person to act "without the effective consent of an owner." "Consent," "effective consent," and "owner" are defined terms in RCC § 22E-701 that together generally require a person to lack some indication of an owner's agreement to the placement of graffiti from a person holding an interest in the property. The current D.C. Code graffiti offense requires that the defendant act "without the consent of the owner," but there is no statutory definition of these terms, and no District case law addresses the meaning of "without the consent" or "owner" in the graffiti statute. Requiring a person to act "without the effective consent of an owner" and damaged, destroyed, converted, unlawfully obtained, or substantially decreased the value of the property of another . . . (2) The Division may order the parent or guardian of a child, a child, or both to make restitution to: (A) The victim; (B) Any governmental entity; (C) A third-party payor, including an insurer, that has made payment to the victim to compensate the victim for a property loss under paragraph (1)(A) of this subsection or pecuniary loss under paragraph (1)(B) or (C) of this subsection.").

[19] RCC § 22E-602 generally authorizes courts to order restitution in accordance with D.C. Code § 16-711.

using the definitions in RCC § 22E-701 that apply to other property offenses in Chapter 20 of Subtitle III of the RCC improves the clarity and consistency of the revised offense.

Third, the definition of "person" in RCC § 22E-701 is applicable to all RCC property offenses and provisions, including the definitions of "actor," "complainant," "owner," and "property of another," which in turn rely on the definition of "person" in the RCC property offenses. The definition of "person" in RCC § 22E-701 establishes that "person" categorically includes both natural persons and non-human legal entities such as trusts, estates, companies, etc. The RCC definition of "person" is substantively identical to the definition of "person" in current D.C. Code § 22-3201(2A), which is limited to the Theft, Fraud, Stolen Property, Forgery, and Extortion offenses and other provisions in Chapter 32 of the current D.C. Code Title 22. The current D.C. Code § 22-3201(2A) definition of "person" does not apply to property offenses codified outside of current Chapter 32 of Title 22 despite a similar scope of conduct.[20] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised statute uses the definition of "person" in RCC § 22E-701. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, the revised criminal graffiti statute eliminates the "on public or private property" requirement that is in the current D.C. Code definition of "graffiti."[21] Similarly, the revised criminal graffiti offense deletes "on structures, buildings, dwellings, statues, monuments, fences, vehicles, or other similar materials" that is in the current definition of "graffiti."[22] Such language is surplusage and deletion will not change District law.

Second, the revised criminal graffiti statute deletes the language in the current D.C. Code definition of "graffiti"[23] that refers to a "manager, or agent in charge of the property" because the RCC relies on civil law principles of agency to determine when an individual is authorized to give "consent" on behalf of another person. Deleting the language will not change District law.

Finally, the revised criminal graffiti offense deletes specific reference to the methods of making graffiti that are in the current definition of "graffiti:"[24] "is painted, sprayed, etched, scratched, or otherwise placed." Instead, the revised criminal graffiti statute requires the defendant to "place[]" "any inscription, writing, drawing, marking, or design." "Any inscription, writing, drawing, marking, or design" is taken from the current definition of "graffiti" without change. "Places" and the types of graffiti specified in the [20] It should be noted that there is a definition of "person" in D.C. Code § 45-604 that applies to the current D.C. Code. See D.C. Code §§ 45-601 (rule of construction stating that "[i]n the interpretation and construction of this Code the following rules shall be observed."); 45-604 (stating that "person" "shall be held to apply to partnerships and corporations, unless such construction would be unreasonable, and the reference to any officer shall include any person authorized by law to perform the duties of his office, unless the context shows that such words were intended to be used in a more limited sense."). However, this definition is not dispositive and in some D.C. Code property offenses outside Chapter 32 of Title 22, the term "person" is not used at all (e.g., the current malicious destruction of property statute, D.C. Code § 22-303, does not use the term "person," instead referring to "whoever").

RCC § 22E-2601. Trespass.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the trespass offense and penalty gradations for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The offense proscribes knowingly entering or remaining in certain locations without a privilege or license to do so under civil law. The offense is graded based on the location at issue. The revised trespass offense is closely related to burglary,[1] with the primary difference that trespass does not require that the defendant intend to commit a crime on the premises. The revised trespass offense replaces the forcible entry and detainer,[2] unlawful entry on property[3] and unlawful entry of a motor vehicle[4] statutes in the current D.C. Code.[5]

Paragraphs (a)(1), (b)(1), and (c)(1) require that the defendant "enters or remains in" a given place. The "enters" element does not require complete or full entry of the body, and evidence of partial entry is sufficient proof for a completed trespass.[6] The alternate phrase "remains in" creates liability for a person who remains on property with knowledge that he or she has no right or permission to be there.[7] A person who commits a trespass by remaining after being asked to leave must have a reasonable opportunity to do so.[8] Where a person is uncertain as to whether they can safely comply with a notice to quit, a justification defense may apply. Paragraphs (a)(1), (b)(1), and (c)(1) also specify the culpable mental state for these elements to be knowledge, a term defined at RCC § 22E-206 and here requiring that the defendant must at least be aware to a practical certainty that his or her conduct "enters or remains in" the prohibited space.[9]

[9] See, e.g., Wicks v. United States, 226 A.3d 743 (D.C. 2020) (reversing a conviction where the government failed to prove that the defendant knew that he was barred from a sidewalk appeared to be a public walkway).

Paragraphs (a)(1), (b)(1), and (c)(1) also describe the places where a trespass can occur. Trespass into a dwelling is punished more severely per paragraph (a)(1) than trespass into a building per paragraph (b)(1), which is punished more severely than trespass on land or into a watercraft or motor vehicle per paragraph (c)(1). The terms "dwelling," "building," and "motor vehicle" are defined in RCC § 22E-701. The phrase "or part thereof" makes clear that while a person may have a right to enter one part of a parcel, building, or vehicle, that person may not have a right to enter another area in the same location.[10] The "knowingly" mental state requires that the defendant at least be aware to a practical certainty that the identity of the location is a dwelling, building, land, watercraft, or motor vehicle.

Paragraphs (a)(2), (b)(2), and (c)(2) state that the proscribed conduct must be done "[w]ithout a privilege or license to do so under civil law."[11] Determining criminal liability for trespass depends on a wide array of non-criminal laws[12] to establish whether a person is "[w]ithout a privilege or license to do so under civil law."[13] In some instances, it may be obvious that a person has a right to be present.[14] However, particularly where there are competing rights,[15] or where there is public access[16] to a given parcel, building, or vehicle,

[10] For example, a retail store may give members of the general public effective consent to enter the floor room to shop and simultaneously withhold consent to enter a locked storage room in the rear of the store.

[11] A license may be specific or general and need not be communicated directly to the accused. For example, a private homeowner may be indifferent to children using her yard as a shortcut to and from school. A child who uses the yard for that purpose does not commit a trespass.

[12] The determination of whether a person is without a privilege or license under civil law to enter a location may depend on property law, contract law, family law, civil procedure, or other legal sources. For example, a landlord who seeks to evict a tenant must follow the notice and hearing requirements that govern evictions and may not instead have the tenant arrested and removed pursuant to the revised trespass statute. See generally D.C. Code § 42-3505, et seq.

[13] See Spriggs v. United States, 52 A.3d 878, n. 2 (D.C. 2012) (explaining, "The law relating to occupancy and the procedures required to resolve disputes is complicated with respect to trespassers, guests, roomers, lodgers, licensees, and true tenants, including holdover tenants.").

[14] Consider, for example, a person who owns and inhabits a home or a person who is shopping a local store that is open to the public.

[15] Compare, for example, a roommate who bars another roommate's paramour from a shared apartment with a situation where a parent bars a teenage child's paramour from a shared apartment. See, e.g., Saidi v. United States, 110 A.3d 606, 611-12 (D.C. 2015) (discussing the authority of one co-occupant to countermand the invitation of another co-occupant).

[16] When public property is involved, the court has previously explained, "[O]ne must be without legal right to trespass upon the property in question." Leiss v. United States, 364 A.2d 803, 806 (D.C. 1976). The court construed the current unlawful entry statute to require "some additional specific factor establishing the party's lack of a legal right to remain," so as to protect a citizens First Amendment rights by ensuring that his "otherwise lawful presence is not conditioned upon the mere whim of a public official." Accepted "additional specific factors" include: a published WMATA free speech regulation (O'Brien v. United States, 444 A.2d 946 (D.C. 1982)), the issuance of a Capitol police order (Abney v. United States, 616 A.2d 856 (D.C. 1992)), the existence of a chain that separated a tourist line from the White House lawn (Carson v. United States, 419 A.2d 996, 998 (D.C. 1980)), a "pair of gates which WMATA personnel closed every night at the conclusion of the day's business," (United States v. Powell, 563 A.2d 1086 (D.C. 1989)), and a regulation prohibiting sitting or lying down combined with a police officer's warning that the defendant was in violation of the regulation (Berg v. United States, 631 A.2d 394, 399 (D.C. 1993)). However, additional specific factors that the DCCA has rejected includes: closing early the public buildings early in response to the defendant-protestors themselves (Wheelock v. United States, 552 A.2d 503, 505 (D.C. 1988)), and an invalid arrest under a different statute (Hasty v. United States, 669 A.2d 127, 135 (D.C. 1995)); see also Wicks v. United States, 226 A.3d 743 (D.C. 2020) (D.C. App. Apr. 30, 2020).

it may be less clear whether an individual is legally licensed to enter or remain. Even if a person apparently has obtained permission to enter or remain, the means by which the person obtained permission may render an entry unlawful.[17] Or, a person may commit a trespass by unlawfully exceeding the scope of a permission that is limited in time, place, or purpose.[18] Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" mental state also applies to paragraphs (a)(2), (b)(2), and (c)(2), requiring the defendant to be at least aware to a practical certainty or consciously desire that his or her presence at the location is unlawful.[19]

Paragraph (d)(1) codifies the proof requirements in cases alleging unlawful entry onto the grounds of public housing. Where the government seeks to prove unlawful entry premised on a violation of a barring notice for District of Columbia Housing Authority ("DCHA") properties,[20] it must prove that the barring notice was issued for a reason described in DCHA regulations.[21] Additionally, the government must offer evidence that the DCHA official who issued the barring notice had an objectively reasonable basis for believing that the criteria identified in the relevant regulation were satisfied.[22] Even if sufficient cause for barring in fact exists, the issuance of a DCHA barring notice without objectively reasonable cause will render the notice invalid.[23] Paragraph (d)(1) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for the elements in paragraph (d)(1).

Paragraph (d)(2) excludes from trespass liability the failure to pay an established transit fare to the Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority. Such conduct is punished exclusively under D.C. Code § 35-252. Paragraph (d)(2) specifies "in fact," a [17] For example, a person who obtained permission by making a coercive threat may nevertheless commit a trespass.

[18] For example, a person who obtains permission to enter a home for the purpose of completing a repair may commit a trespass by instead (or additionally) entering another part of the home unrelated to the repair.

[19] For example, an investigative journalist who gains entry by going undercover does not commit a trespass unless she is practically certain that she does not have a privilege or license to do so under civil law. Consider also, a person who walks into the lobby of a residential building to leave menus, fliers, or business cards inside. See also Wicks v. United States, 226 A.3d 743 (D.C. 2020) (D.C. App. Apr. 30, 2020) (reversing a conviction where the government failed to prove that the defendant knew that he was barred from a sidewalk appeared to be a public walkway).

[20] This means any temporary, extended, or permanent notice barring a person from a location that is owned, operated, developed, administered, or financially assisted by the Department of Housing and Urban Development or District of Columbia Housing Authority. It includes notices issued by parties other than DCHA officials, including property managers and law enforcement officers.

United States*, 106 A.3d 1087, 1090 (D.C. 2015) (reversing a conviction where the defendant was barred from public housing for being an unauthorized person without first verifying whether the defendant was the guest of a resident); Foster v. United States, 17-CM-994, 2019 WL 5792498 (D.C. Nov. 7, 2019).

[23] Consider, for example, the facts in Winston v. United States, 106 A.3d 1087 (D.C. 2015). A security guard observed a non-resident on the grounds of a public housing complex unaccompanied by a resident and, based on this information alone, barred Mr. Winston as unauthorized, pursuant to 14 DCMR § 9600.4. The officer's actions were found to be objectively unreasonable because no steps were taken to verify that Mr. Winston was not a guest of a resident, permitted to enter pursuant to 14 DCMR § 9600.2. Accordingly, the barring notice was ruled invalid and the violation of the barring notice did not amount to an unlawful entry. It was deemed of no consequence whether Mr. Winston was, in fact, a guest or an unauthorized person.

defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element, here that the conduct constitutes a violation of D.C. Code § 35-252.

Subsection (e) specifically provides that a factfinder may infer that a person lacks a privilege or license to enter or remain in an otherwise vacant[24] location when there are at least two indicia of unlawful entry. The premises must show signs of forced entry[25] and either be secured in a manner that reasonably conveys that it is not to be entered[26] or display signage that is reasonably visible prior to or outside the location's points of entry that says "no trespassing" or similarly indicates that a person may not enter.

Subsection (f) provides the penalties for each grade of the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (g) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised trespass statute clearly changes current District law in five main ways.

First, the revised offense includes three penalty gradations. Current law separately criminalizes, with three different penalties, unlawful entry into a dwelling, building, or other property,[27] and unlawful entry of a motor vehicle.[28] In contrast, the revised trespass offense includes both real property and vehicles, but grades intrusions into dwellings more severely than intrusions into other buildings, which in turn are graded more severely than intrusions on land and vehicles. This change logically reorganizes the revised offenses and improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offenses.

Second, the revised statute punishes an attempt to trespass differently from a completed trespass. Current D.C. Code § 22-3302 punishes an attempt to trespass the same as a completed trespass. In contrast, the revised offense punishes attempted trespass in a manner consistent with other revised offenses, relying on the general part's common definition of attempt[29] and penalty for an attempt.[30] This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offenses.

Third, under the revised trespass statute, the general culpability principles for self-induced intoxication in RCC § 22E-209 allow a defendant to claim they did not act "knowingly" or with "intent" due to their self-induced intoxication. The current unlawful entry statutes are silent as to the availability of an intoxication defense, however, the DCCA has characterized the current statute is a general intent crime.[31] Under the RCC trespass statute, a defendant will be able to raise and present relevant and admissible evidence in support of a claim of that voluntary intoxication prevented the defendant from forming the [24] Here, "vacant" means that the property is uninhabited, not merely unoccupied at a particular moment in time.

[25] Signs of forced entry are not limited to broken doors or windows.
[26] For example, boarding up the property or locking a gate or entryway to the property may be means of reasonably conveying that the public is not free to enter.

knowledge or intent required to prove a trespass. Likewise, where appropriate, a defendant will be entitled to an instruction on intoxication.[32]

Fourth, the permissive inference in the revised offense requires that the affected property be vacant and shows signs of forced entry. Current D.C. Code § 22-3302 provides, "The presence of a person in any private dwelling, building, or other property that is otherwise vacant and boarded-up or otherwise secured in a manner that conveys that it is vacant and not to be entered, or displays a no trespassing sign, shall be prima facie[33] evidence that any person found in such property has entered against the will of the person in legal possession of the property." This language is unclear as to whether the location must be vacant if it displays a no trespassing sign, and there is no case law on point. The current D.C. Code statute, however, clearly does not require evidence of forced entry as part of the permissive inherence. Legislative history indicates that the permissive inference was added to "make it easier to arrest unlawful occupants on vacant property."[34] In contrast, the inference in the revised offense requires signs of forced entry, to ensure that the inference meets the legal standard of being an indicator that it is "more likely than not" that the accused is acting without a privilege or license to do so.[35] A homeowner, real estate agent, or repair person who enters a vacant location that displays a "no trespassing" sign should not be able to be found guilty without further evidence of wrongdoing. This change improves the proportionality and may improve the constitutionality of the revised offense.

Fifth, the RCC repeals D.C. Code § 22-3301, Forcible Entry and Detainer, which is archaic, unused, and duplicative of conduct in the revised Trespass and Burglary statutes.[36] This change reduces unnecessary overlap between the revised statutes.

Beyond these five changes to current District law, four other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised trespass statute specifies knowledge as the culpable mental state required for all offense elements. The current District statutes do not specify a culpable mental state for any element of the unlawful entry on property or unlawful entry of a motor vehicle offenses. The District of Columbia Court of Appeals ("DCCA") has generally said

[32] These results are a product of the logical relevance principle set forth in RCC § 22E-209(a) and the fact that knowledge and intent is a mental state susceptible to negation by self-induced intoxication. See RCC § 22E-209(b).

[33] The phrase "prima facie" is not defined by statute or in case law interpreting the current unlawful entry statutes. However, the same phrase, in the context of the bail reform act (D.C. Code § 22-1327), has been construed as "a permissive inference, not a presumption." Trice v. United States, 525 A.2d 176, 182 (D.C. 1987); see also Raymond v. United States, 396 A.2d 975, 976-77 ("although the wording…may be read to imply that the inference of willfulness is mandatory…the trier of fact has merely been permitted and not required to infer willfulness. We conclude that this instruction, incorporating a permissive inference, properly construes the statute."). As the phrase may be unnecessarily confusing to lawyers and lay people alike, the revised offense uses more straightforward language to convey that the inference is optional. This approach appears to be in line with current District practice. See D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 5.401 ("You may, but you are not required to, presume that [name of defendant] entered the property against the will" of the lawful occupant.).

that trespass is a general intent crime,[37] while also stating that it must be proven that the actor "knew or should have known" that entry was unwanted,[38] and also upholding a requirement that the actor "entered, or attempted to enter the property voluntarily, on purpose, and not by mistake or accident."[39] In addition, the court also has consistently recognized that a person who holds a bona fide belief that she has a right to remain does not commit a trespass.[40] To resolve these ambiguities, the revised statute requires a culpable mental state of knowingly, using the RCC standard definition. Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[41] This change improves the consistency of the revised offense and the proportionality of penalties.

Second, under the revised trespass offense, criminal liability turns on whether the accused acted without privilege or license to do so under civil law. Current D.C. Code § 22-3302 prohibits entering property "against the will of the lawful occupant or of the person lawfully in charge thereof, or being therein or thereon, without lawful authority to remain therein or thereon shall refuse to quit…" An array of DCCA cases have construed, in light of specific fact patterns, the meaning of, and exceptions to, the terms "against the will,"[42] "the lawful occupant,"[43] "the person lawfully in charge thereof,"[44] and "without lawful authority."[45] Current D.C. Code § 22-1341 prohibits entering or being inside a motor vehicle "without the permission of the owner or person lawfully in charge," and lists [42] Compare Bowman v. United States, 212 A.2d 610, 611 (D.C. 1965) ("the entry must be against the expressed will, that is, after a warning to keep off") with McGloin v. United States, 570 A.2d 819, 822 (D.C. 1990) (finding a lessee's right to the use of a corridor is sufficient to bring her within the meaning of "person lawfully in charge thereof.").

[45] See, e.g., Dent v. United States, 271 A.2d 699, 700 (D.C. 1970) (affirming a conviction where defendant was told "never to come back to the apartment, since he didn't know how to act.").

a few statutory exceptions where permission is not needed.[46] The revised statute more broadly refers to whether an actor has a "privilege or license"[47] for entry (or remaining) under civil law.[48] This standard more plainly alludes to the many instances in which a person is entitled to occupy a particular space or vehicle over the express objection of an owner, occupant, manager, or security guard.[49] Unlike theft[50] (requiring unlawful taking) and burglary[51] (requiring intent to commit a crime), trespass criminalizes mere presence. Considerations of freedom of expression, assembly, movement, and association are, therefore, of paramount concern. Accordingly, criminality turns entirely on the entitlements of accused and not merely on the express objection of others. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Third, the revised statute's permissive inference provision includes an explicit reasonableness requirement. The current trespass statute's evidentiary inference applies to a "property that is otherwise vacant and boarded-up or otherwise secured in a manner that conveys that it is vacant and not to be entered, or displays a no trespassing sign…" There is no case law on what manner of securing conveys a location is vacant or what standards may apply to the display of a no trespassing sign. To resolve these ambiguities, the revised permissive inference requires the manner in which the premises are secured to "reasonably convey" that it is not to be entered, or that the "no trespassing" signage be "reasonably visible" prior to or outside the property's points of entry. The reasonableness requirements provide courts with a degree of flexibility in assessing whether the manner of securing or signage is sufficient to infer that the defendant was on notice that the entry was unlawful.[52]

[46] D.C. Code § 22-1341(b) ("Subsection (a) of this section shall not apply to: (1) An employee of the District government in connection with his or her official duties; (2) A tow crane operator who has valid authorization from the District government or from the property owner on whose property the motor vehicle is illegally parked; or (3) A person with a security interest in the motor vehicle who is legally authorized to seize the motor vehicle.").

[47] The phrasing "license or privilege" follows the Model Penal Code and many other jurisdictions' use. See § 21.2(a) Nature of the intrusion, 3 Subst. Crim. L. § 21.2(a) (3d ed.). The RCC does not intend to limit construction of these terms to that of any other particular jurisdiction, but the basic distinction held by some jurisdictions seems appropriate that "licensed" refers to a consensual entry while "privileged" refers to a nonconsensual entry. Id.

[48] The term "civil law" is intended to refer broadly to non-criminal law. Black's Law Dictionary (10th ed. 2014).

[49] For example, current D.C. Code § 22-1341 includes several exclusions from liability for the government, tow truck operators, and re-possessors to enter a motor vehicle without the owner's permission. Similarly, there are many legitimate reasons for a person to occupy real property without permission from the titleholder. For example, a person may have rights in contract or landlord-tenant law (D.C. Code § 42-3505.01); under local or federal housing regulations (14 DCMR § 9600 et seq.; Winston v. United States, 106 A.3d 1087, 1090 (D.C. 2015)); by private necessity (Saidi v. United States, 110 A.3d 606, 611-12 (D.C. 2015)), or as protected by the First Amendment or the District's protections of traditional public forums (O'Brien v. United States, 444 A.2d 946 (D.C. 1982); D.C. Code § 5-331.01 et seq.; D.C. Code § 2-575). See also Bodrick v. United States, 892 A.2d 1116, 1121 (D.C. 2006) (explaining that, in the case of a stay away order, a person's interest as leaseholder is subordinate to her occupancy and use).

[50] See RCC § 22E-2101.

[51] See RCC § 22E-2701.

[52] Depending on the particular facts of the case, the reasonableness requirement may narrow the applicability of the permissive inference as compared to current law. E.g., a single "No trespassing" sign that is obscured or at one entrance of a building with multiple entrances accessible to the public may not "reasonably" indicate that the building is not to be entered, but arguably may provide adequate notice under the current statute. On the other hand, the reasonableness requirement in the revised offense also may

The reasonableness requirements are an objective matter, to be determined from the perspective of an ordinary person entering or remaining in the location. Of course, even if the reasonableness requirements are not met, the government may prove the defendant's guilt without the benefit of the permissive inference.[53] This change clarifies the revised statute.

Fourth, the definition of "person" in RCC § 22E-701 is applicable to all RCC property offenses and provisions, including the definitions of "actor," "complainant," "owner," and "property of another," which in turn rely on the definition of "person" in the RCC property offenses. The definition of "person" in RCC § 22E-701 establishes that "person" categorically includes both natural persons and non-human legal entities such as trusts, estates, companies, etc. The RCC definition of "person" is substantively identical to the definition of "person" in current D.C. Code § 22-3201(2A), which is limited to the Theft, Fraud, Stolen Property, Forgery, and Extortion offenses and other provisions in Chapter 32 of the current D.C. Code Title 22. The current D.C. Code § 22-3201(2A) definition of "person" does not apply to property offenses codified outside of current Chapter 32 of Title 22 despite a similar scope of conduct.[54] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised statute uses the definition of "person" in RCC § 22E-701. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, the revised offense replaces the reference to "other property" in the current unlawful entry on property statute with a specific list of locations where trespass may occur. The current statute[55] protects "any private dwelling, building, or other property" as well as "any public building, or other property," and parts thereof. The DCCA has not provided clear or comprehensive guidance, however, on how broadly "or other property" expand the applicability of the permissive inference, as compared to the current statute. For example, sign that read, "Employees Only," "Keep Out," or "Authorized Personnel Only" would all be included within the ambit of the RCC permissive inference, while they might not be included within the current statute.

[53] See, e.g., Culp v. United States, 486 A.2d 1174 (D.C. 1985) (Where police officers observed defendant inside a vacant building, and had reason to believe that defendant did not belong there, and the property itself revealed indications of a continued claim of possession by the owner or manager, police had probable cause to arrest defendant for unlawful entry); Smith v. United States, 281 A.2d 438 (D.C. 1971) (Where a construction company, the occupant of lot, had posted signs indicating its rightful control of the site, it had never authorized defendant to use the site at night when no one was present, and where site was protected at night by locked gates and a mesh chain link fence topped by barbed wire, there was no need that an explicit "keep out" sign be posted to establish that defendant was acting against the will of the construction company when he entered the site).

[54] It should be noted that there is a definition of "person" in D.C. Code § 45-604 that applies to the current D.C. Code. See D.C. Code §§ 45-601 (rules of interpretation stating that "[i]n the interpretation and construction of this Code the following rules shall be observed."); 45-604 (stating that "person" "shall be held to apply to partnerships and corporations, unless such construction would be unreasonable, and the reference to any officer shall include any person authorized by law to perform the duties of his office, unless the context shows that such words were intended to be used in a more limited sense."). However, this definition is not dispositive and in some D.C. Code property offenses outside Chapter 32 of Title 22, the term "person" is not used at all (e.g., the current malicious destruction of property statute, D.C. Code § 22-303, does not use the term "person," instead referring to "whoever").

[55] D.C. Code § 22-3302.

should be read.[56] The revised trespass offense clarifies that the protected locations are dwellings, buildings, land, watercraft, and motor vehicles. Use of other property[57] without a privilege or license under civil law may be punishable in the RCC as unauthorized use of property.[58]

Second, the revised statute replaces the phrase "refuses to quit" with the more modern "remains in." This does not appear to be a substantive change, merely a stylistic one supported by modern usage.[59]

Third, the revised statute codifies an exclusionary rule for violations of DCHA barring notices. In Winston v. United States,[60] the DCCA required an objectively reasonable basis for believing that valid grounds exist to bar a person from public housing pursuant the regulations in 14 DCMR § 9600 et seq. Where a barring notice is issued incorrectly or arbitrarily—in that case, without first verifying that the person was not a guest[61]—violation of the notice does not amount to a criminal unlawful entry.

Fourth, the revised trespass offense clarifies that fare evasion may not be prosecuted as a trespass. The Fare Evasion Decriminalization Amendment Act of 2018 provides that fare evasion may be prosecuted as a civil infraction only, not as trespass or theft.[62]

Fifth, the statutory text of the revised offense does not list the exclusions from liability that are enumerated in current D.C. Code § 22-1341(b).[63] The revised offense's requirement that the accused know that they are acting without privilege or license under civil law renders this language superfluous.

[56] The DCCA has affirmed convictions for intrusions into places other than buildings or dwellings, including a Home Depot parking lot (Gray v. United States, 100 A.3d 129 (D.C. 2014)), the steps of the United States Capitol (Abney v. United States, 616 A.2d 856 (D.C. 1992)), the area immediately surrounding the Farragut West Metro station (United States v. Powell, 536 A.2d 1086 (D.C. 1989)), and the White House grounds (Leiss v. United States, 364 A.2d 803 (D.C. 1976)).

[57] For example, a bicycle.

[58] RCC § 22E-2102.

[59] The DCCA has used the term "remaining" in construing the elements of the offense. Leiss v. United States, 364 A.2d 803, 806 (D.C. 1976) (the offense prohibits "the act of entering or remaining upon any property when such conduct is both without legal authority and against the expressed will of the person lawfully in charge of the premises.") [62] Prior to this legislation being enacted, fare evasion may have been prosecuted as a trespass. See Bowman v. U.S., 212 A.2d 610 (D.C. 1965) (finding defendants were properly convicted under statute for unlawful entry where they, without a ticket and intent to board a train, had entered restricted area despite sign and public announcements whereby only persons having tickets were permitted through the gate to the restricted area.)

[63] "Subsection (a) of this section shall not apply to: (1) An employee of the District government in connection with his or her official duties; (2) A tow crane operator who has valid authorization from the District government or from the property owner on whose property the motor vehicle is illegally parked; or (3) A person with a security interest in the motor vehicle who is legally authorized to seize the motor vehicle."

RCC § 22E-2701. Burglary.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the burglary offense and penalty gradations for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The offense proscribes knowingly and fully entering or surreptitiously remaining in certain locations without a privilege or license to do so under civil law, with intent to commit a crime inside. The offense is graded based on location. The revised burglary offense is closely related to trespass,[1] with the primary difference that trespass does not require that the defendant intend to commit a crime on the premises. The revised burglary offense replaces the burglary statute in the current D.C. Code.[2]

Paragraphs (a)(1), (b)(1), and (c)(1) require the defendant act "with intent to" commit one or more District crimes inside that is either an offense against persons under Subtitle II or a "predicate property offense," as defined in paragraph (e)(2). "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means here means the accused was practically certainty that his or her conduct constitutes a criminal offense under District of Columbia law. The defendant must have the intent to commit the crime at the moment he or she enters or begins to surreptitiously hide inside.[3] Also, the actor must intend to commit the crime in that location. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary that the accused attempted or completed the predicate offense, only that the accused believed to a practical certainty that he or she would attempt or complete the predicate offense.

Paragraphs (a)(2), (b)(2), and (c)(2) require that the defendant "fully enters or surreptitiously remains in" a given place. The "fully enters" element requires complete entry of the body, and evidence of partial entry of the body is insufficient proof for a completed burglary.[4] The alternate phrase "surreptitiously remains in" creates liability for a person who hides[5] on property with knowledge that he or she has no permission to be there.[6] Paragraphs (a)(2), (b)(2), and (c)(2) also specify the culpable mental state for these

[3] For example, a person who decides to steal an item after noticing it inside may commit a theft but not a burglary. See RCC § 22E-2101.

[4] Fact patterns involving a person's nonconsensual reaching—but not full body entry—into a dwelling, building, or business yard with intent to commit a crime inside may constitute attempted burglary (e.g., a person caught on top of a fence to a business yard) or an attempted or completed form of the predicate crime (e.g., theft, where a person reaches through a window to take an object from a building).

[5] A person who remains without hiding may commit a trespass, in violation of RCC § 22E-2601, but not a burglary. Consider, for example, a person who enters a store open to the public, makes a scene and is asked to leave by a manager, and who thereafter refuses and makes a criminal threat against the manager—such a person may be liable for trespass and criminal threats, but not burglary.

[6] A person may be notified that his or her presence is unlawful by someone other than the titleholder. See, e.g., Smith v. United States, 445 A.2d 961, 964 (D.C. 1982) (a Secret Service officer can demand that protestors leave the grounds of the White House, even though the officer was not the highest ranking officer at the White House); *Whittlesey v. elements to be knowledge, a term defined at RCC § 22E-206 and here requiring that the defendant must at least be aware to a practical certainty that his or her conduct "enters or remains in" the prohibited space.

Paragraphs (a)(2), (b)(2), and (c)(2) also describe the places where a burglary can occur. Burglary into an occupied dwelling is punished more severely than burglary into an unoccupied dwelling[7] or into an occupied building, which are punished more severely than burglary into an unoccupied building[8] or a business yard. The terms "dwelling," "building," and "business yard" are defined in RCC § 22E-701.[9] The phrase "or part thereof" makes clear that while a person may have a right to enter one part of a dwelling, building, or business yard, that person may not have a right to enter another area in the same location.[10] The "knowingly" mental state requires that the defendant at least be aware to a practical certainty that the identity of the location is a dwelling, building, or business yard.

Paragraph (a)(3), subparagraphs (b)(2)(A) and (b)(2)(B), and paragraph (c)(3) state that the entering or remaining must be done "[w]ithout a privilege or license to do so under civil law."[11] Determining criminal liability for burglary depends on a wide array of non-criminal laws[12] to establish whether a person is "[w]ithout a privilege or license to do so under civil law."[13] In some instances, it may be obvious that a person has a right to be present.[14] However, particularly where there are competing rights,[15] or where there is public access[16] to a given building or business yard, it may be less clear whether an [8] Or, an occupied building, when the defendant is not reckless as to occupancy.

[9] The term "dwelling" may include houseboats and other structures that are not buildings.

[10] For example, a retail store may give members of the general public effective consent to enter the floor room to shop and simultaneously withhold consent to enter a locked storage room in the rear of the store.

[11] A license may be specific or general and need not be communicated directly to the accused.

[12] The determination of whether a person is without a privilege or license under civil law to enter a location may depend on property law, contract law, family law, civil procedure, or other legal sources. For example, a landlord who seeks to evict a tenant must follow the notice and hearing requirements that govern evictions and may not instead have the tenant arrested and removed pursuant to the revised trespass statute. See generally D.C. Code § 42-3505, et seq.

[13] See Spriggs v. United States, 52 A.3d 878, n. 2 (D.C. 2012) (explaining, "The law relating to occupancy and the procedures required to resolve disputes is complicated with respect to trespassers, guests, roomers, lodgers, licensees, and true tenants, including holdover tenants.").

[14] Consider, for example, a person who owns and inhabits a home or a person who is shopping a local store that is open to the public.

[15] Compare, for example, a roommate who bars another roommate's paramour from a shared apartment with a situation where a parent bars a teenage child's paramour from a shared apartment. See, e.g., Saidi v. United States, 110 A.3d 606, 611-12 (D.C. 2015) (discussing the authority of one co-occupant to countermand the invitation of another co-occupant).

[16] When public property is involved, the court has previously explained, "[O]ne must be without legal right to trespass upon the property in question." Leiss v. United States, 364 A.2d 803, 806 (D.C. 1976). The court construed the current unlawful entry statute to require "some additional specific factor establishing the party's lack of a legal right to remain," so as to protect a citizens First Amendment rights by ensuring that his "otherwise lawful presence is not conditioned upon the mere whim of a public official." Accepted "additional specific factors" include: a published WMATA free speech regulation (O'Brien v. United States, 444 A.2d 946 (D.C. 1982)), the issuance of a Capitol police order (Abney v. United States, 616 A.2d 856 (D.C. 1992)), the existence of a chain that separated a tourist line from the White House lawn (Carson v. United States, 419 A.2d 996, 998 (D.C. 1980)), a "pair of gates which WMATA personnel closed every night at the conclusion of the day's business," (United States v. Powell, 563 A.2d 1086 (D.C. 1989)), and a regulation prohibiting sitting or lying down combined with a police officer's warning that the defendant individual is legally licensed to enter or remain. Even if a person apparently has obtained permission to enter, the means by which the person obtained permission may render an entry unlawful.[17] Or, a person may commit a burglary by unlawfully exceeding the scope of a permission that is limited in time, place, or purpose.[18] Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "knowingly" mental state in paragraphs (a)(2), (b)(2) and (c)(2) also apply to the element "without a privilege or license," requiring the defendant to be at least aware to a practical certainty or consciously desire that his or her presence at the location is unlawful.

Sub-subparagraph (b)(2)(B)(i) and subparagraph (c)(2)(B) specify that buildings and business yards must not be open to the general public at the time of the burglary.[19] "Open to the general public" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 to mean no payment, membership, affiliation, appointment, or special permission is required to enter. A person does not commit a burglary by entering a public space with intent to commit a crime.[20]

Paragraph (a)(4) and sub-subparagraph (b)(2)(B)(ii) provide heightened liability where a defendant is reckless as to the dwelling or building being occupied. "Recklessly" is defined in RCC § 22E-206 and here requires that the accused consciously disregard a substantial risk that the location is occupied by someone other than a participant in the burglary at the moment he or she enters or begins to surreptitiously hide inside.[21] Paragraph (a)(4) and sub-subparagraph (b)(2)(B)(ii) further require that a non-participant, in fact, directly perceive the actor, by sight or sound or touch.[22] "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element and, applied here, indicates that the actor need not have any awareness as to being directly perceived during the burglary. Entering a dwelling undetected is punished as second was in violation of the regulation (Berg v. United States, 631 A.2d 394, 399 (D.C. 1993)). However, additional specific factors that the DCCA has rejected includes: closing early the public buildings early in response to the defendant-protestors themselves (Wheelock v. United States, 552 A.2d 503, 505 (D.C. 1988)), and an invalid arrest under a different statute (Hasty v. United States, 669 A.2d 127, 135 (D.C. 1995)).

[17] For example, a person who obtained permission by deceit may nevertheless commit a burglary. See, e.g., McKinnon v. United States, 644 A.2d 438, 440 (D.C. 1994).

[18] For example, a person who obtains permission to enter a home for the purpose of completing a repair may commit a burglary by instead (or additionally) entering another part of the home unrelated to the repair with intent to commit a crime.

[19] There are instances in which a person is unauthorized to enter a space that is open to the general public. In those cases, other liability may attach but burglary liability will not. Consider, for example, a person is barred from a grocery store for shoplifting and returns to the same grocery store, in violation of the bar notice, with intent to commit theft, during business hours. That person may have committed a trespass, but not a burglary. Consider also, a person is ordered to stay 100 yards away from a former intimate partner, sees the former partner at the grocery store, approaches her, and assaults her. That person may have committed contempt, but not a burglary.

[20] For example, a person who enters a store during business hours with intent to steal and does steal may commit theft, but not burglary. See RCC § 22E-2101. A person who enters a tavern with intent to fight and does fight may commit an assault but not a burglary. See RCC § 22E-1202.

[21] Where an occupant returns home after the burglary commences and the burglary is immediately discovered, the offense is punished as second degree burglary only, not first degree. However, where an occupant returns home after the burglary commences and the burglar remains surreptitiously on the premises, the offense is punished as first degree burglary.

[22] Where a building occupant observes a burglar remotely, through a camera system, the burglar commits a third degree burglary only, not second degree.

degree burglary, not as first degree. Entering a building undetected is punished as third degree burglary not as second degree.[23]

Subsection (d) provides the penalties for each grade of the offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.] Paragraph (d)(4) authorizes a penalty enhancement where the actor carries a dangerous weapon or imitation firearm while entering or surreptitiously remaining in the location. Paragraph (d)(4) specifies a culpable mental state of "knowingly," a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means that the actor is at least aware to a practical certainty that he or she holds or carries on the actor's person, while entering or surreptitiously remaining in the location, an item. Paragraph (d)(4) further requires that the item be, "in fact," a "dangerous weapon" or "imitation firearm" as those terms are defined in RCC § 22E-701. "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element, here that the item is a "dangerous weapon" or "imitation firearm."

Subsection (e) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC and defines the term "predicate property offense" to include specified offenses in Subtitle III of the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised burglary statute clearly changes current District law in seven main ways.

First, the revised burglary statute prohibits surreptitiously remaining in a specified location. Current D.C. Code § 22-801 punishes unlawfully entering but not unlawfully remaining. In contrast, the revised statute provides liability in instances where a person lawfully enters a location and then hides to facilitate commission of a crime at a later time.[24] This change eliminates an unnecessary gap in liability.

Second, the revised burglary statute requires fully entering or remaining. Although current D.C. Code § 22-801 does not define the term "enter," District case law that previously has held that the term includes entering with "any part of a person's body."[25] In contrast, the RCC punishes partial entry of the body or a camera, microphone, or other instrument held by an actor as trespass[26] but reserves the revised burglary statute's more severe penalties for instances in which the potential for harm to another person or property is greater. This change improves the organization and proportionality of the revised offenses.

Third, the revised burglary offense requires proof that the defendant's presence in the location is "without a privilege or license…under civil law"—i.e. trespassory. The current burglary statute does not require that the defendant's presence is otherwise unlawful.[27] The lack of a trespassory element in burglary leads to some counterintuitive [23] Consider, for example, a person who enters the lobby and mailroom of a large building, undetected by an employee on the fifth floor.

[24] Consider, for example, a person enters a store during business hours and hides away, intending to steal from the store once it is closed.

[25] Edelen v. United States, 560 A.2d 527, 529 (D.C. 1989); Davis v. United States, 712 A.2d 482, 485 (D.C. 1998).

[26] RCC § 22E-2601.

[27] United States v. Kearney, 498 F.2d 61, 65 (D.C. Cir. 1974) ("It is thus apparent that since the District of Columbia first degree burglary statute makes it an offense to enter an occupied dwelling with intent to commit a crime therein and that such offense can be committed without a violation of the unlawful entry statute, the entry need not necessarily be against the will of the occupants."); see also Spriggs v. United States, 52 A.3d outcomes. For example, a witness who enters a courthouse intending to commit perjury, a government official who enters her office intending to accept a bribe, a drug user who enters his friend's home to use drugs with his companion, and a shoplifter who enters a store intending to steal a candy bar would all be guilty of burglary under current District law, even though their presence in the specified location was invited. In contrast, the revised burglary statute requires that the defendant's presence in the location amount to a trespass. This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised offenses.

Fourth, the revised burglary offense includes three penalty gradations that distinguish liability for when the actor is directly perceived or goes undetected, and the nature of the location. The current burglary statute contains two gradations: first degree burglary, which punishes those who burgle a dwelling where another person is present;[28] and second degree burglary which punishes invasions of dwellings where no one is present, all other buildings, and the miscellaneous watercraft and railroad cars discussed below.[29] No distinction in liability is made under current law as to whether the actor encountered or was seen by anyone in the location. In contrast, the revised burglary offense has three gradations to better distinguish the degree of possible danger—though threats or violence are highly unusual[30] and not required—and the expectation of privacy that is violated. The topmost gradation applies to dwellings when the actor is reckless as to occupancy and is, in fact, directly perceived. The revised statute includes an intermediate gradation that applies in two circumstances: burglary of a dwelling that is unoccupied or when the burglary is not perceived,[31] and burglary of an occupied building (other than a dwelling) when the actor is reckless as to occupancy and is, in fact, directly perceived. The lowest gradation of the revised statute applies to any type of building or a business yard. This change improves the proportionality of the revised statutes.

Fifth, the first and second degrees of the revised burglary statute require recklessness as to a location being occupied at the time of the burglary[32] while knowledge is the required culpable mental state for all other elements of the offense besides an intent to commit a crime or the fact that the burglar was perceived. Current D.C. Code § 22-801 is silent as to applicable the culpable mental states required, other than "intent" (undefined) to commit another crime at the time of the entry.[33] Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[34] A reckless culpable mental state is consistent with a wide range of penalty enhancements in the RCC related to the complainant's characteristics,[35] and has been recognized by some authorities as an appropriate minimal basis for liability.[36] This change improves the clarity and completeness of the revised offense.

[31] Or, an occupied dwelling, when the defendant is not reckless as to occupancy.

[32] A person who is not at least reckless as to the presence of others in a location remains liable for burglary but is subject to a lower penalty. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offenses.

Sixth, the revised burglary offense only protects a stable, watercraft, or railroad car if it is being used as a dwelling[37] or is affixed to land. The current second degree burglary statute expressly protects any "stable…steamboat, canalboat, vessel, or other watercraft, [or] railroad car."[38] In contrast, although the RCC punishes a trespass onto any land, watercraft, or motor vehicle,[39] it punishes only burglary of dwellings, buildings, or business yards. "Building" is broadly defined to include any "structure affixed to land that is designed to contain one or more natural persons."[40] Unlike trespass, burglary is an inchoate offense that, in practice, provides a location enhancement for confined places where a person may be surprised by a burglar and where a person there is a special expectation of privacy. This change improves the organization and proportionality of the revised offenses.

Seventh, the revised burglary offense requires an intent to commit one of several specific offenses in the revised code. Current D.C. Code § 22-801 refers broadly to "intent to break and carry away any part thereof, or any fixture or other thing attached to or connected thereto or to commit any criminal offense" (emphasis added). However, a least one District Court opinion has interpreted this statutory language to be narrower,[41] requiring that the nature of the intended criminal offense be reasonably related to the sanctity of the place entered—usually a crime of violence against persons or a crime involving the taking or destruction of property.[42] The same court has declined to state that the District's burglary statute reaches an intent to commit any misdemeanor[43] and specifically held that trespass may not itself be the basis for a burglary conviction.[44] In contrast, the revised statute limits burglary to specified crimes. The terms "bodily injury," "sexual act," "sexual contact," and "property" are defined in RCC § 22E-701, consistent with the use of these terms in other parts of the revised code. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised offense.

United States*, 37 App. D.C. 442, 445 (D.C. Cir. 1911) ("To constitute the crime of housebreaking, it is necessary to show an unlawful entry, with the intent to commit some other offense") (emphasis added).

Beyond these seven changes to current District law, one other aspect of the revised statute may constitute a substantive change to current District law.

The definition of "person" in RCC § 22E-701 is applicable to all RCC property offenses and provisions, including the definitions of "actor," "complainant," "owner," and "property of another," which in turn rely on the definition of "person" in the RCC property offenses. The definition of "person" in RCC § 22E-701 establishes that "person" categorically includes both natural persons and non-human legal entities such as trusts, estates, companies, etc. The RCC definition of "person" is substantively identical to the definition of "person" in current D.C. Code § 22-3201(2A), which is limited to the Theft, Fraud, Stolen Property, Forgery, and Extortion offenses and other provisions in Chapter 32 of the current D.C. Code Title 22. The current D.C. Code § 22-3201(2A) definition of "person" does not apply to property offenses codified outside of current Chapter 32 of Title 22 despite a similar scope of conduct.[45] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised statute uses the definition of "person" in RCC § 22E-701. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statute.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, by use of the word "inside," the revised burglary statute clarifies that the defendant must intend to commit the offense within the trespassed location. Although this requirement does not appear in the statutory text, the DCCA has included this requirement in some of its recitations of burglary's elements.[46] The purpose is to exclude from liability instances where a person passes through one property en route to the property where he or she intends to commit the crime.[47]

---

[45] It should be noted that there is a definition of "person" in D.C. Code § 45-604 that applies to the current D.C. Code. See D.C. Code §§ 45-601 (rules of interpretation stating that "[i]n the interpretation and construction of this Code the following rules shall be observed."); 45-604 (stating that "person" "shall be held to apply to partnerships and corporations, unless such construction would be unreasonable, and the reference to any officer shall include any person authorized by law to perform the duties of his office, unless the context shows that such words were intended to be used in a more limited sense."). However, this definition is not dispositive and in some D.C. Code property offenses outside Chapter 32 of Title 22, the term "person" is not used at all (e.g., the current malicious destruction of property statute, D.C. Code § 22-303, does not use the term "person," instead referring to "whoever").

[46] Shelton v. United States, 505 A.2d 767, 769 (D.C. 1986) ("A conviction for burglary requires a finding that the defendant entered the premises having already formed the intent to commit a criminal offense inside."); Marshall v. United States, 623 A.2d 551, 557 (D.C. 1992) ("In order to prove armed first degree burglary, the government must establish beyond a reasonable doubt, an armed entry (by appellant or by a principal aided and abetted by appellant) into an occupied dwelling with the intent to commit a crime therein. The intent to commit the crime inside the premises must have been formed by the time of the entry.") (internal citations omitted); Lee v. United States, 699 A.2d 373, 383 (D.C. 1997) ("To prove burglary, the government must establish that the defendant entered the premises having already formed an intent to commit a crime therein.") (internal quotations and citations omitted).

[47] For example, imagine adjacent houses A and B. A burglar plans to enter House B to steal property; but to do so, she knows she must cross over the backyard of House A to get to House B. She does so. Absent

Second, the revised burglary statute specifies that participants in the crime cannot be the "other person" required in first degree and second degree burglary. The current statute is silent on this matter. The basis for treating burglaries of occupied places more seriously is the added danger and terror those occupants may experience. Such danger and terror are far less likely to occur if the other person present during the crime is an accomplice, co-conspirator, or aider and abettor.

Third, the revised burglary statute updates and modernizes the language of the offense in various other ways that do not change the scope of the offense. For instance, the revised offense simply eliminates a number of contradictory and redundant phrases.[48] the requirement that the burglar must intend to commit an offense "therein," it appears that the burglar has actually committed burglary twice, once as to House A and once as to House B. Although counterintuitive, the burglar did trespass with intent to commit an offense when she entered the backyard of House A. Under the revised statute, the burglar would only be guilty of a trespass as to House A, and a burglary as to House B.

[48] The phrases are, "in the nighttime or in the daytime," which is pure surplusage; "break and enter, or enter without breaking," which is also surplusage; "room used as a sleeping apartment in any building," which is covered by the RCC's definition of dwelling; and "with intent to break and carry away any part thereof, or any fixture or other thing attached to or connected thereto," which is surplusage to the phrase "with intent to commit any criminal offense therein." D.C. Code § 22-801. In the case of second-degree burglary, "bank, store, warehouse, shop, stable," are redundant because each is covered by the broader term "building."

RCC § 22E-2702. Possession of Tools to Commit Property Crime.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the possession of tools to commit property crime offense for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The offense criminalizes possession of a tool designed or specifically adapted for picking locks, cutting chains, cutting glass, bypassing an electronic security system, or bypassing a locked door, with intent to use the tool to commit a property offense. The revised possession of tools to commit property crime statute replaces the possession of implements of crime[1] statute and a minimum statutory penalty for the offense[2] in the current D.C. Code.

Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that the defendant must "possess" the prohibited item, a term defined at RCC § 22E-701. Paragraph (a)(1) also specifies the culpable mental state for paragraph (a)(1) of the offense to be knowledge, a term defined at RCC § 22E-206 to mean the defendant must be aware to a practical certainty that he possesses an item or items[3] that is a property crime tool. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that the types of tools that are covered by the offense are limited to tools for picking locks, cutting chains, cutting glass, bypassing an electronic security system, or bypassing a locked door.[4] The tools must be designed or specifically adapted for such use, and do not include unmodified, common, general use objects.[5]

Paragraph (a)(2) clarifies that the person must act "with intent to" use the tool to commit a District crime and that the crime must be Theft,[6] Unauthorized Use of Property,[7] Unauthorized Use of a Motor Vehicle,[8] Shoplifting,[9] Alteration of Motor Vehicle Identification Number,[10] Alteration of Bicycle Identification Number,[11] Arson,[12] Criminal Damage to Property,[13] Criminal Graffiti,[14] Trespass,[15] or Burglary.[16] "Intent" is a term defined at RCC § 22E-206 that here means the defendant was practically certain that he or she would use the tool to commit one of the specified crimes. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this

Relation to Current District Law. The revised possession of tools to commit property crime statute clearly changes current District law in five main ways.

First, the revised statute changes the range of prohibited items by including tools that are designed or specifically adapted for "picking locks, cutting chains, cutting glass, bypassing an electronic security system, or bypassing a locked door" and by eliminating tools for picking pockets. The current statute only covers tools "for picking locks or pockets."[17] District case law has explicitly held that bolt-cutters, for example, are not tools covered by the current statute because they would destroy, not pick, a lock.[18] In contrast, the revised statute broadens the scope of the statute to include tools designed or specifically adapted for other purposes, including "cutting chains," which likely would include bolt-cutters. Such tools may commonly be used in gaining access to an object or location to commit a property crime. The revised statute reduces unnecessary gaps in the existing offense.

Second, the revised offense limits the offense to tools "designed or specifically adapted for" the specified purposes. The current statute is silent as to whether the tool must be fashioned in a manner suited for the specified purposes of picking locks, etc. In contrast, the revised statute no longer covers objects that are not designed or specifically adapted for one of the stated purposes. This change eliminates liability for many common items carried by citizens that could be used for—but are not designed or specifically adapted for—picking locks or pockets.[19] This change clarifies and improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

Third, the revised statute eliminates the repeat offender penalty provision in the current statutes consistent with other nonviolent revised offenses in the RCC. In current law, the offense ordinarily is punishable by a maximum term of imprisonment of 180 days and a maximum fine of $1,000.[20] However, if the defendant has ever been previously convicted of the offense, or of any felony, the offense is punishable by a minimum term of imprisonment of one year, a maximum term of imprisonment of five years, and a maximum fine of $12,500.[21] By contrast, the revised offense is subject to a single, standard penalty classification. The RCC general recidivism enhancement (RCC § 22E-606) is limited to RCC offenses against persons and enhanced burglary, which requires the presence of a dangerous weapon or imitation firearm. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statutes.

[18] In re J.W., 100 A.3d 1091, 1092-94 (D.C. 2014) (holding that bolt-cutters do not constitute tools for "picking" locks or pockets).

[20] D.C. Code § 22-2501.

[21] D.C. Code §§ 22-2501; 24-403.01(f)(3).

Fourth, the revised offense bars any attempt liability. Under current law, possession of implements of crime is subject to the general attempt statute.[22] In contrast, under the revised offense, even if a person satisfies the required elements for attempt liability under RCC § 22E-301 as to revised possession of tools to commit property crime, that person has committed no offense under the revised code. Completed possession of tools to commit property crime is already an inchoate crime, closely related to an attempted form of theft or burglary, for which the RCC provides liability. This change improves the proportionality of the revised statute.

Fifth, the revised offense limits the target crimes within the scope of the revised statute to District crimes involving the trespass, misuse, taking, or damage of property. The District's current possession of implements of a crime statute refers broadly to "a crime."[23] In contrast, the revised offense requires an intent to commit a broad range of specified District property crimes. The revised statute consequently excludes the use of such tools to commit assault or drug crimes, or exclusively federal[24] crimes. By requiring intent to commit a property crime, the revised offense punishes only intended conduct that, by its nature, is logically related to the use of the tools that are within the scope of the statute. Possession[25] and use[26] of such tools as dangerous weapons to commit offenses against persons are addressed in other sections of the RCC. This change clarifies and improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

Beyond these five changes to current District law, one other aspect of the revised statute may constitute a substantive change to current District law.

The definition of "person" in RCC § 22E-701 is applicable to all RCC property offenses and provisions, including the definitions of "actor," "complainant," "owner," and "property of another," which in turn rely on the definition of "person" in the RCC property offenses. The definition of "person" in RCC § 22E-701 establishes that "person" categorically includes both natural persons and non-human legal entities such as trusts, estates, companies, etc. The RCC definition of "person" is substantively identical to the definition of "person" in current D.C. Code § 22-3201(2A), which is limited to the Theft, Fraud, Stolen Property, Forgery, and Extortion offenses and other provisions in Chapter 32 of the current D.C. Code Title 22. The current D.C. Code § 22-3201(2A) definition of "person" does not apply to property offenses codified outside of current Chapter 32 of Title 22 despite a similar scope of conduct.[27] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised statute uses

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

The revised offense requires a culpable mental state of knowledge for paragraph (a)(1). The current statute does not specify a culpable mental state for these elements and no case law exists on point. However, given the current and revised offenses' requirements that the defendant have an intent to commit a crime with the tool,[28] a knowing culpable mental state as to the facts that the defendant possessed a relevant kind of tool appears appropriate. Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[29] Requiring a knowing culpable mental state also makes the revised possession of tools to commit property crime offense consistent with the revised burglary statute and other property offenses, which generally require that the defendant act knowingly with respect to the elements of the offense.[30] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Code property offenses outside Chapter 32 of Title 22, the term "person" is not used at all (e.g., the current malicious destruction of property statute, D.C. Code § 22-303, does not use the term "person," instead referring to "whoever").

COMMENTARY:
SUBTITLE IV. OFFENSES AGAINST GOVERNMENT OPERATION

RCC § 22E-3201. Impersonation of an Official.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the impersonation of an official offense for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The revised statute replaces D.C. Code § 22-1404-1406 (Falsely impersonating public officer or minister, false personation of inspector of departments of District, and false personation of police officer, respectively). The revised statute also replaces D.C. Code § 22-1409 (Use of official insignia; penalty for unauthorized use) decriminalizing under District law conduct associated with the misuse of official insignia that does not satisfy the requirements for impersonation of an official or a more general property crime.

Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that the actor must engage in conduct with intent to deceive another as to the actor's lawful authority and with intent to cause harm to another or that any person receive a personal benefit.

In subparagraph (a)(1)(A), "deceive" is a defined term that means: "[c]reating or reinforcing a false impression as to a material fact, including false impressions as to intention to perform future actions; [p]reventing another person from acquiring material information; [and], failing to correct a false impression as to a material fact, including false impressions as to intention, which the person previously created or reinforced, or which the deceiver knows to be influencing another to whom he or she stands in a fiduciary or confidential relationship."[1] "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the actor is practically certain that another person would be deceived as to the actor's authority. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that the actor successfully deceives another person, only that the actor believes to a practical certainty that another person will be deceived as to the actor's lawful authority.

In subparagraph (a)(1)(B), per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the culpable mental state "with intent" also applies to whether the actor intends to cause harm to another person or believes that any person will receive a personal benefit. It is not necessary to prove that the actor or another actually receives a benefit or causes harm to another, only that the actor believes to a practical certainty that they will harm another person or any person will receive such a personal benefit. The personal benefit need not be monetary or material in nature. [2]

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies that to be criminally liable for impersonation of an official, the actor must knowingly represent themselves to currently hold lawful authority as a person in a specialized role, and they must know that such a representation is false. The term "knowingly" is defined in RCC § 22E-206, and applied here means that the actor must be practically certain that he or she is representing him- or herself to hold lawful authority as a person in one or more of the enumerated roles listed in subparagraphs (a)(2)(A)-(H) and must be practically certain that such a representation is false.

Subparagraphs (a)(2)(A)-(a)(2)(H) list eight roles that an actor may be liable for falsely claiming the lawful authority of under the revised offense. Subparagraph (a)(2)(A) refers to a judge of a federal or local court in the District of Columbia, subparagraph (a)(2)(B) refers to a prosecutor for the United States Attorney for the District of Columbia or the Attorney General for the District of Columbia, and subparagraph (a)(2)(C) refers to a notary public. Subparagraph (a)(2)(D) refers to a "law enforcement officer,"[3] subparagraph (a)(2)(E) refers to a "public safety employee,"[4] and subparagraph (a)(2)(F) refers to a "District official."[5] Subparagraph (a)(2)(G) refers to a "District employee with power to enforce District laws or regulations." This language includes the role of a District of Columbia inspector for any department of government.[6] Subparagraph (a)(2)(H) refers to a "person authorized to solemnize marriage."[7]

Paragraph (a)(3) specifies that, in addition to the requirements outlined in paragraphs (a)(1) and (a)(2), the actor must perform the duty, exercise the authority, or attempt to perform the duty or exercise the authority associated with the role listed in subparagraphs (a)(2)(A)-(H). Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the culpable mental state of "knowingly" also applies to whether the actor performs the duty, exercises the authority, or attempts to do so related to a role listed in subparagraphs (a)(2)(A)-(H).

Subsection (b) specifies the requirements of impersonation of an official in the second degree. Paragraphs (b)(1) and (b)(2) are identical to paragraphs (a)(1) and (a)(2). The second degree differs from the first degree of the offense only in its omission of the requirements in paragraph (a)(3); to commit the offense in the second degree, the actor need not perform the duty, exercise the authority, or attempt to do so related to a role listed in subparagraph (b)(2)(A)-(H).

Subsection (c) specifies that the Metropolitan Police Department and the Fire and Emergency Medical Services Department have the sole ownership of their official uniform insignia. This subsection is a civil provision and does not itself specify a criminal offense, although a violation of these ownership rights may constitute another crime under District or federal law.[8]

Subsection (d) specifies the penalties for the revised offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (e) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC and the D.C. Code.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised impersonation of an official statute clearly changes current District law in four main ways.

First, the revised statute has two gradations distinguished by whether or not the actor performed the duty or exercised the authority of a specified official, or attempted to do so. Current D.C. Code § 22-1404 (falsely impersonating public officer or minister) requires that the actor "attempt[] to perform the duty or exercise the authority pertaining to any such office or character," but the offense has no other gradation for when an actor does not make such an attempt. Other current false personation statutes (D.C. Code § 22-1405, § 22-1406) only require false representation as being an official, no actual or attempted use official powers, and have just one gradation. In contrast, the revised statute codifies a first degree gradation where there is actual or attempted performance or exercise of the duty or authority of the impersonated official, and a second degree gradation for false representation where there is merely impersonation but no attempt to perform or exercise the duty or authority of the impersonated official. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statute.

Second, the revised statute prohibits and penalizes impersonation of a District inspector the same as impersonation of other specified officials. Current D.C. Code § 22–1405 provides that falsely representing oneself as an "inspector of any department of the District government" is a crime punishable by a specified fine (with a first offense differing from the standard schedule of fines in the D.C. Code), 6 months imprisonment, or both.[9] [8] For example, such a violation may constitute a federal crime for copyright or trademark infringement.

[9] D.C. Code § 22–1405 ("It shall be unlawful for any person in the District of Columbia to falsely represent himself or herself as being an inspector of the Department of Human Services of said District, or an inspector of any department of the District government; and any person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction in the Superior Court of the District of Columbia shall be punished by a fine of not less than $10 nor more than $50 for the 1st offense, and for each subsequent offense by a fine of not less than $50 and not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, or imprisonment in the Jail of the District not exceeding 6 months, or both, in the discretion of the court.").

Current D.C. Code § 22–1404 provides in relevant part that falsely representing oneself as a "public officer" and attempting to perform the duty or exercise the authority of such a position is a crime punishable by a fine, one to three years imprisonment, or both.[10] There is no case law on the scope of the phrase "inspector of any department of the District government" under D.C. Code § 22–1405 or the scope of the phrase "public officer"[11] under D.C. Code § 22–1404. Per the current general attempt statute in D.C. Code § 22–1803, an attempt to commit a crime under D.C. Code § 22–1404 by impersonating a "public official" and attempting to exercise that authority is punishable by a maximum 180 days imprisonment. In contrast, the revised statute specifies that impersonation of a District employee with power to enforce District laws or regulations is punishable the same as other specified officials. First degree impersonation of an official provides higher penalties where there is not only a false representation but an attempt to exercise the authority or duty to enforce District laws or regulations, consistent with an interpretation that the current D.C. Code § 22–1404 term "public officer" includes District inspectors.[12] Second degree impersonation of an official punishes false representation as a District employee with power to enforce District laws or regulations the same as inchoate violations of D.C. Code § 22–1404 for impersonating other officials.[13] This change clarifies and improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Third, the revised statute codifies as an element of the offense that the actor engaged in the conduct either with intent to harm another person or that anyone gain a personal benefit. Current D.C. Code § 22-1404, § 22-1405, and § 22-1409 make no mention of a personal benefit. D.C. Code § 22-1406 requires that an actor impersonating a police officer do so "with a fraudulent design," and case law has construed this phrase to broadly mean

---

[10] D.C. Code § 22–1404 ("Whoever falsely represents himself or herself to be a judge of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia, notary public, police officer, or other public officer, or a minister qualified to celebrate marriage, and attempts to perform the duty or exercise the authority pertaining to any such office or character, or having been duly appointed to any of such offices shall knowingly attempt to act as any such officers after his or her appointment or commission has expired or he or she has been dismissed from such office, shall suffer imprisonment in the penitentiary for not less than 1 year nor more than 3 years. In addition to any other penalty provided under this section, a person may be fined an amount not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01.").

[11] The reference to "public officer" appears in the 1901 codification of this offense. See An Act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901 (31 Stat. 1321) ("SEC. 860. Whoever falsely represents himself to be a justice of the peace, notary public, police officer, constable, or other public officer, or a minister qualified to celebrate marriage, and attempts to perform the duty or exercise the authority pertaining to any such office or character, or having been duly appointed to any of such offices shall knowingly attempt to act as any of such officers after his appointment or commission has expired or he has been dismissed from such office, shall suffer imprisonment in the penitentiary for not less than one year nor more than three years.").

[12] Notably federal law does not differentiate punishment for an "officer" and other employees attempting to exercise official authority. See 18 U.S. Code § 912 ("Whoever falsely assumes or pretends to be an officer or employee acting under the authority of the United States or any department, agency or officer thereof, and acts as such, or in such pretended character demands or obtains any money, paper, document, or thing of value, shall be fined under this title or imprisoned not more than three years, or both.").

[13] Compare the 180-day (non-jury demandable) penalty for an attempted violation of D.C. Code § 22–1404 (requiring not only a false representation but an attempt to exercise the authority of the false role) with the 6-month (jury demandable) penalty for a violation of D.C. Code § 22–1405.

gaining any advantage over another.[14] In contrast, the RCC provides liability for falsely impersonating an official to cause harm to another or that anyone receive a personal benefit. Deliberately harming another through the impersonation of an official appears to be at least as blameworthy as gaining a benefit, and captures instances of impersonation not within the scope of the current statutes. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statutes and may reduce an unnecessary gap in liability.

Fourth, the revised statute eliminates as a separate criminal offense with a distinct penalty the misuse of official uniform insignia of the Metropolitan Police Department and the Fire and Emergency Medical Services Department. Current D.C. Code § 22–1409(b) criminalizes a person who "for any reason, makes or attempts to make unauthorized use of" an "official insignia" of the Metropolitan Police Department (MPD) or the Fire and Emergency Medical Services Department (FEMS)."[15] The term "official insignia" is not defined and there is no case law regarding that term or the scope of the phrase, "for any reason, makes or attempts to make unauthorized use of." Legislative history, however, indicates that the offense was intended to proscribe people misrepresenting themselves (or being an accomplice to another person misrepresenting themselves) as an MPD or FEMS employee through the use of official badges.[16] In contrast, the revised statute does not separately criminalize misuse of MPD and FEMS insignia. For misuses of insignia to impersonate MPD or FEMS, the revised statute provides liability, consistent with the apparent legislative intent for the offense.[17] For other misuses of insignia that involve mere property crime rather than impersonation, federal copyright[18] and trademark[19] laws may preempt part or all of current D.C. Code § 22–1409(b) or other RCC provisions concerning

United States*, 955 A.2d 152, 155 (D.C. 2008) ("As to the second element, we have said that "'fraud' is a 'generic term which embraces all the multifarious means ... resorted to by one individual to gain advantage over another by false suggestions or by suppression of the truth.' " Thus, to prove the defendant's fraudulent design, there must be evidence that the defendant impersonated a police officer to deceive another in order to gain some advantage thereby. But the advantage need not be monetary or even material in nature.").

[15] D.C. Code § 22–1409(b) ("Any person who, for any reason, makes or attempts to make unauthorized use of, or aids or attempts to aid another person in the unauthorized use or attempted unauthorized use of the official badges, patches, emblems, copyrights, descriptive or designated marks, or other official insignia of the Metropolitan Police Department or the Fire and Emergency Medical Services Department shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, imprisoned for not more than one year, or both.").

[16] See Committee on the Judiciary Report on Bill 14-373, the "Omnibus Anti-Terrorism Act of 2002" (April 4, 2002) at 23-24 ("Title VII, the 'Badge Protection Act of 2002,' gives the MPD and FEMS Department the sole and exclusive rights to have and use, in carrying out their respective missions, their official badges, patches, emblems, copyrights, descriptive or designating marks, or other insignia and makes it a misdemeanor offense for persons to misuse such insignia in any way. This title is intended to deter and penalize individuals from misrepresenting themselves as an MPD or FEMS employee through the use of official badges. This language implicates, but is not limited to, potential uses to carry out terrorist acts, such as using insignia to gain access to an area or to avoid going through security screenings.").

[17] Unlike the current D.C. Code § 22-1404 and § 22-1406 which do not clearly cover FEMS, the revised statute broadly provides liability for any means of falsely representing oneself as possessing lawful authority as MPD or FEMS personnel, whether through use of insignia, oral communications, or other conduct.

theft[20] and unauthorized use of property[21] may be applicable. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and possibly the constitutionality[22] of the revised statutes.

Beyond these four changes to current District law, two other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised statute codifies a culpable mental state requirement of "with intent to" for the elements of deceiving and receiving a benefit or causing harm to another, and a culpable mental state requirement of "knowingly" as to the elements of falsely representing themselves to currently hold a specified type of lawful authority. Current D.C. Code § 22-1404 (falsely impersonating public officer or minister) specifies a "knowingly" element for one phrase in that offense about attempting to use official power after expiration of an appointment[23] and current D.C. Code § 22-1405 (false impersonation of a police officer) requires proof that the false representation be conducted "with a fraudulent design," although case law[24] appears to treat this element as a kind of motive (personal gain) rather than a culpable mental state. However, the current D.C. Code false impersonation statutes are otherwise silent as to culpable mental state requirements, and no DCCA case law exists on point. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised impersonation of an official statute requires "with intent to" for the elements of deceiving and receiving a benefit or causing harm to another, and a culpable mental state requirement of "knowingly" as to the elements of falsely representing themselves to currently hold a specified type of lawful authority. Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American [22] Federal preemption is ultimately based on the Supremacy Clause of the U.S. Constitution, Article VI, cl.2. In addition, however, broadly criminalizing "misuse" of insignia without time, place, and manner restrictions may violate First Amendment protections (and fair use exceptions to trademark and copyright based on the First Amendment). The legislative history indicates that potential First Amendment concerns with the legislation were known to the Council. See Committee on the Judiciary Report on Bill 14-373, the "Omnibus Anti-Terrorism Act of 2002" (April 4, 2002) at 24 ("The Committee inserted the word "official" into the language contained in Title VII to avoid encompassing the recreational use of the name or insignia of the agencies for the purpose of showing support for those agencies. For example, the intent of the law is not to penalize an individual wearing a tee shirt or baseball cap with the initials 'MPDC' emblazoned on them. The Committee believes that the language 'Any person who makes unauthorized use of or attempts to make unauthorized use of or attempts to aid another person in the unauthorized use or attempted unauthorized use' also insures that the law is only applicable to individuals who actively use the badges or insignia for an unauthorized purpose.").

[23] D.C. Code 22-1404 ("…or having been duly appointed to any of such offices shall knowingly attempt to act as any such officers after his or her appointment or commission has expired or he or she has been dismissed from such office, shall suffer imprisonment…").
[24] See Gary v. United States, 955 A.2d 152, 155 (D.C. 2008) ("As to the second element, we have said that " 'fraud' is a 'generic term which embraces all the multifarious means ... resorted to by one individual to gain advantage over another by false suggestions or by suppression of the truth.'" Thus, to prove the defendant's fraudulent design, there must be evidence that the defendant impersonated a police officer to deceive another in order to gain some advantage thereby. But the advantage need not be monetary or even material in nature.").

jurisprudence.[25] The "with intent" requirement substantively matches a knowledge requirement except that the object of the phrase need not be separately proven.[26] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statutes.

Second, the revised statute specifically includes within the scope of the offense impersonation of a judge in a federal or local court in the District, District prosecutors, a wide array of persons exercising law enforcement authority besides a "police officer," fire fighters, and paramedics. Current D.C. Code §22-1404 specifically refers only to "a judge of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia, notary public, police officer, or other public officer, or a minister qualified to celebrate marriage," without definitions of these terms. There is no case law defining the scope of "public officer" or other terms in the statute. Current § 22-1405 refers only to an "inspector of the Department of Human Services of said District, or an inspector of any department of the District government," and § 22-1406 specifically refers to a "member of the police force." Again, none of these terms, including are defined in case law. Resolving this ambiguity around the scope of the terms "police officer," "public officer," and "inspector of any department of the District government," the revised statute specifies that the covered roles include all local and federal judges in courts in the District, District prosecutors, an array of persons besides Metropolitan Police Department (MPD) officers who exercise law enforcement authority, fire fighters, and paramedics. There is no apparent reason for excluding impersonation of a sworn member or officer of the District of Columbia Protective Services or other law enforcement agency, or other persons such as firefighters and paramedics who exercise extraordinary powers under color of law from the scope of the statute. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statutes and may reduce an unnecessary gap in liability.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change District law.

To clarify the applicability of the revised statute to persons who previously, but no longer, hold authority, the revised statute replaces the phrase in D.C. Code 22-1404 "or having been duly appointed to any of such offices shall knowingly attempt to act as any such officers after his or her appointment or commission has expired or he or she has been dismissed from such office," with "currently hold lawful authority as." It may not be necessary to specifically refer to a person who knowingly seeks to exercise lawful authority after the expiration of their authority, as that special instance appears to be already included in the plain language of both the current D.C. Code 22-1404 and the revised statute referring to false representation. However, for clarity, the revised statute continues to specify the requirement that the actor falsely represent themselves to currently hold lawful authority.

RCC § 22E-3202. Misrepresentation as a District of Columbia Entity.

Explanatory Note. The RCC misrepresentation as a District of Columbia entity offense prohibits engaging in the business of collecting or aiding in the collection of debts or obligations, or of providing private police, investigation, or other detective services and using the name of the District of Columbia in a business communication with intent to deceive another as to the actor's lawful authority. The RCC misrepresentation as a District of Columbia entity offense replaces the current D.C. Code statutory provisions concerning the crime of Use of "District of Columbia" by Certain Persons.[1]

Subsection (a) specifies the prohibited conduct for the revised misrepresentation as a District of Columbia entity statute. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that the actor must knowingly engage in the business of collecting or aiding in the collection of debts or obligations, or of providing private police, investigation, or other detective services, and knowingly use the words "District of Columbia," "District," or "D.C.," in the business name or in a business communication, written or oral. "Knowingly" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206, and here means the actor must be practically certain that the actor is engaging in business of collecting or aiding in the collection of debts or obligations, or of providing private police, investigation, or other detective services, and is also practically certain that the actor is using the words "District of Columbia," "District," or "D.C.". The actor's use of the words "District of Columbia," "District," or "D.C.," may be oral or in writing.

Paragraph (a)(2) requires that the conduct outlined in paragraph (a)(1) be committed with intent to deceive any other person as to the actor's lawful authority as a District of Columbia entity, and the actor must intend to receive a personal or business benefit of any kind. "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206, and here means that the actor was practically certain that his or her conduct as outlined in subsections (a)(1)(A) and (a)(1)(B) would cause someone to be deceived as to the actor's authority as a District of Columbia entity and result in a personal or business benefit for the actor. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that deception or a personal or business benefit, in fact, occurred, just that the actor believed to a practical certainty that the deception or personal or business benefit would result from his or her conduct.

Paragraph (a)(3) specifies that misrepresentation as a District of Columbia entity requires that, in fact, the name or communication would cause a reasonable person in the complainant's circumstances to believe that the actor is a District of Columbia government entity or representative. The use of "in fact" indicates that no culpable mental state is required as to whether the misrepresentation would cause a reasonable person in the complainant's circumstances to believe that the actor is a District of Columbia government entity or representative. However, it must be proven that the communication would cause a reasonable person in the complainant's circumstances to believe the misrepresentation that the actor is a representative of a District of Columbia government entity.

[1] D.C. Code §§ 22-3401-3403.

Subsection (b) states that the Attorney General for the District of Columbia is responsible for prosecuting violations of the statute.

Subsection (c) provides the penalty for the revised offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (d) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC and specifies that in this section the term "actor" includes a legal entity that is not a natural person. This definition of "actor" differs from the RCC general definition of an "actor" which, through its use of the defined term "person," does not specify whether or not non-natural persons are included for this or other offenses in Subtitle IV.[2]

Relation to Current District Law. The revised misrepresentation as a District of Columbia entity statute changes current District law in two main ways.

First, the revised misrepresentation as a District of Columbia entity offense requires that the actor's use of the words "District of Columbia," "District," or "D.C." be done with the intent to deceive another as to the actor's lawful authority as a District of Columbia entity and receive a personal or business benefit. The current Use of "District of Columbia" by Certain Persons statute does not require an intent to deceive or to receive a personal or business benefit, and only requires that the use be "in such manner as reasonably to convey the impression or belief that such business is a department, agency, bureau, or instrumentality of the municipal government of the District of Columbia or in any manner represents the District of Columbia."[3] There is no case law on point. In contrast, the revised statute requires that the actor's use of "District of Columbia," "District," or "D.C." be with intent to deceive another as to the actor's lawful authority as a District of Columbia entity and receive a personal or business benefit. The revised statute eliminates criminal liability for actors whose communications are unintentionally misleading and there is no intent to deceive or receive a benefit. Requiring that the actor be practically certain that the use of the District's name will deceive another person and provide a benefit is similar to a knowledge requirement except that deception or benefit need not be proven. Requiring, at a minimum, a knowing culpable mental state for the elements of an offense

[2] D.C. Code § 45-604 broadly states that, in interpreting the D.C. Code: "The word "person" shall be held to apply to partnerships and corporations, unless such construction would be unreasonable, and the reference to any officer shall include any person authorized by law to perform the duties of his office, unless the context shows that such words were intended to be used in a more limited sense." The definition of "actor" in this section more clearly specifies that the crime of misrepresentation as a District of Columbia entity may be committed by non-natural Second, the revised misrepresentation as a District of Columbia entity offense requires a culpable mental state of intent, requiring that the actor use of the words "District of Columbia", "District", or "D.C." with the intent to deceive and receive a benefit. This is in contrast to the current Use of "District of Columbia" by Certain Persons statute does not specify a culpable mental state current Use of "District of Columbia" by Certain Persons statute does not specify a culpable mental state, which allows for criminal culpability for actors whose communications may be inadvertently misleading but where there is no intent to deceive or receive a benefit.

[3] D.C. Code § 22–3401.

that make otherwise legal conduct illegal is a generally accepted legal principle.[4] Commercial speech is protected under the First Amendment unless there is a recognized exception to such rights.[5] However, requiring as an element of the offense an intent to deceive another by the commercial speech, for a personal or business benefit, makes the revised statute similar to fraud and other deceptive practices crimes that are not subject to First Amendment protections.[6] The revised statute's language regarding deception and benefit is also consistent with language RCC § 22E-2201, fraud, and RCC § 22E-3201, impersonation of an official offenses. This change improves the clarity, consistency, and completeness of the revised offenses, and may improve the constitutionality of the statute.

Second, the revised statute applies to actors engaged in the collection of non-private debts or obligations. The current Use of "District of Columbia" by Certain Persons statute only applies to actors engaged in the collection of "private debts or obligations."[7] In contrast, the misrepresentation as a District of Columbia entity offense expands criminal liability to include actors engaged in the collection of debts or obligations, both private and non-private.[8] When undertaken with intent to deceive as to the actor's lawful authority, it is not clear why the collection of private debt should be treated differently than public debt. This change may reduce an unnecessary gap in liability in the revised statutes.

Beyond these two substantive changes to current District law, three other aspects of the revised misrepresentation as a District of Columbia entity offense may be viewed as substantive changes of District law.

First, the revised misrepresentation as a District of Columbia entity offense requires a culpable mental state of knowingly as to the nature of the actor's conduct and the use of the words "District of Columbia," "District," or "D.C." in the business name or in a business communication. The current Use of "District of Columbia" by Certain Persons statute does not specify a culpable mental state as to the elements of the offense, and there is no case law on point. To resolve this ambiguity, the revised misrepresentation as a District of Columbia entity offense requires a culpable mental state of "knowingly," using the RCC definition of that term. Requiring, at a minimum, a knowing culpable mental state for the elements of an offense that make otherwise legal conduct illegal is a generally accepted legal principle.[9] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and completeness of the revised offenses.

Second, the revised misrepresentation as a District of Columbia entity offense does not limit the type of communication that can fall under the statute to writings. The current

[7] D.C. Code § 22–3401.
[8] For example, a private collection agency engaged in the collection of federal student loan payments may be liable under the revised statute if other elements of the offense are satisfied.
[9] See Elonis v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2001, 2009 (2015) ("[O]ur cases have explained that a defendant generally must 'know the facts that make his conduct fit the definition of the offense,' even if he does not know that those facts give rise to a crime. (Internal citation omitted)").

Use of "District of Columbia" by Certain Persons statute refers to "use as part of the name of such business, or employ in any communication, correspondence, notice, advertisement, circular, or other writing or publication, the words "District of Columbia"…" in which it is unclear whether the phrase "or other writing or publication" is a limitation on the prior list of nouns such as "communication." There is no case law on point. To resolve this ambiguity, the revised statute refers broadly to any reference to the District in a business name or business communication, without limit to written or published communications. It is not clear that the harm addressed by the offense differs significantly depending on whether the misrepresentation is oral or written or published. This change improves the clarity of the revised statute and may reduce an unnecessary gap in liability.

Third, the revised statute eliminates specific reference to an actor who is "aiding" in debt collection. The current statute specifically includes liability for a person "aiding in the collection of private debts or obligations." [10] The meaning of "aiding" is unclear, however, and there is no case law on point. To resolve this ambiguity, the revised statute does not refer to "aiding," and instead relies on the RCC § 22E-210 provisions specifying the requirements and penalty for accomplice liability when a person purposely assists in the planning or commission of conduct constituting an offense. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statutes.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change District law.

The revised statute eliminates specific reference to the offense covering "any emblem or insignia utilizing any of the said terms as part of its design."[11] Such conduct is already covered by the current and revised statutes' reference to any use of the terms in a business name or business communication, whether in an emblem or otherwise.

[11] D.C. Code § 22–3401.

RCC § 22E-3401. Escape from a Correctional Facility or Officer.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the escape from a correctional facility or officer offense and penalty gradations for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The offense prohibits knowingly absconding from the lawful official custody of a government actor or agency. It replaces D.C. Code § 22-2601, Escape from institution or officer, and D.C. Code § 10-509.01a,[1] Escape from juvenile facilities.

Subsection (a) establishes the first degree gradation of escape, which prohibits leaving confinement in a correctional facility, secure juvenile detention facility, or cellblock operated by the United States Marshals Service without effective consent. "Correctional facility" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 to mean any building or building grounds located in the District of Columbia operated by the Department of Corrections for the secure confinement of persons charged with or convicted of a criminal offense.[2] The word "secure" makes clear that placements in an unsecured inpatient drug treatment program or independent living program are excluded. "Secure juvenile detention facility" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 to mean any building or building grounds, whether located in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, operated by the Department of Youth Rehabilitation Services for the secure confinement of persons committed to the Department of Youth Rehabilitation Services.[3] The word "secure" makes clear that a placement at home or in a community-based residential facility is excluded.[4] These definitions do not include facilities such as behavioral health hospitals that are principally concerned with providing medical care. Nor do they include buildings used by private businesses to detain suspected criminals.[5] The term "building" is also defined in RCC § 22E-701 and means "a structure affixed to land that is designed to contain one or more natural persons." "Building grounds" refers to the area of land occupied by the correctional facility and its yard and outbuildings, with a clearly identified perimeter.[6]

The phrase "in fact" in paragraph (a)(1) indicates that the accused is strictly liable[7] with respect to whether he or she was under a court order at the time the elements of the escape offense were completed.[8] The term "court order" includes any judicial directive,

[1] The penalty for this offense appears in D.C. Code § 10-509.03.
[2] E.g., Central Detention Facility ("D.C. Jail"), Central Treatment Facility ("CTF"). The term does not include locations operated by the Metropolitan Police Department or the United States Marshals Service. However, escaping from the lawful official custody of such an agency may be punished as second degree escape.
[3] E.g., Youth Services Center (located inside the District of Columbia), New Beginnings Youth Development Center (located outside the District of Columbia).
[4] Community-based residential facilities include group homes, therapeutic foster care, extended family homes, and independent living programs.
[5] For example, a person who runs from the booking room of a retail store does not commit an escape under RCC § 22E-3401(a)(1)(A).

oral or written. The word "authorizing" makes clear that an order permitting a custodial agency[9] to choose either a secured or unsecured residential placement is sufficient.[10]

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies that the person must act knowingly, a term defined in RCC § 22E-206. Applied here, it means the person must be practically certain that they do not have the effective consent of the Mayor, the Director of the Department of Corrections, the Director of the Department of Youth Rehabilitation Services, or the United States Marshals Service to leave.[11] A person leaves a facility when they depart from the building grounds.[12] "Effective consent" is a defined term and excludes consent that was obtained by the application of physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception.[13] "Consent" is also defined in RCC § 22E-701.

Subsection (b) establishes the second degree gradation of escape, which prohibits escaping the lawful official custody of a law enforcement officer. "Official custody" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 to mean full submission after an arrest or substantial physical restraint after an arrest.[14] For example, official custody may include being detained by an officer on the street, being securely confined to a holding cell, or being securely transported to a court appearance or medical facility.[15]

The phrase "in fact" in paragraph (b)(1) indicates that the accused is strictly liable[16] with respect to whether they were in lawful official custody at the time the elements of the escape offense were completed. For liability to attach, the official custody must, in fact, be lawful. Where a law enforcement officer has detained a person without requisite cause or authority, in violation of any federal or District law, the person is not in lawful official custody. The term "law enforcement officer" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and includes persons with limited arrest powers, such as special police officers[17] and community supervision officers acting in their official capacity,[18] but excludes private actors who are [9] E.g., Department of Corrections, Bureau of Prisons, United States Parole Commission, Department of Youth Rehabilitation Services.

[10] For example, if a person who was ordered to participate in a work release program violates the rules of the program and is administratively remanded to D.C. Jail, that person may not escape from D.C. Jail and defend on grounds that the court order did not explicitly "require" him to stay at the jail.
[11] Where an individual employee of the detaining agency allows a person to leave without requisite authority from the warden or from the court, liability for the escape offense likely turns on the defendant's mental state. A person who is erroneously told she is free to leave may not commit an escape, whereas a person who bribes the employee to release her does commit an escape because she was practically certain she did not have the facility's effective consent and that the employee was acting ultra vires.
[12] A person who leaves the building but is apprehended on building grounds does not commit a completed escape from a correctional facility but may have committed an attempted escape.

performing a citizen's arrest.[19] The officer must be employed by the District or federal government.

Paragraph (b)(2) specifies that the person must act knowingly, a term defined in RCC § 22E-206. Applied here, it means the person must be practically certain that the person detaining him or her is a law enforcement officer[20] and that they do not have the effective consent of the law enforcement officer to leave official custody.[21] A person leaves official custody when they distance themselves from the officer in an effort to avoid apprehension.[22] "Effective consent" is a defined term and excludes consent that was obtained by the application of physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception. "Consent" is also defined in RCC § 22E-701.

Subsection (c) establishes the third degree gradation of escape, which punishes unlawful absences from correctional facilities and halfway houses.

The phrase "in fact" in paragraph (c)(1) indicates that the actor is strictly liable[23] with respect to whether the actor was under a court order at the time the elements of the escape offense were completed.[24] The term "court order" includes any judicial directive, oral or written. The word "authorizing" makes clear that an order permitting a custodial agency[25] to choose either a secured or unsecured residential placement is sufficient.[26]

Paragraph (c)(2) specifies that the person must act knowingly, a term defined in RCC § 22E-206. Applied here, it means the person must be practically certain that the person does not have the effective consent of the Mayor, the Director of the Department of Corrections, the Director of the Department of Youth Rehabilitation Services, or the United States Marshals Service to leave or remain away.[27] "Effective consent" is a defined term

A person who is erroneously told she is free to leave may not commit an escape, whereas a person who bribes the employee to release her does commit an escape because she was practically certain she did not have the facility's effective consent and that the employee was acting ultra vires.

and excludes consent that was obtained by the application of physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception.[28] "Consent" is also defined in RCC § 22E-701.

Under subparagraphs (c)(2)(A) and (c)(2)(B), a person may commit a third degree escape by omission. Failing to return to custody after a lawful absence[29] or failing to report to custody as ordered[30] amounts to a third degree escape. Under subparagraph (c)(2)(C), leaving a halfway house without permission also amounts to third degree escape. A person leaves a facility when they depart from the building grounds.

Subsection (d) excludes prosecution for second degree escape for a person who is within a correctional facility (i.e. inside the building or on the building grounds). A person who is lawfully confined to a facility may be subject to first or third degree liability, depending on the facility, but not second degree liability.[31] Subsection (d) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement for a given element. Here, there is no culpable mental state required for the fact that the actor is within a correctional facility, juvenile detention facility, or halfway house.

Subsection (e) specifies the penalties for each grade of the revised offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (f) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised escape from a correctional facility or officer statute clearly changes current District law in six main ways.

First, the revised escape offense has three gradations. The current statute provides only one penalty for all escape offenses.[32] Thus, under current law, a person who returns late to a work release program faces the same maximum penalty as a person who tunnels out of D.C. Jail.[33] Notably, a failure to return to a halfway house may, alternatively, be prosecuted as a misdemeanor by the Attorney General for the District of Columbia,[34] whereas there is no alternative charge in District law for a conventional prison break. In contrast, the revised offense distinguishes between escaping the confinement of an [28] RCC § 22E-701. Accordingly, a person who obtains permission to leave by impersonating another resident or an employee commits an escape.

[29] E.g., work release, unsupervised furlough.
[30] See Williams v. United States, 832 A.2d 158 (D.C. 2003) (where the defendant failed to serve all required consecutive weekends at D.C. Jail); Mundine v. United States, 431 A.2d 16 (D.C. 1981) (where the defendant failed to report to DC halfway house after being released in Virginia).
[31] For example, a person who is confined within a correctional facility does not commit an escape from the lawful official custody of a law enforcement officer by wriggling out of an officer's grasp and returning to their designated cell.
[32] D.C. Code § 22-2601.
[33] Although the verb "escape" is not defined in the statute, District case law has held that escape is "knowingly or deliberately leaving physical confinement, or failing to return to it, without permission." Hines v. United States, 890 A.2d 686 (D.C. 2006) (emphasis added); see also Days v. United States, 407 A.2d 702, 704 (D.C. 1979) (finding the extension of leave beyond that which is granted is the legal equivalent of an escape).
[34] D.C. Code § 24-241.05(b).

institution, escaping the lawful official custody of a police officer, and failing to return or report to an institution.[35] This change improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

Second, the revised statute punishes an attempt to escape as less serious than a completed escape. Current D.C. Code §§ 22-2601[36] and 10-509.01a[37] punish an attempt to escape the same as a completed escape. In contrast, the revised statute relies on the general part's common definition of attempt[38] and penalty for an attempt[39] to define and penalize attempts the same as for other revised offenses. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised offense.

Third, the revised statute punishes accomplice liability consistently with other revised offenses. Current D.C. Code § 10-509.01a, Escape from juvenile facilities, prohibits aiding or abetting an escape from a juvenile facility. In contrast, the revised escape statute relies on the definition of accomplice liability in the revised code's general part,[40] as well as related provisions that establish a rule for crimes that exploit other persons as innocent instruments,[41] and carves out exceptions to accomplice liability.[42] This change improves the clarity, consistency, completeness, and the proportionality of the revised offense.

Fourth, the revised statute requires the person whose official custody is escaped be a law enforcement officer and defines the term "law enforcement officer"[43] consistently with other revised offenses. Current D.C. Code § 22-2601(a)(2) prohibits escaping the lawful custody of "an officer or employee of the District of Columbia or of the United States." In contrast, the revised code clarifies that the person must be a law enforcement officer, as defined, who is acting within their lawful authority. While the revised definition of "law enforcement officer" is broad and includes individuals such as probation officers, the revised definition is narrower than the current statute's reference to any person employed by the District or federal government. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised offenses.

Fifth, the scope of the revised statute is more precisely defined so as to only include secure locations. Current D.C. Code § 22-2601(a)(1) prohibits escape from "any penal or correctional institution or facility" or from "[a]n institution or facility, whether located in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, in which a person committed to the Department of Youth Rehabilitation Services is placed." DCCA case law has held that, in addition to the Central Detention Facility ("D.C. Jail"), the statute also includes the District's halfway houses.[44] Case law is silent as to which, if any, other locations qualify. The revised offense defines "correctional facility" to include any jails and prisons that are or may be erected in the District[45] and "secure juvenile detention facility" so as to include any physically secure juvenile placement.[46] The revised statute may broaden current law by including escapes from the Youth Services Center, pre-adjudication[47] or pre-commitment.[48] The revised statute may narrow current law by excluding escapes from unsecured congregate care placements such as group homes.[49] This change clarifies and may eliminate a gap in liability and improve the proportionality of the revised offense.

Sixth, the revised statute eliminates the consecutive sentencing provision in current law. Current D.C. Code § 22-2601(b) states in pertinent part, that the "…sentence [is] to begin, if the person is an escaped prisoner, upon the expiration of the original sentence or disposition for the offense for which he or she was confined, committed, or in custody at the time of his or her escape." The DCCA has interpreted the phrase "original sentence" to mean the sentence being served at the time of the escape.[50] In contrast, the revised statute does not require judges to issue consecutive sentences, but continues to allow such consecutive sentencing where the judge finds it appropriate. The RCC does not include mandatory sentencing provisions. Sentencing guidelines, rather than statutory mandates are a more appropriate way to guide judicial decision making.[51] This change improves the proportionality of the revised statute.

Beyond these six changes to current District law, one other aspect of the revised statute may constitute a substantive change to current District law.

The revised statute specifies that whether a person is subject to a court order or in lawful official custody of a law enforcement officer is a matter of strict liability. The current escape statute does not specify any culpable mental state for this offense element, nor has the DCCA directly addressed the matter. The revised statute resolves this

[46] E.g., Youth Services Center (located inside the District of Columbia), New Beginnings Youth Development Center (located outside the District of Columbia).

[47] The DCCA has not considered or decided whether the Youth Services Center qualifies as a "penal or correctional institution or facility," under D.C. Code § 22-2601(a)(1). However, the Center is not described as penal or correctional in nature in Title 16. See, e.g., D.C. Code § 16-2310 (authorizing shelter care placement if a child has no parent, guardian, custodian, or other person or agency able to provide supervision). Notably, all references to "penal" and "correctional" institutions in Title 16 are followed by the phrase "for adult offenders" or a reference to Title 22.

[48] Persons held at the Youth Services Center post-commitment currently are subject to escape liability, under D.C. Code § 22-2601(a)(3).

[49] The DCCA has not considered or decided whether any location other than New Beginnings Youth Development Center qualify as "[a]n institution or facility, whether located in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, in which a person committed to the Department of Youth Rehabilitation Services is placed," under D.C. Code § 22-2601(a)(3).

ambiguity by not requiring any culpable mental state as to being subject to a court order or as to the lawfulness of the official custody. For example, a person who mistakenly believes an arrest warrant is invalid, nevertheless commits an escape if all of the offense elements are satisfied, including the fact that the person knew they lacked effective consent of the institution or officer. It is generally recognized that a person may be held strictly liable for elements of an offense that do not distinguish innocent from guilty conduct.[52] This change clarifies the revised statutes.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, the revised statute specifies that a "knowing" culpable mental state is required for leaving custody or failure to return or report to custody, and for lacking effective consent to do so. The current escape statute does not specify any culpable mental state. However, the DCCA has explained that escaping is "knowingly or deliberately leaving physical confinement, or failing to return to it, without permission."[53] The revised statute clarifies that the accused must be practically certain that he or she is acting without permission. Consequently, a mistake of fact is an available defense in some, but not all, cases.[54] Applying a knowledge or intent requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[55] This change clarifies the revised statute.

Second, the revised statute requires the accused to leave or fail to return without "effective consent." The current escape statute is silent as to whether lack of effective consent to the person's behavior, or a similar element, must be proven. District case law requires the accused escape without "permission," but does not specify whose permission is required or further define that term.[56] The revised statute requires a lack of "effective consent," of the person in charge of the facility, a defined term which means consent obtained by means other than the application of physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception.[57] This change improves the revised offenses by describing all elements that must be proven and applying consistent definitions throughout the revised code.

Third, the RCC provides for a general duress defense[58] that is consistent with other revised offenses. The current statute is silent as to whether any duress offense exists to escape. However, District case law has recognized a duress defense to escape in limited circumstances.[59] The revised statute does not separately codify a duress defense to escape, but instead relies on the duress defense in the general part of the RCC. This change clarifies and improves the consistency of the revised statutes.

RCC § 22E-3402. Tampering with a Detection Device.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the tampering with a detection device offense for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The offense prohibits purposely removing or interfering with a wearable monitoring device, such as a GPS ankle bracelet. It replaces D.C. Code § 22-1211, Tampering with a detection device.

Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that for criminal liability to attach, the person must know that the person is legally required to wear a detection device at the time the elements of the tampering offense were completed. The term "detection device" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and is any technology installed on a person's body or clothing that is capable of monitoring the person's whereabouts.[1] The term refers to the physical device itself and does not include the records or reports that it generates.[2] The term "knowingly" is defined in the general part of the revised code[3] and here means the person must be practically certain that compliance with electronic monitoring was required. The monitoring may be required as a condition of release or as a sanction for noncompliance with other release conditions.[4] The requirement must be valid at the time of the offense.[5]

Subparagraphs (a)(1)(A)-(E) establish five categories of people who are prohibited from tampering with a detection device. Namely, the revised statute applies to persons who must wear the device while subject to a final civil protection order; while on pretrial release; while on presentence or predisposition release;[6] while committed to the Department of Youth Rehabilitation Services or incarcerated; or while on supervised release, probation, or parole. The revised statute does not apply to persons who are required to wear a monitoring device before a court proceeding is initiated or after a sentence is completed. Nor does it apply to people who are required to wear a monitoring device as a result of a judgment issued outside of the Superior Court of District of Columbia.

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies two alternative result element, at least one of which must be proven for the offense. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207(a), the culpable

It explicitly includes the global position systems ("GPS") that are currently used by the Pretrial Services Agency, Court Services and Offender Supervision Agency, and Court Social Services. It also explicitly includes the radio frequency identification technology ("RFID") that is currently used by the Department of Corrections.

[2] A person does not commit tampering with a detection device by destroying or manipulating the data generated by the device after it has been transmitted. Consider, for example, a person who hacks into his supervision officer's computer and deletes or alters the monitoring records. Such conduct may, however, constitute tampering with physical evidence, in violation of D.C. Code § 22-723.

[3] RCC § 22E-206.

[4] D.C. Code § 22-1211 was amended in 2016 to include sanctions, following the D.C. Court of Appeals decision in Hunt v. United States, 109 A.3d 620, 621 (D.C. 2014).

[5] Electronic monitoring, like any release condition, may only be authorized by a judicial officer or by the United States Parole Commission ("USPC"). See Hunt v. United States, 109 A.3d 620, 621-22 (D.C. 2014). Accordingly, if a supervision officer employed by the Pretrial Services Agency, Court Services and Offender Supervision Agency, or Court Social Services were to require electronic monitoring without authorization from the court or USPC, the requirement would be invalid. Additionally, if the period of release specified by the court expires before the tampering occurs, criminal liability does not attach.

[6] "Predisposition" refers to minors who have been adjudicated delinquent and are awaiting the juvenile equivalent of sentencing.

mental state of knows[7] specified in paragraphs (a)(1) applies to the following elements in paragraph (a)(2).

Subparagraph (a)(2)(A) prohibits removing the wearable monitor or allowing another to remove it.[8] An unauthorized person refers to a person other than someone that the court or parole commission authorized to remove the device.[9] Applied here, the culpable mental state "knows" requires the person to be practically certain as to their conduct removing or allowing an unauthorized person to do so.

Subparagraph (a)(2)(B) prohibits interfering with the operation of the device,[10] and allowing an unauthorized person to do so.[11] Interfering with the emission or detection of the device includes failing to charge the power for the device or allowing the device to lose the power required to operate,[12] when done knowingly, to interfere with its operation. An unauthorized person refers to a person other than someone that the court or parole commission authorized to interfere with the device.[13] Applied here, the culpable mental state "knows" requires the person to be practically certain as to their interference or allowing an unauthorized person to do so.

Subsection (b) specifies that the District may exercise long-arm jurisdiction over an offense that occurs outside the boundaries of the District of Columbia.

Subsection (c) provides the penalties for the revised offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.]

Subsection (d) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised tampering with a detection device clearly changes current District law in three main ways

[8] A person may violate this statute by an act or by an omission, provided that the person behaves purposely. See RCC § 22E-202.

[9] Examples of persons authorized by the court or the parole commission to install and remove monitoring devices may include employees of the Pretrial Services Agency, Court Services and Offender Supervision Agency, Department of Youth Rehabilitation Services, or Court Social Services. Electronic monitoring, like any release condition, may only be authorized by a judicial officer or by the United States Parole Commission ("USPC"). See Hunt v. United States, 109 A.3d 620, 621-22 (D.C. 2014). In extenuating circumstances unauthorized persons (e.g., a paramedic providing care) may have a justification defense for removing a bracelet. See RCC §§ 22E-401 and 408.

[10] Unless one has a purpose to interfere with the operation of the device, and does so, a person does not violate the revised statute merely by decorating the device, applying a case to make it waterproof, or applying a substance to make it more comfortable to wear.

[11] A person may violate this statute by an act or by an omission, provided that the person behaves purposely. See RCC § 22E-202.

[12] See D.C. Code § 22-1211(a)(1)(C).

[13] Examples of persons authorized by the court or the parole commission to install and remove monitoring devices may include employees of the Pretrial Services Agency, Court Services and Offender Supervision Agency, Department of Youth Rehabilitation Services, or Court Social Services. Electronic monitoring, like any release condition, may only be authorized by a judicial officer or by the United States Parole Commission ("USPC"). See Hunt v. United States, 109 A.3d 620, 621-22 (D.C. 2014). In extenuating circumstances unauthorized persons (e.g., a paramedic providing care) may have a justification defense for removing a bracelet. See RCC §§ 22E-401 and 408.

First, the revised statute punishes an attempt to tamper with a detection device as less serious than a completed tampering. Current D.C. Code § 22-1211 punishes an attempt to interfere with the operation of the device the same as a completed tampering.[14] In contrast, the revised statute relies on the general part's common definition of attempt[15] and penalty for an attempt[16] to define and penalize attempts the same as for other revised offenses. This change improves the consistency and proportionality of revised offense.

Second, the revised statute limits the offense to tampering with detection devices that are required in connection with a District of Columbia court case. The plain language of the current statute appears to provide liability for interference with detection devices worn by a person under any jurisdiction's court order. However, it is not clear that this was intended by the Council or that the statute has been applied in such circumstances. There is no case law on point. In contrast, the revised statute excludes violations of court orders imposed by other jurisdictions, where the District has no control over the underlying statutes and procedures that allowed for the placement of a detection device. This revision clarifies the revised statute.

Third, the revised statute specifies that the District of Columbia may exercise jurisdiction over a tampering with a detection device offense that occurs across state lines. Current D.C. Code § 22-1211 does not specify whether a person who tampers with a device outside of the District commits an offense. In contrast, the revised statute includes a provision makes clear that a tampering committed out of state violates the statute. This change clarifies the revised statute and may eliminate a gap in liability.

Beyond these three changes to current District law, one other aspect of the revised statute may constitute a substantive change to current District law.

The revised statute requires knowing conduct. The current tampering statute does not specify a culpable mental state for the circumstance of being under court-ordered detention or supervision that requires electronic monitoring, and there is no case law on point. Current D.C. Code § 22-1211 requires that the defendant "intentionally" remove, alter, mask, or interfere with a device. However, the term "intentionally" is not defined in the statute or in case law, and the legislative history is unclear.[17] By contrast, the revised statute requires that the person know that they are required to wear a detection device and remove it or interfere with its operation. Applying a knowledge requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in

It is not the desire to add another element that the prosecution would be required to prove. Further, from a plain reading of the language, it already seems to clearly convey that the Committee's intent is to implicate individuals who have intentionally acted in order to evade by interfering with the monitoring. That equipment was faulty must be a consideration in whether the individual acted intentionally to interfere with monitoring.").

American jurisprudence.[18] This change improves the revised offenses by describing all elements, including mental states, that must be proven in a clear, consistent manner.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, the revised statute amends the word "committed" in paragraph (a)(1) of the current statute to the phrase "committed to the Department of Youth Rehabilitation Services." This clarifies that the statute refers to minors who have been adjudicated delinquent and not to adults who are civilly committed to the Department of Behavioral Health for psychiatric services. This change clarifies the revised statute.

Second, the revised statute strikes the terms "alter" and "mask" as superfluous. The word "interferes" broadly encompasses all interference with the emission and detection of the device's signal. The revised statute does not capture "altering" or "masking" a device in a way that does not affect its functionality, such as decorating a device or covering it with clothing, unless such conduct is also done with a purpose of interfering with the device's monitoring functions. This change clarifies the revised statute.

Third, the revised statute strikes language in D.C. Code § 22-1211(a)(1)(C)[19] as unnecessary and potentially confusing. This meaning of this provision is unclear in light of the possibility of changing technology, the lack of any standard for measuring a "failure to charge," and differing responsibilities of a person to maintain charges for different devices. Moreover, failing to adequately charge a device's battery may be one means of interfering with the operability of the device, in violation of RCC § 22E-3402(a)(2)(B). This change clarifies the revised statute.

Fourth, the revised statute clarifies that the term "protection order" refers to the final civil protection orders that are issued after formal notice and hearing under Title 16 of the D.C. Code. This change clarifies the revised statute.

[19] "Intentionally fail to charge the power for the device or otherwise maintain the device's battery charge or power."

RCC § 22E-3403. Correctional Facility Contraband.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the correctional facility contraband offense and penalty gradations for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The offense punishes knowingly bringing certain prohibited items to a person confined in a secure facility. It also punishes a person confined to a facility who knowingly possesses certain prohibited items. The revised statute replaces D.C. Code § 22-2603.02, Unlawful possession of contraband; D.C. Code § 22-2603.03, Penalties; D.C. Code § 22-2603.01, Definitions; and D.C. Code § 22-2603.04, Detainment Power.

Subparagraphs (a)(1)(A), (a)(2)(A), (b)(1)(A), and (b)(2)(A) specify that one way of committing correctional facility contraband is by bringing[1] a prohibited item to a correctional facility[2] or secure juvenile detention facility[3] with intent that it reach someone who is confined there. It is not an element that the prohibited item actually was received by someone confined. "With intent" is a defined culpable mental state[4] that here requires the person believe their conduct is practically certain to cause the prohibited item to be received by someone who is confined to the facility.[5] Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary that the person intend that the item reach a particular resident of the facility.[6] The terms "correctional facility" and "secured juvenile detention facility" are defined in RCC § 22E-701 to include buildings and building grounds.

Subparagraphs (a)(1)(A), (a)(2)(A), (b)(1)(A), and (b)(2)(A) specify that the person must act knowingly, a culpable mental state that is defined in the general part of the revised code.[7] Applied here, it means the person must be practically certain that they have the item[8] and be practically certain that they brought the item to correctional facility grounds.[9] However, causing an innocent third party, such as a mail delivery person, to bring a

[1] The word "bringing" has its ordinary meaning, "to convey, lead, carry, or cause to come along with one toward the place from which the action is being regarded." Merriam-Webster.com, 2020, available at https://www.merriam-webster.com/dictionary/bring. For example, where a person lobs a tennis ball filled with contraband over the wall of a facility, the person can be said to have brought the contraband there, without having entered the building.

[2] E.g., Central Detention Facility ("D.C. Jail"), Central Treatment Facility ("CTF").

[3] E.g., Youth Services Center, New Beginnings Youth Development Center.

[4] RCC § 22E-206.

[5] For example, an attorney who brings a cellular phone into D.C. Jail to take personal phone calls in the waiting room does not commit a contraband offense because she did not intent to give it to a resident.

[6] Consider, for example, a person who places a weapon on the outer wall of a correctional facility's recreation yard, hopeful that any resident might retrieve it. The government is not required to prove which resident was the intended recipient.

[7] RCC § 22E-206.

[8] Consider, for example, an attorney who brings his college backpack to D.C. Jail, without realizing there is a decades-old marijuana cigarette in the bottom of the bag. That attorney has not committed a correctional facility contraband offense.

[9] Consider, for example, a person who attempts to bring contraband into a halfway house, believing it is a temporary housing shelter or a rehabilitation center. That visitor has not committed a correctional facility contraband offense.

prohibited item to a facility may be sufficient for liability if the other elements of the offense are satisfied.[10]

Subparagraphs (a)(1)(B), (a)(2)(B), (b)(1)(B), and (b)(2)(B) require that the person bring the item to the facility without the effective consent of the Mayor, the Director of the Department of Corrections, or the Director of the Department of Youth Rehabilitation Services. "Effective consent" is a defined term and means consent that was not obtained by the application of physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception.[11] "Consent" is also defined in RCC § 22E-701. Where a person has the effective consent of the facility to bring the otherwise-prohibited item to the location, that item does not subject the person to correctional facility contraband liability.[12] Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207(a), the culpable mental state of knowingly specified in subparagraphs (a)(1)(A) and (b)(2)(A) apply to this element of the offense. The person must be practically certain that they lack effective consent to bring the item to the facility.[13]

Subparagraphs (a)(1)(C) and (a)(2)(C) require that the item constitute Class A contraband.[14] Subparagraphs (b)(1)(C) and (b)(2)(C) require that the item constitute Class B contraband.[15] The term "in fact" is defined in the revised code to indicate that the actor is strictly liable with respect to this element of the revised offense.[16] Accordingly, it is of no consequence that the person does not know that the item is classified as Class A or Class B contraband.

Paragraphs (a)(2) and (b)(2) state that the second type of person subject to liability for correctional facility contraband is someone who is confined to a correctional facility or secure juvenile detention facility. The word "confined" here refers to the person's legal custodial status and not to the physical strictures of the building. For instance, a corrections officer may, as a practical matter, be securely confined inside D.C. Jail during a shift in a physical sense, but the officer not legally "confined" to the custody of the correctional facility.

Subsection (c) establishes three exclusions from liability for the correctional facility contraband offense. Subsection (c) specifies "in fact." "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state for a given element. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, "in fact" applies to every element that follows unless a culpable mental state is specified. Here, the "in fact" specified in subsection (c) applies to paragraphs (c)(1), (c)(2), and (c)(3) and there is no culpable mental state requirement for any of these elements.

Paragraph (c)(1) excludes from liability the use of a portable electronic communication device by any person during a legal visit.[17] Paragraph (c)(2) excludes from liability a person's possession of their prescription medication when there is a medical necessity to access the item immediately or to be constantly accessible. Paragraph (c)(3) excludes from liability a person's possession of a syringe, needle, or other medical device when there is a medical necessity to access the item immediately or to be constantly accessible.[18]

Subsection (d) limits the correctional facility's authority to detain a person on suspicion of bringing contraband to a facility under paragraphs (a)(1) and (b)(1) to a period of two hours, pending surrender to the Metropolitan Police Department or, for facilities outside the District of Columbia, to a law enforcement agency designated by the Mayor. Probable cause is both sufficient and required.[19]

Subsection (e) specifies the penalties for each grade of the revised offense. [See RCC §§ 22E-603 and 22E-604 for the imprisonment terms and fines for each penalty class.] The revised statute punishes contraband that may be used to cause an injury or facilitate an escape more severely than other contraband.

Subsection (f) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised correctional facility contraband statute clearly changes current District law in five main ways.

First, the revised offense reclassifies contraband according to the danger presented. Current statutory law roughly classifies contraband as (A) any item prohibited by law, weapons, escape implements, and drugs;[20] (B) alcohol, drug paraphernalia, and cellular phones;[21] and (C) any item prohibited by rule.[22] The current statute penalizes possession of class C contraband as a criminal offense, even though only administrative sanctions are authorized.[23] In contrast, the revised statute classifies contraband into: (A) weapons and escape implements; and (B) alcohol, drugs, drug paraphernalia, and cellular phones. The revised statute does not otherwise criminalize violations of other facility rules regarding what items that can be possessed. In the RCC, such matters are subject to only administrative processing and sanctions. This reclassification of what constitutes contraband reorders and limits criminal sanctions to items posing significant dangers. This change improves the proportionality of the revised statutes.

Second, the revised statute narrows the list of Class A contraband in two ways. First, the current statute includes as Class A contraband the possession of any civilian [17] Prohibiting contraband in this context may offend the right to effective assistance of counsel under the Sixth Amendment.

[18] These exceptions apply to medicines and medical devices necessary to treat chronic, persistent, or acute conditions that require constant or immediate medical response such as diabetes, severe allergies, or seizures. Depending on the facts of the case, criminalizing the possession of contraband in this context may offend the prohibition of cruel and unusual punishment in the Eighth Amendment.

clothing[24] and "[a]ny item, the mere possession of which is unlawful under District of Columbia or federal law."[25] There is no District case law interpreting this phrase, but the language would seem to include not only weapons and controlled substances listed separately as Class A contraband, but items that pose no apparent threat to the safety or order of a correctional facility.[26] In contrast, the revised statute criminalizes as Class A contraband only the possession of a uniform, and punishes possession of any weapon or drug that is prohibited by the District's criminal code, without including any (unspecified) item prohibited by federal or District law. Second, the current statute includes as Class A contraband, "Any object designed or intended to facilitate an escape."[27] In contrast, the revised statute refers more specifically to "A tool created or specifically adapted for picking locks, cutting chains, cutting glass, bypassing an electronic security system, or bypassing a locked door."[28] The revised language creates a more objective basis for identifying contraband—rather than intent to facilitate escape—and is consistent with language in the revised possession of tools to commit property crime offense.[29] These changes improve the clarity and consistency of the revised offense and improve the proportionality of penalties.

Third, the revised statute does not criminalize a failure to report contraband except to the extent such conduct meets the requirements for accomplice liability. The current contraband statute compels District employees to report contraband and criminally punishes a failure to do so.[30] In contrast, the revised contraband statute relies on the definition of accomplice liability in the revised code's general part,[31] as well as related provisions that establish a rule for crimes that exploit other persons as innocent instruments,[32] and carves out exceptions to accomplice liability.[33] Offenses relating to public corruption and obstructing justice may also punish employee accomplices in this context.[34] This change improves the consistency and the proportionality of the revised offenses.

Fourth, the revised statute leaves concurrent versus consecutive sentencing decisions to the discretion of the sentencing court. The current contraband statute requires that a sentence for unlawful possession of contraband run consecutive to any term of imprisonment imposed in the case in which the person was being detained at the time this offense was committed.[35] This provision has two notable features that distinguish it from any other sentencing provision in the D.C. Code. First, it applies to persons who are pre-sentence in any jurisdiction at the time of the contraband offense.[36] Second, it applies to persons who are pre-trial in any jurisdiction at the time of the contraband offense.[37] Legislative history does not clarify why such an infringement on the court's discretion is applied to contraband offenses and not to other correctional facility offenses such as escape. In contrast, the revised statute does not require consecutive sentencing, leaving such a decision to the sentencing court. This change improves the consistency and the proportionality of revised offenses.

Fifth, the revised statute adds an exception to liability for possession of a syringe, needle, or other medical device when the actor has a medical necessity to have the substance immediately or constantly accessible. The current D.C. Code contraband statute only provides an exception for possession of a prescribed controlled substance that is medically necessary to carry.[38] In contrast, the revised statute excepts liability for syringes, needles, or other medical devices where there is a medical necessity or immediate access. The offense's exclusion of liability does not create an affirmative right for a confined person to possess such items, and administrative sanctions may be imposed for such possession. There may also be criminal liability for misuse of a needle, syringe, or medical device under another statute,[39] and possession of a needle, etc. with intent to give the item to a confined person may be liable as an attempt or give rise to accomplice liability. However, a person's mere possession of such a medically necessary item is not grounds for a contraband conviction. This change improves the proportionality of the revised offense.

Beyond these five changes to current District law, four other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to current District law.

First, the revised statute specifies that a knowing culpable mental state is required for confined persons as to their possession of contraband, just as it is for persons who deliver it. Current D.C. Code § 22-2603.02(b) merely states, "It is unlawful for an inmate, or securely detained juvenile, to possess Class A, Class B, or Class C contraband, regardless of the intent with which he or she possesses it." This language is ambiguous as to whether a person is strictly liable as to whether the item possessed is contraband, or whether a person's intent to use contraband for a non-harmful purpose is irrelevant to liability but they must be aware that they possess contraband.[40] There is no case law on point. District practice appears to treat as a matter of strict liability the fact that an item possessed by a confined person is contraband, while the possession itself must be [36] By contrast, the District's escape statute only requires the sentence be consecutive to an original sentence that is being served at the time of the. D.C. Code § 22-2601(b).

[37] The United States Supreme Court held that a federal judge did not violate the federal Sentencing Reform Act by running a federal sentence consecutive to an anticipated state sentence after a finding of guilt by the state court. Setser v. United States, 566 U.S. 231 (2012).
[38] D.C. Code § 22-2603.03(f).
[39] For example, an inmate who uses a syringe or other device to assault another inmate may face more severe criminal liability for using a dangerous weapon in the assault. See RCC § 22E-1202.
[40] The current statutory definition of Class C contraband also states: "The rules shall be posted in the facility to give notice of the prohibited articles or things," but does not provide any relief to the accused if the notice is not posted. D.C. Code § 22-2603.01(4)(a).

purposeful.[41] In contrast, the revised statute requires a confined person to knowingly possess an item, similar to the requirements for someone bringing contraband into a correctional facility. Applying a knowledge culpable mental state requirement to statutory elements that distinguish innocent from criminal behavior is a well-established practice in American jurisprudence.[42] This change improves the proportionality of the revised statutes.

Second, the detainment authority provision in the revised offense authorizes and limits detention pending surrender to certain law enforcement authorities to investigate and arrest a person for commission correctional facility contraband. Current D.C. Code § 22-2603.04 refers only to the Metropolitan Police Department as an authorized authority. However, under a separate D.C. Code provision, other officials, may be granted specific authority by the Mayor to make arrests on the District's behalf for offenses occurring out of the District, including at New Beginnings Youth Development Center in Laurel, Maryland under D.C. Code § 10-509.01. There is no case law on whether or how to resolve the potential conflict between these provisions of law. To resolve this ambiguity, the revised statute includes in the detainment provision a reference to an agency designated per D.C. Code § 10-509.01. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Third, the revised statute punishes accomplice liability consistently with other revised offenses. Current D.C. Code § 22-2603.02(a)(2) makes it unlawful to "cause another" to bring contraband to a secured facility. By contrast, the revised statute relies on the definitions of accomplice liability,[43] solicitation,[44] and criminal conspiracy[45] in the revised code's general part. This change improves the consistency and the proportionality of revised offenses.

Fourth, the revised statute requires a person to know that their possession or introduction of the contraband item is without the effective consent of the person in charge of the facility, and eliminates the exclusions from liability enumerated in D.C. Code § 22-2603.02(d) for items "issued" to a facility employee or law enforcement officer. The current D.C. Code excludes from liability for a contraband offense any item "issued" to a facility employee or a law enforcement officer that is being used in the performance of her official duties.[46] Case law has not addressed the scope or meaning of this provision. The RCC's requirement that the person knowingly act without the facility's effective consent renders this statutory exception to liability unnecessary.[47] It also ensures the revised offense does not reach possession of items that the facility authorized but did not "issue," such as personal medication. This change improves the proportionality of the revised offenses.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change current District law.

First, the phrase "brings…to a correctional facility or secured juvenile detention facility" replaces the phrases "bring…into or upon the grounds of"[48] and "place in such proximity to."[49] Current D.C. Code § 22-2603.02(a) is grammatically difficult to understand. Presumably, paragraph (a)(3) intends to say either, "place in close proximity with intent to give access" or "place in such proximity as to give access." Because the revised statute defines the terms "correctional facility" and "secured juvenile detention facility" to include the building grounds, the word "to" adequately captures all trafficking scenarios targeted by the current law.[50]

Second, the revised code defines "possession" in RCC § 22E-701. The D.C. Code does not codify a definition of possession, although it is an element of several property, drug, and weapon offenses. Instead, parties rely on District case law concerning what evidence is or is not sufficient to establish that the accused actually or constructively or jointly possessed an unlawful item.[51] In contrast, the RCC codifies a definition to be used uniformly for all possessory elements throughout the code.

Third, the revised offense simplifies the defined term "Cellular telephone or other portable communication device and accessories thereto."[52] Current law defines this term with references to specific technology, several of which are already rare or obsolete.[53] The revised statute uses a simpler reference to portable electronic communication devices and accessories thereto.[54]

[53] "Cellular telephone or other portable communication device and accessories thereto" means any device carried, worn, or stored that is designed, intended, or readily converted to create, receive or transmit oral or written messages or visual images, access or store data, or connect electronically to the Internet, or any other electronic device that enables communication in any form. The term "cellular telephone or other portable communication device and accessories thereto" includes portable 2-way pagers, hand-held radios, cellular telephones, Blackberry-type devices, personal digital assistants or PDAs, computers, cameras, and any components of these devices. The term "cellular telephone or other portable communication device and accessories thereto" also includes any new technology that is developed for communication purposes and includes accessories that enable or facilitate the use of the cellular telephone or other portable communication device.
[54] RCC § 22E-701.

Fourth, the revised statute clarifies the correctional facilities' detention authority. D.C. Code § 22-2603.04 states that a person who "introduces or attempts to introduce" contraband to a facility may be detained for no more than two hours until police arrive. The statute does not include a standard of proof and the District of Columbia Court of Appeals has not interpreted the statute. The revised statute clarifies that probable cause is required, just as it is for any other warrantless detention.[55]

COMMENTARY:
SUBTITLE V. PUBLIC ORDER AND SAFETY OFFENSES

RCC § 22E-4101. Possession of a Prohibited Weapon or Accessory.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the possession of a prohibited weapon or accessory offense and penalty gradations for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The offense criminalizes possession of particular weapons that are so highly suspect and devoid of lawful use that their mere possession is forbidden, without requiring any proof of intent to use the weapon for an unlawful purpose.[1] The revised offense replaces D.C. Code §§ 22-4514(a) (Possession of certain dangerous weapons prohibited), [2] 22-4515a(a) and (c) (Manufacture, transfer, use, possession, or transportation of Molotov cocktails, or other explosives for unlawful purposes),[3] 7-2506.01(a)(3) (regarding restricted pistol bullets), and 7-2506.01(b) (regarding large capacity ammunition feeding devices).

Subsection (a) specifies the elements of first degree possession of a prohibited weapon or accessory. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that to commit first degree possession of a prohibited weapon or accessory, a person must act at least knowingly.[4] That is, the person must be practically certain that they possess an item[5] and must be practically certain that the item they possess is a firearm or an explosive.[6] "Firearm" is a defined term,[7] which includes inoperable weapons that may be redesigned, remade or readily converted or restored to operability[8] but excludes antiques.[9] "Possesses" is a defined term and includes both actual and constructive possession.[10] Constructive possession requires intent to exercise dominion and control over an object and to guide its destiny.[11] With respect to firearms, the person must know they possess a firearm[12] or that they possess component parts that could be arranged to make a whole firearm.[13] Evidence of knowledge of an item's location is required, but not necessarily sufficient, to demonstrate constructive possession.[14] No intent to use the firearm, accessory, or ammunition is required for this possessory offense.[15]

[3] The revised possession of a prohibited weapon or accessory offense (RCC § 22E-4101) and the revised possession of a dangerous weapon with intent to commit crime offense (RCC § 22E-4103) together replace the penalty provisions in D.C. Code § 22-4515a(d) – (e).

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies that a person must be at least reckless as to whether the weapon or accessory is of the prohibited variety.[16] "Reckless" is a defined term,[17] which, applied here, means the person must consciously disregard a substantial risk that the item is an assault weapon, machine gun, sawed-off shotgun, or restricted explosive. The risk must be of such a nature and degree that, considering the nature of and motivation for the person's conduct and the circumstances the person is aware of, the person's conscious disregard of that risk is a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct.[18] The government is not required to prove that the person should have been aware that it is illegal to have the item. Subparagraphs (a)(2)(A) – (D) criminalize possession of four classes of prohibited objects.

Subparagraph (a)(2)(A) makes it unlawful to possess an assault weapon. "Assault weapon" is a defined term that includes an enumerated list of semiautomatic rifles, pistols, and shotguns. The term also includes semiautomatic firearms with specific features that make a firearm more readily capable of mass destruction, such as grenade launchers, flash suppressors, or vertical handgrips. Accordingly, an otherwise lawful firearm may be modified in a manner that converts it into contraband under the statute. It is not a defense that firearm was compliant at the time of manufacture or acquisition.

Subparagraph (a)(2)(B) makes it unlawful to possess a machine gun. "Machine gun" is a defined term and includes any firearm that is capable of automatically firing multiple shots with a single trigger pull. The term also includes a machine gun frame or receiver and parts that are designed and intended to convert a firearm into a machine gun.

Subparagraph (a)(2)(C) makes it unlawful to possess a sawed-off shotgun. "Sawed-off shotgun" is a defined term and means a shotgun having a barrel of less than 18 inches in length or a firearm made from a shotgun if such firearm as modified has an overall length of less than 26 inches or any barrel of less than 18 inches in length.

Subparagraph (a)(2)(D) makes it unlawful to possess a restricted explosive. The term "restricted explosive" is defined to include Molotov cocktails, bombs, grenades, and missiles. However, the term does not include explosive and combustible objects lawfully and commercially manufactured for a lawful purpose, which may exclude liability for items such as lanterns, fireworks, pest exterminators, or demolition dynamite.[19]

Subparagraph (a)(2)(E) makes it unlawful to possess a ghost gun. "Ghost gun" is a defined term and generally refers to a firearm that, after the removal of all parts other than a receiver, is not as detectable by walk-through metal detectors. The term also includes an unfinished frame or receiver and parts that do not generate accurate images when inspected by detection devices.
