Report #70 –
Criminal Code Reform Commission (CCRC)
Recommendations for the Council and Mayor
(Voting Draft)

March 10, 2021

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CRIMINAL CODE REFORM COMMISSION
441 FOURTH STREET, NW, SUITE 1C001 SOUTH
WASHINGTON, DC 20001
PHONE: (202) 442-8715
www.ccrc.dc.gov

This Report contains proposed final recommendations of the D.C. Criminal Code Reform Commission (CCRC) to the Mayor and Council for reforms to District of Columbia criminal statutes. The proposed final recommendations are submitted for approval to the voting members[1] of the CCRC's statutorily designated Advisory Group.

The Report consists of two main parts:

(1) Statutory text for an enacted Title 22 (Title 22E) of the D.C. Code and revised statutes in other Titles of the D.C. Code, collectively referred to as the Revised Criminal Code (RCC); and
(2) Commentary on the RCC statutes that explains how and why the recommendations change current District law.

The following background materials are attached as appendices to this report:

(1) Appendix A. Table of Correspondence - RCC to Current D.C. Code Statutes;
(2) Appendix B. Table of Advisory Group Draft Documents;
(3) Appendix C. Advisory Group Comments on Draft Documents;
(4) Appendix D. Disposition of Advisory Group Comments & Other Changes From Draft Documents;
(5) Appendix E. Table of RCC Specific Offense Classifications;
(6) Appendix F. District Charging and Conviction Data 2010-2019, 2015-2019 and 2018-2019;
(7) Appendix G. Comparison of RCC Offense Penalties and District Charging and Conviction Data;
(8) Appendix H. D.C. Voluntary Sentencing Guidelines Rankings;
(9) Appendix I. Public Opinion Data;
(10) Appendix J. Research on Other Jurisdictions' Relevant Criminal Code Provisions; and
(11) Appendix K. Future Issues to be Addressed & Known Conforming Amendments.

[On March 24, 2021 the five voting members of the CCRC's Advisory Group voted _-_ to approve this Report for submission to the Council and Mayor for their due consideration.[2]] The full record of the Advisory Group's written comments on drafts of the statutory text and commentary and the handling of those comments are provided in Appendices C and D. The background materials attached to the report were provided to the Advisory Group but were not the subject of Advisory Group written comments.

---

[1] Don Braman, Associate Professor of Law, George Washington University School of Law (Council Appointee); Paul Butler, Professor of Law, Georgetown University Law Center (Council Appointee); Laura Hankins, General Counsel, Public Defender Service for the District of Columbia (Designee of the Director of the Public Defender Service for the District of Columbia); Dave Rosenthal, Senior Assistant Attorney General, Office of the Attorney General (Designee of the Attorney General for the District of Columbia); and Elana Suttenberg, Special Counsel for Legislative Affairs, United States Attorney's Office for the District of Columbia (Designee of the United States Attorney for the District of Columbia).

[2] The question voted upon was: ["Whether to approve the submitted criminal code reform recommendations and background materials for submission to the Council and Mayor for their due consideration, subject to any final typographic changes recommended by agency staff."]

The proposed final recommendations are submitted to fulfill the agency's statutory duties under D.C. Code § 3–152(a)-(c).[3] Previously, in a report transmitted to the Mayor and Council on May 5, 2017, the CCRC provided recommendations to enable the adoption of Title 22 as an enacted title of the District of Columbia Official Code.[4]

All materials in this report are available on the CCRC website at www.ccrc.dc.gov.

[3] D.C. Code § 3–152(a)-(c) states: "(a) By March 31, 2021, the Commission shall submit to the Mayor and the Council comprehensive criminal code reform recommendations that revise the language of the District's criminal statutes to:

(1) Use clear and plain language;
(2) Apply consistent, clearly articulated definitions;
(3) Describe all elements, including mental states, that must be proven;
(4) Reduce unnecessary overlap and gaps between criminal offenses;
(5) Eliminate archaic and unused offenses;
(6) Adjust penalties, fines, and the gradation of offenses to provide for proportionate penalties;
(7) Organize existing criminal statutes in a logical order;
(8) Identify any crimes defined in common law that should be codified, and propose recommended language for codification, as appropriate;
(9) Identify criminal statutes that have been held to be unconstitutional and recommend their removal or amendment;
(10) Propose such other amendments as the Commission believes are necessary; and
(11) Enable the adoption of Title 22 as an enacted title of the District of Columbia Official Code.

(b) The comprehensive criminal code reform recommendations required by subsection (a) of this section shall be in the form of a report that:

(1) Includes draft legislation or other specific steps for implementing the recommendations;
(2) Includes charging, sentencing, and other relevant statistics regarding the offenses affected by the recommendations; and
(3) Explains how and why the recommendations change existing District law.

(c) In preparing the comprehensive criminal code reform recommendations required by subsection (a) of this section, the Commission shall:

(1) Consult with the Code Revision Advisory Group established pursuant to § 3-153; and
(2) Review criminal code reforms in other jurisdictions, recommend changes to criminal offenses by the American Law Institute, and survey best practices recommended by criminal law experts.

[4] https://lims.dccouncil.us/Legislation/RC22-0053

CCRC Draft Title 22E
Table of Contents

SUBTITLE I. GENERAL PART.

Chapter 1. Preliminary Provisions.

Chapter 2. Basic Requirements of Offense Liability.

Chapter 3. Inchoate Liability.

Chapter 4. Justification Defenses.

* No corresponding statute in current D.C. Code. {…} Corresponding statute(s) in D.C. Code
[…] Possible or planned RCC statute, no draft to date.  Recommended for Repeal in CCRC Report #1

* No corresponding statute in current D.C. Code. {…} Corresponding statute(s) in D.C. Code
[…] Possible or planned RCC statute, no draft to date.  Recommended for Repeal in CCRC Report #1

Chapter 12. Robbery, Assault, and Threats.

§ 22E-1201. Robbery. {D.C. Code §§ 22-851; 22-2801; 22-2802; 22-2803; 22-3601; 22-3602; 22-3611; 22-3751; 22-3751.01; 22-3752; 22-4502; 24-403.01(b-2), (e)}

§ 22E-1202. Assault. {D.C. Code §§ 22-401 – 22-405; 22-406; 22-851; 22-3601; 22-3602; 22-3611; 22-3751; 22-3751.01; 22-3752; 22-4502; 24-403.01(e), (f)(1)}

[§ 22E-1203. Reserved.]

§ 22E-1204. Criminal Threats. {D.C. Code §§ 22-402; 22-404; 22-407; 22-851; 22-1810; 22-3601; 22-3602; 22-3611; 22-3751; 22-3751.01; 22-3752; 22-4502}

§ 22E-1205. Offensive Physical Contact. {D.C. Code §§ 22-401 – 22-405; 22-851; 22-3601; 22-3602; 22-3611; 22-3751; 22-3751.01; 22-3752; 22-4502; 24-403.01(e), (f)(1)}

Chapter 13. Sexual Assault and Related Provisions.

§ 22E-1301. Sexual Assault. {D.C. Code §§ 22-3002; 22-3003; 22-3004; 22-3005; 22-3007; 22-3018; 22-3019; 22-3020; 22-3601; 22-3611; 22-4502; 24-403.01(b-2), (e)}

§ 22E-1302. Sexual Abuse of a Minor. {D.C. Code §§ 22-3008; 22-3009; 22-3009.01; 22-3009.02; 22-3011; 22-3012; 22-3018; 22-3019; 22-3020; 22-3611; 22-4502; 24-403.01(b-2), (e)}

§ 22E-1303. Sexual Abuse by Exploitation. {D.C. Code §§ 22-3009.03; 22-3009.04; 22-3013; 22-3014; 22-3015; 22-3016; 22-3017; 22-3018; 22-3019; 22-3020}

§ 22E-1304. Sexually Suggestive Conduct with a Minor. {D.C. Code §§ 22-3010.01; 22-3011; 22-3018; 22-3019; 22-3020}

§ 22E-1305. Enticing a Minor into Sexual Conduct. {D.C. Code §§ 22-1312; 22-3010; 22-3011; 22-3012; 22-3018; 22-3019; 22-3020}

§ 22E-1306. Arranging for Sexual Conduct with a Minor or Person Incapable of Consenting. {D.C. Code §§ 22-3010.02; 22-3018; 22-3019; 22-3020}

§ 22E-1307. Nonconsensual Sexual Conduct. {D.C. Code §§ 22-3006; 22-3007; 22-3018; 22-3019; 22-3020}

§ 22E-1308. Incest. {D.C. Code § 22-1901}

§ 22E-1309. Civil Provisions on the Duty to Report a Sex Crime. {D.C. Code §§ 22-3020.51; 22-3020.52; 22-3020.53; 22-3020.54; 22-3020.55}

§ 22E-1310. Admission of Evidence in Sexual Assault and Related Cases. {D.C. Code §§ 22-3021; 22-3022; 22-3023; 22-3024}

Chapter 14. Kidnapping, Criminal Restraint, and Blackmail.

§ 22E-1401. Kidnapping. {D.C. Code §§ 22-851; 22-2001; 22-2704; 22-2705; 22-2706; 22-2708; 22-2709; 22-3601; 22-3602; 22-3611; 22-3751; 22-3751.01; 22-3752; 22-4502}

§ 22E-1402. Criminal Restraint. {D.C. Code §§ 22-851; 22-2001; 22-2704; 22-2705; 22-2706; 22-2708; 22-2709; 22-3601; 22-3602; 22-3611; 22-3751; 22-3751.01; 22-3752; 22-4502}
§ 22E-1403. Blackmail. {D.C. Code § 22-3252}

Chapter 15. Abuse and Neglect of Vulnerable Persons.

§ 22E-1501. Criminal Abuse of a Minor. {D.C. Code §§ 22-1101; 22-1102; 22-3611}
§ 22E-1502. Criminal Neglect of a Minor. {D.C. Code §§ 22-1101; 22-1102}
§ 22E-1503. Criminal Abuse of a Vulnerable Adult or Elderly Person. {D.C. Code §§ 22-933; 22-934; 22-935; 22-936}
§ 22E-1504. Criminal Neglect of a Vulnerable Adult or Elderly Person. {D.C. Code §§ 22-933; 22-934; 22-935; 22-936}

Chapter 16. Human Trafficking.

§ 22E-1601. Forced Labor. {D.C. Code §§ 22-1832; 22-1837}
§ 22E-1602. Forced Commercial Sex. {D.C. Code § 22-2705; 22-2706; 22-2708}*
§ 22E-1603. Trafficking in Labor. {D.C. Code §§ 22-1833; 22-1837}
§ 22E-1604. Trafficking in Forced Commercial Sex. {D.C. Code §§ 22-1833; 22-1837}
§ 22E-1605. Sex Trafficking of a Minor or Adult Incapable of Consenting. {D.C. Code §§ 22-1834; 22-1837; 22-2704}
§ 22E-1606. Benefitting from Human Trafficking. {D.C. Code §§ 22-1836, 22-1837}
§ 22E-1607. Misuse of Documents in Furtherance of Human Trafficking. {D.C. Code §§ 22-1835; 22-1837}
§ 22E-1608. Commercial Sex with a Trafficked Person.*
§ 22E-1609. Forfeiture. {D.C. Code § 22-1838}
§ 22E-1610. Reputation or Opinion Evidence. {D.C. Code § 22-1839}
§ 22E-1611. Civil Action. {D.C. Code § 22-1840}
§ 22E-1612. Limitation on Liabilities and Sentencing for RCC Chapter 16 Offenses.*
§ 22E-1613. Civil Forfeiture. {D.C. Code § 22-2723}

Chapter 17. Terrorism.

[§ 22E-1701. Acts of Terrorism. {D.C. Code §§ 22-3151; 22-3152; 22-3153; 22-3156}]
[§ 22E-1702. Manufacture or Possession of a Weapon of Mass Destruction. {D.C. Code §§ 22-3152; 22-3154; 22-3156}]
[§ 22E-1703. Use, Dissemination, or Detonation of a Weapon of Mass Destruction. {D.C. Code §§ 22-3152; 22-3155; 22-3156}]

Chapter 18. Stalking, Obscenity, and Invasions of Privacy.

§ 22E-1801. Stalking. {D.C. Code §§ 22-3131 – 3135}
§ 22E-1802. Electronic Stalking. {D.C. Code §§ 22-3131 – 3135}
§ 22E-1803. Voyeurism. {D.C. Code § 22-3531}
§ 22E-1804. Unauthorized Disclosure of a Sexual Recording. {D.C. Code §§ 22-3051 – 3057; 22-3531(f)(2)}
§ 22E-1805. Distribution of an Obscene Image. {D.C. Code § 22-2201(a)}
§ 22E-1806. Distribution of an Obscene Image to a Minor. {D.C. Code § 22-2201(b)}

* No corresponding statute in current D.C. Code. {…} Corresponding statute(s) in D.C. Code
[…] Possible or planned RCC statute, no draft to date.  Recommended for Repeal in CCRC Report #1

Chapter 19.
[Reserved.]

SUBTITLE III. PROPERTY OFFENSES.

Chapter 20. Property Offense Subtitle Provisions.

Chapter 21. Theft.

Chapter 22. Fraud.

Chapter 23. Extortion.

Chapter 24. Stolen Property.

§ 22E-2401. Possession of Stolen Property. {D.C. Code § 22-3232}
§ 22E-2402. Trafficking of Stolen Property. {D.C. Code § 22-3231}
§ 22E-2403. Alteration of a Motor Vehicle Identification Number. {D.C. Code § 22-3233}
§ 22E-2404. Alteration of a Bicycle Identification Number. {D.C. Code § 22-3234}

Chapter 25. Property Damage.

§ 22E-2501. Arson. {D.C. Code §§ 22-301; 22-302; 22-3305}
§ 22E-2502. Reckless Burning. {D.C. Code §§ 22-301; 22-302; 22-3305}
§ 22E-2503. Criminal Damage to Property. {D.C. Code §§ 22-303; 22-3305; 22-3307; 22-3309; 22-3310; 22-3312.01; 22-3312.04(a), (c); 22-3312.05; 22-3313; 22-3314}
§ 22E-2504. Criminal Graffiti. {D.C. Code §§ 22-3312.01; 22-3312.04(a), (c), (d), (e); 22-3312.05}

Chapter 26. Trespass.

§ 22E-2601. Trespass. {D.C. Code §§ 22-1341; 22-3301; 22-3302}

Chapter 27. Burglary.

§ 22E-2701. Burglary. {D.C. Code § 22-801}
§ 22E-2702. Possession of Tools to Commit Property Crime. {D.C. Code §§ 22-2501; 24-403.01(f)(3)}

Chapter 28.

[Reserved.]

Chapter 29.

[Reserved.]

SUBTITLE IV. OFFENSES AGAINST GOVERNMENT OPERATION.

Chapter 30. Offenses Against Government Operation Subtitle Provisions.

[Reserved.]

Chapter 31. Bribery, Improper Influence, and Official Misconduct.

[§ 22E-31XX. Corrupt Influence. {D.C. Code § 22-704}]
[§ 22E-31XX. Bribery. {D.C. Code §§ 22-711 – 22-713}]

Chapter 32. Perjury and Other Official Falsification Offenses.

§ 22E-3201. Impersonation of an Official. {D.C. Code §§ 22-1404 – 1406; 22-1409}
§ 22E-3202. Misrepresentation as a District of Columbia Entity. {D.C. Code §§ 22-3401 – 3403}
[§ 22E-32XX. Impersonation of another before court or officer. {D.C. Code § 22-1403}]

* No corresponding statute in current D.C. Code. {…} Corresponding statute(s) in D.C. Code
[…] Possible or planned RCC statute, no draft to date.  Recommended for Repeal in CCRC Report #1

[§ 22E-32XX. Perjury. {D.C. Code § 22-2402}]
[§ 22E-32XX. Subornation of Perjury. {D.C. Code § 22-2403}]
[§ 22E-32XX. False Swearing. {D.C. Code § 22-2404}]
[§ 22E-32XX. False Statements. {D.C. Code § 22-2405}]

Chapter 33. Offenses Involving Obstruction of Governmental Operations.

[§ 22E-33XX. Tampering with Physical Evidence. {D.C. Code § 22-723}]
[§ 22E-33XX. Obstruction of Justice. {D.C. Code §§ 22-721 – 22-722}]
[§ 22E-33XX. False alarms and false reports; hoax weapons. {D.C. Code § 22-1319}]
[§ 22E-33XX. Fraudulent interference or collusion in jury selection. {D.C. Code § 22-1514}]
[§ 22E-33XX. Accessories after the fact. {D.C. Code § 22-1806}]
[§ 22E-33XX. Obstructing, preventing, or interfering with reports to or requests for assistance from law enforcement agencies, medical providers, or child welfare agencies. {D.C. Code § 22-1931}]

Chapter 34. Government Custody.

§ 22E-3401. Escape from a Correctional Facility or Officer. {D.C. Code §§ 22-2601; 10-509.01a}
§ 22E-3402. Tampering with a Detection Device. {D.C. Code § 22-1211}
§ 22E-3403. Correctional Facility Contraband. {D.C. Code §§ 22-2603.01 – 22-2603.04}
[§ 22E-3404. Resisting Arrest. {D.C. Code § 22-405.01}]
[§ 22E-34XX. Fleeing or Eluding. {D.C. Code §§ 50-2201.05b; 50-301.34}]

Chapter 35.

[Reserved.]

Chapter 36.

[Reserved.]

Chapter 37.

[Reserved.]

Chapter 38.

[Reserved.]

Chapter 39.

[Reserved.]

SUBTITLE V. PUBLIC ORDER AND SAFETY OFFENSES.

Chapter 40. Public Order and Safety Offenses Subtitle Provisions.

[Reserved.]

Chapter 41. Weapon Offenses and Related Provisions.

§ 22E-4101. Possession of a Prohibited Weapon or Accessory. {D.C. Code §§ 7-2506.01(a)(3); 7-2506.01(b); 22-4514(a); 22-4515a(a) and (c)}
§ 22E-4102. Carrying a Dangerous Weapon. {D.C. Code §§ 22-4502.01; 22-4504(a) – (a-1); 22-4504.01}
§ 22E-4103. Possession of a Dangerous Weapon with Intent to Commit Crime. {D.C. Code §§ 22-4514(b); 22-4515a(b)}
§ 22E-4104. Possession of a Dangerous Weapon During a Crime. {D.C. Code §§ 22-4502; 22-4504(b)}
§ 22E-4105. Possession of a Firearm by an Unauthorized Person. {D.C. Code §§ 22-4503; 24-403.01(f)(2)}
§ 22E-4106. Negligent Discharge of Firearm. {D.C. Code §§ 22-4503.01; 24 DCMR § 2300.1 – 3}
§ 22E-4107. Alteration of a Firearm Identification Mark. {D.C. Code §§ 7-2505.03(d); 22-4512}
§ 22E-4108. Civil Provisions for Prohibitions of Firearms on Public or Private Property. {D.C. Code § 22-4503.02}
§ 22E-4109. Civil Provisions for Lawful Transportation of a Firearm or Ammunition. {D.C. Code § 22-4504.02}
§ 22E-4110. Civil Provisions for Issuance of a License to Carry a Pistol. {D.C. Code § 22-4506}
§ 22E-4111. Unlawful Sale of a Pistol. {D.C. Code § 22-4507}
§ 22E-4112. Unlawful Transfer of a Firearm. {D.C. Code § 22-4508}
§ 22E-4113. Sale of a Firearm Without a License. {D.C. Code § 22-4509}
§ 22E-4114. Civil Provisions for Licenses of Firearms Dealers. {D.C. Code § 22-4510}
§ 22E-4115. Unlawful Sale of a Firearm by a Licensed Dealer. {D.C. Code § 22-4510}
§ 22E-4116. Use of False Information for Purchase or Licensure of a Firearm. {D.C. Code § 22-4511}
§ 22E-4117. Civil Provisions for Taking and Destruction of Dangerous Articles. {D.C. Code § 22-4517}
§ 22E-4118. Exclusions from Liability for Weapon Offenses. {D.C. Code §§ 22-4504.01; 22-4505}
§ 22E-4119. Merger of Related Weapon Offenses.*
§ 22E-4120. Endangerment with a Firearm.*

Chapter 42. Breaches of Peace.

§ 22E-4201. Disorderly Conduct. {D.C. Code §§ 22-1301; 22-1321; 22-1809}
§ 22E-4202. Public Nuisance. {D.C. Code § 22-1321}
§ 22E-4203. Blocking a Public Way. {D.C. Code §§ 22-1307; 22-1318; 22-1323; 22-3319; 22-3321; 22-3322}
§ 22E-4204. Unlawful Demonstration. {D.C. Code §§ 10-503.17; 22-1307}
§ 22E-4205. Breach of Home Privacy. {D.C. Code § 22-1321(f)}
§ 22E-4206. Indecent Exposure. {D.C. Code § 22-1312}
[§ 22E-42XX. Throwing Stones or Other Missiles. {D.C. Code § 22-1309}]
[§ 22E-42XX. Kindling Bonfires. {D.C. Code § 22-1313}]

* No corresponding statute in current D.C. Code. {…} Corresponding statute(s) in D.C. Code
[…] Possible or planned RCC statute, no draft to date.  Recommended for Repeal in CCRC Report #1

[§ 22E-42XX. Protest Targeting a Residence. {D.C. Code § 22-2751}]
[§ 22E-42XX. Interference with Access to a Medical Facility. {D.C. Code §§ 22-1314.01; 22-1314.02}]
[§ 22E-42XX. Defacing or Burning Cross or Religious Symbol; Display of Certain Emblems. {D.C. Code §§ 22-3312.02; 22-3312.04}]
[§ 22E-42XX. Wearing hoods or masks. {D.C. Code §§ 22-3312.02; 22-3312.03}]
[§ 22E-42XX. Disorderly Conduct in Public Buildings or Grounds; Injury to or Destruction of United States Property. {D.C. Code § 22-3311}]

Chapter 43. Group Misconduct.

§ 22E-4301. Rioting. {D.C. Code § 22-1322}
§ 22E-4302. Failure to Disperse.*
[§ 22E-43XX. Criminal Gangs. {D.C. Code § 22-951}]

Chapter 44. Prostitution and Related Statutes.

§ 22E-4401. Prostitution. {D.C. Code §§ 22-2701; 22-2701.01; 22-2703; 22-2713 – 22-2720; 22-2724; 22-2725}
§ 22E-4402. Patronizing Prostitution. {D.C. Code §§ 22-2701; 22-2701.01; 22-2703; 22-2713 – 22-2720; 22-2724; 22-2725}
§ 22E-4403. Trafficking in Commercial Sex. {D.C. Code §§ 22-2701.01; 22-2705; 22-2707; 22-2710; 22-2711; 22-2712; 22-2713 – 22-2720; 22-2722; 22-2724; 22-2725}
§ 22E-4404. Civil Forfeiture. {D.C. Code § 22-2723; 22-2724; 22-2725}

Chapter 45. Cruelty to Animals.

[§ 22E-45XX. Protection of Police Animals. {D.C. Code § 22-861}]
[§ 22E-45XX. Cruelty to Animals. {D.C. Code §§ 22-1001 – 22-1013}]
[§ 22E-45XX. Urging Dogs to Fight or Create Disorder. {D.C. Code § 22-1310}]

Chapter 46. Offenses Against the Family and Youth.

§ 22E-4601. Contributing to the Delinquency of a Minor. {D.C. Code § 22-811}
[§ 22E-46XX. Bigamy. {D.C. Code § 22-501}]

Chapter 47. Gambling.

§ 22E-47XX. Promotion, sale, or possession of lottery tickets. {D.C. Code § 22-1701}]
§ 22E-47XX. Possession of lottery or policy tickets. {D.C. Code § 22-1702}]
§ 22E-47XX. Permitting sale of lottery tickets on premises. {D.C. Code § 22-1703}]
§ 22E-47XX. Gaming; setting up gaming table; inducing play. {D.C. Code § 22-1704}]
§ 22E-47XX. Gambling premises; definition; prohibition against maintaining; forfeiture; liens; deposit of moneys in Treasury; penalty; subsequent offenses. {D.C. Code § 22-1705}]
§ 22E-47XX. Three-card monte and confidence games. {D.C. Code § 22-1706}]
§ 22E-47XX. "Gaming table" defined. {D.C. Code § 22-1707}]
[§ 22E-47XX. Gambling pools and bookmaking; athletic contest defined. {D.C. Code § 22-1708}]

* No corresponding statute in current D.C. Code. {…} Corresponding statute(s) in D.C. Code
[…] Possible or planned RCC statute, no draft to date.  Recommended for Repeal in CCRC Report #1

[§ 22E-47XX. Corrupt influence in connection with athletic contests. {D.C. Code § 22-1713}]
[§ 22E-47XX. Immunity of witnesses; record. {D.C. Code § 22-1714}]
[§ 22E-47XX. Statement of purpose. {D.C. Code § 22-1716}]
[§ 22E-47XX. Permissible gambling activities. {D.C. Code § 22-1717}]
[§ 22E-47XX. Advertising and promotion; sale and possession of lottery and numbers tickets and slips. {D.C. Code § 22-1718}]

Chapter 48. Environmental Offenses.

[§ 22E-49XX. Malicious Pollution of Water {D.C. Code § 22-3318}]
[§ 22E-49XX. Throwing or depositing matter in Potomac River. {D.C. Code § 22-4402}]
[§ 22E-49XX. Deposits of deleterious matter in Rock Creek or Potomac River. {D.C. Code §§ 22-4403; 22-4404}]

SUBTITLE VI. OTHER OFFENSES.

Chapter 50.

[Reserved.]

D.C. Code Statutes Outside Title 22 Recommended for Revision

§ 7-2502.01A. Possession of an Unregistered Firearm, Destructive Device, or Ammunition. {D.C. Code §§ 7-2502.01(a); 7-2506.01(a); 7-2507.06(a)(2) – (4) and (b); 24 DCMR § 2343.2}
§ 7-2502.15. Possession of a Stun Gun. {D.C. Code § 7-2502.15; 7-2507.06(b)(1)(E)}
§ 7-2502.17. Carrying an Air or Spring Gun. {24 DCMR § 2301}
§ 7-2507.02A. Unlawful Storage of a Firearm. {D.C. Code § 7-2507.02; 24 DCMR § 2348}
§ 7-2509.06A. Carrying a Pistol in an Unlawful Manner. {24 DCMR §§ 2343.1; 2344}
§ 16-705. Jury trial; trial by court. {D.C. Code § 16-705}
§ 16-1005A. Criminal Contempt for Violation of a Civil Protection Order. {D.C. Code §§ 16-1005(f) – (i)}
§ 16-1021. Parental Kidnapping Definitions. {D.C. Code § 16-1021}
§ 16-1022. Parental Kidnapping. {D.C. Code §§ 16-1022-1025}
§ 16-1023. Protective Custody and Return of Child. {D.C. Code § 16-1023}
§ 16-1024. Expungement of Parental Kidnapping Conviction. {D.C. Code § 16-1026}
§ 23-586. Failure to Appear after Release on Citation or Bench Warrant Bond. {D.C. Code § 23-585(b)}
§ 23-1327. Failure to Appear in Violation of a Court Order. {D.C. Code § 23-1327}
§ 23-1329A. Criminal Contempt for Violation of a Release Condition. {D.C. Code § 23-1329(a-1) and (c)}
§ 24-241.05A. Violation of Work Release. {D.C. Code § 24-241.05(b)}
§ 24-403.01. Sentencing, supervised release, and good time credit for felonies committed on or after August 5, 2000. {D.C. Code § 24-403.01}
§ 24-403.03. Modification of an imposed term of imprisonment. {D.C. Code § 24-403.03}
§ 25-1001. Possession of an Open Container or Consumption of Alcohol in a Motor Vehicle. {D.C. Code § 25-1001}
§ 48-904.01a. Possession of a Controlled Substance. {D.C. Code §§ 48-904.01(d)(1); 48-904.08; 48-904.09}
§ 48-904.01b. Trafficking of a Controlled Substance. {D.C. Code §§ 48-904.01(a)(1); 48-904.06; 48-904.07; 48-904.07a; 48-904.08; 48-904.09}
§ 48-904.01c. Trafficking of a Counterfeit Substance. {D.C. Code §§ 48-904.01(b)(1); 48-904.08; 48-904.09}
§ 48-904.10. Possession of Drug Manufacturing Paraphernalia. {D.C. Code §§ 48-904.10; 48-1102; 48-1101(3); 48-1103(a)(1)}
§ 48-904.11. Trafficking of Drug Paraphernalia. {D.C. Code §§ 48-1102; 48-1103(b)(1)}
§ 48-904.12. Maintaining Methamphetamine Production. {D.C. Code § 48-904.03a}
[§ 48-904.02. [Controlled Substances] Prohibited Acts B.]
[§ 48-904.03. [Controlled Substances] Prohibited Acts C.]

* No corresponding statute in current D.C. Code. {…} Corresponding statute(s) in D.C. Code
[…] Possible or planned RCC statute, no draft to date.  Recommended for Repeal in CCRC Report #1

D.C. Code Statutes Recommended for Repeal

§ 3-206. Unlawful acts.
§ 4-125. Assisting child to leave institution without authority; concealing such child; duty of police.
§ 5-115.03. Neglect to Make Arrest for Offense Committed in Presence.
§§ 7-2502.12 – 7-2502.13. Possession of self-defense sprays.
§ 8-305. Penalty.
§ 9-433.01. Permit required; exceptions.
§ 9-433.02. Penalty; prosecution.
§ 22-1003. Rest, water and feeding for animals transported by railroad company.
§ 22-1012(a). Abandonment of maimed or diseased animal; destruction of diseased animals; disposition of animal or vehicle on arrest of driver; scientific experiments.
§ 22-1308. Playing games in streets.
§ 22-1311. Allowing dogs to go at large.
§ 22-1317. Flying fire balloons or parachutes.
§ 22-1402. Recordation of deed, contract, or conveyance with intent to extort money.
§§ 22-1511 – 22-1513. Fraudulent Advertising.
§ 22-1807. Punishment for offenses not covered by provisions of Code. **
§§ 22-2301 – 22-2306. Panhandling.
§ 22-3224. Fraudulent registration.
§ 22-3303. Grave robbery; burying or selling dead bodies.
§ 22-3320. Obstructing public road; removing milestones.
§ 34-701. False statements in securing approval for stock issue.
§ 34-707. Destruction of apparatus or appliance of Commission.
§ 36-153. Unauthorized use, defacing, or sale of registered vessel.
§ 37-131.08(b). Penalties for Illegal vending.
§ 47-102. Total indebtedness not to be increased.
§ 48-904.07. Enlistment of minors to distribute.

* No corresponding statute in current D.C. Code. {…} Corresponding statute(s) in D.C. Code
[…] Possible or planned RCC statute, no draft to date.  Recommended for Repeal in CCRC Report #1

D.C. Code Statutes Recommended for Relocation Out of D.C. Code Title 22

§ 22-1841. [Human Trafficking] Data collection and dissemination.
§ 22-1842. [Human Trafficking] Training program.
§ 22-1843. Public posting of human trafficking hotline.
§§ 22-3218.01 – 22-3218.04. Theft of Utility Service.
§§ 22-3225.01 – 22-3225.15. Insurance Fraud.
§§ 22-3226.01 – 22-3226.15. Telephone Fraud.
§§ 22-3704. [Bias-Related Crime] Civil Action.
§ 22-3803. [Sexual Psychopaths] Definitions.
§ 22-3804. [Sexual Psychopaths] Filing of statement.
§ 22-3805. [Sexual Psychopaths] Right to counsel.
§ 22-3806. [Sexual Psychopaths] Examination by psychiatrists.
§ 22-3807. [Sexual Psychopaths] When hearing is required.
§ 22-3808. [Sexual Psychopaths] Hearing; commitment.
§ 22-3809. [Sexual Psychopaths] Parole; discharge.
§ 22-3810. [Sexual Psychopaths] Stay of criminal proceedings.
§ 22-3811. [Sexual Psychopaths] Criminal law unchanged.
§ 22-3901. [HIV Testing of Certain Criminal Offenders] Definitions.
§ 22-3902. [HIV Testing of Certain Criminal Offenders] Testing and counselling.
§ 22-3903. [HIV Testing of Certain Criminal Offenders] Rules.
Title 22 Chapter 40. Sex Offender Registration.
Title 22 Chapter 41a. DNA Testing and Post-Conviction Relief For Innocent Persons.
Title 22 Chapter 41b. DNA Sample Collection.
Title 22 Chapter 42. National Institute of Justice Appropriations.
Title 22 Chapter 42a. Criminal Justice Coordinating Council.
Title 22 Chapter 42b. Homicide Elimination.

SUBTITLE I. GENERAL PART.

Chapter 1. Preliminary Provisions.

RCC § 22E-101. Short Title and Effective Date.

(a) Short title. This title may be cited as the "Revised Criminal Code."
(b) Effective date. This title takes effect at 12:01 am on [A DATE AT LEAST 1 YEAR FROM ENACTMENT].
(c) Prior offenses. Offenses committed prior to the effective date of the Revised Criminal Code are subject to laws in effect at that time. In this subsection, an offense is "committed prior to the effective date" if any one of the elements of the offense is satisfied prior to the effective date.

RCC § 22E-102. Rules of Interpretation.

(a) Interpretation Generally. To interpret a statutory provision of this title, the plain meaning of that provision shall be examined first. If necessary to determine the legislature's meaning, the structure, goal, and history of the provision also may be examined.
(b) Rule of lenity. If the meaning of a statutory provision remains in doubt after examination of that provision's plain meaning, structure, purpose, and history, then the interpretation that is most favorable to the actor applies.
(c) Effect of headings and captions. Headings and captions that appear at the beginning of subtitles, chapters, subchapters, sections, and subsections of this title may aid the interpretation of otherwise ambiguous statutory language.
(d) Effect of definition cross-references. Cross-references to definitions located elsewhere in this title, or omissions of such cross-references, may aid the interpretation of otherwise ambiguous statutory language.
(e) Definitions. The term "actor" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-103. Interaction of Title 22E with Other District Laws.

(a) General interaction of Title 22E with provisions in other laws. Unless otherwise expressly specified by statute, a provision in this title applies to this title only.
(b) Interaction of Title 22E with civil provisions in other laws. Unless expressly specified by this title or otherwise provided by law, the provisions of this title do not bar, suspend, or otherwise affect any right or liability to damages, penalty, forfeiture, or other remedy authorized by law to be recovered or enforced in a civil action.

RCC § 22E-104. Applicability of the General Part.

Unless otherwise expressly specified by statute, the provisions in Subtitle I of this title apply to all other provisions of this title.

Chapter 2. Basic Requirements of Offense Liability.

RCC § 22E-201. Proof of Offense Elements Beyond a Reasonable Doubt.

(a) Proof of offense elements beyond a reasonable doubt. No person may be convicted of an offense unless the government proves each offense element beyond a reasonable doubt.
(b) Burden of proof for exclusions from liability, defenses, and affirmative defenses.
    (1) If there is any evidence of a statutory exclusion from liability at trial, the government must prove the absence of at least one element of the exclusion from liability beyond a reasonable doubt.
    (2) If there is any evidence of a statutory defense at trial, the government must prove the absence of at least one element of the defense beyond a reasonable doubt.
    (3) An actor has the burden of proving an affirmative defense by a preponderance of the evidence.
(c) "Offense element" defined. "Offense element" includes the necessary objective elements and culpability required for an offense.
(d) "Objective element" defined. "Objective element" means any conduct element, result element, or circumstance element. In this title:
    (1) "Conduct element" means any act or omission that is required to establish liability for an offense;
    (2) "Result element" means any consequence caused by a person's act or omission that is required to establish liability for an offense; and
    (3) "Circumstance element" means any characteristic or condition relating to either a conduct element or result element that is required to establish liability for an offense.
(e) "Culpability required" defined. "Culpability required" includes:
    (1) The voluntariness requirement under RCC § 22E-203;
    (2) The culpable mental state requirement under RCC § 22E-205; and
    (3) Any other aspect of culpability specifically required for an offense.
(f) Definitions. The terms "act" and "omission" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-202; and the term "actor" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-202. Conduct Requirement.

(a) Conduct requirement. No person may be convicted of an offense unless the person's liability is based on an act or omission.
(b) "Act" defined. "Act" means a bodily movement.
(c) "Omission" defined. "Omission" means a failure to act when:
    (1) A person is under a legal duty to act; and
    (2) The person is either:
        (A) Aware that the legal duty to act exists; or
        (B) Culpably unaware that the legal duty to act exists.

(d) Existence of legal duty. In this title, a legal duty to act exists when:
(1) The failure to act is expressly made sufficient by the law defining the offense; or
(2) A duty to perform the omitted act is otherwise imposed by law.

RCC § 22E-203. Voluntariness Requirement.

(a) Voluntariness requirement. No person may be convicted of an offense unless the person voluntarily commits the conduct element required for the offense.
(b) Scope of voluntariness requirement.
(1) Voluntariness of act. When a person's act provides the basis for liability, a person voluntarily commits the conduct element of an offense when the act is:
(A) The product of conscious effort or determination; or
(B) Otherwise subject to the person's control.
(2) Voluntariness of omission. When a person's omission provides the basis for liability, a person voluntarily commits the conduct element of an offense when:
(A) The person has the physical capacity to perform the required legal duty; or
(B) The failure to act is otherwise subject to the person's control.
(c) Definitions. The term "conduct element" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-201; and the terms "act" and "omission" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-202.

RCC § 22E-204. Causation Requirement.

(a) Causation requirement. No person may be convicted of an offense that contains a result element unless the person's conduct is the factual cause and legal cause of the result.
(b) "Factual cause" defined. A person's conduct is the factual cause of a result if:
(1) The result would not have occurred but for the person's conduct; or
(2) When the conduct of 2 or more persons contributes to a result, the conduct of each alone would have been sufficient to produce that result.
(c) "Legal cause" defined. A person's conduct is the legal cause of a result if:
(1) The result is reasonably foreseeable in its manner of occurrence; and
(2) When the result depends on another person's volitional conduct, there is a close connection between the actor's conduct and the result.
(d) Definitions. The term "result element" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-201; and the term "actor" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-205. Culpable Mental State Requirement.

(a) Culpable mental state requirement. No person may be convicted of an offense unless the person acts with a culpable mental state as to every result element and circumstance element required for the offense, other than an element for which the person is strictly liable under RCC § 22E-207(b).
(b) Culpable mental state defined. "Culpable mental state" means:
    (1) Purpose, knowledge, intent, recklessness, or negligence; and
    (2) The object of the phrases "with intent" and "with the purpose".
(c) "Strictly liability" defined. "Strictly liable" and "strict liability" mean liability as to a result element or circumstance element in the absence of a culpable mental state.
(d) Definitions. The terms "circumstance element" and "result element" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-201; and the terms "intent," "knowledge," "negligence," "purpose," and "recklessness" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206.

RCC § 22E-206. Definitions and Hierarchy of Culpable Mental States.

(a) "Purposely" defined. A person acts purposely:
    (1) As to a result element when the person consciously desires to cause the result; and
    (2) As to a circumstance element when the person consciously desires that the circumstance exists.
(b) "Knowingly" and "intentionally" defined. A person acts knowingly or intentionally:
    (1) As to a result element, when the person is aware or believes that the conduct is practically certain to cause the result; and
    (2) As to a circumstance element when the person is practically certain that the circumstance exists.
(c) "Recklessly" defined. A person acts recklessly:
    (1) As to a result element, when:
        (A) The person consciously disregards a substantial risk that the conduct will cause the result; and
        (B) The risk is of such a nature and degree that, considering the nature of and motivation for the person's conduct and the circumstances the person is aware of, the person's conscious disregard of that risk is a gross deviation from the standard of conduct that a reasonable individual would follow in the person's situation; and
    (2) As to a circumstance element, when:
        (A) The person consciously disregards a substantial risk that the circumstance exists; and
        (B) The risk is of such a nature and degree that, considering the nature of and motivation for the person's conduct and the circumstances the person is aware of, the person's conscious disregard of that risk is a gross deviation from the standard of conduct that a reasonable individual would follow in the person's situation.

(d) "Negligently" defined. A person acts negligently:
  (1) As to a result element, when:
    (A) The person should be aware of a substantial risk that the conduct will cause the result; and
    (B) The risk is of such a nature and degree that, considering the nature of and motivation for the person's conduct and the circumstances the person is aware of, the person's failure to perceive that risk is a gross deviation from the standard of care that a reasonable individual would follow in the person's situation; and
  (2) As to a circumstance element, when:
    (A) The person should be aware of a substantial risk that the circumstance exists; and
    (B) The risk is of such a nature and degree that, considering the nature of and motivation for the person's conduct and the circumstances the person is aware of, the person's failure to perceive that risk is a gross deviation from the standard of care that a reasonable individual would follow in the person's situation.

(e) Hierarchical relationship of culpable mental states.
  (1) Proof of Negligence. When the law requires negligence as to a result element or circumstance element, the requirement is also satisfied by proof of recklessness, intent, knowledge, or purpose.
  (2) Proof of Recklessness. When the law requires recklessness as to a result element or circumstance element, the requirement is also satisfied by proof of intent, knowledge, or purpose.
  (3) Proof of Knowledge or Intent. When the law requires knowledge or intent as to a result element or circumstance element, the requirement is also satisfied by proof of purpose.

(f) Same definitions for other parts of speech. The words defined in this section have the same meaning when used as other parts of speech.

(g) Definitions. The terms "circumstance element" and "result element" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-201.

RCC § 22E-207. Rules of Interpretation Applicable to Culpable Mental States.

(a) Distribution of specified culpable mental states. Any culpable mental state or strict liability specified in an offense applies to all subsequent result elements and circumstance elements until another culpable mental state or strict liability is specified.

(b) Identification of elements subject to strict liability. A person is strictly liable for any result element or circumstance element in an offense:
  (1) That is modified by the phrase "in fact"; or

(2) When another statutory provision explicitly indicates strict liability applies to that result element or circumstance element.

(c) Recklessness otherwise implied. A culpable mental state of "recklessly" applies to any result element or circumstance element not otherwise subject to a culpable mental state under RCC § 22E-207(a) or strict liability under RCC § 22E-207(b).

(d) Definitions. The terms "circumstance element" and "result element" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-201; the terms "culpable mental state," "strict liability," and "strictly liable" have the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-205; the term "recklessly" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; and the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207.

RCC § 22E-208. Principles of Liability Governing Accident, Mistake, and Ignorance.

(a) Effect of accident, mistake, and ignorance on liability. A person is not liable for an offense when the person's accident, mistake, or ignorance as to a matter of fact or law negates the existence of a culpable mental state required for a result element or circumstance element in the offense.

(b) Relationship between mistake and culpable mental state requirements. A mistake as to a matter of fact or law negates the existence of a culpable mental state applicable to a circumstance element as follows:

(1) Purpose. Any mistake as to a circumstance element negates purpose as to that element.

(2) Knowledge or intent. Any mistake as to a circumstance element negates knowledge or intent as to that element.

(3) Recklessness. A reasonable mistake as to a circumstance element negates recklessness as to that element. An unreasonable mistake as to a circumstance element negates recklessness as to that element unless the person made the mistake recklessly.

(4) Negligence. A reasonable mistake as to a circumstance element negates negligence as to that element. An unreasonable mistake as to a circumstance element negates negligence as to that element unless the person made the mistake negligently.

(c) Mistake or ignorance as to criminality. A person remains liable for an offense when they are mistaken or ignorant as to the illegality of their conduct unless the person's mistake or ignorance:

(1) Negates a culpable mental state that is expressly specified by statute as to:

(A) Whether conduct constitutes that offense; or

(B) The existence, meaning, or application of the law defining an offense; or

(2) Satisfies the requirements of a general defense under Chapters 4 and 5 of this Subtitle.

(d) Imputation of knowledge for deliberate ignorance. Knowledge of a circumstance element is established if the person:

(1) Is reckless as to whether the circumstance element exists; and
(2) With the purpose of avoiding criminal liability, avoids confirming or fails to investigate whether the circumstance element exists.

(e) Definitions. The terms "circumstance element" and "result element" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-201; the term "culpable mental state" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-205; and the terms "intent," "knowledge," "negligence," "negligently," "purpose," "reckless," "recklessly," and "recklessness" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206.

RCC § 22E-209. Principles of Liability Governing Intoxication.

(a) Relevance of intoxication to liability. A person is not liable for an offense when the person's intoxication negates the existence of a culpable mental state required for a result element or circumstance element in the offense.
(b) Relationship between intoxication and culpable mental state requirements. Intoxication negates the existence of a culpable mental state applicable to a result element or circumstance element as follows:
(1) Purpose. Intoxication negates purpose as to a result element or circumstance element when, due to the person's intoxicated state, the person does not consciously desire to cause the result or that the circumstance exists.
(2) Knowledge or intent. Intoxication negates knowledge or intent as to a result element or circumstance element when, due to the person's intoxicated state, the person is not practically certain that the result will occur or that the circumstance exists.
(3) Recklessness. Except as specified in subsection (c) of this section, intoxication negates recklessness as to a result element or circumstance element when, due to the person's intoxicated state:
(A) The person is unaware of a substantial risk that the result will occur or that the circumstance exists; or
(B) The person's disregard of the risk is not a gross deviation from the standard of conduct that a reasonable individual would follow in the person's situation under RCC § 22E-206(c)(1)(B) or RCC § 22E-206(c)(2)(B).
(4) Negligence. Intoxication negates negligence as to a result element or circumstance element when, due to the person's intoxicated state, the person's failure to perceive a substantial risk that the result will occur or that the circumstance exists is not a gross deviation from the standard of care that a reasonable individual would follow in the person's situation under RCC § 22E-206(d)(1)(B) or § 22E-206(d)(2)(B).
(c) Imputation of recklessness for self-induced intoxication. Recklessness as to a result element or circumstance element is established if:

(1) Because of an intoxicated state, the person is unaware of a substantial risk of the result occurring or circumstance existing, that the person would have been aware of had the person been sober;
(2) The person's intoxicated state is self-induced; and
(3) The person acts at least negligently as to that result or circumstance.

(d) "Intoxication" and "self-induced intoxication" defined.
(1) "Intoxication" means a disturbance of mental or physical capacities resulting from the introduction of substances into the body.
(2) "Self-induced intoxication" means intoxication that, in fact, is caused by a substance that an actor knowingly introduces into their body, negligent as to the tendency of the substance to cause intoxication and, in fact, the substance was not introduced pursuant to medical advice by a licensed health professional or under circumstances that would afford a general defense under Chapters 4 or 5 of this Subtitle.

(e) Definitions. The terms "circumstance element" and "result element" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-201; the term "culpable mental state" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-205; the terms "intent," "knowingly," "knowledge," "negligence," "negligent," "negligently," "purpose," and "recklessness" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor" and "health professional" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-210. Accomplice Liability.

(a) Accomplice liability. An actor is an accomplice to the commission of an offense by another person when the actor:
(1) Purposely assists another person with the planning or commission of conduct constituting an offense and, in fact, acts with the culpability required for the offense; or
(2) Purposely encourages another person to engage in specific conduct constituting an offense and, in fact, acts with the culpability required for the offense.

(b) Culpable mental state elevation applicable to circumstances of target offense. Notwithstanding subsection (a) of this section, to be an accomplice to the commission of an offense, an actor must intend for all circumstance elements required by the offense to exist.

(c) Grading distinctions based on culpability as to result elements. An accomplice to the commission of an offense that is graded by distinctions in culpability as to result elements is liable for any grade for which they have the culpability required.

(d) Charging and penalties. An actor who is an accomplice to the commission of an offense by another person shall be charged and subject to punishment as a principal.

(e) Actual disposition of principal not relevant. An actor is liable as an accomplice under this section even though the principal has not been arrested, prosecuted, convicted, adjudicated delinquent, or acquitted for an offense.

(f) Definitions. The terms "circumstance elements," "culpability required," and "result elements" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-201; the terms "intend" and "purposely" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the term "actor" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-211. Criminal Liability for Conduct by an Innocent or Irresponsible Person.

(a) Criminal liability for conduct by an innocent or irresponsible person. An actor is criminally liable for the conduct of an innocent or irresponsible person when the actor:
  (1) In fact, causes an innocent or irresponsible person to engage in conduct constituting an offense; and
  (2) Acts with the culpability required for the offense.

(b) "Innocent or irresponsible person" defined. The term "innocent or irresponsible person" includes a person who engages in conduct constituting an offense but either:
  (1) Lacks the culpability required for the offense; or
  (2) Acts under conditions that establish a general defense under Chapters 4 or 5 of this Subtitle.

(c) Charging and penalties. An actor who is criminally liable for the conduct of an innocent or irresponsible person shall be charged and subject to punishment as if the actor had directly engaged in the conduct constituting the offense.

(d) Actual disposition of innocent or irresponsible person not relevant. An actor is liable for the conduct of an innocent or irresponsible person even though the innocent or irresponsible person has not been arrested, prosecuted, convicted, adjudicated delinquent, or acquitted for an offense.

(e) Definitions. The term "culpability required" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-201; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the term "actor" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-212. Exclusions from Liability for Conduct of Another Person.

(a) Exclusions from liability. Unless otherwise expressly specified by statute, a person is not liable for the conduct of another person under RCC § 22E-210 or RCC § 22E-211 when, in fact, the person is a victim of the offense, or the person's conduct is inevitably incident to commission of the offense.

(b) Definitions. The term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207.

RCC § 22E-213. Withdrawal Defense to Legal Accountability.

(a) Affirmative defense. It is an affirmative defense to liability under RCC § 22E-210 or RCC § 22E-211 that the actor, in fact, terminates their efforts to promote or facilitate commission of an offense before it is committed, and:

(1) Ensures their prior efforts are wholly ineffective;
(2) Gives timely warning to the appropriate law enforcement authorities; or
(3) Makes reasonable efforts to prevent the commission of the offense.

(b) Definitions. The term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the term "actor" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-214. Merger of Related Offenses.

(a) Merger of multiple related offenses. Multiple convictions for 2 or more offenses arising from the same act or course of conduct merge when:
(1) One offense is necessarily established by proof of the elements of the other offense as a matter of law;
(2) The offenses differ only in that:
(A) One prohibits a less serious harm or wrong to the same person, property, or public interest;
(B) One may be satisfied by a lower culpable mental state under RCC § 22E-206 or § 22E-207; or
(C) One is defined to prohibit a designated kind of conduct generally, and the other is defined to prohibit a specific instance of that kind of conduct;
(3) One offense requires a finding of fact inconsistent with the requirements for commission of the other offense, as a matter of law;
(4) One offense reasonably accounts for the other offense, given the harm or wrong, culpability, and penalty proscribed by each;
(5) One offense consists only of a criminal attempt or criminal solicitation of:
(A) The other offense; or
(B) An offense that is related to that offense in the manner described in paragraphs (a)(1) – (a)(4) of this subsection; or
(6) Each offense is a general inchoate offense designed to culminate in the commission of:
(A) The same offense; or
(B) Different offenses that are related to one another in the manner described in paragraphs (a)(1) – (a)(4) of this subsection.

(b) Merger procedure. For an actor found guilty of 2 or more offenses that merge under this section the sentencing court shall either:
(1) Vacate all but one of the offenses prior to sentencing according to the rule of priority in subsection (c) of this section; or
(2) Enter judgment and sentence the actor for offenses that merge, provided that:
(A) Sentences for the offenses run concurrent to one another; and
(B) The convictions for all but, at most, one of the offenses shall be vacated after:
(i) The time for appeal has expired; or
(ii) The judgment that was appealed has been decided.

(c) Rule of priority. When convictions are vacated under subsection (b) of this section, the conviction that remains shall be the conviction for:
  (1) The offense with the highest authorized maximum period of incarceration; or
  (2) If two or more offenses have the same, highest authorized maximum period of incarceration, any offense that the sentencing court deems appropriate.

(d) Definitions. The term "act" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-202; the term "culpable mental state" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-205; and the terms "actor" and "property" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-215. Judicial Dismissal for Minimal or Unforeseen Harms.

(a) Court authority to dismiss. The court may dismiss a prosecution if, in fact, considering the nature of the conduct alleged, the actor's culpable mental state, and the nature of the attendant circumstances, it finds that the actor's conduct constituting the offense:
  (1) Was within a customary license or tolerance, which was not expressly refused by the person whose interest was infringed and which is not inconsistent with the goal of the law defining the offense;
  (2) Did not actually cause or threaten the harm or evil sought to be prevented by the law defining the offense or did so only to an extent too trivial to warrant the condemnation of conviction; or
  (3) Presents such other extenuations that it cannot reasonably be regarded as envisioned by the legislature in forbidding the offense.

(b) Specific findings. A court shall state its specific findings of facts, as determined by a preponderance of the evidence, or findings of law under this section in open court or in a written decision or opinion.

(c) Definitions. The term "culpable mental state" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-205; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the term "actor" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-216. Minimum Age for Offense Liability.

(a) Exception to liability for actors under 12. An actor does not commit an offense when the actor, in fact, is under 12 years of age.

(b) Others' liability for actors under 12. When otherwise liable for an offense based on the conduct of another, an actor remains liable for the offense notwithstanding the fact that the conduct is committed by a person under 12 years of age.

(c) Definitions. The term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the term "actor" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-701.

Chapter 3. Inchoate Liability.

RCC § 22E-301. Criminal Attempt.

(a) Definition of criminal attempt. An actor commits criminal attempt to commit an offense when the actor:
  (1) In fact, plans to engage in conduct constituting an offense;
  (2) Engages in conduct that is reasonably adapted to completion of the offense;
  (3) Acts with the culpability required for the offense; and
  (4) Either:
    (A) Comes dangerously close to completing the offense; or
    (B) Would have come dangerously close to completing the offense if the situation was as the actor perceived it to be.

(b) Culpable mental state elevation applicable to results of target offense. Notwithstanding subsection (a) of this section, to commit a criminal attempt to commit an offense, the actor must intend to cause all result elements required for the offense.

(c) Proof of completed offense sufficient basis for criminal attempt conviction. An actor may be convicted of criminal attempt to commit an offense based upon proof that the actor actually committed the target offense, provided that no actor may be convicted of both the target offense and an attempt to commit the target offense arising from the same act or course of conduct.

(d) Penalties. A criminal attempt to commit an offense is subject to not more than one-half the maximum term of imprisonment and fine applicable to the offense, after the application of any penalty enhancements.

(e) Definitions. The terms "culpability required" and "result element" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-201; the term "intend" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; and the term "actor" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-302. Criminal Solicitation.

(a) Definition of criminal solicitation. An actor commits criminal solicitation when the actor:
  (1) Purposely commands, requests, or tries to persuade another person to engage in or aid the planning or commission of specific conduct, which, if carried out, in fact, will constitute an offense or an attempt to commit an offense; and
  (2) Acts with the culpability required for the offense.

(b) Scope of criminal solicitation liability. Notwithstanding subsection (a) of this section, an actor commits criminal solicitation to commit an offense only when the offense is, in fact:
  (1) An offense against persons as defined in Subtitle II of this title; or
  (2) A felony property offense as defined in Subtitle III of this title.

(c) Culpable mental state elevation applicable to results and circumstances of target offense. Notwithstanding subsection (a) of this section, to commit criminal solicitation to commit an offense, an actor must:
  (1) Intend to cause all result elements required for the offense; and
  (2) Intend for all circumstance elements required for the offense to exist.

(d) Uncommunicated criminal solicitation. It is immaterial under subsection (a) of this section that the planned recipient of the actor's command, request, or efforts at persuasion fails to receive the message, if the actor does everything they plan to do to transmit the message to the planned recipient.

(e) Penalties. A criminal solicitation to commit an offense is subject to not more than one-half the maximum term of imprisonment and fine applicable to the offense, after the application of any penalty enhancements.

(f) Definitions. The terms "circumstance element," "culpability required," and "result element" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-201; the terms "intend" and "purposely" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor" and "felony" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-303. Criminal Conspiracy.

(a) Definition of criminal conspiracy. An actor commits criminal conspiracy to commit an offense when the actor and at least one other person:
  (1) Purposely agree to engage in or aid the planning or commission of conduct which, if carried out, in fact, will constitute an offense or a criminal attempt to commit an offense;
  (2) The parties to the agreement act with the culpability required for the offense; and
  (3) Any one of the parties to the agreement engages in an overt act in furtherance of the agreement.

(b) Culpable mental state elevation applicable to results and circumstances of target offense. Notwithstanding subsection (a) of this section, to commit criminal conspiracy to commit an offense, the actor and at least one other person must:
  (1) Intend to cause all result elements required for the offense; and
  (2) Intend for all circumstance elements required for the offense to exist.

(c) Penalties. A criminal conspiracy to commit an offense is subject to not more than one-half the maximum term of imprisonment and fine applicable to the offense, after the application of any penalty enhancements.

(d) Jurisdiction when object of criminal conspiracy is to engage in conduct outside the District. When the object of a conspiracy formed inside the District is to engage in conduct outside the District, the conspiracy is a violation of this section only if:
  (1) The conduct would constitute a criminal offense under the statutory laws of the District if performed in the District; and
  (2) The conduct would constitute a criminal offense under:

(A) The statutory laws of the other jurisdiction if performed in that jurisdiction; or
(B) The statutory laws of the District even if performed outside the District.

(e) Jurisdiction when criminal conspiracy is formed outside the District. A conspiracy formed outside the District to engage in conduct inside the District is a violation of this section if:
(1) The conduct would constitute a criminal offense under the statutory laws of the District if performed within the District; and
(2) An overt act in furtherance of the conspiracy is committed within the District.

(f) Legality of conduct in other jurisdiction no defense. When paragraphs (e)(1) and (e)(2) of this section are proven, it is not a defense to a prosecution for conspiracy that the conduct that is the object of the conspiracy would not constitute a criminal offense under the laws of the jurisdiction in which the conspiracy was formed.

(g) Definitions. The terms "circumstance element," "culpability required," and "result element" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-201; the term "act" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-202; the terms "intend" and "purposely" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; and the term "actor" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-304. Limitation on Vicarious Liability for Conspirators.

(a) Offense. An actor who is a party to a criminal conspiracy as defined under RCC § 22E-303 shall not be liable for an offense committed by another party to the conspiracy, unless, in fact:
(1) The actor satisfies the requirements for criminal liability specified in RCC § 22E-210, RCC § 22E-211, or RCC § 22E-302; or
(2) It is expressly specified by statute that a party to a conspiracy may be held criminally liable for an offense committed by another party to the conspiracy.

(b) Definitions. The term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the term "actor" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-305. Exceptions to General Inchoate Liability.

(a) Exceptions to general inchoate liability. A person does not commit criminal solicitation under RCC § 22E-302 or criminal conspiracy under RCC § 22E-303 when, in fact:
(1) The person is a victim of the target offense; or
(2) The person's criminal objective is inevitably incident to commission of the target offense as defined by statute.

(b) Exceptions inapplicable where liability expressly provided by statute. The exceptions established in subsection (a) of this section do not limit the criminal liability expressly specified by statute.

RCC § 22E-306. Renunciation Defense to Attempt, Conspiracy, and Solicitation.

(a) Renunciation defense. It is an affirmative defense to liability for a criminal attempt under RCC § 22E-301, criminal solicitation under RCC § 22E-302, or criminal conspiracy under RCC § 22E-303 that, in fact:
  (1) The actor made reasonable efforts to prevent commission of the target offense;
  (2) Under circumstances manifesting a voluntary and complete renunciation of the actor's criminal intent; and
  (3) The target offense was not committed.

(b) Scope of voluntary and complete. A renunciation is not "voluntary and complete" under subsection (a) of this section when it is motivated in whole or in part by:
  (1) A belief that circumstances exist which:
    (A) Increase the probability of detection or apprehension of the actor or another participant in the criminal enterprise; or
    (B) Render accomplishment of the criminal plans more difficult; or
  (2) A decision to:
    (A) Postpone the criminal conduct until another time; or
    (B) Transfer the criminal effort to another victim or similar objective.

(c) Definitions. The term "intent" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the term "actor" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-701.

Chapter 4. Justification Defenses.

RCC § 22E-401. Lesser Harm.

(a) Defense. It is a defense that, in fact, the actor:
  (1) Reasonably believes the actor or another person is in imminent danger of a specific, identifiable harm;
  (2) Reasonably believes the conduct constituting the offense:
    (A) Will protect against the harm; and
    (B) Is necessary in degree; and
  (3) The conduct constituting the offense brings about a significantly lesser harm than that the actor seeks to avoid.

(b) Exceptions. This defense is not available when:
  (1) Recklessness is the culpable mental state for an objective element of the offense and the actor recklessly brings about the situation requiring a choice of harms;
  (2) Negligence is the culpable mental state for an objective element of the offense and the actor negligently brings about the situation requiring a choice of harms; or

(3) The conduct constituting the offense is expressly addressed by another available defense, affirmative defense, or exclusion from liability.

(c) Definitions. The term "objective element" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-201; the term "culpable mental state" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-205; the terms "negligence," "negligently," "recklessly," and "recklessness" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the term "actor" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-402. Execution of Public Duty.

(a) Defense. It is a defense that, in fact:
  (1) The conduct constituting the offense is required or authorized by law, including:
    (A) A court order;
    (B) A law governing the armed services or the lawful conduct of war;
    (C) A law defining the duties or functions of a public official;
    (D) A law defining the assistance to be rendered to a public official in the performance of their official duties;
    (E) A law governing the execution of legal process; or
    (F) Any other provision of law imposing a public duty;
  (2) The actor reasonably believes the conduct constituting the offense is required or authorized by a court order or warrant; or
  (3) The actor reasonably believes the conduct constituting the offense is required or authorized by law to assist a public official in the performance of their official duties.

(b) Exceptions.
  (1) This defense is not available in a situation that is expressly addressed by another available defense, affirmative defense, or exclusion from liability.
  (2) This defense is not available when the conduct constituting the offense is the use of deadly force, unless that use of deadly force:
    (A) Is expressly authorized by law; or
    (B) Occurs in the lawful conduct of war.

(c) Definitions. The term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "deadly force," and "public official" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-403. Defense of Self or Another Person.

(a) Defense. It is a defense that, in fact, the actor reasonably believes:
  (1) The actor or another person is in imminent danger of a physical contact, bodily injury, sexual act, sexual contact, confinement, or death; and
  (2) The conduct constituting the offense:

(A) Will protect against the harm; and
(B) Is necessary in degree.

(b) Exceptions. This defense is not available when:
(1) In fact, the actor uses or attempts to use deadly force, unless the actor reasonably believes:
(A) The actor or another person is in imminent danger:
(i) Of a serious bodily injury, a sexual act, confinement, or death; or
(ii) While in their individual dwelling unit, of a bodily injury or a sexual contact; and
(B) The conduct constituting the offense:
(i) Will protect against the harm; and
(ii) Is necessary in degree;
(2) The actor purposely, through conduct other than speech or presence alone, provokes or brings about the situation requiring the defense and, in fact, does not withdraw or make reasonable efforts to withdraw; or
(3) The actor is reckless as to the fact that they are protecting themselves or another from lawful conduct.

(c) Use of deadly force by a law enforcement officer. When, in fact, the actor is a law enforcement officer who uses or attempts to use deadly force, a factfinder shall consider all of the following when determining whether the actor satisfies the requirements of the defense:
(1) The law enforcement officer's training and experience;
(2) Whether the complainant:
(A) Appeared to possess, either on their person or in a location where it is readily available, a dangerous weapon; and
(B) Was afforded an opportunity to comply with an order to surrender any suspected dangerous weapons;
(3) Whether the law enforcement officer engaged in de-escalation measures, including taking cover, waiting for back-up, trying to calm the complainant, or using non-deadly force;
(4) Whether any conduct by the law enforcement officer increased the risk of a confrontation resulting in deadly force being used; and
(5) Whether the law enforcement officer made all reasonable efforts to prevent a loss of a life, including abandoning efforts to apprehend the complainant.

(d) Definitions. The terms "purposely" and "reckless" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "bodily injury," "complainant," "dangerous weapon," "deadly force," "law enforcement officer," "possess," "serious bodily injury," "sexual act," "sexual contact," and "speech" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-404. Defense of Property.

(a) Defense. It is a defense that, in fact, the actor reasonably believes:

(1) Real or tangible personal property is in imminent danger of damage, taking, trespass, or misuse; and
(2) The conduct constituting the offense:
(A) Will protect against the harm; and
(B) Is necessary in degree.

(b) Exceptions. This defense is not available when:
(1) In fact, the actor uses or attempts to use deadly force;
(2) The property is land that is property of another, unless the actor has or reasonably believes they have the effective consent of a property owner to protect the land; or
(3) The actor is reckless as to the fact that they are protecting themselves or another from lawful conduct.

(c) Definitions. The term "reckless" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "deadly force," "effective consent," "owner," "property," and "property of another" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-408. Special Responsibility for Care, Discipline, or Safety Defenses.

(a) Parental defense. It is a defense to offenses under Subtitle II and Subtitle III of this title that:
(1) In fact, the actor reasonably believes that:
(A) The complainant is under 18 years of age; and
(B) The actor is either:
(i) A parent, or a person acting in the place of a parent under civil law, who is responsible for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant; or
(ii) Acting with the effective consent of such a parent or such a person;
(2) The actor engages in the conduct constituting the offense with intent to safeguard or promote the welfare of the complainant, including the prevention or punishment of the complainant's misconduct; and
(3) In fact, such conduct:
(A) Is reasonable, under all the circumstances; and
(B) Either:
(i) Does not create a substantial risk of, or cause, death or serious bodily injury; or
(ii) Is the performance or authorization of a lawful cosmetic or medical procedure.

(b) Guardian defense. It is a defense to offenses under Subtitle II and Subtitle III of this title that:
(1) In fact, the actor reasonably believes that:
(A) The complainant is an incapacitated individual; and
(B) The actor is either:
(i) A court-appointed guardian to the complainant; or
(ii) Acting with the effective consent of such a guardian;

(2) The actor engages in the conduct constituting the offense with intent to safeguard or promote the welfare of the complainant, including the prevention of the complainant's misconduct; and
(3) In fact, such conduct:
(A) Is reasonable under all the circumstances;
(B) Is permitted under civil law controlling the guardianship; and
(C) Either:
(i) Does not create a substantial risk of, or cause, death or serious bodily injury; or
(ii) Is the performance or authorization of a lawful cosmetic or medical procedure.

(c) Emergency health professional defense. It is a defense to offenses under Subtitle II and Subtitle III of this title that:
(1) In fact, the actor reasonably believes that:
(A) The complainant is presently unable to give effective consent;
(B) The actor is either:
(i) A licensed health professional; or
(ii) A person acting at a licensed health professional's direction;
(C) The conduct charged to constitute the offense is the performance or authorization of a lawful medical procedure;
(D) The medical procedure is administered or authorized in an emergency;
(E) No person who is legally permitted to consent to the medical procedure on behalf of the complainant can be timely consulted;
(F) There is no legally valid standing instruction by the complainant declining the medical procedure;
(2) The actor engages in or authorizes the medical procedure with intent to safeguard or promote the physical or mental health of the complainant; and
(3) In fact, a reasonable person wishing to safeguard the welfare of the complainant would consent to the medical procedure.

(d) Limited duty of care defense. It is a defense to offenses under Subtitle II and Subtitle III of this title that:
(1) In fact, the actor reasonably believes that the actor has a responsibility, under civil law, for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant;
(2) The actor engages in the conduct constituting the offense with intent that the conduct:
(A) Is necessary to fulfill the actor's responsibility to the complainant; and
(B) Is consistent with the welfare of the complainant; and
(3) In fact, such conduct:
(A) Is reasonable, under all the circumstances;

(B) Does not create a substantial risk of, or cause, death or serious bodily injury; and

(4) The defenses in subsections (a) - (c) of this section do not apply to the actor's conduct.

(e) Exceptions. The defenses in this section do not apply to:

(1) Offenses in Chapter 13 of this title (Sexual Assault and Related Provisions); and

(2) Offenses in Chapter 16 of this title (Human Trafficking).

(f) Definitions. The term "intent," has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "complainant," "consent," "effective consent," "health professional," "incapacitated individual," "person acting in the place of a parent under civil law," and "serious bodily injury" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

Chapter 5. Excuse Defenses.

RCC § 22E-501. Duress.

(a) Affirmative defense. It is an affirmative defense that, in fact:

(1) The actor reasonably believes:

(A) A person communicated to the actor that the person will cause the actor or a third person a criminal bodily injury, sexual act, sexual contact, confinement, or death; and

(B) The actor or third person is in imminent danger of the communicated harm; and

(2) The communication would cause a reasonable person of the same background and in the same circumstances as the actor to engage in the conduct constituting the offense.

(b) Exceptions. This defense is not available when, in fact:

(1) The actor recklessly brings about the situation requiring a choice of harms;

(2) Negligence is the culpable mental state for an objective element of the offense and the actor is negligent in bringing about the situation requiring a choice of harms; or

(3) The conduct constituting the offense is an escape from a correctional facility or officer under RCC § 22E-3401 and the actor does not make reasonable efforts to safely return to official custody.

(c) Definitions. The term "objective element" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-201; the term "culpable mental state" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-205; the terms "negligence," "negligent," and "recklessly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "bodily injury," "official custody," "sexual act," and "sexual contact" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-502. Temporary Possession.

(a) Affirmative defense. It is an affirmative defense that:
  (1) In fact, the offense is a predicate possessory or distribution offense;
  (2) The actor possesses or distributes the item with intent, exclusively and in good faith, to do one or more of the following:
    (A) Permanently relinquish control over the item to a law enforcement officer or prosecutor for appropriate and lawful action;
    (B) Permanently relinquish control over the item to the actor's supervisor or a person in charge of the location where the item was found, for appropriate and lawful action;
    (C) Seek legal services from an attorney or provide legal services as an attorney;
    (D) Seek medical services from a licensed health professional or provide medical services as a licensed health professional;
    (E) Investigate the circumstances surrounding the item's possession, acquisition, or use by a specific person when the actor has a responsibility, under civil law, for the health, welfare, or supervision of the person; or
    (F) Permanently dispose of the item; and
  (3) In fact, the actor does not possess the item longer than is reasonably necessary to engage in the conduct specified in paragraph (a)(2) of this subsection.

(b) Definitions.
  (1) The term "intent" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the terms "actor," "health professional," "law enforcement officer," "possess," "possesses," and "possession" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and
  (2) In this section, the term "predicate possessory or distribution offense" means:
    (A) Possession of a Prohibited Weapon or Accessory under RCC § 22E-4101;
    (B) Carrying a Dangerous Weapon under RCC § 22E-4102;
    (C) Possession of a Firearm by an Unauthorized Person under RCC § 22E-4105;
    (D) Possession of an Unregistered Firearm, Destructive Device, or Ammunition under RCC § 7-2502.01;
    (E) Possession of a Stun Gun under RCC § 7-2502.15;
    (F) Carrying an Air or Spring Gun under RCC § 7-2502.17;
    (G) Carrying a Pistol in an Unlawful Manner under RCC § 7-2509.06.
    (H) Possession of a Controlled Substance under RCC § 48-904.01a;

(I) Trafficking of a Controlled Substance under RCC § 48-904.01b; and
(J) Trafficking of a Counterfeit Substance under RCC § 48-904.01c.

RCC § 22E-503. Entrapment.

(a) Affirmative defense. It is an affirmative defense that, in fact, a law enforcement officer acting under color or pretense of official right, or a person cooperating with a law enforcement officer acting under color or pretense of official right:
  (1) Purposely commanded, requested, tried to persuade, or otherwise induced the actor to engage in the conduct constituting the offense; or
  (2) Purposely commanded, requested, tried to persuade, or otherwise induced a third party to engage in conduct constituting a criminal offense:
    (A) Reckless as to the fact that the third party would command, request, try to persuade, or otherwise induce one or more additional persons to engage in or assist the conduct; and
    (B) In fact, the command, request, effort to persuade or otherwise induce an additional person in paragraph (a)(2)(A) induces the actor to engage in the conduct constituting the offense.
(b) Exception. This defense is not available when, in fact, the actor is predisposed to engage in the specific conduct constituting the offense and the actor is merely afforded the opportunity or means to engage in such conduct.
(c) Definitions. The terms "purposely" and "reckless" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor" and "law enforcement officer" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-504. Mental Disability Defense.

(a) Affirmative defense. It is an affirmative defense in a criminal proceeding that, in fact, as a result of a mental disability, the actor:
  (1) Lacked substantial capacity to conform their conduct to the requirements of the law; or
  (2) Lacked substantial capacity to recognize the wrongfulness of their conduct.
(b) Effect of defense. An actor who is acquitted solely on the ground of mental disability shall be committed under D.C. Code § 24-501.
(c) Definitions.
  (1) The term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the term "actor" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-701; and
  (2) In this section, the term "mental disability" means an abnormal condition of the mind, regardless of its medical label, that affects mental or emotional processes and either substantially impairs a person's ability to regulate and control their conduct or substantially impairs a person's ability to recognize the wrongfulness of their conduct.

(d) Interpretation of statute. This section shall not be construed to create or limit a court's authority, on its own initiative, to order a psychiatric examination or to raise a mental disability defense.

Chapter 6. Offense Classes, Penalties, & Enhancements.

RCC § 22E-601. Offense Classifications.

(a) Offense classifications. Each offense in this title is classified as a:
  (1) Class 1 felony;
  (2) Class 2 felony;
  (3) Class 3 felony;
  (4) Class 4 felony;
  (5) Class 5 felony;
  (6) Class 6 felony;
  (7) Class 7 felony;
  (8) Class 8 felony;
  (9) Class 9 felony;
  (10) Class A misdemeanor;
  (11) Class B misdemeanor;
  (12) Class C misdemeanor;
  (13) Class D misdemeanor; or
  (14) Class E misdemeanor.

(b) Definitions. The terms "felony" and "misdemeanor" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-602. Authorized Dispositions.

(a) Unless otherwise expressly specified by statute, a court may sentence a person upon conviction to sanctions that include:
  (1) A term of imprisonment under RCC § 22E-603;
  (2) A fine under RCC § 22E-604;
  (3) Probation under D.C. Code § 16-710;
  (4) Restitution or reparation under D.C. Code § 16-711;
  (5) Community service under D.C. Code § 16-712;
  (6) Post-release supervision under D.C. Code § 24-903; and
  (7) Work release under D.C. Code § 24-241.01.

(b) A court may sentence a person upon conviction to either imprisonment under RCC § 22E-603 or a fine under RCC § 22E-604, but not both, for the following statutes prosecuted by the Attorney General for the District of Columbia: [RESERVED.]

(c) Judicial deferral and dismissal of proceedings.

(1) When a person is found guilty of a violation of any Class A, B, C, D, or E offense, the court may, without entering a judgment of guilty and with the consent of the person, defer further proceedings on that offense and place the person on probation upon such reasonable conditions as it may require and for such period, not to exceed one year, as the court may prescribe. Upon violation of a condition of the probation, the court may enter an adjudication of guilt and proceed as otherwise provided. The court may, in its discretion, dismiss the proceedings against the person and discharge the person from probation before the expiration of the maximum period prescribed for such person's probation. If during the period of probation the person does not violate any of the conditions of the probation, then upon expiration of such period the court shall discharge such person and dismiss the proceedings against the person. Discharge and dismissal under this subsection shall be without court adjudication of guilt. Such discharge or dismissal shall not be deemed a conviction with respect to disqualifications or disabilities imposed by law upon conviction of a crime (including the penalties prescribed under RCC § 22E-606 for second or subsequent convictions).

(2) Upon the dismissal of the proceedings and discharge of the person under paragraph (c)(1) of this subsection, the person may apply to the court for an order to seal the publicly available records of the arrest and related court proceedings. If the court determines, after hearing, that the proceedings were dismissed and the person discharged, it shall grant the motion to seal under the procedures in D.C. Code § 16–803(l).

(3) A person to whom relief is granted under paragraph (c)(2) of this subsection shall have the legal protections and obligations specified under D.C. Code § 16–803(l) and (m).

(d) Definitions. The term "consent" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-603. Authorized Terms of Imprisonment.

(a) Authorized terms of imprisonment. Unless otherwise expressly specified by statute, the maximum term of imprisonment authorized for an offense is:

(1) For a Class 1 felony, 45 years;
(2) For a Class 2 felony, 40 years;
(3) For a Class 3 felony, 30 years;
(4) For a Class 4 felony, 24 years;
(5) For a Class 5 felony, 18 years;
(6) For a Class 6 felony, 12 years;
(7) For a Class 7 felony, 8 years;
(8) For a Class 8 felony, 4 years;

(9) For a Class 9 felony, 2 years;
(10) For a Class A misdemeanor, 1 year;
(11) For a Class B misdemeanor, 180 days;
(12) For a Class C misdemeanor, 60 days;
(13) For a Class D misdemeanor, 10 days; and
(14) For a Class E misdemeanor, no imprisonment.

(b) Definitions. The terms "felony" and "misdemeanor" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-604. Authorized Fines.

(a) Authorized fines. Unless otherwise expressly specified by statute, the maximum fine for an offense is:
(1) For a Class 1 felony, $1,000,000;
(2) For a Class 2 felony, $750,000;
(3) For a Class 3 felony, $500,000;
(4) For a Class 4 felony, $250,000;
(5) For a Class 5 felony, $100,000;
(6) For a Class 6 felony, $75,000;
(7) For a Class 7 felony, $50,000;
(8) For a Class 8 felony, $25,000;
(9) For a Class 9 felony, $10,000;
(10) For a Class A misdemeanor, $5,000;
(11) For a Class B misdemeanor, $2,500;
(12) For a Class C misdemeanor, $1,000;
(13) For a Class D misdemeanor, $500; and
(14) For a Class E misdemeanor, $250.

(b) Alternative fines for pecuniary loss or gain, or organizational actors. A court may fine an actor who has been found guilty:
(1) Up to twice the pecuniary loss or pecuniary gain when:
(A) The offense, in fact, results in either pecuniary loss to a person other than the actor, or pecuniary gain to any person; and
(B) The information or indictment alleges the amount of the pecuniary loss or pecuniary gain and that the actor is subject to a fine double the amount of the pecuniary loss or pecuniary gain; or
(2) Up to three times the amount otherwise provided by statute for the offense when the actor, in fact, is an organizational actor and the information or indictment alleges the actor is an organizational actor and is subject to a fine treble the maximum amount otherwise authorized.

(c) Limits on fines. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, a court shall not impose a fine that would impair the ability of an actor who has been found guilty to make restitution or leave the actor without sufficient means for reasonable living expenses and family obligations, and a person who is eligible for appointed counsel under D.C. Code § 11-2601 shall not be subject to a fine under subsection (a) of this section.

(d) Definitions.

(1) The term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the terms "actor," "felony," "misdemeanor," "pecuniary gain," and "pecuniary loss" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and

(2) In this section, "organizational actor" means any actor other than a natural person, including a trust, estate, fiduciary, partnership, company, corporation, association, organization, union, government, government agency, or government-owned corporation, or any other legal entity.

RCC § 22E-605. Charging and Proof of Penalty Enhancements.

(a) Charging of penalty enhancements. An offense is not subject to a general penalty enhancement under this chapter or any other penalty enhancement expressly specified by statute unless notice of the penalty enhancement is specified in the information or indictment for the offense.

(b) Standard of proof for penalty enhancements. Except for the establishment of prior convictions under D.C. Code § 23-111, an offense is not subject to a general penalty enhancement under this chapter or any other penalty enhancement expressly specified by statute unless each objective element and culpable mental state of the penalty enhancement is proven beyond a reasonable doubt.

(c) Definitions. The term "objective element" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E- 201; the term "culpable mental state" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-205; and the term "prior conviction" has the meaning specified in RCC 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-606. Repeat Offender Penalty Enhancement.

(a) Felony repeat offender penalty enhancement. A felony repeat offender penalty enhancement applies to an offense when:

(1) In fact, the actor presently commits a felony offense under Subtitle II of this title, or an enhanced burglary offense; and

(2) At the time of the offense, has at least one prior conviction for a felony offense under Subtitle II of this title, an enhanced burglary offense, or a comparable offense, that was:

(A) Committed within 10 years of the current offense being enhanced; and

(B) Not committed on the same occasion as the current offense being enhanced.

(b) Misdemeanor repeat offender penalty enhancement. A misdemeanor repeat offender penalty enhancement applies to an offense when:

(1) In fact, the actor presently commits a misdemeanor offense under Subtitle II of this title; and

(2) At the time of the offense, has at least two prior convictions for misdemeanor offenses under Subtitle II of this title, or comparable offenses, or at least one prior conviction for a felony offense under Subtitle II of this title, an enhanced burglary offense, or a comparable offense, that were:
(A) Committed within 10 years of the current offense being enhanced; and
(B) Not committed on the same occasion as one another or the current offense being enhanced.

(c) Proceedings to establish previous convictions. No person shall be subject to additional punishment for a felony or misdemeanor repeat offender penalty enhancement in this section unless the requirements under D.C. Code § 23-111 are satisfied.

(d) Penalties. Subject to the limitation under RCC § 22E-602(b) regarding imposition of both a term of imprisonment and a fine:
(1) A felony repeat offender penalty enhancement under subsection (a) of this section increases the authorized term of imprisonment and fine for the offense above the otherwise authorized penalty classification:
(A) For a Class 1 or Class 2 felony, 6 years and $50,000;
(B) For a Class 3 or Class 4 felony, 4 years and $40,000;
(C) For a Class 5 or Class 6 felony, 2 years and $30,000;
(D) For a Class 7 or Class 8 felony, 1 years and $20,000; and
(E) For a Class 9 felony, 180 days and $10,000; and
(2) A misdemeanor repeat offender penalty enhancement under subsection (b) of this section increases the authorized term of imprisonment and fine for the offense above the otherwise authorized penalty classification:
(A) For a Class A or Class B misdemeanor, 60 days and $500; and
(B) For a Class C, Class D, or Class E misdemeanor, 10 days and $50.

(e) Multiple penalty enhancements. A penalty enhancement under this section is in addition to, and does not limit application of, additional penalty enhancements specified elsewhere in this chapter or this title, provided that the determination of the offense class under subsection (d) of this section shall be based on the offense penalty before application of any additional penalty enhancements.

(f) Definitions.
(1) The term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the terms "actor," "comparable offense," "felony," "misdemeanor," and "prior conviction" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and
(2) In this section the term "enhanced burglary offense" means enhanced first and enhanced second degree burglary under RCC § 22E-2701(a)-(b), (d)(4).

RCC § 22E-607. Pretrial Release Penalty Enhancement.

(a) Pretrial release penalty enhancement. A pretrial release penalty enhancement applies to an offense when, in fact, at the time the actor commits the offense the actor is on pretrial release under D.C. Code § 23-1321.

(b) Exceptions. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, a penalty enhancement in this section does not apply to an offense of Contempt under D.C. Code § 11-741, Third Degree Escape from a Correctional Facility or Officer under RCC § 22E-3401(c), Tampering With a Detection Device under RCC § 22E-3402(a)(1)(B), or violation of a condition of release under D.C. Code § 23-1329 for the same conduct.

(c) Penalties. Subject to the limitation in RCC § 22E-602(b) regarding imposition of both a term of imprisonment and a fine, a pretrial release penalty enhancement increases the authorized term of imprisonment and fine for an offense above the otherwise authorized penalty classification:

(1) For a Class 1 or Class 2 felony, 6 years and $50,000;
(2) For a Class 3 or Class 4 felony, 4 years and $40,000;
(3) For a Class 5 or Class 6 felony, 2 years and $30,000;
(4) For a Class 7 or Class 8 felony, 1 years and $20,000;
(5) For a Class 9 felony, 180 days and $10,000;
(6) For a Class A or B misdemeanor, 60 days and $500; and
(7) For a Class C, Class D, or Class E misdemeanor, 10 days and $50.

(d) Multiple penalty enhancements. A penalty enhancement under this section is in addition to, and does not limit application of, additional penalty enhancements specified elsewhere in this chapter or in this title, provided that the determination of the offense class under subsection (c) of this section shall be based on the offense penalty before application of any additional penalty enhancements.

(e) Definitions. The term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "felony," and "misdemeanor" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-608. Hate Crime Penalty Enhancement.

(a) Hate crime penalty enhancement. A hate crime penalty enhancement applies to an offense when the actor commits the offense with the purpose, in whole or part, of threatening, physically harming, damaging the property of, or causing a pecuniary loss to any person or group because of prejudice against the perceived race, color, religion, national origin, sex, age, sexual orientation, homelessness, physical disability, political affiliation, or gender identity or expression of any person or group.

(b) Penalties. A hate crime penalty enhancement increases the penalty classification for an offense by one class except, for a Class 1 felony, the authorized term of imprisonment and fine for the offense increases by 6 years and $50,000.

(c) Multiple penalty enhancements. A penalty enhancement under this section is in addition to, and does not limit application of, additional penalty enhancements specified elsewhere in this chapter or in this title.

(d) Definitions.

(1) The term "purpose" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the terms "actor," "felony," "homelessness," "pecuniary loss," and "property" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and

(2) In this section, the term "gender identity or expression" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 2-1401.02.

RCC § 22E-609. Hate Crime Penalty Enhancement Civil Provisions.

(a) Civil provisions on data collection and publication.

(1) The Metropolitan Police Department shall afford each crime victim the opportunity to submit with their complaint a written statement that contains information to support a claim that the conduct that occurred is a crime subject to a hate crime penalty enhancement under RCC § 22E-608.

(2) The Mayor shall collect and compile data on the incidence of crime subject to a hate crime penalty enhancement under this section, provided that such data shall be used for research or statistical purposes and shall not contain information that may reveal the identity of an individual crime victim.

(3) The Mayor shall publish an annual summary of the data collected under paragraph (b)(2) of this section and transmit the summary and recommendations based on the summary to the Council.

(b) Civil action.

(1) Irrespective of any criminal prosecution or the result of a criminal prosecution, a civil cause of action in a court of competent jurisdiction for appropriate relief shall be available for any person who alleges that they have been subjected to conduct that constitutes a criminal offense committed with the purpose, in whole or part, of threatening, physically harming, damaging the property of, or causing a pecuniary loss to any person or group because of prejudice against the person's or group's perceived race, color, religion, national origin, sex, age, sexual orientation, homelessness, physical disability, political affiliation, or gender identity or expression as, in fact, defined in D.C. Code § 2-1401.02(12A).

(2) In a civil action under paragraph (b)(1) of this section, the relief available shall include:

(A) An injunction;

(B) Actual or nominal damages for economic or non-economic loss, including damages for emotional distress;

(C) Punitive damages in an amount to be determined by a jury or a court sitting without a jury; or

(D) Reasonable attorneys' fees and costs.

(3) An actor's parent, or a person acting in the place of a parent under civil law, who is responsible for the health, welfare, or supervision of the actor shall be liable for any damages that an actor under 18 years of age is required to pay in a civil action brought under paragraph (b)(1) of this section, if any act or omission of the parent or person acting in the place of a parent under civil law contributed to the conduct of the actor.

(c) Definitions. The terms "act" and "omission" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-202; the term "purpose" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "homelessness," "pecuniary loss," "person acting in the place of a parent under civil law," and "property" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-610. Abuse of Government Power Penalty Enhancement.

(a) Penalty enhancement. An abuse of government power penalty enhancement applies to an offense when the actor:
(1) In fact, commits an offense under Subtitle II or Subtitle III of this title;
(2) Knowing that they are a public official; and
(3) Recklessly engages in the conduct constituting the offense under color or pretense of official right.

(b) Penalties. An abuse of government power penalty enhancement increases the penalty classification for an offense by one class except, for a Class 1 felony, the authorized term of imprisonment and fine for the offense increases by 6 years and $50,000.

(c) Multiple penalty enhancements. A penalty enhancement under this section is in addition to, and does not limit application of, additional penalty enhancements specified elsewhere in this chapter or in this title.

(d) Definitions. The terms "knowing" and "recklessly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "felony," and "public official" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

Chapter 7. Definitions.

RCC § 22E-701. Generally Applicable Definitions.

Unless otherwise defined in a particular section, in this title, the term:

"Act" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-202.

"Actor" means person accused of a criminal offense.

"Ammunition" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 7-2501.01.

"Amount of damage" means:

(A) When property is completely destroyed, the property's fair market value at the time it was destroyed; or

(B) When the property is partially damaged, either:

(i) The reasonable cost of necessary repairs if there are repairs; or

(ii) If there are no repairs, the change in the fair market value of the property due to the damage.

(C) Notwithstanding subparagraph (B) of this paragraph, if the reasonable cost of necessary repairs is greater than the fair market value of the property at the time it was partially damaged, that fair market value is the amount of damage.

"Assault weapon" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 7-2501.01.

"Audiovisual recording" means a material object upon which are fixed a series of related images which are intrinsically intended to be shown by the use of machines or devices such as projectors, viewers, or electronic equipment, now existing or later developed, together with any accompanying sounds.

"Block" and other parts of speech, including "blocks" and "blocking," mean to render safe passage through a space difficult or impossible.

"Bodily injury" means physical pain, physical injury, illness, or impairment of physical condition.

"Building" means a structure affixed to land that is designed to contain one or more natural persons.

"Bump stock" means any object that, when installed in or attached to a firearm, increases the rate of fire by using energy from the recoil of the firearm to generate a reciprocating action that facilitates repeated activation of the trigger.

"Business yard" means securely fenced or walled land where goods are stored or merchandise is traded.

"Check" means any written instrument for payment of money by a financial institution.

"Circumstance element" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-201.

"Class A contraband" means:

(A) A dangerous weapon or an imitation dangerous weapon;

(B) Ammunition or an ammunition clip;

(C) A flammable liquid or explosive powder;

(D) A knife, screwdriver, ice pick, box cutter, needle, or any other tool capable of cutting, slicing, stabbing, or puncturing a person;

(E) A shank or a homemade knife;

(F) Tear gas, pepper spray, or any other substance that is designed or specifically adapted for causing temporary blindness or incapacitation;
(G) A tool that is designed or specifically adapted for picking locks, cutting chains, cutting glass, bypassing an electronic security system, or bypassing a locked door;
(H) Handcuffs, security restraints, handcuff keys, or any other object that is designed or specifically adapted for locking, unlocking, or releasing handcuffs or security restraints;
(I) A hacksaw, hacksaw blade, wire cutter, file, or any other object or tool that is designed or specifically adapted for cutting through metal, concrete, or plastic;
(J) Rope; or
(K) A law enforcement officer's uniform, medical staff clothing, or any other uniform.

"Class B contraband" means:
(A) Any controlled substance or marijuana;
(B) Any alcoholic liquor or beverage;
(C) A hypodermic needle or syringe or other item that is designed or specifically adapted for administering an unlawful controlled substance; or
(D) A portable electronic communication device or an accessory to a portable electronic communication device.

"Close relative" means a parent, grandparent, sibling, child, grandchild, aunt, or uncle.

"Coercive threat" means a communication that, unless the complainant complies, any person will do any of the following:
(A) Engage in conduct that, in fact, constitutes:
(i) An offense against persons under Subtitle II of this title; or
(ii) A property offense under Subtitle III of this title;
(B) Take or withhold action as a public official, or cause a public official to take or withhold action;
(C) Accuse a person of a crime;
(D) Expose a secret, publicize an asserted fact, or distribute a photograph, video or audio recording, regardless of the truth or authenticity of the secret, fact, or item, that tends to subject another person to, or perpetuate:
(i) Hatred, contempt, ridicule, or other significant injury to personal reputation; or
(ii) Significant injury to credit or business reputation;
(E) Notify a federal, state, or local government agency or official of, or publicize, another person's immigration or citizenship status;
(F) Restrict a person's access to either a controlled substance that the person owns or a prescription medication that the person owns; or
(G) Cause any harm that is sufficiently serious, under all the circumstances, to compel a reasonable person of the same background and in the same circumstances as the complainant to comply.

"Commercial sex act" means any sexual act or sexual contact on account of which or for which anything of value is given to, promised to, or received by any person.

"Comparable offense" means an offense committed against the District of Columbia, a state, a federally-recognized Indian tribe, or the United States and its territories, with elements that would necessarily prove the elements of a corresponding current District offense.

"Complainant" means person who is alleged to have been subjected to the criminal offense.

"Conduct element" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-201.

"Consent" means a word or act that:

(A) Indicates, explicitly or implicitly, agreement to particular conduct or a particular result; and

(B) Is not given by a person who:

(i) Is legally unable to authorize the conduct charged to constitute the offense or to the result thereof; or

(ii) Because of youth, mental disability, or intoxication, is unable to make a reasonable judgment as to the nature or harmfulness of the conduct to constitute the offense or to the result thereof; and

(C) Has not been withdrawn, explicitly or implicitly, by a subsequent word or act.

"Controlled substance" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 48–901.02.

"Correctional facility" means any building or building grounds located in the District of Columbia, operated by the Department of Corrections, for the secure confinement of persons charged with or convicted of a criminal offense.

"Counterfeit mark" means any trademark, service mark, trade name, label, term, picture, seal, word, or advertisement or any combination of these adopted or used by a person to identify such person's goods or services and which is lawfully filed for record in the Office of the Secretary of State of any state or which the exclusive right to reproduce is guaranteed under the laws of the United States or the District of Columbia, that is used without the permission of the owner of the trademark, service mark, trade name, label, term, picture, seal, word, or advertisement.

"Crime of violence" means:

(A) Murder under RCC § 22E-1101;

(B) Manslaughter under RCC § 22E-1102;

(C) Robbery under RCC § 22E-1201;

(D) First degree, second degree, and third degree assault under RCC § 22E-1202(a)-(c);

(E) Enhanced first degree criminal threats under RCC § 22E-1204(a), (d)(4)(B);

(F) First degree, second degree, and third degree sexual assault under RCC § 22E-1301(a)-(c);
(G) First, second, fourth, and fifth degree sexual abuse of a minor under RCC § 22E-1302(a)-(b), (d)-(e);
(H) Kidnapping under RCC § 22E-1401;
(I) Enhanced criminal restraint under RCC § 22E-1402(a), (d)(2);
(J) First and second degree criminal abuse of a minor under RCC § 22E-1501(a)-(b);
(K) First and second degree criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person under RCC § 22E-1503(a)-(b);
(L) Forced labor under RCC § 22E-1601;
(M) Forced commercial sex under RCC § 22E-1602;
(N) Trafficking in labor under RCC § 22E-1603;
(O) Trafficking in forced commercial sex under RCC § 22E-1604;
(P) Sex trafficking of a minor or adult incapable of consenting under RCC § 22E-1605;
(Q) [Reserved. Acts of terrorism under RCC § 22E-1701;]
(R) [Reserved. Manufacture or possession of a weapon of mass destruction under RCC § 22E-1702;]
(S) [Reserved. Use, dissemination, or detonation of a weapon of mass destruction under RCC § 22E-1703;]
(T) Enhanced first degree and enhanced second degree burglary under RCC § 22E-2701(a)-(b), (d)(4); or
(U) For any of the offenses described in subparagraphs (A)-(T) of this paragraph, a criminal attempt under RCC § 22E-301, a criminal solicitation under RCC § 22E-302, or a criminal conspiracy under RCC § 22E-303.

"Culpability required" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-201.

"Culpable mental state" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-205.

"Dangerous weapon" means:
(A) A firearm;
(B) A restricted explosive;
(C) A knife with a blade longer than 3 inches, sword, razor, stiletto, dagger, or dirk; or
(D) A blackjack, billy club, slungshot, sand club, sandbag, or false knuckles;
(E) A stun gun; or
(F) Any object, other than a body part or stationary object, that in the manner of its actual, attempted, or threatened use is likely to cause death or serious bodily injury to a person.

"Deadly force" means any physical force that is likely to cause serious bodily injury or death.

"Debt bondage" means the status or condition of a person who provides services or commercial sex acts, for a real or alleged debt, where:

(A) The value of the services or commercial sex acts, as reasonably assessed, is not applied toward the liquidation of the debt;

(B) The length and nature of the services or commercial sex acts are not respectively limited and defined; or

(C) The amount of the debt does not reasonably reflect the value of the items or services for which the debt was incurred.

"Deceive" and other parts of speech, including "deception," mean:

(A) To create or reinforce a false impression as to a material fact, including a false impression as to an intention to perform future actions;

(B) Preventing another person from acquiring material information;

(C) Failing to correct a false impression as to a material fact, including false impressions as to intention, which the person previously created or reinforced, or which influences another to whom they stand in a fiduciary or confidential relationship; or

(D) For offenses under Subtitle III of this title, failing to disclose a lien, adverse claim, or other legal impediment to the enjoyment of property which they transfer or encumber in consideration for property, whether or not it is a matter of official record; provided that under subparagraphs (A)-(D) of this paragraph:

(i) The term does not include puffing statements that are unlikely to deceive ordinary persons; and

(ii) Deception as to a person's intention to perform a future act shall not be inferred from the fact alone that they did not subsequently perform the act.

"Demonstration" means an act of marching, congregating, standing, sitting, lying down, parading, or patrolling by one or more persons, with or without signs, with the desire to persuade one or more individuals, or the public, or to protest some action, attitude, or belief.

"Deprive" means:

(A) Withhold property or cause it to be withheld from an owner permanently, or for so extended a period or under such circumstances that a substantial portion of its value or its benefit is lost to the owner; or

(B) Dispose of the property, or use or deal with the property so as to make it unlikely that the owner will recover it.

"Detection device" means any wearable equipment with location tracking capability, including global positioning system and radio frequency identification technologies.

"District official" has the same meaning as "public official" in D.C. Code § 1-1161.01(47)(A) - (H).

"Domestic partner" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 32-701(3).

"Domestic partnership" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 32-701(4).

"Dwelling" means a structure that at the time of the offense is either designed or actually used for lodging or residing overnight, including, in multi-unit buildings, communal areas secured from the general public.

"Effective consent" means consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception.

"Elderly person" means a person who is 65 years of age or older.

"Factual cause" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-204.

"Fair market value" means the price which a purchaser who is willing but not obligated to buy would pay an owner who is willing but not obligated to sell, considering all the uses to which the property is adapted and might reasonably be applied.

"False knuckles" means an object, whether made of metal, wood, plastic, or other similarly durable material that is constructed of one piece, the outside part of which is designed to fit over and cover the fingers on a hand and the inside part of which is designed to be gripped by the fist.

"Felony" means:

(A) An offense punishable by a term of imprisonment that is more than one year;
(B) In other jurisdictions, an offense punishable by death; or
(C) First or Second Degree Parental Kidnapping under RCC § 16-1022.

"Financial injury" means the reasonable monetary costs, debts, or obligations incurred by a natural person as a result of a criminal act, including:

(A) The costs of clearing a name, debt, credit rating, credit history, criminal record, or any other official record;
(B) The costs of repairing or replacing any property that was taken or damaged;
(C) Medical bills;
(D) Relocation costs;
(E) Lost wages or compensation; and
(F) Attorneys' fees.

"Firearm" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 7-2501.01, except that in Chapter 41 of this title the term "firearm":

(A) Shall not include a firearm frame or receiver;
(B) Shall not include a firearm muffler or silencer; and
(C) Shall include operable antique pistols.

"Firearms instructor" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 7-2501.01.

"Ghost gun" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 7-2501.01.

"Halfway house" means any building or building grounds located in the District of Columbia that are used for the confinement of persons participating in a work release program under D.C. Code § 24-241.01.

"Health professional" means a person required to obtain a District license, registration, or certification in D.C. Code § 3-1205.01.

"Healthcare provider" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 16-2801.

"Homelessness" means the status or circumstance of an individual who:

(A) Lacks a fixed, regular, and adequate nighttime residence; or

(B) Has a primary nighttime residence that is:

(i) A supervised, publicly or privately operated shelter designed to provide temporary living accommodations, including motels, hotels, congregate shelters, and transitional housing for persons with a mental illness;

(ii) An institution that provides a temporary residence for individuals expected to be institutionalized; or

(iii) A public or private place not designed for, or ordinarily used as, a regular sleeping accommodation for human beings.

"Image" means a visual depiction, other than a depiction rendered by hand, including a video, film, photograph, or hologram, whether in print, electronic, magnetic, digital, or other format.

"Imitation dangerous weapon" means an object used or fashioned in a manner that would cause a reasonable person to believe that the object is a dangerous weapon.

"Imitation firearm" means any instrument that resembles an actual firearm closely enough that a person observing it might reasonably believe it to be real.

"In fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207.

"Incapacitated individual" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 21-2011.

"Innocent or irresponsible person" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-211.

"Intentionally" and other parts of speech, including "intent," have the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206.

"Intoxication" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-209.

"Knowingly" and other parts of speech, including "know," "known," "knows," "knowing," and "knowledge," have the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206.

"Labor" means work that has economic or financial value.

"Large capacity ammunition feeding device" means a magazine, belt, drum, feed strip, or similar device that has a capacity of, or that can be readily restored or converted to accept, more than 10 rounds of ammunition. The term "large capacity ammunition feeding device" shall not include an attached tubular device designed to accept, and capable of operating only with, .22 caliber rimfire ammunition.

"Law enforcement officer" means:

(A) An officer or member of the Metropolitan Police Department of the District of Columbia, or of any other police force operating in the District of Columbia;
(B) An investigative officer or agent of the United States;
(C) An on-duty, civilian employee of the Metropolitan Police Department;
(D) An on-duty, licensed special police officer;
(E) An on-duty, licensed campus police officer;
(F) An on-duty employee of the Department of Corrections or Department of Youth Rehabilitation Services; or
(G) An on-duty employee of the Court Services and Offender Supervision Agency, Pretrial Services Agency, or Family Court Social Services Division.

"Legal cause" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-204.

"Live broadcast" means a streaming video, or any other electronically transmitted image, for simultaneous viewing by an audience, including an audience of one person.

"Live performance" means a play, dance, or other visual presentation or exhibition for an audience, including an audience of one person.

"Machine gun" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 7-2501.01.

"Misdemeanor" means an offense punishable by a term of imprisonment that is one year or less.

"Monitoring equipment or software" means equipment or software with location tracking capability, including global positioning system and radio frequency identification technologies.

"Motor vehicle" means any automobile, all-terrain vehicle, self-propelled mobile home, motorcycle, truck, truck tractor with or without a semitrailer or trailer, bus, or other vehicle designed to be propelled only by an internal-combustion engine or electricity.

"Movie theater" means a theater, auditorium, or other venue that is being utilized primarily for the exhibition of a motion picture to the public.

"Negligently" and other parts of speech, including "negligent" and "negligence," have the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206.

"Objective element" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-201.

"Obscene" means:

(A) Appealing to a prurient interest in sex, under contemporary community standards and considered as a whole;
(B) Patently offensive; and
(C) Lacking serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value, considered as a whole.

"Offense element" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-201.

"Official custody" means full submission after an arrest or substantial physical restraint after an arrest.

"Omission" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-202.

"Open to the general public" means a location:

(A) To which the public is invited; and
(B) For which no payment, membership, affiliation, appointment, or special permission is required for an adult to enter, other than proof of age or a security screening.

"Owner" means a person holding an interest in property with which the actor is not privileged to interfere without consent.

"Payment card" means an instrument of any kind, whether tangible or digital, including an instrument that is a credit card or debit card, that is issued for use by the cardholder to obtain or pay for property, or the number inscribed on such a card.

"Pecuniary gain" means before-tax profit that is monetary or readily measurable in money, including additional revenue or cost savings.

"Pecuniary loss" means actual harm that is monetary or readily measurable in money.

"Person," in Subtitle III of this Title, means an individual, whether living or dead, as well as a trust, estate, fiduciary, partnership, company, corporation, association, organization, union, government, government agency, or government-owned corporation, or any other legal entity, notwithstanding the definition in D.C. Code § 45-604.

"Person acting in the place of a parent under civil law" means:

(A) A person who has put themselves in the situation of a lawful parent by assuming the obligations incident to the parental relation without going through the formalities necessary to legal adoption; or
(B) A person acting by, through, or under the direction of a court with jurisdiction over the child.

"Person with legal authority over the complainant" means:
(A) When the complainant is a person under 18 years of age:
(i) A parent, or a person acting in the place of a parent under civil law, who is responsible for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant; or
(ii) Someone who is acting with the effective consent of such a parent or such a person; or
(B) When the complainant is an incapacitated individual:
(i) A court-appointed guardian to the complainant; or
(ii) Someone who is acting with the effective consent of such a guardian.

"Personal identifying information" means:
(A) Name, address, telephone number, date of birth, or mother's maiden name;
(B) Driver's license or driver's license number, or non-driver's license or non-driver's license number;
(C) Savings, checking, or other financial account number;
(D) Social security number or tax identification number;
(E) Passport or passport number;
(F) Citizenship status, visa, or alien registration card or number;
(G) Birth certificate or a facsimile of a birth certificate;
(H) Credit or debit card, or credit or debit card number;
(I) Credit history or credit rating;
(J) Signature;
(K) Personal identification number, electronic identification number, password, access code or device, electronic address, electronic identification number, routing information or code, digital signature, or telecommunication identifying information;
(L) Biometric data, such as fingerprint, voice print, retina or iris image, or other unique physical representation;
(M) Place of employment, employment history, or employee identification number; and
(N) Any other numbers or information that can be used to access a person's financial resources, access medical information, obtain identification, serve as identification, or obtain property.

"Physically following" means maintaining close proximity to a person, near enough to see or hear the person's activities as they move from one location to another.

"Physically monitoring" means being in close proximity to a person's residence, workplace, or school to detect the person's whereabouts or activities.

"Pistol" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 7-2501.01.

"Position of trust with or authority over" means a relationship to a complainant that is:

(A) A parent, grandparent, great-grandparent, sibling, or a parent's sibling, or an individual with whom such a person is in a romantic, dating, or sexual relationship, whether related by:
  (i) Blood or adoption; or
  (ii) Marriage, domestic partnership, either while the marriage or domestic partnership creating the relationship exists, or after such marriage or domestic partnership ends;

(B) A half-sibling related by blood;

(C) A person acting in the place of a parent under civil law, the current spouse or domestic partner of such a person, or an individual with whom such a person is in a romantic, dating, or sexual relationship;

(D) Any person, at least 4 years older than the complainant, who resides intermittently or permanently in the same dwelling as the complainant;

(E) A religious leader described in D.C. Code § 14-309;

(F) A coach, not including a coach who is a secondary school student; a teacher, counselor, principal, administrator, nurse, or security officer, provided that such an actor is an employee, contractor, or volunteer at the school at which the complainant is enrolled or at a school where the complainant receives educational services or attends educational programming;

(G) Any employee, contractor, or volunteer of a school, religious institution, or an educational, social, recreational, athletic, musical, charitable, or youth facility, organization, or program, that exercises supervisory or disciplinary authority over the complainant; or

(H) A person responsible under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant.

"Possess," and other parts of speech, including "possesses," "possessing," and "possession," mean:

(A) To hold or carry on one's person; or

(B) To have the ability and desire to exercise control over.

"Prior conviction" means a final order by any court of the District of Columbia, a state, a federally-recognized Indian tribe, or the United States and its territories, that enters judgment of guilt for a criminal offense. The term "prior conviction" does not include:

(A) An adjudication of juvenile delinquency;

(B) Probation under D.C. Code § 48-904.01(e);

(C) A conviction that has been reversed, vacated, sealed, or expunged; or

(D) A conviction for which a person has been granted a pardon.

"Property" means anything of value and includes:

(A) Real property, including things growing on, affixed to, or found on land;

(B) Tangible or intangible personal property, including an animal;

(C) Services;
(D) Credit;
(E) Money, or any paper or document that evidences ownership in or of property, an interest in or a claim to wealth, or a debt owed; and
(F) A government-issued license, permit, or benefit.

"Property of another" means any property that a person has an interest in with which the actor is not privileged to interfere without consent, regardless of whether the actor also has an interest in that property. The term "property of another" does not include any property in the possession of the actor with which the other person has only a security interest.

"Protected person" means:
(A) A person who is under 18 years of age and at least 4 years younger than an actor who is 18 years of age or older;
(B) A person who is 65 years of age or older and at least 10 years older than an actor who is under 65 years of age;
(C) A vulnerable adult;
(D) A law enforcement officer, while in the course of their official duties;
(E) A public safety employee, while in the course of their official duties;
(F) A transportation worker, while in the course of their official duties; or
(G) A District official, while in the course of their official duties.

"Public conveyance" means any government-operated air, land, or water vehicle used for the transportation of persons, including any airplane, train, bus, or boat.

"Public official" means a government employee, government contractor, law enforcement officer, or public official as defined in D.C. Code § 1-1161.01(47).

"Public safety employee" means:
(A) An on-duty District of Columbia firefighter, emergency medical technician/ paramedic, emergency medical technician/intermediate paramedic, or emergency medical technician;
(B) Any other on-duty firefighter, emergency medical technician/ paramedic, emergency medical technician/intermediate paramedic, or emergency medical technician operating in the District of Columbia; or
(C) An on-duty District of Columbia investigator, vehicle inspection officer as defined in D.C. Code § 50-301.03(30B), or code inspector.

"Purposely" and other parts of speech, including "purpose," have the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206.

"Rail transit station" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 35-251.

"Recklessly" and other parts of speech, including "reckless" and "recklessness," have the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206.

"Recording device" means a photographic or video camera, audio recorder, or any other device that is later developed that may be used for recording sounds or images or both.

"Restricted explosive" means any device that is designed to explode or produce uncontained combustion upon impact, including a breakable container containing flammable liquid and having a wick or a similar device capable of being ignited, but excluding any device that is lawfully and commercially manufactured primarily for the purpose of illumination, construction work, or other lawful purpose.

"Result element" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-201.

"Retail value" means the actor's regular selling price for the item or service bearing or identified by the counterfeit mark. In the case of items bearing a counterfeit mark which are components of a finished product, the retail value shall be the actor's regular selling price of the finished product on or in which the component would be utilized.

"Revoked or canceled" means that notice, in writing, of revocation or cancellation either was received by the named holder, as shown on the payment card, or was recorded by the issuer.

"Sadomasochistic abuse" means flagellation, torture, or physical restraint by or upon a person as an act of sexual stimulation or gratification.

"Sawed-off shotgun" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 7-2501.01.

"Secure juvenile detention facility" means any building or building grounds, whether located in the District of Columbia or elsewhere, operated by the Department of Youth Rehabilitation Services for the secure confinement of persons committed to the Department of Youth Rehabilitation Services.

"Self-induced intoxication" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-209.

"Serious bodily injury" means a bodily injury or significant bodily injury that involves:

(A) A substantial risk of death;
(B) Protracted and obvious disfigurement;
(C) Protracted loss or impairment of the function of a bodily member or organ; or
(D) Protracted loss of consciousness.

"Serious mental injury" means substantial, prolonged harm to a person's psychological or intellectual functioning, that may be exhibited by severe anxiety, depression, withdrawal, or outwardly aggressive behavior, or a combination of those behaviors, and that may be demonstrated by a change in behavior, emotional response, or cognition.

"Services" includes:

(A) Labor, whether professional or nonprofessional;

(B) The use of vehicles or equipment;
(C) Transportation, telecommunications, energy, water, sanitation, or other public utility services, whether provided by a private or governmental entity;
(D) The supplying of food, beverage, lodging, or other accommodation in hotels, restaurants, or elsewhere;
(E) Admission to public exhibitions or places of entertainment; and
(F) Educational and hospital services, accommodations, and other related services.

"Sexual act" means:
(A) Penetration, however slight, of the anus or vulva of any person by a penis;
(B) Contact between the mouth of any person and another person's penis, vulva, or anus;
(C) Penetration, however slight, of the anus or vulva of any person by any body part or by any object, with the desire to sexually abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, arouse, or gratify any person, or at the direction of someone with such a desire; or
(D) Conduct described in subparagraphs (A)-(C) of this paragraph between a person and an animal.

"Sexual contact" means:
(A) Sexual act; or
(B) Touching of the clothed or unclothed genitalia, anus, groin, breast, inner thigh, or buttocks of any person:
(i) With any clothed or unclothed body part or any object, either directly or through the clothing; and
(ii) With the desire to sexually abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, arouse, or gratify any person, or at the direction of someone with such a desire.

"Significant bodily injury" means a bodily injury that, to prevent long-term physical damage or to abate severe pain, requires hospitalization or immediate medical treatment beyond what a layperson can personally administer, and, in addition, the following injuries constitute at least a significant bodily injury: a fracture of a bone; a laceration that is at least one inch in length and at least one quarter of an inch in depth; a burn of at least second degree severity; a brief loss of consciousness; a traumatic brain injury; and a contusion, petechia, or other bodily injury to the neck or head sustained during strangulation or suffocation.

"Significant emotional distress" means substantial, ongoing mental suffering that may require medical or other professional treatment or counseling, and must rise significantly above the level of uneasiness, nervousness, unhappiness, or similar feeling, that is commonly experienced in day to day living.

"Simulated" means feigned or pretended in a way that realistically duplicates the appearance of actual conduct.

"Sound recording" means a material object in which sounds, other than those accompanying a motion picture or other audiovisual recording, are fixed by any method now existing or later developed, from which the sounds can be perceived, reproduced, or otherwise communicated, either directly or with the aid of a machine or device.

"Speech" means oral or written language, symbols, or gestures.

"Strangulation or suffocation" means a restriction of normal breathing or circulation of the blood by applying pressure on the throat or neck or by blocking the nose or mouth.

"Strict liability" or "strictly liable" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-205.

"Stun gun" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 7-2501.01.

"Transportation worker" means:

(A) A person who is licensed to operate, and is operating, a publicly or privately owned or operated commercial vehicle for the carriage of 6 or more passengers, including any Metrobus, Metrorail, Metroaccess, or DC Circulator vehicle or other bus, trolley, or van operating within the District of Columbia;

(B) Any Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority employee who is assigned to supervise a Metrorail station from a kiosk at that station within the District of Columbia; and

(C) A person who is licensed to operate, and is operating, a taxicab within the District of Columbia; and

(D) A person who is licensed to operate, and is operating within the District of Columbia, a personal motor vehicle to provide private vehicle-for-hire service in contract with a private vehicle-for-hire company as defined in D.C. Code § 50-301.03(16B).

"Undue influence" means mental, emotional, or physical coercion that overcomes the free will or judgment of a person and causes the person to act in a manner that is inconsistent with the person's financial, emotional, mental, or physical well-being.

"Value" means:

(A) The fair market value of property at the time and place of the offense; or

(B) If the fair market value cannot be ascertained:

(i) For property other than a written instrument, the cost to replace the property within a reasonable time after the offense;

(ii) For a written instrument constituting evidence of debt, such as a check, draft, or promissory note, the amount due or collectible thereon, that figure ordinarily being the face amount of the indebtedness less any portion that has been satisfied; and

(iii) For any other written instrument that creates, releases, discharges, or otherwise affects any valuable legal right, privilege, or obligation, the greatest amount of economic loss that the owner of the instrument might reasonably suffer by virtue of the loss of the written instrument.

(C) Notwithstanding subparagraphs (A) and (B) of this paragraph, the value of a payment card alone is $10.00 and the value of an unendorsed check alone is $10.00.

"Vehicle identification number" means a number or symbol that is originally inscribed or affixed by the manufacturer to a motor vehicle or motor vehicle part for identification.

"Vulnerable adult" means a person who is 18 years of age or older and has one or more physical or mental limitations that substantially impairs the person's ability to independently provide for their daily needs or safeguard their person, property, or legal interests.

"Written instrument" includes any:

(A) Security, bill of lading, document of title, draft, check, certificate of deposit, and letter of credit, as defined in Title 28 of the D.C. Code;

(B) A will, contract, deed, or any other document purporting to have legal or evidentiary significance;

(C) Stamp, legal tender, or other obligation of any domestic or foreign governmental entity;

(D) Stock certificate, money order, money order blank, traveler's check, evidence of indebtedness, certificate of interest or participation in any profit-sharing agreement, transferable share, investment contract, voting trust certificate, certification of interest in any tangible or intangible property, and any certificate or receipt for or warrant or right to subscribe to or purchase any of the foregoing items;

(E) Commercial paper or document, or any other commercial instrument containing written or printed matter or the equivalent; or

(F) Other instrument commonly called a security or so defined by an Act of Congress or a provision of the District of Columbia Official Code.

Subtitle II. Offenses Against Persons.

Chapter 11. Homicide.

RCC § 22E-1101. Murder.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree murder when the actor purposely, with premeditation and deliberation, causes the death of another person.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree murder when the actor:

(1) Knowingly causes the death of another person;

(2) Recklessly, with extreme indifference to human life, causes the death of another person; or

(3) Negligently causes the death of another person, other than an accomplice, by committing the lethal act in the course of and in furtherance of committing or attempting to commit an offense that is, in fact:
(A) First or second degree arson under RCC § 22E-2501;
(B) First degree sexual assault under RCC § 22E-1301;
(C) First or second degree sexual abuse of a minor under RCC § 22E-1302;
(D) First degree assault under RCC § 22E-1202;
(E) Enhanced first degree burglary under RCC § 22E-2701
(F) First or second degree robbery under RCC § 22E-1201;
(G) First or second degree kidnapping under RCC § 22E-1401; or
(H) First degree criminal abuse of a minor when the actor knowingly causes serious bodily injury.

(c) Self-induced intoxication. An actor shall be deemed to have consciously disregarded the risk required to prove that the actor acted with extreme indifference to human life in paragraph (b)(2) if due to self-induced intoxication, in fact, the actor was unaware of the risk, but would have been aware had the actor been sober.

(d) Penalties.
(1) First degree murder is a Class 2 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(2) Second degree murder is a Class 4 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(3) Penalty enhancements. The penalty classification of any gradation of this offense is increased by one class when the actor commits the offense and the person:
(A) Is reckless as to the fact that the decedent is a protected person;
(B) Commits the murder with the purpose of harming the decedent because of the decedent's status as a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or District official;
(C) Commits the murder with intent to avoid or prevent a lawful arrest or effecting an escape from official custody;
(D) Knowingly commits the murder for hire;
(E) Knowingly inflicts extreme physical pain or mental suffering for a prolonged period of time immediately prior to the decedent's death;
(F) Knowingly mutilates or desecrates the decedent's body;
(G) In fact, commits the murder after substantial planning;
(H) By knowingly shooting from a vehicle that is being driven at the time of the shooting; or
(I) Commits the murder with the purpose of harming the decedent because was or had been a witness in any criminal investigation or judicial proceeding, or the decedent was capable of providing or had provided assistance in any criminal investigation or judicial proceeding.

(e) Evidence of extreme pain, mental suffering, mutilation, or desecration. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, an actor charged with penalty enhancements under subparagraph (d)(3)(E) or (d)(3)(F) shall be subject to a bifurcated criminal proceeding with the same jury or fact finder serving in both stages of the proceeding. In the first stage of the proceeding, the factfinder must determine if the actor committed either first degree murder as defined under subsection (a) or second degree murder as defined under subsection (b). In the first stage of the proceeding, evidence of penalty enhancements under subparagraph (d)(3)(E) or (d)(3)(F) is inadmissible except if such evidence is relevant to determining whether the actor committed first degree murder or second degree murder. In the second stage of the proceeding, after the actor has been found guilty of either first degree murder or second degree murder, the factfinder may consider any evidence relevant to penalty enhancements under subparagraphs (d)(3)(E) or (d)(3)(F).

(f) Defenses.

(1) In addition to any defenses otherwise applicable to the actor's conduct under District law, the presence of mitigating circumstances is a defense to prosecution under subsection (a) and paragraphs (b)(1) and (b)(2) of this section. Mitigating circumstances means:

(A) Acting under the influence of an extreme emotional disturbance for which there is a reasonable cause as determined from the viewpoint of a reasonable person in the actor's situation under the circumstances as the actor believed them to be;

(B) Acting with an unreasonable belief that the use of deadly force was necessary to prevent a person from unlawfully causing imminent death or serious bodily injury to the actor or another person; or

(C) Any other legally-recognized partial defense which substantially diminishes either the actor's culpability or the wrongfulness of the actor's conduct.

(2) Effect of mitigation defense. If the government fails to prove the absence of mitigating circumstances beyond a reasonable doubt, but proves all other elements of murder, the actor is not guilty of murder, but is guilty of voluntary manslaughter.

(g) No accomplice liability for felony murder. Notwithstanding RCC § 22E-210, no person shall be liable as an accomplice to second degree murder under paragraph (b)(3) of this section.

(h) Felony murder merger. Multiple convictions for second degree murder under paragraph (b)(3) and another offense listed in subparagraphs (b)(3)(A) – (b)(3)(H) of this section merge when arising from the same act or course of conduct and the sentencing court shall follow the procedures specified in subsections (b) and (c) of RCC § 22E-214.

(i) Definitions. The term "act" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-202; the terms "intent," "intentionally," "knowingly," "negligently," "purpose," "purposely," "reckless," and "recklessly" have the meanings specified in RCC

§ 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the term "self-induced intoxication" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-209; and the terms "actor," "deadly force," "District official," "law enforcement officer," "official custody," "protected person," "public safety employee," and "serious bodily injury" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-1102. Manslaughter.

(a) Voluntary manslaughter. An actor commits voluntary manslaughter when the actor:
  (1) Knowingly causes the death of another person;
  (2) Recklessly, with extreme indifference for human life, causes death of another person; or
  (3) Negligently causes the death of another person, other than an accomplice, by committing the lethal act in the course of and in furtherance of committing or attempting to commit an offense that is, in fact:
    (A) First or second degree arson under RCC § 22E-2501;
    (B) First degree sexual assault under RCC § 22E-1301;
    (C) First or second degree sexual abuse of a minor under RCC § 22E-1302;
    (D) First degree assault under RCC § 22E-1202;
    (E) Enhanced first degree burglary under RCC § 22E-2701
    (F) First or second degree robbery under RCC § 22E-1201;
    (G) First or second degree kidnapping under RCC § 22E-1401; or
    (H) First degree criminal abuse of a minor when the actor knowingly causes serious bodily injury.

(b) Involuntary manslaughter. An actor commits involuntary manslaughter when the actor recklessly causes the death of another person.

(c) Self-induced intoxication. An actor shall be deemed to have consciously disregarded the risk required to prove that the person acted with extreme indifference to human life in paragraph (a)(2) if due to self-induced intoxication, in fact, the actor was unaware of the risk, but would have been aware had the actor been sober.

(d) Penalties.
  (1) Voluntary manslaughter is a Class 5 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
  (2) Involuntary manslaughter is a Class 7 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
  (3) Penalty enhancements. The penalty classification for voluntary manslaughter and involuntary manslaughter is increased by one class when the actor commits the offense:
    (A) Reckless as to the fact that the decedent is a protected person; or

(B) With the purpose of harming the decedent because of the decedent's status as a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or District official.

(e) No accomplice liability for felony murder. Notwithstanding RCC § 22E-210, no person shall be liable as an accomplice to voluntary manslaughter under paragraph (a)(3) of this section.

(f) Felony murder merger. Multiple convictions for voluntary manslaughter under paragraph (a)(3) and another offense listed in subparagraphs (a)(3)(A) – (a)(3)(H) of this section merge when arising from the same act or course of conduct and the sentencing court shall follow the procedures specified in subsections (b) and (c) of RCC § 22E-214.

(g) Definitions. The term "act" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-202; the terms "intends," "intentionally," "knowingly," "negligently," "purpose," "reckless," and "recklessly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the term "self-induced intoxication" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-209; and the terms "actor," "District official," "law enforcement officer," "protected person," "public safety employee," and "serious bodily injury" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-1103. Negligent Homicide.

(a) Offense. An actor commits negligent homicide when the actor negligently causes the death of another person.

(b) Penalties. Negligent homicide is a Class 8 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(c) Definitions. The term "negligently" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; and the term "actor" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-701.

Chapter 12. Robbery, Assault, and Threats.

RCC § 22E-1201. Robbery.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree robbery when the actor:

(1) Knowingly takes or exercises control over the property of another that the complainant possesses within the complainant's immediate physical control by:

(A) Causing bodily injury to the complainant or another person physically present;

(B) Communicating, explicitly or implicitly, that the actor immediately will cause the complainant or another person physically present to suffer bodily injury, a sexual act, a sexual contact, confinement, or death;

(C) Applying physical force that moves or immobilizes another person present; or

(D) Removing property from the hand or arms of the complainant;

(2) With intent to deprive the complainant of the property; and
(3) In the course of the robbery, recklessly causes serious bodily injury another person, other than an accomplice.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree robbery when the actor:
(1) Knowingly takes or exercises control over the property of another that the complainant possesses within the complainant's immediate physical control by:
(A) Causing bodily injury to another person physically present;
(B) Communicating, explicitly or implicitly, that the actor immediately will cause the complainant or another person present to suffer bodily injury, a sexual act, a sexual contact, confinement, or death;
(C) Applying physical force that moves or immobilizes another person present; or
(D) Removing property from the hand or arms of the complainant
(2) With intent to deprive the complainant of the property; and
(3) Either:
(A) In the course of the robbery, recklessly causes significant bodily injury to another person, other than an accomplice; or
(B) In fact:
(i) The property is a motor vehicle; or
(ii) The property has a value of $5,000 or more.

(c) Third degree. An actor commits third degree robbery when the actor:
(1) Knowingly takes or exercises control over the property of another that the complainant possesses within the complainant's immediate physical control by:
(A) Causing bodily injury to the complainant or another person present;
(B) Communicating to the complainant, explicitly or implicitly, that the actor immediately will cause the complainant or another person present to suffer bodily injury, a sexual act, a sexual contact, confinement, or death;
(C) Applying physical force that moves or immobilizes another person present; or
(D) Removing property from the hand or arms of the complainant;
(2) With intent to deprive the complainant of the property.

(d) Affirmative defense. It is an affirmative defense to criminal liability under this section that, in fact, the actor reasonably believes that an owner of the property gives effective consent to the actor to take or exercise control over the property.

(e) Penalties.
(1) First degree robbery is a Class 6 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(2) Second degree robbery is a Class 8 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(3) Third degree robbery is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(4) Penalty enhancements. The penalty classification for first degree robbery is increased in severity by one class when the actor commits the offense:

(A) Reckless as to the fact that the complainant is a protected person; or

(B) By using or displaying what is, in fact, a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon.

(5) Penalty enhancements. The penalty classification of second and third degree robbery is increased by:

(A) One class when the actor commits the offense:

(i) Reckless as to the fact that the complainant is a protected person; or

(ii) Under sub-paragraphs (b)(3)(B), (c)(1)(B), (c)(1)(C), or (c)(1)(D) by using or displaying what is, in fact, a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon; or

(B) Two classes when the actor commits the offense under sub-paragraph (b)(3)(A) or sub-paragraph (c)(1)(A) by recklessly displaying or using what, in fact, is a dangerous weapon and the display or use of the dangerous weapon directly or indirectly causes the injury to the complainant.

(f) Definitions. The terms "intent," "knowingly," "reckless," and "recklessly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the terms "actor," "bodily injury," "complainant," "dangerous weapon," "effective consent," "deprive," "imitation dangerous weapon," "motor vehicle," "owner," "possesses," "property," "property of another," "protected person," "serious bodily injury," "sexual act," "sexual contact," "significant bodily injury," and "value" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-1202. Assault.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree assault when the actor purposely:

(1) Causes serious and permanent disfigurement to the complainant; or

(2) Destroys, amputates, or permanently disables a member or organ of the complainant's body.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree assault when the actor recklessly, with extreme indifference to human life, causes serious bodily injury to the complainant.

(c) Third degree. An actor commits third degree assault when the actor recklessly causes significant bodily injury to the complainant.

(d) Fourth degree. An actor commits fourth degree assault when the actor recklessly causes bodily injury to the complainant.

(e) Exclusion from liability. An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor's conduct is specifically permitted by a District statute or regulation.

(f) Defenses.

(1) It is a defense to liability under subsections (a) and (b) of this section that, in fact:

(A) The injury is caused by a lawful cosmetic or medical procedure;

(B) The actor is not a person with legal authority over the complainant; and

(C) The actor reasonably believes that:

(i) The complainant is 18 years of age or older, and the complainant, or a person with legal authority over the complainant acting consistent with that authority, gives effective consent to the actor to cause the injury;

(ii) The complainant is under 18 years of age and:

(I) The actor is 18 years of age or older; and

(II) A person with legal authority over the complainant acting consistent with that authority gives effective consent to the actor to cause the injury; or

(iii) The complainant is under 18 years of age and:

(I) The actor is under 18 years of age; and

(II) The complainant gives effective consent to the actor to cause the injury.

(2) It is a defense to liability under subsections (c) and (d) of this section that, in fact:

(A) The actor is not a person with legal authority over the complainant; and

(B) The actor reasonably believes that:

(i) The complainant is 18 years of age or older, and the complainant, or a person with legal authority over the complainant acting consistent with that authority, gives effective consent to the actor either to cause the injury or to engage in a lawful sport, occupation, or other concerted activity, and the actor's infliction of the injury is a reasonably foreseeable hazard of that activity;

(ii) The complainant is under 18 years of age and:

(I) The actor is 18 years of age or older and is more than four years older than the complainant; and

(II) A person with legal authority over the complainant acting consistent with that authority gives effective consent to the actor either to cause the injury or to engage in a lawful sport, occupation, or other concerted activity, and the actor's infliction of the injury is a reasonably foreseeable hazard of that activity; or

(iii) The complainant is under 18 years of age and:

(I) The actor is either under 18 years of age or is 18 years of age or older and not more four years older than the complainant; and

(II) The complainant gives effective consent to the actor to either to cause the injury or to engage in a lawful sport, occupation, or other concerted activity, and the actor's infliction of the injury is a reasonably foreseeable hazard of that activity.

(g) Self-induced intoxication. An actor shall be deemed to have consciously disregarded the risk required to prove the actor acted with extreme indifference to human life in subsection (b) of this section if due to self-induced intoxication, in fact, the actor was unaware of the risk, but would have been aware had the actor been sober.

(h) Penalties.

(1) First degree assault is a Class 6 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(2) Second degree assault is a Class 7 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(3) Third degree assault is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(4) Fourth degree assault is a Class B crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(5) Penalty enhancements. The penalty classification of second degree assault is increased by one class when the actor commits the offense:

(A) Reckless as to the fact that the complainant is a protected person;

(B) By displaying or using what, in fact, is a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon; or

(C) With the purpose of harming the complainant because of the complainant's status as a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or District official.

(6) Penalty enhancements. The penalty classification of third degree assault is increased by:

(A) One class when the actor commits the offense:

(i) Reckless as to the fact that the complainant is a protected person;

(ii) By displaying or using what, in fact, is an imitation dangerous weapon; or

(iii) With the purpose of harming the complainant because of the complainant's status as a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or District official; or

(B) Two classes when the actor commits the offense by recklessly displaying or using what, in fact, is a dangerous weapon.

(7) Penalty enhancements. The penalty classification of fourth degree assault is increased by:

(A) One class when the actor commits the offense:

(i) Reckless as to the fact that the complainant is a protected person;

(ii) By recklessly displaying or using what, in fact, is an imitation dangerous weapon; or

(iii) With the purpose of harming the complainant because of the complainant's status as a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or District official; or

(B) Three classes when the actor commits the offense by recklessly displaying or using what, in fact, is a dangerous weapon.

(i) Definitions. The terms "purpose," "purposely," "reckless," and "recklessly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the term "self-induced intoxication" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-209; and the terms "actor," "bodily injury," "complainant," "dangerous weapon," "District official," "effective consent," "imitation dangerous weapon," "law enforcement officer," "person with legal authority over the complainant," "protected person," "public safety employee," "serious bodily injury," and "significant bodily injury" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-1204. Criminal Threats.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree criminal threats when the actor:

(1) Knowingly communicates to a person other than a co-conspirator or accomplice, explicitly or implicitly, that the actor immediately will cause the complainant or another person to suffer a criminal death, serious bodily injury, sexual act, or confinement;

(2) With intent that the communication be perceived as a serious expression that the actor would cause the harm; and

(3) In fact, the communication would cause a reasonable person in the complainant's circumstances to believe that the harm would occur.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree criminal threats when the actor:

(1) Knowingly communicates to a person other than a co-conspirator or accomplice, explicitly or implicitly, that the actor will cause the complainant or another person to suffer a criminal bodily injury or sexual contact;

(2) With intent that the communication be perceived as a serious expression that the actor would cause the harm; and

(3) In fact, the communication would cause a reasonable person in the complainant's circumstances to believe that the harm would occur.

(c) Third degree. An actor commits third degree criminal threats when the actor:

(1) Knowingly communicates to a person other than a co-conspirator or accomplice, explicitly or implicitly, that the actor will cause the complainant or another person to suffer a criminal loss or damage to property;
(2) With intent that the communication be perceived as a serious expression that the actor would cause the harm; and
(3) In fact, the communication would cause a reasonable person in the complainant's circumstances to believe that the harm would occur.

(d) Penalties.
(1) First degree criminal threats is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(2) Second degree criminal threats is a Class B crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(3) Third degree criminal threats is a Class C crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(4) Penalty enhancements. The penalty classification of any gradation of this offense is increased by one class when the actor commits the offense:
(A) Reckless as to the fact that the complainant is a protected person;
(B) By displaying or using what, in fact, is a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon; or
(C) With the purpose of harming the complainant because of the complainant's status as a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or District official.

(e) Definitions. The terms "intent," "knowingly," "purpose," and "reckless" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "bodily injury," "complainant," "dangerous weapon," "District official," "imitation dangerous weapon," "law enforcement officer," "property," "protected person," "public safety employee," "serious bodily injury," "sexual act," and "sexual contact" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-1205. Offensive Physical Contact.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree offensive physical contact when the actor:
(1) Knowingly causes the complainant to come into physical contact with bodily fluid or excrement;
(2) With intent that the physical contact be offensive to the complainant; and
(3) In fact, a reasonable person in the situation of the complainant would regard it as offensive.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree offensive physical contact when the actor:

(1) Knowingly causes the complainant to come into physical contact with any person or any object or substance;
(2) With intent that the physical contact be offensive to the complainant; and
(3) In fact, a reasonable person in the situation of the complainant would regard it as offensive.

(c) Exclusion from liability. An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor's conduct is specifically permitted by a District statute or regulation.

(d) Defense. It is a defense to liability that, in fact:
(1) The actor is not a person with legal authority over the complainant; and
(2) The actor reasonably believes that:
(A) The complainant is 18 years of age or older, and the complainant, or a person with legal authority over the complainant acting consistent with that authority, gives effective consent to the actor to:
(i) Cause the physical contact; or
(ii) Engage in a lawful sport, occupation, or other concerted activity, and the actor's infliction of the physical contact is a reasonably foreseeable hazard of that activity;
(B) The complainant is under 18 years of age and:
(i) The actor is 18 years of age or older and is more than four years older than the complainant; and
(ii) A person with legal authority over the complainant acting consistent with that authority gives effective consent to the actor to:
(I) Cause the physical contact; or
(II) Engage in a lawful sport, occupation, or other concerted activity, and the actor's infliction of the physical contact is a reasonably foreseeable hazard of that activity; or
(C) The complainant is under 18 years of age and:
(i) The actor is either under 18 years of age or is 18 years of age or older and not more four years older than the complainant; and
(ii) The complainant gives effective consent to the actor to:
(I) Cause the physical contact; or
(II) Engage in a lawful sport, occupation, or other concerted activity, and the actor's infliction of the physical contact is a reasonably foreseeable hazard of that activity.

(e) Penalties.

(1) First degree offensive physical contact is a Class C crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(2) Second degree offensive physical contact is a Class D crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(3) Penalty enhancements. The penalty classification of any gradation of this offense is increased by one class when the actor commits the offense:
(A) Reckless as to the fact that the complainant is a protected person; or
(B) With the purpose of harming the complainant because of the complainant's status as a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or District official.

(f) *Definition*s. The terms "intent," "knowingly," "purpose," and "reckless" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "complainant," "District official," "effective consent," "law enforcement officer," "person with legal authority over the complainant," "protected person," and "public safety employee" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

Chapter 13. Sexual Assault and Related Provisions.

RCC § 22E-1301. Sexual Assault.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree sexual assault when the actor:
(1) Knowingly engages in a sexual act with the complainant or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act;
(2) In one or more of the following ways:
(A) By causing bodily injury to the complainant, or by using physical force that moves or immobilizes the complainant;
(B) By communicating to the complainant, explicitly or implicitly, that the actor will cause:
(i) The complainant to suffer a bodily injury, confinement or death; or
(ii) A third party to suffer a bodily injury, sexual act, sexual contact, confinement, or death; or
(C) By administering or causing to be administered to the complainant, without the complainant's effective consent, a drug, intoxicant, or other substance:
(i) With intent to impair the complainant's ability to express willingness or unwillingness to engage in the sexual act; and
(ii) In fact, the drug, intoxicant, or other substance renders the complainant:

(I) Asleep, unconscious, substantially paralyzed, or passing in and out of consciousness;
(II) Substantially incapable of appraising the nature of the sexual act; or
(III) Substantially incapable of communicating willingness or unwillingness to engage in the sexual act.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree sexual assault when the actor:
(1) Knowingly engages in a sexual act with the complainant or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act;
(2) In one or more of the following ways:
(A) By making a coercive threat, explicit or implicit; or
(B) When the complainant is:
(i) Asleep, unconscious, or passing in and out of consciousness;
(ii) Incapable of appraising the nature of the sexual act or of understanding the right to give or withhold consent to the sexual act, either due to a drug, intoxicant, or other substance, or, due to an intellectual, developmental, or mental disability or mental illness when the actor has no similarly serious disability or illness;
(iii) Incapable of communicating willingness or unwillingness to engage in the sexual act; or
(iv) Substantially paralyzed.

(c) Third degree. An actor commits third degree sexual assault when the actor:
(1) Knowingly engages in a sexual contact with the complainant or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual contact;
(2) In one or more of the following ways:
(A) By causing bodily injury to the complainant, or by using physical force that moves or immobilizes the complainant;
(B) By communicating to the complainant, explicitly or implicitly, that the actor will cause:
(i) The complainant to suffer a bodily injury, confinement or death; or
(ii) A third party to suffer a bodily injury, sexual act, sexual contact, confinement, or death; or
(C) By administering or causing to be administered to the complainant, without the complainant's effective consent, a drug, intoxicant, or other substance:
(i) With intent to impair the complainant's ability to express unwillingness to engage in the sexual contact; and
(ii) In fact, the drug, intoxicant, or other substance renders the complainant:

(I) Asleep, unconscious, substantially paralyzed, or passing in and out of consciousness;
(II) Substantially incapable of appraising the nature of the sexual contact; or
(III) Substantially incapable of communicating willingness or unwillingness to engage in the sexual contact.

(d) Fourth degree. An actor commits fourth degree sexual assault when the actor:
(1) Knowingly engages in a sexual contact with the complainant or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual contact;
(2) In one or more of the following ways:
(A) By making a coercive threat, explicit or implicit; or
(B) When the complainant is:
(i) Asleep, unconscious, or passing in and out of consciousness;
(ii) Incapable of appraising the nature of the sexual contact or of understanding the right to give or withhold consent to the sexual contact, either due to a drug, intoxicant, or other substance, or, due to an intellectual, developmental, or mental disability or mental illness when the actor has no similarly serious disability or illness;
(iii) Incapable of communicating willingness or unwillingness to engage in the sexual contact; or
(iv) Substantially paralyzed.

(e) Defense. It is a defense to liability under subparagraphs (a)(2)(A), (a)(2)(B), (b)(2)(A), (b)(2)(B), (c)(2)(A), (c)(2)(B), (d)(2)(A), and (d)(2)(B) of this section that, in fact, the actor reasonably believes that the complainant gives effective consent to the actor to engage in the conduct constituting the offense.

(f) Penalties.
(1) First degree sexual assault is a Class 4 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(2) Second degree sexual assault is a Class 5 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(3) Third degree sexual assault is a Class 7 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(4) Fourth degree sexual assault is a Class 8 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(5) Penalty enhancements. The penalty classification of any gradation of this offense is increased by one class when the actor:
(A) Recklessly causes the sexual act or sexual contact by displaying or using what is, in fact, a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon;
(B) Knowingly acts with one or more accomplices that are physically present at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact; or

(C) Recklessly causes serious bodily injury to the complainant immediately before, during, or immediately after the sexual act or sexual contact; or

(D) At the time of the sexual act or sexual contact:

(i) In fact, the complainant is under 12 years of age, and the actor is at least 4 years older than the complainant;

(ii) The actor is reckless as to the fact that the complainant is under 16 years of age and, in fact, the actor is at least 4 years older than the complainant;

(iii) The actor is reckless as to the fact that the complainant is under 18 years of age and the fact that the actor is in a position of trust with or authority over the complainant, and, in fact, the actor is at least 4 years older than the complainant;

(iv) The actor is reckless as to the fact that the complainant is 65 years of age or older and, in fact, the actor is under 65 years of age and at least 10 years younger than the complainant; or

(v) The actor is reckless as to the fact that the complainant is a vulnerable adult.

(g) Definitions. The terms "intent," "knowingly," "reckless," and "recklessly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "bodily injury," "coercive threat," "complainant," "consent," "dangerous weapon," "effective consent," "imitation dangerous weapon," "position of trust with or authority over," "serious bodily injury," "sexual act," "sexual contact," and "vulnerable adult" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-1302. Sexual Abuse of a Minor.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree sexual abuse of a minor when the actor:

(1) Knowingly engages in a sexual act with the complainant or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act; and

(2) In fact:

(A) The complainant is under 12 years of age; and

(B) The actor is at least 4 years older than the complainant.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree sexual abuse of a minor when the actor:

(1) Knowingly engages in a sexual act with the complainant or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act; and

(2) In fact:

(A) The complainant is under 16 years of age; and

(B) The actor is at least 4 years older than the complainant.

(c) Third degree. An actor commits third degree sexual abuse of a minor when the actor:

(1) Knowingly engages in a sexual act with the complainant or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act;
(2) While in a position of trust with or authority over the complainant; and
(3) In fact:
(A) The complainant is under 18 years of age; and
(B) The actor is 18 years of age or older and at least 4 years older than the complainant.

(d) Fourth degree. An actor commits fourth degree sexual abuse of a minor when the actor:
(1) Knowingly engages in a sexual contact with the complainant or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual contact; and
(2) In fact:
(A) The complainant is under 12 years of age; and
(B) The actor is at least 4 years older than the complainant.

(e) Fifth degree. An actor commits fifth degree sexual abuse of a minor when the actor:
(1) Knowingly engages in a sexual contact with the complainant or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual contact; and
(2) In fact:
(A) The complainant is under 16 years of age; and
(B) The actor is at least 4 years older than the complainant.

(f) Sixth degree. An actor commits sixth degree sexual abuse of a minor when the actor:
(1) Knowingly engages in a sexual contact with the complainant or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual contact;
(2) While in a position of trust with or authority over the complainant; and
(3) In fact:
(A) The complainant is under 18 years of age; and
(B) The actor is, in fact, 18 years of age or older and at least 4 years older than the complainant.

(g) Affirmative defenses.
(1) It is an affirmative defense to liability under this section for conduct involving only the actor and the complainant that, in fact, the actor and the complainant are in a marriage or domestic partnership at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact.
(2) It is an affirmative defense to liability under subsection (b) and subsection (e) of this section that, in fact:
(A) The actor reasonably believes that the complainant is 16 years of age or older at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact;
(B) Such reasonable belief is based on an oral or written statement that the complainant made to the actor about the complainant's age; and
(C) The complainant is 14 years of age or older at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact.
(3) It is an affirmative defense to liability under subsection (c) and subsection (f) of this section that, in fact:

(A) The actor reasonably believes that the complainant is 18 years of age of older at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact;
(B) Such reasonable belief is based on an oral or written statement that the complainant made to the actor about the complainant's age; and
(C) The complainant is 16 years of age or older at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact.

(h) Penalties.

(1) First degree sexual abuse of a minor is a Class 4 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(2) Second degree sexual abuse of a minor is a Class 5 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(3) Third degree sexual abuse of a minor is a Class 6 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(4) Fourth degree sexual abuse of a minor is a Class 6 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(5) Fifth degree sexual abuse of a minor is a Class 7 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(6) Sixth degree sexual abuse of a minor is a Class 8 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(7) Penalty enhancements. The penalty classification of first, second, fourth, and fifth degree sexual abuse of a minor is increased by one class when the actor:
    (A) Recklessly causes the sexual act or sexual contact by displaying or using what is, in fact, a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon;
    (B) Knowingly acts with one or more accomplices that are physically present at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact;
    (C) Recklessly causes serious bodily injury to the complainant immediately before, during, or immediately after the sexual act or sexual contact; or
    (D) Knows at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact that the actor is in a position of trust with or authority over the complainant.
(8) Penalty enhancements. The penalty classification of third and sixth degree sexual abuse of a minor is increased by one class when the actor:

(A) Recklessly causes the sexual act or sexual contact by displaying or what is, in fact, a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon;
(B) Knowingly acts with one or more accomplices that are physically present at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact; or
(C) Recklessly causes serious bodily injury to the complainant immediately before, during, or immediately after the sexual act or sexual contact.

(i) Definitions. The terms "knowingly," "knows," and "recklessly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "complainant," "dangerous weapon," "domestic partnership," "imitation dangerous weapon," "position of trust with or authority over," "serious bodily injury, "sexual act," and "sexual contact" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-1303. Sexual Abuse by Exploitation.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree sexual abuse by exploitation when the actor:
(1) Knowingly engages in a sexual act with the complainant or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act;
(2) In one or more of the following situations:
(A) The actor is a coach, not including a coach who is a secondary school student; a teacher, counselor, principal, administrator, nurse, or security officer at a secondary school, working as an employee, contractor, or volunteer, and is reckless as to the fact that:
(i) The complainant:
(I) Is an enrolled student in the same secondary school; or
(II) Receives educational services or attends educational programming at the same secondary school; and
(ii) The complainant is under 20 years of age;
(B) The actor knowingly and falsely represents that the actor is someone else with whom the complainant is in a romantic, dating, or sexual relationship;
(C) The actor is, or purports to be, a healthcare provider, a health professional, or a religious leader described in D.C. Code § 14-309, and:
(i) Falsely represents that the sexual act is for a bona fide medical, therapeutic, or professional purpose;
(ii) Commits the sexual act during a consultation, examination, treatment, therapy, or other provision of professional services; or

(iii) Commits the sexual act while the complainant is a patient or client of the actor, and is reckless as to the fact that the mental, emotional, or physical condition of the complainant is such that the complainant is impaired from declining participation in the sexual act;

(D) The actor:

(i) Knowingly works as an employee, contractor, or volunteer at or for a hospital, treatment facility, detention or correctional facility, group home, or institution housing persons who are not free to leave at will; and

(ii) Is reckless as to the fact that the complainant is:

(I) A ward, patient, client, or prisoner at that institution;

(II) Awaiting admission to that institution; or

(III) In transport to or from that institution; or

(E) The actor knowingly works as a law enforcement officer, and is reckless as to the fact that the complainant is:

(i) In official custody or detained for a legitimate police purpose;

(ii) Detained pending or following:

(I) A charge or conviction of an offense, or an allegation or finding of juvenile delinquency;

(II) Commitment as a material witness; or

(III) Civil commitment proceedings, extradition, deportation, or exclusion; or

(iii) On probation or parole.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree sexual abuse by exploitation when the actor:

(1) Knowingly engages in a sexual contact with the complainant or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual contact;

(2) In one or more of the following situations:

(A) The actor is a coach, not including a coach who is a secondary school student; a teacher, counselor, principal, administrator, nurse, or security officer at a secondary school, working as an employee, contractor, or volunteer, and is reckless as to the fact that:

(i) The complainant:

(I) Is an enrolled student in the same secondary school; or

(II) Receives educational services or attends educational programming at the same secondary school; and

(ii) The complainant is under 20 years of age;

(B) The actor knowingly and falsely represents that the actor is someone else with whom the complainant is in a romantic, dating, or sexual relationship;

(C) The actor is, or purports to be, a healthcare provider, a health professional, or a religious leader described in D.C. Code § 14-309, and:

(i) Falsely represents that the sexual contact is for a bona fide medical, therapeutic, or professional purpose;

(ii) Commits the sexual contact during a consultation, examination, treatment, therapy, or other provision of professional services; or

(iii) Commits the sexual contact while the complainant is a patient or client of the actor, and is reckless as to the fact that the mental, emotional, or physical condition of the complainant is such that the complainant is impaired from declining participation in the sexual contact;

(D) The actor:

(i) Knowingly works as an employee, contractor, or volunteer at or for a hospital, treatment facility, detention or correctional facility, group home, or institution housing persons who are not free to leave at will; and

(ii) Is reckless as to the fact that the complainant is:

(I) A ward, patient, client, or prisoner at that institution;

(II) Awaiting admission to that institution; or

(III) In transport to or from that institution; or

(E) The actor knowingly works as a law enforcement officer, and is reckless as to the fact that the complainant is:

(i) In official custody or detained for a legitimate police purpose;

(ii) Detained pending or following:

(I) A charge or conviction of an offense, or an allegation or finding of juvenile delinquency;

(II) Commitment as a material witness; or

(III) Civil commitment proceedings, extradition, deportation, or exclusion; or

(iii) On probation or parole.

(c) Affirmative defense. It is an affirmative defense to liability under this section that, in fact, the actor and the complainant are in a marriage or domestic partnership at the time of the sexual act or sexual contact.

(d) Penalties.

(1) First degree sexual abuse by exploitation of an adult is a Class 7 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(2) Second degree sexual abuse by exploitation of an adult is a Class 8 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(3) No abuse of government power penalty enhancement. A person shall not be subject to prosecution for violation of this section and an abuse of government power penalty enhancement in RCC § 22E-610 for the same conduct.

(e) Definitions. The terms "knowingly" and "reckless" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "complainant," "correctional facility," "domestic partnership," "health professional," "healthcare provider," "law enforcement officer," "official custody," "sexual act," and "sexual contact" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-1304. Sexually Suggestive Conduct with a Minor.

(a) Offense. An actor commits sexually suggestive conduct with a minor when the actor:

(1) In fact, is 18 years of age or older and at least 4 years older than the complainant; and:

(A) The actor is reckless as to the fact that the complainant is under 16 years of age; or

(B) The actor:

(i) Is reckless as to the fact that the complainant is under 18 years of age; and

(ii) Knows that the actor is in a position of trust with or authority over the complainant; and

(2) The actor:

(A) Purposely engages in:

(i) A sexual act that is visible to the complainant;

(ii) A sexual contact that is visible to the complainant; or

(iii) A sexual or sexualized display of the genitals, pubic area, or anus that is visible to the complainant;

(B) Knowingly:

(i) Engages in one of the following with the complainant or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to one of the following:

(I) Touching or kissing any person, either directly or through the clothing; or

(II) Removing clothing from any person;

(ii) With intent to cause the sexual arousal or sexual gratification of any person; or

(C) Knowingly engages in a sexual act or sexual contact with the complainant or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act or sexual contact.

(b) Affirmative defense. It is an affirmative defense to liability under this section for conduct involving only the actor and the complainant that, in fact, the actor and the complainant are in a marriage or domestic partnership at the time of the prohibited conduct.
(c) Penalties. Sexually suggestive contact with a minor is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(d) Definitions. The terms "intent," "knowingly," "knows," "purposely," and "reckless" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "complainant," "domestic partnership," "position of trust with or authority over," "sexual act," and "sexual contact" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-1305. Enticing a Minor Into Sexual Conduct.

(a) Offense. An actor commits enticing a minor into sexual conduct when the actor:
    (1) Knowingly commands, requests, or tries to persuade the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act or sexual contact;
    (2) In fact, is 18 years of age or older and at least four years older than the complainant, and:
        (A) The actor is reckless as to the fact that the complainant is under 16 years of age; or
        (B) The actor:
            (i) Is reckless as to the fact that the complainant is under 18 years of age; and
            (ii) Knows that the actor is in a position of trust with or authority over the complainant; or
    (3) In fact, is 18 years of age or older and at least four years older than the purported age of the complainant, and:
        (A) The complainant is a law enforcement officer who purports to be a person under 16 years of age; and
        (B) The actor is reckless as to the fact that the purported age of the complainant is under 16 years of age.
(b) Affirmative defense. It is an affirmative defense to liability under this section for conduct involving only the actor and the complainant that, in fact, the actor and the complainant are in a marriage or domestic partnership at the time of the prohibited conduct.
(c) Penalties. Enticing a minor into sexual conduct is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(d) Definitions. The terms "knowingly," "knows," and "reckless" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "complainant," "domestic partnership," "law enforcement officer," "position of trust with or authority over," "sexual act," and "sexual contact" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-1306. Arranging for Sexual Conduct with a Minor or Person Incapable of Consenting.

(a) Offense. An actor commits arranging for sexual conduct with a minor or person incapable of consenting when the actor:
  (1) Knowingly:
    (A) As a person with a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant;
    (B) Gives effective consent to a third party to:
      (i) Engage in or submit to a sexual act or sexual contact with or for the complainant; or
      (ii) Cause the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act or sexual contact with or for the third party or any other person;
  (2) In one of the following situations:
    (A) The actor is reckless as to:
      (i) The fact that the complainant is under 16 years of age; and
      (ii) The fact that the third party or other person is at least 4 years older than the complainant;
    (B) The actor:
      (i) Is reckless as to:
        (I) The fact that the complainant is under 18 years of age; and
        (II) The fact that the third party or other person is 18 years of age or older and at least 4 years older than the complainant; and
      (ii) Knows that the third party or other person is in a position of trust with or authority over the complainant; or
    (C) The actor is reckless as to:
      (i) The fact that the complainant is incapable of appraising the nature of the sexual act or sexual contact or of understanding the right to give or withhold consent to the sexual act or sexual contact, either due to a drug, intoxicant, or other substance, or, due to an intellectual, developmental, or mental disability or mental illness when the actor has no similarly serious disability or illness; or
      (ii) The fact that the complainant is incapable of communicating willingness or unwillingness to engage in the sexual act or sexual contact.

(b) Penalties. Arranging for sexual conduct with a minor or person incapable of consenting is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(c) Definitions. The terms "knowingly," "knows," and "reckless" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; and the terms "actor," "complainant," "consent," "effective consent," "position of trust with or authority over," "sexual act," and "sexual contact" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-1307. Nonconsensual Sexual Conduct.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree nonconsensual sexual conduct when the actor:
  (1) Knowingly engages in a sexual act with the complainant or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual act;
  (2) Reckless as to the fact that the actor lacks the complainant's effective consent.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree nonconsensual sexual contact when the actor:
  (1) Knowingly engages in a sexual contact with the complainant or causes the complainant to engage in or submit to a sexual contact;
  (2) Reckless as to the fact that the actor lacks the complainant's effective consent.

(c) Exclusion from liability. An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor uses deception, unless it is deception as to the nature of the sexual act or sexual contact.

(d) Penalties.
  (1) First degree nonconsensual sexual conduct of an adult is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
  (2) Second degree nonconsensual sexual conduct of an adult is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(e) Definitions. The terms "knowingly" and "reckless" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "complainant," "deception," "effective consent," "sexual act," and "sexual contact" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-1308. Incest.[5]

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree incest when the actor:
  (1) In fact, is 16 years of age or older;
  (2) Knowingly engages in a sexual act with another person who is a:

[5] Incest was previously numbered as RCC § 22E-1312.

(A) Parent, grandparent, great-grandparent, child, grandchild, great-grandchild, sibling, parent's sibling, a sibling's child, or a child of a parent's sibling, whether related by:
(i) Blood or adoption; or
(ii) Marriage or domestic partnership, either while the marriage or domestic partnership creating the relationship exists, or after such marriage or domestic partnership ends; or
(B) A half-sibling related by blood; and
(3) Obtains the consent of the other person by undue influence.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree incest when the actor:
(1) In fact, is 16 years of age or older;
(2) Knowingly engages in a sexual contact with another person who is a:
(A) Parent, grandparent, great-grandparent, child, grandchild, great-grandchild, sibling, parent's sibling, or a sibling's child, or a child of a parent's sibling, whether related by:
(i) Blood or adoption; or
(ii) Marriage or domestic partnership, either while the marriage or domestic partnership creating the relationship exists, or after such marriage or domestic partnership ends; or
(B) A half-sibling related by blood; and
(3) Obtains the consent of the other person by undue influence.

(c) Penalties.
(1) First degree incest is a Class 8 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(2) Second degree incest is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(d) Definitions. The term "knowingly" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "consent," "domestic partnership," "sexual act," "sexual contact," and "undue influence" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-1309. Civil Provisions on the Duty to Report a Sex Crime.

(a) Duty to report a sex crime. A person who is, in fact, 18 years of age or older, and is aware of a substantial risk that a person under 16 years of age is being subjected to, or has been subjected to, a predicate crime, shall immediately report such information or belief in a call to 911, a report to the Child and Family Services Agency, or a report to the Metropolitan Police Department.

(b) Exclusions from duty to report.
(1) A person does not have a duty to report a predicate crime under subsection (a) of this section when the person is, in fact:
(A) Subjected to a predicate crime by the same person alleged to have committed a predicate crime against the person under 16 years of age;

(B) A lawyer or a person employed by a lawyer when the lawyer or employee is providing representation in a criminal, civil, or delinquency matter, and the information or basis for the belief arises solely in the course of that representation;

(C) A religious leader described in D.C. Code § 14-309, when the information or basis for the belief is the result of a confession or penitential communication made by a penitent directly to the minister if:

(i) The penitent made the confession or penitential communication in confidence;

(ii) The confession or penitential communication was made expressly for a spiritual or religious purpose;

(iii) The penitent made the confession or penitential communication to the minister in the minister's professional capacity; and

(iv) The confession or penitential communication was made in the course of discipline enjoined by the church or other religious body to which the minister belongs; or

(D) A sexual assault counselor, when the information or basis for the belief is disclosed in a confidential communication, unless the sexual assault counselor is aware of a substantial risk that:

(i) A sexual assault victim is under 13 years of age;

(ii) A perpetrator or alleged perpetrator of the predicate crime in subsection (a) is in a position of trust with or authority over the sexual assault victim; or

(iii) A perpetrator or alleged perpetrator of the predicate crime in subsection (a) is more than 4 years older than the sexual assault victim.

(2) No legal privilege, except the privileges set forth in subsection (b) of this section, shall apply to the duty to report in subsection (a) of this section.

(c) Relationship to D.C. Code § 4-1321.02. This section should not be construed as altering the special duty to report by persons specified in D.C. Code § 4-1321.02(b).

(d) Civil violation. A person commits failure to report a sex crime involving a person under 16 years of age when the person:

(1) Is, in fact, 18 years of age or older;

(2) Knows that they have a duty to report a predicate crime involving a person under 16 years of age under subsection (a) of this section; and

(3) Fails to carry out this duty.

(e) Defense. It is a defense to liability under subsection (d) of this section that the person fails to report a predicate crime under subsection (a) of this section because the person, in fact, reasonably believes that they are a survivor of intimate partner violence, as defined in D.C. Code § 16-1001(7), or intrafamily violence, as defined in D.C. Code § 16-1001(9).

(f) Penalty.

(1) Failure to report a sex crime involving a person under 16 years of age is a civil violation subject to a civil fine of $300.

(2) A violation of subsection (d) of this section shall not constitute a criminal offense or a delinquent act as defined in D.C. Official Code § 16-2301(7).

(g) Judicial venue. Adjudication of a civil violation under this section shall occur in the Office of Administrative Hearings pursuant to D.C. Code § 2-1831.03(b-6).

(h) Immunity for good faith report of a sex crime.

(1) Any person who in good faith makes a report under this section shall have immunity from liability, civil or criminal, that might otherwise be incurred or imposed with respect to the making of the report or any participation in any judicial proceeding involving the report. In all civil or criminal proceedings concerning the person under 16 years of age who is the subject of the report, or resulting from the report, good faith shall be presumed unless rebutted.

(2) Any person who makes a good-faith report under this section and, as a result thereof, is discharged from the person's employment or in any other manner is discriminated against with respect to compensation, hire, tenure, or terms, conditions, or privileges of employment, may commence a civil action for appropriate relief. If the court finds that the person was required to report under this section, in good faith made a report, and was discharged or discriminated against as a result, the court may issue an order granting appropriate relief, including reinstatement with back pay. The District may intervene in any action commenced under this subsection.

(i) Definitions.

(1) The term "knows" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the term "position of trust with or authority over" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-701; and

(2) In this section, the term:

(A) "Confidential communication" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 14-312(a)(1), and is subject to the protections in D.C. Code § 14-312(b)(3);

(B) "Predicate crime" means any conduct that violates:

(i) Chapter 13 of this title; or

(ii) Forced Commercial Sex under RCC § 22E-1602, Trafficking in Forced Commercial Sex under RCC § 22E-1604, Sex Trafficking of a Minor or Adult Incapable of Consenting under RCC § 22E-1605, or Commercial Sex with a Trafficked Person under RCC § 22E-1608; or

(iii) Creating or Trafficking an Obscene Image of a Minor under RCC § 22E-1807, Possession of an Obscene Image of a Minor under RCC § 22E-1808, Arranging a

Live Sexual Performance of a Minor under RCC § 22E-1809, or Attending or Viewing a Live Sexual Performance of a Minor under RCC § 22E-1810; or

(iv) Trafficking in Commercial Sex under RCC § 22E-4403;

(C) "Sexual assault counselor" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 23-1907(10); and

(D) "Sexual assault victim" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 23-1907(11).

RCC § 22E-1310. Admission of Evidence in Sexual Assault and Related Cases.[6]

(a) Reputation or opinion evidence of complainant's past sexual behavior inadmissible. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, in a criminal case under Chapter 13 of this title, reputation or opinion evidence of the past sexual behavior of the complainant is not admissible.

(b) Admissibility of other evidence of complainant's past sexual behavior.

(1) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, in a criminal case for an offense under Chapter 13 of this title, evidence of a complainant's past sexual behavior, other than reputation or opinion evidence, is not admissible, unless such evidence is:

(A) Admitted in accordance with paragraphs (2), (3), or (4) of this subsection and is constitutionally required to be admitted; or

(B) Admitted in accordance with paragraphs (2), (3), or (4) of this subsection and is evidence of:

(i) Past sexual behavior with persons other than the actor, offered by the actor upon the issue of whether the actor was or was not, with respect to the complainant, the source of semen or bodily injury; or

(ii) Past sexual behavior with the actor where the consent or effective consent of the complainant is at issue and is offered by the actor upon the issue of whether the complainant gave consent or effective consent to the sexual behavior that is the basis of the criminal charge.

(2) If the actor plans to offer under paragraph (1) of this subsection, evidence of specific instances of the complainant's past sexual behavior, the actor shall make a written motion to offer such evidence not later than 15 days before the date on which the trial in which such evidence is to be offered is scheduled to begin, except that the court may allow the motion to be made at a later date, including during trial, if the court determines either that the evidence is newly discovered and could not have been obtained earlier through the exercise of due diligence or that the issue to which such evidence relates has newly arisen in the case. Any motion made under this paragraph, and the accompanying offer of proof, shall be filed under seal and served on all other parties and on the complainant.

[6] Admission of Evidence in Sexual Assault and Related Cases was previously numbered as RCC § 22E-1311.

(3) The motion described in paragraph (2) of this subsection shall be accompanied by a written offer of proof. If the court determines that the offer of proof contains evidence described in paragraph (1) of this subsection, the court shall order a hearing in chambers to determine if such evidence is admissible. At such hearing, the parties may call witnesses, including the complainant, and offer relevant evidence. If the relevancy of the evidence which the actor seeks to offer in the trial depends upon the fulfillment of a condition of fact, the court, at the hearing in chambers, or at a subsequent hearing in chambers scheduled for such purpose, shall accept evidence on the issue of whether such condition of fact is fulfilled and shall determine such issue.

(4) If the court determines on the basis of the hearing described in paragraph (3) of this subsection that the evidence which the actor seeks to offer is relevant and that the probative value of such evidence outweighs the danger of unfair prejudice, such evidence shall be admissible in the trial to the extent an order made by the court specifies evidence which may be offered and areas with respect to which the complainant may be examined or cross-examined.

(c) Prompt reporting. Evidence of delay in reporting an offense under Chapter 13 of this title to a public authority shall not raise any presumption concerning the credibility or veracity of a charge under Chapter 13 of this title.

(d) Privilege inapplicable for spouses or domestic partners. Laws attaching a privilege against disclosure of communications between spouses or domestic partners are inapplicable in prosecutions under Chapter 13 of this title where the actor is or was married to the complainant, or is or was a domestic partner of the complainant, or where the complainant is a person under 16 years of age.

(e) Definitions.

(1) The terms "actor," "bodily injury," "complainant," "consent," "domestic partner," and "effective consent" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and

(2) In this section, the term "past sexual behavior" means sexual behavior other than the sexual behavior with respect to which an offense under Chapter 13 of this title is alleged.

Chapter 14. Kidnapping, Criminal Restraint, and Blackmail.

RCC § 22E-1401. Kidnapping.

(a) First degree kidnapping. An actor commits first degree kidnapping when the actor:

(1) Knowingly and substantially confines or moves the complainant;

(2) By means of:

(A) Causing bodily injury to the complainant or by using physical force;
(B) Making an explicit or implicit coercive threat;
(C) Deception; or
(D) With acquiescence of the complainant, when the actor is:
(i) Reckless as to the facts that:
(I) The complainant is an incapacitated individual; and
(II) A person with legal authority over the complainant who is acting consistent with that authority has not given effective consent to the confinement or movement; or
(ii) In fact, 18 years of age or older and reckless as to the facts that:
(I) The complainant is under 16 years of age and four years younger than the actor; and
(II) A person with legal authority over the complainant who is acting consistent with that authority has not given effective consent to the confinement or movement; and

(3) With intent to:
(A) Hold the complainant for ransom or reward;
(B) Use the complainant as a shield or hostage;
(C) Facilitate the commission of any felony or flight thereafter;
(D) Inflict death or serious bodily injury upon the complainant;
(E) Commit a sexual offense defined in Chapter 13 of this Title against the complainant;
(F) Cause any person to believe that the complainant will not be released without suffering death, serious bodily injury, or a sex offense defined in Chapter 13 of this Title;
(G) Permanently leave a person with legal authority over the complainant without custody of the complainant; or
(H) Confine or move the complainant for 72 hours or more.

(b) Second degree kidnapping. An actor commits second degree kidnapping when the actor:
(1) Knowingly and substantially confines or moves the complainant;
(2) By means of:
(A) Causing bodily injury to the complainant or by using physical force;
(B) Making an explicit or implicit coercive threat;
(C) Deception; or
(D) With acquiescence of the complainant, when the actor is:
(i) Reckless as to the facts that:
(I) The complainant is an incapacitated individual; and

(II) A person with legal authority over the complainant who is acting consistent with that authority has not given effective consent to the confinement or movement; or

(ii) In fact, 18 years of age or older and reckless as to the facts that:

(I) The complainant is under 16 years of age and four years younger than the actor; and

(II) A person with legal authority over the complainant who is acting consistent with that authority has not given effective consent to the confinement or movement; and

(3) With intent to:

(A) Inflict bodily injury upon the complainant;

(B) Cause any person to believe that the complainant will not be released without suffering bodily injury.

(c) Defense. It is a defense to prosecution under subparagraphs (a)(3)(G) and (a)(3)(H) when the complainant is, in fact, under 18 years of age and the actor is either:

(1) A close relative or a former legal guardian who had authority to control the complainant's freedom of movement who:

(A) Acts with intent to assume full responsibility for the care and supervision of the complainant; and

(B) Does not cause bodily injury or use an explicit or implicit coercive threat to cause the confinement or movement; or

(2) A person who reasonably believes they are acting at the direction of a close relative who:

(A) Acts with intent that the close relative will assume full responsibility for the care and supervision of the complainant; and

(B) Does not cause bodily injury or use an explicit or implicit coercive threat to cause the confinement or movement.

(d) Penalties.

(1) First degree kidnapping is a Class 5 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(2) Second degree kidnapping is a Class 7 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(3) Penalty enhancements. The penalty classification of any gradation of this offense is increased by one class when the actor commits the offense:

(A) Reckless as to the fact that the complainant is a protected person;

(B) By recklessly causing the confinement or movement by displaying or using what, in fact, is a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon; or

(C) With the purpose of harming the complainant because of the complainant's status as a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or District official.

(e) Multiple convictions for related offenses. Multiple convictions for first degree kidnapping or second degree kidnapping and another offense merge when arising from the same act or course of conduct and when the confinement or movement was incidental to commission of the other offense, and the sentencing court shall follow the procedures specified in subsections (b) and (c) of RCC § 22E-214.

(f) Definitions. The terms "intent," "knowingly," "purpose," "reckless," and "recklessly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "bodily injury," "close relative," "coercive threat," "complainant," "dangerous weapon," "deception," "District official," "effective consent," "felony," "imitation dangerous weapon," "incapacitated individual," "law enforcement officer," "person with legal authority over the complainant," "protected person," "public safety employee," and "serious bodily injury" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-1402. Criminal Restraint.

(a) Offense. An actor commits criminal restraint when the actor knowingly and substantially confines or moves the complainant:

(1) By means of:

(A) Causing bodily injury to the complainant or by using physical force;

(B) Making an explicit or implicit coercive threat;

(C) Deception; or

(2) By any means, including with acquiescence of the complainant, when the actor is:

(A) Reckless as to the facts that:

(i) The complainant is an incapacitated individual; and

(ii) A person with legal authority over the complainant who is acting consistent with that authority has not given effective consent to the confinement or movement; or

(B) In fact, 18 years of age or older and reckless as to the facts that:

(i) The complainant is under 16 years of age and four years younger than the actor; and

(ii) A person with legal authority over the complainant who is acting consistent with that authority has not given effective consent to the confinement or movement.

(b) Defenses.

(1) It is a defense that the complainant is, in fact, under 18 years of age, and the actor is:

(A) A close relative or a former legal guardian who had authority to control the complainant's freedom of movement who:

(i) Acts with intent to assume full responsibility for the care and supervision of the complainant; and

(ii) Does not cause bodily injury or use an explicit or implicit coercive threat to cause the confinement or movement; or

(B) A person who reasonably believes they are acting at the direction of a close relative who:

(i) Acts with intent that the close relative will assume full responsibility for the care and supervision of the complainant; and

(ii) Does not cause bodily injury or use an explicit or implicit coercive threat to cause the confinement or movement.

(2) It is a defense to prosecution under paragraph (a)(2) of this section that, in fact, the actor:

(A) Is a transportation worker who moves the complainant while in the course of the worker's official duties; or

(B) Is a person who moves the complainant solely by persuading the complainant to go to a location open to the general public to engage in a commercial or other legal activity.

(c) Affirmative defenses.

(1) It is an affirmative defense to prosecution under subparagraph (a)(1)(C) of this section that the actor, in fact:

(A) Lacks the complainant's effective consent solely because of deception by the actor; and

(B) Does not confine or move the complainant with intent to use bodily injury or an explicit or implicit coercive threat if the deception should fail.

(2) It is an affirmative defense to prosecution under paragraph (a)(2) that the actor, in fact, reasonably believes that a person with legal authority over the complainant would have given effective consent to the conduct constituting the offense.

(d) Penalties.

(1) Criminal restraint is a Class A offense, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(2) Penalty enhancements. The penalty classification of this offense is increased by one class when the actor commits the offense:

(A) Reckless as to the fact that the complainant is a protected person;

(B) By recklessly causes the confinement or movement by displaying or using what, in fact, is a dangerous weapon or imitation dangerous weapon; or

(C) With the purpose of harming the complainant because of the complainant's status as a law enforcement officer, public safety employee, or District official.

(e) Multiple convictions for related offenses. Multiple convictions for criminal restraint and another offense merge when arising from the same act or course of conduct and when the confinement or movement was incidental to commission of the other offense, and the sentencing court shall follow the procedures specified in subsections (b) and (c) of RCC § 22E-214.

(f) Definitions. The terms "intent," "knowingly," "purpose," "reckless," and "recklessly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "bodily injury," "close relative," "coercive threat," "complainant," "dangerous weapon," "deception," "District official," "effective consent," "imitation dangerous weapon," "incapacitated individual," "law enforcement officer," "open to the general public," "person with legal authority over the complainant," "protected person," "public safety employee," and "transportation worker" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-1403. Blackmail.

(a) Offense. An actor commits blackmail when the actor:

(1) Purposely causes another person to commit or refrain from any act,

(2) By communicating, explicitly or implicitly, that if the person does not commit or refrain from the act, any person will:

(A) Take or withhold action as a public official, or cause a public official to take or withhold action;

(B) Accuse another person of a crime;

(C) Expose a secret, publicize an asserted fact, or distribute a photograph, video or audio recording, regardless of the truth or authenticity of the secret, fact, or item, that tends to subject another person to, or perpetuate:

(i) Hatred, contempt, ridicule, or other significant injury to personal reputation; or

(ii) Significant injury to credit or business reputation;

(D) Significantly impair the reputation of a deceased person;

(E) Notify a federal, state, or local government agency or official of, or publicize, another person's immigration or citizenship status;

(F) Restrict a person's access to a controlled substance that the person owns, or restrict a person's access to prescription medication that the person owns;

(G) Engage in conduct that, in fact, constitutes:

(i) An offense under Subtitle II of this title; or

(ii) A property offense as defined in subtitle III of this title.

(b) Exclusions to liability.

(1) An actor does not commit an offense under subparagraph (a)(2)(C) for communicating that, in fact, any person will engage in legal employment or business actions.

(2) An actor does not commit an offense under this section for causing a person to do any of the following:

(A) Transfer, use, give control over, or consent to damage property;

(B) Remain in or move to a location; or

(C) Give consent for a person to enter or remain in a location.

(c) Affirmative defenses.

(1) It is an affirmative defense to liability under this section committed by means of the conduct specified in subparagraphs (a)(1)(A)-(F) that:

(A) The actor, in fact, reasonably believes the threatened official action to be justified, or the accusation, secret, or assertion to be true, or that the photograph, video, or audio recording is authentic, and

(B) Engages in the conduct with the purpose of compelling the other person to:

(i) Desist or refrain from criminal or tortious activity or behavior harmful to any person's physical or mental health,

(ii) Act or refrain from acting in a manner reasonably related to the wrong that is the subject of the accusation, assertion, invocation of official action, or photograph, video or audio recording; or

(iii) Refrain from taking any action or responsibility for which the actor believes the other unqualified.

(2) It is an affirmative defense to liability under this section that, in fact, the actor reasonably believes that the complainant gives effective consent to the actor to engage in the conduct constituting the offense.

(d) Penalties.

(1) Blackmail is a Class 8 offense, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(2) No abuse of government power penalty enhancement. A person convicted under subparagraph (a)(2)(A) of this section shall not be subject to an abuse of government power penalty enhancement in RCC § 22E-610 for the same conduct.

(e) Definitions. The term "act" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-202; the terms "purpose" and "purposely" have the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "complainant," "consent," "controlled substance," "effective consent," "property," and "public official" have the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-701.

Chapter 15. Abuse and Neglect of Vulnerable Persons.

RCC § 22E-1501. Criminal Abuse of a Minor.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree criminal abuse of a minor when the actor:
  (1) Is reckless as to the fact that:
    (A) The actor has a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant; and
    (B) The complainant is under 18 years of age; and
  (2) Either:
    (A) Purposely causes serious mental injury to the complainant; or
    (B) Recklessly causes serious bodily injury to the complainant.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree criminal abuse of a minor when the actor:
  (1) Is reckless as to the fact that:
    (A) The actor has a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant; and
    (B) The complainant is under 18 years of age; and
  (2) Causes significant bodily injury to the complainant.

(c) Third degree. An actor commits third degree criminal abuse of a minor when the actor:
  (1) Is reckless as to the fact that:
    (A) The actor has a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant; and
    (B) The complainant is under 18 years of age; and
  (2) Either:
    (A) Causes serious mental injury to the complainant; or
    (B) In fact, commits a predicate offense against persons against the complainant.

(d) Exclusion from liability. An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor's conduct is specifically permitted by a District statute or regulation.

(e) Affirmative defense. It is an affirmative defense to liability under this subsection (b) and subsection (c) of this section that the actor, in fact:
  (1) Is not a person with legal authority over the complainant; and
  (2) Reasonably believes that a person with legal authority over the complainant, acting consistent with that authority, would give effective consent to the injury or the conduct constituting the offense.

(f) Penalties.
  (1) First degree criminal abuse of a minor is a Class 6 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
  (2) Second degree criminal abuse of a minor is a Class 8 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
  (3) Third degree criminal abuse of a minor is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(g) Definitions.

(1) The terms "purposely," "reckless," and "recklessly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the terms "actor," "complainant," "effective consent," "person with legal authority over the complainant," "serious bodily injury," "serious mental injury," and "significant bodily injury" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and

(2) In this section, the term "predicate offense against persons" means:

(A) Fourth Degree Assault under RCC § 22E-1202(d);
(B) Criminal Threats under RCC § 22E-1204;
(C) Offensive Physical Contact under RCC § 22E-1205;
(D) Criminal Restraint under RCC § 22E-1404;
(E) Stalking under RCC § 22E-1801; or
(F) Electronic Stalking under RCC § 22E-1802.

RCC § 22E-1502. Criminal Neglect of a Minor.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree criminal neglect of a minor when the actor:

(1) Is reckless as to the fact that:

(A) The actor has a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant; and
(B) The complainant is under 18 years of age; and

(2) Created, or failed to mitigate or remedy, a substantial risk that the complainant would experience serious bodily injury or death.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree criminal neglect of a minor when the actor:

(1) Is reckless as to the fact that:

(A) The actor has a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant; and
(B) The complainant is under 18 years of age; and

(2) Created, or failed to mitigate or remedy, a substantial risk that the complainant would experience:

(A) Significant bodily injury; or
(B) Serious mental injury.

(c) Third degree. An actor commits third degree criminal neglect of a minor when the actor:

(1) Is reckless as to the fact that:

(A) The actor has a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant; and
(B) The complainant is under 18 years of age; and

(2) Engages in one of the following:

(A) Knowingly leaves the complainant in any place with intent to abandon the complainant; or
(B) Recklessly:

(i) Fails to make a reasonable effort to provide food, clothing, shelter, supervision, medical services, medicine, or other items or care essential for the physical health, mental health, or safety of the complainant; or

(ii) Creates, or fails to mitigate or remedy, a substantial risk that the complainant would experience bodily injury from consumption of alcohol, or consumption or inhalation, without a valid prescription, of a controlled substance or marijuana.

(d) Exclusions from liability.

(1) An actor does not commit an offense under this section for conduct that, in fact, constitutes surrendering a newborn child in accordance with D.C. Code § 4-1451.01 et seq.

(2) An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor's conduct is specifically permitted by a District statute or regulation.

(e) Affirmative defense. It is an affirmative defense to liability under subsection (b) and subparagraph (c)(2)(B) of this section that the actor, in fact:

(1) Is not a person with legal authority over the complainant; and

(2) Reasonably believes that a person with legal authority over the complainant, acting consistent with that authority, would give effective consent to the conduct constituting the offense.

(f) Penalties.

(1) First degree criminal neglect of a minor is a Class 8 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(2) Second degree criminal neglect of a minor is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(3) Third degree criminal neglect of a minor is a Class B crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(g) Definitions. The terms "intent," "knowingly," "reckless," and "recklessly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "bodily injury," "complainant," "controlled substance," "effective consent," "person with legal authority over the complainant," "serious bodily injury," "serious mental injury," and "significant bodily injury" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-1503. Criminal Abuse of a Vulnerable Adult or Elderly Person.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person when the actor:

(1) Is reckless as to the fact that:

(A) The actor has a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant; and
(B) The complainant is a vulnerable adult or elderly person; and

(2) Either:
(A) Purposely causes serious mental injury to the complainant; or
(B) Recklessly causes serious bodily injury to the complainant.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person when the actor:
(1) Is reckless as to the fact that:
(A) The actor has a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant; and
(B) The complainant is a vulnerable adult or elderly person; and
(2) Causes significant bodily injury to the complainant.

(c) Third degree. An actor commits third degree criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person when the actor:
(1) Is reckless as to the fact that:
(A) The actor has a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant; and
(B) The complainant is a vulnerable adult or elderly person; and
(2) Either:
(A) Causes serious mental injury to the complainant; or
(B) In fact, commits a predicate offense against persons against the complainant.

(d) Exclusion from liability. An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor's conduct is specifically permitted by a District statute or regulation.

(e) Defenses.
(1) It is a defense to liability under subparagraph (a)(2)(B) of this section that, in fact:
(A) The injury is caused by:
(i) A lawful cosmetic or medical procedure; or
(ii) An omission;
(B) The actor is not a person with legal authority over the complainant; and
(C) The actor reasonably believes that the complainant, or a person with legal authority over the complainant acting consistent with that authority, gives effective consent to the actor to cause the injury or engage in the omission that causes the injury.
(2) It is a defense to liability under subsection (b) and subsection (c) of this section that, in fact:
(A) The actor is not a person with legal authority over the complainant; and
(B) The actor reasonably believes that the complainant, or a person with legal authority over the complainant acting consistent with that authority, gives effective consent to the actor to:
(i) Cause the injury;

(ii) Engage in the omission that causes the injury; or

(iii) Engage in a lawful sport, occupation, or other concerted activity, and the actor's infliction of the injury is a reasonably foreseeable hazard of that activity.

(f) Penalties.

(1) First degree criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person is a Class 6 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(2) Second degree criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person is a Class 8 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(3) Third degree criminal abuse of a vulnerable adult or elderly person is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(g) Definitions.

(1) The term "omission" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-202; the terms "purposely," "reckless," and "recklessly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the terms "actor," "complainant," "effective consent," "elderly person," "person with legal authority over the complainant," "serious bodily injury," "serious mental injury," "significant bodily injury," and "vulnerable adult" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and

(2) In this section, the term "predicate offense against persons" means:

(A) Fourth Degree Assault under RCC § 22E-1202(d);

(B) Criminal Threats under RCC § 22E-1204;

(C) Offensive Physical Contact under RCC § 22E-1205;

(D) Criminal Restraint under RCC § 22E-1404;

(E) Stalking under RCC § 22E-1801; or

(F) Electronic Stalking under RCC § 22E-1802.

RCC § 22E-1504. Criminal Neglect of a Vulnerable Adult or Elderly Person.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person when the actor:

(1) Is reckless as to the fact that:

(A) The actor has a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant; and

(B) The complainant is a vulnerable adult or elderly person; and

(2) Creates, or fails to mitigate or remedy, a substantial risk that the complainant would experience serious bodily injury or death.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person when the actor:

(1) Is reckless as to the fact that:

(A) The actor has a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant; and

(B) The complainant is a vulnerable adult or elderly person; and

(2) Creates, or fails to mitigate or remedy, a substantial risk that the complainant would experience:

(A) Significant bodily injury; or

(B) Serious mental injury.

(c) Third degree. An actor commits third degree criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person when the actor:

(1) Is reckless as to the fact that:

(A) The actor has a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant; and

(B) The complainant is a vulnerable adult or elderly person; and

(2) Either:

(A) Fails to make a reasonable effort to provide food, clothing, shelter, supervision, medical services, medicine, or other items or care essential for the physical health, mental health, or safety of the complainant; or

(B) Creates, or fails to mitigate or remedy, a substantial risk that the complainant would experience bodily injury from consumption of alcohol, or consumption or inhalation, without a valid prescription, of a controlled substance or marijuana.

(d) Exclusion from liability. An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor's conduct is specifically permitted by a District statute or regulation.

(e) Defenses.

(1) It is a defense to liability under subsection (a) of this section that, in fact:

(A) The risk is caused by:

(i) A lawful cosmetic or medical procedure; or

(ii) An omission;

(B) The actor is not a person with legal authority over the complainant; and

(C) The actor reasonably believes that the complainant, or a person with legal authority over the complainant acting consistent with that authority, gives effective consent to the actor to engage in the conduct that constitutes the offense.

(2) It is a defense to liability under subsection (b) and subsection (c) of this section that, in fact:

(A) The actor is not a person with legal authority over the complainant; and

(B) The actor reasonably believes that the complainant, or a person with legal authority over the complainant acting consistent with that authority, gives effective consent to the actor to:

(i) Engage in the conduct that constitutes the offense; or

(ii) Engage in a lawful sport, occupation, or other concerted activity, and the actor's creation, or failure to mitigate or remedy, the risk is a reasonably foreseeable hazard of that activity.

(f) Penalties.
  (1) First degree criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person is a Class 8 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
  (2) Second degree criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
  (3) Third degree criminal neglect of a vulnerable adult or elderly person is a Class B crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(g) Definitions. The term "omission" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-202; the term "reckless" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "bodily injury," "complainant," "controlled substance," "effective consent," "elderly person," "person with legal authority over the complainant," "serious bodily injury," "serious mental injury," "significant bodily injury," and "vulnerable adult" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

Chapter 16. Human Trafficking.

RCC § 22E-1601. Forced Labor.

(a) Offense. An actor commits forced labor when the actor:
  (1) Knowingly causes a person to provide services;
  (2) By means of debt bondage or making an explicit or implicit coercive threat.

(b) Exclusions from liability. An actor does not commit an offense under this section for, in fact, communicating that any person will engage in legal employment actions, such as threats of termination, demotion, reduced pay or benefits, or scheduling changes, in order to compel an employee to provide labor or services.

(c) Penalties.
  (1) Forced labor is a Class 5 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
  (2) Penalty enhancements. The penalty classification of this offense is increased by one class when the actor commits the offense:
    (A) Reckless as to the fact that the complainant is under 18 years of age; or
    (B) By holding the complainant, or causing the complainant to provide services, for more than 180 days.

(d) Definitions. The terms "knowingly" and "reckless" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; and the terms "actor," "coercive threat,"

"complainant," "debt bondage," "labor," and "services" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-1602. Forced Commercial Sex.

(a) Offense. An actor commits forced commercial sex when the actor:
  (1) Knowingly causes the complainant to engage in or submit to a commercial sex act with or for another person;
  (2) In one or more of the following ways:
    (A) By using physical force that causes bodily injury to, overcomes, or restrains any person;
    (B) By making a coercive threat, explicit or implicit;
    (C) By debt bondage; or
    (D) By administering or causing to be administered to the complainant, without the complainant's effective consent, a drug, intoxicant, or other substance:
      (i) With intent to impair the complainant's ability to express unwillingness to engage in the commercial sex act; and
      (ii) In fact, the drug, intoxicant, or other substance renders the complainant:
        (I) Asleep, unconscious, substantially paralyzed, or passing in and out of consciousness;
        (II) Substantially incapable of appraising the nature of the commercial sex act; or
        (III) Substantially incapable of communicating unwillingness to engage in the commercial sex act.

(b) Penalties.
  (1) Forced commercial sex is a Class 4 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
  (2) Penalty enhancements. The penalty classification of this offense is increased by one class when the actor commits the offense:
    (A) Reckless as to the fact that the complainant is under 18 years of age, or, in fact, the complainant is under 12 years of age; or
    (B) By recklessly holding the complainant, or causing the complainant to provide commercial sex acts, for a total of more than 180 days.

(c) Definitions. The terms "intent," "knowingly," "reckless," and "recklessly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC §22E-207; and the terms "actor," "bodily injury," "business," "coercive threat," "commercial sex act," "complainant," and "debt bondage" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-1603. Trafficking in Labor.

(a) Offense. An actor commits trafficking in labor when the actor:
  (1) Knowingly recruits, entices, houses, transports, provides, obtains, or maintains by any means, a person;
  (2) With intent that, as a result, the person will be caused to provide services by means of debt bondage or an explicit or implicit coercive threat.

(b) Penalties.
  (1) Trafficking in labor is a Class 6 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
  (2) Penalty enhancements. The penalty classification of this offense is increased by one class when the actor commits the offense:
    (A) Reckless as to the fact that the complainant is under 18 years of age; or
    (B) By holding the complainant, or causing the complainant to provide services, for a total of more than 180 days.

(c) Definitions. The terms "intent," "knowingly," and "reckless" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; and the terms "actor," "coercive threat," "complainant," "debt bondage," "labor," and "services" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-1604. Trafficking in Forced Commercial Sex.

(a) Offense. An actor commits trafficking in forced commercial sex when the actor:
  (1) Knowingly recruits, entices, houses, transports, provides, obtains, or maintains by any means, the complainant;
  (2) With intent that, as a result, the complainant will be caused to engage in or submit to a commercial sex act with or for another person in one or more of the following ways:
    (A) By physical force that causes bodily injury to, overcomes, or restrains any person;
    (B) By an explicit or implicit coercive threat;
    (C) By debt bondage; or
    (D) By a drug, intoxicant, or other substance, administered to the complainant without the complainant's effective consent.

(b) Penalties.
  (1) Trafficking in forced commercial sex is a Class 6 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
  (2) Penalty enhancements. The penalty classification of this offense is increased by one class when the actor commits the offense:
    (A) Reckless as to the fact that the complainant is under 18 years of age, or, in fact, the complainant is under 12 years of age; or
    (B) By recklessly holding the complainant, or causing the complainant to provide commercial sex acts, for a total of more than 180 days.

(c) Definitions. The terms "intent," "knowingly," "reckless," and "recklessly," have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "bodily injury," "coercive threat," "commercial sex act," "complainant," "debt bondage," and "effective consent" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-1605. Sex Trafficking of a Minor or Adult Incapable of Consenting.

(a) Offense. An actor commits sex trafficking of a minor or adult incapable of consenting when the actor:
  (1) Knowingly recruits, entices, houses, transports, provides, obtains, or maintains by any means the complainant;
  (2) With intent that the complainant, as a result, will be caused to engage in or submit to a commercial sex act with or for another person; and
  (3) Reckless as to the fact that the complainant is:
    (A) Under 18 years of age;
    (B) Incapable of appraising the nature of the commercial sex act or of understanding the right to give or withhold consent to the commercial sex act, either due to a drug, intoxicant, or other substance, or, due to an intellectual, developmental, or mental disability or mental illness when the actor has no similarly serious disability or illness; or
    (C) Incapable of communicating willingness or unwillingness to engage in the commercial sex act.

(b) Penalties.
  (1) Sex trafficking of a minor or adult incapable of consenting is a Class 5 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
  (2) Penalty enhancements. The penalty classification of this offense is increased by one class when the actor commits the offense and recklessly holds the complainant, or causes the complainant to provide commercial sex acts, for a total of more than 180 days.

(c) Definitions. The terms "intent," "knowingly," "reckless," and "recklessly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; and the terms "actor," "commercial sex act," "complainant," and "consent" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-1606. Benefiting from Human Trafficking.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree benefiting from human trafficking when the actor:
  (1) Knowingly obtains any financial benefit or property;
  (2) By participating in a group of 2 or more persons;
  (3) Reckless as to the fact that the group is engaging in conduct that, in fact: constitutes forced commercial sex under RCC § 22E-1602, trafficking in forced commercial sex under RCC § 22E-1604, or sex trafficking of a minor or adult incapable of consenting under RCC § 22E-1605; and

(4) The actor's participation in the group furthers, in any manner, the conduct that constitutes a human trafficking offense.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree benefiting from human trafficking when the actor:

(1) Knowingly obtains any financial benefit or property;

(2) By participation in a group of 2 or more persons;

(3) Reckless as to the fact that the group is engaging in conduct that, in fact: constitutes forced labor under RCC § 22E-1601 or trafficking in labor under RCC § 22E-1603; and

(4) In fact, the actor's participation in the group furthers, in any manner, the conduct that constitutes a human trafficking offense.

(c) Penalties.

(1) First degree benefitting from human trafficking is a Class 6 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(2) Second degree benefitting from human trafficking is a Class 7 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(d) Definitions. The terms "knowingly" and "reckless" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "labor," and "property" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-1607. Misuse of Documents in Furtherance of Human Trafficking.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree misuse of documents in furtherance of human trafficking when the actor:

(1) Knowingly destroys, conceals, removes, confiscates, or possesses any actual or purported government identification document, including a passport or other immigration document of any person;

(2) With intent to restrict the person's liberty to move or travel in order to maintain performance of a commercial sex act by the person.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree misuse of documents in furtherance of human trafficking when the actor:

(1) Knowingly destroys, conceals, removes, confiscates, or possesses any actual or purported government identification document, including a passport or other immigration document of any person;

(2) With intent to restrict the person's liberty to move or travel in order to maintain the services of the person.

(c) Penalties.

(1) First degree misuse of documents in furtherance of human trafficking is a Class 8 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(2) Second degree misuse of documents in furtherance of human trafficking is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(d) Definitions. The terms "intent" and "knowingly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; and the terms "actor," "commercial sex act," "possesses," and "services" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-1608. Commercial Sex with a Trafficked Person.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree commercial sex with a trafficked person when the actor:
  (1) Knowingly engages in a commercial sex act;
  (2) When a coercive threat, explicit or implicit, or debt bondage by another person causes the complainant to submit to or engage in the commercial sex act;
  (3) Reckless as to the fact that the complainant is under 18 years of age, or, in fact, the complainant is under 12 years of age.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree commercial sex with a trafficked person when the actor:
  (1) Knowingly engages in a commercial sex act;
  (2) When either:
    (A) An explicit or implicit coercive threat, or debt bondage by another person causes the complainant to submit to or engage in the commercial sex act; or
    (B) The complainant is recruited, enticed, housed, transported, provided, obtained, or maintained for the purpose of causing the person to submit to or engage in the commercial sex act; and:
      (i) The actor is reckless that the complainant is under 18 years of age;
      (ii) Incapable of appraising the nature of the commercial sex act or of understanding the right to give or withhold consent to the commercial sex act, either due to a drug, intoxicant, or other substance, or, due to an intellectual, developmental, or mental disability or mental illness when the actor has no similarly serious disability or illness; or
      (iii) Incapable of communicating willingness or unwillingness to engage in the commercial sex act; or
      (iv) The complainant is, in fact, under 12 years of age.

(c) Penalties.
  (1) First degree commercial sex with a trafficked person is a Class 3 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(2) Second degree commercial sex with a trafficked person is a Class 4 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(d) Definitions. The terms "purpose," "knowingly," and "reckless" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "coercive threat," "commercial sex act," "complainant," "consent," and "debt bondage" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-1609. Forfeiture.

(a) Forfeiture penalty. In imposing sentence on any person convicted of a violation of this chapter, the court may order, in addition to any sentence imposed, that the person shall forfeit to the District of Columbia:
(1) Any interest in any property, real or personal, that was used or planned to be used to commit or to facilitate the commission of the violation; and
(2) Any property, real or personal, constituting or derived from any proceeds that the person obtained, directly or indirectly, as a result of the violation.

(b) Property subject to forfeiture. The following shall be subject to forfeiture to the District of Columbia and no property right shall exist in them:
(1) Any property, real or personal, that was used or planned to be used to commit or to facilitate the commission of any violation of this chapter; and
(2) Any property, real or personal, which constitutes or is derived from proceeds traceable to any violation of this chapter.

(c) Definitions. The term "property" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-1610. Reputation or Opinion Evidence.

In a criminal case in which a person is accused of forced commercial sex under RCC § 22E-1602; trafficking in forced commercial sex under RCC § 22E-1604; sex trafficking of a minor or adult incapable of consenting under RCC § 22E-1605; or benefitting from human trafficking under RCC § 22E-1606; reputation or opinion evidence of the past sexual behavior of the alleged victim is not admissible. Evidence of an alleged victim's past sexual behavior other than reputation or opinion evidence also is not admissible, unless such evidence other than reputation or opinion evidence is admitted in accordance with RCC § 22E-1311 (b) and is constitutionally required to be admitted.

RCC § 22E-1611. Civil Action.

(a) An individual who is a victim of an offense prohibited by RCC §§ 22E-1601, 22E-1602, 22E-1603, 22E-1604, 22E-1605, 22E-1606, 22E-1607, or 22E-1608 may bring a civil action in the Superior Court of the District of Columbia. The court may award actual damages, compensatory damages, punitive damages, injunctive relief, and any other appropriate relief. A prevailing plaintiff shall also be awarded attorney's fees and costs. Treble damages shall be awarded on proof of actual damages where a defendant's acts were willful and malicious.

(b) Any action for recovery of damages arising out of an offense in this chapter may not be brought after 5 years from when the victim knew, or reasonably should have been aware, of any act constituting an offense in this chapter, or if the offense occurred while the victim was less than 35 years of age, the date that the victim turns 40 years of age, whichever is later.

(c) If a person entitled to sue is imprisoned, insane, or similarly incapacitated at the time the cause of action accrues, so that it is impossible or impracticable for the person to bring an action, then the time of the incapacity is not part of the time limited for the commencement of the action.

(d) A defendant is estopped to assert a defense of the statute of limitations when the expiration of the statute is due to conduct by the defendant inducing the plaintiff to delay the filing of the action.

(e) Definitions. The term "act" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-202.

RCC § 22E-1612. Limitation on Liabilities and Sentencing for RCC Chapter 16 Offenses.

(a) Accomplice liability for victims of trafficking. A person shall not be charged as an accomplice to the commission of an offense under this chapter if, prior to commission of the offense, the person was themself a victim of an offense under this chapter by the principal within 3 years prior to the conduct by the principal that constitutes the offense.

(b) Conspiracy liability for victims of trafficking. A person shall not be charged with conspiracy to commit an offense under this chapter if, prior to the conspiracy, the person was themself a victim of an offense under this chapter by a party to the conspiracy within 3 years prior to the formation of the conspiracy.

RCC § 22E-1613. Civil Forfeiture.

(a) Property subject to forfeiture. The following are subject to civil forfeiture:
  (1) In fact, all conveyances, including aircraft, vehicles or vessels, which are possessed with intent to be used, or are, in fact, used, to facilitate the commission of an offense under this chapter; and
  (2) In fact, all money, coins, and currency which are possessed with intent to be used, or are, in fact, used, to facilitate the commission of an offense under this chapter.

(b) Requirements for forfeiture. All seizures and forfeitures under this section shall be pursuant to the standards and procedures set forth in D.C. Law 20-278.

(c) Definitions. The term "intent" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the term "possessed" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-701.

Chapter 18. Stalking, Obscenity, and Invasions of Privacy.

RCC § 22E-1801. Stalking.

(a) Offense. An actor commits stalking when the actor:
  (1) Purposely engages in a course of conduct directed at a complainant that consists of 2 or more separate occasions of any of the following:
    (A) Physically following or physically monitoring the complainant;
    (B) Falsely personating the complainant;
    (C) Contacting the complainant, by use of a telephone, mail, delivery service, electronic message, in person, or any other means, negligent as to the fact that the contact is without the complainant's effective consent; or
    (D) In fact, committing, soliciting, or attempting:
      (i) Criminal Threats under RCC § 22E-1204;
      (ii) Theft under RCC § 22E-2101;
      (iii) Identity Theft under RCC § 22E-2205;
      (iv) Arson under RCC § 22E-2501;
      (v) Criminal Damage to Property under RCC § 22E-2503;
      (vi) Criminal Graffiti under RCC § 22E-2504;
      (vii) Trespass under RCC § 22E-2601;
      (viii) Breach of Home Privacy under RCC § 22E-4205; or
      (ix) Indecent Exposure under RCC § 22E-4206;
  (2) Negligent as to the fact that the course of conduct is without the complainant's effective consent;
  (3) Either:
    (A) With intent to cause the complainant to:
      (i) Fear for the complainant's safety or the safety of another person; or
      (ii) Suffer significant emotional distress; or
    (B) Negligently causing the complainant to:
      (i) Fear for the complainant's safety or the safety of another person; or
      (ii) Suffer significant emotional distress.

(b) Exclusions from liability.
  (1) An actor does not commit an offense under subparagraph (a)(1)(C) of this section when, in fact, the actor is expressing an opinion on a political or public matter, and the expression is directed to a complainant who is a law enforcement officer, District official, candidate for elected office, or employee of a business that serves the public, while the complainant is involved in their official duties.

(2) An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor is:
(A) Authorized to engage in the conduct by a court order or District statute, regulation, rule, or license; or
(B) Carrying out a specific, lawful commercial purpose or employment duty, when acting within the reasonable scope of that purpose or duty.

(c) Unit of prosecution. Where conduct is of a continuing nature, each 24-hour period constitutes one occasion.

(d) Penalties.
(1) Stalking is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(2) Penalty enhancements. The penalty classification of this offense is increased by one class when the actor, in fact:
(A) Violates a court order or condition of release prohibiting or restricting contact with the complainant;
(B) Has one or more prior convictions within 10 years for:
(i) Stalking under RCC § 22E-1801 or a comparable offense; or
(ii) Electronic Stalking under RCC § 22E-1802 or a comparable offense;
(C) Causes more than $5,000 in financial injury; or
(D) Is 18 years of age or older, is at least 4 years older than the complainant, and is reckless as to the fact that the complainant is under 18 years of age.
(3) No repeat offender enhancement. A person shall not be subject to both a penalty enhancement under subparagraph (d)(2)(B) of this section and a repeat offender penalty enhancement in RCC § 22E-606 for the same conduct.

(e) Definitions.
(1) The terms "intent," "negligent," "negligently," "purpose," "purposely," and "reckless" have the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the terms "actor," "comparable offense," "complainant," "District official," "effective consent," "financial injury," "law enforcement officer," "physically following," "physically monitoring," "prior conviction," and "significant emotional distress" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and
(2) In this section, the term "safety" means ongoing security from significant intrusions on one's bodily integrity or bodily movement.

RCC § 22E-1802. Electronic Stalking.

(a) Offense. An actor commits electronic stalking when the actor:
(1) Purposely engages in a course of conduct directed at a complainant that consists of 2 or more separate occasions of:

(A) Creating an image or an audio recording of the complainant, other than a derivative image or audio recording; or

(B) Accessing monitoring equipment or software, on property of another, that discloses the complainant's location;

(2) Negligent as to the fact that the course of conduct is without the complainant's effective consent;

(3) Either:

(A) With intent to cause the complainant to:

(i) Fear for the complainant's safety or the safety of another person; or

(ii) Suffer significant emotional distress; or

(B) Negligently causing the complainant to:

(i) Fear for the complainant's safety or the safety of another person; or

(ii) Suffer significant emotional distress.

(b) Exclusions from liability.

(1) An actor does not commit an offense under subparagraph (a)(1)(A) of this section when, in fact:

(A) The actor is a party to the communication on the audio recording; or

(B) One of the parties to the communication on the audio recording gives effective consent to the conduct.

(2) An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor is:

(A) Authorized to engage in the conduct by a court order or District statute, regulation, rule, or license; or

(B) Carrying out a specific, lawful commercial purpose or employment duty, when acting within the reasonable scope of that purpose or duty.

(c) Unit of prosecution. Where conduct is of a continuing nature, each 24-hour period constitutes one occasion.

(d) Penalties.

(1) Electronic stalking is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(2) Penalty enhancements. The penalty classification of this offense is increased by one class when the actor, in fact:

(A) Violates a court order or condition of release prohibiting or restricting contact with the complainant;

(B) Has one or more prior convictions within 10 years for:

(i) Stalking under RCC § 22E-1801 or a comparable offense; or

(ii) Electronic Stalking under RCC § 22E-1802 or a comparable offense;

(C) Causes more than $5,000 in financial injury; or

(D) Is 18 years of age or older, is at least 4 years older than the complainant, and is reckless as to the fact that the complainant is under 18 years of age.

(3) No repeat offender enhancement. A person shall not be subject to both a penalty enhancement under subparagraph (d)(2)(B) of this section and a repeat offender penalty enhancement in RCC § 22E-606 for the same conduct.

(e) Definitions.

(1) The terms "intent," "negligent," "negligently," "purpose," "purposely," and "reckless" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the terms "actor," "comparable offense," "complainant," "effective consent," "financial injury," "image," "monitoring equipment or software," "prior conviction," "property of another," and "significant emotional distress" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and

(2) In this section, the term "safety" means ongoing security from significant intrusions on one's bodily integrity or bodily movement.

RCC § 22E-1803. Voyeurism.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree voyeurism when the actor:

(1) Knowingly creates:

(A) An image, other than a derivative image, of the complainant's nude or undergarment-clad genitals, pubic area, anus, buttocks, or female breast below the top of the areola;

(B) An image or audio recording, other than a derivative image or audio recording, of the complainant engaging in or submitting to a sexual act or masturbation; or

(C) An image, other than a derivative image, of the complainant urinating or defecating;

(2) Without the complainant's effective consent; and

(3) In fact, the complainant has a reasonable expectation of privacy under the circumstances.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree voyeurism when the actor:

(1) Knowingly observes directly:

(A) The complainant's nude or undergarment-clad genitals, anus, pubic area, buttocks, or female breast below the top of the areola;

(B) The complainant engaging in or submitting to a sexual act or masturbation; or

(C) The complainant urinating or defecating.

(2) Without the complainant's effective consent; and

(3) In fact, the complainant has a reasonable expectation of privacy under the circumstances.

(c) Penalties.

(1) First degree voyeurism is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(2) Second degree voyeurism is a Class B crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(3) Penalty enhancements. The penalty classification of any gradation of this offense is increased by one class when the actor is reckless as to the fact that the complainant is under 18 years of age.

(d) Definitions. The terms "knowingly" and "reckless" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "complainant," "effective consent," "image," and "sexual act" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-1804. Unauthorized Disclosure of a Sexual Recording.

(a) Offense. An actor commits unauthorized disclosure of a sexual recording when the actor:
(1) Knowingly distributes or displays to a person other than the complainant, or makes accessible on an electronic platform to a user other than the complainant or actor:
(A) An image of the complainant's:
(i) Nude genitals or anus; or
(ii) Nude or undergarment-clad pubic area, buttocks, or female breast below the top of the areola; or
(B) An image or an audio recording of the complainant engaging in or submitting to a sexual act, masturbation, or sadomasochistic abuse;
(2) Without the complainant's effective consent; and
(3) Either:
(A) After reaching an explicit or implicit agreement with the complainant that the image or audio recording will not be distributed or displayed, with intent to:
(i) Alarm or sexually abuse, humiliate, harass, or degrade the complainant; or
(ii) Receive financial gain as a result of the distribution or display; or
(B) In fact, after personally obtaining the image or audio recording by committing a District offense that is, in fact:
(i) Voyeurism under RCC § 22E-1803;
(ii) Theft under RCC § 22E-2101;
(iii) Unauthorized Use of Property under RCC § 22E-2102; or
(iv) Extortion under RCC § 22E-2102.

(b) Exclusions from liability.
(1) An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor is a licensee under the Communications Act of 1934 (47

U.S.C. § 151 et seq.) engaged in activities regulated pursuant to such Act.

(2) An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor is an interactive computer service, as defined in section 230(e)(2) of the Communications Act of 1934, approved February 8, 1996 (110 Stat. 139; 47 U.S.C. § 230(f)(2)), for content provided by another person.

(c) Affirmative defense. It is an affirmative defense to liability under this section, that the actor:

(1) With intent, exclusively and in good faith, to report possible illegal conduct or seek legal counsel from any attorney;

(2) Distributed the image or audio recording to a person whom the actor reasonably believes is:

(A) A law enforcement officer, prosecutor, or attorney; or

(B) A teacher, school counselor, school administrator, or a person with a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of a person who is:

(i) Depicted in the image or audio recording; or

(ii) Involved in the creation of the image or audio recording.

(d) Penalties.

(1) Unauthorized disclosure of a sexual recording is a Class B crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(2) Penalty enhancements. The penalty classification of this offense is increased by two classes when the actor knowingly:

(A) Distributes or displays the image or audio recording to 6 or more persons other than the complainant; or

(B) Makes the image or audio recording publicly accessible on an electronic platform to a user other than the complainant or actor.

(e) Definitions.

(1) The terms "intent" and "knowingly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the terms "actor," "complainant," "effective consent," "image," "law enforcement officer," "sadomasochistic abuse," and "sexual act" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and

(2) In this section, the term "licensee" has the meaning specified in 47 U.S.C. § 153(30).

RCC § 22E-1805. Distribution of an Obscene Image.

(a) Offense. An actor commits distribution of an obscene image when the actor:

(1) Knowingly distributes or displays to a complainant an image that depicts a real or fictitious person engaging in or submitting to an actual or simulated:

(A) Sexual act;
(B) Sadomasochistic abuse;
(C) Masturbation;
(D) Sexual or sexualized display of the genitals, pubic area, or anus, when there is less than a full opaque covering;
(E) Sexual contact; or
(F) Sexual or sexualized display of the breast below the top of the areola, or buttocks, when there is less than a full opaque covering;

(2) Without the complainant's effective consent; and
(3) Reckless as to the fact that the image is obscene.

(b) Exclusions from liability.

(1) An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor is a licensee under the Communications Act of 1934 (47 U.S.C. § 151 et seq.) engaged in activities regulated pursuant to such Act.
(2) An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor is an interactive computer service, as defined in section 230(e)(2) of the Communications Act of 1934, approved February 8, 1996 (110 Stat. 139; 47 U.S.C. § 230(f)(2)), for content provided by another person.
(3) An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor distributes or displays an image to a complainant in a location open to the general public or in an electronic forum, unless the actor:
(A) Knowingly distributes or displays the image directly to the complainant; or
(B) Purposely distributes or displays the image to the complainant.
(4) An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor reasonably believes that they are distributing the image or audio recording to:
(A) A person who is depicted in the image or audio recording;
(B) A person who was involved in the creation or distribution of the image or audio recording; or
(C) A person with a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of a person who is:
(i) Depicted in the image or audio recording; or
(ii) Involved in the creation of the image or audio recording.

(c) Affirmative defenses.

(1) It is an affirmative defense to liability under this section that the actor, in fact:
(A) Is an employee of a school, museum, library, movie theater, or other venue;
(B) Is acting within the reasonable scope of that role; and
(C) Has no control over the selection of the image.
(2) It is an affirmative defense to liability under this section, that the actor:

(A) With intent, exclusively and in good faith, to report possible illegal conduct or seek legal counsel from any attorney;
(B) Distributed the image or audio recording to a person whom the actor reasonably believes is:
(i) A law enforcement officer, prosecutor, or attorney; or
(ii) A teacher, school counselor, school administrator.

(d) Penalties. Distribution of an obscene image is a Class C crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(e) Definitions.
(1) The terms "intent," "knowingly," "purposely," and "reckless" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the terms "actor," "complainant," "effective consent," "image," "law enforcement officer," "movie theater," "obscene," "open to the general public," "sadomasochistic abuse," "sexual act," "sexual contact," and "simulated" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and
(2) In this section, the term "licensee" has the meaning specified in 47 U.S.C. § 153(30).

RCC § 22E-1806. Distribution of an Obscene Image to a Minor.

(a) Offense. An actor commits distribution of an obscene image to a minor when the actor:
(1) Knowingly distributes or displays to a complainant an image that depicts a real or fictitious person engaging in or submitting to an actual or simulated:
(A) Sexual act;
(B) Sadomasochistic abuse;
(C) Masturbation;
(D) Sexual or sexualized display of the genitals, pubic area, or anus, when there is less than a full opaque covering;
(E) Sexual contact; or
(F) Sexual or sexualized display of the breast below the top of the areola or buttocks, when there is less than a full opaque covering;
(2) Reckless as to the fact that:
(A) The image is obscene; and
(B) The complainant is under 16 years of age; and
(3) In fact, the actor is 18 years of age or older and at least 4 years older than the complainant.
(b) Exclusions from liability.
(1) An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor is a licensee under the Communications Act of 1934 (47 U.S.C. § 151 et seq.) engaged in activities regulated pursuant to such Act.

(2) An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor is an interactive computer service, as defined in section 230(e)(2) of the Communications Act of 1934, approved February 8, 1996 (110 Stat. 139; 47 U.S.C. § 230(f)(2)), for content provided by another person.

(3) An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor distributes or displays an image to a complainant in a location open to the general public or in an electronic forum, unless the actor:

(A) Knowingly distributes or displays the image directly to the complainant; or

(B) Purposely distributes or displays the image to the complainant.

(4) An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor reasonably believes that they are distributing the image or audio recording to:

(A) A person who is depicted in the image or audio recording;

(B) A person who was involved in the creation or distribution of the image or audio recording; or

(C) A person with a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of a person who is:

(i) Depicted in the image or audio recording; or

(ii) Involved in the creation of the image or audio recording.

(c) Affirmative defenses.

(1) It is an affirmative defense to liability under this section that the actor in fact:

(A) Is an employee of a school, museum, library, movie theater, or other venue;

(B) Is acting within the reasonable scope of that role; and

(C) Has no control over the selection of the image.

(2) It is an affirmative defense to liability under this section that, in fact:

(A) The actor:

(i) Is married to, or in a domestic partnership with, the complainant; or

(ii) Is no more than 4 years older than the complainant and in a romantic, dating, or sexual relationship with the complainant; and

(B) The complainant gives effective consent to the conduct or the actor reasonably believes that complainant gave effective consent to the conduct.

(d) Penalties. Distribution of an obscene image to a minor is a Class B crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(e) Definitions.

(1) The terms "knowingly," "purposely," and "reckless" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the terms "actor,"

"complainant," "domestic partnership," "effective consent," "image," "movie theater," "obscene," "open to the general public," "sadomasochistic abuse," "sexual act," "sexual contact," and "simulated" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and

(2) In this section, the term "licensee" has the meaning specified in 47 U.S.C. § 153(30).

RCC § 22E-1807. Creating or Trafficking an Obscene Image of a Minor.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree creating or trafficking an obscene image of a minor when the actor:

(1) Knowingly:

(A) Creates an image, other than a derivative image, by recording, photographing, or filming the complainant, or produces or directs the creation of such an image;

(B) As a person with a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant, gives effective consent for the complainant to engage in or submit to the recording, photographing, or filming of an image, other than a derivative image;

(C) Displays, distributes, or manufactures with intent to distribute an image;

(D) Makes an image accessible to another user on an electronic platform; or

(E) Sells or advertises an image;

(2) Is reckless as to the fact that the image depicts, or will depict, in part or whole, the body of a real complainant under 18 years of age engaging in or submitting to:

(A) A sexual act or simulated sexual act;

(B) Sadomasochistic abuse or simulated sadomasochistic abuse;

(C) Masturbation or simulated masturbation; or

(D) A sexual or sexualized display of the genitals, pubic area, or anus, when there is less than a full opaque covering.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree creating or trafficking an obscene image of a minor when the actor:

(1) Knowingly:

(A) Creates an image, other than a derivative image, by recording, photographing, or filming the complainant, or produces or directs the creation of such an image;

(B) As a person with a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant, gives effective consent for the complainant to engage in or submit to the recording, photographing, or filming of an image, other than a derivative image;

(C) Displays, distributes, or manufactures with intent to distribute an image;

(D) Makes an image accessible to another user on an electronic platform; or

(E) Sells or advertises an image;

(2) Is reckless as to the fact that the image depicts, or will depict, in part or whole, the body of a real complainant under 18 years of age engaging in or submitting to:

(A) An obscene sexual contact; or

(B) An obscene sexual or sexualized display of the breast below the top of the areola, or the buttocks, when there is less than a full opaque covering.

(c) Exclusions from liability.

(1) An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor is a licensee under the Communications Act of 1934 (47 U.S.C. § 151 et seq.) engaged in activities regulated pursuant to such Act.

(2) An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor is an interactive computer service, as defined in section 230(e)(2) of the Communications Act of 1934, approved February 8, 1996 (110 Stat. 139; 47 U.S.C. § 230(f)(2)), for content provided by another person.

(d) Affirmative defenses.

(1) It is an affirmative defense to liability under subsection (a) of this section that, in fact, the image has, or will have, serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value, when considered as a whole.

(2) It is an affirmative defense to liability under subparagraphs (a)(1)(A), (a)(1)(B), (a)(1)(C), (a)(1)(D), (b)(1)(A), (b)(1)(B), (b)(1)(C), and (b)(1)(D) of this section that, in fact:

(A) The actor is under 18 years of age; and

(B) Either:

(i) The actor is the only person under 18 years of age who is, or who will be, depicted in the image; or

(ii) The actor reasonably believes that every person under 18 years of age who is, or who will be, depicted in the image, gives effective consent to the actor to engage in the conduct constituting the offense.

(3) It is an affirmative defense to liability under subparagraphs (a)(1)(A), (a)(1)(C), (a)(1)(D), (b)(1)(A), (b)(1)(C), and (b)(1)(D) of this section that, in fact:

(A) The actor is at least 18 years of age;

(B) Either:

(i) The actor is married to, or in a domestic partnership with, the complainant; or

(ii) The actor is in a romantic, dating, or sexual relationship with the complainant, and:

(I) When the complainant is under 16 years of age, the actor is less than 4 years older than the complainant; and

(II) When the complainant is under 18 years of age and the actor is at least 4 years older than the complainant, the actor is not in a position of trust with or authority over the complainant; and

(C) The complainant is the only person who is, or who will be, depicted in the image, or the actor and the complainant are the only persons who are, or who will be, depicted in the image;

(D) The actor reasonably believes that the complainant gives effective consent to the actor to engage in the conduct constituting the offense; and

(E) Under subparagraphs (a)(1)(C), (b)(1)(C), (a)(1)(D), and (b)(1)(D), the actor reasonably believes that the recipient, the planned recipient, or the user of the electronic platform is the complainant.

(4) It is an affirmative defense to liability under subparagraphs (a)(1)(C) and (b)(1)(C) of this section for displaying or distributing an image that the actor:

(A) With intent, exclusively and in good faith, to report possible illegal conduct or seek legal counsel from any attorney;

(B) In fact, distributes or displays the image to a person whom the actor reasonably believes is:

(i) A law enforcement officer, prosecutor, or attorney; or

(ii) A teacher, school counselor, school administrator, or person with a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of a person that the actor reasonably believes to be depicted in the image or involved in the creation of the image.

(5) It is an affirmative defense to liability under subparagraphs (a)(1)(C), (a)(1)(D), (a)(1)(E), (b)(1)(C), (b)(1)(D), and (b)(1)(E) of this section that the actor, in fact:

(A) Is an employee of a school, museum, library, movie theater, or other venue;

(B) Is acting within the reasonable scope of that role; and

(C) Has no control over the creation or selection of the image.

(e) Penalties.

(1) First degree creating or trafficking an obscene image of a minor is a Class 7 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(2) Second degree creating or trafficking an obscene image of a minor is a Class 8 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(f) Definitions.

(1) The terms "intent," "knowingly," and "reckless" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the terms "actor," "complainant," "domestic partnership," "effective consent," "image," "law enforcement officer," "movie theater," "obscene," "position of trust with or authority over," "sadomasochistic abuse," "sexual act," "sexual contact," and "simulated" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and

(2) In this section, the term "licensee" has the meaning specified in 47 U.S.C. § 153(30).

RCC § 22E-1808. Possession of an Obscene Image of a Minor.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree possession of an obscene image of a minor when the actor:

(1) Knowingly possesses an image;

(2) Is reckless as to the fact that the image depicts, in part or whole, the body of a real complainant under 18 years of age engaging in or submitting to:

(A) A sexual act or simulated sexual act;

(B) Sadomasochistic abuse or simulated sadomasochistic abuse;

(C) Masturbation or simulated masturbation; or

(D) A sexual or sexualized display of the genitals, pubic area, or anus, when there is less than a full opaque covering.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree possession of an obscene image of a minor when the actor:

(1) Knowingly possesses an image;

(2) Is reckless as to the fact that the image depicts, in part or whole, the body of a real complainant under 18 years of age engaging in or submitting to:

(A) An obscene sexual contact; or

(B) An obscene sexual or sexualized display of the breast below the top of the areola, or the buttocks, when there is less than a full opaque covering.

(c) Exclusions from liability.

(1) An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor is a licensee under the Communications Act of 1934 (47 U.S.C. § 151 et seq.) engaged in activities regulated pursuant to such Act.

(2) An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor is an interactive computer service, as defined in section 230(e)(2) of the Communications Act of 1934, approved February 8, 1996 (110 Stat. 139; 47 U.S.C. § 230(f)(2)), for content provided by another person.

(d) Affirmative defenses.

(1) It is an affirmative defense to liability under subsection (a) of this section that, in fact, the image has serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value, when considered as a whole.
(2) It is an affirmative defense to liability under this section that, in fact:
    (A) The actor is under 18 years of age; and
    (B) Either:
        (i) The actor is the only person under 18 years of age who is depicted in the image; or
        (ii) The actor reasonably believes that every person under 18 years of age who is depicted in the image gives effective consent to the actor to engage in the conduct constituting the offense.
(3) It is an affirmative defense to liability under this section that, in fact:
    (A) The actor is at least 18 years of age;
    (B) Either:
        (i) The actor is married to, or in a domestic partnership with, the complainant; or
        (ii) The actor is in a romantic, dating, or sexual relationship with the complainant, and:
            (I) When the complainant is under 16 years of age, the actor is less than 4 years older than the complainant; and
            (II) When the complainant is under 18 years of age and the actor is at least 4 years older than the complainant, the actor is not in a position of trust with or authority over the complainant; and
    (C) The complainant is the only person who is depicted in the image, or the actor and the complainant are the only persons who are depicted in the image; and
    (D) The actor reasonably believes that the complainant gives effective consent to the actor to engage in the conduct constituting the offense.
(4) It is an affirmative defense to liability under this section that the actor:
    (A) With intent, exclusively and in good faith, to report possible illegal conduct or to seek legal counsel from any attorney;
    (B) In fact, promptly contacts a person whom the actor reasonably believes is:
        (i) A law enforcement officer, prosecutor, or attorney; or
        (ii) A teacher, school counselor, school administrator, or person with a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant that the actor reasonably believes to be depicted in the image; and
    (C) Either:

(i) Promptly distributes the image to one of the individuals specified in sub-subparagraph (d)(3)(B)(i) or sub-subparagraph (d)(3)(B)(ii) of this section, without making or retaining a copy; or

(ii) Affords a law enforcement officer access to the image.

(5) It is an affirmative defense to liability under this section that the actor, in fact:

(A) Is an employee of a school, museum, library, movie theater, or other venue;

(B) Is acting within the reasonable scope of that role; and

(C) Has no control over the creation or selection of the image.

(6) It is an affirmative defense to liability under this section that the actor possesses the image:

(A) With intent, exclusively and in good faith, to permanently dispose of the item; and

(B) In fact, the actor does not possess the item longer than is reasonably necessary to permanently dispose of the item.

(e) Penalties.

(1) First degree possession of an obscene image of a minor is a Class 8 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(2) Second degree possession of an obscene image of a minor is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(f) Definitions.

(1) The terms "intent," "knowingly," and "reckless" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the terms "actor," "complainant," "domestic partnership," "effective consent," "image," "law enforcement officer," "movie theater," "obscene," "position of trust with or authority over," "possess," "possesses," "sadomasochistic abuse," "sexual act," "sexual contact," and "simulated" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and

(2) In this section, the term "licensee" has the meaning specified in 47 U.S.C. § 153(30).

RCC § 22E-1809. Arranging a Live Sexual Performance of a Minor.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree arranging a live sexual performance of a minor when the actor:

(1) Knowingly:

(A) Creates, produces, or directs a live performance;

(B) As a person with a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant, gives effective consent for the complainant to engage in or submit to the creation of a live performance; or

(C) Sells admission to or advertises a live performance;

(2) Reckless as to the fact that the live performance depicts, or will depict, in part or whole, the body of a real complainant under 18 years of age engaging in or submitting to:

(A) A sexual act or simulated sexual act;

(B) Sadomasochistic abuse or simulated sadomasochistic abuse;

(C) Masturbation or simulated masturbation; or

(D) A sexual or sexualized display of the genitals, pubic area, or anus, when there is less than a full opaque covering.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree arranging a live sexual performance of a minor when the actor:

(1) Knowingly:

(A) Creates, produces, or directs a live performance;

(B) As a person with a responsibility under civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant, gives effective consent for the complainant to engage in or submit to the creation of a live performance; or

(C) Sells admission to or advertises a live performance.

(2) Reckless as to the fact that the live performance depicts, or will depict, in part or whole, the body of a real complainant under 18 years of age engaging in or submitting to:

(A) An obscene sexual contact; or

(B) An obscene sexual or sexualized display of the breast below the top of the areola, or the buttocks, when there is less than a full opaque covering.

(c) Affirmative defenses.

(1) It is an affirmative defense to liability under subsection (a) of this section that, in fact, the live performance has, or will have, serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value, when considered as a whole.

(2) It is an affirmative defense to liability under subparagraphs (a)(1)(A), (a)(1)(B), (b)(1)(A), and (b)(1)(B) of this section that, in fact:

(A) The actor is under 18 years of age; and

(B) Either:

(i) The actor is the only person under 18 years of age who is, or who will be, depicted in the live performance; or

(ii) The actor reasonably believes that every person under 18 years of age who is, or who will be, depicted in the live performance, gives effective consent to the actor to engage in the conduct constituting the offense.

(3) It is an affirmative defense to liability under subparagraphs (a)(1)(A) and (b)(1)(A) of this section, that, in fact:

(A) The actor is at least 18 years of age:

(B) Either:

(i) The actor is married to, or in a domestic partnership with, the complainant; or

(ii) The actor is in a romantic, dating, or sexual relationship with the complainant, and;

(I) When the complainant is under 16 years of age, the actor is less than 4 years older than the complainant; and

(II) When the complainant is under 18 years of age and the actor is at least 4 years older than the complainant, the actor is not in a position of trust with or authority over the complainant; and

(C) The complainant is the only person who is, or who will be, depicted in the live performance, or the actor and complainant are the only persons who are, or who will be, depicted in the live performance;

(D) The actor reasonably believes that the complainant gives effective consent to the actor to engage in the conduct constituting the offense; and

(E) The actor reasonably believes that the actor is the only audience for the live performance, other than the complainant.

(4) It is an affirmative defense to subparagraphs (a)(1)(C) and (b)(1)(C) that the actor, in fact:

(A) Is an employee of a school, museum, library, movie theater, or other venue;

(B) Is acting within the reasonable scope of that role;

(C) Has no control over the creation or selection of the live performance; and

(D) Does not record, photograph, or film the live performance.

(d) Penalties.

(1) First degree arranging a live sexual performance of a minor is a Class 7 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(2) Second degree arranging a live sexual performance of a minor is a Class 8 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(e) Definitions. The terms "knowingly" and "reckless" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "complainant," "domestic partnership," "effective consent," "live performance," "movie theater," "obscene," "position of trust with or authority over," "sadomasochistic abuse," "sexual act," "sexual contact," and "simulated" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-1810. Attending or Viewing a Live Sexual Performance of a Minor.

(a) First degree. An actor commits attending or viewing a live sexual performance of a minor when the actor:

(1) Knowingly attends or views a live performance or views a live broadcast;
(2) Reckless as to the fact that the live performance or live broadcast depicts, in part or whole, the body of a real complainant under 18 years of age engaging in or submitting to:
(A) A sexual act or simulated sexual act;
(B) Sadomasochistic abuse or simulated sadomasochistic abuse;
(C) Masturbation or simulated masturbation; or
(D) A sexual or sexualized display of the genitals, pubic area, or anus, when there is less than a full opaque covering.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits attending or viewing a live sexual performance of a minor when the actor:
(1) Knowingly attends or views a live performance or views a live broadcast;
(2) Reckless as to the fact that the live performance or live broadcast depicts, in part or whole, the body of a real complainant under 18 years of age engaging in or submitting to:
(A) An obscene sexual contact; or
(B) An obscene sexual or sexualized display of the breast below the top of the areola, or the buttocks, when there is less than a full opaque covering.

(c) Affirmative defenses.
(1) It is an affirmative defense to liability under this section that, in fact, the live performance or live broadcast has serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value, when considered as a whole.
(2) It is an affirmative defense to liability under this section that, in fact:
(A) The actor is under 18 years of age; and
(B) Either:
(i) The actor is the only person under 18 years of age who is depicted in the live performance or live broadcast; or
(ii) The actor reasonably believes that every person under 18 years of age who is depicted in the live performance or live broadcast gives effective consent to the actor to engage in the conduct constituting the offense.
(3) It is an affirmative defense to liability under this section that, in fact:
(A) The actor is at least 18 years of age;
(B) Either:
(i) The actor is married to, or in a domestic partnership with, the complainant; or
(ii) The actor is in a romantic, dating, or sexual relationship with the complainant, and;
(I) When the complainant is under 16 years of age, the actor is less than 4 years older than the complainant; and
(II) When the complainant is under 18 years of age and the actor is at least 4 years older than the complainant, the actor is not in a position of trust with or authority over the complainant; and

(C) The complainant is the only person that is depicted in the live performance or live broadcast, or the actor and the complainant are the only persons that are depicted in the live performance or live broadcast;

(D) The actor reasonably believes that the complainant gives effective consent to the actor to engage in the conduct constituting the offense; and

(E) The actor reasonably believes that the actor is the only audience for the live performance or live broadcast, other than the complainant.

(4) It is an affirmative defense to liability under this section that the actor, in fact:

(A) Is an employee of a school, museum, library, movie theater, or other venue;

(B) Is acting within the reasonable scope of that role;

(C) Has no control over the creation or selection of the live performance or live broadcast; and

(D) Does not record, photograph, or film the live performance or live broadcast.

(d) Penalties.

(1) First degree attending or viewing a live sexual performance of a minor is a Class 8, crime subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(2) Second degree attending or viewing a live sexual performance of a minor is a Class 9, crime subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(e) Definitions. The terms "knowingly" and "reckless" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "complainant," "domestic partnership," "effective consent," "live broadcast," "live performance," "movie theater," "obscene," "position of trust with or authority over," "sadomasochistic abuse," "sexual act," "sexual contact," and "simulated" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

SUBTITLE III. PROPERTY OFFENSES.

Chapter 20. Property Offense Subtitle Provisions.

RCC § 22E-2001. Aggregation to Determine Property Offense Grades.

(a) Requirements for aggregation. When a single scheme or systematic course of conduct could give rise to multiple charges of an offense listed in subsection (b) of this section, the government instead may bring one charge and aggregate the values, amounts of damage, or quantities of the property involved to determine the grade of the offense.

(b) Offenses subject to aggregation. Aggregation under subsection (a) of this section may be applied to the following offenses:
  (1) Theft under RCC § 22E-2101;
  (2) Unlawful Creation or Possession of a Recording under RCC § 22E-2105;
  (3) Fraud under RCC § 22E-2201;
  (4) Payment Card Fraud under RCC § 22E-2202;
  (5) Check Fraud under RCC § 22E-2203;
  (6) Forgery under RCC § 22E-2204;
  (7) Identity Theft under RCC § 22E-2205;
  (8) Unlawful Labeling of a Recording under RCC § 22E-2206;
  (9) Financial Exploitation of a Vulnerable Adult or Elderly Person under RCC § 22E-2208;
  (10) Extortion under RCC § 22E-2301;
  (11) Possession of Stolen Property under RCC § 22E-2401;
  (12) Trafficking of Stolen Property under RCC § 22E-2402;
  (13) Alteration of Motor Vehicle Identification Number under RCC § 22E-2403; and
  (14) Criminal Damage to Property under RCC § 22E-2503.

(c) Definitions. The terms "amount of damage," "property," and "value" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

Chapter 21. Theft.

RCC § 22E-2101. Theft.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree theft when the actor:
  (1) Knowingly takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over the property of another;
  (2) Without the consent of an owner;
  (3) With intent to deprive an owner of the property; and
  (4) In fact, the property has a value of $500,000 or more.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree theft when the actor:
  (1) Knowingly takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over the property of another;
  (2) Without the consent of an owner;
  (3) With intent to deprive an owner of the property; and
  (4) In fact, the property has a value of $50,000 or more.

(c) Third degree. An actor commits third degree theft when the actor:
  (1) Knowingly takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over the property of another;
  (2) Without the consent of an owner;
  (3) With intent to deprive an owner of the property; and
  (4) In fact:

(A) The property has a value of $5,000 or more; or
(B) The property is a motor vehicle.

(d) Fourth degree. An actor commits fourth degree theft when the actor:
(1) Knowingly takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over the property of another;
(2) Without the consent of an owner;
(3) With intent to deprive an owner of the property; and
(4) In fact:
(A) The property has a value of $500 or more; or
(B) The property is taken from a complainant who possesses the property within the complainant's immediate physical control.

(e) Fifth degree. An actor commits fifth degree theft when the actor:
(1) Knowingly takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over the property of another;
(2) Without the consent of an owner;
(3) With intent to deprive an owner of the property; and
(4) In fact, the property has any value.

(f) Exclusion from liability. An actor does not commit an offense under this section for conduct that, in fact, constitutes a violation of D.C. Code § 35-252, Failure to pay established fare or to present valid transfer.

(g) Penalties.
(1) First degree theft is a Class 7 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(2) Second degree theft is a Class 8 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(3) Third degree theft is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(4) Fourth degree theft is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(5) Fifth degree theft is a Class C crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(h) Definitions. The terms "intent" and "knowingly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "complainant," "consent," "deprive," "motor vehicle," "owner," "possesses," "property," "property of another," and "value" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-2102. Unauthorized Use of Property.

(a) Offense. An actor commits unauthorized use of property when the actor:
(1) Knowingly takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over the property of another;
(2) Without the effective consent of an owner.

(b) Exclusion from liability. An actor does not commit an offense under this section for conduct that, in fact, constitutes a violation of D.C. Code § 35-252, Failure to pay established fare or to present valid transfer.

(c) Defense. It is a defense to liability under this section that, in fact:
(1) The actor reasonably believes that the property is lost or was stolen by a third party; and
(2) Engages in the conduct constituting the offense with intent to return the property to a lawful owner.
(d) Penalties. Unauthorized use of property is a Class D crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(e) Definitions. The terms "intent" and "knowingly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "effective consent," "owner," "property," and "property of another" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-2103. Unauthorized Use of a Motor Vehicle.

(a) Offense. An actor commits unauthorized use of a motor vehicle when the actor:
(1) Knowingly operates a motor vehicle;
(2) Without the effective consent of an owner.
(b) Defense. It is a defense to liability under this section that, in fact:
(1) The actor reasonably believes that the motor vehicle is lost or was stolen by a third party; and
(2) Engages in the conduct constituting the offense with intent to return the motor vehicle to a lawful owner.
(c) Penalties. Unauthorized use of a motor vehicle is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(d) Definitions. The terms "intent" and "knowingly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "effective consent," "motor vehicle," and "owner" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-2104. Shoplifting.

(a) Offense. An actor commits shoplifting when the actor:
(1) Knowingly:
(A) Holds or carries on the actor's person, or conceals;
(B) Removes, alters, or transfers the price tag, serial number, or other identification mark that is imprinted on or attached to; or
(C) Transfers from one container or package to another container or package;
(2) Personal property of another that is:
(A) Displayed or offered for sale; or
(B) Held or stored on the premises in reasonably close proximity to the customer sales area, for future display or sale;
(3) With intent to take or make use of the property without complete payment.

(b) No attempt liability. The criminal attempt provision in RCC § 22E-301 does not apply to this section.

(c) Penalties. Shoplifting is a Class D crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(d) Qualified immunity. A person who displays, holds, stores, or offers for sale personal property as specified in paragraph (a)(2) of this section, or an employee or agent of such a person, who detains or causes the arrest of a person in a place where such property is displayed, held, stored, or offered for sale shall not be held liable for detention, false imprisonment, malicious prosecution, defamation, or false arrest, in any proceeding arising out of such detention or arrest, if, in fact:

(1) The person detaining or causing the arrest has, at the time thereof, probable cause to believe that the person detained or arrested committed an offense described in this section;

(2) The manner of the detention or arrest is reasonable;

(3) Law enforcement authorities are notified as soon as practicable; and

(4) The person detained or arrested is released as soon as practicable after the detention or arrest, or is surrendered to law enforcement authorities as soon as practicable.

(e) Definitions. The terms "intent" and "knowingly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "person," "property," and "property of another" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-2105. Unlawful Creation or Possession of a Recording.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree unlawful creation or possession of a recording when the actor:

(1) Knowingly makes, obtains, or possesses either:

(A) A sound recording that is a copy of an original sound recording that was fixed prior to February 15, 1972; or

(B) A sound recording or audiovisual recording of a live performance;

(2) Without the effective consent of an owner;

(3) With intent to sell, rent, or otherwise use the recording for commercial gain or advantage; and

(4) In fact, the number of recordings made, obtained, or possessed is 100 or more.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree unlawful creation or possession of a recording when the actor:

(1) Knowingly makes, obtains, or possesses either:

(A) A sound recording that is a copy of an original sound recording that was fixed prior to February 15, 1972; or

(B) A sound recording or audiovisual recording of a live performance;

(2) Without the effective consent of an owner;

(3) With intent to sell, rent, or otherwise use the recording for commercial gain or advantage; and
(4) In fact, any number of recordings were made, obtained, or possessed.

(c) Exclusions from liability. An actor does not commit an offense under this section when the actor, in fact:
(1) Copies or reproduces a sound recording or audiovisual recording in the manner specifically permitted by Title 17 of the United States Code; or
(2) Copies or reproduces a sound recording that is made by a licensed radio or television station or a cable broadcaster solely for broadcast or archival use.

(d) Penalties.
(1) First degree unlawful creation or possession of a recording is a Class C crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(2) Second degree unlawful creation or possession of a recording is a Class D crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(e) Forfeiture. Upon conviction under this section, the court may, in addition to the penalties provided by this section, order the forfeiture and destruction or other disposition of all sound recordings, audiovisual recordings, and equipment used, or attempted to be used, in violation of this section.

(f) Definitions. The terms "intent" and "knowingly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "audiovisual recording," "effective consent," "live performance," "owner," "possessed," "possesses," and "sound recording" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-2106. Unlawful Operation of a Recording Device in a Movie Theater.

(a) Offense. An actor commits unlawful operation of a recording device in a movie theater when the actor:
(1) Knowingly operates a recording device within a movie theater;
(2) Without the effective consent of an owner of the movie theater; and
(3) With intent to record a motion picture, or any part of it.

(b) Penalties. Unlawful operation of a recording device in a movie theater is a Class D crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(c) Qualified immunity. An owner of the movie theater specified in subsection (a) of this section, or the owner's employee or agent, who detains or causes the arrest of a person in, or immediately adjacent to, the movie theater, shall not be held liable for detention, false imprisonment, malicious prosecution, defamation, or false arrest in any proceeding arising out of such detention or arrest, if, in fact:
(1) The person detaining or causing the arrest has, at the time thereof, probable cause to believe that the person detained or arrested committed, or attempted to commit, an offense described in this section;

(2) The manner of the detention or arrest is reasonable;
(3) Law enforcement authorities are notified as soon as practicable; and
(4) The person detained or arrested is released as soon as practicable after the detention or arrest, or is surrendered to law enforcement authorities as soon as practicable.

(d) Forfeiture. Upon conviction under this section, the court may, in addition to the penalties provided by this section, order the forfeiture and destruction or other disposition of any recording and all equipment used, or attempted to be used, in violation of this section.

(e) Definitions. The terms "intent" and "knowingly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "effective consent," "movie theater" "owner," "person," and "recording device" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

Chapter 22. Fraud.

RCC § 22E-2201. Fraud.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree fraud when the actor:
(1) Knowingly takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over the property of another;
(2) With the consent of an owner obtained by deception;
(3) With intent to deprive an owner of the property; and
(4) In fact:
(A) The property, other than labor or services, has a value of $500,000 or more; or
(B) The property is 2080 hours or more of labor or services.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree fraud when the actor:
(1) Knowingly takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over the property of another;
(2) With the consent of an owner obtained by deception;
(3) With intent to deprive an owner of the property; and
(4) In fact:
(A) The property, other than labor or services, has a value of $50,000 or more; or
(B) The property is 160 hours or more of labor or services.

(c) Third degree. An actor commits third degree fraud when the actor:
(1) Knowingly takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over the property of another;
(2) With the consent of an owner obtained by deception;
(3) With intent to deprive an owner of the property; and
(4) In fact:

(A) The property, other than labor or services, has a value of $5,000 or more; or
(B) The property is 40 hours or more of labor or services.

(d) Fourth degree. An actor commits fourth degree fraud when the actor:
(1) Knowingly takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over the property of another;
(2) With the consent of an owner obtained by deception;
(3) With intent to deprive an owner of the property; and
(4) In fact:
(A) The property, other than labor or services, has a value of $500 or more; or
(B) The property is 8 hours or more of labor or services.

(e) Fifth degree. An actor commits fifth degree fraud when the actor:
(1) Knowingly takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over the property of another;
(2) With the consent of an owner obtained by deception;
(3) With intent to deprive an owner of the property; and
(4) In fact, the property has any value.

(f) Penalties.
(1) First degree fraud is a Class 7 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(2) Second degree fraud is a Class 8 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(3) Third degree fraud is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(4) Fourth degree fraud is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(5) Fifth degree fraud is a Class C crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(g) Definitions. The terms "intent" and "knowingly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "consent," "deception," "deprive," "labor," "owner," "property," "property of another," "services," and "value" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-2202. Payment Card Fraud.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree payment card fraud when the actor:
(1) Knowingly obtains or pays for property by using a payment card:
(A) Without the effective consent of the person to whom the payment card was issued;
(B) After the payment card was revoked or canceled;
(C) When the payment card was never issued; or

(D) For the actor's own purposes, when the actor is an employee or contractor and the payment card was issued to the actor for the employer's purposes; and

(2) In fact, the property has a value of $500,000 or more.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree payment card fraud when the actor:

(1) Knowingly obtains or pays for property by using a payment card:

(A) Without the effective consent of the person to whom the payment card was issued;

(B) After the payment card was revoked or canceled;

(C) When the payment card was never issued; or

(D) For the actor's own purposes, when the actor is an employee or contractor and the payment card was issued to the actor for the employer's purposes; and

(2) In fact, the property has a value of $50,000 or more.

(c) Third degree. An actor commits third degree payment card fraud when the actor:

(1) Knowingly obtains or pays for property by using a payment card:

(A) Without the effective consent of the person to whom the payment card was issued;

(B) After the payment card was revoked or canceled;

(C) When the payment card was never issued; or

(D) For the actor's own purposes, when the actor is an employee or contractor and the payment card was issued to the actor for the employer's purposes; and

(2) In fact, the property has a value of $5,000 or more.

(d) Fourth degree. An actor commits fourth degree payment card fraud when the actor:

(1) Knowingly obtains or pays for property by using a payment card:

(A) Without the effective consent of the person to whom the payment card was issued;

(B) After the payment card was revoked or canceled;

(C) When the payment card was never issued; or

(D) For the actor's own purposes, when the actor is an employee or contractor and the payment card was issued to the actor for the employer's purposes; and

(2) In fact, the property has a value of $500 or more.

(e) Fifth degree. An actor commits fifth degree payment card fraud when the actor:

(1) Knowingly obtains or pays for property by using a payment card:

(A) Without the effective consent of the person to whom the payment card was issued; or

(B) After the payment card was revoked or canceled; or

(C) When the payment card was never issued; or

(D) For the actor's own purposes, when the actor is an employee or contractor and the payment card was issued to the actor for the employer's purposes; and

(2) In fact, the property has any value.

(f) Penalties.

(1) First degree payment card fraud is a Class 7 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(2) Second degree payment card fraud is a Class 8 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(3) Third degree payment card fraud is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(4) Fourth degree payment card fraud is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(5) Fifth degree payment card fraud is a Class C crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(g) Definitions. The term "knowingly" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "effective consent," "payment card," "person," "property," "revoked or canceled," and "value" have the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-2203. Check Fraud.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree check fraud when the actor:

(1) Knowingly obtains or pays for property by using a check;

(2) With intent that the check not be honored in full upon presentation to the bank or depository institution drawn upon; and

(3) The amount of loss to the check holder is, in fact, $5,000 or more.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree check when the actor:

(1) Knowingly obtains or pays for property by using a check;

(2) With intent that the check not be honored in full upon presentation to the bank or depository institution drawn upon; and

(3) The amount of loss to the check holder is, in fact, $500 or more.

(c) Third degree. An actor commits second degree check when the actor:

(1) Knowingly obtains or pays for property by using a check;

(2) With intent that the check not be honored in full upon presentation to the bank or depository institution drawn upon; and

(3) The amount of loss to the check holder is, in fact, any amount.

(d) Penalties.

(1) First degree check fraud is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(2) Second degree check fraud is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(3) Third degree check fraud is a Class C crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(e) Definitions. The terms "intent" and "knowingly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "check," and "property" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-2204. Forgery.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree forgery when the actor:
(1) Commits third degree forgery; and
(2) The written instrument appears to be, in fact:
(A) A stock certificate, bond, or other instrument representing an interest in or claim against a corporation or other organization of its property;
(B) A public record, or instrument filed in a public office or with a public servant;
(C) A written instrument officially issued or created by a public office, public servant, or government instrumentality;
(D) A deed, will, codicil, contract, assignment, commercial instrument, or other instrument which does or may evidence, create, transfer, terminate, or otherwise affect a legal right, interest, obligation, or status; or
(E) A written instrument having a value of $50,000 or more.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree forgery when the actor:
(1) Commits third degree forgery; and
(2) The written instrument appears to be, in fact:
(A) A token, fare card, public transportation transfer certificate, or other article manufactured for use as a symbol of value in place of money for the purchase of property or services;
(B) A prescription of a duly licensed physician or other person authorized to issue the same for any controlled substance or other instrument or devices used in the taking or administering of controlled substances for which a prescription is required by law; or
(C) A written instrument having a value of $5,000 or more.

(c) Third degree. An actor commits third degree forgery when the actor:
(1) Knowingly does any of the following:
(A) Alters a written instrument without authorization, and the written instrument is reasonably adapted to deceive a person into believing it is genuine;

(B) Makes or completes a written instrument:
(i) That appears:
(I) To be the act of another who did not authorize that act, or
(II) To have been made or completed at a time or place or in a numbered sequence other than was in fact the case, or
(III) To be a copy of an original when no such original existed; and
(ii) The written instrument is reasonably adapted to deceive a person into believing the written instrument is genuine; or
(C) Transmits or otherwise uses a written instrument that was made, signed, or altered in a manner specified in subparagraphs (c)(1)(A) or (c)(1)(B);
(2) With intent to:
(A) Obtain the property of another by deception; or
(B) Harm another person.

(d) Penalties.
(1) First degree forgery is a Class 8 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(2) Second degree forgery is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(3) Third degree forgery is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(e) Definitions. The term "act" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-202; the terms "intent" and "knowingly" having the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "controlled substance," "deceive," "deception," "person," "property," "property of another," "services," "value," and "written instrument" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-2205. Identity Theft.

(a) First degree. An actor commits identity theft when the actor:
(1) Commits fifth degree identity theft; and
(2) The value of the property intended to be obtained or the amount of the payment intended to be avoided, or the financial injury, whichever is greater, in fact, is $500,000 or more.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree identity theft when the actor:
(1) Commits fifth degree identity theft; and
(2) The value of the property intended to be obtained or the amount of the payment intended to be avoided, or the financial injury, whichever is greater, in fact, is $50,000 or more.

(c) Third degree. An actor commits third degree identity theft when the actor:

(1) Commits fifth degree identity theft; and
(2) The value of the property intended to be obtained or the amount of the payment intended to be avoided, or the financial injury, whichever is greater, in fact, is $5,000 or more.

(d) Fourth degree. A person commits fourth degree identity theft when the actor:
(1) Commits fifth degree identity theft; and
(2) The value of the property intended to be obtained or the amount of the payment intended to be avoided, or the financial injury, whichever is greater, in fact, is $500 or more.

(e) Fifth degree. An actor commits fifth degree identity theft when the actor:
(1) Knowingly creates, possesses, or uses personal identifying information belonging to or pertaining to another person;
(2) Without that other person's effective consent; and
(3) With intent to use the personal identifying information to:
(A) Obtain the property of another by deception;
(B) Avoid payment due for any property, fines, or fees by deception; or
(C) Give, sell, transmit, or transfer the information to a third person to facilitate the use of the identifying information by that third person to obtain property by deception.

(f) Unit of prosecution and calculation of time to commence prosecution of offense. Creating, possessing, or using a person's personal identifying information in violation of this section shall constitute a single course of conduct for determining the applicable period of limitation under D.C. Code § 23-113(b). The applicable time limitation under D.C. Code § 23-113 shall not begin to run until after the day after the course of conduct has been completed, or the person whose identifying information was taken, possessed, or used knows, or reasonably should have been aware, of the identity theft, whichever occurs earlier.

(g) Penalties.
(1) First degree identity theft is a Class 7 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(2) Second degree identity theft is a Class 8 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(3) Third degree identity theft is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(4) Fourth degree identity theft is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(5) Fifth degree identity theft is a Class C crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(h) Police reports. The Metropolitan Police Department shall make a report of each complaint of identity theft and provide the complainant with a copy of the report.

(i) Definitions. The terms "intended," "intent," "knowingly," "known," and "knows" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor,"

"complainant," "deception," "effective consent," "financial injury," "person," "personal identifying information," "possessed," "possesses," "possessing," "property," "property of another," and "value" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-2206. Identity Theft Civil Provisions.

(a) When a person is convicted, adjudicated delinquent, or found not guilty of identity theft under the mental disability affirmative defense in RCC § 22E-504, the court may issue such orders as are necessary to correct any District of Columbia public record that contains false information as a result of a violation of RCC § 22E-2205.

(b) In all other cases, a person who alleges that they are a victim of identity theft may petition the court for an expedited judicial determination that a District of Columbia public record contains false information as a result of a violation of RCC § 22E-2205. Upon a finding of clear and convincing evidence that the person was a victim of identity theft, the court may issue such orders as are necessary to correct any District of Columbia public record that contains false information as a result of a violation of RCC § 22E-2205.

(c) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, District of Columbia agencies shall comply with orders issued under subsection (a) of this section within 30 days of issuance of the order.

(d) Definitions.

(1) The term "person" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-701; and

(2) In this section, the term "District of Columbia public record" means any document, book, photographic image (as defined in RCC § 22E-701), electronic data recording, paper, sound recording (as defined in RCC § 22E-701), or other material, regardless of physical form or characteristic, made or received pursuant to law or in connection with the transaction of public business by any officer or employee of the District of Columbia.

RCC § 22E-2207. Unlawful Labeling of a Recording.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree unlawful labeling of a recording when the actor:

(1) Knowingly possesses sound recordings or audiovisual recordings that do not clearly and conspicuously disclose the true name and address of the manufacturer on their labels, covers, or jacket that, in fact, number 100 or more;

(2) With intent to sell or rent the sound recordings or audiovisual recordings.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree unlawful labeling of a recording when the actor:

(1) Knowingly possesses one or more sound recordings or audiovisual recordings that does not clearly and conspicuously disclose the true name and address of the manufacturer on its label, cover, or jacket;
(2) With intent to sell or rent the sound recordings or audiovisual recordings.

(c) Exclusions from liability. An actor does not commit an offense under this section when the actor, in fact:
(1) Transfers any sounds or images recorded on a sound recording or audiovisual recording in connection with, or as part of, a radio or television broadcast transmission, or for the purposes of archival preservation; or
(2) Transfers, in their home for their own personal use, any sounds or images recorded on a sound recording or audiovisual recording.

(d) Penalties.
(1) First degree unlawful labeling of a recording is a Class C crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(2) Second degree unlawful labeling of a recording is a Class D crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(e) Forfeiture. Upon conviction under this section, the court may, in addition to the penalties provided by this section, order the forfeiture and destruction or other disposition of all sound recordings, audiovisual recordings, and equipment used, or attempted to be used, in violation of this section.

(f) Definitions.
(1) The terms "intent" and "knowingly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the terms "actor," "audiovisual recording," "image," "person," "possesses," and "sound recording" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and
(2) In this section, the term "manufacturer" means the person who affixes, or authorizes the affixation of, sounds or images to a sound recording or audiovisual recording.

RCC § 22E-2208. Financial Exploitation of a Vulnerable Adult or Elderly Person.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult or elderly person when the actor:
(1) Commits fifth degree financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult or elderly person; and
(2) In fact, the value of the property or the amount of the financial injury, whichever is greater, is $500,000 or more.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult or elderly person when the actor:
(1) Commits fifth degree financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult or elderly person; and

(2) In fact, the value of the property or the amount of the financial injury, whichever is greater, is $50,000 or more.

(c) Third degree. An actor commits third degree financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult or elderly person when the actor:
(1) Commits fifth degree financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult or elderly person; and
(2) In fact, the value of the property or the amount of the financial injury, whichever is greater, is $5,000 or more.

(d) Fourth degree. An actor commits fourth degree financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult or elderly person when the actor:
(1) Commits fifth degree financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult or elderly person; and
(2) In fact, the value of the property or the amount of the financial injury, whichever is greater, is $500 or more.

(e) Fifth degree. An actor commits fifth degree financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult or elderly person when the actor:
(1) Knowingly takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over the property of another:
(A) With consent of an owner obtained by undue influence;
(B) Reckless as to the fact that the owner is a vulnerable adult or elderly person;
(C) With intent to deprive an owner of the property; and
(D) In fact, the property has any value; or
(2) Reckless as to the fact that the complainant is a vulnerable adult or elderly person, commits one or more District offenses that is, in fact:
(A) Theft under RCC § 22E-2101;
(B) Fraud under RCC § 22E-2201;
(C) Payment Card Fraud under RCC § 22E-2202;
(D) Check Fraud under RCC § 22E-2203;
(E) Forgery under RCC § 22E-22E-2204;
(F) Identity Theft under RCC § 22E-2205; or
(G) Extortion under RCC § 22E-2301.

(f) Penalties.
(1) First degree financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult or elderly person is a Class 6 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(2) Second degree financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult or elderly person is a Class 7 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(3) Third degree financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult or elderly person is a Class 8 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(4) Fourth degree financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult or elderly person is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(5) Fifth degree financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult or elderly person is a Class B crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(g) Restitution. In addition to the penalties set forth in subsection (f) of this section, a person shall make restitution, before the payment of any fines or civil penalties.

(h) Definitions. The terms "intent," "knowingly," "reckless," and "recklessness" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "consent," "complainant," "deprive," "elderly person," "financial injury," "owner," "property," "property of another," "undue influence," "value," and "vulnerable adult" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-2209. Financial Exploitation of a Vulnerable Adult or Elderly Person Civil Provisions.

(a) Petition for injunctive relief and protections. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, if the Attorney General for the District of Columbia or the United States Attorney has reason to believe that any person has violated, or intends to violate, section RCC § 22E-2208, the Attorney General or the United States Attorney may bring a civil action in the Court, in the name of the District, which may be by ex parte motion and without notice to the person, to seek any of the following:

(1) A temporary or permanent injunction;

(2) Restitution of money or property;

(3) The cost of the action, including reasonable attorney's fees;

(4) Revocation of all permits, licenses, registrations, or certifications issued by the District authorizing the person to provide services to vulnerable adults or elderly persons, provided that such a revocation shall be effective upon the issuance of the Court's judgment, and the person shall not be entitled to a hearing with the relevant licensing board or agency;

(5) Civil penalties of not more than $10,000 per violation; or

(6) Any other relief the court deems just.

(b) In an action under this section;

(1) A related criminal proceeding need not have been initiated, nor judgment secured, prior to bringing the action;

(2) The Attorney General shall not be required to prove damages; and

(3) The burden of proof shall be by a preponderance of the evidence.

(c) Standard for court review of petition. The court may grant an ex parte motion authorized by subsection (a) of this section without notice to the person against whom the injunction or order is sought if the court finds that facts offered in support of the motion establish that:

(1) There is a substantial likelihood that the person committed financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult or elderly person;

(2) The harm that may result from the injunction or order is clearly outweighed by the risk of harm to the vulnerable adult or elderly person if the inunction or order is not issued; and

(3) If the Attorney General for the District of Columbia or the United States Attorney has petitioned for an order temporarily freezing assets, the order is necessary to prevent dissipation of assets obtained in violation of RCC § 22E-2208.

(d) Effect of order to temporarily freeze assets.

(1) An order temporarily freezing assets without notice to the person under subsections (a) and (c) of this section shall expire on a date set by the court, not later than 14 days after the court issues the order unless, before that time, the court extends the order for good cause shown.

(2) A person whose assets were temporarily frozen under subsections (a) and (c) of this section may move to dissolve or modify the order after notice to the Attorney General for the District of Columbia or the United States Attorney. The court shall hear and decide the motion or application on an expedited basis.

(e) Appointment of receiver or conservator. The court may issue an order temporarily freezing the assets of the vulnerable adult or elderly person to prevent dissipation of assets; provided, that the court also appoints a receiver or conservator for those assets. The order shall allow for the use of assets to continue care for the vulnerable adult or elderly person, and can only be issued upon a showing that a temporary injunction or temporary restraining order authorized by this section would be insufficient to safeguard the assets, or with the consent of the vulnerable adult or elderly person or their legal representative.

(f) Definitions. The term "intends" has the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; and the terms "consent," "elderly person," "person," and "vulnerable adult" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-2210. Trademark Counterfeiting.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree trademark counterfeiting when the actor:

(1) Knowingly manufactures for sale, possesses with intent to sell, or offers to sell, property bearing or identified by a counterfeit mark; and

(2) In fact, the property consists of 100 or more items, or the property has a total retail value of $5,000 or more.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree trademark counterfeiting when the actor:

(1) Knowingly manufactures for sale, possesses with intent to sell, or offers to sell, property bearing or identified by a counterfeit mark; and

(2) In fact, the property has any value.

(c) Exclusion from liability. An actor does not commit an offense under this section if the actor, in fact, uses a trademark in a manner that is legal under civil law.

(d) Seizure and disposal of seized items bearing a counterfeit mark.

(1) Any items bearing a counterfeit mark shall be seized, and all personal property, including any items, objects, tools, machines, equipment, instrumentalities, or vehicles of any kind, employed or used in connection with a violation of this chapter may be seized, by any law enforcement officer, including any designated civilian employee of the Metropolitan Police Department, in accordance with the procedures established by § 48-905.02.

(2) All seized personal property shall be subject to forfeiture pursuant to the standards and procedures set forth in D.C. Law 20-278.

(3) Upon the request of the owner of the trademark, service mark, trade name, label, term, picture, seal, word, or advertisement, all seized items bearing a counterfeit mark shall be released to the owner of the trademark, service mark, trade name, label, term, picture, seal, word, or advertisement for destruction or disposition.

(4) If the owner of the trademark, service mark, trade name, label, term, picture, seal, word, or advertisement does not request release of seized items bearing a counterfeit mark, such items shall be destroyed unless the owner of the of the trademark, service mark, trade name, label, term, picture, seal, word, or advertisement consents to another disposition.

(e) Evidence of state or federal registration. Any state or federal certificate of registration of any trademark, service mark, trade name, label, term, picture, seal, word, or advertisement shall be prima facie evidence of the facts stated therein.

(f) Penalties.

(1) First degree trademark counterfeiting is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(2) Second degree trademark counterfeiting is a Class C crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(g) Definitions. The terms "intent" and "knowingly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "consents," "counterfeit mark," "law enforcement officer," "owner," "possesses," "property," "retail value," and "value" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

Chapter 23. Extortion.

RCC § 22E-2301. Extortion.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree extortion when the actor:

(1) Knowingly takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over the property of another;
(2) With the consent of an owner obtained by an explicit or implicit coercive threat;
(3) With intent to deprive an owner of the property; and
(4) In fact, the property has a value of $500,000 or more.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree extortion when the actor:
(1) Knowingly takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over the property of another;
(2) With the consent of an owner obtained by an explicit or implicit coercive threat;
(3) With intent to deprive an owner of the property; and
(4) In fact, the property has a value of $50,000 or more.

(c) Third degree. An actor commits third degree extortion when the actor:
(1) Knowingly takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over the property of another;
(2) With the consent of an owner obtained by an explicit or implicit coercive threat;
(3) With intent to deprive an owner of the property; and
(4) In fact, the property has a value $5,000 or more.

(d) Fourth degree. An actor commits fourth degree extortion when the actor:
(1) Knowingly takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over the property of another;
(2) With the consent of an owner obtained by an explicit or implicit coercive threat;
(3) With intent to deprive an owner of the property; and
(4) In fact, the property has a value of $500 or more.

(e) Fifth degree. An actor commits fifth degree extortion when the actor:
(1) Knowingly takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control over the property of another;
(2) With the consent of an owner obtained by an explicit or implicit coercive threat;
(3) With intent to deprive an owner of the property; and
(4) In fact, the property has any value.

(f) Penalties.
(1) First degree extortion is a Class 6 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(2) Second degree extortion is a Class 7 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(3) Third degree extortion is a Class 8 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(4) Fourth degree extortion is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(5) Fifth degree extortion is a Class B crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(g) Definitions. The terms "intent" and "knowingly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "coercive threat," "consent," "deprive," "owner," "property," "property of another," and "value" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

Chapter 24. Stolen Property.

RCC § 22E-2401. Possession of Stolen Property.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree possession of stolen property when the actor:
  (1) Knowingly buys or possesses property;
  (2) With intent that the property be stolen;
  (3) With intent to deprive an owner of the property; and
  (4) In fact, the property has a value of $500,000 or more.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree possession of stolen property when the actor:
  (1) Knowingly buys or possesses property;
  (2) With intent that the property be stolen;
  (3) With intent to deprive an owner of the property; and
  (4) In fact, the property has a value of $50,000 or more.

(c) Third degree. An actor commits third degree possession of stolen property when the actor:
  (1) Knowingly buys or possesses property;
  (2) With intent that the property be stolen;
  (3) With intent to deprive an owner of the property; and
  (4) In fact, the property has a value of $5,000 or more.

(d) Fourth degree. An actor commits fourth degree possession of stolen property when the actor:
  (1) Knowingly buys or possesses property;
  (2) With intent that the property be stolen;
  (3) With intent to deprive an owner of the property; and
  (4) In fact, the property has a value of $500 or more.

(e) Fifth degree. An actor commits fifth degree possession of stolen property when the actor:
  (1) Knowingly buys or possesses property;
  (2) With intent that the property be stolen;
  (3) With intent to deprive an owner of the property;
  (4) In fact, the property has any value.

(f) Penalties.
  (1) First degree possession of stolen property is a Class 8 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(2) Second degree possession of stolen property is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(3) Third degree possession of stolen property is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(4) Fourth degree possession of stolen property is a Class B crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(5) Fifth degree possession of stolen property is a Class D crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(g) Definitions. The terms "intent" and "knowingly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "deprive," "owner," "possesses," "property," and "value" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-2402. Trafficking of Stolen Property.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree trafficking of stolen property when the actor:
(1) Knowingly buys or possesses property on two or more separate occasions;
(2) With intent that the property be stolen;
(3) With intent to sell, pledge as consideration, or trade the property; and
(4) In fact, the total property trafficked has a value of $500,000 or more.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree trafficking of stolen property when the actor:
(1) Knowingly buys or possesses property on two or more separate occasions;
(2) With intent that the property be stolen;
(3) With intent to sell, pledge as consideration, or trade the property; and
(4) In fact, the total property trafficked has a value of $50,000 or more.

(c) Third degree. An actor commits third degree trafficking of stolen property when the actor:
(1) Knowingly buys or possesses property on two or more separate occasions;
(2) With intent that the property be stolen;
(3) With intent to sell, pledge as consideration, or trade the property; and
(4) In fact, the total property trafficked has a value of $5,000 or more.

(d) Fourth degree. An actor commits fourth degree trafficking of stolen property when the actor:
(1) Knowingly buys or possesses property on two or more separate occasions;
(2) With intent that the property be stolen;
(3) With intent to sell, pledge as consideration, or trade the property; and

(4) In fact, the total property trafficked has a value of $500 or more.

(e) Fifth degree. An actor commits fifth degree trafficking of stolen property when the actor:
   (1) Knowingly buys or possesses property on two or more separate occasions;
   (2) With intent that the property be stolen;
   (3) With intent to sell, pledge as consideration, or trade the property; and
   (4) In fact, the property trafficked has any value.

(f) Penalties.
   (1) First degree trafficking of stolen property is a Class 7 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
   (2) Second degree trafficking of stolen property is a Class 8 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
   (3) Third degree trafficking of stolen property is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
   (4) Fourth degree trafficking of stolen property is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
   (5) Fifth degree trafficking of stolen property is a Class C crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(g) Definitions. The terms "intent" and "knowingly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "possesses," "property," and "value" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-2403. Alteration of a Motor Vehicle Identification Number.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree alteration of a motor vehicle identification number when the actor:
   (1) Knowingly alters a vehicle identification number of a motor vehicle or motor vehicle part;
   (2) With intent to conceal or misrepresent the identity of the motor vehicle or motor vehicle part; and
   (3) The value of such motor vehicle or motor vehicle part, in fact, is $5,000 or more.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree alteration of a motor vehicle identification number when the actor:
   (1) Knowingly alters a vehicle identification number of a motor vehicle or motor vehicle part;
   (2) With intent to conceal or misrepresent the identity of the motor vehicle or motor vehicle part.

(c) Penalties.

(1) First degree alteration of a motor vehicle identification number is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(2) Second degree alteration of a motor vehicle identification number is a Class B crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(d) Definitions. The terms "intent" and "knowingly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "motor vehicle," "value," and "vehicle identification number" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-2404. Alteration of a Bicycle Identification Number.

(a) Offense. An actor commits alteration of a bicycle identification numbers when the actor:
(1) Knowingly alters an identification number of a bicycle or bicycle part;
(2) With intent to conceal or misrepresent the identity of the bicycle or bicycle part.

(b) Penalties. Alteration of a bicycle identification number is a Class D crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(c) Definitions.
(1) The terms "intent" and "knowingly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "actor" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-701; and
(2) In this section, the terms "bicycle" and "identification number" have the meanings specified in D.C. Code § 50-1609.

Chapter 25. Property Damage.

RCC § 22E-2501. Arson.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree arson when the actor:
(1) Knowingly starts a fire, or causes an explosion, that damages or destroys a dwelling or building;
(2) Reckless as to the fact that a person who is not a participant in the crime is present in the dwelling or building; and
(3) The fire or explosion, in fact, causes death or serious bodily injury to any person who is not a participant in the crime.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree arson when the actor:
(1) Knowingly starts a fire, or causes an explosion, that damages or destroys a dwelling or building;
(2) Reckless as to the fact that the fact that a person who is not a participant in the crime is present in the dwelling or building.

(c) Third degree. An actor commits third degree arson when the actor knowingly starts a fire, or causes an explosion, that damages or destroys a dwelling or building.

(d) Affirmative defense. It is an affirmative defense to liability under subsection (c) of this section that the actor, in fact, has a valid blasting permit issued by the District of Columbia Fire and Emergency Medical Services Department, and complied with all the rules and regulations governing the use of such a permit.

(e) Penalties.

(1) First degree arson is a Class 5 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(2) Second degree arson is a Class 7 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(3) Third degree arson is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(f) Definitions. The terms "knowingly" and "reckless" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "building," "dwelling," "person," and "serious bodily injury" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-2502. Reckless Burning.

(a) Offense. An actor commits reckless burning when the actor:

(1) Knowingly starts a fire or causes an explosion;

(2) Reckless as to the fact that the fire or explosion damages or destroys a dwelling or building.

(b) Affirmative defense. It is an affirmative defense to liability under this section that the actor, in fact, has a valid blasting permit issued by the District of Columbia Fire and Emergency Medical Services Department, and complied with all the rules and regulations governing the use of such a permit.

(c) Penalties. Reckless burning is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(d) Definitions. The terms "knowingly" and "reckless" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "building," and "dwelling" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-2503. Criminal Damage to Property.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree criminal damage to property when the actor:

(1) Knowingly damages or destroys the property of another;

(2) Without the effective consent of an owner; and

(3) In fact, the amount of damage is $500,000 or more.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree criminal damage to property when the actor:
  (1) Knowingly damages or destroys the property of another;
  (2) Without the effective consent of an owner; and
  (3) In fact, the amount of damage is $50,000 or more.

(c) Third degree. An actor commits third degree criminal damage to property when the actor:
  (1) Knowingly damages or destroys the property of another;
    (A) Without the effective consent of an owner; and
    (B) In fact:
      (i) The amount of damage is $5,000 or more;
      (ii) The property is a cemetery, grave, or other place for the internment of human remains; or
      (iii) The property is a place of worship or a public monument; or
  (2) Recklessly damages or destroys property;
    (A) Knowing that it is the property of another;
    (B) Without the effective consent of an owner; and
    (C) In fact, the amount of damage is $50,000 or more.

(d) Fourth degree. An actor commits fourth degree criminal damage to property when the actor:
  (1) Recklessly damages or destroys property;
  (2) Knowing that it is the property of another;
  (3) Without the effective consent of an owner; and
  (4) In fact, the amount of damage is $500 or more.

(e) Fifth degree. An actor commits fifth degree criminal damage to property when the actor:
  (1) Recklessly damages or destroys property;
  (2) Knowing that it is the property of another;
  (3) Without the effective consent of an owner; and
  (4) In fact, there is any amount of damage to the property.

(f) Penalties.
  (1) First degree criminal damage to property is a Class 7 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
  (2) Second degree criminal damage to property is a Class 8 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
  (3) Third degree criminal damage to property is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
  (4) Fourth degree criminal damage to property is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(5) Fifth degree criminal damage to property is a Class C crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(g) Definitions. The terms "knowing," "knowingly," and "recklessly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "amount of damage," "effective consent," "owner," "property," and "property of another" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-2504. Criminal Graffiti.

(a) Offense. An actor commits criminal graffiti when the actor:
(1) Knowingly places any inscription, writing, drawing, marking, or design on the property of another;
(2) Without the effective consent of an owner.

(b) Penalties. Criminal graffiti is a Class D crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(c) Definitions. The term "knowingly" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the terms "actor," "effective consent," "owner," and "property of another" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

Chapter 26. Trespass.

RCC § 22E-2601. Trespass.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree trespass when the actor:
(1) Knowingly enters or remains in a dwelling, or part thereof;
(2) Without a privilege or license to do so under civil law.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree trespass when the actor:
(1) Knowingly enters or remains in a building, or part thereof;
(2) Without a privilege or license to do so under civil law.

(c) Third degree. An actor commits third degree trespass when the actor:
(1) Knowingly enters or remains in or on land, a watercraft, or a motor vehicle, or part thereof;
(2) Without a privilege or license to do so under civil law.

(d) Exclusions from liability.
(1) An actor does not commit an offense under this section by, in fact, violating a barring notice issued for District of Columbia Housing Authority properties unless the bar notice is lawfully issued pursuant to the District of Columbia Municipal Regulations on an objectively reasonable basis.
(2) An actor does not commit an offense under this section for conduct that, in fact, constitutes a violation of D.C. Code § 35-252, Failure to pay established fare or to present valid transfer.

(e) Permissive inference. In a trial determining a violation of this section, a factfinder may, but is not required to, infer that an actor lacks a privilege or license to enter or remain in or on a location that:
  (1) Is otherwise vacant;
  (2) Shows signs of a forced entry; and
  (3) Is either:
    (A) Secured in a manner that reasonably conveys that it is not to be entered; or
    (B) Displays signage that is reasonably visible prior to or outside the location's points of entry, and that sign says "no trespassing" or similarly indicates that a person may not enter.

(f) Penalties.
  (1) First degree trespass is a Class B crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
  (2) Second degree trespass is a Class C crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
  (3) Third degree trespass is a Class D crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(g) Definitions. The term "knowingly" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "building," "dwelling," "person," and "motor vehicle" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

Chapter 27. Burglary.

RCC § 22E-2701. Burglary.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree burglary when the actor:
  (1) With intent to commit inside one or more District offenses that is, in fact, an offense under Subtitle II of this title or a predicate property offense;
  (2) Knowingly and fully enters or surreptitiously remains in a dwelling, or part thereof;
  (3) Without a privilege or license to do so under civil law;
  (4) Reckless as to the fact that a person who is not a participant in the burglary either is entering with the actor or is already inside and, in fact, directly perceives the actor while inside.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree burglary when the actor:
  (1) With intent to commit inside one or more District offense that is, in fact, an offense under Subtitle II of this title or a predicate property offense;
  (2) Knowingly and fully enters or surreptitiously remains in:
    (A) A dwelling, or part thereof, without a privilege or license to do so under civil law; or
    (B) A building, or part thereof, without a privilege or license to do so under civil law:

(i) That is not open to the general public at the time of the burglary;
(ii) Reckless as to the fact that a person who is not a participant in the burglary either is entering with the actor or is already inside and, in fact, directly perceives the actor while inside.

(c) Third degree. An actor commits third degree burglary when the actor:
(1) With intent to commit inside one or more District offenses that is, in fact, an offense under Subtitle II of this title or a predicate property offense;
(2) Knowingly and fully enters or surreptitiously remains in:
(A) A building or business yard, or part thereof;
(B) That is not open to the general public at the time of the burglary;
(3) Without a privilege or license to do so under civil law.

(d) Penalties.
(1) First degree burglary is a Class 8 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(2) Second degree burglary is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(3) Third degree burglary is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(4) Penalty enhancements. The penalty classification of any gradation of this offense is increased by one class when the actor knowingly holds or carries on the actor's person, while entering or surreptitiously remaining in the location, what is, in fact, a dangerous weapon or imitation firearm.

(e) Definitions.
(1) The terms "intent," "knowingly," and "reckless" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the terms "actor," "building," "business yard," "dangerous weapon," "dwelling," "imitation firearm," "open to the general public," and "person" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and
(2) In this section, the term "predicate property offense" means:
(A) Theft under RCC § 22E-2101;
(B) Unauthorized Use of Property under RCC § 22E-2102;
(C) Unauthorized Use of a Motor Vehicle under RCC § 22E-2103;
(D) Extortion under RCC § 22E-2301;
(E) Arson under RCC § 22E-2501;
(F) Reckless Burning under RCC § 22E-2502; or
(G) Criminal Damage to Property under RCC § 22E-2503.

RCC § 22E-2702. Possession of Tools to Commit Property Crime.

(a) Offense. An actor commits possession of tools to commit property crime when the actor:
  (1) Knowingly possesses a tool, or tools, designed or specifically adapted for picking locks, cutting chains, cutting glass, bypassing an electronic security system, or bypassing a locked door;
  (2) With intent to use the tool or tools to commit one or more District offenses that is, in fact:
    (A) Theft under RCC § 22E-2101;
    (B) Unauthorized Use of Property under RCC § 22E-2102;
    (C) Unauthorized Use of a Motor Vehicle under RCC § 22E-2103;
    (D) Shoplifting under RCC § 22E-2301;
    (E) Alteration of Motor Vehicle Identification Number under RCC § 22E-2403;
    (F) Alteration of Bicycle Identification Number under RCC § 22E-2404;
    (G) Arson under RCC § 22E-2501;
    (H) Criminal Damage to Property under RCC § 22E-2503;
    (I) Criminal Graffiti under RCC § 22E-2504;
    (J) Trespass under RCC § 22E-2601; or
    (K) Burglary under RCC § 22E-2701.

(b) No attempt liability. The criminal attempt provision in RCC § 22E-301 does not apply to this section.

(c) Penalties. Possession of tools to commit property crime is a Class D crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(d) Definitions. The terms "intent" and "knowingly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor" and "possesses" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

SUBTITLE IV. OFFENSES AGAINST GOVERNMENT OPERATION.

Chapter 32. Perjury and Other Official Falsification Offenses.

RCC § 22E-3201. Impersonation of an Official.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree impersonation of an official when the actor:
  (1) With intent:
    (A) To deceive any other person as to the actor's lawful authority; and
    (B) Either:
      (i) To cause harm to another person; or
      (ii) That any person receive a personal benefit of any kind;
  (2) Knowingly and falsely represents themselves to currently hold lawful authority as a:

(A) Judge of a federal or local court in the District of Columbia;
(B) Prosecutor for the United States Attorney for the District of Columbia, or the Attorney General for the District of Columbia;
(C) Notary public;
(D) Law enforcement officer;
(E) Public safety employee;
(F) District official;
(G) District employee with power to enforce District laws or regulations; or
(H) Person authorized to solemnize marriage; and

(3) Performs the duty, exercises the authority, or attempts to perform the duty or exercise the authority pertaining to a person listed in paragraph (a)(2).

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree impersonation of an official when the actor:

(1) With intent:
(A) To deceive any other person as to the actor's lawful authority; and
(B) Either:
(i) To cause harm to another person; or
(ii) That any person receive a personal benefit of any kind;

(2) Knowingly and falsely represents themselves to currently hold lawful authority as a:
(A) Judge of a federal or local court in the District of Columbia;
(B) Prosecutor for the United States Attorney for the District of Columbia, or the Attorney General for the District of Columbia;
(C) Notary public;
(D) Law enforcement officer;
(E) Public safety employee;
(F) District official;
(G) District employee with power to enforce District laws or regulations; or
(H) Person authorized to solemnize marriage.

(c) Civil provision regarding use of official uniform insignia. The Metropolitan Police Department and the Fire and Emergency Medical Services Department shall have the sole and exclusive rights to have and use, in carrying out their respective missions, the official badges, patches, emblems, copyrights, descriptive or designating marks, and other official insignia displayed upon their current and future uniforms.

(d) Penalties.

(1) First degree impersonation of an official is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(2) Second degree impersonation of an official is a Class B crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(e) Definitions. The terms "intent" and "knowingly" have the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; and the terms "actor," "deceive," "District official," "law enforcement officer," and "public safety employee" have the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-3202. Misrepresentation as a District of Columbia Entity.

(a) Offense. An actor commits misrepresentation as a District of Columbia entity when the actor:
  (1) Knowingly:
    (A) Engages in the business of collecting or aiding in the collection of debts or obligations, or of providing private police, investigation, or other detective services; and
    (B) Uses the words "District of Columbia," "District," or "D.C." in the business name or in a business communication;
  (2) With intent to:
    (A) Deceive any other person as to the actor's lawful authority as a District of Columbia entity; and
    (B) Receive a personal or business benefit of any kind; and
  (3) In fact, the name or communication would cause a reasonable person in the complainant's circumstances to believe that the actor is a District of Columbia government entity or representative.

(b) Prosecutorial authority. The Attorney General for the District of Columbia shall prosecute violations of this section.

(c) Penalties. Misrepresentation as a District of Columbia entity is a Class C crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(d) Definitions.
  (1) The terms "intent" and "knowingly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the terms "deceive" and "complainant" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and
  (2) In this section, the term "actor," in addition to the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-701, includes a legal entity that is not a natural person.

Chapter 34. Government Custody.

RCC § 22E-3401. Escape from a Correctional Facility or Officer.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree escape from a correctional facility or officer when the actor:
  (1) In fact, is subject to a court order that authorizes the actor's confinement in a correctional facility, secure juvenile detention facility, or cellblock operated by the United States Marshals Service; and

(2) Knowingly, without the effective consent of the Mayor, the Director of the Department of Corrections, the Director of the Department of Youth Rehabilitation Services, or the United States Marshals Service, leaves the correctional facility, juvenile detention facility, or cellblock operated by the United States Marshals Service.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree escape from an institution or officer when the actor:

(1) In fact, is in the lawful official custody of a law enforcement officer of the District of Columbia or of the United States; and

(2) Knowingly, without the effective consent of the law enforcement officer, leaves official custody.

(c) Third degree. An actor commits third degree escape from an institution or officer when the actor:

(1) In fact, is subject to a court order that authorizes the person's confinement in a correctional facility or halfway house; and

(2) Knowingly, without the effective consent of the Mayor, the Director of the Department of Corrections, or the Director of the Department of Youth Rehabilitation Services:

(A) Fails to return to the correctional facility or halfway house;

(B) Fails to report to the correctional facility or halfway house; or

(C) Leaves a halfway house.

(d) Exclusion from liability. An actor does not commit an offense under subsection (b) of this section when, in fact, the actor is within a correctional facility, juvenile detention facility, or halfway house.

(e) Penalties.

(1) First degree escape from a correctional facility or officer is a Class 8 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(2) Second degree escape from a correctional facility or officer is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(3) Third degree escape from a correctional facility or officer is a Class B crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(f) Definitions. The term "knowingly" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "correctional facility," "effective consent," "halfway house," "law enforcement officer," "official custody," and "secure juvenile detention facility" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-3402. Tampering with a Detection Device.

(a) Offense. An actor commits tampering with a detection device when the actor:

(1) Knows the actor is required to wear a detection device while:

(A) Subject to a final civil protection order issued under D.C. Code § 16-1005;
(B) On pretrial release in a District of Columbia case;
(C) On presentence or predisposition release in a District of Columbia case;
(D) Committed to the Department of Youth Rehabilitation Services or incarcerated, in a District of Columbia case; or
(E) On supervised release, probation, or parole, in a District of Columbia case; and

(2) Either:
(A) Removes the detection device or allows an unauthorized person to do so; or
(B) Interferes with the emission or detection of the detection device or allows an unauthorized person to do so.

(b) Jurisdiction. An offense under this section shall be deemed to be committed in the District of Columbia, regardless of whether the actor is physically present in the District of Columbia.

(c) Penalties. Tampering with a detection device is a Class B crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(d) Definitions. The term "knows" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; and the terms "actor" and "detection device" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-3403. Correctional Facility Contraband.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree correctional facility contraband when the actor:
(1) With intent that an item be received by someone confined to a correctional facility or secure juvenile detention facility:
(A) Knowingly brings the item to a correctional facility or secure juvenile detention facility;
(B) Without the effective consent of the Mayor, the Director of the Department of Corrections, or the Director of the Department of Youth Rehabilitation Services; and
(C) The item, in fact, is Class A contraband; or
(2) In fact, is someone confined to a correctional facility or secure juvenile detention facility and:
(A) Knowingly possesses an item in a correctional facility or secure juvenile detention facility;
(B) Without the effective consent of the Mayor, the Director of the Department of Corrections, or the Director of the Department of Youth Rehabilitation Services; and
(C) The item, in fact, is Class A contraband.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree correctional facility contraband when the actor:

(1) With intent that an item be received by someone confined to a correctional facility or secure juvenile detention facility:
(A) Knowingly brings the item to a correctional facility or secure juvenile detention facility;
(B) Without the effective consent of the Mayor, the Director of the Department of Corrections, or the Director of the Department of Youth Rehabilitation Services; and
(C) The item, in fact, is Class B contraband; or

(2) In fact, is someone confined to a correctional facility or secure juvenile detention facility and:
(A) Knowingly possesses an item in a correctional facility or secure juvenile detention facility;
(B) Without the effective consent of the Mayor, the Director of the Department of Corrections, or the Director of the Department of Youth Rehabilitation Services; and
(C) The item, in fact, is Class B contraband.

(c) Exclusion from liability. An actor does not commit an offense under this section for, in fact, possessing:
(1) A portable electronic communication device, in the course of a legal visit;
(2) A controlled substance that is prescribed to the actor and medically necessary to have immediately or constantly accessible; or
(3) A syringe, needle, or other medical device, that is medically necessary to have immediately or constantly available.

(d) Detainment authority. If there is probable cause to suspect an actor of committing correctional facility contraband under paragraph (a)(1) or (b)(1) of this section, the warden or director of a correctional facility may detain the actor for not more than 2 hours, pending surrender to the Metropolitan Police Department or a law enforcement agency acting pursuant to D.C. Code § 10-509.01.

(e) Penalties.
(1) First degree correctional facility contraband is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(2) Second degree correctional facility contraband is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(f) Definitions. The terms "intent" and "knowingly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "Class A contraband," "Class B contraband," "controlled substance," "correctional facility," "effective consent," "possesses," "possessing," and "secure juvenile detention facility" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

SUBTITLE V. PUBLIC ORDER AND SAFETY OFFENSES.

Chapter 41. Weapon Offenses and Related Provisions.

RCC § 22E-4101. Possession of a Prohibited Weapon or Accessory.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree possession of a prohibited weapon or accessory when the actor:
  (1) Knowingly possesses a firearm or explosive;
  (2) Reckless as to the fact that the firearm or explosive is:
    (A) An assault weapon;
    (B) A machine gun;
    (C) A sawed-off shotgun;
    (D) A restricted explosive; or
    (E) A ghost gun.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree possession of a prohibited weapon or accessory when the actor:
  (1) Knowingly possesses a firearm accessory;
  (2) Reckless as to the fact that the firearm accessory is:
    (A) A firearm silencer;
    (B) A bump stock; or
    (C) A large capacity ammunition feeding device.

(c) Exclusion from liability. An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor satisfies the criteria in RCC § 22E-4118.

(d) Affirmative defense. It is an affirmative defense to liability under this section that the actor possesses the item while, in fact, voluntarily surrendering the item pursuant to District or federal law.

(e) Penalties.
  (1) First degree possession of a prohibited weapon or accessory is a Class 8 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
  (2) Second degree possession of a prohibited weapon or accessory is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
  (3) Merger. A conviction for possession of a prohibited weapon or accessory does not merge with any other offense arising from the same course of conduct.

(f) Definitions. The terms "knowingly" and "reckless" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "assault weapon," "bump stock," "firearm," "ghost gun," "large capacity ammunition feeding device," "machine gun," "possesses," "restricted explosive," and "sawed-off shotgun" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-4102. Carrying a Dangerous Weapon.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree carrying a dangerous weapon when the actor:

(1) Knowingly possesses:
(A) A firearm, other than a pistol;
(B) A pistol, without a license to carry under RCC § 22E-4110; or
(C) A restricted explosive;
(2) The firearm, pistol, or restricted explosive is conveniently accessible and within reach; and
(3) The actor is in a location:
(A) Other than the actor's home, place of business, or land; and
(B) That, in fact, is:
(i) Within 300 feet of the boundary line of a school, college, university, public swimming pool, public playground, public youth center, public library, or children's day care center; and
(ii) Displays clear and conspicuous signage indicating that firearms or explosives are prohibited.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree carrying a dangerous weapon when the actor:
(1) Knowingly possesses:
(A) A firearm, other than a pistol;
(B) A pistol, without a license to carry under RCC § 22E-4110; or
(C) A restricted explosive;
(2) The firearm, pistol, or restricted explosive is conveniently accessible and within reach; and
(3) The actor is in a location other than the actor's home, place of business, or land.

(c) Third degree. An actor commits third degree carrying a dangerous weapon when the actor:
(1) Knowingly possesses a dangerous weapon;
(2) The dangerous weapon is conveniently accessible and within reach;
(3) The actor is in a location other than the actor's home, place of business, or land; and
(4) With intent to use the weapon, anytime in the future or if any condition is met, in a manner that is likely to cause death or serious bodily injury to another person.

(d) Exclusion from liability. An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor satisfies the criteria in RCC § 22E-4118.

(e) Affirmative defense. It is an affirmative defense to liability under this section that the actor possesses the item while, in fact, voluntarily surrendering the item pursuant to District or federal law.

(f) Penalties.
(1) First degree carrying a dangerous weapon is a Class 8 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(2) Second degree carrying a dangerous weapon is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(3) Third degree carrying a dangerous weapon is a Class B crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(g) Definitions. The terms "intent" and "knowingly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "dangerous weapon," "firearm," "pistol," "possesses," "restricted explosive," and "serious bodily injury" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-4103. Possession of a Dangerous Weapon with Intent to Commit Crime.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree possession of a dangerous weapon with intent to commit crime when the actor:
  (1) Knowingly possesses an object designed to explode or produce uncontained combustion;
  (2) With intent to use the object to commit a criminal harm that is, in fact:
    (A) An offense under Subtitle II of this title; or
    (B) An offense under Subtitle III of this title.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree possession of a dangerous weapon with intent to commit crime when the actor:
  (1) Knowingly possesses:
    (A) A dangerous weapon; or
    (B) An imitation firearm;
  (2) With intent to use the imitation firearm or dangerous weapon to commit a criminal harm that is, in fact:
    (A) An offense under Subtitle II of this title; or
    (B) Burglary under RCC § 22E-2701.

(c) Limitation on attempt liability. The criminal attempt provision in RCC § 22E-301 does not apply to this section if the actor does not actually possess an item with intent to use it to commit an offense under Subtitle II or III of this title.

(d) Penalties.
  (1) First degree possession of a dangerous weapon with intent to commit crime is a Class 8 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
  (2) Second degree possession of a dangerous weapon with intent to commit crime is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(e) Definitions. The terms "intent" and "knowingly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "dangerous weapon," "imitation firearm," "possess," and "possesses" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-4104. Possession of a Dangerous Weapon During a Crime.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree possession of a dangerous weapon during a crime when the actor:

(1) Knowingly possesses a firearm;
(2) In furtherance of and while committing what, in fact, is an offense under Subtitle II of this title.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree possession of a dangerous weapon during a crime when the actor:
(1) Knowingly possesses:
(A) An imitation firearm; or
(B) A dangerous weapon;
(2) In furtherance of and while committing what, in fact, is an offense under Subtitle II of this title.

(c) Penalties.
(1) First degree possession of a dangerous weapon during a crime is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(2) Second degree possession of a dangerous weapon during a crime is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(d) Definitions. The term "knowingly" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "dangerous weapon," "firearm," "imitation firearm," and "possesses" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-4105. Possession of a Firearm by an Unauthorized Person.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree possession of a firearm by an unauthorized person when the actor:
(1) Knowingly possesses a firearm; and
(2) Has a prior conviction for what is, in fact, a crime of violence other than conspiracy, or a comparable offense.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree possession of a firearm by an unauthorized person when the actor:
(1) Knowingly possesses a firearm; and
(2) In addition:
(A) Is a fugitive from justice;
(B) Has a prior conviction for what is, in fact:
(i) A District offense that is currently punishable by imprisonment for a term exceeding one year, or a comparable offense, committed within 10 years of the current possession of a firearm;
(ii) An offense under Chapter 41 of this subtitle, or a comparable offense, committed within 5 years of the current possession of a firearm; or
(iii) An intrafamily offense, as defined in D.C. Code § 16-1001(8), that requires as an element confinement, sexual act, sexual contact, bodily injury, or threats, or a comparable offense, committed within 5 years of the current possession of a firearm; or

(C) Is subject to a final civil protection order issued under D.C. Code § 16-1005 or a final anti-stalking order issued under D.C. Code § 16-1064.

(c) Exclusion from liability. An actor does not commit an offense under this section for, in fact, possessing a firearm within the first 24 hours of the prior conviction or service of the protection order, or, when the judicial officer sentencing the actor or issuing the protection order specifically orders a shorter period of time for the actor to retrieve and safely transport the firearm or relinquish ownership, within the time specified by the judicial officer.

(d) Affirmative defense. It is an affirmative defense to liability under this section that the actor possesses the item while, in fact, voluntarily surrendering the item pursuant to District or federal law.

(e) Penalties.

(1) First degree possession of a firearm by an unauthorized person is a Class 8 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(2) Second degree possession of a firearm by an unauthorized person is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(f) Definitions.

(1) The term "knowingly" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the terms "actor," "bodily injury," "comparable offense," "crime of violence," "firearm," "prior conviction," "possesses," "possessing," "possession," "sexual act," and "sexual contact" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and

(2) In this section, the term "fugitive from justice" means a person who has an open arrest warrant for:

(A) Fleeing to avoid prosecution for a crime;

(B) Fleeing to avoid giving testimony in a criminal proceeding; or

(C) Escape from a correctional facility or officer under RCC § 22E-3401.

RCC § 22E-4106. Negligent Discharge of Firearm.

(a) Offense. An actor commits negligent discharge of a firearm when the actor:

(1) Negligently discharges a projectile from a firearm outside a licensed firing range; and

(2) In fact, does not have:

(A) A written permit issued by the Metropolitan Police Department; or

(B) Other permission under District or federal law.

(b) Prosecutorial authority. The Attorney General for the District of Columbia shall prosecute violations of this section.

(c) Penalties. Negligent discharge of a firearm is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(d) Definitions. The term "negligently" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor" and "firearm" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-4107. Alteration of a Firearm Identification Mark.

(a) Offense. An actor commits alteration of a firearm identification mark when the actor:
    (1) Knowingly alters or removes from a firearm:
        (A) The name of the maker;
        (B) The model;
        (C) The manufacturer's number; or
        (D) Other identifying mark;
    (2) With intent to conceal or misrepresent the identity of the firearm.
(b) Penalties. Alteration of a firearm identification mark is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(c) Definitions.
    (1) The terms "intent" and "knowingly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the terms "actor" and "firearm" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and
    (2) In this section, the term "manufacturer" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 7-2505.03.

RCC § 22E-4108. Civil Provisions for Prohibitions of Firearms on Public or Private Property.

(a) The District may prohibit or restrict the possession of firearms on its property and any property under its control.
(b) Private persons or entities owning property in the District may prohibit or restrict the possession of firearms on their property by any person other than a law enforcement officer while that law enforcement officer is lawfully authorized to enter onto the private property.
(c) Definitions. The terms "firearm," "law enforcement officer," "possession," and "property" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-4109. Civil Provisions for Lawful Transportation of a Firearm or Ammunition.

(a) Notwithstanding any other District law, a person shall be permitted to transport a firearm or ammunition under the following circumstances:
    (1) The person is not otherwise prohibited by law from possessing a firearm or ammunition;
    (2) The transportation of the firearm or ammunition is:

(A) For any lawful purpose;
(B) From any place where the person may lawfully possess the firearm or ammunition;
(C) To any place where the person may lawfully possess the firearm or ammunition;

(3) When the firearm is transported in a motor vehicle, the firearm is unloaded, and:
(A) If the motor vehicle has a compartment separate from the passenger area, neither the firearm nor any ammunition is conveniently accessible and within reach from the passenger area of the motor vehicle; or
(B) If the motor vehicle does not have a compartment separate from the passenger area, the firearm and any ammunition is in a locked container other than the glove compartment or console; and

(4) When the firearm is not transported in a motor vehicle, the firearm is:
(A) Unloaded;
(B) Inside a locked container; and
(C) Separate from any ammunition.

(b) Definitions. The terms "ammunition," "firearm," "possess," "possessing," and "motor vehicle" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-4110. Civil Provisions for Issuance of a License to Carry a Pistol.

(a) The Chief of the Metropolitan Police Department may, upon the application of a person having a bona fide residence or place of business within the District of Columbia, or of a person having a bona fide residence or place of business within the United States and a license to carry a pistol concealed upon their person issued by the lawful authorities of any state or subdivision of the United States, issue a license to such person to carry a pistol concealed upon their person within the District of Columbia for not more than 2 years from the date of issue, if it appears that the person is a suitable person to be so licensed.

(b) A non-resident who lives in a state or subdivision of the United States that does not require a license to carry a concealed pistol may apply to the Chief of the Metropolitan Police Department for a license to carry a pistol concealed upon their person within the District of Columbia for not more than 2 years from the date of issue, provided that the person meets the same reasons and requirements set forth in subsection (a) of this section.

(c) For any person issued a license pursuant to this section, or renewed pursuant to D.C. Code § 7-2509.03, the Chief of the Metropolitan Police Department may limit the geographic area, circumstances, or times of the day, week, month, or year in which the license is effective, and may subsequently limit, suspend, or revoke the license as provided under D.C. Code § 7-2509.05.

(d) The application for a license to carry shall be on a form prescribed by the Chief of the Metropolitan Police Department and shall bear the name, address, description, photograph, and signature of the licensee.
(e) Except as provided in D.C. Code § 7-2509.05(b), any person whose application has been denied or whose license has been limited or revoked may, within 15 days after the date of the notice of denial or notice of intent, appeal to the Concealed Pistol Licensing Review Board established pursuant to D.C. Code § 7-2509.08.
(f) Definitions. The term "pistol" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-4111. Unlawful Sale of a Pistol.

(a) Offense. An actor commits unlawful sale of a pistol when the actor:
    (1) Knowingly sells a pistol;
    (2) Reckless as to the fact that the purchaser is:
        (A) Not of sound mind;
        (B) Prohibited from possessing a firearm by RCC § 22E-4105; or
        (C) Under 21 years of age, except when the purchaser is a child or ward of the actor.
(b) Penalties. Unlawful sale of a pistol is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(c) Definitions. The terms "knowingly" and "reckless" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; and the terms "actor," "firearm," "pistol," and "possessing" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-4112. Unlawful Transfer of a Firearm.

(a) Offense. An actor commits unlawful transfer of a firearm when the actor:
    (1) Knowingly, as the seller of a firearm, delivers the firearm to a purchaser:
        (A) Fewer than 10 days after the date of the purchase, except in the case of sales to law enforcement officers; or
        (B) In a manner other than as specified in RCC § 22E-4109;
    (2) Knowingly, as the purchaser of a firearm, fails to sign in duplicate and deliver to the seller a statement containing the purchaser's full name, address, occupation, date and place of birth, the date of purchase, the caliber, make, model, and manufacturer's number of the firearm and a statement that the purchaser is not prohibited from possessing a firearm under RCC § 22E-4105;
    (3) Knowingly, as the seller of a firearm, fails to sign and attach their address to the purchaser's statement described in paragraph (a)(2) of this section and deliver one copy to such person or persons as the Chief of the Metropolitan Police Department may designate, and retain the other copy for 6 years; or
    (4) Knowingly sells an assault weapon, machine gun, or sawed-off shotgun:

(A) To any person other than the persons designated in RCC § 22E-4118(b) as entitled to possess the same; or
(B) Without prior permission to make such sale obtained from the Chief of the Metropolitan Police Department.

(b) Exclusion from liability. An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor is a wholesale dealer selling a firearm to a dealer licensed under RCC § 22E-4114.
(c) Penalties. Unlawful transfer of a firearm is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(d) Definitions. The term "knowingly" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "assault weapon," "firearm," "law enforcement officer," "machine gun," "possess," "possessing," and "sawed-off shotgun" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-4113. Sale of a Firearm Without a License.

(a) Offense. An actor commits sale of a firearm without a license when the actor knowingly:
(1) As a retail dealer:
(A) Sells, exposes for sale, or possesses with intent to sell, a firearm;
(B) Without a license under RCC § 22E-4114; or
(2) As a wholesale dealer, sells, or possesses with intent to sell, a firearm to any person other than a dealer licensed under RCC § 22E-4114.
(b) Penalties. Unlawful sale of a firearm without a license is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(c) Definitions. The terms "intent" and "knowingly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; and the terms "actor," "firearm," and "possesses," have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-4114. Civil Provisions for Licenses of Firearms Dealers.

(a) The Mayor of the District of Columbia may, in their discretion, grant licenses and may prescribe the form thereof, effective for not more than one year after the date of issue, permitting the licensee to sell a firearm at retail within the District of Columbia.
(b) Any license issued under this section shall require the licensee to follow the following licensure requirements:
(1) Firearm sales shall occur only in the building designated in the license.
(2) The license or a copy thereof, certified by the issuing authority, shall be clearly and conspicuously displayed on the premises.
(3) No firearm shall be sold if the purchaser is:
(A) Not of sound mind;
(B) Prohibited from possessing a firearm under RCC § 22E-4105;

(C) Under 21 years of age; or
(D) Unknown to the seller, unless the purchaser presents clear evidence of the purchaser's identity.

(4) No assault weapon, machine gun, or sawed-off shotgun shall be sold to any person other than the persons specified in RCC § 22E-4118(b) as entitled to possess the same, and then only after permission to make such sale has been obtained from the Chief of the Metropolitan Police Department.

(5) A true record shall be made of all firearms in the possession of the licensee, in a form prescribed by the Mayor. The record shall contain the date of purchase, the caliber, make, model, and manufacturer's number of each weapon, to which shall be added, when sold, the date of sale.

(6) A true record in duplicate shall be made of every firearm sold, in a form prescribed by the Mayor. The record shall be personally signed by the purchaser and by the person effecting the sale, each in the presence of the other, and shall contain the date of sale; the name, address, occupation, and place of birth of the purchaser; so far as applicable, the caliber, make, model, and manufacturer's number of the weapon; and a statement by the purchaser that the purchaser is not a person prohibited from possessing a firearm under RCC § 22E-4105. A copy of the record shall, within 7 days after the sale, be forwarded by mail to the Chief of the Metropolitan Police Department and the other copy retained by the seller for 6 years after the sale.

(7) No firearm or imitation firearm or placard advertising the sale of a firearm or imitation firearm shall be clearly and conspicuously displayed on the premises, where it can readily be seen from outside.

(c) Any license shall be subject to forfeiture for any violation of the requirements specified in subsection (b) of this section.

(d) Any license issued under this section shall be issued by the Metropolitan Police Department as a Public Safety endorsement to a basic business license under the basic business license system as set forth in subchapter I-A of Chapter 28 of Title 47 of the D.C. Code (§ 47-2851.01 et seq.).

(e) Definitions.

(1) The terms "assault weapon," "building," "firearm," "imitation firearm," "machine gun," "possess," "possessing," "possession," and "sawed-off shotgun" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and

(2) In this section, the term "manufacturer" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 7-2505.03.

RCC § 22E-4115. Unlawful Sale of a Firearm by a Licensed Dealer.

(a) Offense. An actor commits unlawful sale of a firearm by a licensed dealer when the actor:

(1) In fact, is a licensed dealer under RCC § 22E-4114; and

(2) Recklessly violates a licensure requirement specified in RCC § 22E-4114(b).

(b) Penalties. Unlawful sale of a firearm by a licensed dealer is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(c) Definitions. The term "recklessly" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor" and "firearm" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-4116. Use of False Information for Purchase or Licensure of a Firearm.

(a) Offense. An actor commits use of false information for purchase or licensure of a firearm when the actor knowingly gives false information or false evidence of identity to:

(1) Purchase a firearm; or

(2) Apply for a license to carry a pistol under RCC § 22E-4110.

(b) Penalties. Use of false information for purchase or licensure of a firearm is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(c) Definitions. The term "knowingly" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; and the terms "actor," "firearm," and "pistol" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-4117. Civil Provisions for Taking and Destruction of Dangerous Articles.

(a) A dangerous article unlawfully owned, possessed, or carried is hereby declared to be a nuisance.

(b) When a police officer, in the course of a lawful arrest or lawful search, or when a designated civilian employee of the Metropolitan Police Department in the course of a lawful search, discovers a dangerous article that the officer reasonably believes is a nuisance under subsection (a) of this section the officer shall take it into their possession and surrender it to the Property Clerk of the Metropolitan Police Department.

(c) Hearing procedures.

(1) Within 30 days after the date of such surrender, any person may file in the office of the Property Clerk of the Metropolitan Police Department a written claim for possession of such dangerous article. Upon the expiration of the period, the Property Clerk shall notify each claimant, by registered mail addressed to the address shown on the claim, of the time and place of a hearing to determine which claimant, if any, is entitled to possession of such dangerous article. The hearing shall be held within 60 days after the date of such surrender.

(2) At the hearing the Property Clerk shall hear and receive evidence with respect to the claims filed under paragraph (c)(1) of this section. Thereafter the Property Clerk shall determine which claimant, if any, is entitled to possession of such dangerous article and shall reduce their decision to writing. The Property Clerk shall send a true copy of the written decision to each claimant by registered mail addressed to the most recent address of the claimant.

(3) Any claimant may, within 30 days after the day on which the copy of the decision was mailed to such claimant, file an appeal in the Superior Court of the District of Columbia. If the claimant files an appeal, the claimant shall at the same time give written notice thereof to the Property Clerk. If the decision of the Property Clerk is so appealed, the Property Clerk shall not dispose of the dangerous article while the appeal is pending and, if the final judgment is entered by the court, the Property Clerk shall dispose of the dangerous article in accordance with the judgment of the court. The court is authorized to determine which claimant, if any, is entitled to possession of the dangerous article and to enter a judgment ordering a disposition of the dangerous article consistent with subsection (e) of this section.

(4) If there is no appeal, or if the appeal is dismissed or withdrawn, the Property Clerk shall dispose of the dangerous article in accordance with subsection (e) of this section.

(5) The Property Clerk shall make no disposition of a dangerous article under this section, whether in accordance with their own decision or in accordance with the judgment of the court, until the United States Attorney for the District of Columbia or the Attorney General for the District of Columbia certifies to the Property Clerk that the dangerous article will not be needed as evidence.

(d) A person claiming a dangerous article shall be entitled to its possession only if:

(1) The claimant shows, on satisfactory evidence that the ownership is lawful and:

(A) The person is the owner of the dangerous article; or

(B) The person is the accredited representative of the owner and has a power of attorney from the owner;

(2) The claimant shows, on satisfactory evidence, that at the time the dangerous article was taken into possession by a police officer or a designated civilian employee of the Metropolitan Police Department, it was not unlawfully owned and was not unlawfully possessed or carried by the claimant or with their awareness or consent; and

(3) The receipt of possession by the claimant does not cause the article to be a nuisance.

(e) If a person claiming a dangerous article is entitled to its possession as determined under subsections (c) and (d) of this section, possession of such dangerous article shall be given to the claimant. If no person so claiming is entitled to its possession as determined under subsections (c) and (d) of this section, or if there is no claimant, the dangerous article shall be destroyed or, upon order of the Mayor of the District of Columbia, transferred to and used by any federal or District government law enforcement agency. A District government agency receiving a dangerous article under this section shall establish responsibility and records for the item.

(f) The Property Clerk shall not be liable in damages for any action performed in good faith under this section.

(g) Definitions.

(1) The terms "consent," "owner," "possessed," and "possession" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and

(2) In this section, the term "dangerous article" means:

(A) A bump stock, as defined in RCC § 22E-701;

(B) A firearm, as defined in RCC § 22E-701;

(C) A firearm silencer;

(D) A large capacity ammunition feeding device, as defined in RCC § 22E-701; and

(E) A restricted explosive, as defined in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-4118. Exclusions from Liability for Weapon Offenses.

(a) Scope of exclusion. The exclusions from liability specified in this section apply to the following District offenses:

(1) Possession of an Unregistered Firearm, Destructive Device, or Ammunition under RCC § 7-2502.01A;

(2) Possession of a Stun Gun under RCC § 7-2502.15;

(3) Carrying an Air or Spring Gun under RCC § 7-2502.17;

(4) Carrying a pistol in an unlawful manner under RCC § 7-2509.06A;

(5) Possession of a Prohibited Weapon or Accessory under RCC § 22E-4101; and

(6) Carrying a Dangerous Weapon under RCC § 22E-4102.

(b) Exclusion from liability. Notwithstanding any other District law, an actor does not commit an offense specified in subsection (a) of this section when, in fact, the actor is:

(1) A member of the Army, Navy, Air Force, or Marine Corps of the United States;

(2) An on-duty member of the National Guard or Organized Reserves;

(3) A qualified law enforcement officer as defined in 18 U.S.C. § 926B;

(4) A qualified retired law enforcement officer as defined in 18 U.S.C. § 926C, who carries a concealed pistol that is registered under D.C. Code § 7-2502.07 and is conveniently accessible and within reach;

(5) An on-duty licensed special police officer or campus police officer, who possesses or carries a firearm registered under D.C. Code § 7-2502.07 in accordance with D.C. Code § 5-129.02 and all rules promulgated under that section;

(6) An on-duty director, deputy director, officer, or employee of the District of Columbia Department of Corrections who possesses or carries a firearm registered under D.C. Code § 7-2502.07;

(7) An employee of the District or federal government, who is on duty and acting within the scope of those duties;

(8) Lawfully engaging in the business of manufacturing, repairing, or dealing the weapon involved in the offense;
(9) Lawfully engaging in the business of shipping or delivering the weapon involved in the offense; or
(10) Acting within the scope of authority granted by the Chief of the Metropolitan Police Department or a competent court.

(c) Exclusion from liability. Notwithstanding any other District law, an actor shall not be subject to prosecution for an offense specified in subsection (a) of this section if, in fact, the actor:
(1) Holds a valid registration certificate issued under D.C. Code § 7-2502.07; and
(2) Possesses the registered firearm or ammunition for a firearm of the same caliber while:
(A) At the home or place of business designated on the registration certificate;
(B) Transporting the firearm or ammunition, in accordance with RCC § 22E-4109, to or from:
(i) A place of sale;
(ii) The person's home or place of business;
(iii) A place of repair;
(iv) A firearms training and safety class conducted by a firearms instructor; or
(v) A lawful recreational firearm-related activity; or
(C) Transporting the firearm or ammunition for a lawful purpose as expressly authorized by a District or federal statute and in accordance with the requirements of that statute.

(d) Exclusion from liability. Notwithstanding any other District law, an actor does not commit an offense specified in subsection (a) of this section when, in fact, the actor possesses or carries a firearm while participating in a firearms training and safety class conducted by a firearms instructor.

(e) Definitions. The term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "ammunition," "firearm," "firearms instructor," "law enforcement officer," "pistol," and "possesses" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-4119. Merger of Related Weapon Offenses.

(a) Merger of possessory offenses and offenses related to other crime. Multiple convictions for 2 or more of the following offenses merge when arising from the same act or course of conduct:
(1) Possession of an Unregistered Firearm, Destructive Device, or Ammunition under RCC § 7-2502.01A;
(2) Possession of a Stun Gun under RCC § 7-2502.15;
(3) Carrying an Air or Spring Gun under RCC § 7-2502.17;
(4) Carrying a Dangerous Weapon under RCC § 22E-4102;

(5) Possession of a Dangerous Weapon with Intent to Commit Crime under RCC § 22E-4103; and
(6) Possession of a Dangerous Weapon During a Crime under RCC § 22E-4104.

(b) Merger of offenses related to other crime and display or use of weapon. Multiple convictions for 2 or more of the following offenses merge when arising from the same act or course of conduct:
(1) Possession of a Dangerous Weapon with Intent to Commit Crime under RCC § 22E-4103;
(2) Possession of a Dangerous Weapon During a Crime under RCC § 22E-4104; and
(3) Any offense under Subtitle II or Subtitle III of this title that includes as an element of any gradation or enhancement that the person displayed or used a dangerous weapon.

(c) Merger procedure and rule of priority. For an actor found guilty of 2 or more offenses that merge under this section the sentencing court shall follow the procedures specified in subsections (b) and (c) of RCC § 22E-214.

(d) Definitions. The term "act" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-202; and the terms "actor" and "dangerous weapon" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-4120. Endangerment with a Firearm.

(a) Offense. An actor commits endangerment with a firearm when the actor:
(1) Knowingly discharges a projectile from a firearm outside a licensed firing range; and
(2) Either:
(A) The discharged projectile creates a substantial risk of death or bodily injury to another person; or
(B) In fact:
(i) The actor or the discharged projectile is in a location that is:
(I) Open to the general public at the time of the offense;
(II) A communal area of multi-unit housing;
(III) A public conveyance; or
(IV) A rail transit station; and
(ii) The actor does not have permission to discharge a projectile from a firearm under:
(I) A written permit issued by the Metropolitan Police Department; or
(II) Other District or federal law.

(b) Penalties. Endangerment with a firearm is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(c) Multiple convictions for related offenses. A conviction for an offense under this section and a conviction for another offense that has as an objective element in the offense definition or applicable penalty enhancement the use or display, or attempted use or display, of a firearm, imitation firearm, or dangerous weapon shall merge when the convictions arise from the same act or course of conduct and the same complainant.

(d) Merger procedure and rule of priority. For an actor found guilty of 2 or more offenses that merge under this section the sentencing court shall follow the procedures specified in subsections (b) and (c) of RCC § 22E-214.

(e) Definitions. The term "objective element" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-201; the term "knowingly" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "bodily injury," "complainant," "dangerous weapon," "firearm," "imitation firearm," "open to the general public," "public conveyance," and "rail transit station" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

Chapter 42. Breaches of Peace.

RCC § 22E-4201. Disorderly Conduct.

(a) Offense. An actor commits disorderly conduct when the actor:
  (1) In fact, is in a location that is:
    (A) Open to the general public at the time of the offense;
    (B) Inside a public conveyance or a rail transit station; or
    (C) A communal area of multi-unit housing; and
  (2) Engages in any of the following conduct:
    (A) Recklessly, by conduct other than speech, causes any person present to reasonably believe that they are likely to suffer immediate criminal bodily injury, taking of property, or damage to property;
    (B) Purposely commands, requests, or tries to persuade any person present to cause immediate criminal bodily injury, taking of property, or damage to property, reckless as to the fact that the harm is likely to occur;
    (C) Purposely directs abusive speech to any person present, reckless as to the fact that such conduct is likely to provoke immediate retaliatory criminal bodily injury, taking of property, or damage to property; or
    (D) Knowingly continues or resumes fighting with another person after receiving a law enforcement officer's order to stop.

(b) Exclusions from liability.
  (1) An actor does not commit an offense under subparagraph (a)(2)(A) of this section when, in fact, the other person present is a law enforcement officer in the course of official duties.
  (2) An actor does not commit an offense under subparagraph (a)(2)(C) of this section when, in fact, the conduct is directed to or likely to provoke a law enforcement officer in the course of official duties.

(c) Prosecutorial authority. The Attorney General for the District of Columbia shall prosecute violations of this section.
(d) Penalties. Disorderly conduct is a Class D crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(e) Definitions. The terms "knowingly," "purposely," "reckless," and "recklessly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "bodily injury," "law enforcement officer," "open to the general public," "property," "public conveyance," "rail transit station" and "speech" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-4202. Public Nuisance.

(a) Offense. An actor commits public nuisance when the actor purposely causes significant interruption to:
    (1) The orderly conduct of a meeting by a District or federal public body;
    (2) A person's reasonable, quiet enjoyment of their dwelling, between 10:00 p.m. and 7:00 a.m., and continues or resumes the conduct after receiving oral or written notice to stop; or
    (3) A person's lawful use of a public conveyance; or
    (4) A religious service, funeral, or wedding, that is, in fact, lawful and in a location that is open to the general public at the time of the offense.
(b) Prosecutorial authority. The Attorney General for the District of Columbia shall prosecute violations of this section.
(c) Penalties. Public nuisance is a Class D crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(d) Definitions.
    (1) The term "purposely" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the terms "actor," "dwelling," "open to the general public," and "public conveyance" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and
    (2) In this section, the terms "meeting" and "public body" have the meanings specified in D.C. Code § 2-574.

RCC § 22E-4203. Blocking a Public Way.

(a) Offense. An actor commits blocking a public way when the actor:
    (1) Knowingly blocks a street, sidewalk, bridge, path, entrance, exit, or passageway;
    (2) While on land or in a building that is owned by a government, government agency, or government-owned corporation; and
    (3) Continues or resumes the blocking after receiving a law enforcement officer's order that, in fact, is lawful, to stop.
(b) Prosecutorial authority. The Attorney General for the District of Columbia shall prosecute violations of this section.

(c) Penalties. Blocking a public way is a Class D crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(d) Definitions. The term "knowingly" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "blocks," "building," and "law enforcement officer" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-4204. Unlawful Demonstration.

(a) Offense. An actor commits unlawful demonstration when the actor:
    (1) Knowingly engages in a demonstration;
    (2) In a location where the demonstration, in fact, is otherwise unlawful under District or federal law; and
    (3) Continues or resumes engaging in the demonstration after receiving a law enforcement order to stop.
(b) Prosecutorial authority. The Attorney General for the District of Columbia shall prosecute violations of this section.
(c) Penalties. Unlawful demonstration is a Class D crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(d) Definitions. The term "knowingly" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor" and "demonstration" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-4205. Breach of Home Privacy.

(a) Offense. An actor commits breach of home privacy when the actor:
    (1) Knowingly and surreptitiously observes inside a dwelling, by any means; and
    (2) In fact, an occupant of the dwelling would have a reasonable expectation of privacy.
(b) Prosecutorial authority. The Attorney General for the District of Columbia shall prosecute violations of this section.
(c) Penalties. Breach of home privacy is a Class C crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(d) Definitions. The term "knowingly" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor" and "dwelling" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-4206. Indecent Exposure.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree indecent exposure when the actor:
    (1) Knowingly engages in:
        (A) A sexual act;
        (B) Masturbation; or

(C) A sexual or sexualized display of the genitals, pubic area, or anus, when there is less than a full opaque covering; and

(2) The conduct is:

(A) Is visible to the complainant;

(B) Is without the complainant's effective consent; and

(C) Is with the purpose of alarming or sexually abusing, humiliating, harassing, or degrading the complainant.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree indecent exposure when the actor:

(1) Knowingly engages in:

(A) A sexual act;

(B) Masturbation; or

(C) A display of the genitals, pubic area, or anus, when there is less than a full opaque covering;

(2) In, or visible from, a location that is:

(A) Open to the general public at the time of the offense;

(B) A communal area of multi-unit housing;

(C) A public conveyance; or

(D) A rail transit station; and

(3) Reckless as to the fact that the conduct:

(A) Is visible to the complainant;

(B) Is without the complainant's effective consent; and

(C) Alarms or sexually abuses, humiliates, harasses, or degrades any person.

(c) Exclusions from liability.

(1) An actor does not commit an offense under subsection (a) of this section when, in fact:

(A) The actor is inside their own individual dwelling unit; and

(B) The conduct is not visible to any person outside the dwelling.

(2) An actor shall not be subject to prosecution under this section when, in fact, the actor is:

(A) An employee of a licensed sexually-oriented business establishment; and

(B) Acting within the reasonable scope of that role.

(d) Prosecutorial authority. The Attorney General for the District of Columbia shall prosecute violations of subsection (b) of this section.

(e) Penalties.

(1) First degree indecent exposure is a Class B crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(2) Second degree indecent exposure is a Class C crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(f) Definitions.

(1) The terms "knowingly," "purpose," and "reckless" have the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the terms "actor," "complainant," "dwelling," "effective consent," "open to the general public," "public conveyance," "rail transit station," and "sexual act" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and

(2) In this section, the term "sexually-oriented business establishment" has the meaning specified in 11 DCMR § 199.1.

Chapter 43. Group Misconduct.

RCC § 22E-4301. Rioting.

(a) Offense. An actor commits rioting when the actor:
   (1) Knowingly commits or attempts to commit a criminal bodily injury, taking of property, or damage to property;
   (2) Reckless as to the fact 7 or more other people are each personally and simultaneously committing or attempting to commit a criminal bodily injury, taking of property, or damage to property, in the area reasonably perceptible to the actor.

(b) No attempt liability. The criminal attempt provision in RCC § 22E-301 does not apply to this section.

(c) Penalties. Rioting is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(d) Definitions. The terms "knowingly" and "reckless" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; and the terms "actor," "bodily injury," and "property" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-4302. Failure to Disperse.

(a) Offense. An actor commits failure to disperse when the actor:
   (1) Knowingly fails to obey a law enforcement officer's dispersal order;
   (2) Reckless as to the fact that 8 or more people are each personally and simultaneously committing or attempting to commit a criminal bodily injury, taking of property, or damage to property, in the area reasonably perceptible to the actor; and
   (3) In fact, the actor's presence substantially impairs the ability of a law enforcement officer to safely prevent or stop the criminal conduct.

(b) Penalties. Failure to disperse is a Class D crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(c) Definitions. The terms "knowingly" and "reckless" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "bodily injury," "law enforcement officer," and "property" have the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-701.

Chapter 44. Prostitution and Related Statutes.

RCC § 22E-4401. Prostitution.

(a) Offense. An actor commits prostitution when the actor knowingly:
  (1) Pursuant to a prior agreement, explicit or implicit, engages in or submits to a sexual act or sexual contact in exchange for the actor or a third party receiving anything of value;
  (2) Agrees, explicitly or implicitly, to engage in or submit to a sexual act or sexual contact in exchange for the actor or a third party receiving anything of value; or
  (3) Commands, requests, or tries to persuade any person to engage in or submit to a sexual act or sexual contact in exchange for the actor or a third party receiving anything of value.

(b) Immunity.
  (1) An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor is under 18 years of age.
  (2) The Metropolitan Police Department and any other District agency designated by the Mayor shall refer any person under 18 years of age that is suspected of violating subsection (a) of this section to an organization that provides treatment, housing, or services appropriate for victims of sex trafficking of a minor under RCC § 22E-1605.

(c) Penalties. Prostitution is a Class D crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(d) Definitions. The term "knowingly" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "sexual act," and "sexual contact" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-4402. Patronizing prostitution.

(a) Offense. An actor commits patronizing prostitution when the actor knowingly:
  (1) Pursuant to a prior agreement, explicit or implicit, engages in or submits to a sexual act or sexual contact in exchange for the actor giving another person anything of value;
  (2) Agrees, explicitly or implicitly, to give anything of value to another person in exchange for that person or a third party engaging in or submitting to a sexual act or sexual contact; or
  (3) Commands, requests, or tries to persuade any person to engage in or submit to a sexual act or sexual contact in exchange for the actor giving another person anything of value.

(b) Penalties.
  (1) Patronizing prostitution is a Class D crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
  (2) Penalty enhancements. The penalty classification of this offense is increased by one class when the actor:

(A) Is reckless as to the fact that the person patronized is under 18 years of age, or, in fact, the person patronized is under 12 years of age; or

(B) Is reckless as to the fact that the person patronized is:

(i) Incapable of appraising the nature of the sexual act or sexual contact or of understanding the right to give or withhold consent to the sexual act or sexual contact, either due to a drug, intoxicant, or other substance, or, due to an intellectual, developmental, or mental disability or mental illness when the actor has no similarly serious disability or illness; or

(ii) Incapable of communicating willingness or unwillingness to engage in the sexual act or sexual contact.

(c) Definitions. The terms "knowingly" and "reckless" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "consent," "sexual act," and "sexual contact" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-4403. Trafficking in Commercial Sex.

(a) Offense. An actor commits trafficking in commercial sex when the actor:

(1) With intent to receive anything of value as a result, purposely:

(A) Causes, procures, provides, recruits, or entices a person to engage in or submit to a commercial sex act with or for another person; or

(B) Provides or maintains a location for a person to engage in or submit to a commercial sex act with or for another person;

(2) Knowingly receives anything of value as a result of:

(A) Causing, procuring, providing, recruiting, or enticing a person to engage in or submit to a commercial sex act with or for another person; or

(B) Providing or maintaining a location for a person to engage in or submit to a commercial sex act with or for another person; or

(3) Obtains anything of value from the proceeds or earnings of a commercial sex act that a person has engaged in or submitted to, either without consideration or when the consideration is providing or maintaining a location for a commercial sex act.

(b) Penalties.

(1) Trafficking in commercial sex is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(2) Penalty enhancements. The penalty classification of this offense is increased by one class when the actor:

(A) Is reckless as to the fact that the person trafficked is under 18 years of age, or, in fact, the person trafficked is under 12 years of age;
(B) Is reckless as to the fact that the person trafficked is:
(i) Incapable of appraising the nature of the commercial sex act or of understanding the right to give or withhold consent to the commercial sex act, either due to a drug, intoxicant, or other substance, or, due to an intellectual, developmental, or mental disability or mental illness when the actor has no similarly serious disability or illness; or
(ii) Incapable of communicating willingness or unwillingness to engage in the commercial sex act.

(c) Definitions. The terms "intent," "knowingly," "purposely," and "reckless" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "consent," and "commercial sex act" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 22E-4404. Civil Forfeiture.

(a) Property subject to forfeiture. The following are subject to civil forfeiture:
(1) In fact, all conveyances, including aircraft, vehicles or vessels, which are possessed with intent to be used, or are, in fact, used, to facilitate the commission of Trafficking in Commercial Sex under RCC § 22E-4403; and
(2) In fact, all money, coins, and currency which are possessed with intent to be used, or are, in fact, used, to facilitate the commission of Trafficking in Commercial Sex under RCC § 22E-4403.

(b) Requirements for forfeiture. All seizures and forfeitures under this section shall be pursuant to the standards and procedures set forth in D.C. Law 20-278.

(c) Definitions. The term "intent" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the term "possessed" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-701.

Chapter 46. Offenses Against the Family.

RCC § 22E-4601. Contributing to the Delinquency of a Minor.

(a) Offense. An actor commits contributing to the delinquency of a minor when the actor:
(1) In fact, is 18 years of age or older and at least four years older than the complainant;
(2) Is reckless as to the fact that the complainant is under 18 years of age; and
(3) In fact, either:

(A) Is an accomplice to the complainant under RCC § 22E-210 for any District offense, a violation of D.C. Code § 25-1002, or a comparable offense or comparable violation in another jurisdiction; or

(B) Engages in criminal solicitation of the complainant under RCC § 22E-302 for any District offense, a violation of D.C. Code § 25-1002, or a comparable offense or comparable violation in another jurisdiction.

(b) Exclusions from liability.

(1) An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, during a demonstration, the complainant's conduct constitutes, or, if carried out, would constitute, a trespass under RCC § 22E-2601, a public nuisance under RCC § 22E-4202, blocking a public way under RCC § 22E-4203, an unlawful demonstration under RCC § 22E-4204, an attempt to commit such an offense, or a comparable offense in another jurisdiction.

(2) An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor satisfies the requirements specified under D.C. Code § 7-403.

(c) Relationship to minor's conduct. An actor may be convicted of an offense under this section even though the complainant has not been arrested, prosecuted, convicted, or adjudicated delinquent for an offense.

(d) Affirmative defense. It is an affirmative defense to liability under this section that the actor engages in the conduct constituting the offense:

(1) With intent to safeguard or promote the welfare of the complainant; and

(2) In fact, such conduct:

(A) Is reasonable in manner and degree, under all the circumstances; and

(B) Does not create a substantial risk of, or cause, death or serious bodily injury.

(e) Penalties. Contributing to the delinquency of a minor is a Class B crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(f) Definitions. The terms "intent" and "reckless" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "comparable offense," "complainant," "demonstration," and "serious bodily injury" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

D.C. Code Statutes Outside Title 22 Recommended for Revision

RCC § 7-2502.01A. Possession of an Unregistered Firearm, Destructive Device, or Ammunition.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree possession of an unregistered firearm, destructive device, or ammunition when the actor knowingly possesses:
  (1) A firearm without, in fact, being the holder of a registration certificate issued under D.C. Code § 7-2502.07 for that firearm;
  (2) A destructive device; or
  (3) One or more restricted pistol bullets.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree possession of an unregistered firearm, destructive device, or ammunition when the actor knowingly possesses ammunition without, in fact, being the holder of a registration certificate issued under D.C. Code § 7-2502.07 for a firearm of the same caliber.

(c) Exclusions from liability.
  (1) An actor does not commit an offense under subsection (a) of this section for, in fact, possessing a firearm frame, receiver, muffler, or silencer.
  (2) An actor does not commit an offense under subsection (a) of this section for, in fact, possessing a lacrimator or sternutator.
  (3) An actor does not commit an offense under subsection (a) of this section when, in fact, the actor is a nonresident of the District of Columbia who is:
    (A) Participating in a lawful recreational firearm-related activity inside the District; or
    (B) Traveling to or from a lawful recreational firearm-related activity outside the District; and
      (i) Upon demand of a law enforcement officer exhibits proof that:
        (I) The actor is traveling to or from a lawful recreational firearm-related activity outside the District; and
        (II) The actor's possession or control of the firearm is lawful in the actor's jurisdiction of residence; and
      (ii) The firearm is transported in accordance with the requirements specified in RCC § 22E-4109.
  (4) An actor does not commit an offense under subsection (b) of this section when, in fact, the actor is the holder of an ammunition collector's certificate effective on or before September 24, 1976.
  (5) An actor does not commit an offense under subsection (b) this section for, in fact, possessing one or more empty cartridge cases, shells, or spent bullets.
  (6) An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor satisfies the criteria in RCC § 22E-4118.

(d) Affirmative defense. It is an affirmative defense to liability under this section that the person possesses the item while, in fact, voluntarily surrendering the item pursuant to District or federal law.

(e) Prosecutorial authority. The Attorney General for the District of Columbia shall prosecute violations of this section.

(f) Penalties.

(1) First degree possession of an unregistered firearm, destructive device, or ammunition is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(2) Second degree possession of an unregistered firearm, destructive device, or ammunition is a Class B crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(3) Administrative disposition. The Attorney General for the District of Columbia may, in its discretion, offer an administrative disposition under D.C. Code § 5-335.01 et seq. for a violation of this section.

(g) Definitions.

(1) The term "knowingly" has the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the terms "actor," "ammunition," "law enforcement officer," "possesses," "possessing," and "possession" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and

(2) In this section, the terms "destructive device," "firearm," and "restricted pistol bullet" have the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 7-2501.01.

(h) Interpretation of statute. Chapters 1 through 6 of Subtitle I of Title 22E shall apply to this offense.

RCC § 7-2502.15. Possession of a Stun Gun.

(a) Offense. An actor commits possession of a stun gun when the actor knowingly possesses a stun gun and is:

(1) Under 18 years of age; or

(2) In a location that:

(A) Is a building, building grounds, or part of a building, that is occupied by the District of Columbia;

(B) Is a building, building grounds, or part of a building, that is occupied by a preschool, a primary or secondary school, public recreation center, or a children's day care center; or

(C) Displays clear and conspicuous signage indicating that stun guns are prohibited.

(b) Exclusion from liability. An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor satisfies the criteria in RCC § 22E-4118.

(c) Affirmative defense. It is an affirmative defense to liability under this section that, in fact:

(1) A person lawfully in charge of the location gave effective consent to the conduct charged to constitute the offense; or

(2) The actor reasonably believes that a person lawfully in charge of the location gave effective consent to the conduct charged to constitute the offense.

(d) Prosecutorial authority. The Attorney General for the District of Columbia shall prosecute violations of this section.
(e) Penalties. Possession of a stun gun is a Class B crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(f) Definitions. The term "knowingly" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "building," "effective consent," "possesses," and "stun gun" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.
(g) Interpretation of statute. Chapters 1 through 6 of Subtitle I of Title 22E shall apply to this offense.

RCC § 7-2502.17. Carrying an Air or Spring Gun.

(a) Offense. An actor commits carrying an air or spring gun when the actor:
    (1) Knowingly possesses any instrument or weapon of the kind commonly called an air rifle, air gun, air pistol, B-B gun, spring gun, blowgun, or bowgun;
    (2) While outside a building; and
    (3) The instrument or weapon is conveniently accessible and within reach.
(b) Exclusions from liability.
    (1) An actor does not commit an offense under this section if, in fact, the conduct occurs:
        (A) As part of a lawful theatrical performance, athletic contest, or educational or cultural presentation;
        (B) In a licensed firing range; or
        (C) With the permission of the Metropolitan Police Department.
    (2) An actor does not commit an offense under this section if, in fact, the actor:
        (A) Is 18 years of age or older; and
        (B) Transports the instrument or weapon while it is unloaded and securely wrapped.
    (3) An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor satisfies the criteria in RCC § 22E-4118.
(c) Prosecutorial authority. The Attorney General for the District of Columbia shall prosecute violations of this section.
(d) Penalties. Carrying an air or spring gun is a Class D crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(e) Definitions. The term "knowingly" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "building," and "possesses" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.
(f) Interpretation of statute. Chapters 1 through 6 of Subtitle I of Title 22E shall apply to this offense.

RCC § 7-2507.02A. Unlawful Storage of a Firearm.

(a) Offense. An actor commits unlawful storage of a firearm when the actor:
  (1) Knowingly possesses a firearm that is:
    (A) Not conveniently accessible and within reach;
    (B) Not in a securely locked container; and
    (C) Not in another location that a reasonable person would believe to be secure; and
  (2) Is negligent as to the fact that:
    (A) A person other than the actor who is under 18 years of age is able to access the firearm without the permission of their parent or guardian; or
    (B) A person other than the actor who is prohibited from possessing a firearm under District law is able to access the firearm.

(b) Prosecutorial authority. The Attorney General for the District of Columbia shall prosecute violations of this section.

(c) Penalties.
  (1) Unlawful storage of a firearm is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
  (2) Penalty enhancements. The penalty classification of an offense under subparagraph (a)(1)(A) of this section is increased by one class when, in fact, a person under 18 years of age accesses and uses the firearm to cause either:
    (A) A criminal bodily injury; or
    (B) A bodily injury to themselves.

(d) Definitions. The terms "knowingly" and "negligent" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "bodily injury," "firearm," "possesses," and "possessing" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

(e) Interpretation of statute. Chapters 1 through 6 of Subtitle I of Title 22E shall apply to this offense.

RCC § 7-2509.06A. Carrying a Pistol in an Unlawful Manner.

(a) Offense. An actor commits carrying a pistol in an unlawful manner when the actor:
  (1) Knowingly possesses a pistol;
  (2) While outside the actor's home or place of business;
  (3) The pistol is conveniently accessible and within reach; and
  (4) In addition:
    (A) The actor possesses ammunition that is conveniently accessible and within reach and is either:
      (i) More than is required to fully load the pistol twice; or
      (ii) More than 20 rounds;
    (B) The pistol is not entirely hidden from public view; or

(C) The pistol is not in a holster on the actor's person in a firmly secure manner that is reasonably designed to prevent loss, theft, and accidental discharge of the pistol.

(b) Exclusions from liability. An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor satisfies the criteria in RCC § 22E-4118.

(c) Prosecutorial authority. The Attorney General for the District of Columbia shall prosecute violations of this section.

(d) Penalties. Carrying a pistol in an unlawful manner is a Class D crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(e) Definitions. The term "knowingly" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; and the terms "actor," "ammunition," "pistol," and "possesses" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701.

(f) Interpretation of statute. Chapters 1 through 6 of Subtitle I of Title 22E shall apply to this offense.

D.C. Code § 16-705. Jury trial; trial by court.

(a) Until [midnight on a date three years after enactment of the RCC], in a criminal case tried in the Superior Court:

(1) Except as provided in paragraph (a)(2) of this section, a trial for the offense shall be by jury when:

(A) According to the Constitution of the United States, the defendant is entitled to a jury trial;

(B) The defendant is charged with an offense that is punishable by a fine or penalty of more than $1,000, or by imprisonment for more than 60 days, or for more than six months in the case of the offense of contempt of court;

(C) The defendant is charged with an attempt, conspiracy, or solicitation to commit an offense specified in subparagraph (a)(1)(B) of this section;

(D) The defendant is charged with an offense under Chapter 12 of Title 22E in which the person who is alleged to have been subjected to the criminal offense is a "law enforcement officer" as defined in D.C. Code § 22E-701;

(E) The defendant is charged with a "registration offense" as defined in D.C. Code § 22-4001(8);

(F) The defendant is charged with an offense that, if the defendant were a non-citizen and were convicted of the offense, could result in the defendant's deportation from the United States under federal immigration law, or denial of naturalization under federal immigration law; or

(G) The defendant is charged with 2 or more offenses which are punishable by a cumulative fine or penalty of more than $1,000 or a cumulative term of imprisonment of more than 60 days; and

(2) A trial for the offense shall be by a single judge whose verdict shall have the same force and effect as that of a jury:
(A) In any case not specified in paragraphs (a)(1)(A) – (a)(1)(G) of this section; or
(B) In any case specified in paragraphs (a)(1)(A) – (a)(1)(G) of this section if the defendant in open court expressly waives trial by jury and requests trial by the court more than 10 days before the scheduled trial or, with the consent of the court, within 10 days of the scheduled trial.

(b) After [midnight on a date three years after enactment of the RCC], in a criminal case tried in the Superior Court:
(1) Except as provided in paragraph (b)(2) of this section, a trial shall be by jury when:
(A) According to the Constitution of the United States, the defendant is entitled to a jury trial;
(B) The defendant is charged with an offense that is punishable by a fine or penalty of more than $250, or by imprisonment, or for more than six months in the case of the offense of contempt of court;
(C) The defendant is charged with 2 or more offenses which are punishable by a cumulative fine or penalty of more than $250; and
(2) A trial shall be by a single judge whose verdict shall have the same force and effect as that of a jury:
(A) In any case not specified in paragraphs (b)(1)(A) – (b)(1)(C) of this section; or
(B) In any case specified in paragraphs (b)(1)(A) – (b)(1)(C) of this section if the defendant in open court expressly waives trial by jury and requests trial by the court more than 10 days before the scheduled trial or, with the consent of the court, within 10 days of the scheduled trial.

(c) If a defendant in a criminal case is charged with 2 or more offenses and the offenses include at least one jury demandable offense and one non-jury demandable offense the trial for all offenses charged against that defendant shall be by jury unless the defendant in open court expressly waives trial by jury and requests trial by the court, in which case the trial shall be by a single judge, whose verdict shall have the same force and effect as that of a jury.

(d) The jury shall consist of twelve persons, unless the parties, with the approval of the court and in the manner provided by rules of the court, agree to a number less than twelve. Even absent such agreement, if, due to extraordinary circumstances, the court finds it necessary to excuse a juror for just cause after the jury has retired to consider its verdict, in the discretion of the court, a valid verdict may be returned by the remaining eleven jurors.

RCC § 16-1005A. Criminal Contempt for Violation of a Civil Protection Order.

(a) Offense. An actor commits criminal contempt for violation of a civil protection order when the actor:
  (1) Knows they are subject to a protection order that, in fact:
    (A) Is one of the following:
      (i) A temporary civil protection order issued under D.C. Code § 16-1004;
      (ii) A final civil protection order issued under D.C. Code § 16-1005; or
      (iii) A valid foreign protection order;
    (B) Is in writing;
    (C) Advises the actor of the consequences for violating the order, including immediate arrest, the issuance of a warrant for the person's arrest, and the criminal penalties under this section; and
    (D) Is sufficiently clear and specific to serve as a guide for the actor's conduct; and
  (2) Knowingly fails to comply with the order.

(b) Defense. An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, a judicial officer gives effective consent to the conduct constituting the offense.

(c) Jurisdiction. An oral or written statement made by an actor located outside the District of Columbia to a person located in the District of Columbia by means of telecommunication, mail, or any other method of communication shall be deemed to be made in the District of Columbia.

(d) Penalties. Criminal contempt for violation of a civil protection order is a Class B crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(e) Definitions.
  (1) The terms "knowingly" and "knows" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the terms "actor" and "effective consent" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and
  (2) In this section:
    (A) The term "judicial officer" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 16-1001; and
    (B) The term "valid foreign protection order" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 16-1041.

(f) Interpretation of statute. Chapters 1 through 6 of Subtitle I of Title 22E shall apply to this offense.

RCC § 16-1021. Parental Kidnapping Definitions.

For the purposes of this subchapter, the terms:
  (1) "Child" means a person under 16 years of the age.
  (2) "Lawful custodian" means a person who is authorized to have custody under District law, or by an order of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia or a court of competent jurisdiction of any state, or a person designated by the lawful custodian temporarily to care for the child.

(3) "Relative" means a parent, other ancestor, brother, sister, uncle, or aunt, or one who has been lawful custodian at some prior time.

RCC § 16-1022. Parental Kidnapping.

(a) First degree. An actor commits the offense of first degree parental kidnapping when the actor:
  (1) Commits fourth degree parental kidnapping; and
  (2) Knowingly takes, conceals, or detains the child outside of the District for more than 24 hours; and
  (3) The child is, in fact, outside the custody of the lawful custodian for more than 30 days.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits the offense of second degree parental kidnapping when the actor:
  (1) Commits fourth degree parental kidnapping; and
  (2) Knowingly takes, conceals, or detains the child outside of the District for more than 24 hours; and
  (3) Fails to release the child without injury in a safe place prior to arrest.

(c) Third degree. An actor commits the offense of third degree parental kidnapping when the actor:
  (1) Commits fourth degree parental kidnapping; and
  (2) Knowingly takes, conceals, or detains the child outside of the District for more than 24 hours.

(d) Fourth degree. An actor commits the offense of fourth degree parental kidnapping when the actor:
  (1) Knowingly takes, conceals, or detains a person who has another lawful custodian;
  (2) With intent to prevent a lawful custodian from exercising rights to custody of the person;
  (3) The person taken, concealed, or detained is, in fact, under 16 years of age; and
  (4) The actor is a relative of the complainant, or a person who believes they are acting pursuant to the direction of a relative of the complainant.

(e) Exclusion from liability. An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact:
  (1) The actor is a parent who reasonably believes they are fleeing from imminent physical harm to the parent;
  (2) The actor has the effective consent of the other parent; or
  (3) The actor has intent to protect the child from imminent physical harm.

(f) Defense.
  (1) If a person engages in conduct constituting a violation of this section, the person may file a petition in the Superior Court of the District of Columbia that:

(A) States that at the time the act was done, a failure to do the act would have resulted in a clear and present danger to the health, safety, or welfare of the child; and

(B) Seeks to establish custody, to transfer custody, or to revise or to clarify the existing custody order; except that if the Superior Court of the District of Columbia does not have jurisdiction over the custody issue, the person shall seek to establish, transfer, revise, or clarify custody in a court of competent jurisdiction.

(2) It is a defense to prosecution under this section that the actor filed a petition as provided in paragraph (f)(1) within 5 business days of the action taken, and that the court finds that at the time the act was done, a failure to do the act would have resulted in a clear and present danger to the health, safety, or welfare of the child.

(g) Continuous offense. The offense prohibited by this section is continuous in nature and continues for so long as the child is concealed, detained, or otherwise unlawfully physically removed from the lawful custodian.

(h) Penalties.

(1) First degree parental kidnapping is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(2) Second degree parental kidnapping is a Class B crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(3) Third degree parental kidnapping is a Class D crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(4) Fourth degree parental kidnapping is a Class E crime, subject to a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(5) Reimbursement of expenses. Any expenses incurred by the District in returning the child shall be assessed by the court against any person convicted of the violation and reimbursed to the District. Those expenses reasonably incurred by the lawful custodian and child victim as a result of a violation of this section shall be assessed by the court against any person convicted of the violation and reimbursed to the lawful custodian.

(6) First and second degree parental kidnapping designated as felonies. Notwithstanding the maximum authorized penalties, first and second degree parental kidnapping shall be deemed felonies under D.C. Code § 22-563.

(i) Definitions.

(1) The term "act" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-202; the terms "intent" and "knowing" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the terms "actor," "complainant," and "effective consent" have the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-701; and

(2) In this section, the terms "child," "lawful custodian," and "relative" have the meanings specified in RCC § 16-1021.

(j) Interpretation of statute. The general provisions of Chapters 1 through 6 of Subtitle I of Title 22E of the D.C. Code shall apply to this offense.

RCC § 16-1023. Protective Custody and Return of Child.

(a) A law enforcement officer may take a child into protective custody if it reasonably appears to the officer that any person is in violation of this subchapter and unlawfully will flee the District with the child.

(b) A child who has been detained or concealed shall be returned by a law enforcement officer to the lawful custodian or placed in the custody of another entity authorized by law.

(c) Definitions. The term "law enforcement officer" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-701.

RCC § 16-1024. Expungement of Parental Kidnapping Conviction.

Any parent convicted in the Superior Court of the District of Columbia of violating any provision of this subchapter with respect to their child may apply to the court for an order to expunge from all official records all records relating to the conviction at such time that the parent's youngest child has reached the age of 18 years, provided that the parent has no more than one conviction for a violation of this subchapter at the time that the application for expungement is made. Any other person convicted of violating the provisions of this subchapter may apply to the court for an order to expunge all records relating to the conviction 5 years after the conviction, or at such time as the child has reached the age of 18 years, whichever shall later occur, provided that the person has no more than one conviction for violating any provision of this subchapter at the time that the application for expungement is made.

RCC § 23-586. Failure to Appear after Release on Citation or Bench Warrant Bond.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree failure to appear after release on citation or bench warrant bond when the actor:

(1) Knows that they are released on a condition to appear before a judicial officer on a specified date and time either:

(A) By a citation that, in fact, is issued under D.C. Code § 23-584 for a felony; or

(B) After knowingly posting a bond that is, in fact, for a bench warrant issued from the Superior Court of the District of Columbia in a felony case; and

(2) Knowingly fails to appear or remain for the hearing.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree failure to appear after release on citation or bench warrant bond when the actor:

(1) Knows that they are released on a condition to appear before a judicial officer on a specified date and time either:
(A) By a citation that, in fact, is issued under D.C. Code § 23-584 for a felony or misdemeanor; or
(B) After knowingly posting a bond that is, in fact, for a bench warrant issued from the Superior Court of the District of Columbia in a felony or misdemeanor case; and
(2) Knowingly fails to appear or remain for the hearing.

(c) Defenses.
(1) It is a defense to liability under this section that, in fact, a releasing official, prosecutor, or judicial officer gives effective consent to the conduct constituting the offense.
(2) It is a defense to liability under this section that, in fact, the actor makes good faith, reasonable efforts to appear or remain for the hearing.

(d) Penalties.
(1) First degree failure to appear after release on citation or bench warrant bond is a Class B crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(2) Second degree failure to appear after release on citation or bench warrant bond is a Class D crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(e) Definitions.
(1) The terms "knowingly" and "knows" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the terms "actor," "effective consent," "felony," and "misdemeanor" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and
(2) In this section:
(A) The term "judicial officer" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 23-501; and
(B) The term "releasing official" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 23-1110.

(f) Interpretation of statute. Chapters 1 through 6 of Subtitle I of Title 22E shall apply to this offense.

RCC § 23-1327. Failure to Appear in Violation of a Court Order.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree failure to appear in violation of a court order when the actor:
(1) Knows that they are required to appear before a judicial officer on a specified date and time by a court order for what is, in fact, a hearing:
(A) In a case in which the actor is charged with a felony; or
(B) In which the actor is scheduled to be sentenced; and
(2) Knowingly fails to appear or remain for the hearing.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree failure to appear in violation of a court order when the actor:

(1) Knows that they are required to appear before a judicial officer on a specified date and time by a court order for what is, in fact, a hearing:
(A) In a case in which the actor is charged with a felony or misdemeanor; or
(B) In which the actor is scheduled to appear as a material witness in a criminal case; and
(2) Knowingly fails to appear or remain for the hearing.

(c) Defenses.
(1) It is a defense to liability under this section that, in fact, a judicial officer gives effective consent to the conduct constituting the offense.
(2) It is a defense to liability under this section that, in fact, the actor makes good faith, reasonable efforts to appear or remain for the hearing.

(d) Penalties.
(1) First degree failure to appear in violation of a court order is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(2) Second degree failure to appear in violation of a court order is a Class C crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(3) Forfeiture. Upon conviction under this section, the court may, subject to the provisions of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, order the forfeiture of any security which was given or pledged for the actor's release.

(e) Definitions.
(1) The terms "knowingly" and "knows" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the terms "actor," "effective consent," "felony," and "misdemeanor" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and
(2) In this section, the term "judicial officer" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 23-1331.

(f) Interpretation of statute. Chapters 1 through 6 of Subtitle I of Title 22E shall apply to this offense.

RCC § 23-1329A. Criminal Contempt for Violation of a Release Condition.

(a) Offense. An actor commits criminal contempt for violation of a release condition when the actor:
(1) Knows they are subject to a conditional release order that, in fact:
(A) Is issued under D.C. Code § 23-1321;
(B) Is in writing;
(C) Advises the actor of the consequences for violating the order, including immediate arrest or the issuance of a warrant for the actor's arrest, the criminal penalties under this section, the pretrial release penalty enhancements under RCC § 22E-607, and the criminal penalties for obstruction of justice under D.C. Code § 22-722; and

(D) Is sufficiently clear and specific to serve as a guide for the actor's conduct; and

(2) Knowingly fails to comply with the conditional release order.

(b) Defense. It is a defense to liability under this section that, in fact, a judicial officer gives effective consent to the conduct constituting the offense.

(c) Prosecutorial authority. A judicial officer or a prosecutor may initiate a proceeding for contempt under this section.

(d) Non-jury hearing. A proceeding determining a violation of this section shall be by a single judge, whose verdict shall have the same force and effect as that of a jury.

(e) Penalties. Criminal contempt for violation of a release condition is a Class B crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(f) Definitions.

(1) The terms "knowingly" and "knows" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the terms "actor" and "effective consent" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and

(2) In this section, the term "judicial officer" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 23-1331.

(g) Interpretation of statute. Chapters 1 through 6 of Subtitle I of Title 22E shall apply to this offense.

RCC § 24-241.05A. Violation of Work Release.

(a) Offense. An actor commits violation of work release when the actor:

(1) In fact, is granted a work release privilege under D.C. Code § 24-241.02; and

(2) Knowingly fails to return at the time and to the place of confinement designated in their work release plan.

(b) Defense. An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, a judicial officer, the Director of the Department of Corrections, or the Chairman of the United States Parole Commission gives effective consent to the conduct constituting the offense.

(c) Prosecutorial authority. The Attorney General for the District of Columbia shall prosecute violations of this section.

(d) Penalties. Violation of work release is a Class C crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(e) Definitions.

(1) The term "knowingly" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the terms "actor" and "effective consent" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and

(2) In this section, the term "judicial officer" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 23-1331.

(f) Interpretation of statute. Chapters 1 through 6 of Subtitle I of Title 22E shall apply to this offense.

RCC § 24-403.01. Sentencing, supervised release, and good time credit for felonies committed on or after August 5, 2000.

(a) For any felony committed on or after August 5, 2000, the court shall impose a sentence that:
  (1) Reflects the seriousness of the offense and the criminal history of the person found guilty;
  (2) Provides for just punishment and affords adequate deterrence to potential criminal conduct of the person found guilty and others; and
  (3) Provides the person found guilty with needed educational or vocational training, medical care, and other correctional treatment.

(b)
  (1) If a person found guilty is sentenced to imprisonment, or to commitment pursuant to § 24-903, under this section, the court shall impose an adequate period of supervision ("supervised release") to follow release from the imprisonment or commitment.
  (2) If the court imposes a sentence of more than one year, the court shall impose a term of supervised release of:
    (A) Not more than 5 years, if the maximum term of imprisonment authorized for the offense is 24 years or more;
    (B) Not more than 3 years, if the maximum term of imprisonment authorized for the offense is 8 years or more, but less than 24 years; or
    (C) Not more than 1 year, if the maximum term of imprisonment authorized for the offense is less than eight years.
  (3) [Reserved].
  (4) In the case of a person sentenced for an offense for which registration is required by the Chapter 40 of Title 22, the court may, in its discretion, impose a longer term of supervised release than that required or authorized by paragraph (2) or (3) of this subsection, of:
    (A) Not more than 10 years; or
    (B) Not more than life if the person is required to register for life.
  (5) The term of supervised release commences on the day the incarcerated person is released from imprisonment, and runs concurrently with any federal, state, or local term of probation, parole, or supervised release for another offense to which the person is subject or becomes subject during the term of supervised release. A term of supervised release does not run during any period in which the person is imprisoned in connection with a conviction for a federal, state, or local crime unless the period of imprisonment is less than 30 days.

(6) Persons on supervised release shall be subject to the authority of the United States Parole Commission until completion of the term of supervised release. The Parole Commission shall have and exercise the same authority as is vested in the United States District Courts by 18 U.S.C. § 3583(d)-(i), except that:
  (A) The procedures followed by the Parole Commission in exercising such authority shall be those set forth in chapter 311 of title 18 of the United States Code; and
  (B) An extension of a term of supervised release under 18 U.S.C. § 3583(e)(2) may be ordered only by the court upon motion from the Parole Commission.

(7) A person whose term of supervised release is revoked may be imprisoned for a period of:
  (A) Not more than 5 years, if the maximum term of imprisonment authorized for the offense is 40 years or more;
  (B) Not more than 3 years, if the maximum term of imprisonment authorized for the offense is 24 years or more, but less than 40 years;
  (C) Not more than 2 years, if the maximum term of imprisonment authorized for the offense is 8 years or more, but less than 24 years; or
  (D) Not more than 1 year, if the maximum term of imprisonment authorized for the offense is less than 8 years.

(b-1) The maximum term of imprisonment authorized upon revocation of supervised release pursuant to subsection (b)(7) shall not be deducted from the maximum term of imprisonment or commitment authorized for such offense.

(c)

(1) Except as provided under paragraph (2) of this subsection, a sentence under this section of imprisonment, or of commitment pursuant to § 24-903, shall be for a definite term, which shall not exceed the maximum term allowed by law or be less than any minimum term required by law.

(2) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, if the person committed the offense for which they are being sentenced under this section while under 18 years of age:
  (A) The court may issue a sentence less than the minimum term otherwise required by law; and
  (B) The court shall not impose a sentence of life imprisonment without the possibility of parole or release.

(c-1) A person sentenced under this section to imprisonment, or to commitment pursuant to § 24-903, shall serve the term of imprisonment or commitment specified in the sentence, less any time credited toward service of the sentence under subsection (d) of this section and subject to § 24-403.03, if applicable.

(d) Notwithstanding any other law, a person sentenced to imprisonment, or to commitment pursuant to § 24-903, under this section for any offense may receive good time credit toward service of the sentence only as provided in 18 U.S.C. § 3624(b).

(d-1)

(1) A person sentenced to imprisonment under this section for a nonviolent offense may receive up to a one-year reduction in the term the person must otherwise serve if the person successfully completes a substance abuse treatment program in accordance with 18 U.S.C. § 3621(e)(2).

(2) For the purposes of this subsection, the term "nonviolent offense" means any crime other than those included within the definition of "crime of violence" in § 23-1331(4).

D.C. Code § 24-403.03. Modification of an imposed term of imprisonment.[7]

(a) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the court shall reduce a term of imprisonment imposed upon a defendant for an offense if:

(1) The defendant was sentenced pursuant to § 24-403 or § 24-403.01, or was committed pursuant to § 24-903, and has served at least 15 years in prison; and

(2) The court finds, after considering the factors set forth in subsection (c) of this section, that the defendant is not a danger to the safety of any person or the community and that the interests of justice warrant a sentence modification.

(b)

(1) A defendant convicted as an adult of an offense may file an application for a sentence modification under this section. The application shall be in the form of a motion to reduce the sentence. The application may include affidavits or other written material. The application shall be filed with the sentencing court and a copy shall be served on the United States Attorney.

(2) The court may direct the parties to expand the record by submitting additional testimony, examinations, or written materials related to the motion. The court shall hold a hearing on the motion at which the defendant and the defendant's counsel shall be given an opportunity to speak on the defendant's behalf. The court may permit the parties to introduce evidence. The court may consider any records related to the underlying offense.

(3)

(A) Except as provided in subparagraph (B) of this paragraph, the defendant shall be present at any hearing conducted under this section unless the defendant waives the right to be present. Any proceeding under this section may occur by video teleconferencing and the requirement of a defendant's presence is satisfied by participation in the video teleconference.

[7] The text of RCC § 24-403.03 includes changes to the text as approved in the Omnibus Public Safety and Justice Amendment Act of 2020, Act A23-0568 (Projected Law Date of May 18, 2021). The RCC assumes the Omnibus text will proceed into law after Congressional review.

(B) During a period of time for which the Mayor has declared a public health emergency pursuant to section 5a of the District of Columbia Public Emergency Act of 1980, effective October 17, 2002 (D.C. Law 14-194; D.C. Official Code § 7-2304.01), a defendant in the custody of the Bureau of Prisons, who committed the offense for which the defendant has filed the application for sentence modification under this section on or after the defendant's 18th birthday, may not petition the court to return to the Department of Corrections for a proceeding under this section.

(4) The court shall issue an opinion in writing stating the reasons for granting or denying the application under this section, but the court may proceed to sentencing immediately after granting the application.

(c) The court, in determining whether to reduce a term of imprisonment pursuant to subsection (a) of this section, shall consider:

(1) The defendant's age at the time of the offense;

(2) The history and characteristics of the defendant;

(3) Whether the defendant has substantially complied with the rules of the institution to which the defendant has been confined, and whether the defendant has completed any educational, vocational, or other program, where available;

(4) Any report or recommendation received from the United States Attorney;

(5) Whether the defendant has demonstrated maturity, rehabilitation, and a fitness to reenter society sufficient to justify a sentence reduction;

(6) Any statement, provided orally or in writing, provided pursuant to § 23-1904 or 18 U.S.C. § 3771 by a victim of the offense for which the defendant is imprisoned, or by a family member of the victim if the victim is deceased;

(7) Any reports of physical, mental, or psychiatric examinations of the defendant conducted by licensed health care professionals;

(8) The defendant's family and community circumstances at the time of the offense, including any history of abuse, trauma, or involvement in the child welfare system;

(9) The extent of the defendant's role in the offense and whether and to what extent another person was involved in the offense;

(10) The diminished culpability of juveniles and persons under age 25, as compared to that of older adults, and the hallmark features of youth, including immaturity, impetuosity, and failure to appreciate risks and consequences, which counsel against sentencing them to lengthy terms in prison, despite the brutality or cold-blooded nature of any particular crime, and the defendant's personal circumstances that support an aging out of crime; and

(11) Any other information the court deems relevant to its decision.

(d) If the court denies or grants only in part the defendant's 1st application under this section, a court shall entertain a 2nd application under this section no sooner than 3 years after the date that the order on the initial application becomes final. If the court denies or grants only in part the defendant's 2nd application under this section, a court shall entertain a 3rd and final application under this section no sooner than 3 years following the date that the order on the 2nd application becomes final. No court shall entertain a 4th or successive application under this section.

(e)

(1) Any defendant whose sentence is reduced under this section shall be resentenced pursuant to § 24-403, § 24-403.01, or § 24-903, as applicable.

(2) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, when resentencing a defendant under this section, the court:

(A) May issue a sentence less than the minimum term otherwise required by law; and

(B) Shall not impose a sentence of life imprisonment without the possibility of parole or release.

(f) The version of this section that was effective from May 10, 2019, to the effective date of the Omnibus Public Safety and Justice Amendment Act of 2020, as approved by the Committee on the Judiciary and Public Safety on November 23, 2020 (Committee print of Bill 23-127), shall apply to all proceedings initiated under this section in any District of Columbia court, including any appeals thereof, by defendants who were eligible under this section prior to the effective date of the Omnibus Public Safety and Justice Amendment Act of 2020, as approved by the Committee on the Judiciary and Public Safety on November 23, 2020 (Committee print of Bill 23-127), and shall apply to all proceedings under this section in any District of Columbia court, including any appeals thereof, that were pending prior to the effective date of the Omnibus Public Safety and Justice Amendment Act of 2020, as approved by the Committee on the Judiciary and Public Safety on November 23, 2020 (Committee print of Bill 23-127).

(g) In considering applications filed by defendants for offenses committed after the defendant's 18th birthday, the court shall endeavor to prioritize consideration of the applications of defendants who have been incarcerated the longest; except, that the inability to identify those defendants shall not delay the court acting on other applications under this section.

(h) Notwithstanding any other law, if a District government workforce development program requires District residency as a condition of program eligibility, the residency requirement shall be waived for defendants resentenced pursuant to this section.

(i) Beginning in Fiscal Year 2022, the Office of Victim Services and Justice Grants shall, 1353 on an annual basis, issue a grant of $200,000 to an organization that provides advocacy, case, management, and legal services, for the purpose of developing and offering restorative justice practices for survivors of violent crimes who seek such practices, such as for survivors impacted by post-conviction litigation.

RCC § 25-1001. Possession of an Open Container or Consumption of Alcohol in a Motor Vehicle.

(a) Offense. An actor commits possession of an open container or consumption of alcohol in a motor vehicle when the actor:
  (1) Knowingly:
    (A) Consumes an alcoholic beverage; or
    (B) Possesses an alcoholic beverage in an open container;
  (2) In the passenger area of a motor vehicle on a public highway, or the right-of-way of a public highway.

(b) Exclusion from liability. An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor is:
  (1) Located in:
    (A) The passenger area of a motor vehicle designed, maintained, or used primarily for the transportation of persons for compensation; or
    (B) The living quarters of a house coach or house trailer; and
  (2) Not operating the motor vehicle.

(c) No attempt liability. The criminal attempt provision in RCC § 22E-301 does not apply to this section.

(d) Penalties. Possession of an open container or consumption of alcohol in a motor vehicle is a Class C crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(e) Definitions.
  (1) The term "knowingly" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the terms "actor," "motor vehicle," and "possesses" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and
  (2) In this section:
    (A) The terms "alcoholic beverage" and "open container" have the meanings specified in D.C. Code § 25-101; and
    (B) The term "highway" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 50-2206.01.

(f) Interpretation of statute. Chapters 1 through 6 of Subtitle I of Title 22E shall apply to this offense.

RCC § 48-904.01a. Possession of a Controlled Substance.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree possession of a controlled substance when the actor:
  (1) Knowingly possesses a measurable amount of a controlled substance; and
  (2) The controlled substance is, in fact:

(A) Opium, its phenanthrene alkaloids, or their derivatives, except isoquinoline alkaloids of opium;
(B) Any salt, compound, isomer, derivative, or preparation thereof which is chemically equivalent to or identical with any of the substances referred to in subparagraph (A) of this paragraph;
(C) Opium poppy or poppy straw;
(D) Cocaine, its salts, optical and geometric isomers, or salts of isomers;
(E) Ecgonine, its derivatives, their salts, isomers, or salts of isomers;
(F) Methamphetamine, its salts, isomers, or salts of its isomers;
(G) Phenmetrazine, or its salts; or
(H) Phencyclidine or a phencyclidine immediate precursor.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree possession of a controlled substance when the actor knowingly possesses a measurable amount of any controlled substance.

(c) Exclusions from liability. An actor does not commit an offense under this section when, in fact, the actor:
(1) Possesses a controlled substance that was obtained directly from, or pursuant to a valid prescription or order of, a practitioner while acting in the course of their professional practice, or as authorized by this chapter or Chapter 16B of Title 7; or
(2) Satisfies the requirements specified under D.C. Code § 7-403.

(d) Penalties.
(1) First degree possession of a controlled substance is a Class C offense subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(2) Second degree possession of a controlled substance is a Class D offense subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(e) Definitions.
(1) The term "knowingly" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the terms "actor," "controlled substance," and "possesses" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and
(2) In this section, the terms "distribute," "immediate precursor," "manufacture," "opium poppy," and "poppy straw" have the meanings specified in D.C. Code § 48-901.02.

(f) Interpretation of statute. The general provisions of Chapters 1 through 6 of Subtitle I of Title 22E of the D.C. Code shall apply to this offense.

(g) Judicial deferral and dismissal of proceedings.
(1) Notwithstanding RCC § 22E-602(c), when a person is convicted of possession of a controlled substance under RCC § 48-904.01a the court may, without entering a judgment of guilty and with the consent of the person, defer further proceedings on that offense and place the person on probation upon such reasonable conditions as it may require and for such period, not to exceed one year, as the court may prescribe. Upon violation of a condition of the probation, the court may enter an adjudication of guilt and proceed as otherwise provided. The court may, in its discretion, dismiss the proceedings against such person and discharge the person from probation before the expiration of the maximum period prescribed for such person's probation. If during the period of probation the person does not violate any of the conditions of the probation, then upon expiration of such period the court shall discharge the person and dismiss the proceedings against the person. Discharge and dismissal under this subsection shall be without court adjudication of guilt. Such discharge or dismissal shall not be deemed a conviction with respect to disqualifications or disabilities imposed by law upon conviction of a crime (including the penalties prescribed under § 48-904.08 for second or subsequent convictions) or for any other reason.

(2) Upon the dismissal of such proceedings and discharge of the person under paragraph (g)(1) of this section, such person may apply to the court for an order to expunge from all official records all recordation relating to his or her arrest, indictment or information, trial, finding of guilty, and dismissal and discharge pursuant to this subsection. If the court determines, after hearing, that the proceedings were dismissed and the person discharged, it shall enter such order. The effect of such order shall be to restore such person, in the contemplation of this law, to the status he or she occupied before such arrest or indictment or information. No person as to whom such order has been entered shall be held thereafter under any provision of any law to be guilty of perjury or otherwise giving a false statement by reason of failure to recite or acknowledge such arrest, or indictment, or trial in response to any inquiry made of him or her for any purpose.

RCC § 48-904.01b. Trafficking of a Controlled Substance.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree trafficking of a controlled substance when the actor:

(1) Knowingly distributes, manufactures, or possesses with intent to distribute or manufacture, a measurable quantity of a controlled substance; and

(2) The controlled substance is, in fact:

(A) More than 200 grams of any compound or mixture containing opium, its phenanthrene alkaloids, or their derivatives, except isoquinoline alkaloids of opium;

(B) More than 200 grams of any compound or mixture containing any salt, compound, isomer, derivative, or preparation thereof which is chemically equivalent to or identical with any of the substances referred to in subparagraph (A) of this paragraph;

(C) More than 200 grams of a compound or mixture containing opium poppy or poppy straw;
(D) More than 400 grams of a compound or mixture containing cocaine, its salts, optical and geometric isomers, or salts of isomers;
(E) More than 400 grams of a compound or mixture containing ecgonine, its derivatives, their salts, isomers, or salts of isomers;
(F) More than 200 grams of a compound or mixture containing methamphetamine, its salts, isomers, or salts of its isomers;
(G) More than 200 grams of a compound or mixture containing phenmetrazine, or its salts; or
(H) More than 100 grams of a compound or mixture containing phencyclidine or a phencyclidine immediate precursor.

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree trafficking of a controlled substance when the actor:
(1) Knowingly distributes, manufactures, or possesses with intent to distribute or manufacture, a measurable quantity of a controlled substance; and
(2) The controlled substance is, in fact:
(A) More than 20 grams of any compound or mixture containing opium, its phenanthrene alkaloids, or their derivatives, except isoquinoline alkaloids of opium;
(B) More than 20 grams of any compound or mixture containing any salt, compound, isomer, derivative, or preparation thereof which is chemically equivalent to or identical with any of the substances referred to in subparagraph (A) of this paragraph;
(C) More than 20 grams of a compound or mixture containing opium poppy or poppy straw;
(D) More than 50 grams of a compound or mixture containing cocaine, its salts, optical and geometric isomers, or salts of isomers;
(E) More than 50 grams of a compound or mixture containing ecgonine, its derivatives, their salts, isomers, or salts of isomers;
(F) More than 20 grams of a compound or mixture containing methamphetamine, its salts, isomers, or salts of its isomers;
(G) More than 20 grams of a compound or mixture containing phenmetrazine, or its salts; or
(H) More than 10 grams of a compound or mixture containing phencyclidine or a phencyclidine immediate precursor.

(c) Third degree. An actor commits third degree trafficking of a controlled substance when the actor:
(1) Knowingly distributes, manufactures, or possesses with intent to distribute or manufacture, a measurable quantity of a controlled substance; and

(2) The controlled substance is, in fact, a compound or mixture containing:
(A) Opium, its phenanthrene alkaloids, or their derivatives, except isoquinoline alkaloids of opium;
(B) Any salt, compound, isomer, derivative, or preparation thereof which is chemically equivalent to or identical with any of the substances referred to in subparagraph (A) of this paragraph;
(C) Opium poppy or poppy straw;
(D) Cocaine, its salts, optical and geometric isomers, or salts of isomers;
(E) Ecgonine, its derivatives, their salts, isomers, or salts of isomers;
(F) Methamphetamine, its salts, isomers, or salts of its isomers;
(G) Phenmetrazine, or its salts; or
(H) Phencyclidine or a phencyclidine immediate precursor.

(d) Fourth degree. An actor commits fourth degree trafficking of a controlled substance when the actor knowingly distributes, manufactures, or possesses with intent to distribute or manufacture, a measurable quantity of any controlled substance that is, in fact, listed in Schedule I, II, or III as defined in Subchapter II of this Chapter.

(e) Fifth degree. An actor commits fifth degree trafficking of a controlled substance when the actor knowingly distributes, manufactures, or possesses with intent to distribute or manufacture, a measurable quantity of any controlled substance.

(f) Aggregation of quantities. When a single scheme or systematic course of conduct could give rise to multiple charges under this section, the government instead may bring one charge and aggregate the quantities of a controlled substance involved in the scheme or systematic course of conduct to determine the grade of the offense.

(g) Weight of mixtures and compounds not to include edible products or non-consumable containers.
(1) For controlled substances that are contained within edible products and that are planned to be consumed as food or beverages, the total weight of the controlled substance shall be determined by calculating the concentration of the controlled substance contained within the mixture and then calculating the total amount of controlled substance that is present. The weight of the inert edible mixture will not be added to determine the total weight of the compound or mixture containing a controlled substance.
(2) The weight of a non-consumable container in which a controlled substance is stored or carried shall not be included in the weight of the compound or mixture containing the controlled substance.

(h) Penalties.
(1) First degree trafficking of a controlled substance is a Class 7 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(2) Second degree trafficking of a controlled substance is a Class 8 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(3) Third degree trafficking of a controlled substance is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(4) Fourth degree trafficking of a controlled substance is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(5) Fifth degree trafficking of a controlled substance is a Class B crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.
(6) Penalty enhancements. The penalty classification of any gradation of this offense is increased by one class when the actor commits the offense:
(A) When the actor is, in fact, 21 years of age or older, and distributes a controlled substance to a person reckless as to the fact that the person is under 18 years of age;
(B) By knowingly possessing, either on the actor's person or in a location where it is readily available, a firearm, imitation firearm, or dangerous weapon in furtherance of and while distributing, or possessing with intent to distribute, a controlled substance;
(C) When the actor is, in fact, 21 years of age or older, and the actor engages in the conduct constituting the offense by enlisting, hiring, contracting, or encouraging any person to sell or distribute any controlled substance for the profit or benefit of the actor, recklessness as to the fact the person is under 18 years of age; or
(D) When the actor commits an offense under this section when in a location that, in fact:
(i) Is within 300 feet of the boundary line of a school, college, university, public swimming pool, public playground, public recreation center, public library, or children's day care center; and
(ii) Displays clear and conspicuous signage that indicates controlled substances are prohibited in the location or that the location is a drug free zone.

(i) Defenses.
(1) It is a defense to prosecution under this section for distribution or possession with intent to distribute that the actor distributes or possesses with intent to distribute a controlled substance but, in fact, does not do so in exchange for something of value or expectation of future financial gain from distribution of a controlled substance and either the quantity of the controlled substance distributed does not exceed the amount for a single use by the recipient, or recipient plans to immediately use the controlled substance.

(2) It is a defense to prosecution under this section for manufacturing or possession with intent to manufacture that the actor packaged, repackaged, labeled, or relabeled a controlled substance for the person's own personal use, or possessed a controlled substance with intent to do so.

(j) Definitions.

(1) The terms "intended," "intends," "intent," "knowingly," "reckless," and "recklessness" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the terms "actor," "controlled substance," "dangerous weapon," "firearm," "imitation firearm," "possesses," "possessing," "possession," and "value" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and

(2) In this section, the terms "distribute," "immediate precursor," "manufacture," "opium poppy," "person," and "poppy straw" have the meanings specified in D.C. Code § 48-901.02.

(k) Interpretation of statute. The general provisions of Chapters 1 through 6 of Subtitle I of Title 22E of the D.C. Code shall apply to this offense.

RCC § 48-904.01c. Trafficking of a Counterfeit Substance.

(a) First degree. An actor commits first degree trafficking of a counterfeit substance when the actor:

(1) Knowingly distributes, creates, or possesses with intent to distribute a measurable quantity of a counterfeit substance; and

(2) The counterfeit substance is, in fact:

(A) More than 200 grams of any compound or mixture containing opium, its phenanthrene alkaloids, or their derivatives (except isoquinoline alkaloids of opium);

(B) More than 200 grams of any compound or mixture containing any salt, compound, isomer, derivative, or preparation thereof which is chemically equivalent to or identical with any of the substances referred to in subparagraph (A) of this paragraph;

(C) More than 200 grams of a compound or mixture containing opium poppy or poppy straw;

(D) More than 400 grams of a compound or mixture containing cocaine, its salts, optical and geometric isomers, or salts of isomers;

(E) More than 400 grams of a compound or mixture containing ecgonine, its derivatives, their salts, isomers, or salts of isomers;

(F) More than 200 grams of a compound or mixture containing methamphetamine, its salts, isomers, or salts of its isomers;

(G) More than 200 grams of a compound or mixture containing phenmetrazine, or its salts; or

(H) More than 100 grams of a compound or mixture containing phencyclidine or a phencyclidine immediate precursor;

(b) Second degree. An actor commits second degree trafficking of a counterfeit substance when the actor:

(1) Knowingly distributes, creates, or possesses with intent to distribute a measurable quantity of a counterfeit substance; and

(2) The counterfeit substance is, in fact:

(A) More than 20 grams of any compound or mixture containing opium, its phenanthrene alkaloids, or their derivatives (except isoquinoline alkaloids of opium);

(B) More than 20 grams of any compound or mixture containing any salt, compound, isomer, derivative, or preparation thereof which is chemically equivalent to or identical with any of the substances referred to in subparagraph (A) of this paragraph;

(C) More than 20 grams of a compound or mixture containing opium poppy or poppy straw;

(D) More than 20 grams of a compound or mixture containing cocaine, its salts, optical and geometric isomers, or salts of isomers;

(E) More than 20 grams of a compound or mixture containing ecgonine, its derivatives, their salts, isomers, or salts of isomers;

(F) More than 20 grams of a compound or mixture containing methamphetamine, its salts, isomers, or salts of its isomers;

(G) More than 20 grams of a compound or mixture containing phenmetrazine, or its salts; or

(H) More than 10 grams of a compound or mixture containing phencyclidine or a phencyclidine immediate precursor;

(c) Third degree. An actor commits third degree trafficking of a counterfeit substance when the actor:

(1) Knowingly distributes, creates, or possesses with intent to distribute a measurable quantity of a counterfeit substance; and

(2) The counterfeit substance is, in fact a compound or mixture containing:

(A) Opium, its phenanthrene alkaloids, or their derivatives (except isoquinoline alkaloids of opium);

(B) Any salt, compound, isomer, derivative, or preparation thereof which is chemically equivalent to or identical with any of the substances referred to in subparagraph (A) of this paragraph;

(C) Opium poppy or poppy straw;

(D) Cocaine, its salts, optical and geometric isomers, or salts of isomers;

(E) Ecgonine, its derivatives, their salts, isomers, or salts of isomers;

(F) Methamphetamine, its salts, isomers, or salts of its isomers;

(G) Phenmetrazine, or its salts; or

(H) Phencyclidine or a phencyclidine immediate precursor.

(d) Fourth degree. An actor commits fourth degree trafficking of a counterfeit substance when the actor knowingly distributes, creates, or possesses with intent to distribute a measurable quantity of any counterfeit substance that is, in fact, a controlled substance under Schedule I, II, or III, as defined in Subchapter II of this Chapter.

(e) Fifth degree. An actor commits fifth degree trafficking of a counterfeit substance when the actor knowingly distributes, creates, or possesses with intent to distribute a measurable quantity of any counterfeit substance.

(f) Aggregation of quantities. When a single scheme or systematic course of conduct could give rise to multiple charges under this section, the government instead may bring one charge and aggregate the quantities of a counterfeit substance involved in the scheme or systematic course of conduct to determine the grade of the offense.

(g) Weight of mixtures and compounds not to include edible products or non-consumable containers.

(1) For controlled substances that are contained within edible products and that are planned to be consumed as food or beverages, the total weight of the controlled substance shall be determined by calculating the concentration of the controlled substance contained within the mixture and then calculating the total amount of controlled substance that is present. The weight of the inert edible mixture will not be added to determine the total weight of the compound or mixture containing a controlled substance.

(2) The weight of a non-consumable container in which a controlled substance is stored or carried shall not be included in the weight of the compound or mixture containing the controlled substance.

(h) Penalties.

(1) First degree trafficking of a counterfeit substance is a Class 7 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(2) Second degree trafficking of a counterfeit substance is a Class 8 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(3) Third degree trafficking of a counterfeit substance is a Class 9 crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(4) Fourth degree trafficking of a counterfeit substance is a Class A crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(5) Fifth degree trafficking of a counterfeit substance is a Class B crime, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(6) Penalty enhancements. The penalty classification of any gradation of this offense is increased by one class when, in addition to the elements of the offense gradation, if the actor knowingly possesses, either on the actor's person or in a location where it is readily available, a firearm, imitation firearm, or dangerous weapon in furtherance of and while distributing, or possessing with intent to distribute, a counterfeit substance.

(i) Definitions.

(1) The terms "intended," "intent," and "knowingly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "in fact" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-207; the terms "actor," "controlled substance," "dangerous weapon," "firearm" "imitation firearm," "possesses," and "possessing" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and

(2) In this section, the terms "distribute," "immediate precursor," "manufacture," "opium poppy," "person," and "poppy straw" have the meanings specified in D.C. Code § 48-901.02.

(j) Interpretation of statute. The general provisions of Chapters 1 through 6 of Subtitle I of Title 22E of the D.C. Code shall apply to this offense.

RCC § 48-904.10. Possession of Drug Manufacturing Paraphernalia.

(a) Offense. An actor commits possession of drug manufacturing paraphernalia when the actor knowingly possesses an object with intent to use the object to manufacture a controlled substance.

(b) Exclusions from liability. An actor does not commit an offense under this section:

(1) If the object possessed is, in fact, 50 years of age or older;

(2) If the actor possesses an object with intent solely to use the object to package or repackage a controlled substance for the actor's own use; or

(3) If the actor, in fact, satisfies the requirements specified under D.C. Code § 7-403.

(c) Penalties. Possession of drug manufacturing paraphernalia is a Class D offense, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(d) Definitions.

(1) The terms "intent" and "knowingly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the terms "actor," "controlled substance," "possessed," and "possesses" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and

(2) In this section, the term "manufacture" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 48-901.02.

(e) Interpretation of statute. The general provisions of Chapters 1 through 6 of Subtitle I of Title 22E of the D.C. Code shall apply to this offense.

RCC § 48-904.11. Trafficking of Drug Paraphernalia.

(a) Offense. An actor commits trafficking of drug paraphernalia when the actor:

(1) Knowingly sells or delivers, or possesses with intent to sell or deliver, an object;
(2) With intent that another person will use the object to introduce into the human body, produce, process, prepare, test, analyze, pack, store, conceal, manufacture, or measure a controlled substance.

(b) Defenses. It is a defense to prosecution under this section that the object specified in paragraph (a)(1) of this section is, in fact:
(1) Testing equipment or other objects used, planned for use, or designed for use in identifying or analyzing the strength, effectiveness, or purity of a controlled substance or for ingestion or inhalation of a controlled substance, provided that the actor is a community-based organization;
(2) An unused hypodermic syringe or needle;
(3) An item planned for use in a medical procedure or treatment permitted under District or federal civil law, to be performed by a licensed health professional or by a person acting at the direction of a licensed health professional; or
(4) An object that is 50 years of age or older.

(c) Penalties. Trafficking of drug paraphernalia is a Class D offense, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(d) Definitions.
(1) The terms "intended," "intent," and "knowingly" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-206; the terms "actor," "controlled substance," "health professional," and "possesses" have the meanings specified in RCC § 22E-701; and
(2) In this section:
(A) The term "community-based organization" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 7-404; and
(B) The terms "distributes" and "manufacture" have the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 48-901.02.

(e) Interpretation of statute. The general provisions of Chapters 1 through 6 of Subtitle I of Title 22E of the D.C. Code shall apply to this offense.

RCC § 48-904.12. Maintaining Methamphetamine Production.

(a) Offense. An actor commits the offense of maintaining methamphetamine production when the actor knowingly maintains or opens any location with intent that the location will be used to manufacture, other than by mere packaging, repackaging, labeling, or relabeling, methamphetamine, its salts, isomers, or salts of its isomers.

(b) Penalties. Maintaining methamphetamine production is a Class A offense, subject to a maximum term of imprisonment of [X], a maximum fine of [X], or both.

(c) Definitions.
(1) The term "knowingly" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-206; the term "actor" has the meaning specified in RCC § 22E-701; and

(2) In this section, the term "manufacture" has the meaning specified in D.C. Code § 48-901.02.

(d) Interpretation of statute. The general provisions of Chapters 1 through 6 of Subtitle I of Title 22E of the D.C. Code shall apply to this offense.

COMMENTARY:
SUBTITLE I. GENERAL PART

RCC § 22E-101. Short Title and Effective Date.

Explanatory Note. This section provides a short title for the Revised Criminal Code and provisions necessary for an orderly transition. The section ensures that implementation of the Revised Criminal Code will not raise ex post facto concerns under the U.S. Constitution by establishing that the Revised Criminal Code does not apply to conduct committed prior to the effective date. Such conduct is instead governed by prior laws, which remain in force solely to deal with these prosecutions.

Relation to Current District Law. This section is in accordance with, but fills a gap in, District law. The use of a short title for a section of the D.C. Code is common practice.[1] Also, several Titles of the D.C. Code set a specific effective date by their own terms.[2] With respect to subsection (c), D.C. Code § 45-404 states that repeal of an act of the Council does not "release or extinguish any penalty . . . incurred pursuant to the act," and that "the [repealed] act shall be treated as remaining in force for the purpose of sustaining any . . . prosecution for the enforcement of any penalty . . . ." This "savings" statute has been used to ensure that crimes committed prior to a change in a criminal law are prosecuted under the prior version.[3] However, neither the savings statute nor any other statute in the D.C. Code states when a penalty is "incurred" under a repealed law. Nor has the DCCA clarified the matter. To resolve this ambiguity and fill a gap in District law, subsection (c) states that if a single element of a crime is committed before the effective date of the Revised Criminal Code, then the superseded law should apply.

[1] See, e.g., D.C. Code § 19-1301.01 ("This chapter may be cited as the 'Uniform Trust Code'."); D.C. Code § 29-101.01(a) ("This title may be cited as the 'Business Organizations Code'."); D.C. Code § 46-351.01 ("This chapter may be cited as the Uniform Interstate Family Support Act.").
[2] See, e.g., D.C. Code § 2-118 ("This subchapter shall become effective 6 months from the date of their [sic] approval.").
[3] See Holiday v. United States, 683 A.2d 61, 80 (D.C. 1996) ("The general savings statutes, therefore . . . preserve mandatory-minimum sentences in all cases where the offense was committed" before repeal of the mandatory minimum).

RCC § 22E-102. Rules of Interpretation.

1. § 22E-102 (a) — Interpretation Generally.

Explanatory Note. This subsection codifies the general rules of statutory interpretation that should be used to determine the meaning of provisions in the Revised Criminal Code. The subsection specifies that a provision first shall be interpreted according to the plain meaning of its text. However, in addition to its plain meaning, a provision also may be interpreted based on its structure, purpose, and history when necessary to determine the legislative intent.[1] This subsection is intended to codify existing District law concerning the general rules of interpretation applicable to criminal statutes. Such codification provides notice to the public as to applicable rules of interpretation.

Relation to Current District Law. The D.C. Code currently provides no notice of how criminal statutes are to be interpreted. This subsection codifies the general rules of interpretation in District case law.

Longstanding Supreme Court and District case law holds that the first, mandatory step in statutory interpretation is always examination of the text.[2] This examination of the text should use the ordinary, common sense meaning of words.[3] This requirement has been called the "plain meaning" rule of interpretation, and the rule's primacy stems from the fact that the statutory text is generally the best way to ascertain the legislative intent for a law.[4] The plain meaning rule also reflects the importance of the public being able to understand and comply with criminal laws.[5]

However, as recognized in the second sentence of subsection (a), the plain meaning rule is not necessarily the last or decisive step in interpreting a statutory provision.[6] In

---

[1] RCC § 22E-102(a) refers to the "legislature's meaning" and "goal" to avoid use of the RCC defined culpable mental state terms "purpose" and "intent." However, District case law usually refers to the latter terms, and use of "legislature's meaning" and "goal" in RCC § 22E-102(a) should be construed consistent with "legislative intent" and "purpose" in that case law.

[2] Tippett v. Daly, 10 A.3d 1123, 1126 (D.C. 2010) (en banc) ("We start, as we must, with the language of the statute") (quoting Bailey v. United States, 516 U.S. 137, 144 (1995)).

[3] Tippett, 10 A.3d at 1126 ("Moreover, in examining the statutory language, it is axiomatic that 'the words of the statute should be construed according to their ordinary sense and with the meaning commonly attributed to them.'") (quoting Peoples Drug Stores, Inc. v. District of Columbia, 470 A.2d 751, 753 (D.C. 1983) (en banc) (internal citations omitted).

[4] Peoples Drug Stores, 470 A.2d at 753 ("The primary and general rule of statutory construction is that the intent of the lawmaker is to be found in the language that he has used."). Varela v. Hi-Lo Powered Stirrups, Inc., 424 A.2d 61, 64 (D.C.1980) (en banc) (quoting United States v. Goldenberg, 168 U.S. 95, 102-03 (1897)).

[5] Peoples Drug Stores, 470 A.2d at 755 ("There are strong policy reasons for maintaining the certainty, fairness, and respect for the legal system that the plain meaning rule engenders in most instances. Unless the meaning of statutes can be readily ascertained by a reading of statutory language, the ability of citizens to comply with statutory standards is diminished and the administration of such standards may be unmanageable or even erratic.").

[6] Id. at 754 ("Although the 'plain meaning' rule is certainly the first step in statutory interpretation, it is not always the last or the most illuminating step. This court has found it appropriate to look beyond the plain meaning of statutory language in several different situations.").

some situations, it may be necessary to look beyond the plain meaning of statutory text.[7] In such situations, the purpose,[8] structure,[9] or history[10] of the provision and surrounding statutory text may be examined to determine legislative intent. There does not appear to be consensus in District case law about when it is necessary to look beyond the plain meaning of a statutory provision to determine legislative intent.[11] However, there is agreement that looking beyond the plain meaning of a statutory provision to the purpose, structure or history is "unusual",[12] and requires "persuasive reasons" for doing so.[13] To the extent there may be ambiguity in District case law as to when the exceptions to the plain meaning rule should be applied, this subsection is intended merely to codify existing law, not resolve these ambiguities.

2. § 22E-102 (b) — Rule of Lenity.

Explanatory Note. Subsection (b) codifies how to interpret statutory language when the rules of statutory interpretation in subsection (a) fail to resolve the matter. Subsection (b) states that if of the meaning of statutory language remains in doubt after examination of the statute's plain meaning, structure, purpose,[14] and history, then the [7] Varela v. Hi-Lo Powered Stirrups, Inc., 424 A.2d 61, 65 (D.C. 1980) ("However, while (t)he plain meaning of the words is generally the most persuasive evidence of the intent of the legislature ... the plain meaning rule has limitations. It has long been recognized that the literal meaning of a statute will not be followed when it produces absurd results. And since the judicial function is to ascertain the legislative intention the Court may properly exercise that function with recourse to the legislative history, and may depart from the literal meaning of the words when at variance with the intention of the legislature as revealed by legislative history. (District of Columbia National Bank v. District of Columbia, 121 U.S.App.D.C. 196, 198, 348 F.2d 808, 810 (1965) (citations omitted). See also Davis v. United States, D.C.App., 397 A.2d 951 (1979).)").

[8] See, e.g., Tippett, 10 A.3d at 1127 ("We consider not only the bare meaning of the word but also its placement and purpose in the statutory scheme.") (quoting Bailey v. United States, 516 U.S. 137, 145 (1995)).

[9] See, e.g., Tippett, 10 A.3d at 1127 ("Therefore, 'we do not read statutory words in isolation; the language of surrounding and related paragraphs may be instrumental to understanding them.'") (quoting District of Columbia v. Beretta, U.S.A., Corp., 872 A.2d 633, 652 (D.C.2005) (en banc)).

[10] See, e.g., Peoples Drug Stores, 470 A.2d at 755 ("Finally, a court may refuse to adhere strictly to the plain wording of a statute in order 'to effectuate the legislative purpose.'") (internal citations omitted).

[11] Some judicial opinions suggest that unless absurd, it is never necessary to inquire further if the plain meaning of a provision is clear. See, e.g., Eaglin v. District of Columbia, 123 A.3d 953, 955 (D.C. 2013) ("[I]f the plain meaning of statutory language is clear and unambiguous and will not produce an absurd result, we will look no further." Smith v. United States, 68 A.3d 729, 735 (D.C.2013) (quoting Hood v. United States, 28 A.3d 553, 559 (D.C.2011))); In re Al-Baseer, 19 A.3d 341, 344 (D.C. 2011) ("The court's task in interpreting a statute begins with its language, and, where it is clear, and its import not patently wrong or absurd, our task comes to an end") (quoting In re Orshansky, 952 A.2d 199, 210 (D.C. 2008) (internal citations omitted)). Other opinions specifically note that the clarity of a plain meaning interpretation may be misleading and further examination is required. See, e.g., Peoples Drug Stores, 470 A.2d at 754 ("[E]ven where the words of a statute have a 'superficial clarity,' a review of the legislative history or an in-depth consideration of alternative constructions that could be ascribed to statutory language may reveal ambiguities that the court must resolve.") (quoting Sanker v. United States, 374 A.2d 304, 307 (D.C. 1977) (internal citations omitted)).

[12] District of Columbia v. Place, 892 A.2d 1108, 1111 (D.C. 2006).

[13] Peoples Drug Stores, 470 A.2d at 755.

[14] RCC § 22E-102(b) refers to "goal" to avoid use of the RCC defined culpable mental state term "purpose." However, District case law usually refers to the latter term, and the use of "goal" in RCC § 22E-102(b) should be construed to be consistent with "purpose" in that case law.

interpretation that is most favorable to the defendant applies. This codifies existing District case law concerning the rule of lenity.

Relation to Current District Law. The DCCA has held that the rule of lenity is "a secondary canon of construction" that is to be applied after other rules of interpretation, and only if necessary.[15] In other words, the rule of lenity is a rule of last resort.[16] The rule can "tip the balance in favor of criminal defendants only where, exclusive of the rule, a penal statute's language, structure, purpose and legislative history leave its meaning genuinely in doubt."[17] Moreover, the interpretation favoring the defendant must still be a "reasonable" interpretation of a statute's language, structure, purpose and history.[18] The rule of lenity reflects a policy decision that imprisonment should not be imposed except where the legislative intent is clear.[19]

3. § 22E-102 (c) — Effect of Headings and Captions.

Explanatory Note. This subsection states that the headings and captions throughout Title 22E may be used to aid interpretation of statutory provisions that are otherwise ambiguous.

Relation to Current District Law. Criminal statutes in the District historically have not been in enacted titles of the D.C. Code. To the extent the Official D.C. Code now contains headings and captions for criminal offenses, these are typically notations added by codification counsel or code publication experts. This section is consistent with current D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) case law that has held that courts may rely upon headings and captions to interpret statutory provisions.[20] However, both the RCC statute and DCCA clarify that headings and captions should only be used when the text of the statutory provision is ambiguous.[21]

---

[15] Luck v. District of Columbia, 617 A.2d 509, 515 (D.C. 1992).
[16] See, e.g., Luck, 617 A.2d at 515 (quoting Callanan v. United States, 364 U.S. 587, 596 (1961)); Heard v. United States, 686 A.2d 1026, 1029 (D.C. 1996) (citing Moskal v. United States, 498 U.S. 103, 108 (1990)).
[17] Lemon v. United States, 564 A.2d 1368, 1381 (D.C.1989) (quoting United States v. Otherson, 637 F.2d 1276, 1285 (9th Cir.1980)).
[18] Henson v. United States, 399 A.2d 16, 21 (D.C.1979).
[19] Luck, 617 A.2d at 515 ("This policy embodies the instinctive distaste against men [and women] languishing in prison unless the lawmaker has clearly said they should.") (quoting United States v. Bass, 404 U.S. 336, 348 (1971)).
[20] Mitchell v. United States, 64 A.3d 154, 156 (D.C. 2013) ("We agree with the Supreme Court of Arizona that in determining the extent and reach of an act of the legislature, the court should consider not only the statutory language, but also the title, Maricopa County v. Douglas, 69 Ariz. 35, 208 P.2d 646, 648 (1949), and we shall do so here.").
[21] In re J.W., 100 A.3d 1091, 1095 (D.C. 2014) ("We agree that bolt cutters may be used to commit a crime and that there was abundant evidence that appellant carried them for that purpose. Thus, a cursory comparison of these facts to the title of the statute—"possession of implements of crime"—might lead to the conclusion that appellant is guilty of the crime charged. However, "[t]he significance of the title of the statute should not be exaggerated." Mitchell v. United States, 64 A.3d 154, 156 (D.C.2013). "[H]eadings and titles are not meant to take the place of the detailed provisions of the text." Bhd. of R.R. Trainmen v. Balt. & Ohio R.R. Co., 331 U.S. 519, 528, 67 S.Ct. 1387, 91 L.Ed. 1646 (1947). We therefore focus our analysis on the text of the statute, which limits its reach to tools and implements "for picking locks or pockets." Because bolt cutters

4. § 22E-102 (d) — Effect of Definition Cross-references.

Explanatory Note. This subsection states that cross-references to definitions in Title 22E, or the fact that there is an omission of a cross-reference to a definition in Title 22E, may be used to aid interpretation of statutory provisions that are otherwise ambiguous. Subsection (d) indicates that cross-references to definitions in Title 22E are to be treated like headings and captions in subsection (c). The inclusion or omission of such a cross-reference does not, of itself, mean that a definition for a term in the statute does or does not apply.

The inclusion of clarificatory definition cross-references in RCC statutes greatly enhances the transparency and accessibility of the statutes' meaning. Should drafting errors occur, however, the inadvertent omission of a cross-reference is not by itself decisive as to whether a definition elsewhere in the RCC applies.

The definitions in Subtitle I (General Part) of Title 22E apply to all provisions unless there is specific language to the contrary. Most definitions in Title 22 are codified in RCC § 22E-701, which prefaces the list of definitions by stating that, "[u]nless otherwise defined in a particular section, in this title the term…[X] [means] [Y]." Other terms are defined somewhere in Subtitle I of the RCC, such as the definition of "act" in RCC § 22E-202, and through RCC § 22E-104 apply to all other provisions of Title 22E absent a statutory provision to the contrary. Either way, regardless of cross-references, terms defined in Subtitle I apply to other subtitles absent statutory language to the contrary.[22]

Subsection (d) does not address cross-references to definitions outside Title 22E or definitions themselves (as opposed to cross-references), which are to be accorded the same status as other substantive statutory text. Definitions outside Title 22E do not already apply to Title 22E by their own language, so a cross-reference to such a non-Title 22E definition in an RCC statute is substantive, not merely clarificatory, text.

Relation to Current District Law. Criminal statutes in the District historically have not utilized generally-applicable definitions. The use of standardized definitions across the RCC is new to District criminal law. However, it is expected that clarificatory cross-references to definitions in the RCC will be treated similarly to how captions and titles are treated in D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) case law—which provides that courts may rely upon headings and captions to interpret statutory provisions.[23] However, both RCC § 22E-102 and DCCA case law clarify that headings and captions (and similarly cross-references to definitions in Title 22E) should only be used when the text of a statutory provision is ambiguous.[24] are not "lock-picking tools" within the definition we have adopted, there was insufficient evidence to sustain J.W.'s adjudication. We therefore vacate the adjudication for possessing implements of crime.").

---

[22] In some cases, application of a definition under RCC § 22E-701 to a particular statute may be non-sensical or produce absurd results. In these cases, the omission of a cross-reference may indicate that the definition under § 22E-701 does not apply to a term as used in that particular statute.

[23] Mitchell v. United States, 64 A.3d 154, 156 (D.C. 2013) ("We agree with the Supreme Court of Arizona that in determining the extent and reach of an act of the legislature, the court should consider not only the statutory language, but also the title, Maricopa County v. Douglas, 69 Ariz. 35, 208 P.2d 646, 648 (1949), and we shall do so here.").

[24] In re J.W., 100 A.3d 1091, 1095 (D.C. 2014) ("We agree that bolt cutters may be used to commit a crime and that there was abundant evidence that appellant carried them for that purpose. Thus, a cursory comparison

5. § 22E-102 (e) — Definitions of these facts to the title of the statute—"possession of implements of crime"—might lead to the conclusion that appellant is guilty of the crime charged. However, "[t]he significance of the title of the statute should not be exaggerated." Mitchell v. United States, 64 A.3d 154, 156 (D.C.2013). "[H]eadings and titles are not meant to take the place of the detailed provisions of the text." Bhd. of R.R. Trainmen v. Balt. & Ohio R.R. Co., 331 U.S. 519, 528, 67 S.Ct. 1387, 91 L.Ed. 1646 (1947). We therefore focus our analysis on the text of the statute, which limits its reach to tools and implements "for picking locks or pockets." Because bolt cutters are not "lock-picking tools" within the definition we have adopted, there was insufficient evidence to sustain J.W.'s adjudication. We therefore vacate the adjudication for possessing implements of crime.").

Subsection (e) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC and the D.C. Code.

RCC § 22E-103. Interaction of Title 22E With Other District Laws.

Explanatory Note. This section limits the scope of Title 22E provisions to avoid unintended consequences that otherwise might arise from applying the title's provisions to other laws. Subsection (a) provides that the provisions of Title 22E will not apply to any law outside of Title 22E unless expressly specified by statute. Crimes in other titles of the D.C. Code will not be affected by the general provisions of Title 22E unless a law specifically states that the general provisions so apply.

Subsection (b) provides that unless expressly specified by statute or otherwise provided by law, Title 22E will not have any unintended effect on current civil law. The words "otherwise provided by law" are intended to include all sources of law, including statutes, regulatory provisions, and case law. For example, unless specified by statute or otherwise specified by law, Title 22E's revisions to the crime of assault will not change the elements required for common law assault under the law of torts. However, under general principles of collateral estoppel recognized under D.C. Court of Appeals case law, a person convicted of an assault offense under Title 22E may still be estopped from re-litigating issues of fact in subsequent civil litigation related to the same events.

Relation to Current District Law. None.

RCC § 22E-104. Applicability of the General Part.

Explanatory Note. This section clarifies that provisions in the General Part, subtitle I of the Revised Criminal Code, by default apply to all the statutes contained within Title 22E, unless expressly specified in statute. For example, the definition of the term "recklessly" in Section 22E-205 applies to all instances of the word within Title 22E, including other general provisions. However, any statute within Title 22E may contain a provision stating that one or more provisions in the General Part do not apply to that statute, overriding the default applicability of the General Part provisions. For instance, the Revised Criminal Code's burglary offense could make the Section 22E-205 definition of "recklessly" not applicable if the burglary offense states as much. This section clarifies and fills gaps in current District law regarding the applicability of general provisions.

Relation to Current District Law. The D.C. Code (including Title 22[1]) contains some provisions that are generally applicable.[2] However, these statutes either themselves provide for possible exceptions[3] or are stated as universally applicable. The D.C. Code does not appear to have codified a broad limitation on the applicability of general provisions. District case law, however, has filled this gap. The DCCA has long recognized "the well-settled rule of statutory construction that a special statute covering a particular subject matter is controlling over a general statutory provision covering the same and other subjects in general terms."[4]

[1] See, e.g., D.C. Code § 22-1801 ("Writing" and "paper" defined) and D.C. Code § 22-1802 ("Anything of value" defined.). Other provisions in Chapter 18 of Title 22, labeled "General offenses" by Codification Counsel, also apply generally to Title 22 offenses, as do certain penalty provisions in Chapters 35 and 36.
[2] See, e.g., D.C. Code §§ 45-601- 606 (Rules of Construction).
[3] See, e.g., D.C. Code § 22-1801 ("Except where otherwise provided for where such a construction would be unreasonable, the words "writing" and "paper," wherever mentioned in this title, are to be taken to include instruments wholly in writing or wholly printed, or partly printed and partly in writing.") (emphasis added).
[4] Martin v. United States, 283 A.2d 448 (D.C. 1971).

RCC § 22E-201. PROOF OF OFFENSE ELEMENTS BEYOND A REASONABLE DOUBT.

1. RCC § 22E-201(a)—Proof of Offense Elements Beyond a Reasonable Doubt

Explanatory Note. Subsection (a) states the burden of proof governing offense elements. It establishes that proof of each offense element beyond a reasonable doubt is the foundation of liability for any offense in the RCC. This provision is intended to codify the well-established constitutional principle recognized by the U.S. Supreme Court in In re Winship: "[T]he Due Process Clause protects the accused against conviction except upon proof beyond a reasonable doubt of every fact necessary to constitute the crime with which he is charged."[1] Pursuant to this principle, "it is up to the prosecution 'to prove beyond a reasonable doubt all of the elements included in the definition of the offense.'"[2]

Relation to Current District Law. Subsection (a) codifies District law. While the D.C. Code does not contain a statement on the burden of proof governing offense elements, it is well established by the DCCA that every element of an offense must be proven by the government beyond a reasonable doubt in order to support a criminal conviction.[3]

2.RCC § 22E-201(c)—Burden of proof for exclusions from liability, defenses, and affirmative defenses

Explanatory Note. Subsection (b) states the burden of proof governing exclusions to liability, defenses, and affirmative defenses. Paragraph (b)(1) establishes that for exclusions to liability, if there is any evidence presented at trial whether by the government or the defense, the government must prove beyond a reasonable doubt the absence of at least one element of the exclusion. Paragraph (b)(2) establishes that for defenses, if there is any evidence presented at trial whether by the government or the defense, that the government must prove beyond a reasonable doubt the absence of at least one element of the defense. Some exclusions and defenses have alternate elements, each of which are sufficient to bar liability. If evidence is presented that supports more than one alternate

---

[1] 397 U.S. 358, 364 (1970). This constitutional principle is a central component of the American criminal justice system:

> [U]se of the reasonable-doubt standard is indispensable to command the respect and confidence of the community in applications of the criminal law. It is critical that the moral force of the criminal law not be diluted by a standard of proof that leaves people in doubt whether innocent men are being condemned. It is also important in our free society that every individual going about his ordinary affairs have confidence that his government cannot adjudge him guilty of a criminal offense without convincing a proper factfinder of his guilt with utmost certainty.

Id.

[2] Conley v. United States, 79 A.3d 270, 278 (D.C. 2013) (quoting Patterson v. New York, 432 U.S. 197, 210 (1977)).

[3] See, e.g., Conley, 79 A.3d at 278 ("The Due Process Clause protects the accused against conviction except upon proof beyond a reasonable doubt of every fact necessary to constitute the crime with which he is charged. This means it is up to the prosecution to prove beyond a reasonable doubt all of the elements included in the definition of the offense.") (citations, quotations, alterations, and footnote call numbers removed); Hatch v. United States, 35 A.3d 1115, 1121 (D.C. 2011).

element, proving the absence of one element does not preclude the alternate element from providing a defense.[4] Paragraph (b)(3) establishes that for affirmative defenses the actor must prove each element of the defense by a preponderance of the evidence.

Relation to Current District Law. Subsection (b) is broadly consistent with current District law and practice. The DCCA has held that when evidence of a defense is presented at trial, "from either the prosecution or defense case,"[5] the government bears the burden of disproving the defense beyond a reasonable doubt.[6] The DCCA has upheld "affirmative defenses" which require that the defendant prove the defense by a preponderance of the evidence.[7] Current District law does not codify the burden of proof for exclusions to liability.

3. RCC § 22E-201(c)—Offense Element Defined

Explanatory Note. Subsection (c) provides the definition of "offense element" applicable to subsection (a) and throughout the RCC. It is an open-ended definition, which establishes that both the necessary objective elements and culpability required for an offense are among the offense elements subject to the burden of proof set forth in subsection (a).[8] What is left unresolved by this non-exclusive list is whether any other aspect of criminal liability not addressed by the RCC should also be treated as an offense element subject to the burden of proof set forth in subsection (a).[9] Under subsection (c), these issues are left for judicial resolution.

Relation to Current District Law. Subsection (c) codifies District law. While the D.C. Code does not contain a definition of "offense element," it is clear under DCCA case law that the objective elements and culpability required for an offense are among the facts subject to the proof beyond a reasonable doubt standard.[10]

4. RCC § 22E-201(d)—Objective Element Defined

Explanatory Note. Subsection (d) provides the definition of "objective element" applicable to subsection (c) and throughout the RCC. It establishes that the objective

---

[4] For example, the trafficking of a controlled substance offense under RCC § 48-904.01b includes a defense if the actor did not receive anything of value for the controlled substance, and either the quantity of controlled substance does not exceed the amount for a single use, or the recipient intends to immediately use the controlled substance. If evidence is presented in support of both of these alternate elements, the government must prove the absence of both elements.

[5] Lihlakha v. United States, 123 A.3d 167, 169 (D.C. 2015)

[6] E.g., Richardson v. United States, 98 A.3d 178, 187 (D.C. 2014).

[7] Russell v. United States, 698 A.2d 1007, 1016 (D.C. 1997).

[8] See, e.g., United States v. Apfelbaum, 445 U.S. 115, 131 (1980) ("In the criminal law, both a culpable mens rea and a criminal actus reus are generally required for an offense to occur."); In re Winship, 397 U.S. at 364 (observing that both of these requirements are among the "fact[s] necessary to constitute the crime with which [the accused] is charged.").

[9] Other aspects of liability not addressed by this provision include facts establishing: the absence of a general justification defense, jurisdiction, venue, or satisfaction of a statute of limitations.

[10] See, e.g., Conley, 79 A.3d at 278; Rose v. United States, 535 A.2d 849, 852 (D.C. 1987).

elements of an offense—often referred to as an offense's actus reus—are the conduct elements, result elements, and circumstance elements contained in an offense definition. All of these elements are subject to the burden of proof set forth in subsection (a).

Subsection (d) also provides precise definitions for these three kinds of objective elements. "Conduct element" is narrowly defined in paragraph (d)(1) as an "act" or "omission," which terms are in turn respectively defined in section 202 as a "bodily movement" or "failure to act" under specified circumstances.[11] This definition of conduct element makes it easier to analytically separate what is usually inconsequential (i.e. the required bodily movement, or where relevant, the failure to make one), from other aspects of a criminal offense that are more central to assessing culpability.[12] One such aspect is a "result element," which is defined in paragraph (d)(2) as "any consequence caused by a person's act or omission that is required to establish liability for an offense." The other relevant aspect is a "circumstance element," which paragraph (d)(3) defines as "any characteristic or condition relating to either a conduct element or result element that is required to establish liability for an offense." The terms "circumstance element" and "result element" include elements in defenses or exclusions to liability applicable to a given offense, as the presence or absence of these elements also establishes liability for an offense.[13]

Under this definitional scheme, any verb employed in an offense definition is likely to constitute either a conduct element and a result element or a conduct element and a circumstance element. For example, in a homicide offense that prohibits "knowingly killing another human being," the verb "killing" implies an act or omission—such as pulling the trigger of a gun—performed by the defendant (a conduct element), which causes death (a result element). Similarly, in a destruction of property offense that prohibits "knowingly destroying property of another without consent," the verb "destroying" implies an act or omission—for example, swinging a baseball bat—performed by the defendant (a conduct element), which causes destruction (a result element).

Verbs such as "killing" and "destroying" refer to a consequence caused by a person's conduct. Where, in contrast, a verb employed in an offense definition refers to a particular characteristic of a person's conduct, that verb is instead likely to constitute a conduct element and a circumstance element.[14] For example, in a joyriding offense that

---

[11] RCC §§ 22E-202(b), (c).

[12] This definition of conduct element reflects the view that in any causal sequence initiated by a bodily movement, "there are no further actions, only further descriptions." DONALD DAVIDSON, ESSAYS ON ACTIONS AND EVENTS 61 (2d ed. 2001). These "further descriptions," in turn, are reflected in the result and circumstance elements of an offense definition.

[13] For example, if a person is prosecuted for assault, and there is evidence that the person acted in self-defense, the term "circumstance element" includes the absence of at least one of the circumstances that comprises self-defense. Accordingly, the culpable mental states defined in RCC § 22E-206 and the term "in fact," which specifies that no culpable mental state is required, may also apply to elements of defenses.

[14] Which is to say: this definitional scheme treats all "issues raised by the nature of one's conduct"—for example, whether one's bodily movement amounts to "use" or a "taking"—"as circumstance elements." Paul H. Robinson & Jane A. Grall, Element Analysis in Defining Criminal Liability: The Model Penal Code and Beyond, 35 STAN. L. REV. 681, 712 (1983); compare Model Penal Code § 2.02(2) (defining culpable mental states with respect to "nature of [the] conduct" elements). For this reason, it will no longer makes sense to refer to "conduct crimes" under the RCC. Every offense under the prescribed framework will be comprised of, at minimum, a conduct element and either a circumstance element or result element. See Larry Alexander prohibits "knowingly using a motor vehicle without consent," the verb "using" implies an act or omission—such as stepping on the accelerator—performed by the defendant (a conduct element), which is of a specific character, namely, it amounts to use in the particular context in which it occurs (a circumstance element). Similarly, in a theft offense that prohibits "knowingly taking property of another without consent," the verb "taking" implies an act or omission—for example, reaching for a wallet—performed the defendant (a conduct element), which is of a specific character, namely, it amounts to a taking in the particular context in which it occurs (a circumstance element).[15]

Under this definitional scheme, the terms that modify the verbs in an offense definition (other than mental states) are likely to constitute circumstance elements. So, for example, the requirement that the victim of a homicide offense be a "human being" is a circumstance element. Similarly, the requirement in a property destruction offense that the object destroyed be "property of another" is a circumstance element, as is the requirement that this destruction have occurred "without consent." Likewise, the requirements in a joyriding offense that the object used be a "motor vehicle" and that this use have occurred "without consent" are both circumstance elements, as are the requirements in a theft offense that the object taken be "property of another" and that this taking have occurred "without consent."

Relation to Current District Law. Subsection (d) broadly reflects District law. Although the D.C. Code lacks any explicit reference to the classification of objective elements, the DCCA has recently recognized the distinction between "conduct, resulting harm, [and] attendant circumstances"—as well as the importance of clearly making it—in recent opinions.[16]

& Kimberly Kessler Ferzan, Culpable Acts of Risk Creation, 5 OHIO ST. J. CRIM. L. 375, 380 (2008) (observing that a person's "willed bodily movement may be qualified by circumstances and results so that [one's] conduct can be redescribed in any number of ways; and some redescriptions render [that person's] conduct criminal.").

[15] Note that the same verb employed in an offense definition may constitute either a combined conduct/circumstance element or conduct/result element depending upon how the crime was committed in a given case. For example, although the verb "taking" may typically constitute a combined conduct/circumstance element (see above theft illustration), it would constitute a combined conduct/result element in a theft prosecution where the causal nexus between the defendant's conduct and the prohibited social harm is mediated by another person or object. Consider the situation of a parent who tells his young child to go inside a neighbor's unlocked house and retrieve the neighbor's wallet resting on the backyard patio based on the lie that the neighbor has "volunteered" to give it to him. Under these conditions, the parent is liable for the theft based on the child's role as an innocent or irresponsible agent. See RCC § 22E-211. In this situation, however, the act, the communication to the child, is clearly distinct from the resultant taking, which does not occur until the child retrieves the wallet. A similar analysis applies if the parent employs a drone, rather than his child, to steal the wallet. Under these conditions, the parent is liable for the theft based on his use of an automated intermediary to retrieve the neighbor's property. Here again, however, the act, the movement of the drone remote, is clearly distinct from the resultant taking, which does not occur until the drone retrieves the wallet.

[16] See, e.g., Jones v. United States, 124 A.3d 127, 130 n.3 (D.C. 2015) ("Ideally, instead of describing a crime as a 'general intent' or 'specific intent' crime, courts and legislatures would simply make clear what mental state . . . is required for whatever material element is at issue (for example, conduct, resulting harm, or an attendant circumstance such as dealing drugs in a school zone or assaulting a police officer).") (italics added); Carrell v. United States, 165 A.3d 314, 320 n.13 (D.C. 2017) (en banc) ("We adopt these ["conduct element," "result element," and "circumstance element"] classifications from the Model Penal Code § 1.13

5. RCC § 22E-201(e)—Culpability Required Defined

Explanatory Note. Subsection (e) provides the definition of "culpability required" applicable to subsection (c) and throughout the RCC. It is an open-ended definition, which establishes that the voluntariness requirement and culpable mental state requirement are part of the culpability required for an offense. Also included in this definition is "[a]ny other aspect of culpability specifically required for an offense," such as, for example, the premeditation, deliberation, and absence of mitigating circumstances that are required to secure a first degree murder conviction.[17] All facts that comprise the culpability required for an offense are subject to the burden of proof set forth in subsection (a). What is left unresolved by this non-exclusive list is whether any other aspect of criminal liability not addressed by the RCC should also be treated as part of the culpability required for an offense (and therefore subject to that burden of proof).[18] Under subsection (e), these issues are left for judicial resolution.

Relation to Current District Law. See Commentary on the voluntariness requirement, RCC § 22E-203, and the culpable mental state requirement, RCC § 22E-205.

RCC § 22E-202. CONDUCT REQUIREMENT.

1. RCC § 22E-202(a)—Conduct Requirement

Explanatory Note. Subsection (a) states the conduct requirement governing all offenses in the RCC. It establishes that commission of an act or omission is a prerequisite to criminal liability. This provision is intended to codify the well-established prohibition against punishing a person for merely possessing undesirable thoughts or status.[1] By establishing that some conduct—whether an act or omission—is necessary for criminal

(9) (Am. Law Inst., Proposed Official Draft 1962)."); see also Harris v. United States, 125 A.3d 704, 708 n.3 (D.C. 2015).

[17] See, e.g., RCC § 22E-1101(a) (requiring premeditation and deliberation for first degree murder); id. at paragraph (f)(2) ("If the government fails to prove the absence of mitigating circumstances beyond a reasonable doubt, but proves all other elements of murder, the actor is not guilty of murder.").

[18] Other aspects of liability not addressed by this provision include facts establishing the absence of a general excuse defense.

[1] See, e.g., Deborah W. Denno, Crime and Consciousness: Science and Involuntary Acts, 87 MINN. L. REV. 269, 282 (2002) ("The maxim that civilized societies should not criminally punish individuals for their 'thoughts alone' has existed for three centuries."); United States v. Muzii, 676 F.2d 919, 920 (2d Cir. 1982) ("The reach of the criminal law has long been limited by the principle that no one is punishable for his thoughts.") (citing S. KADISH & M. PAULSEN, CRIMINAL LAW AND ITS PROCESSES 207 (1969)).

liability under the RCC, subsection (a) safeguards a "basic premise of Anglo-American criminal law,"[2] which is also "constitutionally required."[3]

Possession satisfies the conduct requirement whenever it is based on an act,[4] as defined in subsection (b), or an omission,[5] as defined in subsection (c).[6]

Relation to Current District Law. Subsection (a) codifies District law. While the D.C. Code does not contain a statement on the conduct requirement, the DCCA has clearly

---

[2] WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 1 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 6.1(b) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) ("One basic premise of Anglo-American criminal law is that no crime can be committed by bad thoughts alone. Something in the way of an act, or of an omission to act where there is a legal duty to act, is required too."). As LaFave observes:

> To wish an enemy dead, to contemplate [sexual assault], to think about taking another's wallet—such thoughts constitute none of the existing crimes (not murder or rape or larceny) so long as the thoughts produce no action to bring about the wished-for results. But, while it is no crime merely to entertain an intent to commit a crime, an attempt (or an agreement with another person) to commit it may be criminal; but the reason is that an attempt (or a conspiracy) requires some activity beyond the mere entertainment of the intent.

Id.

[3] JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 9.04(c) (6th ed. 2012) ("Some conduct by the defendant is constitutionally required in order to punish a person.") (discussing Robinson v. California, 392 U.S. 514 (1968) and Powell v. Texas, 392 U.S. 514 (1968)); see LAFAVE, supra note 2, at 1 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 6.1(b) ("A statute purporting to make it criminal simply to think bad thoughts would, in the United States, be held unconstitutional.") (collecting cases).

[4] For example, where purchaser X and dealer Y engage in a direct, hand-to-hand exchange of cash for drugs, X's physical possession is based on an act, and therefore would satisfy the conduct requirement. See RCC § 22E-202(b) (defining "act" as a "bodily movement"); see also id. at 901(X)(1) (defining "possesses" as "[h]olds or carries on one's person").

[5] For example, where purchaser X electronically delivers payment for controlled substances to dealer Y, and Y in turn drops the controlled substances in a mailbox over which X has the ability and desire to exercise control, X's constructive possession is based on an omission, and therefore would satisfy the conduct requirement. See RCC § 22E-202(c) (defining "omission" as "a failure to act when," inter alia, [a] person is under a legal duty to act"); see also id. at 901(X)(2) (defining "possesses" as "[h]as the ability and desire to exercise control over").

[6] As Dressler observes:

> Possession crimes do not necessarily dispense with the voluntary act requirement. Courts typically interpret possession statutes to require proof that the defendant knowingly procured or received the property possessed (thus, a voluntary act must be proven), or that she failed to dispossess herself of the object after she became aware of its presence. In the latter case, "possession" is equivalent to an omission, in which the defendant has a statutory duty to dispossess herself of the property. She is not guilty if the contraband was "planted" on her, and she did not have sufficient time to terminate her possession after she learned of its presence.

Dressler, supra note 3, at § 9.03(c); see, e.g., LAFAVE, supra note 2, at 1 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 6.1(e) ("So construed, knowingly receiving an item or retention after awareness of control over it could be considered a sufficient act or omission to serve as the proper basis for a crime."); Francisco Muñoz-Conde & Luis Ernesto Chiesa, The Act Requirement As A Basic Concept of Criminal Law, 28 CARDOZO L. REV. 2461, 2477 (2007) ("[P]roperly understood, possession crimes do not pose a problem for criminal liability because what is really being punished is either the act of acquiring the object or the failure to get rid of it.") (citing GLANVILLE WILLIAMS, CRIMINAL LAW: THE GENERAL PART 8 (2d ed. 1961)).

recognized that the conduct requirement is a basic and necessary ingredient of criminal liability given that "bad thoughts alone cannot constitute a crime."[7]

2. RCC § 22E-202(b)—Act Defined

Explanatory Note. Subsection (b) provides the definition of "act" applicable to both subsection (a) and throughout the RCC. It establishes that the term "act" is to be understood narrowly, as a person's bodily movement. This narrow definition should make it easier to distinguish between a person's relevant conduct—for example, throwing an object in the direction of a child—and any results or circumstances associated with that conduct—for example, the serious bodily injury to the child inflicted by the projectile.[8]

Relation to Current District Law. Subsection (b) fills a gap in District law. Neither the D.C. Code nor District case law provides a definition of the term "act." However, the DCCA has recognized in passing that an "act" is, generally speaking, a "bodily movement."[9]

3. RCC § 22E-202(c) & (d)—Omission Defined and Existence of Legal Duty

Explanatory Note. Subsection (c) provides the definition of "omission" applicable to subsection (a) and throughout the RCC. Broadly speaking, this definition establishes that the term "omission" is to be understood narrowly, as a person's failure to engage in an "act" (i.e. a bodily movement) that he or she is otherwise obligated to perform. This narrow definition should make it easier to distinguish between a person's relevant conduct—for example, failing to turn off the bath water after having placed one's infant child in the tub—and any results or circumstances associated with that conduct—for example, the fatal drowning of the infant that ensues after the parent leaves the room for a significant period of time.[10]

The definition of omission contained in subsection (c) also incorporates two important principles of omission liability. The first principle, set forth in paragraph (c)(1), is that only a failure to perform a legal duty constitutes an omission. Pursuant to this well-established common law principle, "[f]or criminal liability to be based upon a failure to act it must first be found that there is a duty to act—a legal duty and not simply a moral duty.'"[11] [7] Trice v. United States, 525 A.2d 176, 187 n.5 (D.C. 1987) (Mack, J. dissenting) (internal quotations and alterations omitted); see, e.g., Conley v. United States, 79 A.3d 270, 278-79 (D.C. 2013); Rose v. United States, 535 A.2d 849, 852 (D.C. 1987).

---

[8] See RCC § 22E-201(c): Explanatory Note (discussing differences between conduct, result, and circumstance elements).

[9] Trice, 525 A.2d at 187 n.5 (Mack, J. dissenting).

[10] See RCC § 22E-201(c): Explanatory Note (discussing differences between conduct, result, and circumstance elements).

[11] See, e.g., United States v. Sabhnani, 599 F.3d 215, 237 (2d Cir. 2010) ("It is a long-established principle that criminal law generally regulates action, rather than omission, and that '[f]or criminal liability to be based upon a failure to act it must first be found that there is a duty to act—a legal duty and not simply a moral duty.'") (quoting LAFAVE, supra note 2, at 1 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 6.1(b)); Ian P. Farrell & Justin F. Marceau, Taking Voluntariness Seriously, 54 B.C. L. REV. 1545, 1571 (2013) ("[T]he general rule is that one is not liable for omissions absent a legal duty to act.").

The second principle, set forth in paragraph (c)(2), is that the requisite legal duty must be one of which the accused is either aware or culpably unaware.[12] This limitation on omission liability amounts to a type of culpability required as to the existence of a legal duty in omission prosecutions.[13] It is intended to codify the D.C. Court of Appeals' decision in Conley v. United States,[14] which interprets the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Lambert v. California[15] to stand for the proposition that "it is incompatible with due process to convict a person of a crime based on the failure to take a legally required action—a crime of omission—if he had no reason to believe he had a legal duty to act, or even that his failure to act was blameworthy."[16]

Subsection (d) addresses the scope of a legal duty to act for purposes of omission liability. Specifically, it establishes that a legal duty to act exists under two different sets of circumstances. The first, addressed in paragraph (d)(1), is where the criminal statute for which the accused is being prosecuted expressly defines the offense in terms of an omission.[17] The second, addressed in paragraph (d)(2), is where a law—whether criminal or civil—distinct from the offense for which the defendant is being prosecuted creates a legal duty.[18]

Relation to Current District Law. Subsections (c) and (d) fill a gap in, but are consistent with, various aspects of District law concerning omission liability.

While the D.C. Code does not contain a generally applicable definition of omission (or any other general statement on omission liability), a handful of District statutes expressly criminalize omissions to fulfill particular legal duties, such as the "duty to provide care [to] a vulnerable adult or elderly person"[19] or the duty "to appear before any court or judicial officer as [legally] required."[20] And District case law generally establishes that the imposition of criminal liability under these circumstances is appropriate.[21]

District case law also establishes, however, that omission liability premised on the failure to perform a legal duty not otherwise specified in an offense definition may be appropriate. For example, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit (CADC) in Jones v. United States[22]—a decision handed down before the creation of the [12] A person is "culpably unaware" of a legal duty when a reasonable person in the actor's situation would have been aware of the legal duty.

---

[13] See, e.g., Graham Hughes, Criminal Omissions, 67 YALE L.J. 590, 602 (1958) ("The maxim, 'ignorance of the law is no excuse,' ought to have no application in the field of criminal omissions, for the mind of the offender has no relationship to the prescribed conduct if he has no knowledge of the relevant regulation. The strictest liability that makes any sense is a liability for culpable ignorance.").

[14] 79 A.3d at 273.

[15] 355 U.S. 225 (1957).

[16] Conley, 79 A.3d at 273.

[17] Illustrative of such offenses are statutes criminalizing a motorist's failure to stop after involvement in an accident, a taxpayer's failure to file a tax return, a parent's neglect of the health of his child, and a failure to report certain communicable diseases. PAUL H. ROBINSON, 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 86 (Westlaw 2019).

[18] Illustrative of such duties are those created by special relationships, landowners, contract, voluntary assumption of responsibility, and the creation of peril. ROBINSON, supra note 17, at 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 86.

[19] D.C. Code § 22-934.

[20] D.C. Code § 23-1327.

[21] See, e.g., Fearwell v. United States, 886 A.2d 95, 100 (D.C. 2005); Jackson v. United States, 996 A.2d 796 (D.C. 2010).

[22] 308 F.2d 307 (D.C. Cir. 1962).

local District judicial system[23]—recognized that "the omission of a duty owed by one individual to another, where such omission results in the death of the one to whom the duty is owing, [can] make the other chargeable."[24] However, the Jones court also noted that "the omission of a duty owed by one individual to another" can only establish criminal liability when "the duty neglected [is] a legal duty"—i.e. "[i]t must be a duty imposed by law or by contract" rather than a "mere moral obligation."[25]

Recently, the DCCA appears to have established that not just any legal duty will suffice for purposes of omission liability. Rather, it must be a legal duty that the actor "knew or should have known" about under the circumstances.[26] In Conley v. United States, the DCCA struck down a District statute criminalizing unlawful presence in a motor vehicle containing a firearm[27] on the basis that it "criminalize[d] entirely innocent behavior—merely remaining in the vicinity of a firearm in a vehicle[]—without requiring the government to prove that the defendant had notice of any legal duty to behave otherwise."[28] Observing that "the average person [would not] know that he may be committing a felony offense merely by remaining in [a] vehicle, even if the gun belongs to someone else and he has nothing to do with it," the DCCA concluded that the statute created a form of omission liability that violated the requirements of due process, and, therefore, was "facially unconstitutional."[29]

The Conley decision rested upon the court's reading of the U.S. Supreme Court's opinion in Lambert v. California, which, in the view of the DCCA, stands for the proposition that "it is incompatible with due process to convict a person of a crime based on the failure to take a legally required action—a crime of omission—if he had no reason to believe he had a legal duty to act, or even that his failure to act was blameworthy."[30]

Subsections (c) and (d) are intended to collectively codify the foregoing District precedents concerning omission liability.

RCC § 22E-203. VOLUNTARINESS REQUIREMENT.

1. RCC § 22E-203(a)—Voluntariness Requirement

Explanatory Note. Subsection (a) states the voluntariness requirement governing all offenses in the RCC. It establishes that the voluntary commission of an offense's conduct element is a prerequisite to liability for any crime. This provision is intended to codify the well-established prohibition against punishing a person in the absence of volitional conduct.[1] Both this prohibition and the RCC's codification of it are based on the [23] See M.A.P. v. Ryan, 285 A.2d 310, 312 (D.C. 1971).

[24] Jones, 308 F.2d at 310 (citations and internal quotation marks omitted).
[25] Id.
[26] Conley, 79 A.3d at 281.
[27] D.C. Code § 22-2511 (Repealed).
[28] 79 A.3d at 273.
[29] Id. at 286.
[30] Id. at 273.
[1] See, e.g., WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 1 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 6.1(c) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) ("At all events, it is clear that criminal liability requires that the activity in question be voluntary."); Paul H. Robinson et. al., The American Criminal Code: General Defenses, 7 J. LEGAL ANALYSIS 37, 92 (2015) ("[A] voluntary act is the

"fundamental principle of morality that a person is not to be blamed for what he has done if he could not [fairly] help doing it."[2] Absent voluntary commission of an offense's conduct element, it cannot be said that the defendant possessed a reasonable opportunity to avoid committing the charged offense,[3] or that criminal liability would be appropriate under the circumstances.[4]

Relation to Current District Law. Subsection (a) generally reflects District law. Although there is no voluntariness requirement stated in the D.C. Code, District courts have recognized the voluntariness requirement—as well as the basic principle upon which it rests—through case law.

For example, in Conley v. United States, the DCCA recognized that the requirement of a voluntary act is a "basic jurisprudential point" supported by a wide range of authorities.[5] The court also recognized that the same basic principle applies to omissions as well: "[n]o one, of course, can be held criminally liable for failing to do an act that he is physically incapable of performing."[6] And in Easter v. District of Columbia, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit (in an oft-cited pre-1971 decision) observed the basic principle underlying the voluntariness requirement: "An essential element of criminal responsibility is the ability to avoid the conduct specified in the definition of the crime. Action within the definition is not enough. To be guilty of the crime a person must engage responsibly in the action."[7]

2. RCC § 22E-203(b)—Scope of Voluntariness Requirement

Explanatory Note. Subsection (b) clarifies the scope of the voluntariness requirement under the RCC. It is comprised of two substantively similar legal standards, which account for whether the government's theory of liability in a given case is based on an act or omission.

Paragraph (b)(1) is directed towards situations where a person's act provides the basis for liability. Specifically, it establishes that the conduct element of an offense is most fundamental requirement of criminal liability."); Kevin W. Saunders, Voluntary Acts and the Criminal Law: Justifying Culpability Based on the Existence of Volition, 49 U. PITT. L. REV. 443, 443–44 (1988) ("The concept of the voluntary act lies at the very foundation of the criminal law, since 'there cannot be an act subjecting a person to . . . criminal liability without volition.'") (quoting Bazley v. Tortorich, 397 So. 2d 475, 481 (La. 1981)).

---

[2] H.L.A. HART, Punishment and the Elimination of Responsibility, in PUNISHMENT AND RESPONSIBILITY: ESSAYS IN THE PHILOSOPHY OF LAW 168, 174 (1968).

[3] See, e.g., Ian P. Farrell & Justin F. Marceau, Taking Voluntariness Seriously, 54 B.C. L. REV. 1545, 1571 (2013) (ability to do otherwise is the "sine qua non of voluntariness"); State v. Deer, 244 P.3d 965, 968 (Wash. Ct. App. 2010) ("It is [the] volitional aspect of a person's actions that renders her morally responsible.").

[4] See, e.g., LAFAVE, supra note 1, at 1 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 6.1(c) ("The deterrent function of the criminal law would not be served by imposing sanctions for involuntary action, as such action cannot be deterred. Likewise, assuming revenge or retribution to be a legitimate purpose of punishment, there would appear to be no reason to impose punishment on this basis as to those whose actions were not voluntary.").

[5] 79 A.3d 270, 279 n.37 (D.C. 2013) (citing Model Penal Code § 2.01; ROLLIN M. PERKINS & RONALD N. BOYCE, CRIMINAL LAW 669 (3d ed. 1982); 1 CHARLES E. TORCIA, WHARTON'S CRIMINAL LAW § 25, at 143–44 (15th ed. 1993)).

[6] Conley, 79 A.3d at 279.

[7] 361 F.2d 50, 52 (1966).

voluntarily committed when the required act was the product of conscious effort or determination[8]; or, if it was not the product of conscious effort or determination, when it was otherwise subject to the control of the actor.[9]

The "conscious effort and determination" standard stated in subparagraph (b)(1)(A) calls upon the factfinder to consider whether the requisite act was an external manifestation of the defendant's will. This is the crux of the voluntariness requirement, and in all but the most rare cases involving physical abnormalities—such as those where the requisite act was a reflex, part of an epileptic seizure, or occurred while the actor was sleeping—it is likely to be satisfied.

The "otherwise subject to the person's control" standard stated in subparagraph (b)(1)(B) constitutes an alternative, catch-all means of establishing the voluntariness requirement. It is intended to address exceptional situations[10] where, although the act most directly linked to the social harm may not be the product of conscious effort or determination, there nevertheless exists an acceptable basis for determining that the defendant, due to some earlier culpable conduct, possessed a reasonable opportunity to avoid committing the offense.[11]

Paragraph (b)(2) is directed towards situations where a person's omission provides the basis for liability. Specifically, it establishes that the conduct element of an offense is voluntarily committed where a person is physically capable of performing the required legal duty[12]; or, if the person lacked that physical capacity, then where the failure to act was otherwise subject to the control of the actor.[13]

The "physical capacity" standard stated in subparagraph (b)(2)(A) is the logical corollary of the "conscious effort and determination" standard stated in subparagraph (b)(1)(A). It establishes that just as one typically cannot be criminally liable on account of a bodily movement that is not the product of volition, so one cannot be criminally liable for failing to do an act that he or she is physically incapable of performing.

---

[8] RCC § 22E-203(b)(1)(A).

[9] RCC § 22E-203(b)(1)(B).

[10] An example is a blackout-prone drinker, X, who decides to imbibe to excess in his parked car prior to driving to a social engagement. If X effectively loses consciousness while the car is parked (Time 1), and then begins driving, only to crash into a group of pedestrians while still blacked-out (Time 2), the fact that X was not acting consciously at the time of the accident (Time 2) should not preclude a determination that X's conduct was nevertheless subject to X's control, and therefore voluntary, under the circumstances.

[11] Under RCC § 22E-203(b)(1)(B), there is no specific threshold level of risk awareness that must be met at Time 1 concerning the likelihood that an act which is not the product of conscious effort or determination would occur at Time 2 in order to deem that act subject to a person's control at Time 1. However, the person's level of awareness at Time 1 must at the very least be sufficient to meet the culpability required for the charged offense. Consider, for example, the situation of a person, X, who suffers from chronic epilepsy but declines to take her medically necessary anti-seizure medication. At Time 1, X decides to drive on the highway un-medicated. Sixty minutes later, at Time 2, X suffers a seizure on the road, which leads her to crash into another driver on the road, V, who dies from the impact. X ultimately survives the accident and is charged with reckless manslaughter. To establish that X recklessly killed V, the government would have to prove that at Time 1—when X decided to get behind the wheel of her car un-medicated—X was aware of a substantial risk that she might suffer a deadly seizure while on the road, and that X's decision was a gross deviation from the standard of conduct a reasonable individual would follow under the circumstances. See RCC § 22E-206(c).

[12] RCC § 22E-203(b)(2)(A).

[13] RCC § 22E-203(b)(2)(B).

The "otherwise subject to the person's control" standard stated in subparagraph (b)(2)(B) recognizes the same alternative, catch-all means of establishing the voluntariness requirement applicable under subparagraph (b)(1)(B) in situations where a person's omission provides the basis for liability. It is intended to address exceptional situations[14] where, although the omission most directly linked to the social harm may not be the product of conscious effort or determination, there nevertheless exists an acceptable basis for determining that the defendant, due to some earlier culpable conduct, possessed a reasonable opportunity to avoid committing the offense.[15]

Because the existence of a reasonable opportunity to avoid committing the conduct element of an offense is the animating principle underlying all voluntariness evaluations, section 203 should be construed to exclude exceptional situations involving physical interference by a third party.[16]

Relation to Current District Law. Subsection (b) fills a gap in, but is consistent with, District law. The only District authority on the voluntariness requirement is the case law discussed in the commentary to RCC § 22E-203(a).

RCC § 22E-204. CAUSATION REQUIREMENT.

1. RCC § 22E-204(a)—Causation Requirement

[14] An example is a blackout-prone drinker, X, who decides to imbibe to excess at home a few hours before a court hearing that X knows she is legally obligated to attend. If X becomes unconscious before the hearing (Time 1), and thereafter is unable to travel to the hearing at the appointed time (Time 2), the fact that X is physically incapable of fulfilling her duty of attendance should not preclude a determination that X's conduct was nevertheless subject to her control, and therefore voluntary, under the circumstances.

[15] Under RCC § 22E-203(b)(2)(B), there is no specific threshold level of risk awareness that must be met at Time 1 concerning the likelihood that the defendant would be physically incapable of performing a required legal duty at Time 2 in order to deem that person's failure to act to be subject to his or her control at Time 1. However, the person's level of awareness at Time 1 must at the very least be sufficient to meet the culpability required for the charged offense. Consider the situation of a nurse, X, who is the sole person responsible for supervising a number of infants who are in critical condition, and demand constant attention. While on the job, at Time 1, X decides to take an extremely large dose of heroin for recreational purposes and is immediately thereafter incapacitated. Sixty minutes later, at Time 2, one of the infants, V, has a medical ventilator that suffers a routine malfunction. Although merely requiring a simple reboot, X is unable to fix the ventilator because she is still incapacitated. As a result, V dies from lung failure. X is thereafter charged with reckless manslaughter. To establish that X recklessly killed V, the government would have to prove that at Time 1—when X decided to subject herself to an extremely large dose of heroin—X was aware of a substantial risk that she might, due to her incapacitated state, be unable to fulfill her critical, life-preserving duties (e.g., addressing a ventilator malfunction), and that X's decision was a gross deviation from the standard of conduct a reasonable individual would follow under the circumstances. See RCC § 22E-206(c).

[16] Consider the situation of a person, X, who becomes intoxicated at a friend's home and is thereafter carried against his will into a public space by another partygoer, Y. If X is subsequently arrested for public intoxication, there would be an insufficient basis for deeming X's conduct voluntary under section 203. Here, the physical interference of Y is sufficient to deny X a reasonable opportunity to avoid engaging in the proscribed conduct. The same can also be said about the situation of a person, X, who places a controlled substance in her pocket while at home, is immediately thereafter arrested, and then transported to jail without ever being searched or asked about the contraband. If, having entered the jail (and still physically restrained), X is subjected to another charge for introducing a controlled substance into a government facility, there would be an insufficient basis for deeming X's conduct voluntary under section 203. Here, the physical interference of the police is sufficient to deny X a reasonable opportunity to avoid engaging in the proscribed conduct.

Explanatory Note. Subsection (a) establishes that causation is a basic requirement of criminal liability for any offense that requires proof of a result element under the RCC. It provides that the minimum causal nexus between a person's conduct and its attendant results is comprised of two different components: factual causation and legal causation.[1] Together, these two components provide the basis for determining whether a given social harm is fairly attributable to the defendant's conduct, in contrast to other people or forces in the world for which the defendant is not accountable. Because causation is an aspect of the objective elements of a result element offense,[2] both factual causation and legal causation must be proven beyond a reasonable doubt.[3]

Relation to Current District Law. Subsection (a) codifies District law. While the D.C. Code does not contain a general statement on causation, the DCCA has addressed the requirement of causation on many occasions. It is well-established in case law that causation is a basic element of criminal responsibility, which requires the government to prove—for all crimes involving result elements—that the defendant was the factual and legal cause of the harm for which he or she is charged.[4]

2. RCC § 22E-204(b)—Definition of Factual Cause

Explanatory Note. Subsection (b) provides a comprehensive definition of "factual cause." In the vast majority of cases, factual causation will be proven under paragraph (b)(1) by showing that the defendant was the logical, but-for cause of a result.[5] The inquiry required by this paragraph is essentially empirical, though also hypothetical: it asks what the world would have been like if the defendant had not performed his or her conduct.[6] In

---

[1] See, e.g., WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 1 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 6.4(a) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) ("It is required, for criminal liability, that the conduct of the defendant be both (1) the actual cause, and (2) the 'legal' cause (often called 'proximate' cause) of the result."); Burrage v. United States, 134 S. Ct. 881, 887 (2014) ("The law has long considered causation a hybrid concept, consisting of two constituent parts: actual cause and legal cause.") (citing H. HART & A. HONORE, CAUSATION IN THE LAW 104 (1959)).

[2] See RCC § 22E-201(c) ("'Objective element' means any . . . result element); id. at (c)(2) (defining "result element" as "any consequence caused by a person's act or omission that is required establish liability for an offense.") (italics added).

[3] See RCC § 22E-201(a) ("No person may be convicted of an offense unless the government proves each offense element beyond a reasonable doubt."); id. at § (c) ("'Offense element' includes the necessary objective elements and culpability required for an offense.").

[4] See, e.g., McKinnon v. United States, 550 A.2d 915, 917 (D.C. 1988); Matter of J.N., 406 A.2d 1275, 1287 (Newman, C.J., dissenting); D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 4.230.

[5] See, e.g., LAFAVE, supra note 1, at 1 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 6.4(b) ("In order that conduct be the actual cause of a particular result, it is almost always sufficient that the result would not have happened in the absence of the conduct; or, putting it another way, that 'but for' the antecedent conduct the result would not have occurred."); Paroline v. United States, 134 S. Ct. 1710, 1719 (2014) (quoting 4 F. HARPER, F. JAMES, & O. GRAY, TORTS § 20.2, p. 100 (3d ed. 2007)) ("The concept of [f]actual cause 'is not a metaphysical one but an ordinary, matter-of-fact inquiry into the existence . . . of a causal relation as laypeople would view it.'").

[6] This analysis is easiest where the causal chain is direct, and no intervening forces are present. For example, if D shoots at V, who is hit and dies, D is the factual cause of V's death under RCC § 22E-204(b)(1), since, but for D's conduct, V would not have died. However, even where the causal chain is less direct, and includes intervening forces—such as a human intermediary—the analysis remains the same. For example, if D initiates a gun battle with X, and X thereafter returns fire but mistakenly hits a nearby bystander, V, D is still rare cases, however, when the defendant is one of multiple actors that independently contribute to producing a particular result, factual causation may also be proven under paragraph (b)(2) by showing that the defendant's conduct was sufficient—even if not necessary—to produce the prohibited result.[7] Although in this situation it cannot be said that, but for the defendant's conduct, the result in question would not have occurred, the fact that the defendant's conduct was by itself sufficient to cause the result provides an adequate basis for treating the defendant as a factual cause.[8]

For prosecutions based on an omission, the principles codified in subsection (b) will rarely provide a useful test for assigning liability.[9] Whereas factual causation generally presumes a chain of causal forces that affirmatively change the circumstances of the world, omissions do not affirmatively change the circumstances of the world; at most, they constitute failures to interfere with the changes made by other forces.[10] That said, it is certainly possible for an omission to fall short of satisfying the principles codified in subsection (b).[11] And where this is the case, the government's inability to prove the factual causation requirement beyond a reasonable doubt precludes the imposition of liability for a result element crime under the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. Subsection (b) broadly accords with District law. While the D.C. Code does not address factual causation, the DCCA has adopted a standard to address issues of factual causation that is substantively similar to the standard reflected in RCC § 22E-204(b). However, the definition of factual cause provided in RCC § 22E-204(b) constitutes a terminological departure—and, in cases involving multiple concurrent causes, potentially a substantive departure—from the standard currently reflected in District law. This departure improves the clarity and consistency of the RCC.

To address the issue of factual causation, the DCCA has adopted the "substantial factor" test drawn from the Restatement of Torts.[12] Under this test, "[a] defendant's actions are considered the cause-in-fact . . . if those actions 'contribute substantially to or are a a factual cause of V's death under RCC § 22E-204(b)(1), since, but for D's initiating a gun battle with X, X would not have returned fire, and, therefore, V would not have died.

---

[7] See LAFAVE, supra note 1, at 1 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 6.4(b) ("[If] A stabs B, inflicting a fatal wound; while at the same moment X, acting independently, shoots B in the head with a gun, also inflicting such a wound; and B dies from the combined effects of the two wounds[,] A has caused B's death.")

[8] For example, where X and Y both shoot at Z in a crowded area at the same moment, and Z thereafter returns fire but mistakenly hits a nearby bystander, X and Y could be considered independently sufficient factual causes of the bystander's injury under RCC § 22E-204(b)(2).

[9] For example, a parent who fails to feed a child, thereby allowing the child to starve, or a parent who permits a child who cannot swim to jump into a pool, thereby allowing the child to drown, may be the factual cause of the child's death in each case. However, the failure of any other person nearby would also be a factual cause under these circumstances, since the intervention by anybody could have also stopped the starvation or drowning.

[10] PAUL H. ROBINSON, 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 88(d)(4) (Westlaw 2019).

[11] Consider the situation of a parent who fails to seek medical treatment of a child's illness under circumstances where such medical treatment could not have saved, prolonged, or otherwise improved the quality of that child's life. In this situation, it cannot be said that, but for the parent's failure to seek medical attention, the child would have avoided harm. It therefore follows that this parent, if prosecuted for a crime for which causing harm—whether serious mental injury, bodily injury, or death—is a statutorily required element, cannot be held liable under the RCC due to the absence of factual causation.

[12] See, e.g., District of Columbia v. Carlson, 793 A.2d 1285, 1288 (D.C. 2002); Lacy v. District of Columbia, 424 A.2d 317, 321 (D.C. 1980); Butts v. United States, 822 A.2d 407, 417 (D.C. 2003).

substantial factor in a[n] injury.'"[13] "[S]ubstantial cause," in turn, has been defined by the DCCA as "conduct which a reasonable person would regard as having produced the [relevant result]."[14]

Application of the substantial factor test to deal with all issues of factual causation is problematic, however. The test was originally developed in the context of tort law to address those "highly unusual cases" where it is "logically impossible for the government to prove but-for causation because two causes, each alone sufficient to bring about the harmful result, operate[d] together to cause it."[15] By employing the open-textured language of "substantial factor," proponents of the test thought it would provide fact finders with sufficient leeway to ensure that defendants, each of whose conduct constitute independent sufficient causes, would not escape liability.[16] However, the "substantial factor" test has been the source of significant criticism, and, ultimately, has not withstood the test of time."[17]

Insofar as the DCCA's reliance on the test is concerned, two main critiques can be made. First, application of the substantial factor test to deal with all issues of factual causation unnecessarily complicates the fact finder's analysis in many cases.[18] In the run-of-the-mill case, the substantial factor test produces the same results as a but-for test, but requires the factfinder to engage in an unnecessarily complex analysis. Why, one might ask, should a factfinder be required to employ a complex test that incorporates "noncausal policy considerations" to deal with standard factual causation issues when a more concrete, intuitive, and straightforward but-for framing of factual causation—such as that provided in § 22E-204(b)(1)—can easily resolve most issues?[19] "In the absence of such special causation problems, there is [simply] no need to employ the substantial factor test, because the 'but-for cause' of a harm is always a substantial factor in bringing about the harm."[20]

Second, for those few cases where application of a more expansive approach is arguably necessary—namely, where the defendant is one of multiple concurrent causes—the substantial factor test offers a highly discretionary standard to support an outcome that a bright line rule would more effectively facilitate. A simple, straightforward statement deeming independently sufficient causes to be factual causes—such as that provided in RCC § 22E-204(b)(2)—is preferable to the "spectacular vagueness"[21] of the substantial factor test. Indeed, even proponents of the substantial factor test are "uncertain about [its]

---

[13] Blaize v. United States, 21 A.3d 78, 81 (D.C. 2011); D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 4.230.
[14] Blaize, 21 A.3d at 82; see also Roy v. United States, 871 A.2d 507, 5087 (D.C. 2005) (citing Butts v. United States, 822 A.2d 407, 417 (D.C. 2003)).
[15] United States v. Pitt-Des Moines, Inc., 970 F. Supp. 1359, 1364-65 (N.D. Ill. 1997) aff'd, 168 F.3d 976 (7th Cir. 1999).
[16] See, e.g., David J. Karp, Causation in the Model Penal Code, 78 COLUM. L. REV. 1249, 1264-66 (1978); LAFAVE, supra note 1, at 1 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 6.4; W. PAGE KEETON, PROSSER AND KEETON ON TORTS § 41, at 267-68 (5th ed. 1984).
[17] RESTATEMENT (THIRD) OF TORTS § 26 cmt. j (Tentative Draft No. 2, 2002).
[18] See, e.g., Eric Johnson, Criminal Liability for Loss of A Chance, 91 IOWA L. REV. 59, 87-88 (2005); Model Penal Code § 2.03 cmt. at 259; United States v. Neadle, 72 F.3d 1104, 1120 (3d Cir. 1995) amended, 79 F.3d 14 (3d Cir. 1996) (Becker, J. dissenting).
[19] Robert Strassfeld, Counterfactuals in the Law, 60 GEO. WASH. L. REV. 339, 355 (1992); see Kimberly Kessler, The Role of Luck in the Criminal Law, 142 U. PA. L. REV. 2183, 2201-02 (1994).
[20] Pitt-Des Moines, Inc., 970 F. Supp. at 1364-65.
[21] Johnson, supra note 18, at 89 n.190.

precise application," and have had a difficult time specify[ing] how important or how substantial a cause must be to qualify."[22]

Given the uncertain scope of the substantial factor test, it's possible—though by no means clear—that replacing it with the approach in RCC § 22E-204(b) could modestly circumscribe the scope of criminal liability under District law in some situations.[23] However, "[g]iven[24]

3. RCC § 22E-204(c)—Definition of Legal Cause

Explanatory Note. Subsection (c) provides a comprehensive definition of "legal cause." Under the proscribed definition, legal causation exists where it can be proven that the result was reasonably foreseeable in its manner of occurrence, and when the result depends on the volitional conduct of another, there is a close connection between the actor's conduct and the result. This is a normative evaluation, which requires the factfinder to assess whether it would be appropriate to hold a person criminally responsible for a social harm of which he or she is the cause in fact due to the influence of intervening forces, such as natural events, the conduct of a third party, or the conduct of the victim.[25]

The influence of these intervening forces can generally be divided into two categories. The first category, codified under paragraph (c)(1), relates to foreseeability; the focus here is on the extent to which a given result can be attributed to intervening

[22] Burrage, 134 S. Ct. at 892.

[23] In Fleming v. United States, 224 A.3d 213 (D.C. 2020) (en banc) the DCCA reversed prior case law and held that the second degree murder statute requires but-for causation. Relying on the Supreme Court's decision in Burrage v. United States, 571 U.S. 204 (2014), the DCCA held that the trial court erred in instructing the jury that factual causation was satisfied if the appellant's conduct was a "substantial factor" bringing about the decedent's death. The DCCA's opinion in Fleming was specifically related to causation under the District's second degree murder statute, and it did not purport to apply to requirements of factual causation for all criminal statutes under the D.C. Code. In a subsequent case, Lucas v. United States, 240A.2d 328 (D.C. 2020) the DCCA also held that the Bias-Related Crime enhancement defined under D.C. Code § 22-3701(1) requires but-for causation; the government "must prove that the accused would not have committed the underlying crime but-for prejudice against the victim based on the victim's protected characteristic."

[24] Burrage, 134 S. Ct. at 892.

[25] Note that in cases where a defendant acts with intent to cause a prohibited result, a finding that legal causation is absent will not exculpate the defendant entirely. Instead, it will merely limit liability to that associated with a criminal attempt rather than a completed offense. See infra notes 27-28.

forces—whether human[26] or natural[27]—of a remote and/or accidental nature.[28] The second category, codified under paragraph (c)(2), relates to human volition; the focus here is on whether a person's conduct is closely connected such that the person may justly be held liable for a given result that can be attributed to the free, deliberate, and informed conduct of a third party[29] or the victim.[30] Under paragraph (c)(2), there is no legal causation when intervening volitional conduct[31] was reasonably foreseeable, if the actor's conduct was not

---

[26] For example, imagine X stabs V with intent to kill, but only manages to inflict a minor wound on V's arm before the police intercede. Thereafter, V is taken to the hospital to receive stiches, at which point the attending physician determines that, for reasons unrelated to the gash, V must also undergo a dangerous but medically necessary hernia operation. V ends up dying of complications from the hernia surgery. In this scenario, X is the factual cause of V's death: but for X's infliction of a knife wound, V would not have been subjected to the hernia operation. However, the remote nature of the intervening cause in this scenario—complications from an unrelated medical procedure—is so unforeseeable as to break the chain of legal causation. (Note, though, that X could still be convicted of attempted murder.)

[27] For example, imagine X begins shooting at V from a distance with intent to kill, but V escapes the deadly assault by running down an alley. At the end of the alley, however, V is fatally struck by lightning. In this scenario, X is the factual cause of V's death: but for X's firing of the gun, V would not have been in the location where the lightning struck. However, the accidental nature of the intervening cause in this scenario—the lightning bolt—is so unforeseeable as to break the chain of legal causation. (Note, though, that X could still be convicted of attempted murder.)

[28] Note that reasonable foreseeability is distinct from culpable negligence. For example, X may negligently create a risk of death to V, a young child standing next to the crosswalk, by speeding through a school zone right after school lets out, while unaware that he is driving in a school zone or that V is present. Should X fatally hit V with his vehicle under these circumstances, X would be liable for negligently causing V's death. If, however, X does not hit V but instead his car kicks up a small pebble onto the sidewalk, which V then fatally slips on, legal causation would likely be lacking. Here, the remote and accidental nature of V's manner of death is so unforeseeable as to break the chain of legal causation—notwithstanding the fact that X's conduct was still negligent under the circumstances.

[29] For example, imagine X and D have been in a longstanding competitive basketball rivalry, marked by regular bouts of violence by D perpetrated against his teammates after his losses. Nearing the final few seconds of a championship game, and down by one point, X is about to shoot the game winning shot against D after a game marked by many missteps by X's teammate V, at which point X realizes that D will almost certainly (and in fact appears to be preparing to) assault V once the loss is formalized. Nevertheless, D decides to disregard this risk and score the final two points necessary for the win. Immediately thereafter, D does as expected: he becomes enraged and viciously beats V on the court. In this scenario, X is the factual cause of V's injuries: but for X's scoring the game-winning basket, D would not have gone on to assault V. Under these circumstances, D's violent response to X's game winning basket was entirely foreseeable. Although D's response was foreseeable, it would be unjust to hold X criminally liable the injuries to V. X's conduct, winning a basketball game, is not inherently wrongful, and X did not desire that V or anyone else suffer injuries.

[30] For example, consider a hypothetical where A intends to end a romantic relationship with B, and B says that as a result he will commit suicide. A does not want B to commit suicide, but is practically certain that he will do so. A ends the relationship, and as a result B commits suicide. Even though B's actions were reasonably foreseeable, it would be unjust to hold A criminally liable for causing B's death. A's conduct was not inherently wrongful, and A did not desire to cause the death of another. Compare with, United States v. Hamilton, 182 F. Supp. 548, 549 (D.D.C 1960) (The defendant severely beat the decedent, causing him to fall into a semi-comatose state. While in the hospital, the decedent pulled out his breathing tubes, which caused death by asphyxiation. The Court found the defendant guilty of manslaughter, despite the decedent's intervening act.)

[31] Intervening volitional conduct may include both acts and omissions of others. For example, if a driver speeds through an intersection and strikes a child, initially causing minor injury. If the child's parent does not seek medical care which causes the child's injury to become much more severe, the driver may argue that the parent's omission negates legal causation as to the degree of injury.

closely connected to the result. Determining whether a person's conduct is closely connected to the result is a normative judgment that depends on analysis of the totality of the facts of a given case, including the inherent wrongfulness of the actor's conduct, whether the actor desired the prohibited result to occur, and the amount of time between the initial conduct and the intervening act. Inherent wrongfulness of the conduct, desire to cause the prohibited result[32], and short passage of time[33] are not required in order to find legal causation. However, all else being equal, inherent wrongfulness of the conduct, desire to cause the result, and short passage of time between the initial act and intervening act weigh in favor of finding legal causation.

There is no precise formula for determining the point at which intervening influences becomes so great as to break the causal chain between a defendant's conduct and the prohibited result for which he or she is being prosecuted.[34] Rather, the legal causation standard enunciated in subsection (c) simply (and necessarily) calls for an "intuitive judgment"[35] that revolves around whether "although intervening occurrences may have contributed to [a result], the defendant can still, in all fairness, be held criminally responsible for [causing it]."[36]

Relation to Current District Law. Subsection (c) codifies, clarifies, and changes District law. While the D.C. Code does not address legal causation, the DCCA has adopted a standard to address issues of legal causation that focuses on reasonable foreseeability. The definition of legal cause in RCC § 22E-204(c) is intended to incorporate and refine this aspect of District law in a manner that makes it more accessible and coherent. At the same time, RCC § 22E-204(c) also potentially expands District law by clarifying that the volitional conduct of another actor is a relevant causal influence—independent of reasonable foreseeability—to be considered by the factfinder.

It is well established in the District that "a criminal defendant proximately causes, and thus can be held criminally accountable for, all harms that are reasonably foreseeable consequences of his or her actions."[37] Reasonable foreseeability is thus at the heart of legal

---

[32] This issue may be especially likely to arise with offenses that require recklessness or negligence as to causing the result element. For example, if a person fires several gunshots in a crowded theater, and in the ensuing panic a person is trampled and suffers injuries, legal causation may be appropriate if the actor was reckless, but did not desire to cause the injury.

[33] For example, if A seriously but non-fatally injures B, and B dies days later because B fails to fully comply with his physician's complex instructions, legal causation may be appropriate despite this passage of time between the initial injury and B's failure to follow the physician's instructions.

[34] See, e.g., Blue Shield of Virginia v. McCready, 457 U.S. 465, 478 n.13 (1982) ("[T]he principle of proximate cause is hardly a rigorous analytic tool."); LLOYD L. WEINREB, Comment on Basis of Criminal Liability; Culpability; Causation: Chapter 3, in 1 WORKING PAPERS OF THE NATIONAL COMMISSION ON REFORM OF FEDERAL CRIMINAL LAWS 144 (1970)) (noting the difficulty of reducing the requirement of legal causation to "readily understood rules").

[35] Paul H. Robinson, Legality and Discretion in the Distribution of Criminal Sanctions, 25 HARV. J. ON LEGIS. 393, 439 (1988); see, e.g., Palsgraf v. Long Island R. Co., 248 N.Y. 339, 351-52 (Andrews, J., dissenting) (defining legal causation in terms of "a rough sense of justice," wherein "the law arbitrarily declines to trace a series of events beyond a certain point"); Model Penal Code § 2.03 cmt. at 260 (one advantage of "putting the issue squarely to the jury's sense of justice is that it does not attempt to force a result which the jury may resist.").

[36] Matter of J.N., 406 A.2d at 1287 (Newman, C.J., dissenting).

[37] Blaize, 21 A.3d at 81 (quoting McKinnon v. United States, 550 A.2d 915, 918 (D.C. 1988)).

causation under District law—a point reflected in the D.C. Criminal Jury Instructions on homicide which state that "A person causes the death of another person if . . . it was reasonably foreseeable that death or serious bodily injury could result from such conduct."[38] Notwithstanding the centrality of the phrase "reasonably foreseeable" in the District's law of causation, however, it is far from clear what it actually means.

District courts have made a wide range of statements on the nature of reasonable foreseeability. Relying on the requirement of reasonable foreseeability, for example, the DCCA has held that a defendant "may not be held liable for harm actually caused where the chain of events leading to the injury appears 'highly extraordinary in retrospect.'"[39] Reasonable foreseeability is also the basis of the DCCA's observation that "[a]n intervening cause will be considered a superseding legal cause that exonerates the original actor if it was so unforeseeable that the actor's . . . conduct, though still a substantial causative factor, should not result in the actor's liability."[40]

The diversity and complexity of statements regarding the nature of reasonable foreseeability perhaps explains why at least some District judges have refrained from providing jurors with any further elaboration of the concept in their instructions—notwithstanding specific requests from jurors for further clarification.[41] This is unfortunate, however, given that these statements all revolve around a basic and intuitive moral question (which is reflected in the case law): can the defendant, given all of the "intervening occurrences [that] may have contributed to" producing the result for which he or she is being prosecuted, "in all fairness[] be held criminally responsible" for that result?[42]

Paragraph (c)(1) is intended to give voice to this principle by codifying the requirement of reasonable foreseeability in terms of whether the manner in which a result occurs is, in fact, reasonably foreseeable. Thereafter, the explanatory note provides further clarity on this inquiry by highlighting that "the focus here is on the extent to which a given result can be attributed to intervening forces—whether human or natural—of a remote or accidental nature," while providing numerous illustrative examples of how such considerations operate in practice. Viewed collectively, these provisions articulate the unnecessarily legalistic and complicated DCCA case law on reasonable foreseeability in a more accessible and transparent way.

Paragraph (c)(2) addresses a different problem reflected in the District approach to legal causation: the failure of reasonable foreseeability to account for the independent causal significance of the volitional conduct of another. The following scenario is illustrative:

Basketball Rivals. X and D have been in a longstanding competitive basketball rivalry, marked by regular bouts of violence by D perpetrated against his teammates after his losses. Nearing the final few seconds of a championship game, and down by one point, X is about to shoot the game winning shot against D after a game marked by many missteps

[38] D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 4.230.
[39] Blaize, 21 A.3d at 83; Majeska v. District of Columbia, 812 A.2d 948, 951 (D.C.2002) (citing Morgan v. District of Columbia, 468 A.2d 1306, 1318 (D.C.1983) (en banc)).
[40] Butts, 822 A.2d at 418 (citing Restatement (Second) of Torts § 440 (1965)).
[41] Blaize, 21 A.3d at 84.
[42] Matter of J.N., 406 A.2d at 1287 (Newman, C.J., dissenting); see, e.g., McKinnon, 550 A.2d at 917.

by X's teammate V, at which point X realizes that D will almost certainly (and in fact appears to be preparing to) assault V once the loss is formalized. Nevertheless, D decides to disregard this risk and score the final two points necessary for the win. Immediately thereafter, D does as expected: he becomes enraged and viciously beats V on the court.

In this scenario, X is the factual cause of V's injuries: but for X's scoring the game-winning basket, D would not have gone on to assault V. But is X the legal cause of V's injuries? Intuitively, it would seem that the answer to this question should be "no" given that D freely chose to assault, while X did not in any way desire D to engage in such conduct—rather, D merely desired to win the game. Thus, after accounting for all of the "intervening occurrences [that] may have contributed to" producing V's injury—namely, D's volitional conduct—it cannot be said that "in all fairness" X should "be held criminally responsible" for V's injuries.[43] And yet, under a strict reasonable foreseeability approach it would appear that X must be deemed the legal cause of V's injury since D's intervening conduct was in no way a surprise—indeed, D's intervening conduct was specifically foreseen by X.

District law and practice does recognize that potentially foreseeable intervening acts may nonetheless negate legal causation. The District's criminal jury instructions, specifying when medical treatment constitutes an intervening cause state: "[A]s a matter of law, grossly negligent medical treatment is not reasonably foreseeable if it is the sole cause of death . . . ."[44] This rule, which effectively allows for grossly negligent medical treatment to break the chain of legal causation, is sensible. For example, where X inflicts a minor injury on V, only to have medical professional D give V a fatal dose of a sedative mislabeled by D as Tylenol, it's intuitive that D's gross negligence would break the chain of legal causation. But here again, the rule is not necessarily contingent upon considerations of foreseeability.[45] For the outcome would appear to be the same even if the assault took place in a small town with a single hospital with a known penchant for grossly negligent medical care.[46]

One additional aspect of District law that weighs in favor of viewing the volitional conduct of another as a distinct consideration independent of reasonable foreseeability is the law of accomplice liability. The law of accomplice liability, both inside and outside the District, constitutes the primary method for holding one actor responsible for the criminal conduct of another.[47] Yet in order to attribute criminal responsibility in this way, a mere showing of reasonable foreseeability will not suffice.[48] Instead, the would-be accomplice must act with a "purposive attitude towards" the other person's/principal's criminal conduct.[49] So, for example, where X sells D a baseball bat, believing that D will

---

[43] Matter of J.N., 406 A.2d at 1287 (Newman, C.J., dissenting).
[44] D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 4.230.
[45] See also LAFAVE, supra note 1, at 1 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 6.4(f)(4) (noting that "there may well be instances . . . in which the refusal [of medical treatment] is so extremely foolish as to be abnormal," and that "voluntary harm-doing usually suffices to break the chain of legal cause").
[46] Id.
[47] See generally Commentary on RCC § 22E-210: Accomplice Liability.
[48] Wilson-Bey v. United States, 903 A.2d 818, 838 (D.C. 2006) (en banc) ("We therefore conclude that it serves neither the ends of justice nor the purposes of the criminal law to permit an accomplice to be convicted under a reasonable foreseeability standard when a principal must be shown to have specifically intended the decedent's death and to have acted with premeditation and deliberation, and when such intent, premeditation, and deliberation are elements of the offense.").
[49] Wilson-Bey, 903 A.2d. at 831.

subsequently use it to assault V, X cannot be held criminally liable for D's conduct as an accomplice.[50] True, D's conduct may have been foreseen by X (and was surely reasonably foreseeable under the circumstances). Nevertheless, absent proof that X "designedly encouraged or facilitated"[51] D's subsequent assault of V, the law of accomplice liability will not support the attribution of criminal responsibility.

This stringent approach to dealing with the attribution of criminal responsibility is founded upon the general belief that "the way in which a person's acts produce results in the physical world is significantly different from the way in which a person's acts produce results that take the form of the volitional actions of others."[52] As such, it would be inappropriate to view criminal responsibility for the volitional actions of others as solely being a matter of reasonable foreseeability. Conceptually, this would reduce the culpable choices of others to mere "caused happenings," rather than the independently blameworthy subjects of prosecution that the criminal law assumes them to be.[53] And as a matter of practice, it would effectively negate—by rendering superfluous—the District's well-established principles of accomplice liability.[54]

Paragraph (c)(2) is intended to give voice to the above considerations by stating that—in addition to assessing reasonable foreseeability—"when the result depends on another person's volitional conduct," the fact finder must consider whether there "is a close connection between the actor's conduct and the result." Thereafter, the explanatory note provides further clarity on this inquiry by noting that whether a person's conduct is

---

[50] Id. ("To establish a defendant's criminal liability as an aider and abettor, [] the government must prove . . . that the accomplice . . . wished to bring about [the criminal venture] . . . . "); see, e.g., Robinson v. United States, 100 A.3d 95, 106 (D.C. 2014); Gray v. United States, 79 A.3d 326, 338 (D.C. 2013); Joya v. United States, 53 A.3d 309, 314 (D.C. 2012); Ewing v. United States, 36 A.3d 839, 846 (D.C. 2012).

[51] Porter v. United States, 826 A.2d 398, 405 (D.C. 2003) (quoting Jefferson v. United States, 463 A.2d 681, 683 (D.C. 1983)); Evans v. United States, 160 A.3d 1155, 1161 (D.C. 2017); see also English v. United States, 25 A.3d 46, 53 (D.C. 2011) ("The key question is whether, drawing all reasonable inferences in the prosecution's favor, an impartial jury could fairly find beyond a reasonable doubt that Anderson intentionally participated in English's reckless flight from the pursuing officer, and that he not only wanted English (and his passengers) to succeed in eluding the police (which Anderson undoubtedly did), but that he also took concrete action to make his hope a reality.").

[52] Sanford H. Kadish, Complicity, Cause and Blame: A Study in the Interpretation of Doctrine, 73 Cal. L. Rev. 323, 327, 369-70 (1985) (other people's criminal conduct are not typically viewed "as caused happenings, but as the product of the actor's self-determined choices, so that it is the actor who is the cause of what he does, not [the individual] who set the stage for his action."); see, e.g., H.L.A. HART & A.M. HONORÉ, CAUSATION IN THE LAW 326 (2d ed. 1985) ("The free, deliberate, and informed intervention of a second person, who intends to exploit the situation created by the first, but is not acting in concert with him, is normally held to relieve the first actor of criminal responsibility."); JOHN KAPLAN ET AL., CRIMINAL LAW 261 (6th ed. 2008) ("Rather than distinguish between foreseeable and unforeseeable intervening events . . . the common law generally assumed that individuals were the exclusive cause of their own actions.").

[53] Kadish, 73 Cal. L. Rev. 323, at 391.

[54] As the DCCA has observed:

> A rule imposing criminal liability upon an accomplice for foreseeable consequences, without proof that the accomplice intended those consequences (while, by contrast, a principal must be shown to have the proscribed intent), is also contrary to the underlying purpose of aiding and abetting statutes, which is to "abolish the distinction between principals and accessories and [render] them all principals."

Wilson-Bey, 903 A.2d at 837 (quoting Standefer v. United States, 447 U.S. 10, 19, 100 S.Ct. 1999, 64 L.Ed.2d 689 (1980)).

closely related to the result requires analysis of all facts of a given case, including the inherent wrongfulness of the actor's conduct, whether the actor desired a prohibited result to occur, and the passage of time between the initial conduct and the intervening act, while providing numerous illustrative examples of how such considerations operate in practice. Viewed collectively, these provisions expand the District approach to legal causation in a manner that better coheres with District law as a whole.[55]

These provisions clarify operative causal principles governing second-degree murder.[56] Specifically, the District law governing homicides arising from gun battles dictates that where X and Y culpably shoot at one another, and Y subsequently hits either an innocent bystander or another culpable participant, that X may be held criminally responsible for Y's conduct if "it was reasonably foreseeable that death or serious bodily injury could result."[57] In Fleming v. United States, DCCA held that "the intervening actions of a third party do not by themselves defeat proximate cause if those actions were reasonably foreseeable to the defendant,"[58] rejecting the argument raised by appellant that an intervening volitional act categorically negates legal causation. However, the DCCA did not hold that reasonable foreseeability is the only relevant consideration in determining whether an actor legally caused a prohibited result. The Court specifically declined to decide whether a significant passage of time between the initial actor's conduct and the intervening act of another can negate legal causation, even when the intervening act is reasonably foreseeable.[59] The Court provided a model instruction to guide juries' decision making in accordance with the principles set forth in Fleming. However, the Court noted that the model instruction is only to be used in second-degree murder cases, and that the [55] See, Fleming v. United States, 224 A.3d 213, 229 (D.C. 2020) (en banc) (providing model jury instructions for homicide causation, which state in part "the government must prove that there is a close connection between the defendant's action and the decedent's death. You may find that a close connection exists if, at the time of the defendant's action, the defendant knew or reasonably should have known that the action might result in the death of or serious bodily injury to the decedent [or another person]. On the other hand, you may not find that a close connection exists if the series of events leading from the defendant's action to the decedent's death is highly unusual, abnormal, or extraordinary [or too lengthy]").

---

[56] Compare Roy v. United States, 871 A.2d 498, 502 (D.C. 2005) (upholding jury instruction that permitted the jury to find that the defendant, by engaging in a gun battle in a public space, was responsible for causing the death of an innocent bystander killed by a stray bullet even if it was not the defendant who fired the fatal round, provided that the death was reasonably foreseeable), with Fleming v. United States, 148 A.3d 1175, 1177 (D.C. 2016) (Easterly, J., dissenting) ("[E]ven assuming arming oneself with a gun and firing it could satisfy the direct causation requirement, the volitional, felonious act of someone else then shooting and killing the decedent is an 'intervening cause' that breaks this chain of criminal causation.").
The DCCA noted in Fleming that "[t]he causation principles we have discussed in this case are generally applicable in second-degree-murder cases, not special principles applicable in some distinctive way to gun battles." Fleming, 224 A.3d at 228.

[57] D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 4.230; see, e.g., Roy v. United States, 871 A.2d 498, 508 (D.C. 2005); Bryant v. United States, 148 A.3d 689, 2016 WL 6543533 (D.C. 2016); McCray v. United States, 133 A.3d 205 (D.C. 2016); Blaize v. United States, 21 A.3d 78 (D.C. 2011); Blaine v. United States, 18 A.3d 766 (D.C. 2011).

[58] Fleming, 224 A.3d at 226.

[59] The DCCA provided a model jury instruction which addresses "the issue of temporal attenuation," but "does not attempt to provide any concrete guidance about that issue, because the issue was not raised in this case." Fleming, 224 A.3d at 229. This suggests that legal causation may be negated even when an intervening act is reasonably foreseeable if too much time passes between an actor's initial conduct and the intervening act. Notably, at oral argument, "the United States took the position that a person who started a deadly feud between two groups might not properly be held criminally responsible for reasonably foreseeable killings that took place years or even a day after the person's initial conduct." Id. at 224.

instruction leaves "open whether causation operates differently under [the] felony-murder statute."[60] The model instruction includes bracketed language suggesting that the passage of time may negate legal causation, but "does not attempt to provide any concrete guidance about that issue, because the issue was not raised in this case."[61] Although holding that an actor may be held liable for results caused by the intervening volitional act of another, the Court recognized that in a variety of situations, intervening acts may negate legal causation even when they are reasonably foreseeable. However, the DCCA did not specify when reasonably foreseeable intervening acts negate causation, or which factors are relevant in making this determination.

In contrast, the RCC clarifies that although an intervening volitional act does not necessarily negate legal causation, it will in cases where the actor's conduct was not closely connected to the result. The commentary further clarifies that the determination of whether it is just to hold an actor liable for the acts of another depends on analysis of the totality of facts of a given case, and identifies three particularly relevant factors.

RCC § 22E-205. CULPABLE MENTAL STATE REQUIREMENT.

Explanatory Notes. Subsection (a) states the culpable mental state requirement governing all criminal offenses in the RCC. It establishes that a culpable mental state is applicable to every result and circumstance element in an offense definition, with the exception of those result and circumstance elements that are subject to strict liability under the rule of interpretation established in RCC § 22E-207(b).[1]

In so doing, subsection (a) more broadly communicates the RCC's basic commitment to viewing culpable mental states on an element-by-element basis—a practice known as "element analysis."[2] This commitment is based on the dual recognition that: (1) "the mental ingredients of a particular crime may differ with regard to the different elements of the crime"[3]; and, therefore, (2) "clear analysis requires that the question of the

---

[60] Id. at 229.

[61] Id. at 229.

[1] See RCC § 22E-207(b) ("A person is strictly liable for any result or circumstance in an offense: (1) That is modified by the phrase 'in fact,' or (2) When another statutory provision explicitly indicates strict liability applies to that result or circumstance.").

[2] Paul H. Robinson & Jane Grall, Element Analysis in Defining Criminal Liability: The Model Penal Code and Beyond, 35 STAN. L. REV. 681, 683 (1983); see, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02(1) ("Except as provided in Section 2.05, a person is not guilty of an offense unless he acted purposely, knowingly, recklessly or negligently, as the law may require, with respect to each material element of the offense."); Herbert Wechsler, Codification of Criminal Law in the United States: The Model Penal Code, 68 COLUM. L. REV. 1425, 1436–37 (1968) ("This way of putting the matter acknowledges that the required mode of culpability may not only vary from crime to crime but also from one to another element of the same offense—meaning by material element an attribute of conduct that gives it its offensive quality"); see also Ronald L. Gainer, The Culpability Provisions of the Model Penal Code, 19 RUTGERS L.J. 575, 577 (1988) (describing element analysis as the Model Penal Code's greatest achievement).

[3] WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 1 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 5.1(d) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019). As LaFave illustrates:

> One might imagine a carefully drafted statutory crime worded: "Whoever sells intoxicating liquor to one whom he knows to be a policeman and whom he should know to be on duty" is guilty of a misdemeanor. Such a statute, aside from its mens rea aspects, covers several different [objective] elements—(1) the sale (2) of intoxicating liquor (3) to a policeman (4) who is on duty. As to elements (1) and (2), the statute evidently provides for liability kind of culpability required to establish the commission of an offense be faced separately with respect to each material element of the crime."[4]

Under the RCC approach to element analysis, it is necessary to consider what culpable mental state (if any) applies to the result and circumstance elements in an offense definition.[5] Conduct elements are accordingly excluded from the requisite culpable mental state evaluation required by subsection (a).[6] In practice, this means that the only aspect of an actor's culpability as to his or her own present conduct[7] which is necessary to establish affirmative liability under the RCC is its voluntariness, as proscribed in RCC § 22E-203.[8] In addition, subsection (a) requires that a person "acts with" the requisite mental state as to each result and circumstance element. This generally requires a concurrence in time between the actor's conduct and requisite mental states.[9]

Subsection (a) also recognizes that in certain instances the legislature may decide to refrain from requiring proof of a culpable mental state as to a given result or circumstance element, thereby holding an actor strictly liable for it.[10] In that case, however, > without fault: if he in fact sells intoxicating liquor it is no defense that he either reasonably or unreasonably thinks he is making a gift rather than a sale, or thinks he is selling Coca-Cola rather than whiskey. As to element (3), however, the statute requires the seller to have actual knowledge that the purchaser is a policeman; so a reasonable or even unreasonable belief that he is a fireman would be a defense. As to element (4), a negligence type of fault is all that is required; a reasonable belief that the policeman is off duty is a defense, but an unreasonable belief is not.

---

Id.

[4] United States v. Bailey, 444 U.S. 394, 406 (1980) (quoting Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 123); see, e.g., Carrell v. United States, 165 A.3d 314, 321 (D.C. 2017) (en banc).

[5] See also, e.g., RCC § 22E-206 (defining purpose, knowledge, intent, recklessness, and negligence as to results and circumstances, but not conduct).

[6] See, e.g., Paul H. Robinson, A Functional Analysis of Criminal Law, 88 NW. U. L. REV. 857, 864 (1994) (requiring proof of mens rea as to conduct unnecessarily "duplicates the voluntariness requirement."); Kenneth W. Simons, Should the Model Penal Code's Mens Rea Provisions Be Amended?, 1 OHIO ST. J. CRIM. L. 179 (2003) ("It is normally unduly confusing, and not analytically helpful, to retain [the conduct culpability] category [in an element analysis scheme].").

[7] That is, the act, omission, or series of acts or omissions that satisfy the objective elements of an offense.

[8] See RCC § 22E-203(a) ("No person may be convicted of an offense unless the person voluntarily commits the conduct element necessary to establish liability for the offense.").

[9] See Fleming v. United States, 224 A.3d 213, 229–30 (D.C. 2020), cert. denied, 207 L. Ed. 2d 1059 (June 15, 2020) ("We have said that, "[i]f either the actus reus—the unlawful conduct—or the mens rea—the criminal intent—is missing at the time of the alleged offense, there can be no conviction. Reducing it to its simplest terms, a crime consists in the concurrence of prohibited conduct and a culpable mental state." Rose v. United States, 535 A.2d 849, 852 (D.C. 1987) (internal quotation marks omitted). We have recently suggested that the concept of concurrence contains exceptions and presents complications. Dawkins v. United States, 189 A.3d 223, 231 & n.11 (D.C. 2018). At least in general, though, considerations of concurrence would suggest that a defendant's acts that lead to a later death could provide the basis for a conviction for second-degree murder only if, at the time the defendant took those acts, the defendant had the mental state required for second-degree murder: intent to kill, intent to inflict serious bodily injury, or conscious disregard of the risk of death or serious bodily injury. Walker v. United States, 167 A.3d 1191, 1201 (D.C. 2017).").

[10] See RCC § 22E-205(c) (defining strict liability).

the legislature must explicitly communicate its intent to impose strict liability in accordance with RCC § 22E-207(b).[11]

Subsection (b) provides the definition of "culpable mental state" applicable to RCC § 22E-205(a) and throughout the RCC. The first part of this definition refers to the culpability terms employed in the RCC—purpose, knowledge, intent, recklessness, and negligence, as defined in RCC § 22E-206. Proof that the defendant brought about the result and circumstance elements required by an offense with a state of mind that satisfies any one of these terms will satisfy the culpable mental state requirement codified in subsection (a).[12]

The second part of subsection (b) establishes that the object of the phrases "with intent" and "with the purpose" also constitutes part of a "culpable mental state." This aspect of the definition is intended to clarify the nature of the culpable mental state requirement governing the RCC's various inchoate offenses (e.g., theft, burglary, and attempt),[13] the hallmark of which is the imposition of liability for unrealized criminal plans.[14]

It is helpful to think of the object of the phrases "with intent to" and "with the purpose of" as part of the culpable mental state governing these inchoate offenses since the relevant propositional content need only exist in an actor's mind. The RCC's possession of stolen property statute is illustrative.[15] The objective elements of this offense, the "purchase[]" or "possess[ion]" of "property," are subject to two distinct culpable mental

---

[11] See RCC § 22E-207(b) ("A person is strictly liable for any result or circumstance in an offense: (1) That is modified by the phrase 'in fact,' or (2) When another statutory provision explicitly indicates strict liability applies to that result or circumstance.").

[12] That is, assuming the offense of prosecution does not require proof of a more culpable state of mind.

[13] There exist two categories of inchoate offenses: general inchoate offenses and specific inchoate offenses. See generally Ira P. Robbins, Double Inchoate Crimes, 26 HARV. J. ON LEGIS. 1 (1989). Specific inchoate offenses, such as burglary and theft, require proof of some preliminary consummated harm—for example, an unlawful entry or taking—accompanied by a requirement that this conduct have been committed "with intent to" commit a more serious harm—for example, a crime inside the structure or a permanent deprivation. See, e.g., JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 27 (4th ed. 2012).

General inchoate offenses, in contrast, accomplish the same outcome, but in a characteristically different way. They constitute "adjunct crimes"—that is, a category of offense that "cannot exist by itself, but only in connection with another crime," Cox v. State, 534 A.2d 1333, 1335 (Md. 1988)—that generally do not require that any harm actually have been realized. See, e.g., Michael T. Cahill, Attempt, Reckless Homicide, and the Design of Criminal Law, 78 U. COLO. L. REV. 879, 956 (2007).

For example, whereas burglary and theft respectively require proof of a taking or a trespass, a criminal attempt merely requires proof of significant progress towards completion of the target offense—without regard to whether this progress was itself harmful. Like burglary and theft, however, general inchoate offenses such as criminal attempts similarly incorporate a "with intent to" requirement, that is, a requirement that the relevant conduct have been committed "with intent to" commit the target offense. See generally Larry Alexander & Kimberly D. Kessler, Mens Rea and Inchoate Crimes, 87 J. CRIM. L. & CRIMINOLOGY 1138 (1997).

[14] E.g., Michael T. Cahill, Defining Inchoate Crime: An Incomplete Attempt, 9 OHIO ST. J. CRIM. L. 751, 759 (2012). For example, theft is an inchoate offense because it does not require proof that the defendant actually deprived the victim of property in a permanent manner; instead, proof of a taking committed "with intent to deprive" will suffice. Similarly, attempt (to commit murder) is an inchoate offense because it does not require proof that the defendant actually killed the victim; instead, proof that the defendant, acting "with intent to kill," engaged in significant conduct, which goes beyond mere preparation, directed towards killing the victim will suffice.

[15] RCC § 22E-2401.

states, (1) "with intent that the property be stolen" and (2) "with intent to deprive the owner of the property."[16] Here, the objects of both culpable mental states—the stolen-ness of the property and the deprivation to the owner—do not actually need to transpire to support liability.

Classifying the object of the phrases "with intent" and "with the purpose" as part of the culpable mental state governing an inchoate offense also appropriately ensures that the relevant propositional content will be subject to the burden of proof stated in RCC § 22E-201.[17]

Subsection (c) provides the definition of "strict liability" applicable to subsection (a) and throughout the RCC. It establishes that strict liability means liability as to a result element or circumstance element in the absence of a culpable mental state.[18] Implicit in this understanding of strict liability is the view that the voluntary commission of an offense, while a necessary prerequisite for criminal liability under RCC § 22E-203, does not constitute a culpable mental state, as defined in RCC § 22E-205(b).[19] Nevertheless, pure [16] Id. It should be noted that the purchase or possession of property is also subject to a "knowingly" mental state under RCC § 22E-2401.

---

[17] This is because subsections 201(a) and (b) require the government to prove the "objective elements" and "culpability required" for an offense beyond a reasonable doubt. RCC § 22E-201. As the object of the phrases "with intent" and "with the purpose" need not occur, the relevant propositional content (e.g., the deprivation in theft or the crime committed within the dwelling for burglary) clearly does not constitute part of that offense's "objective elements," all of which by definition must actually occur. RCC § 22E-201(c)(1) ("Conduct element" means any act or omission that is required to establish liability for an offense."); id. at § (c)(2)("Result element" means "any consequence caused by a person's act or omission that is required to establish liability for an offense."); id. at § (c)(3) ("Circumstance element" means any characteristic or condition relating to either a conduct element or result element that is required to establish liability for an offense."). Consequently, it is necessary to incorporate these inchoate elements into the "culpability required" for an offense through the definition of "culpable mental state," so as to afford them the protections of proof beyond a reasonable doubt under section 201. See RCC § 22E-201(e) ("Culpability required" includes," inter alia, "[t]he culpable mental state requirement, as provided in RCC § 22E-205(a).").

[18] See, e.g., Sanford H. Kadish, Excusing Crime, 75 CAL. L. REV. 257, 267 (1987) ("Strict liability imposes guilt without regard to whether the defendant knew or could reasonably have known some relevant feature of the situation."). As Kadish illustrates:

> The defendant did an act that, judged from his or her perspective, is blameless: she drove a car; she rented her home in another city; he presided over a pharmaceutical company that bought packaged drugs and cosmetics and reshipped them under its own label. But the facts were not as they thought. The driver could not see a stop sign at the intersection, because it was obscured by a bush. The homeowner's otherwise respectable tenants decided to throw a [party involving controlled substances]. The drugs and cosmetics the pharmaceutical company reshipped were mislabeled by the manufacturer and there was nothing the defendant officer could practically have done about it. These circumstances would surely be a defense to a charge of moral fault and usually, under the requirement of mens rea or the doctrine of reasonable mistake, they would be a legal defense as well. But . . . many jurisdictions would disallow the excuse of reasonable mistake because, it would be explained, these are instances of strict liability.

Id.

[19] Which is to say: requiring proof of voluntary conduct, and nothing more, is entirely consistent with strict liability. For example, consider the situation of a person who quickly reaches for a soda on the counter, when, unbeknownst to the person, a small child darts in front of the soda prior to the person's ability to reach it. If the child suffers a facial injury in the process one can say that the person's voluntary act (factually) caused bodily injury to the child. That the relevant conduct was the product of effort or determination, strict liability offenses,[20] which require proof of voluntariness and nothing more, are possible under the RCC if explicitly specified by the legislature.

Subsection (d) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. RCC 22E-205 fills a gap in District law, which at present does not typically enumerate all the culpable mental states that must be proven for a given offense. By requiring element analysis, RCC § 22E-205 provides the basis for clearly drafting and consistently applying criminal statutes in a manner sensitive to key distinctions in culpability between objective elements. Although the District's criminal statutes generally do not reflect this kind of element analysis, the manner in which the DCCA has interpreted many criminal statutes—particularly in the past few years—accords with the most important aspects of RCC § 22E-205. District case law also recognizes the benefits of clarity and consistency to be gained from legislative adoption of element analysis.

Generally speaking, the District's criminal statutes do not reflect element analysis. Which is to say, they are not drafted in a manner that "make[s] clear what mental state (for example, strict liability, negligence, recklessness, knowledge, or purpose) is required for [each of an offense's objective elements] (for example, conduct, resulting harm, or an attendant circumstance)."[21] Instead, the District's criminal statutes most often generally state some culpable mental state requirement—whether comprised of one,[22] two,[23] three,[24] or even four[25] culpability terms—at the beginning of an offense definition, without clarifying how these culpability terms are intended to be distributed among the offense's objective elements.

The more recent of these District statutes typically employ modern culpability terms, such as purpose, knowledge, recklessness, and negligence.[26] However, many of the District's older statutes employ more ambiguous culpability terms, such as "maliciously,[27] "willfully,"[28] "wanton[ly],"[29] "reckless indifference,"[30] and "having reason to believe."[31] And some of the District's most important criminal statutes merely codify the penalty however, is not to say that the person was in any way blameworthy or at fault for causing the child's injury. On this view, then, a criminal offense that premised liability on the mere fact that the person's conduct was voluntary—that is, regardless of whether the person acted purposely, knowingly, recklessly, or negligently as to the relevant result and circumstance elements—is appropriately understood as a strict liability offense.

---

[20] "Pure" strict liability offenses, which do not require proof of a culpable mental state as to any of an offense's objective elements, are to be distinguished from "impure" strict liability offenses, which merely fail to require proof of a culpable mental state as to only some of an offense's objective elements. Kenneth W. Simons, When Is Strict Criminal Liability Just?, 87 J. CRIM. L. & CRIMINOLOGY 1075, 1081-82 (1997).

[21] Jones v. United States, 124 A.3d 127, 130 n.3 (D.C. 2015)) (citing Perry v. United States, 36 A.3d 799, 809 n.18 (D.C. 2011))

[22] E.g., D.C. Code § 22-303; D.C. Code § 22-3318; D.C. Code § 22-3309.

[23] E.g., D.C. Code § 22-404.01; D.C. Code § 22-3312.01.

[24] E.g., D.C. Code § 22-404; D.C. Code § 22-1101.

[25] D.C. Code § 5-1307.

[26] E.g., D.C. Code § 22-404.01; D.C. Code § 22-404; D.C. Code § 22-1101; D.C. Code § 5-1307.

[27] E.g., D.C. Code § 22-303; D.C. Code § 22-3318.

[28] E.g., D.C. Code § 22-934; D.C. Code § 22-3312.01.

[29] E.g., D.C. Code § 22-934; D.C. Code § 22-3312.01.

[30] E.g., D.C. Code § 22-934; D.C. Code § 22-404.01.

[31] E.g., D.C. Code § 22-723; D.C. Code § 22-3214.

applicable to an offense, and, therefore, enumerate no culpable mental state at all.[32] In the absence of a legislative statement of offense elements, the common law definition of these offenses—typically comprised of an ambiguous culpable mental state requirement framed in terms very different from element analysis—is read in by the courts.[33]

When viewed as a whole, then, criminal statutes in the D.C. Code do not reflect the basic tenets of element analysis.

Historically, District courts have similarly refrained from using element analysis in their interpretation of criminal statutes. For a long time, the DCCA, when faced with clarifying the culpability required for a criminal statute, employed an approach known as "offense analysis," analyzing the appropriate culpable mental state for an offense as a whole (rather than each of its parts). Rather than ask whether any particular objective element in an offense was subject to a culpable mental state—and if so, whether it is akin to purpose, knowledge, recklessness, or negligence—the court typically sought to determine the mens rea governing the crime as a whole, which it characterized as one of "general intent" or "specific intent."[34] More recently, however, the DCCA has recognized how problematic this practice is for the administration of justice, and has thus sought to shift its focus away from this common law approach.

For example, in a pair of 2011 decisions, Perry v. United States and Buchanan v. United States, the DCCA observed that the terms "general intent" or "specific intent" are little more than "rote incantations" of "dubious value,"[35] which "can be too vague or misleading to be dispositive or even helpful"[36] and can lead to "outright confusion . . . when they are included in jury instructions."[37] For this reason, the District's criminal jury instructions "avoid[s]" using the terms "general intent" and "specific intent" as the terms are "more confusing than helpful to juries."[38]

Thereafter, in the DCCA's 2013 decision in Ortberg v. United States, the court recognized that the problem with "these terms [is that they] fail to distinguish between elements of the crime, to which different mental states may apply."[39] The better alternative, as the court goes on to explain, is a "clear analysis" which faces the "question of the kind of culpability required to establish the commission of an offense [] separately with respect to each material element of the crime."[40]

With the foregoing insights in mind, the DCCA observed in the 2015 decision of Jones v. United States that "courts and legislatures" should, wherever possible, "simply make clear what mental state (for example, strict liability, negligence, recklessness,

---

[32] These include assault, D.C. Code § 22-404, murder, D.C. Code § 22-2101, manslaughter, D.C. Code § 22-2105, mayhem, D.C. Code § 22-406, affrays, D.C. Code § 22-1301, and threats, D.C. Code § 22-407.

[33] See generally Buchanan v. United States, 32 A.3d 990, 1002 (D.C. 2011) (Ruiz, J. concurring). These statutes are to be contrasted with various strict liability offenses in the D.C. Code, where it is clear that no culpable mental state was intended to govern some or all of the offense's objective elements. For example, as the DCCA observed in McNeely v. United States, "[s]trict liability criminal offenses—including felonies—are not unprecedented in the District of Columbia; the Council has enacted several such statutes in the past. 874 A.2d 371, 385–86 n.20 (D.C. 2005) (collecting statutes); see also D.C. Code Ann. § 22-3011(a).

[34] Buchanan, 32 A.3d at 1002.

[35] Id. at 1001.

[36] Perry v. United States, 36 A.3d 799, 809 n.18 (D.C. 2011)

[37] Id. at 809.

[38] D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 3.100 Defendant's State of Mind—Note.

[39] 81 A.3d 303, 307 (D.C. 2013).

[40] Id. (citations, quotations, and alterations omitted).

knowledge, or purpose) is required for whatever material element is at issue (for example, conduct, resulting harm, or an attendant circumstance)."[41]

Most recently, the en banc DCCA in Carrell v. United States (2017) specifically adopted both the element analysis framework[42] and accompanying culpable mental state definitions[43] developed by the Model Penal Code (and subsequently endorsed by the U.S. Supreme Court) in resolving an ongoing conflict surrounding the culpability of criminal threats.[44]

RCC § 22E-205 establishes a legislative framework that broadly accords with all of the foregoing insights. Consistent with the DCCA's recent case law, RCC § 22E-205(a) "requires that the question of the kind of culpability required to establish the commission of an offense be faced separately with respect to each material element of the crime."[45] Consistent with the District's varied criminal statutes, RCC § 22E-205(b) establishes that the kind of culpable mental state at issue will be one of purpose, knowledge, intent, recklessness, or negligence. And consistent with both District case law and criminal statutes, RCC § 22E-205(c) acknowledges the possibility that no culpable mental state may apply to a given objective element at all.[46]

There is, however, one potential difference between the element analysis recognized by the DCCA and that specified by RCC § 22E-205, namely, the RCC approach removes conduct from the requisite analysis of culpable mental states. This variance should help resolve an issue over which there has been extensive litigation in the District: whether and how culpable mental states relate to the conduct element of an offense.

Although the DCCA appears, at times, to envision that conduct, no less than results or circumstances, is subject to a culpable mental state analysis, the court's more recent case law demonstrates the problems and confusion to which this view can lead. For example, the DCCA has frequently defined a "general intent" crime as one requiring proof of "the intent to do the act that constitutes the crime."[47] Applying this definition to simple assault, a so-called general intent crime, suggests that the government need only prove the intent to perform the acts constituting the assault.[48] But two recent cases, Williams v. United States and Buchanan v. United States, appear to reject this view of the culpable mental state requirement governing the offense, holding that the government must prove that the [41] 124 A.3d 127, 130 n.3 (D.C. 2015).

---

[42] Carrell v. United States, 165 A.3d 314, 320 n.13 (D.C. 2017) (en banc) ("We adopt these ["conduct element," "result element," and "circumstance element"] classifications from the Model Penal Code § 1.13 (9) (Am. Law Inst., Proposed Official Draft 1962).")

[43] Id. at 323-24 ("Following the lead of the Supreme Court . . . we likewise conclude that more precise gradations of mens rea should be employed. We have previously expressed concern about the use of 'general' and 'specific' intent. We reiterate our endorsement of more particularized and standardized categorizations of mens rea, and, in the absence of a statutory scheme setting forth such categorizations, we, like the Supreme Court, look to the Model Penal Code terms and their definitions.")

[44] Id. at 324 ("Applying this hierarchy of mens rea levels to the actus reus result element of the crime of threats, we hold that the government may carry its burden of proof by establishing that the defendant acted with the purpose to threaten or with knowledge that his words would be perceived as a threat.").

[45] For a discussion of how many of the non-conforming culpable mental states in current District statutes are comparable to purpose, knowledge, intent, recklessness, or negligence, see the Commentary on RCC § 22E-206.

[46] See McNeely, 874 A.2d at 385.

[47] E.g., Dauphine v. United States, 73 A.3d 1029, 1032 (D.C. 2013).

[48] Anthony v. United States, 361 A.2d 202, 206 n.5; Ray v. United States, 575 A.2d 1196, 1198 (D.C. 1990).

accused intended for that harm to occur.[49] The reason? The "intent to act" interpretation of simple assault, if taken literally, would—as one DCCA judge phrases it—"allow the prosecution of individuals for criminal assault for actions taken with a complete lack of culpability," and, therefore, is actually consistent with strict liability. [50]

Whether or not a strict liability interpretation of simple assault was ever intended by the DCCA is not entirely clear.[51] What is clear, though, is that other courts have unwittingly created strict liability crimes by misconstruing an "intent to act" as amounting to something more than the voluntariness requirement, and that, more generally, the failure to distinguish between voluntary conduct and mens rea as to results and circumstances has produced a significant amount of confusion in the law, both inside and outside of the District.[52] Subsection (a) is intended to avoid confusion of this nature by excluding conduct—narrowly defined elsewhere in the RCC as an act or failure to act—from the requisite culpable mental state analysis.

RCC § 22E-206. DEFINITIONS AND HIERARCHY OF CULPABLE MENTAL STATES.

---

[49] Buchanan v. United States, 32 A.3d 990 (D.C. 2011); Williams v. United States, 887 A.2d 1000 (D.C. 2005).

[50] Buchanan, 32 A.3d at 1002 (Ruiz, J. concurring). It should be noted that the culpable mental state requirement governing simple assault has continued to be a source of litigation and confusion in the District. This is reflected in Vines v. United States (2013), where the DCCA went out of its way to avoid resolving the culpable mental state of simple assault. 70 A.3d 1170, 1180 (D.C. 2013), as amended (Sept. 19, 2013).

The defendant in Vines argued that prior simple assault case law "require[s] the government to prove that he had either: (a) the specific intent to cause bodily harm; or (b) the specific intent to place his victim in reasonable apprehension of bodily harm in order to sustain a conviction." Id. at 1179-80. In response, the DCCA noted that it "need not address the correctness of Vines' understanding of our case law to resolve this appeal," and that "[e]ven assuming Vines is correct, a reasonable juror could have inferred the intent to cause bodily harm from his extremely reckless conduct, which was almost certain to cause bodily injury to another . . . ." Id. (italics added); see id. ("We need not decide whether it was necessary for the government to show that Vines possessed the intent to injure May and Garrett or only the intent to commit the acts constituting the assault. Even if the greater proof was necessary, the jury could permissibly infer such intent from Vines' extremely reckless conduct, which posed a high risk of injury to those around him.") (italics added).

[51] For example, neither the DCCA nor any other common law authority has explicitly taken the position that simple assault is a strict liability crime. And the DCCA has even interpreted so-called strict liability crimes to require proof of some mens rea beyond just voluntary conduct. See, e.g., McNeely, 874 A.2d at 387. Moreover, in other contexts, the DCCA has defined a "general intent" crime as requiring the government to prove that the accused was "aware of all those facts which make [one's] conduct criminal," Campos v. United States, 617 A.2d 185, 188 (D.C. 1992) (quoting Hearn v. District of Columbia, 178 A.2d 434, 437 (D.C. 1962))—a definition that seems to imply that a knowledge-like mens rea is applicable to at least some of the objective elements in an offense such as simple assault.

[52] For relevant case law from outside the District, see, for example, State v. Sigler, 688 P.2d 749 (Mont. 1984) overruled by State v. Rothacher, 901 P.2d 82 (Mont. 1995); Van Dyken v. Day, 165 F.3d 37 (9th Cir. 1998); Alvarado v. State, 704 S.W.2d 36 (Tex. Crim. App. 1985); Markley v. State, 421 N.E.2d 20 (Ind. Ct. App. 1981); Jennings v. State, 806 P.2d 1299 (Wyo. 1991); Pena-Cabanillas v. United States, 394 F.2d 785 (9th Cir. 1968). And for relevant commentary, see, for example, Paul H. Robinson, A Functional Analysis of Criminal Law, 88 NW. U. L. REV. 857, 864 (1994); Paul H. Robinson, Element Analysis in Defining Criminal Liability: The Model Penal Code and Beyond, 35 STAN. L. REV. 681, 722 (1983); Eric A. Johnson, The Crime That Wasn't There: Wyoming's Elusive Second-Degree Murder Statute, 7 WYO. L. REV. 1 (2007); Joel M. Schumm, Recent Developments in Indiana Criminal Law and Procedure, 44 IND. L. REV. 1135 (2011); Larry Kupers, Aliens Charged with Illegal Re-Entry Are Denied Due Process and, Thereby, Equal Treatment Under the Law, 38 U.C. DAVIS L. REV. 861 (2005); J.W.C. Turner, The Mental Element in Crime at Common Law, 6 CAMBRIDGE L.J. 31, 34 (1936).

Explanatory Notes. Section 206 establishes a culpable mental state hierarchy comprised of four levels—purposely, knowingly/intentionally, recklessly, and negligently—separately defined in relation to result and circumstance elements. These terms "prescribe the minimal requirements" of criminal liability and "lay the basis for distinctions that may usefully be drawn" in the grading of offenses under the RCC.[1] The hierarchy these terms comprise is intended to codify, clarify, and refine the "representative modern American culpability scheme," which was originally developed by the drafters of the Model Penal Code and has subsequently been adopted by legislatures and courts around the country.[2]

---

[1] Herbert Wechsler, Codification of Criminal Law in the United States: The Model Penal Code, 68 COLUM. L. REV. 1425 (1968) (discussing the culpable mental state hierarchy developed in Model Penal Code § 2.02); see, e.g., NATIONAL COMMISSION ON REFORM OF FEDERAL CRIMINAL LAWS, 1 WORKING PAPERS OF THE NATIONAL COMMISSION ON REFORM OF FEDERAL CRIMINAL LAWS 119 (1970) (observing that the culpability concepts incorporated into Model Penal Code § 2.02 "express the significant distinctions found by the courts, and are adequate for all the distinctions which can and should be made to accomplish the purposes of a [] criminal code.").

The rationale for carefully distinguishing between distinctions in culpable mental states has been described accordingly:

> Criminal law exhibits a well-known fixation with the defendant's mind, a fixation that we do not find in other areas of law, including areas in which the mental states of the parties matter to liability. Criminal law responds differently to defendants who are only subtly different in their psychological states; we often give large punishments to some who cause harm while giving low punishments, or even no punishments, to subtly psychologically different actors who cause the very same, or even greater, harms. The reason is that subtle differences in psychological states . . . cloak large differences in something fundamental to what it is to be a human being and a citizen of a state who owes an account of his conduct to other people and other citizens: the evaluative weight that we give to others' interests in comparison to our own . . . From subtle differences in psychology, we are able to infer the presence of large differences [in the level of disregard for the legally protected interests of others that an actor's harmful or dangerous conduct manifests on a particular occasion].

Gideon Yaffe, The Point of Mens Rea: The Case of Willful Ignorance, 12 CRIM. L. & PHIL. 19, 25 (2018); see, e.g., Peter Westen, Individualizing the Reasonable Person in Criminal Law, 2 CRIM. L. & PHIL. 137, 151 (2008) ("To publicly blame a person [is] to adjudge that, rather than being motivated in his conduct by proper regard for interests that the law seeks to safeguard, the person placed insufficient value on those interests. The attitudes for which persons are blamed range in gravity from maliciousness (e.g., 'purpose' to do harm), callousness (e.g., 'knowingly' doing harm), indifference to harm, conscious disregard of harm (i.e. 'recklessness'), and inadvertent neglect (i.e. 'negligence'). In each case, however, blame is a negative judgment of the person's motivating values.").

[2] Paul H. Robinson & Jane Grall, Element Analysis in Defining Criminal Liability: The Model Penal Code and Beyond, 35 STAN. L. REV. 681, 692 (1983) ("Section 2.02 [of the Model Penal Code] may appropriately be considered the representative modern American culpability scheme."); see Model Penal Code § 2.02(2) (defining purposely, knowingly, recklessly, and negligently); id. at § 2.02(5) (establishing that proof of higher mental state will satisfy the lower mental state).

The influence of Model Penal Code § 2.02 has been summarized accordingly:

> Upon initial publication, the MPC formulation of culpability was hailed by most commentators as a reasonable attempt to impose some predictable structure on a notoriously unpredictable and discordant area of the law. State legislatures were even more accepting. By 1983—just 25 years after its promulgation—36 states had largely jettisoned their criminal codes in favor of the MPC. Even in the handful of states that have not

Subsection (a) provides a comprehensive definition of the term "purposely," sensitive to the kind of objective element to which the term applies. Under this definition, a person acts purposely as to a result element when that person consciously desires to cause the prohibited result.[3] Likewise, a person acts purposely as to a circumstance element when that person consciously desires that the prohibited circumstance exist.[4] It is immaterial to liability under this definition that a person also possesses an ulterior motive, which goes beyond his or her conscious desire to cause a prohibited result or that a prohibited circumstance exists.[5] However, the conscious desire required by subsection (a) must be accompanied by that person's belief that it is at least possible that the prohibited result will occur or that the prohibited circumstance exists.[6]

Subsection (b) provides a comprehensive definition of the terms "knowingly" and "intentionally," sensitive to the kind of objective element to which the term applies. Under this definition, a person acts knowingly or intentionally as to a result element when that person is aware or believes that it is practically certain that conduct[7] will cause the prohibited result.[8] Likewise, a person acts knowingly or intentionally as to a circumstance > adopted it in whole or in part as legislation, the MPC has still managed to find its way into the common law of those states because judges often turn to it for guidance. The MPC is now taught in virtually every law school, with one professor calling it the principal text in criminal law teaching. Whether in actual legislation, common law, or simply norms accepted by lawyers and judges, the MPC has become a standard part of the furniture of the criminal law.

---

>
> Francis X. Shen, et. al., Sorting Guilty Minds, 86 N.Y.U. L. REV. 1306, 1317–18 (2011) (internal quotations and footnote call numbers omitted).

[3] For example, if X pulls the trigger of a loaded gun with the goal of killing V, X acts "purposely" with respect to causing the death of V.

[4] For example, if X assaults V, a uniformed police officer, because of the victim's status as a police officer, X acts "purposely" with respect to assaulting a police officer.

[5] For example, if X throws a rock at V, consciously desiring to inflict bodily injury upon V, the fact that X's ulterior motive is to impress bystander Y with his assertive display of violence would not in any way preclude a finding that X purposely assaulted V. WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 1 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 5.2(d) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) ("It may be said that, so long as the defendant has the intention required by the definition of the crime, it is immaterial that he may also have had some other intention.") (citing, e.g., O'Neal v. United States, 240 F.2d 700 (10th Cir. 1957); United States v. Argueta-Rosales, 819 F.3d 1149 (9th Cir. 2016)).

[6] For example, if X throws a rock at V who is many hundreds of feet away, consciously desiring to inflict bodily injury upon V but also believing that there is no possibility that the rock will actually hit V, then X does not act purposely with respect to injuring V. See, e.g., Kenneth W. Simons, Statistical Knowledge Deconstructed, 92 B.U. L. REV. 1, 13 n.17 (2012); Larry Alexander, Insufficient Concern: A Unified Conception of Criminal Culpability, 88 CAL. L. REV. 931, 942-43 (2000).

[7] The reference both here and throughout RCC § 22E-206 is to whether "conduct" (in general) will cause a result, and not to whether "that person's conduct" (in particular) will cause a result. This is because, in some situations (e.g., accomplice liability), the defendant's culpable mental state will relate to the relationship between another person's conduct (e.g., the principal actor) and causing a prohibited result. See, e.g., RCC §§ 22E-210 & 211: Explanatory Notes.

[8] Consider the following situation: child rights advocate X blows up a manufacturing facility that relies upon child labor, which in turn causes the death of on-duty night guard V. On these facts, it can be said that X "knowingly" killed V so long as X was practically certain that V would die in the blast. This is so, moreover, although X would prefer that V not be injured in the blast.

element when that person is aware or believes that it is practically certain that the prohibited circumstance exists.[9]

The meaning of "knowingly" and "intentionally" are equivalent as to the subjective state of mind involved. There is, however, an important communicative distinction between these two terms: whereas the term knowledge implies a basic correspondence between a person's subjective belief concerning a proposition and the truth of that proposition, the term intent does not entail this correspondence and can be used when drafting legislation that does not require the result or circumstance to actually be proven to have occurred or existed The RCC provides this terminological alternative to knowledge to facilitate the clear drafting of inchoate offenses (e.g., theft, burglary, and attempt), the hallmark of which is the imposition of liability for unrealized criminal plans.[10] In practice, the RCC utilizes the term "intentionally" only in the formulation "with intent…" to express that the following result or circumstance need not be proven to actually have resulted or existed.[11]

---

[9] Consider the following situation: X purchases a car from Y on the black market, which was previously stolen from V. On these facts, it can be said that X "knowingly" buys stolen property so long as X was practically certain that the purchased car was previously stolen. This is so, moreover, although X would prefer that the car had not been stolen.

[10] See RCC § 22E-205(b): Explanatory Note (providing overview of general and specific inchoate crimes). Given that the consummation of an actor's criminal plans is not necessary for the imposition of inchoate liability, it would be misleading to describe the core culpable mental state requirement for inchoate offenses as one of acting "with knowledge" that a result will occur or that a circumstance exists. See Alan C. Michaels, Acceptance: The Missing Mental State, 71 S. CAL. L. REV. 953, 1032 n.330 (1998) ("Knowledge would not be the proper way to describe this mental state, because it would be odd to describe the defendant as having knowledge of a result when the result does not in fact occur."). Use of the term knowledge suggests that the actor's beliefs must be accurate, and, therefore, that the requisite result and/or circumstance modified by the phrase "with knowledge" actually needs to occur or exist. A central feature of inchoate offenses, however, is that the requisite result and/or circumstance that comprise the core culpable mental state requirement need not actually occur or exist. E.g., Michael T. Cahill, Defining Inchoate Crime: An Incomplete Attempt, 9 OHIO ST. J. CRIM. L. 751, 759 (2012); Andrew Ashworth & Lucia Zedner, Prevention and Criminalization: Justifications and Limits, 15 NEW CRIM. L. REV. 542, 545 (2012). For this reason, the term intent, which does not imply the accuracy of the actor's beliefs, is more appropriate for use in the inchoate context.

To illustrate, consider a hypothetical theft offense that prohibits taking property "with knowledge of a deprivation." This language suggests that proof that the defendant's conduct actually resulted in a permanent deprivation is necessary for a conviction. But if, in contrast, that theft offense instead incorporated the culpable mental state of "with intent to deprive," then there would be no indication that consummation of the deprivation is necessary for a conviction. Likewise, a hypothetical receipt of stolen property offense phrased in terms of "possessing property with knowledge that it is stolen" suggests that the property must have actually been stolen to support a conviction. But if, in contrast, that offense was instead framed in terms of "possessing property with intent that it be stolen," then there would be no indication that the property must have been stolen to support a conviction.

As these examples illustrate, use of the phrase "with intent" will establish that: (1) a subjective belief concerning the likelihood that a given result will occur or that a circumstance exists will provide the basis for liability; (2) without creating the mistaken impression that the relevant result or circumstance modified by the phrase actually needs to occur or exist. See also RCC § 22E-205(b): Explanatory Note (discussing "with intent" in the context of the definition of "culpable mental state").

[11] RCC § 22E-205(b) ("'Culpable mental state' means: (1) Purpose, knowledge, intent, recklessness, or negligence; and (2) The object of the phrases 'with intent' and 'with the purpose'.")

The critical distinction between purpose and knowledge/intent is the presence or absence of a positive desire.[12] Whereas the knowing/intentional actor is aware/believes that a result will occur or that a circumstance exists, the purposeful actor consciously desires to cause that result or that the circumstance exists.[13] To differentiate between these two kinds of culpability in practice, the factfinder may find it useful to consider the following counterfactual test: "Would the defendant regard [him or herself] as having failed if a particular result does not occur, or circumstance does not exist?"[14] An affirmative answer to this question is indicative of a purposeful actor.[15]

Subsection (c) provides a comprehensive definition of the term "recklessly," sensitive to the type of objective element to which the term applies. Under this definition, a person acts recklessly as to a result element when, inter alia, that person consciously disregards a substantial risk that conduct will cause the prohibited result.[16] Likewise, a person acts recklessly as to a circumstance element when, inter alia, that person consciously disregards a substantial risk that the prohibited circumstance exists.[17]

Subsection (d) provides a comprehensive definition of the term "negligently," sensitive to the kind of objective element to which the term applies. Under this definition, a person acts negligently as to a result element when, inter alia, that person fails to perceive a substantial risk that conduct will cause the prohibited result.[18] Likewise, a person acts

---

[12] This distinction rests on a simple but widely shared moral intuition: all else being equal, consciously desiring to cause a given harm is more blameworthy than being aware that it will almost surely result from one's conduct. See, e.g., Fiery Cushman, Liane Young & Marc Hauser*, The Role of Conscious Reasoning and Intuition in Moral Judgment*, 17 PSYCHOL. SCI. 1082 (2006); Matthew R. Ginther et. al., The Language of Mens Rea, 67 VAND. L. REV. 1327 (2014). In practice, however, this distinction "is inconsequential for most purposes of liability; acting knowingly is ordinarily sufficient." Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 234. Rather, it is only in "certain narrow classes of crimes" that the "heightened culpability" of purpose "has been thought to merit special attention" at the liability stage. United States v. Bailey, 444 U.S. 394, 405 (1980). This special attention is captured by the RCC definitions of accomplice, solicitation, and conspiracy, all of which require proof of purpose in order to establish threshold liability. See RCC §§ 22E-210(a) (accomplice liability), 302(a) (solicitation liability), and 303(a) (conspiracy liability).

[13] Note, however, that under RCC § 22E-206(e), proof of a higher culpable mental state will establish a lower one, and, therefore, the culpable mental states of knowledge and intent may be satisfied by proof of purpose. In practical effect, this means that a conscious desire constitutes an alternative to the belief states at issue in knowledge and intent.

[14] R.A. DUFF, CRIMINAL ATTEMPTS 17 (1996).

[15] The distinction between purpose and knowledge/intent might also be framed in terms of the difference between "will[ing] that the act . . . occur [and] willing to let it occur." Kathleen F. Brickey, The Rhetoric of Environmental Crime: Culpability, Discretion, and Structural Reform, 84 IOWA L. REV. 115, 122 (1998).

[16] For example, if X speeds through a red light aware that it is substantially possible that X will fatally hit V, a pedestrian stepping into the crosswalk, X acts "recklessly" with respect to causing the death of V (provided that X's conscious disregard of the risk is also a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct, see infra notes 22-33 and accompanying text). As the italicized language in this example illustrates, the RCC definition of recklessness as to a result requires proof that that defendant subjectively perceived both the risk and its substantiality.

[17] For example, if X purchases a stolen luxury car from Y for a fraction of its market value, aware that it is substantially possible that the car is stolen, X acts "recklessly" with respect to whether the property being purchased is stolen (provided that X's conscious disregard of the risk is also a gross deviation from the standard of conduct a reasonable individual would follow, see infra notes 22-33 and accompanying text). As the italicized language in this example illustrates, the RCC definition of recklessness as to a circumstance requires proof that that defendant subjectively perceived both the risk and its substantiality.

[18] For example, if X speeds through a red light unaware that it is substantially possible that X will fatally hit V, a pedestrian stepping into the crosswalk, X acts "negligently" with respect to causing the death of V negligently as to a circumstance element when, inter alia, that person fails to perceive a substantial risk that the prohibited circumstance exists.[19]

The RCC definitions of recklessness and negligence comprise non-intentional mental states, which extend liability to actors who disregard substantial risks of harm. Recklessness involves conscious risk-taking, and therefore resembles acting knowingly/intentionally, with one important distinction: the actor's requisite awareness of a risk need not rise to the level of a practical certainty. Rather, for recklessness, the risk consciously disregarded by the actor need only be perceived as substantial. Negligence, like recklessness, also involves the disregard of a substantial risk. For negligence, however, liability is assigned based upon the actor's failure to perceive that risk. In this sense, negligence constitutes an objective form of culpability (i.e. it does not require proof of a subjective desire or belief as to a result or circumstance element), which distinguishes it from every other subjective culpability term in the RCC hierarchy.[20]

The other essential component of the RCC definitions of recklessness and negligence is the gross deviation standard, which the second prong of each culpable mental state incorporates in nearly identical terms.[21] Pursuant to this standard, recklessness and negligence liability each entail proof that the person's risk-taking be gross deviations from the standard of conduct or standard of care that a reasonable individual would follow when viewed in light of the morally salient characteristics of that person's situation. The RCC definitions of recklessness and negligence describe those features as the "nature and degree" of the "risk" that has been disregarded, the "nature of and motivation for the person's conduct," and "the circumstances the person is aware of."[22]

This context-sensitive culpability analysis excludes a wide range of activities that involve justifiable risk-taking from falling within the scope of recklessness and negligence liability under the RCC. Risk-taking is a routine and often unavoidable aspect of life, which can be necessary to further important societal interests—as reflected in, for example, performing open-heart surgery, building a skyscraper, or operating an emergency response vehicle. Where a person's risk-taking is justifiable in this conventional sense,[23] that person

---

(provided that X's failure to perceive the risk is also a gross deviation from the standard of care a reasonable individual would follow, see infra notes 22-33 and accompanying text).

[19] For example, if X purchases a stolen luxury car from Y for a fraction of its market value, unaware that it is substantially possible that the car is stolen, X acts "negligently" with respect to whether the property being purchased is stolen (provided that X's failure to perceive the risk is also a gross deviation from the standard of care a reasonable individual would follow, see infra notes 22-33 and accompanying text).

[20] See, e.g., LAFAVE, supra note 5, at 1 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 5.1(c) (observing that negligence requires "objective fault in creating an unreasonable risk; but, since the actor need not realize the risk in order to be negligent, no subjective fault is required," as is the case with other culpability terms).

[21] In the context of recklessness liability, the focus is placed on the degree to which the actor's conscious disregard of a substantial risk deviated from the ordinary standard of conduct—whereas, in the context of negligence liability, the focus is placed on the degree to which the actor's failure to perceive a substantial risk deviated from the ordinary standard of care.

[22] RCC §§ 206(c)(1)(B) & (2)(B); RCC §§ 206(d)(1)(B) & (2)(B).

[23] That is, because the socially beneficial "nature of and motivation for" for the actor's conduct outweighs the "nature and degree" of the "risk" disregarded when considered in light of the circumstances the actor is aware of. See, e.g., Joshua Dressler, Does One Mens Rea Fit All?: Thoughts on Alexander's Unified Conception of Criminal Culpability, 88 CAL. L. REV. 955, 957 (2000) ("To determine justifiability . . . We determine the extent of harm risked by the conduct discounted by its likelihood of occurring and weigh that against the actor's motivation for the conduct (the perceived benefits, to the individual or others, accruing from the conduct) discounted by the probability that the risky behavior will satisfy the actor's goals.").

fails to manifest the "insensitivity to the interests of other people" which characterizes deviations from the ordinary standard of conduct or care,[24] and therefore would fail to satisfy the gross deviation standard governing the RCC definitions of recklessness and negligence.

Aside from justified risk-taking, this context-sensitive culpability analysis also excludes from recklessness and negligence liability those actors whose disregard of a risk is attributable to individual or situational factors beyond their control (and thus for which they cannot fairly be blamed).[25] Because punishment "represents the moral condemnation

---

This justifiability evaluation is largely objective. For example, in weighing the severity of the harm that might have resulted from the defendant's conduct against the extent to which the defendant's conduct might potentially have proven beneficial, the factfinder should consider the value that the community places upon particular types of activities, in contrast to the value that the defendant subjectively placed on them. Eric A. Johnson, Beyond Belief: Rethinking the Role of Belief in the Assessment of Culpability, 3 OHIO ST. J. CRIM. L. 503, 506 (2006); see, e.g., David M. Treiman, Recklessness and the Model Penal Code, 9 AM. J. CRIM. LAW 281, 334 (1981) ("To determine whether a risk is justifiable [the requisite] balance must be based on societal values, not the actor's personal gain").

That said, one aspect of the justifiability evaluation is subjective: the relevant probabilities must be assessed in light of the "circumstances the person is aware of." Specifically, in determining the likelihood of both the harm and potential societal benefit of the defendant's conduct, the factfinder must examine "the events and circumstances from the viewpoint of the defendant at the time the events occurred, without viewing the matter in hindsight." Williams v. State, 235 S.W.3d 742, 753 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007) (collecting cases in accord). And, in so doing, the factfinder is to exclude "mistaken beliefs—and mistaken estimates of the relevant probabilities—[from] the analysis." Eric A. Johnson, Mens Rea for Sexual Abuse: The Case for Defining the Acceptable Risk, 99 J. CRIM. L. & CRIMINOLOGY 1, 50 (2009) (discussing the phrase "circumstances known to the actor" as employed in the Model Penal Code definitions of recklessness and negligence, § 2.02(c)-(d)).

To illustrate how this justifiability evaluation operates in practice, consider the following hypothetical: X, a construction worker, causes the death of V, a pedestrian running on a sidewalk immediately adjacent to the construction site, in the course of using dynamite to demolish a pre-existing structure to make room for a new sports arena. X failed to perceive a risk that anyone outside the confines of the construction site would be injured by the blast. If X is subsequently prosecuted for negligent homicide, the justifiability of his conduct (and thus whether the clear blameworthiness requirement is met) entails a comparative assessment of: (1) the cost of fatal risks to the physical security of pedestrians; (2) the benefit of constructing a new sports arena; (3) the likelihood that X's conduct would result in death to a pedestrian; and (4) the likelihood that X's conduct would further the goal of constructing a new arena. The weighting of the first two (normative) factors is based solely on the community's values (e.g., it would be immaterial that X subjectively believed the creation of sports arenas to be the highest form of human achievement—or thought little of the physical security of pedestrians). The weighting of the latter two (probabilistic) factors, in contrast, is based on an evaluation of the circumstances that X was aware of at the time of the blast.

To illustrate how the weighting of the latter two factors occurs, suppose that at the moment of the blast, 10:00pm on January 1: (1) a nighttime New Year's charity run was occurring immediately adjacent to the construction site; while (2) the dynamite employed routinely sends scraps of material flying beyond the construction site's fencing. If X was aware of both of these facts, then the probability that harm would occur would be quite high. But if, in contrast, X was unaware of both of these facts, then the likelihood of harm—again, given X's perspective—might be quite low given the situation as X perceived it.

[24] United States v. Cordoba-Hincapie, 825 F. Supp. 485, 502 (E.D.N.Y. 1993) (quoting Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 243); see, e.g., David M. Treiman, Recklessness and the Model Penal Code, 9 AM. J. CRIM. LAW 281, 334 (1981) ("What makes the actor's conduct justifiable is a societal judgment that the behavior is not culpable because the balance of risks and benefits was made in a manner beneficial to society.").

[25] See, e.g., Cordoba-Hincapie, 825 F. Supp. at 502 ("[M]oral defects can [only] properly be imputed to instances where the defendant acts out of insensitivity to the interests of other people, and not merely out of an intellectual failure to grasp them.") (quoting Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 243); Williams v. State, 235 S.W.3d 742, 751 (Tex. Crim. App. 2007) (both recklessness and negligence depend "upon a morally of the community,"[26] the imposition of criminal liability can only be justified where a person's risk-taking fails to live up to the community's values—and, therefore, deserves to be condemned—under the circumstances.[27] What ultimately determines whether an actor's disregard of a risk blameworthy, then, is whether it reflects a level of concern or attention[28] for legally-protected interests that is lower than what a reasonable member of the community placed in the defendant's situation could be expected to exercise.[29] Where, in contrast, an actor's risk-taking does manifest a reasonable level of concern or attention for those legally protected interests, and his or her conduct is instead attributable to excusing influences[30]—for example, intellectual deficiencies, physical impairments, blameworthy failure to appreciate a substantial and unjustifiable risk"); SAMUEL PILLSBURY, JUDGING EVIL 171-172 (2012) ("Where the accused did not perceive the risks involved at the time of his conduct, culpability rests on a judgment about why the person failed to perceive. Did the failure stem from a culpable lack of concern for the victim, or should we attribute it to other factors for which the individual should not be blamed?"); Model Penal Code § 210.3, cmt. at 62 ("[I]t would be morally obtuse to appraise a crime . . . without reference to these factors").

---

[26] Ruffin v. United States, 76 A.3d 845, 859 (D.C. 2013) (quoting United States v. Bass, 404 U.S. 336, 348 (1971)); see, e.g., Sanford H. Kadish, Excusing Crime, 75 CALIF. L. REV. 257, 264 (1987) ("To blame a person is to express a moral criticism, and if the person's action does not deserve criticism, blaming him is a kind of falsehood").

[27] See, e.g., Westen, supra note 1, at 151 ("To publicly blame a person is to . . . adjudge that, rather than being motivated in his conduct by proper regard for interests that the law seeks to safeguard, the person placed insufficient value on those interests."); Gideon Yaffe, Intoxication, Recklessness, and Negligence, 9 OHIO ST. J. CRIM. L. 545, 553 (2012) ("[T]he mental states of recklessness and negligence constitute culpability, are morally significant, and contribute to the morally objectionable nature of the agent's act, thanks to what they indicate about the agent's attitude towards the legally protected interests of other people."); cf. Joshua Kleinfeld et. al., White Paper of Democratic Criminal Justice, 111 NW. U. L. REV. 1693, 1703 (2017) (proof of "moral blameworthiness" should be required for all crimes).

[28] As in the case of negligence, where the person has failed to perceive the relevant risk. See, e.g., Stephen P. Garvey, Authority, Ignorance, and the Guilty Mind, 67 SMU L. REV. 545, 575 (2014) ("[A]n actor should be regarded as negligent if his failure to perceive a risk he is creating or imposing results from indifference to the well-being of others, or in other words, if he would have perceived a risk he was creating or imposing had he not been indifferent to the well-being of others."); Kenneth W. Simons, Culpability and Retributive Theory: The Problem of Criminal Negligence, 5 J. CONTEMP. LEGAL ISSUES 365, 388 (1994).

[29] In this sense, reasonableness is not a statistical measure asking the factfinder to identify what the "average" person would have done. Rather, it is an evaluative standard, which requires the factfinder to consider what a person with both (1) the defendant's limitations and shortcomings and (2) "the correct degree of care for the interests and welfare of others" would have done under the circumstances. Douglas Husak, Negligence, Belief, Blame and Criminal Liability: The Special Case of Forgetting, 5 CRIM. L. & PHIL. 199, 206 (2011) ("[T]he reasonable person has all of the physical and psychological attributes of the particular defendant with one important exception: the reasonable person has an appropriate degree of concern for others."); see, e.g., Westen, supra note 1, at 151 (Insofar as culpability is concerned, the relevant question to ask about reasonableness is: "What would a person, who otherwise possessed every trait of the actor but fully respected the interests that the statute at hand seeks to protect, have thought and/or felt on the occasion at issue?"); Model Penal Code § 210.3 cmt. at 63 ("[I]t is clear that personal handicaps and some external circumstances must be taken into account" (e.g., "blindness, shock from traumatic injury, and extreme grief") to determine what the reasonable would have done); compare id. at 64 ("[I]t is equally plain that idiosyncratic moral values" need not be considered: "An assassin who kills a political leader because he believes it is right to do so cannot ask that he be judged by the standard of a reasonable extremist. Any other result would undermine the normative message of the criminal law.").

[30] Importantly, these influences do not need to rise to the level of a complete excuse defense to be relevant to—or ultimately preclude a showing of—the clear blameworthiness standard. To take just one example, consider the situation of sorority pledge, X, who is confronted by abusive sorority sister, Y, with the choice of either: (1) dropping a rock off the sorority's one-story balcony, thereby risking significant bodily injury to immaturity, extreme emotional or mental disturbances, or external coercion[31]—then that person would likewise fail to satisfy the gross deviation standard governing the RCC definitions of recklessness and negligence.[32]

To illustrate how this situation-specific culpability analysis operates in practice, consider the situation of a driver who turns into an intersection, consciously disregarding a substantial risk that she will hit an unoccupied trailer attached to a construction vehicle that is adjacent to her. If the driver ends up destroying the trailer, her unreasonable operation of her motor vehicle will almost surely subject her to civil liability. But whether her conscious disregard of a substantial risk will subject her to criminal liability under the RCC requires further analysis as to whether her conduct constituted a gross deviation from the standard of conduct a reasonable person would follow, which accounts for the "nature and degree" of that risk, the "nature of and motivation for" her conduct, and the "circumstances [she] is aware of."

For example, in a recklessness-based prosecution for second-degree criminal damage to property,[33] the driver's liability would hinge upon three main considerations evaluated by the factfinder in light of the driver's perception of events. The first is the severity of the risk of property damage consciously disregarded by the driver.[34] The second is the extent to which the driver's decision to enter the intersection was intended to further legitimate societal objectives.[35] And the third are any individual or situational factors beyond the driver's control that reasonably hindered her ability to exercise an adequate level of concern for the unoccupied trailer owner's property rights.[36] All else being equal, pedestrian Z, below; or (2) immediately be punched in the face by Y. Assume that X opts to avoid the threatened assault by dropping the rock off the balcony, but that the rock causes significant bodily injury to Z. If X is thereafter prosecuted for reckless assault of Z, she would be unable to raise a "duress defense (sometimes called compulsion or coercion) to the crime in question" because it only applies where a threat of "imminent death or serious bodily injury" is issued (whereas, in contrast, Y's threat only entailed significant bodily injury). LAFAVE, supra note 5, at 1 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 6.8. While falling short of a complete excuse defense, however, the external coercion that X experienced would be relevant to assessing—and indeed, suggests that X likely lacks—the clear blameworthiness required by the RCC definition of recklessness.

---

[31] This non-exclusive list of factors is consistent with the kind of "[f]acts normally considered excusing in the criminal law." E.g., Anders Kaye, Excuses in Exile, 48 U. MICH. J.L. REFORM 437, 442 (2015) (listing as relevant "the offender's infancy, subnormal intelligence, legal insanity, intoxication, diminished capacity, duress, entrapment, and even provocation.") (collecting authorities); see also Carissa Byrne Hessick & Douglas A. Berman, Towards A Theory of Mitigation, 96 B.U. L. Rev. 161, 188 (2016) (noting that mitigation for partial or imperfect excuses is generally well established in American criminal justice policy).

[32] Whether excusing influences mitigate blame in this way is a matter of degree, contingent upon the comparative influence of individual or situational factors beyond that person's control under the circumstances.

[33] RCC § 22E-2503 ("Recklessly damages or destroys property and, in fact, the amount of damage is $25,000 or more.").

[34] That is, the "nature and degree of the risk."

[35] That is, the "motivation" of the actor's conduct." It would be relevant, for example, that the driver acted with a reasonable (even if mistaken) belief that entering the intersection would avoid a more harmful crash with an oncoming school bus or get a passenger suffering from what appeared to be a heart attack to the hospital as expeditiously as possible.

[36] That is, the "nature" of the actor's conduct. Illustrative examples of relevant factors would include: (1) an extreme emotional disturbance stemming from recent news that the driver's child was just killed in a school shooting; (2) external coercion created by a passenger who instructed the driver to step on the gas or else risk being physically beaten at the end of the trip; or (3) impairments of judgment attributable to (i) the early the greater the value assigned to the first consideration, and the lower the value assigned to the second and third considerations, the more likely it is that the gross deviation standard incorporated into the RCC definition of recklessness has been met.

The analysis required to determine whether an actor's failure to perceive a substantial risk meets the gross deviation standard incorporated into the RCC definition of negligence is nearly identical. To illustrate, consider a slightly different hypothetical: a driver turns into the intersection with her eyes fixed on her rearview mirror, failing to perceive the substantial risk that she will (and does) fatally hit a bicyclist who is adjacent to her. If the driver is thereafter prosecuted for negligent homicide,[37] the driver's guilt would again depend upon three main considerations evaluated by the factfinder in light of the driver's perception of events. The first is the severity of the risk of death that the driver should have been aware of under the circumstances.[38] The second is the extent to which the driver's decision to enter the intersection (without looking rightward) was intended to further legitimate societal objectives.[39] And the third are any individual or situational factors beyond the driver's control that reasonably hindered her ability to exercise an adequate level of attention to the bicyclist's physical safety.[40] Here again it can be said that, all else being equal, the greater the value assigned to the first consideration, and the lower the value assigned to the second and third considerations, the more likely it is that the gross deviation standard incorporated into the RCC definition of negligence has been met.

Subsection (e) states that proof of a higher culpable mental state will always establish a lesser culpable mental state. This establishes that: (1) negligence can be satisfied by proof of recklessness, intent, knowledge, or purpose; (2) recklessness can be satisfied by proof of intent, knowledge or purpose; (3) knowledge or intent can be satisfied by proof of purpose. These rules are a product of the view that, all else being equal, purpose is more culpable than knowledge/intent, which is more culpable than recklessness, which is more culpable than negligence. In practical effect, these rules dictate that the legislature need not state alternative mental states in the definition of an offense; rather, a statement of the lowest culpable mental state sufficient to establish a given objective element is sufficient.

---

stages of a heart attack, (ii) the unexpected side effects of a non-narcotic medication prescribed by a physician, or (iii) the foreseeable side effects of a narcotic that had been placed in the driver's beverage without her knowledge or consent.

[37] RCC § 22A-1103(a) ("A person commits negligent homicide when that person negligently causes the death of another person.").

[38] That is, the "nature and degree of the risk."

[39] That is, the "purpose" of the actor's conduct." It would be relevant, for example, that the driver's gaze was fixed on her rearview mirror because it appeared as though a runaway truck was barreling towards her, or because the driver's small child—seated in the backseat—appeared to be choking on a small toy, which could be fatal unless immediately removed.

[40] That is, the "nature" of the actor's conduct. Illustrative examples of relevant factors would include: (1) an extreme emotional disturbance stemming from a recent near-fatal accident the driver had suffered by a runaway truck; (2) external coercion created by a passenger who has instructed the driver to keep her eyes on the rearview mirror, or else be physically beaten at the end of the trip; or (3) impairments of judgment attributable to (i) the early stages of a heart attack, (ii) the unexpected side effects of a non-narcotic medication prescribed by a physician, or (iii) the foreseeable side effects of a narcotic that had been placed in the driver's beverage without her knowledge or consent.

Subsection (f) establishes that the culpable mental states defined in section 206 are to be afforded the same meaning when used in other parts of speech. This principle of construction is necessary to avoid any confusion that might otherwise result from the following conflict: although subsections (a)-(d) define the culpable mental states of "purposely," "knowingly," "intentionally," "recklessly," and "negligently," the RCC routinely employs these same terms in different parts of speech (e.g., "purpose," "knowledge" "intent," "recklessness," and "negligent") in both statutory text and accompanying commentary. Pursuant to subsection (f), these grammatical differences in the articulation of culpability terms do not have any substantive import for the interpretation and application of RCC statutes and commentary.

Subsection (g) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. RCC § 22E-206 codifies, clarifies, fill in gaps, changes, and enhances the proportionality of the District law governing culpable mental state evaluations. The District's current approach to dealing with culpable mental states evaluations is an amalgamation of statutory and decisional law, which is often unclear, frequently inconsistent, and almost always piecemeal. In contrast, the culpable mental state definitions and hierarchy incorporated into Section 206 establishes a clear and comprehensive legislative framework for specifying the state of mind necessary to establish liability for every criminal offense in the RCC.

On a legislative level, the standard District approach to drafting the culpable mental state requirement governing an offense is to generally state one,[41] or sometimes more (e.g., two,[42] three,[43] or even four[44]), undefined culpability terms at the beginning of an offense definition. Some of these undefined terms reflect the contemporary culpability concepts of purpose, knowledge, intent, recklessness, and negligence.[45] However, many of the District's older statutes employ more outdated (and particularly ambiguous) culpability terms, such as "maliciously,[46] "willfully,"[47] "wanton[ly],"[48] "reckless indifference,"[49] and "having reason to believe."[50] In other instances, the District's criminal statutes enumerate no culpable mental state at all, such that courts must read one in pursuant to common law interpretive principles.[51]

The legislative vagueness resulting from these drafting practices has the practical effect of delegating a portion of the D.C. Council's lawmaking authority—namely, its authority to make criminal justice policy by specifying the culpability required for an offense—to the District's local judiciary.[52] Yet the manner in which the District's local

[41] E.g., D.C. Code § 22-303; D.C. Code § 22-3318; D.C. Code § 22-3309.
[42] E.g., D.C. Code § 22-404.01; D.C. Code § 22-3312.01.
[43] E.g., D.C. Code § 22-404; D.C. Code § 22-1101.
[44] D.C. Code § 5-1307.
[45] E.g., D.C. Code § 22-404.01; D.C. Code § 22-404; D.C. Code § 22-1101; D.C. Code § 5-1307.
[46] E.g., D.C. Code § 22-303; D.C. Code § 22-3318.
[47] E.g., D.C. Code § 22-934; D.C. Code § 22-3312.01.
[48] E.g., D.C. Code § 22-934; D.C. Code § 22-3312.01.
[49] E.g., D.C. Code § 22-934; D.C. Code § 22-404.01.
[50] E.g., D.C. Code § 22-723; D.C. Code § 22-3214.
[51] These include assault, D.C. Code § 22-404, murder, D.C. Code § 22-2101, manslaughter, D.C. Code § 22-2105, mayhem, D.C. Code § 22-406, affrays, D.C. Code § 22-1301, and threats, D.C. Code § 22-407.
[52] That is, courts must apply criminal statutes to individual cases, so when a local District prosecution calls into question a mens rea issue left unresolved by a criminal statute, the judges on the D.C. Superior Court and D.C. Court of Appeals have no choice but to exercise the traditionally legislative function of culpability judiciary has carried out this delegation has been and continues to be problematic. Apart from the challenge to democratic representation that arises when unelected officials determine what the law should be (a fact well-recognized by the judiciary[53]), the judges who sit on the D.C. Superior Court and D.C. Court of Appeals have struggled to develop a body of culpability policies that are clear, consistent, or comprehensive.[54] The voluminous appellate case law surrounding the culpable mental states governing some of the District's most routinely charged offenses—for example, threats[55] and simple assault[56]—and foundational theories of liability—for example, criminal attempts[57] and complicity[58]—is illustrative. Notwithstanding decades of decisional law, the culpable mental state requirements governing these offenses and theories of liability are still ambiguous and the subject of significant dispute.[59] Which, in practice, means that some of the most basic and fundamental culpability policy questions in the District remain unresolved.

---

definition and fill in the resulting gap through the process of common law decision-making. See, e.g., Dan M. Kahan, Is Chevron Relevant to Federal Criminal Law?, 110 HARV. L. REV. 469 (1996); RONALD DWORKIN, TAKING RIGHTS SERIOUSLY 31 (1977) (noting that legal discretion "is like the hole of a doughnut": it "does not exist except as an area left open by a surrounding belt of restriction.") In some cases, legislative history may guide the courts in their exercise of this authority; however, oftentimes the ambiguities will be so large and/or legislative intent so inscrutable, that judicial lawmaking is inevitable.

[53] Ruffin v. United States, 76 A.3d 845, 859 (D.C. 2013) (quoting United States v. Bass, 404 U.S. 336, 348 (1971)); ("Because of the seriousness of criminal penalties, and because criminal punishment usually represents the moral condemnation of the community, legislatures and not courts should define crimes.").

[54] See also Kahan, supra note 54, at 470 ("[J]udges frequently lack sufficient consensus to make the law uniform . . . ."); id. at 495 ("Frequent disagreements are inevitable when [many] judges . . . are all independently empowered to identify the best readings of ambiguous criminal statutes."); United States v. Harriss, 347 U.S. 612, 635 (1954) (noting that appellate courts can always change an interpretation of a criminal statute).

[55] D.C. Code § 22-407 ("Whoever is convicted in the District of threats to do bodily harm shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not more than 6 months, or both, and, in addition thereto, or in lieu thereof, may be required to give bond to keep the peace for a period not exceeding 1 year."); D.C. Code § 22-1810 ("Whoever threatens within the District of Columbia to kidnap any person or to injure the person of another or physically damage the property of any person or of another person, in whole or in part, shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not more than 20 years, or both.").

[56] See D.C. Code § 22-404(2) ("Whoever unlawfully assaults, or threatens another in a menacing manner, and intentionally, knowingly, or recklessly causes significant bodily injury to another shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or be imprisoned not more than 3 years, or both.").

[57] D.C. Code § 22-1803 ("Whoever shall attempt to commit any crime, which attempt is not otherwise made punishable by chapter 19 of An Act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901 (31 Stat. 1321), shall be punished . . . .").

[58] D.C. Code § 22-1805 ("In prosecutions for any criminal offense all persons advising, inciting, or conniving at the offense, or aiding or abetting the principal offender, shall be charged as principals and not as accessories, the intent of this section being that as to all accessories before the fact the law heretofore applicable in cases of misdemeanor only shall apply to all crimes, whatever the punishment may be.").

[59] For a summary of the confusion surrounding the mens rea of threats, see Judge Schwelb's dissent in Carrell v. United States, 80 A.3d 163, 171 (D.C. 2013), reh'g en banc granted, opinion vacated, No. 12-CM-523, 2015 WL 5725539 (D.C. June 15, 2015), and on reh'g en banc, 165 A.3d 314 (D.C. 2017). For a summary of the confusion surrounding the mens rea of assault, see Judge Ruiz's concurrence in Buchanan v. United States, 32 A.3d 990, 1002 (D.C. 2011). For a summary of the confusion surrounding the mens rea of attempt, see Judge Beckwith's concurrence in Jones v. United States, 124 A.3d 127, 128 (D.C. 2015). And for a summary of the confusion surrounding the mens rea of complicity, see Wilson-Bey v. United States, 903 A.2d 818 (D.C. 2006) (en banc).

What explains this state of affairs? To some extent, it's a product of the fact that older DCCA opinions, to which subsequent courts are bound, rely upon the confusing common law approach to culpability, offense analysis. Such an approach is—as the DCCA's recent opinions in Buchanan,[60] Ortberg,[61] and Jones[62] helpfully illustrate—a notoriously unreliable means of articulating the culpable mental state requirement governing an offense. At the same time, however, it also reflects the limitations inherent in the common law method of policymaking. Because any court is limited by the facts before it, even a definitive element analysis-based resolution of a culpable mental state issue (e.g., the DCCA's recent en banc opinions in Wilson-Bey[63] and Carrell[64]) can only accomplish so much. And, in any event, relying on multiple rounds of appellate litigation to define the culpable mental state requirement governing individual criminal offenses is a highly inefficient means of making basic and fundamental policy decisions.

To resolve these issues, the RCC incorporates a culpable mental state hierarchy comprised of four mental levels—purposely, knowingly/intentionally, recklessly, and negligently—comprehensively defined in a manner sensitive to the form of objective element to which they apply. As a matter of substantive culpability policy, this hierarchy largely captures the central mental state concepts reflected in current District law, while improving their overall level of clarity and filling in important gaps in mental state definition in a proportionate manner. By codifying this hierarchy, the RCC provides the D.C. Council with a critical tool for clearly and comprehensively stating the culpable mental state requirement governing each and every criminal offense by statute, thereby ameliorating the need for the District's judiciary to promulgate culpability policy through common law decision-making.[65]

---

[60] Buchanan, 32 A.3d at 1002 (Ruiz, J. concurring) ("There is no opportunity better than the present to reiterate the dubious value of rote incantations of the traditional labels of 'general' and 'specific' intent to the different mens rea elements of a wide array of criminal offenses.").

[61] Ortberg v. United States 81 A.3d 303, 307 (D.C. 2013) (recognizing that the problem with "general intent" and "specific intent" is that they "fail to distinguish between elements of the crime, to which different mental states may apply," whereas a "clear analysis" faces the "question of the kind of culpability required to establish the commission of an offense [] separately with respect to each material element of the crime") (citations, quotations, and alterations omitted).

[62] Jones v. United States, 124 A.3d 127, 130 n.3 (D.C. 2015) (instead of offense analysis, "courts and legislatures" should, wherever possible, "simply make clear what mental state (for example, strict liability, negligence, recklessness, knowledge, or purpose) is required for whatever material element is at issue (for example, conduct, resulting harm, or an attendant circumstance)."

[63] Compare, e.g., Wilson-Bey v. United States, 903 A.2d 818, 831 (D.C. 2006) (en banc) (clarifying the mens rea of complicity) with Tann v. United States, 127 A.3d 400 (D.C. 2015) (majority and dissenting opinions debating the meaning of Wilson-Bey).

[64] Compare Carrell v. United States, 165 A.3d 314, 324 (D.C. 2017) (en banc) ("Applying this hierarchy of mens rea levels to the actus reus result element of the crime of threats, we hold that the government may carry its burden of proof by establishing that the defendant acted with the purpose to threaten or with knowledge that his words would be perceived as a threat.") with id. ("[D]eclin[ing] to decide whether a lesser threshold mens rea for the second element of the crime of threats—recklessness—would suffice," and "defer[ing] resolution of this issue for multiple reasons . . . .").

[65] By enhancing the clarity, consistency, and comprehensiveness of the District's criminal statutes in this way, RCC § 22E-206 will almost certainly provide "substantially improved analytical tools for practicing lawyers and courts to use in understanding what must be proven by the prosecution [] beyond a reasonable doubt." Dannye Holley, The Influence of the Model Penal Code's Culpability Provisions on State Legislatures: A Study of Lost Opportunities, Including Abolishing the Mistake of Fact Doctrine, 27 SW. U. L. REV. 229, 232 (1997). In so doing, however, RCC § 22E-206 should also "increase the simplicity" of the RCC §§ 22E-206(a) and (b): Relation to Current District Law on Purpose, Knowledge, and Intent. Subsections (a) and (b) codify, clarify, and fill gaps in District law.

The culpable mental states of "purpose," "knowledge," and "intent" appear in a variety of District statutes; however, virtually none of these statutes explicitly define them.[66] Nor, for that matter, has the DCCA clearly defined them. Based on DCCA case law, however, it is relatively clear that the desire and belief states reflected in the definitions set forth in subsections (a) and (b) will satisfy the requirement of a "specific intent," which is sufficient to establish liability for nearly all of the most serious offenses under District law.[67]

District authority relevant to subsections (a) and (b) revolves around DCCA case law on the "heightened mens rea" of a specific intent, which the statutory terms of purpose, knowledge, and/or intent frequently indicate.[68] At the same time, however, the DCCA has never clearly defined the meaning of the phrase "specific intent"—indeed, as one DCCA judge has observed, the phrase itself is little more than a "rote incantation[]" of "dubious value" which obscures "the different mens rea elements of a wide array of criminal offenses."[69] Ambiguities aside, however, it seems relatively clear from the relevant case law that proof of any of the desire or belief states reflected in subsections (a) and (b) as to a result or circumstance element should satisfy the requirement of a "specific intent," and, therefore, provide an adequate basis for capturing the culpable mental states applicable to relevant District offenses.

That one who consciously desires to cause a result or that a circumstance exists necessarily acts with the requisite "specific intent" is implicit in the fact that this kind of "purposive attitude" is, as the DCCA has recognized, the most culpable of mental states, sufficient to ground a conviction for accomplice liability.[70] This point has also been made more explicitly in the context of the District's enhanced assault offenses. With respect to assault with intent to kill, for example, the court in Logan v. United States observed that "[a] specific intent to kill exists when a person acts with the purpose . . . of causing the District's criminal law, afford the District's residents a greater level of "fair notice," and "reduce litigation by reducing ambiguities in offense definitions." Robinson & Grall, supra note 2, at 704.

---

[66] E.g., D.C. Code § 22-404.01; D.C. Code § 22-1101; D.C. Code § 5-1307. But see D.C. Code § 22-2201(B) ("'[K]nowingly' means having general knowledge of, or reason to know, or a belief or ground for belief which warrants further inspection or inquiry of, the character and content of any article, thing, device, performance, or representation described in paragraph (1) of this subsection which is reasonably susceptible of examination."); D.C. Code § 22-3101 ("'Knowingly' means having general knowledge of, or reason to know or a belief or ground for belief which warrants further inspection or inquiry, or both."); but see also D.C. Code § 22-3225.01 ("'Malice' means an intentional or deliberate infliction of injury, by furnishing or disclosing information with knowledge that the information is false, or furnishing or disclosing information with reckless disregard for a strong likelihood that the information is false and that injury will occur as a result.").

[67] This is not to say, however, that the element-sensitive definition of the term intent in RCC § 22E-206(b) is the equivalent of the term intent as utilized in the phrase "specific intent" (or, for that matter, "general intent").

[68] See, e.g., Perry v. United States, 36 A.3d 799 (D.C. 2011).

[69] Buchanan v. United States, 32 A.3d 990, 1000 (D.C. 2011) (Ruiz, J. concurring).

[70] See, e.g., Wilson-Bey v. United States, 903 A.2d 818, 833-34 (D.C. 2006) (en banc).

death of another,"[71] which in turn seems to entail a desire.[72] Likewise, with respect to assault with intent to rape, the court in United States v. Huff observed that the government must present proof of "an intent to persist in [sexually assaultive] force even in the face of and for the purpose of overcoming the victim's resistance."[73]

It's important to note that District law on the specific intent requirement seems to include more than just purposeful conduct, however. In Logan, for example, the DCCA notes that where the accused possesses the "conscious intention of causing the death of another," he or she also possesses the "specific intent" to kill.[74] Although the court never clarifies what this "conscious intention" entails, the court later equates the mens rea of "a specific intent to kill" with "actually . . . fores[eeing] that death [will] result from [one's] act."[75]

Other DCCA case law concerning "specific intent" also supports that it is satisfied by proof of knowledge. For example, in Peoples v. United States, the DCCA sustained various convictions for malicious disfigurement in a case where "the evidence disclosed that appellant deliberately set fire to [a home], using a flammable liquid accelerant, in the early morning hours while those inside were sleeping."[76] The court deemed it "reasonable to infer that appellant knew that the people inside the house would sustain grievous burn injuries if they escaped alive," circumstances which "evidence[d] appellant's intent sufficiently to permit the jury to find that appellant had the requisite specific intent to support his convictions of malicious disfigurement."[77]

Similarly, in Curtis v. United States, the court upheld a malicious disfigurement conviction where the accused had "brandish[ed] a bottle of draining fluid, and hurled its contents down in his direction, dousing him on the neck and soaking his shirt."[78] Both the court and counsel for the accused deemed it obvious that if "appellant was aware that the particular fluid would cause harmful burns to human skin, proof of specific intent to

---

[71] Logan v. United States, 483 A.2d 664, 671 (D.C. 1984).

[72] As the DCCA later observed in Arthur v. United States:

> The government did have to prove that Arthur had a specific intent to kill . . . There was, however, ample evidence of that intent, both in his behavior and in the comment, "I hope she's dead," which he made (twice) when he first started to leave the room before discovering that his victim was still alive.

602 A.2d 174, 179 n.7 (D.C. 1992).

[73] 442 F.2d 885, 890 (D.C. Cir. 1971).

[74] 483 A.2d at 671.

[75] Id. (quoting United States v. Wharton, 433 F.2d 451, 456 (D.C. Cir. 1970)). For example, the Logan court's recognition that "[a] specific intent to kill exists when a person acts with the . . . conscious intention of causing [a particular result]" relies upon LaFave's Substantive Criminal Law treatise. See Logan, 483 A.2d at 671. However, that same treatise clarifies that "a person who acts (or omits to act) intends a result of his act (or omission) under two quite different circumstances: (1) when he consciously desires that result, whatever the likelihood of that result happening from his conduct; and (2) when he knows that that result is practically certain to follow from his conduct, whatever his desire may be as to that result." LAFAVE, supra note 5, at 1 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 5.2.

[76] 640 A.2d 1047, 1055-56 (D.C. 1994).

[77] Id.

[78] 568 A.2d 1074, 1075 (D.C. 1990).

disfigure the person at whom it was thrown [would exist]"—the only question was whether the accused indeed possessed this awareness. [79]

Another noteworthy aspect of DCCA case law is the recognition that a common indicator of a specific intent requirement—use of the phrase "with intent"—is also the marker of "an inchoate offense," which "can occur without completion of the objective."[80] So, for example, with respect to the crime of assault with intent to kill, "the government is not required to show that the accused actually wounded the victim" in order to prove that an assault was committed with the intent to kill.[81] The same is also true with respect to "[p]ossession of narcotics with intent to distribute them," which does not require proof that "the objective" of distribution was completed.[82] And it is likewise true with respect to "burglary," which merely requires proof that the unlawful entry was "accompanied by an intent to steal once therein"—without regard to whether "the intended theft [was] consummated."[83]

The corollary to this general recognition is that a person need not be "aware" of a circumstance to establish the specific intent requirement at issue in various inchoate crimes; instead, a mere "belief" can suffice. So, for example, the DCCA held in Seeney v. United States that a person acts with the "intent to commit the crime of attempted possession of a controlled substance" when that person "believes" he or she is dealing with a controlled substance.[84] Which is to say, as the DCCA further clarified in Fields v. United States, that proof of "the defendant's belief that he was dealing in controlled substances," rather than proof that the person was aware that the substances implicated are in fact controlled substances, will suffice to establish an attempt conviction.[85]

It's important to qualify the above analysis with a two-fold acknowledgement that: (1) the correspondence between the culpable mental states of purpose, knowledge, and intent as defined in subsections (a) and (b) and what is labeled a specific intent offense in District law is not absolute; and, therefore (2) a simple translation from current District case law to these RCC culpable mental states simply is not possible. To take just one example, consider that there exists both DCCA and U.S. Supreme Court precedent indicating that the culpable mental state of knowledge is actually most akin to a "general intent" standard. The DCCA's recent en banc decision in Carrell v. United States (2017) is illustrative. In one of the District's strongest statements to date regarding the need for mens rea modernization, seven of the DCCA's appellate judges specifically adopted both

---

[79] Id.

[80] Owens v. United States, 688 A.2d 399, 403 (D.C. 1996); see, e.g., United States v. Fox, 433 F.2d 1235, 1236 (D.C. Cir. 1970); McKinnon v. United States, 644 A.2d 438, 442 (D.C. 1994); Monroe v. United States, 598 A.2d 439, 442 (D.C. 1991); *Warrick v. United Stat*es, 528 A.2d 438, 442 (D.C. 1987); Cash v. United States, 700 A.2d 1208, 1212 (D.C. 1997); Hebron v. United States, 804 A.2d 270, 273–74 (D.C. 2002); Price v. United States, 985 A.2d 434, 437 (D.C. 2009).

[81] Nixon v. United States, 730 A.2d 145, 148-49 (D.C. 1999). For this reason, "a lethal intent can be demonstrated without showing that the assailant succeeded in wounding his intended victim." Bedney v. United States, 471 A.2d 1022, 1024 (D.C. 1984). Likewise, with respect to the offense of assault with intent to rob, the DCCA has held that a defendant who, after searching the victim at gunpoint, leaves the victim with his valuables can still have the requisite specific intent. See Dowtin v. United States, 330 A.2d 749, 750 (D.C. 1975).

[82] Owens, 688 A.2d at 403.

[83] United States v. Fox, 433 F.2d 1235, 1236 (D.C. Cir. 1970).

[84] 563 A.2d 1081, 1082 (D.C. 1989) (citing Blackledge v. United States, 447 A.2d 46, 48 (D.C. 1982)).

[85] 952 A.2d 859, 865 (D.C. 2008).

the element analysis framework[86] and accompanying culpable mental state definitions[87] of purpose and knowledge developed by the Model Penal Code (and subsequently endorsed by the U.S. Supreme Court) in resolving an ongoing conflict surrounding the culpability of criminal threats.[88] In so doing, however, the majority opinion—citing to U.S. Supreme Court case law—also indicated that knowledge may at least "loosely" correspond to a general intent standard.[89] The lack of an easy translation from the old offense analysis categories of general and specific intent to the Model Penal Code framework recognized by the DCCA only bolsters the need for legislative specification of new culpable mental states.

The definitions of purpose, knowledge, and intent contained in subsections (a) and (b) provide the possibility of maintaining the culpable mental state distinctions reflected in the foregoing authorities, while also affording greater clarity and specificity to District law. Practically, these new definitions may also provide a possible means of simplifying District law, particularly in the context of inchoate offenses.

Illustrative is the District's receiving stolen property (RSP) statute, which currently employs a confusing and cumbersome approach to communicating that defendants caught in sting operations fall within the scope of the statute.[90] Specifically, the RSP statute allows for a conviction to rest upon proof that the person "knew" or had "reason to believe" he or she was possessing "stolen property."[91] Thereafter, the statute clarifies "that the term 'stolen property' includes property that is not in fact stolen,"[92] and that "[i]t shall not be a

---

[86] Carrell v. United States, 165 A.3d 314, 320 n.13 (D.C. 2017) (en banc) ("We adopt these ["conduct element," "result element," and "circumstance element"] classifications from the Model Penal Code § 1.13 (9) (Am. Law Inst., Proposed Official Draft 1962).")

[87] Id. at 323-24 ("Following the lead of the Supreme Court . . . we likewise conclude that more precise gradations of mens rea should be employed. We have previously expressed concern about the use of 'general' and 'specific' intent. We reiterate our endorsement of more particularized and standardized categorizations of mens rea, and, in the absence of a statutory scheme setting forth such categorizations, we, like the Supreme Court, look to the Model Penal Code terms and their definitions.")

[88] Id. at 324 ("Applying this hierarchy of mens rea levels to the actus reus result element of the crime of threats, we hold that the government may carry its burden of proof by establishing that the defendant acted with the purpose to threaten or with knowledge that his words would be perceived as a threat.").

[89] Carrell, 165 A.3d at 322 n.22 ("It is not entirely clear what the [Elonis] Court meant by this, but, read in the context of Carter, it appears the Court was distinguishing between "general intent" and "specific intent," [], which the Court had previously likened to "knowledge" and "purpose," respectively, Bailey, 444 U.S. at 405, 100 S.Ct. 624 ("In a general sense, 'purpose' corresponds loosely with the common-law concept of specific intent, while 'knowledge' corresponds loosely with the concept of general intent.")).")

[90] The District's trafficking in stolen property (TSP) statute reflects the same issues. That statute reads, in relevant part:

> (b) A person commits the offense of trafficking in stolen property if, on 2 or more separate occasions, that person traffics in stolen property, knowing or having reason to believe that the property has been stolen.
>
> (c) It shall not be a defense to a prosecution under this section, alone or in conjunction with § 22-1803, that the property was not in fact stolen, if the accused engages in conduct which would constitute the crime if the attendant circumstances were as the accused believed them to be.

D.C. Code § 22-3231.

[91] D.C. Code § 22-3232(a).

[92] D.C. Code § 22-3232(d).

defense . . . [that] the property was not in fact stolen, if the accused engages in conduct which would constitute the crime if the attendant circumstances were as the accused believed them to be."[93]

The foregoing provisions were collectively intended to make RSP an inchoate offense, applicable to actors who merely believe the property they possess to be stolen—even if the property isn't actually stolen.[94] To understand this much, however, one needs to read labyrinthine provisions of D.C. Code § 22-3232 in light of the statute's legislative history and applicable DCCA case law. Under the definition of intent as to a circumstance under subsection (b)(2), in contrast, the District's current multi-pronged approach can be replaced with a single clause communicating the relevant point, namely, that RSP involves receiving property "with intent that the property be stolen."[95]

RCC §§ 22E-206(c) and (c): Relation to Current District Law on Recklessness and Negligence. Subsections (c) and (d) codify, clarify, and fill gaps in District law.

The culpable mental states of "recklessness" and "negligence" appear in a variety of District statutes, though no statute defines either term.[96] In the absence of a statutory definition, other District authorities—namely, DCCA case law and the D.C. Criminal Jury Instructions—have provided interpretations of identical or comparable terms in a manner that is broadly consistent with RCC §§ 22E-206(c) and (d). That said, these provisions, when viewed in light of the accompanying explanatory note, provide substantially more detail than does existing District authority. This additional detail improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the RCC.

A central component of District law on recklessness is the District's cruelty to children statute, D.C. Code § 22-1101, which prohibits, inter alia, "recklessly . . . [m]altreat[ing] a child."[97] Notably, the statute does not define this key culpable mental [93] D.C. Code § 22-3232(b).

[94] See Owens v. United States, 90 A.3d 1118, 1121 (D.C. 2014). "[A]ctual knowledge," as the Council notes, is not required for an RSP conviction. D.C. COUNCIL, REPORT ON BILL 4–133 at 54 (Feb. 12, 1981). The same report also notes (with respect to the similarly worded TSP statute) that "it is intended that the offender's knowledge or belief may be inferred from the circumstances of the offense and it is not required that the offender know for a fact that the property is stolen. Rather, it is sufficient if the offender had 'reason to believe' that the property is stolen." Id. at 49.

[95] RCC § 22E-2401 (revised RSP statute, incorporating the phrase "with intent that the property be stolen").

[96] See, e.g., D.C. Code § 22-1101; D.C. Code § 22-404; D.C. Code § 5-1307.

[97] D.C. Code § 22-1101(b)(1). For earlier District authority on recklessness, see, for example, Thompson v. United States, 690 A.2d 479, 483 (D.C. 1997). For other District statutes employing a culpable mental state of recklessness, see, for example: D.C. Code § 22–404 (a)(2) (prescribing penalties for "[w]hoever unlawfully assaults, or threatens another in a menacing manner, and intentionally, knowingly, or recklessly causes significant bodily injury to another" (emphasis added)); D.C. Code § 22–1006.01 (a)(5) (establishing penalties to punish "any person who knowingly or recklessly permits [animal fighting] . . . to be done on any premises under his or her ownership or control, or who aids or abets that act" (emphasis added)); D.C. Code § 22–1833(1) (making it "unlawful for an individual or a business to recruit, entice, harbor, transport, provide, obtain, or maintain by any means a person, knowing, or in reckless disregard of the fact that . . . [c]oercion will be used or is being used to cause the person to provide labor or services or to engage in a commercial sex act" (emphasis added)); D.C. Code § 22–1834(a) (making it unlawful to recruit or maintain by any means a person "who will be caused as a result to engage in a commercial sex act knowing or in reckless disregard of the fact that the person has not attained the age of 18 years" (emphasis added)); D.C. Code § 22–1314.02(a) (making it generally unlawful for a person "to willfully or recklessly interfere with access to or from a medical facility or to willfully or recklessly disrupt the normal functioning of such facility," such as by "[t]hreatening to inflict injury on the owners, agents, patients, employees, or property of the medical facility" (emphasis state. In lieu of a statutory definition, the fourth edition of the D.C. Criminal Jury Instructions (1996) originally recommended that the term "recklessly" be interpreted in general accordance with the Model Penal Code's definition of recklessness.[98] Then, in Jones v. United States, the DCCA had the opportunity to address the issue, determining that the required recklessness could be satisfied by proof that the accused "was aware of and disregarded the grave risk of bodily harm created by his conduct"[99]—a definition the Jones court deemed generally consistent with the Model Penal Code definition of "recklessly."[100]

Building on the Jones decision, the DCCA, in Tarpeh v. United States, applied a similar understanding of recklessness to interpret the requirement of "reckless indifference" in the context of the District's Criminal Neglect of a Vulnerable Adult statute, D.C. Code § 22–934.[101] Observing that "Model Penal Code § 2.02(2)(c) [] states that a 'person acts recklessly with respect to a material element of an offense when he consciously disregards a substantial and unjustified risk that the material element exists or will result from his conduct,'" the Tarpeh court opted to "[a]pply th[e]se concepts to 'reckless indifference'" in a manner consistent with Jones.[102] Specifically, the DCCA held that "the trier of fact," to prove reckless indifference, "must show not only that the actor did not care about the consequences of his or her action, but also that the actor was consciously aware of the risks involved in light of known alternative courses of action."[103]

Most recently, Judge Thompson, writing separately in Carrell v. United States (2017),[104] advocated for adopting the Model Penal Code definition of recklessness as the threshold mens rea for the District's criminal threats offense(s).[105] In so doing, she observes that:

> "A person acts recklessly with respect to a material element of an offense when he consciously disregards a substantial and unjustifiable risk that the material element exists or will result from his conduct." Dorsey v. United added)); D.C. Code § 22–1321 (a)(1) (making it unlawful, "[i]n any place open to the general public, and in the communal areas of multi-unit housing, . . . for a person to . . . [i]ntentionally or recklessly act in such a manner as to cause another person to be in reasonable fear that a person . . . is likely to be harmed or taken" (emphasis added)); D.C. Code 22–2803 (a)(1) (providing that a person "commits the offense of carjacking if, by any means, that person knowingly or recklessly by force or violence, whether against resistance or by sudden or stealthy seizure or snatching, or by putting in fear, . . . shall take from another person immediate actual possession of a person's motor vehicle" (emphasis added)); D.C. Code § 22–3312.02 (a)(4) (making it unlawful to, inter alia, burn a cross or other religious symbol or to display a Nazi swastika or noose on any private premises "where it is probable that a reasonable person would perceive that the intent is . . . [t]o cause another person to fear for his or her personal safety, or where it is probable that reasonable persons will be put in fear for their personal safety by the defendant's actions, with reckless disregard for that probability" (emphasis added)).

[98] D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 4.120 cmt. (quoting Model Penal Code § 2.02(2)(c)); see Jones v. United States, 813 A.2d 220, 225 (D.C. 2002) (quoting and citing to id.).

[99] 813 A.2d at 225.

[100] Id. (quoting Model Penal Code § 2.02(2)(c)).

[101] 62 A.3d 1266, 1270 (D.C. 2013).

[102] Id.

[103] Id.

[104] 165 A.3d 314 (D.C. 2017) (en banc).

[105] Id. at 330 ("I write separately to explain why I believe we should hold that recklessness is enough to satisfy the mens rea element (at least of § 22–407, if not § 22–1810).").

> States, 902 A.2d 107, 113 (D.C. 2006) (internal quotation marks omitted) (quoting Jones v. United States, 813 A.2d 220, 225 (D.C. 2002) (quoting Model Penal Code § 2.02 (2)(c) (Am. Law Inst. 1985))). "Recklessly means that the defendant was aware of and disregarded the grave risk . . . created by his conduct." Jones, 813 A.2d at 225. The Supreme Court has observed that "subjective recklessness as used in the criminal law is a familiar and workable standard[.]" Farmer v. Brennan, 511 U.S. 825, 839, 114 S.Ct. 1970, 128 L.Ed.2d 811 (1994); see also id. at 837, 114 S.Ct. 1970 (Recklessness exists "when a person disregards a risk of harm of which he is aware." (citations omitted)).[106]

The DCCA's approach to negligence appears similar to its approach to recklessness, except awareness of the risk is not necessary. Few District statutes require this particular culpable mental state; however, the DCCA has interpreted the District's broadly worded manslaughter statute to incorporate the offense of involuntary manslaughter, which is governed by the mental state of "culpable (criminal) negligence."[107] Case law establishes that this culpable mental state, in turn, entails proof that the actor's conduct created "extreme danger to life or of serious bodily injury," which amounts to "a gross deviation from a reasonable standard of care."[108] Such requirements are to be distinguished, as the DCCA has further explained, from "simple or civil negligence," which is merely "a failure to exercise that degree of care rendered appropriate by the particular circumstances in which a man or woman of ordinary prudence in the same situation and with equal experience would not have omitted."[109] (Note, however, that the District's vehicular homicide statute, § 50-2203.01, appears to incorporate this civil negligence standard.[110])

The definition of recklessness reflected in subsections (c)(1) and (2) is intended to generally capture the above District authorities on recklessness and reckless indifference. At the same time, however, it is also intended to allow future factfinders to proceed in a clearer and more consistent fashion. For example, the extent to which a risk is grave, an actor's disregard of the risk is culpable, or whether it can be said that an actor did not care about the consequences of his or her action, necessarily hinge upon a variety of fact-specific considerations pertaining to whether the actor's conduct constituted a gross [106] Carrell, 165 A.3d. at330–31.

---

[107] Faunteroy v. United States, 413 A.2d 1294, 1298–99 (D.C. 1980).
[108] Comber, 584 A.2d at 48.
[109] Faunteroy, 413 A.2d at 1298-99.
[110] The relevant statutory provision reads:

> Any person who, by the operation of any vehicle in a careless, reckless, or negligent manner, but not wilfully or wantonly, shall cause the death of another, including a pedestrian in a marked crosswalk, or unmarked crosswalk at an intersection, shall be guilty of a felony, and shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than 5 years or by a fine of not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or both.

D.C. Code Ann. § 50-2203.01. The phrase "careless, reckless, or negligent manner" has in turn been interpreted to mean operating a "vehicle without the exercise of that degree of care that a person of ordinary prudence would exercise under the same or similar circumstances . . . . It is a failure to exercise ordinary care." Butts v. United States, 822 A.2d 407, 416 (D.C. 2003).

deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct. These include, among other factors, the circumstances the actor is aware of, the reasons why the actor consciously disregarded the risk, and the extent to which any aspects of the actor's situation reasonably hindered the actor's ability to exercise an appropriate level of concern for the interests of others. The gross deviation standard and accompanying evaluative framework stated in RCC §§ 22E-(c)(1)(B) and (2)(B) appropriately accounts for these considerations.

The definition of negligence reflected in subsections (d)(1) and (2) is broadly consistent with the above District authority on involuntary manslaughter.[111] Consistent with the analysis of recklessness supra, however, this definition—when viewed in light of the gross deviation standard and accompanying evaluative framework stated in RCC §§ 22E-(d)(1)(B) and (2)(B)—is also intended to provide future factfinders with the basis for identifying it in a clearer and more consistent fashion.

RCC § 22E-206(e): Relation to Current District Law on Culpable Mental State Hierarchy. Subsection (e) generally accords with District law governing the relationship between culpable mental states.

Although no District authority has squarely addressed the principle reflected in subsection (e), many of the District's more recent statutes suggest what this provision explicitly states: where knowledge/intent will suffice to establish an objective element, so will purpose; where recklessness will suffice, so will knowledge/intent or purpose; and where negligence will suffice, so will recklessness, knowledge/intent, or purpose. This is reflected in the legislature's occasional practice of noting hierarchically superior mental states alongside the lowest mental state.[112] Under the RCC, in contrast, the legislature need not state alternative mental states in the definition of an offense; rather, a codified statement of the lowest culpable mental state sufficient to establish a given objective element is sufficient.

RCC § 22E-207. Rules of Interpretation Applicable to Culpable Mental States.

1. RCC § 22E-207(a)—Distribution of Enumerated Culpable Mental States

Explanatory Note. Subsection (a) states the rule of interpretation governing the distribution of enumerated culpable mental states under the RCC. It establishes that any enumerated culpable mental state applies to all ensuing results and circumstances (with the exception of those subject to strict liability under RCC § 22E-207(b)), until another culpable mental state is enumerated, in which case the subsequently specified culpable mental state should be distributed in a similar fashion.[1]

---

[111] Note, however, that the reference to "extreme danger to life or of serious bodily injury" in the DCCA's definition of the negligence governing involuntary manslaughter is likely distinct from the mere "substantial risk" referenced in the RCC's definition of negligence under RCC §§ 22E-206(d)(1)-(2).

[112] D.C. Code § 22-404.01 (knowledge or purpose as to causing serious bodily injury); D.C. Code § 22-404 (intent, knowledge, or recklessness as to causing serious bodily injury); D.C. Code § 22-1101 (intent, knowledge, or recklessness as to causing mistreatment); D.C. Code § 5-1307 (intent, knowledge, recklessness, or negligence as to causing interference).

[1] In so doing, this rule of interpretation clarifies the objective elements in an offense to which the legislature intends for a specified culpable mental state to apply. See, e.g., Flores-Figueroa v. United States, 556 U.S.

To illustrate how this rule of interpretation operates, consider an offense that prohibits "knowingly causing bodily injury to a child." Here, the enumerated culpable mental state of knowingly could be interpreted as solely applying to the result element of causing bodily injury. Or it could be read to apply to both that result and the requisite circumstance element, namely, that the person to whom bodily injury was caused have been a child. Under subsection (a), the latter reading would be the correct one since both of these objective elements follow (i.e. are modified by) the culpable mental state of knowingly.[2]

Subsection (a) facilitates consistency in the law by providing a precise rule for distributing all culpable mental states among the results and circumstances of an offense. However, it also provides the legislature with an important drafting shortcut. Whenever the legislature wishes to apply the same culpability term to consecutive results and circumstances, it need only state that term once with the expectation that it will be distributed appropriately under subsection (a). There is no need for the legislature to repeat the same culpable mental state in an offense under the RCC.[3]

Relation to Current District Law. Subsection (a) fills a gap in District law. The D.C. Code lacks a fixed rule of interpretation for distributing culpability terms, or for interpreting criminal statutes more generally. In the absence of a rule of this nature, the DCCA tends to employ a highly discretionary and context sensitive approach to interpreting criminal statutes.[4] On at least one occasion, however, the court has deemed a rule of distribution such as that reflected in subsection (a) to reflect the "most straightforward reading of the [mental state] language" employed in a criminal statute.[5]

2. RCC § 22E-207(b)—Identification of Elements Subject to Strict Liability

Explanatory Note. Subsection (b) states the rule of interpretation governing the identification of strict liability under the RCC. It establishes that a result or circumstance is subject to strict liability if one of two conditions is met. First, under paragraph (b)(1), a result or circumstance is subject to strict liability if it is modified by the phrase "in fact."[6]

646, 650 (2009) ("In ordinary English, where a transitive verb has an object, listeners in most contexts assume that an adverb (such as knowingly) that modifies the transitive verb tells the listener how the subject performed the entire action, including the object as set forth in the sentence."); Id. at 652 ("[C]ourts ordinarily read a phrase in a criminal statute that introduces the elements of a crime with [a culpable mental state such as] the word 'knowingly' as applying that word to each element."); United States v. X–Citement Video, Inc., 513 U.S. 64, 79 (1994) (Stevens, J., concurring) (describing this rule as the "normal, commonsense reading of a subsection of a criminal statute").

[2] If, however, the offense definition prohibited "knowingly causing injury to a person, negligent as to whether the person is a child," then, pursuant to subsection (a), the culpable mental state of knowledge would apply only to the result, while the culpable mental state of negligence—which is subsequently specified—would govern the requisite circumstance.

[3] As might otherwise be required to clarify the culpable mental states to which various objective elements are subject in the absence of subsection (a).

[4] See, e.g., In re D.F., 70 A.3d 240 (D.C. 2013); Holloway v. United States, 951 A.2d 59 (D.C. 2008); Pelote v. Dist. of Columbia, 21 A.3d 599 (D.C. 2011); Luck v. Dist. of Columbia, 617 A.2d 509, 515 (D.C. 1992).

[5] Perry v. United States, 36 A.3d 799, 816 (D.C. 2011).

[6] Note that two objective elements in an offense definition may be subject to strict liability by repeating the phrase "in fact." Consider, for example, an offense definition that reads: "Knowingly causing bodily injury to a person, who is, in fact, a child, with what is, in fact, a knife." Here, both circumstance elements—that

Second, under paragraph (b)(2), a result or circumstance is subject to strict liability if—notwithstanding the absence of the "in fact" modifier—another statutory provision explicitly indicates strict liability applies to that result or circumstance.

Here is an illustrative example of how each aspect of this provision operate. An offense definition that prohibits "knowingly causing bodily injury to a person who is, in fact, a child" should, pursuant to paragraph (b)(1), be understood to apply strict liability to the requisite circumstance element, namely, that the person to whom bodily injury was caused was a child.[7] In contrast, an offense definition that prohibits "knowingly causing bodily injury to a child" and thereafter explicitly states that "a defendant shall be held strictly liable with respect to whether the victim harmed was a child," should, pursuant to paragraph (b)(2), be given its intended effect. Although the rule of distribution in subsection (a) indicates that the culpable mental state of "knowingly" travels to all subsequent results and circumstances, the explicit expression of legislative intent reflected in the latter portion of the offense definition is sufficiently clear to overcome this rule.

Subsection (b) facilitates consistency in the law by providing a fixed methodology for appropriately recognizing strict liability elements. However, it also provides the legislature with important drafting shortcuts. Whenever the legislature intends to apply strict liability to a single result or circumstance, use of the phrase "in fact" is a simple and efficient means of communicating this point. When, however, the legislature intends to apply strict liability to more than one (or even all) of the results and circumstances in an offense, an explicit statement to that effect may be more efficient than continually repeating the phrase "in fact" throughout an offense definition.[8]

Relation to Current District Law. Subsection (b) fills a gap in, but generally coheres with, District law. The D.C. Code lacks a standard way to specify offense elements that are subject to strict liability, even though elements and offenses subject to strict liability offenses exist in the District.[9] However, the DCCA does not lightly infer the absence of a culpable mental state; rather, it must be "clear the legislature intended to create a strict liability offense."[10] And, in the absence of an "obvious [legislative] purpose" to the victim be a child and that the bodily injury be inflicted with a knife—are subject to strict liability under paragraph (b)(1).

---

[7] While an enumerated culpable mental state "skips" over an objective element modified by "in fact," it nevertheless continues to "travel" and apply to subsequent objective element under RCC § 22E-207(a). For example, an offense definition that reads: "Knowingly causing bodily injury to a person, who is, in fact, a child, with a knife. Under the rules of interpretation, the mental state of "knowingly" would apply to both the result of "causing bodily injury," and the circumstance of "with a knife."

[8] So, for example, when the legislature intends to create a pure strict liability offense it might state something to the effect of "no culpable mental state applies to any objective element in this offense." Another means of applying strict liability to multiple objective elements in an offense is to draft an offense definition using "in fact" followed by a colon and a list of objective elements. This usage of "in fact" followed by a colon clearly communicates that strict liability applies to the ensuing list of objective elements.

[9] As the DCCA observed in McNeely v. United States, "Strict liability criminal offenses—including felonies—are not unprecedented in the District of Columbia; the Council has enacted several such statutes in the past." 874 A.2d 371, 385–86 (D.C. 2005) (collecting statutes); see also In re E.F., 740 A.2d 547, 550-51 (D.C. 1999) (discussing D.C. Code § 22-3011(a)).

[10] Conley v. United States, 79 A.3d 270, 289 n.91 (D.C. 2013) (quoting Santos v. District of Columbia, 940 A.2d 113, 116–17 (D.C. 2007)).

impose strict liability, "the common law presumption in favor of imposing a mens rea requirement where a statute is otherwise silent" operates.[11]

3. RCC § 22E-207(c)—Determination of When Recklessness Is Implied

Explanatory Note. Subsection (c) states a default rule, which addresses any interpretive ambiguities concerning culpable mental states that remain after consideration of the previous rules set forth in section 207.[12] Specifically, this rule establishes that an offense definition which fails to clarify the culpable mental state (or strict liability) applicable to a given result or circumstance should be interpreted as applying a default of recklessness to that element.[13]

Here are two illustrative examples of the kinds of situations where this default rule might apply. First, an offense definition might not specify any culpable mental state at all, such that the rule of distribution stated in subsection (a) is inapplicable, while, at the same time, failing to clarify that strict liability is applicable under subsection (b). Consider, for example, a hypothetical theft of government property offense that reads: "No person shall take government property without consent." Second, an offense definition might specify a culpable mental state but do so after some objective elements have already been enumerated, and which are neither governed by an explicitly specified culpable mental state nor clearly subject to strict liability. Consider, for example, a hypothetical aggravated theft of government property offense that reads: "No person shall take government property without consent and knowingly sell it to another." In each of these situations, the default rule reflected in subsection (c) establishes that the relevant objective elements are subject to a culpable mental state of recklessness.[14]

Subsection (c) facilitates consistency in the law by providing a precise rule for determining how to resolve situations of interpretive ambiguity regarding culpable mental states. It may also provide, however, what amounts to a drafting shortcut for the legislature in those situations where the legislature intends to apply recklessness to multiple objective elements (as reflected in the two examples noted above).

---

[11] McNeely, 874 A.2d at 379–80. "[W]here the legislature is acting in its capacity to regulate public welfare," however, mere "silence can be construed as a legislative choice to dispense with the mens rea requirement." Id. at 388.

[12] See, e.g., Elonis v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2001, 2009 (2015) ("'[M]ere omission from a criminal enactment of any mention of criminal intent' should not be read 'as dispensing with it,'" which "rule of construction reflects the basic principle that 'wrongdoing must be conscious to be criminal.'") (quoting Morissette v. United States, 342 U.S. 246, 249 (1952)); United States v. X–Citement Video, Inc., 513 U.S. 64, 79 (1994) (Stevens, J., concurring) (courts have for a long time opted to "interpret criminal statutes to include broadly applicable [mens rea] requirements, even where the statute by its terms does not contain them").

[13] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02(3), cmt. at 127 (recklessness default rule reflects "the common law position"); Paul H. Robinson & Jane Grall, Element Analysis in Defining Criminal Liability: The Model Penal Code and Beyond, 35 STAN. L. REV. 681, 683 (1983) ("recklessness is generally accepted as the theoretical norm" for criminal liability); Elonis, 135 S. Ct. at 2015 (Alito, J. concurring) (recklessness provides sound basis for punishment and offers most appropriate default rule for courts to employ "without stepping over the line that separates interpretation from amendment").

[14] Specifically, the objective elements of a "taking," that the object taken be "government property," and that the taking occur "without consent" would all be subject to recklessness.

Relation to Current District Law. Subsection (c) fills a gap in, but generally coheres with, District law. The D.C. Code lacks a fixed rule of interpretation for implying culpable mental state terms. In the absence of a rule of this nature, the DCCA employs "an interpretive presumption that mens rea is required," notwithstanding statutory silence to the contrary, so long as the implication of a culpable mental state would not be contrary to legislative intent.[15] As the DCCA has recognized, "[t]he presumption is based on the common understanding of malum in se offenses, which traditionally are 'generally constituted only from concurrence of an evil-meaning mind with an evil-doing hand.'"[16]

RCC § 22E-208. PRINCIPLES OF LIABILITY GOVERNING ACCIDENT, MISTAKE, AND IGNORANCE.

Explanatory Notes. Section 208 establishes general principles of liability governing issues of accident, mistake, and ignorance throughout the RCC.[1]

Subsection (a) addresses the overarching effect of accidents, mistakes, and ignorance on offense liability. It broadly clarifies that a person's accident, mistake, or ignorance as to a matter of fact or law will typically relieve that person of liability when (but only when) it precludes the person from acting with the culpable mental state required for a result or circumstance element.[2] This means that the relationship between the culpable mental state requirement governing an offense and accident, mistake, and ignorance is typically one of logical relevance: any accident, mistake or ignorance is relevant when (but only when) it prevents the government from meeting its affirmative burden of proof with respect to a culpable mental state applicable to a result or [15] Conley, 79 A.3dat 289 (citing Santos v. District of Columbia, 940 A.2d 113, 116–17 (D.C. 2007)).

---

[16] McNeely, 874 A.2d at 388 (quoting Morissette v. United States, 342 U.S 246, 251 (1952)). For a sustained argument by one judge on the DCCA in support of a recklessness default in the context of the District's criminal threats statute, see Carrell v. United States, 165 A.3d 314, 330-39 (D.C. 2017) (Thompson, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part).

[1] Accidents typically relate to the culpable mental state governing the result element(s) of an offense. See Kenneth W. Simons, Mistake and Impossibility, Law and Fact, and Culpability: A Speculative Essay, 81 J. CRIM. L. & CRIMINOLOGY 447, 504-07 (1990) ("An accident occurs when one brings about a result without desiring or foreseeing it"). In contrast, mistakes implicate the culpable mental state governing the circumstance element(s) of an offense. See Douglas N. Husak, Transferred Intent, 10 NOTRE DAME J.L. ETHICS & PUB. POL'Y 65, 73 (1996) ("Mistakes occur in the realm of perception; they involve false beliefs"). According to this distinction, "[o]ne makes a 'mistake' as to another's age or property, the obscene nature of a publication, or other circumstance elements, but one 'accidentally' injures another, pollutes a stream, or interferes with a law enforcement officer." Paul H. Robinson & Jane Grall, Element Analysis in Defining Criminal Liability: The Model Penal Code and Beyond, 35 STAN. L. REV. 681, 732 (1983). Ignorance, like mistake, implicates the culpable mental state governing the circumstance element(s) of an offense, id.; however, whereas mistake "suggests a wrong belief about the matter," "'[i]gnorance' implies a total want of knowledge—a blank mind—regarding the matter under consideration." JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 12.01 n.2 (6th ed. 2012).
[2] See, e.g., WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 1 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 5.6(a) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) ("Instead of speaking of ignorance or mistake of fact or law as a defense, it would be just as easy to note simply that the defendant cannot be convicted when it is shown that he does not have the mental state required by law for commission of that particular offense."); DRESSLER, supra note 1, at § 12.02 ("[B]ecause of a mistake, a defendant may not possess the specific state of mind required in the definition of the crime. In such circumstances, the defendant must be acquitted because the prosecutor has failed to prove an express element of the offense.").

circumstance element.[3] In this sense, accident, mistake and ignorance do not—generally speaking[4]—constitute defenses, but rather, simply describe conditions that may preclude the government from establishing liability.

Subsection (b) clarifies the nature of the correspondence between mistake and the culpable mental state requirement applicable to circumstance elements using the terminology most commonly associated with mistake claims.[5] The courts, when presented with the claim that a given mistake as to a matter of fact or law negates the culpability required for an offense, have historically found it helpful to evaluate the overarching reasonableness of that mistake. Consistent with this evaluation, paragraphs (b)(1) and (2) jointly clarify that any mistake—whether reasonable or unreasonable—has the capacity to negate the existence of the purpose, knowledge, or intent required for a circumstance element. Paragraph (b)(3) thereafter states the rule applicable to an area of mistake law where the traditional reasonableness analysis breaks down—the nature of the mistake that will negate the existence of recklessness as to a circumstance element. In this context, any reasonable mistake will preclude the government from meeting its burden of proof; however, an unreasonable mistake will only negate the requisite recklessness if the person was not reckless making the mistake.[6] Along similar lines, paragraph (b)(4) clarifies that while any reasonable mistake will also categorically negate negligence as to a circumstance element, an unreasonable mistake will only preclude the government from meeting its burden of proof if the defendant was not negligent in making the mistake.[7]

To illustrate the reciprocal nature of the relationship between mistake claims and the culpable mental state requirement governing a circumstance element, consider the situation of a person who: (1) takes a piece of property owned by someone else, motivated by a mistaken belief that the property was abandoned; and (2) is thereafter prosecuted under a statute that reads: "No person shall unlawfully use the property of another." Under these circumstances, the nature of the mistaken belief as to abandonment that will preclude the government from meeting its affirmative burden of proof is part and parcel with the culpable mental state (if any) the court deems to govern the circumstance element, "of another."

For example, if the statute is interpreted to require proof of knowledge as to whether the property was "of another," then any mistake as to the property's ownership status by the defendant will preclude the government from meeting its burden of proof

---

[3] Note, however, that RCC § 22E-208(d) addresses a particular situation where, although an actor's ignorance negates the culpable mental state of knowledge as to a particular circumstance, that culpable mental state is nevertheless imputed on policy grounds.

[4] But see RCC § 208(c)(2) (noting the possibility that a person's "mistake or ignorance" can "satisf[y] the requirements for a general excuse defense").

[5] See, e.g., LAFAVE, supra note 2, at 1 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 5.6(a) ("No area of the substantive criminal law has traditionally been surrounded by more confusion.").

[6] Which is to say, the person was either: (1) unaware of a substantial risk that the requisite circumstance existed in light of the mistake (i.e. merely negligent); or (2) did not grossly deviate from the standard of conduct a reasonable individual would follow in forming the mistaken belief. RCC § 22E-206(c)(2) (defining "recklessly" as to circumstances); see infra note 13 and accompanying text (providing illustration).

[7] Which is to say, the person did not "grossly deviate from the standard of care" in forming the mistaken belief under the circumstances. RCC § 22E-206(d)(2) (defining "negligently" as to circumstances); see infra note 14 and accompanying text (providing illustration). All the more so, reckless mistakes, which are necessarily negligent mistakes (and also gross deviations from the standard of conduct), cannot negate the culpable mental state of negligence.

under the RCC. The reason? If the defendant wholeheartedly believed—whether reasonably or unreasonably—that the property was abandoned, then he cannot, by definition, have been "practically certain" that the property was someone else's, per the RCC definition of knowledge.[8]

If, in contrast, the statute is interpreted to require proof of recklessness or negligence as to whether the property was "of another," then only a reasonable mistake as to the property's ownership status by the defendant will categorically preclude the government from meeting its burden of proof. This is because unreasonable conduct is at the heart of both recklessness and negligence, which, as defined under the RCC, each entail the disregard a "substantial risk" in a manner that is "gross deviation from the standard of conduct or care that a reasonable individual would follow" under the circumstances.[9]

With that in mind, determining whether an unreasonably mistaken belief that the property was abandoned will preclude the government from carrying its burden of proof against the defendant for either recklessness or negligence requires a more contextual analysis, which takes into account both: (1) the precise nature of the mistake; and (2) which of these two non-intentional mental states is at issue.

For example, in a recklessness prosecution, two different kinds of unreasonable mistakes regarding the ownership status of the property at issue will negate the culpability required under RCC § 22E-206(c). The first is an unreasonable mistake that is unequivocally held,[10] and therefore precludes the government from establishing that the defendant "consciously disregard[ed] a substantial risk" that the property was owned by someone else.[11] The second is an unreasonable mistake that—even if equivocally held[12]—is insufficiently culpable to meet the gross deviation standard incorporated into the RCC definition of recklessness.[13]

In a negligence prosecution, in contrast, only the latter type of unreasonable mistake will preclude the government from meeting its burden of proof. Which is to say: an unreasonable mistake concerning the property's ownership statute can negate a requirement of negligence as to whether the property was "of another," but only if the defendant's failure to accurately assess whether the property was abandoned is insufficiently culpable to meet the comparable gross deviation standard incorporated into the RCC definition of negligence.[14]

---

[8] RCC § 22E-206(b)(2). The same analysis would apply if the statute was construed to require "intent," which, like "knowledge," requires a practically certain belief as to the existence of a circumstance. See Commentary on RCC § 22E-206(b): Explanatory Notes (explaining semantic difference between knowledge and intent under the RCC).

[9] RCC § 22E-206(c); id. at (d).

[10] For example, if, because of the unreasonable mistake, the person was 100% confident that the property was abandoned, then the government could not prove that the defendant "consciously disregard[ed] a substantial risk" as to the ownership status of the property, per the RCC definition of recklessness. RCC § 22E-206(c)(2)(A). But if, in contrast, the person was only 70% confident that the property was abandoned by virtue of the mistake, then the government might still be able to prove that the defendant "consciously disregard[ed] a substantial risk" as to the ownership status of the property, per the RCC definition of recklessness. RCC § 22E-206(c)(2)(A).

[11] RCC § 22E-206(c)(2)(A).

[12] See supra note 10.

[13] RCC § 22E-206(c)(2)(B).

[14] RCC § 22E-206(d)(2)(B).

Subsection (c) addresses the general effect of a specific kind of mistake or ignorance on offense liability—a mistake or ignorance as to the illegality of one's conduct. The prefatory clause to this provision sets forth the general presumption, "familiar to all minds, that ignorance of the law will not excuse any person, either civilly or criminally."[15] Under "unusual circumstances," however, "that maxim" must give way to other general culpability principles.[16] Paragraphs (c)(1) and (c)(2) respectively address two relevant sets of such circumstances.

In the first situation, addressed by paragraph (c)(1), the statute for which the defendant is being prosecuted requires proof of a culpable mental state (e.g., knowledge, intent, recklessness, or negligence) as to the illegality of one's conduct.[17] Under these

---

[15] Conley v. United States, 79 A.3d 270, 281 (D.C. 2013) (quoting Barlow v. United States, 32 U.S. (7 Pet.) 404, 411, 8 L.Ed. 728 (1833)); see, e.g., McFadden v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2298, 2304, 192 L. Ed. 2d 260 (2015) ("[I]gnorance of the law is typically no defense to criminal prosecution"); Cheek v. United States, 498 U.S. 192, 199, 111 S.Ct. 604, 112 L.Ed.2d 617 (1991) ("The general rule that ignorance of the law or a mistake of law is no defense to criminal prosecution is deeply rooted in the American legal system."). Consistent with this general principle, "a defendant who knows he is distributing heroin but does not know that heroin is listed on the schedules . . . would [] be guilty of knowingly distributing 'a controlled substance.'" McFadden, 135 S. Ct. at 2304. Under these circumstances, the fact that the defendant is ignorant as to the particular law setting forth the definition of the crime in question does not provide grounds for an excuse.

The latter situation is to be contrasted with a prosecution for an offense comprised of a circumstance element the satisfaction of which hinges upon a legal judgment extrinsic to the definition of that offense. The following trespass statute is illustrative: "No person shall knowingly enter the property of another without license or privilege." If a person is prosecuted under this statute for unlawfully entering the property of another motivated by a mistaken claim of right, the person's inaccurate assessment of his or her property rights would constitute a defense under the circumstances. For although that person's mistake may be rooted in his or her ignorance of the law governing access to property, it nevertheless precludes the government from proving the culpable mental state applicable to a circumstance element in the offense—namely, that the defendant knew that he or she was entering another person's property without a license or privilege. See, e.g., LAFAVE, supra note 2, at 1 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 5.6(d) ("[T]he crime of larceny is not committed if the defendant, because of a mistaken understanding of the law of property, believed that the property taken belonged to him[.]").

[16] Conley, 79 A.3d at 281 (quoting United States v. Wilson, 159 F.3d 280, 293 (7th Cir.1998)(Posner, J., dissenting).

[17] To the extent culpability as to illegality is ever required by the RCC, it will typically be incorporated into an offense definition. The RCC's possession of stolen property statute is illustrative; it requires proof that the defendant "purchase[d]" or "possess[ed]" property with, inter alia, an "intent that the property be stolen." RCC § 22E-2401. The latter culpable mental state could presumably be negated by a mistake as to what constitutes theft under District law, such as, for example, where defendant X purchases stolen property from seller Y while operating under a mistaken belief that the manner in which the property was taken did not amount to theft in the District. Importantly, this is to be contrasted with a mistaken belief that purchasing stolen property is not a crime in the District, which would not negate the "intent that the property be stolen" culpable mental state requirement (and therefore would not constitute a defense to possession of stolen property). See, e.g., Liparota v. United States, 471 U.S. 419, 425 n.9 (1985) ("In the case of a receipt-of-stolen-goods statute, the legal element is that the goods were stolen . . . It is not a defense to a charge of receipt of stolen goods that one did not know that such receipt was illegal . . . It is, however, a defense to a charge of knowing receipt of stolen goods that one did not know that the goods were stolen."); Morissette v. United States, 342 U.S. 246 (1952) (holding that it is a defense to a charge of "knowingly converting" federal property that one did not know that what one was doing was a conversion).

It is also possible, however, that a culpability as to illegality element will be implied through some other general provision. For example, RCC § 22E-202(c) limits omission liability to situations where a person "is either aware that the legal duty to act exists or, if the person lacks such awareness, the person is culpably unaware that the legal duty to act exists." According to this limitation, a defendant's reasonable circumstances, the defendant's mistake or ignorance as to the prohibited nature of his or her conduct must be subjected to the same logical relevance analysis set forth in subsection (a), namely, did the mistake or ignorance "negate[] th[e] culpable mental state" applicable to the required circumstance element of illegality?

In the second situation, addressed by paragraph (c)(2), "[t]he person's mistake or ignorance satisfies the requirements of a general defense…." This catch-all provision allows for the possibility that mistake or ignorance as to the illegality of one's conduct might, under limited circumstances, constitute a true "excuse" in the sense of exculpating a defendant who otherwise satisfies the affirmative elements of an offense.[18]

Subsection (d) establishes a generally applicable principle of imputation[19] to deal with the situation of an actor who deliberately ignores a prohibited circumstance, otherwise suspected to exist, in order to avoid criminal liability.[20] If this actor is later prosecuted for a crime that requires proof of knowledge as to that circumstance under RCC § 22E-206(b)(2), the actor may be able to point to a level of ignorance sufficient to preclude the government from establishing the requisite awareness as to a practical certainty.[21] Nevertheless, under these specific conditions, that actor is—given his or her initial suspicions and later purposeful avoidance—just as blameworthy as a person who possessed a degree of awareness sufficient to satisfy the RCC definition of knowledge.[22] In light of ignorance as to whether he or she was obligated to engage in some act required by the criminal law—for example, exiting a vehicle that contains a firearm—could constitute a defense in a prosecution premised on omission liability. See Conley, 79 A.3d at 281 (striking down a District statute criminalizing unlawful presence in a motor vehicle containing a firearm on the rationale that "it is incompatible with due process to convict a person of a crime based on the failure to take a legally required action—a crime of omission—if he had no reason to believe he had a legal duty to act, or even that his failure to act was blameworthy.") (citing Lambert v. People of the State of California, 355 U.S. 225 (1957)).

---

[18] See, e.g., LAFAVE, supra note 2, at 1 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 5.6(a) (While "it may be correctly said that ignorance of the law is no excuse [], there are exceptions when the defendant reasonably believes his conduct is not proscribed by law and that belief is attributable to an official statement of the law or to the failure of the state to give fair notice of the proscription."); Bsharah v. United States, 646 A.2d 993, 1000 (D.C. 1994) (recognizing the possibility that a general excuse defense based on mistake or ignorance as to illegality might be "available to a defendant who 'reasonably' relied on a conclusion or statement of law 'issued by an official charged with interpretation, administration, and/or enforcement responsibilities in the relevant legal field'") (quoting United States v. Barker, 546 F.2d 940, 955 (D.C. Cir. 1976) and citing Model Penal Code § 2.04(3)(b)").

[19] See Paul H. Robinson, Imputed Criminal Liability, 93 YALE L.J. 609, 611 (1984) ("Typically, the set of elements defining a crime comprise what may be called the paradigm of liability for that offense: An actor is criminally liable if and only if the state proves all these elements. The paradigm of an offense, however, does not always determine criminal liability . . . . [Some] exceptions inculpate actors who do not satisfy the paradigm for the offense charged. Such inculpating exceptions may be termed instances of "imputed" elements of an offense.").

[20] Many different labels are applied to describe this problem, including connivance, willful blindness, willful ignorance, conscious avoidance, and deliberate ignorance. See, e.g., ROLLIN M. PERKINS & RONALD N. BOYCE, CRIMINAL LAW 867 (3d ed. 1982); Rollin M. Perkins, "Knowledge" as a Mens Rea Requirement, 29 HASTINGS L.J. 953, 956-57 (1978). The RCC uses the phrase "deliberate ignorance" throughout for purposes of clarity and consistency.

[21] E.g., GLANVILLE WILLIAMS, CRIMINAL LAW: THE GENERAL PART 157, 159 (2d ed. 1961); Ira P. Robbins, The Ostrich Instruction: Deliberate Ignorance as a Criminal Mens Rea, 81 J. CRIM. L. & CRIMINOLOGY 191, 196-97 (1990).

[22] Conversely, outside of this narrow context, an actor is unlikely to be just as blameworthy as a person who possesses a degree of awareness sufficient to satisfy the RCC definition of knowledge. For example, consider the situation of a parent driving carpool who declines to check his child's backpack after smelling what might this moral equivalency,[23] subsection (d) authorizes the factfinder to impute knowledge as to a circumstance where the government proves beyond a reasonable doubt that: (1) the actor was at least reckless as to whether the prohibited circumstance existed; and (2) the actor avoided confirming or failed to investigate the existence of the circumstance with the purpose of avoiding criminal liability.[24]

Subsection (e) cross references terms defined elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. RCC § 22E-208 codifies, clarifies, fill in gaps, and changes current District law.

While the D.C. Code does not address accident, mistake, or ignorance, the DCCA applies an approach to these issues that is substantively consistent with the principles reflected in subsections (a) and (b). Consistent with DCCA case law, the RCC views the overarching relevance of an accident, mistake, or ignorance to liability to be a product of whether it precludes the government from proving an offense's culpable mental state requirement beyond a reasonable doubt. Importantly, however, the RCC approach to these issues will fundamentally change District law in two significant ways. First, the RCC will, by clarifying the culpable mental state governing each objective element of every offense, practically end use of the judicially developed concepts of general intent and specific intent crimes at the heart of the DCCA case law on accident, mistake, and ignorance. Second, this clarification of culpable mental state requirements, when viewed in light of subsections (a) and (b), will ensure that it is the legislature, not the judiciary, that makes all policy decisions concerning the relevance of accident, mistake, or ignorance to liability. These departures are intended to improve the clarity, consistency, and completeness of District law.

---

be a controlled substance for any (or all) of the following reasons: (1) he wants to respect his child's privacy; (2) he doesn't want to lose the child's hard-earned trust; and/or (3) he simply doesn't want to know whether his child is, in fact, using controlled substances. Under these circumstances, where the parent's deliberate avoidance is not motivated by a desire to avoid criminal liability, it cannot be said that he is as blameworthy as one who knowingly transports controlled substances. See United States v. Heredia, 483 F.3d 913, 924, 928 (9th Cir. 2007) (Absent proof of a "motivation to avoid criminal responsibility," deliberate ignorance doctrine would effectively create "[a] criminal duty to investigate the wrongdoing of others to avoid wrongdoing of one's own," which is a "novelty in the criminal law." For example, "[s]hall someone who thinks his mother is carrying a stash of marijuana in her suitcase be obligated, when he helps her with it, to rummage through her things?" Or [s]hall all of us who give a ride to child's friend search her purse or his backpack?").

[23] "The traditional rationale for this doctrine is that defendants who behave in this manner are just as culpable as those who have actual knowledge." Glob.-Tech Appliances, Inc. v. SEB S.A., 563 U.S. 754, 766, 131 S. Ct. 2060, 2069, 179 L. Ed. 2d 1167 (2011) (citing J. Ll. J. Edwards, The Criminal Degrees of Knowledge, 17 MOD. L. REV. 294, 302 (1954)). And that remains the strongest justification for the imputation of knowledge for deliberately ignorant actors today. See, e.g., Douglas N. Husak & Craig A. Callender, Wilful Ignorance, Knowledge, and the "Equal Culpability" Thesis: A Study of the Deeper Significance of the Principle of Legality, 1994 WIS. L. REV. 29 (1994); Alexander F. Sarch, Willful Ignorance, Culpability, and the Criminal Law, 88 ST. JOHN'S L. REV. 1023 (2014).

[24] Note that the defendant's purpose of avoiding criminal liability need not be the only, or even the primary, motivation for engaging in the conduct. At the very least, though, it must be a substantial motivating factor. Consider, for example, a bartender who fails to check a young-looking female's ID: (1) for the primary purpose of making it easier to sexually assault her after the bar closes; and (2) for the lesser, but still substantially motivating reason of avoiding liability for serving a minor in the event the bar is raided. Under these circumstances, the bartender's non-primary purpose of avoiding liability for serving a minor in the event the bar is raided is sufficient to deem him deliberately ignorant given its substantially motivating nature.

The approach to dealing with culpability as to the criminality of one's conduct incorporated into subsection (c) is similarly in accordance with DCCA case law. This general provision codifies the presumption, well established in the District, that mistake or ignorance as to a matter of penal law is not a defense to criminal liability. That said, DCCA case law also recognizes that in certain limited circumstances this presumption must cede to other generally applicable principles of criminal law. Subsection (c) articulates these potential exceptions in a manner that improves the clarity, consistency, and completeness of District law.

Subsection (d) codifies a rule of imputation applicable to the situation of an actor who deliberately ignores a prohibited circumstance, which he or she otherwise suspects to exist, in order to avoid criminal liability. The D.C. Code is silent on how to deal with these situations of deliberate ignorance; however, the DCCA has generally recognized the applicability of a rule of knowledge imputation through case law. Yet reported decisions addressing this doctrine are scant, and those that do exist provide limited direction on the approach envisioned by the DCCA. Subsection (d) fills this gap in the law by providing a clear and comprehensive approach to dealing with the deliberately ignorant actor.

RCC §§ 22E-208(a) and (b): Relation to Current District Law on Accident, Mistake, and Ignorance. Subsections (a) and (b) codify, clarify, fill in gaps, and change current District law governing accident, mistake, and ignorance.

Under current District law, "[d]efenses of accident and mistake of fact (or non-penal law) have potential application to any case in which they could rebut proof of a required mental element."[25] The same approach appears to be similarly applicable to ignorance as to a matter of fact (or non-penal law), which can rebut proof of a required mental element, though it should be noted that ignorance of this nature appears to be generally assimilated into the District's law of mistake.[26]

To determine when this kind of rebuttal is possible for mistakes, the DCCA typically relies upon the distinction between specific intent crimes and general intent crimes. For specific intent crimes, the DCCA posits that any honestly held mistake as to a relevant matter of fact or law will constitute a defense to the crime charged, regardless of whether the mistake is reasonable or unreasonable.[27] For general intent crimes, however, the DCCA has repeatedly held that only an honestly held and reasonable mistake as to a relevant matter of fact or law will constitute a defense to the crime charged.[28] With respect to claims of accident, in contrast, DCCA case law seems to primarily focus on general intent crimes, to which accidents may constitute a defense.[29] It seems clear, however, that accidents also constitute a defense to specific intent crimes, which entail a higher mens rea.

---

[25] D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 9.600 (collecting relevant cases). As the DCCA recently observed: "The mistake of fact doctrine shields the accused from criminal liability if his or her mistake rebuts the mental state included in the offense." Ortberg v. United States, 81 A.3d 303, 308 (D.C. 2013).

[26] See, e.g., Simms v. District of Columbia, 612 A.2d 215, 219 (D.C. 1992).

[27] See, e.g., Hawkins v. United States, 103 A.3d 199, 201 (D.C. 2014); In re Mitrano, 952 A.2d 901, 905 (D.C. 2008).

[28] See, e.g., Simms v. District of Columbia, 612 A.2d 215, 218 (D.C. 1992); Goddard v. United States, 557 A.2d 1315, 1316 (D.C. 1989); Williams v. United States, 337 A.2d 772, 774–75 (D.C. 1975).

[29] For example, the commentary to the District's criminal jury instructions states that:

The outward clarity and simplicity of the foregoing framework obscures a range of issues, many of which the DCCA has itself recognized. At the heart of the problem is the "venerable common law classification" system it relies upon, offense analysis, which "has been the source of a good deal of confusion."[30] The reasons for this confusion are well known: the central culpability terms that comprise the system, "general intent" and "specific intent," are little more than "rote incantations" of "dubious value,"[31] which can "be too vague or misleading to be dispositive or even helpful."[32] Each term envisions a singular "umbrella culpability requirement that applie[s] in a general way to the offense as a whole."[33] Both, therefore, "fail[] to distinguish between elements of the crime, to which different mental states may apply."[34]

The District's reliance on these ambiguous distinctions to address mistake and accident claims has brought with it the standard litany of consequences associated with offense analysis. The first three problems are primarily relevant to the District's law of mistake.

First, reliance on the distinctions between general intent and specific intent crimes in this context allows for judicial policymaking, given that there is no reliable mechanism, legislative or judicial, for consistently communicating this classification.[35] Second, absent a reliable mechanism for consistently distinguishing between general intent and specific intent crimes, it can be difficult to predict, ex ante, how a District court will exercise its

---

> For offenses that have been understood to be "general intent" crimes, the Committee has settled on describing the required state of mind as the defendant having acted "voluntarily and on purpose, not by mistake or accident." When a "specific intent" is required, the Committee has described the element as the defendant "intended to" cause the required result.

D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 3.100: Defendant's State of Mind—Note. See, e.g., Ortberg, 81 A.3d at 308; Wheeler v. United States, 977 A.2d 973, 993 (D.C. 2009); Kozlovska v. United States, 30 A.3d 799, 801 (D.C. 2011); Carter v. United States, 531 A.2d 956, 964 (D.C. 1987).

[30] Ortberg, 81 A.3d at 307 (quoting United States v. Bailey, 444 U.S. 394, 403 (1980)).

[31] Buchanan v. United States, 32 A.3d 990, 1001 (D.C. 2011) (Ruiz, J. concurring).

[32] Perry v. United States, 36 A.3d 799, 809 n.18 (D.C. 2011).

[33] PAUL H. ROBINSON & MICHAEL T. CAHILL, CRIMINAL LAW 155 (2d ed. 2012).

[34] Ortberg, 81 A.3d at 307.

[35] To take just one example, D.C. Code § 22–3302(a)(1) provides, in relevant part:

> Any person who, without lawful authority, shall enter, or attempt to enter, any private dwelling, building, or other property, or part of such dwelling, building, or other property, against the will of the lawful occupant or of the person lawfully in charge thereof, . . . shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor.

The text of this statute clarifies that "the government must prove (1) entry that is (2) unauthorized—because it is without lawful authority and against the will of owner or lawful occupant." Ortberg, 81 A.3d at 309. "What is less clear," however, "is the mental state or culpable state of mind that must be proved" given that [t]he statute does not expressly address this subject." Id. Nor is there any "legislative history on this provision." Id. Nevertheless, District courts have concluded that the "only state of mind that the government must prove is appellant's general intent to be on the premises contrary to the will of the lawful owner," Artisst v. United States, 554 A.2d 327, 330 (D.C.1989), and, therefore, that only "a reasonable, good faith belief [as to consent] is a valid defense." Ortberg, 81 A.3d at 309. But this is little more than a judicial policy decision, rooted in neither statutory text nor legislative history.

policy discretion over a mistake issue of first impression.[36] And third, judicial reliance on binary, categorical rules concerning whether a mistake is reasonable or unreasonable precludes District judges from accounting for the different kinds of mistakes that might arise—for example, reckless versus negligent mistakes.[37]

The fourth problem has less to do with the classifications of general intent and specific intent themselves than it does with the offense-level analysis of culpability that undergirds them. It is therefore similarly applicable to the District's law of accident. Viewing claims of mistake or accident through the lens of offense analysis has, on occasion, led Superior Court judges to treat issues of mistake and accident as true defenses, when, in fact, they are simply conditions that preclude the government from meeting its burden of proof with respect the culpability required for an offense.[38] In practical effect, this risks improperly shifting the burden of proof concerning an element of an offense onto the accused—something the DCCA has cautioned against in the context of both accident and mistake claims.[39]

All of the foregoing problems should be remedied by subsections (a) and (b) when viewed in light of the element analysis more broadly incorporated into the RCC. Instead of relying on the ambiguous and unpredictable distinctions of general intent and specific intent crimes to address issues of mistake or accident as "defenses," District courts will only need to consider whether—consistent with RCC § 22E-208(a) and (b)—the government is able to meet its affirmative burden of proof as to the culpable mental state requirement governing each offense.

More specifically, if the accident or mistake precludes the government from meeting its burden then it is, by virtue of an offense definition, an appropriate basis for exoneration. But if, in contrast, it does not preclude the government from meeting its burden, then—again, by virtue of an offense definition—that accident or mistake is appropriately ignored. In either case, however, the ultimate policy decision will reside with the legislature, contingent upon the legislature's decision concerning which culpable mental state, if any, to apply to each objective element of an offense.

---

[36] To that end, the commentary on the District's criminal jury instructions states that: "[N]o general pattern instruction on these defenses could adequately provide for the range of contexts in which they arise, without resorting to a confusing array of alternative selections." D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 9.600: Defenses of Accident and Mistake—Note.

[37] As one commentator observes:

> A "reckless mistake" is one in which the actor does not know with a substantial certainty that the element exists, but is aware of "a substantial … risk that the … element exists." A "negligent mistake" is one in which the actor is not, but should be aware of a substantial risk that the element exists and such unawareness is "a gross deviation from the standard of care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation."

PAUL H. ROBINSON, 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 62 (Westlaw 2017).

[38] The DCCA has recently observed this much, noting in the context of trespass that "the existence of a reasonable, good faith belief is a valid defense precisely because it precludes the government from proving what it must—that a defendant knew or should have known that his entry was against the will of the lawful occupant." Ortberg, 81 A.3d at 308–09.

[39] See, e.g., Clark v. United States, 593 A.2d 186, 194 (D.C. 1991); Simms, 612 A.2d at 219; Carter, 531 at 964.

RCC § 22E-208(c): Relation to Current District Law on Culpability as to Criminality. Subsection (c) is in accordance with District law governing the relationship between mistake or ignorance as to a matter of penal law and criminal liability.

It is well established under DCCA case law that, in general, neither ignorance nor mistake as to a matter of penal law is a defense.[40] As the DCCA has recently observed, "[it] is a common maxim, familiar to all minds, that ignorance of the law will not excuse any person, either civilly or criminally."[41] In practice, this means that (for example) "a defendant who knows he is distributing heroin but does not know that heroin is listed on the schedules [would] be guilty of knowingly distributing 'a controlled substance.'"[42] Under these circumstances, the ignorance of the law maxim precludes a defendant from prevailing on a claim that his or her lack of knowledge concerning the definition of the crime in question should constitute a defense.[43]

At the same time, however, the DCCA has also recognized that under "unusual circumstances" this maxim must give way to other general legal principles.[44] Most obvious is the principle that the government must prove all offense elements beyond a reasonable [40] See, e.g., Bsharah v. United States, 646 A.2d 993, 1000 (D.C. 1994) (quoting Morgan v. District of Columbia, 476 A.2d 1128, 1133 (D.C. 1984) ("It is [] solidly established that "[g]eneral intent is not negated by a mistaken belief about the applicability of a penal law."); Abney v. United States, 616 A.2d 856, 857-58, 863 (D.C. 1992).

---

[41] Conley v. United States, 79 A.3d 270, 281 (D.C. 2013) (quoting Barlow v. United States, 32 U.S. (7 Pet.) 404, 411, 8 L.Ed. 728 (1833)); see, e.g., McFadden v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2298, 2304, 192 L. Ed. 2d 260 (2015) ("[I]gnorance of the law is typically no defense to criminal prosecution"); Cheek v. United States, 498 U.S. 192, 199, 111 S.Ct. 604, 112 L.Ed.2d 617 (1991) ("The general rule that ignorance of the law or a mistake of law is no defense to criminal prosecution is deeply rooted in the American legal system.").

[42] McFadden, 135 S. Ct. at 2304.

[43] Ignorance or mistake as to a matter of penal law is to be contrasted with ignorance or mistake as to a matter of non-penal law. The latter form of mistake/ignorance arises in prosecutions for an offense comprised of a circumstance element the satisfaction of which hinges upon a legal judgment extrinsic to the definition of that offense. Consider, for example, the District's taking property without right (TPWR) offense, which applies to a person who takes and carries away the "property of another" and does so "without right to do so." D.C. Code § 22-3216. To determine whether the circumstance element, "property of another," is satisfied hinges upon a determination that the property taken does not qualify as abandoned under civil law. And to determine whether the circumstance element, "without right to do so," is satisfied hinges upon a determination that the defendant lacks a claim of right to take the property under civil law. Notwithstanding the legal nature of these circumstance elements, however, DCCA case law appears to indicate that a person who makes a reasonable mistake (or possesses reasonable ignorance) as to either—i.e. as to whether property has actually been abandoned or a claim of right actually exists—cannot be convicted of the offense because it would negate the culpable mental state requirement governing the offense. See, e.g., Hawkins v. United States, 103 A.3d 199, 201 (D.C. 2014) (reasonable mistake as to abandonment constitutes a defense to general intent crimes, such as taking property without right); Simms v. D.C., 612 A.2d 215, 219 (D.C. 1992) (defendant may raise reasonable mistake defense "based on a defendant's belief that property was abandoned by its owner" to disprove mens rea of vehicular tampering, which only applies where the automobile was owned by another person"); Ortberg v. United States, 81 A.3d 303, 308 (D.C. 2013) ("[T]he requisite criminal intent for unlawful entry" cannot be established "[w]hen a person enters a place with . . . a bona fide belief in his or her right to enter.") (italics added) (quoting Darab v. United States, 623 A.2d 127, 136 (D.C.1993); Morgan v. District of Columbia, 476 A.2d 1128, 1133 (D.C. 1984) ("bona fide belief defense" applies to "a reasonable mistake as to a non-penal property law which, if not a mistake, would justify remaining on the property. . . .") (italics added).

[44] Conley, 79 A.3d at 281.

doubt.[45] On rare occasion, for example, the District's criminal offenses appear to explicitly incorporate a knowledge-of-the-law requirement (i.e. apply a culpable mental state of knowingly to the illegality of one's conduct). To illustrate, consider a penalty provision in the District's campaign finance statute, which subjects to a five year (maximum) criminal penalty any person who "knowingly violates" any of the relevant prohibitions.[46] In a prosecution premised on this provision, a person's mistake or ignorance as to the scope of this criminal law presumably would "excuse" because: (1) the government must prove the elements of an offense beyond a reasonable doubt; (2) knowledge of the law is an element of the offense; and, therefore, (3) the person's mistake or ignorance would preclude the government from establishing the requisite knowledge.[47]

Another "bedrock principle[] of American criminal law" that may supersede the "ignorance of the law will not excuse any person" maxim has been articulated by the DCCA as follows: "It is wrong to convict a person of a crime if he had no reason to believe that the act for which he was convicted was a crime . . . ."[48] The DCCA's recent opinion in Conley v. United States is illustrative. In that case, the court struck down a District statute criminalizing unlawful presence in a motor vehicle containing a firearm[49] on the basis that it "criminalize[d] entirely innocent behavior—merely remaining in the vicinity of a firearm in a vehicle[]—without requiring the government to prove that the defendant had notice of any legal duty to behave otherwise."[50] The Conley decision rested upon the court's reading of the U.S. Supreme Court's opinion in Lambert v. California, which, in the view of the DCCA, stands for the proposition that "it is incompatible with due process to convict a person of a crime based on the failure to take a legally required action—a crime of omission—if he had no reason to believe he had a legal duty to act, or even that his failure to act was blameworthy."[51] In practical effect, then, the Conley decision amounts to an implicit constitutional requirement of negligence as to illegality in cases of omission liability.

Beyond mere negation of (exceedingly rare) culpability as to illegality requirements, District law appears to recognize the possibility that a person's mistake or ignorance as to a matter of penal law can excuse in the traditional sense—i.e. where the government meets the affirmative requirements of liability—under certain narrow sets of [45] See, e.g., Conley v. United States, 79 A.3d 270, 278 (D.C. 2013) (quoting Patterson v. New York, 432 U.S. 197, 210 (1977)); Rose v. United States, 535 A.2d 849, 852 (D.C. 1987).

---

[46] See, e.g., D.C. Code § 1-1163.35(c) ("Any person who knowingly violates any of the provisions of Parts A through E of this subchapter shall be subject to criminal prosecution and, upon conviction, shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, or imprisoned for not longer than 5 years, or both."); see also Trice v. United States, 525 A.2d 176, 179 (D.C. 1987). ("The crime of bail jumping, under D.C. Code § 23-1327(a)[], has four elements. The trier of fact must find (1) that the defendant was released pending trial or sentencing, (2) that he was required to appear in court on a specified date or at a specified time, (3) that he failed to appear, and (4) that his failure was willful.") (italics added); Jenkins v. United States, 415 A.2d 545, 547 (D.C. 1980) (holding that where there was testimony that "certain words had been said to appellant which could have given rise to a good faith and reasonable belief that his case had been dismissed[,]" that story, "if believed by the jury, would constitute a valid defense to a charge of 'willfully' failing to appear").

[47] Conley, 79 A.3d at 278 (quoting Patterson, 432 U.S. at 210 (1977)); Rose, 535 A.2d at 852.

[48] Conley, 79 A.3d at 281 (quoting United States v. Wilson, 159 F.3d 280, 293 (7th Cir.1998)(Posner, J., dissenting).

[49] D.C. Code § 22-2511 (Repealed).

[50] 79 A.3d at 273.

[51] Id. at 273.

circumstances. The DCCA's decision in Bsharah v. United States is illustrative.[52] In that case, the DCCA recognized that a more conventional excuse for a mistake or ignorance as to illegality might be "available to a defendant who 'reasonably' relied on a [mistaken] conclusion or statement of law 'issued by an official charged with interpretation, administration, and/or enforcement responsibilities in the relevant legal field.'"[53] The details of the case illustrate the basis for, and potential contours of, this kind of narrow excuse defense.

At trial, the defendants, White and Bsharah, argued that their convictions for carrying a pistol without a license, possession of an unregistered firearm, and possession of unregistered ammunition should be vacated because, inter alia, "they had been advised by the station manager at the Virginia Square subway station that they could lawfully carry their guns in the District of Columbia."[54] "The trial judge, however, refused to allow them to argue this point to the jury and refused to give an instruction on mistake of law as a defense to the charges."[55] Thereafter, on appeal, White and Bsharah asked the DCCA to carve out a narrow exception to the general ignorance of the law will not excuse maxim on the basis that "they reasonably relied upon the advice of the Metro station manager."[56]

In resolving their argument, the DCCA observed the substantial precedent supporting this kind of exception. Not only had "[t]he defense advanced by White and Bsharah" been recognized by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit in 1976,[57] but, preceding that decision, had "originated in two Supreme Court cases."[58] Specifically:

> In Raley v. Ohio, 360 U.S. 423, 79 S.Ct. 1257, 3 L.Ed.2d 1344 (1959), the defendants were convicted of contempt for refusing to answer certain questions put to them by a state investigating commission, even though they had relied on prior assurances by the chairman of the same commission that they were entitled to assert their Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination. Unknown to the chairman, his advice was contrary to state law. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court reversed the convictions because of the chairman's erroneous assurance to the defendants that they could lawfully refuse to answer . . . A few years later, in Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 559, 85 S.Ct. 476, 13 L.Ed.2d 487 (1965), the Court reversed the convictions of a group of picketers who had been demonstrating across the street from a courthouse, contrary to state law, because the local chief of police had given them permission to picket at that location . . . .[59]

Ultimately, however, the DCCA concluded that the defendants were not entitled to any relief, having deemed the "instant case" distinguishable from existing authorities in two key ways: (1) "the Metro station manager had no authority, real or apparent, to give

[52] 646 A.2d 993, 1000 (D.C. 1994).
[53] Id. at 1000 (quoting United States v. Barker, 546 F.2d 940, 955 (D.C. Cir. 1976) and citing Model Penal Code § 2.04(3)(b).)
[54] Id. at 999.
[55] Id.
[56] Id. at 1000.
[57] United States v. Barker, 546 F.2d 940, 955 (D.C. Cir. 1976)
[58] Bsharah, 646 A.2d at 1000.
[59] Id.

these appellants any advice whatever about the District of Columbia firearms laws"; and (2) "appellants' reliance on the station manager's advice was inherently unreasonable."[60] Nevertheless, the clear import of the Bsharah decision is that had the defendants' claims been indistinguishable from the relevant authorities, then their mistake of penal law defense could have provided the basis for avoiding liability.

In accordance with the above case law, RCC § 22E-208(c) both codifies and synthesizes District law relevant to culpability as to criminality as follows. The prefatory clause in subsection (c) articulates the general ignorance of the law will not excuse maxim through a presumption that "[a] person remains liable for an offense although he or she is mistaken or ignorant as to the illegality of his or her conduct." The balance of the provision thereafter recognizes the possibility of two different kinds of exceptions to this general presumption.

The first exception, addressed in paragraph (c)(1), is where defendant is being prosecuted under a statute that requires proof of a culpable mental state (e.g., knowledge, intent, recklessness, or negligence) as to the illegality of one's conduct.[61] In these circumstances, the defendant's mistake or ignorance as to the prohibited nature of his or her conduct must be subjected to the same logical relevance analysis set forth in RCC § 22E-208(a), namely, did the mistake or ignorance "negate[] th[e] culpable mental state" applicable to the required circumstance of illegality?

The second exception, addressed in paragraph (c)(2), is where "[t]he person's mistake or ignorance satisfies the requirements of a general defense."[62] This catch-all provision allows for the possibility that mistake or ignorance as to the illegality of one's conduct might, under limited circumstances, constitute a true "excuse" in the sense of exculpating a defendant who otherwise satisfies the affirmative elements of an offense.

RCC § 22E-208(d): Relation to Current District Law on Deliberate Ignorance. Subsection (d) is generally in accordance with, but fills a gap in, District law governing deliberate ignorance.

The DCCA has only issued one opinion directly addressing the issue of deliberate ignorance, Owens v. United States, and it is a case that is primarily concerned with the culpability required for the District's RSP statute.[63] That statute penalizes a person who "buys, receives, possesses, or obtains control of stolen property, knowing or having reason to believe that the property was stolen."[64]

At issue in Owens was whether the italicized "having reason to believe" language embodies an objective, negligence-like standard, or, alternatively, a subjective standard akin to knowledge. The DCCA ultimately concluded that "the mental state for RSP is a subjective one" akin to knowledge[65]; however, the Owens court also recognized—quoting from the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit's (CADC) decision in United States v. Gallo[66]—that although "[g]uilty knowledge cannot be established by demonstrating mere negligence or even foolishness on the part of the defendant," it may nevertheless "be

[60] Id. at 1001.
[61] RCC § 22E-208(c)(1).
[62] RCC § 22E-208(c)(2).
[63] 90 A.3d 1118, 1122-23 (D.C. 2014).
[64] D.C. Code § 22-3232(a).
[65] Owens, 90 A.3d at 1121.
[66] 543 F.2d 361, 369 n.6 (D.C. Cir. 1976).

satisfied by proof that the defendant deliberately closed his eyes to what otherwise would have been obvious to him."[67]

"Following these principles," the DCCA went on to explain that when the government proceeds, not "on a theory of actual knowledge," but rather on the basis that "the defendant had 'reason to believe' the property was stolen," Superior Court judges should provide an instruction that incorporates the above-quoted language on deliberate ignorance from Gallo.[68]

No other DCCA case expressly applies the doctrine of deliberate ignorance; however, the Court of Appeals has, over the years, made a variety of passing observations—in both the criminal[69] and civil[70] contexts—which generally suggest that deliberate ignorance doctrine is indeed a generally applicable principle in the District.

Section (d) fills in the foregoing gap in District law in a manner that is broadly consistent with the Owens decision.[71]

RCC § 22E-209. PRINCIPLES OF LIABILITY GOVERNING INTOXICATION.

Explanatory Notes. Section 209 establishes general principles of liability governing the relationship between intoxication and the culpable mental state requirement applicable to individual offenses under the RCC.[1]

---

[67] Owens, 90 A.3d at 1122.

[68] Id. More specifically, Superior Court judges are supposed to provide an instruction that reads, in relevant part:

> [RSP] requires that the defendant either knew or had reason to believe that the property was stolen. This state of mind is a subjective one, focusing on the defendant's actual state of mind, and not simply on what a reasonable person might have thought. In determining whether the government has met its burden of proving the defendant's subjective state of mind, you may consider what a reasonable person would have believed under the facts and circumstances as you find them. But guilty knowledge cannot be established by demonstrating mere negligence or even foolishness on the part of the defendant. It may, nonetheless, be satisfied by proof beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant deliberately closed his eyes to what otherwise would have been obvious to him.

Id.

[69] See Santos v. District of Columbia, 940 A.2d 113, 117 n.21 (D.C. 2007).

[70] See In re Cater, 887 A.2d 1, 26 (D.C. 2005); In re Owusu, 886 A.2d 536, 542 (D.C. 2005).

[71] See also, e.g., United States v. Alston-Graves, 435 F.3d 331, 341 (D.C. Cir. 2006) (willful blindness instruction should not be given unless there is evidence that the defendant "purposely contrived to avoid learning all the facts in order to have a defense in the event of a subsequent prosecution.") (quoting United States v. Espinoza, 244 F.3d 1234, 1242 (10th Cir. 2001) (quoting United States v. Hanzlicek, 187 F.3d 1228, 1233 (10th Cir. 1999)) (internal quotation mark omitted); accord United States v. Heredia, 429 F.3d 820, 824 (9th Cir. 2005); United States v. Puche, 350 F.3d 1137, 1149 (11th Cir. 2003); United States v. Willis, 277 F.3d 1026, 1032 (8th Cir. 2002).

[1] This relationship is to be distinguished from the relationship between intoxication and the availability of an affirmative defense akin to insanity, which would be raised by a claim that "although [the defendant] had the requisite mens rea to commit the offense and was conscious when he was acting, the intoxicants rendered him temporarily insane." JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 24.01[D] (6th ed. 2012). Section 209 is not intended to have any impact on the resolution of general defense claims of this nature.

Nor is section 209 intended to have any impact on the meaning, interpretation, or application of intoxication as an objective element. For example, some criminal offenses prohibit engaging in certain forms of conduct while in an intoxicated state. See, e.g., D.C. Code § 50-2206.11 ("No person shall operate or be

Subsection (a) states the general effect of intoxication—defined in paragraph (d)(1) as a disturbance of mental or physical capacities resulting from the introduction of substances into one's body[2]—on offense liability. It broadly clarifies that a person's intoxicated state will relieve that person of liability when (but only when) it precludes the person from acting with the culpable mental state required for a result or circumstance element.[3] This means that the relationship between the culpable mental state requirement governing an offense and intoxication is typically one of logical relevance: intoxication is relevant when (but only when) it prevents the government from meeting its affirmative burden of proof with respect to a culpable mental state required for a result or circumstance element.[4] In this sense, intoxication does not—generally speaking[5]—constitute a defense, but rather, simply describes conditions that may preclude the government from establishing liability.[6]

Subsection (b) clarifies the nature of the correspondence between intoxication and culpable mental states under the RCC. It provides a set of general rules that may serve as a useful guide for the courts in determining when intoxication is capable of negating the existence of a culpable mental state. First, these rules generally establish that intoxication negates the existence of any subjective culpable mental state—namely, purpose, knowledge, intent, and the conscious disregard component of recklessness[7]—when, due to a person's intoxicated state, that person does not act with the necessary desire or level of awareness that must be proven as to a given result or circumstance element.[8] Second, these in physical control of any vehicle in the District: (1) While the person is intoxicated; or (2) While the person is under the influence of alcohol or any drug or any combination thereof.") (italics added). The general culpability principles stated in section 209 should not be construed as altering the government's burden of proof for the intoxication-related objective element(s) that comprise these offense definitions. See, e.g., WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 9.5(a) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) ("One who is charged with having committed a crime may claim in his defense that, at the time, he was intoxicated[] and so is not guilty. If the crime in question is that of driving while intoxicated, or of being drunk in a public place, he will not get very far with the defense, for with such crimes intoxication, far from being a defense, is an element of the crime.").

---

[2] RCC § 22E-209(d)(1); see, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.08(5)(a) (defining intoxication).

[3] See, e.g., LAFAVE, supra note 1, at 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 9.5(a) n.7 ("Intoxication is a defense to crime if it negatives a required element of the crime; and this is so whether the intoxication is voluntary or involuntary.").

[4] Note, however, that RCC § 22E-209(c) addresses a particular situation where, although an actor's intoxication negates the culpable mental state of recklessness, that culpable mental state is nevertheless imputed on policy grounds.

[5] But see DRESSLER, supra note 1, at § 24.01[D] ("[U]nder very limited circumstances an intoxication [] defense is recognized when an actor becomes 'temporarily insane' as the result of the introduction of drugs, alcohol, or other foreign substances into the body."); LAFAVE, supra note 1, at 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 9.5(a) ("Where the intoxication was 'involuntary,' it may be a defense in the same circumstances as would insanity.")

[6] See, e.g., PAUL H. ROBINSON, 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 65 (Westlaw 2019) ("[W]hen an actor's intoxication negates a culpable state of mind required by an offense definition," this raises "a 'failure of proof' defense where the defendant has a defense because the prosecution is unable to prove all the required elements of the offense.").

[7] RCC §§ 22E-206(a), (b), (c)(1)(A), and (c)(2)(A).

[8] See RCC §§ 22E-209(b)(1), (2), and (3)(A). In general, there are two basic categories of intoxication under the RCC framework: intoxication that is self-induced, and intoxication that is non self-induced (i.e. involuntary intoxication). See RCC § 22E-209(d)(2) (defining self-induced intoxication). The difference between these two forms of intoxication is immaterial for purposes of evaluating the culpable mental states of purpose, knowledge, and intent. However, the distinction matters for purposes of evaluating the conscious disregard component of the RCC definition of recklessness. See RCC §§ 22E-206(c)(1)(A) and (2)(A) (requiring proof that the accused "consciously disregards a substantial risk"). Whereas a person's non selfrules further clarify that intoxication may also negate the objective component of recklessness and the objective culpable mental state of negligence when, due to a person's intoxicated state, that person's disregard of a risk is not a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct or care under the circumstances proscribed by the RCC definitions of recklessness and negligence.[9]

One critical circumstance, for purposes of evaluating the relationship between intoxication and the degree to which a person's deviated from the standard of conduct or care under this context-sensitive culpability analysis, is the origin of a person's intoxicated state.[10] The most important distinction to be made relates to whether intoxication is "self-induced," which is defined in paragraph (d)(2) as the knowing introduction into the body of a substance when at least negligent as to the tendency of the substance to be intoxicating and not acting pursuant to medical advice or circumstances that would establish a justification or excuse defense.[11] In general, self-induced intoxication will support a finding that the person grossly deviated from the ordinary standard of care or conduct under the RCC, and in many instances will serve to establish a gross deviation.[12] In contrast, intoxication that is not self-induced generally will not support a finding that a person's conduct grossly deviated from the ordinary standard of care or conduct.[13] Ultimately, induced state of intoxication necessarily negates recklessness when it precludes that person from acting with the requisite awareness of a substantial risk, a person's self-induced state of intoxication can provide the basis for imputing the requisite awareness of a substantial risk to a person who otherwise lacks it under the conditions specified in subsection (c). See RCC § 22E-209(b)(3) ("Except as otherwise provided in subsection (c)," which recognizes imputation of recklessness for self-induced intoxication).

[9] That is, the "nature and degree" of the risk, the "nature of and motivation for the person's conduct," and the "circumstances the person is aware of." RCC §§ 206(c)(1)(B), (c)(2)(B), (d)(1)(B), (d)(2)(B), and accompanying Explanatory Notes.

[10] Which is to say, the nature of a person's intoxicated state is part and parcel with the "nature [] of the person's conduct" under RCC §§ 206(c)(1)(B), (c)(2)(B), (d)(1)(B), and (d)(2)(B).

[11] RCC § 22E-209(d)(2); see also Model Penal Code § 2.08(5)(a) (defining self-induced intoxication). The RCC uses the phrase "self-induced intoxication," rather than "voluntary intoxication," to avoid any confusion with the voluntariness requirement proscribed in RCC § 22E-203. The RCC also uses the defined culpable mental state term "negligently" to more clearly indicate the kind of culpability needed sa to the tendency of the substances to cause intoxication.

[12] Illustrative is the situation of X, who knowingly drinks a significant amount of alcohol at a rowdy fraternity party, and thereafter, in a highly inebriated state, walks onto the patio, grabs a golf club, and begins hitting golf balls out of the yard, which repeatedly shatter the windows of nearby homes and ultimately causes $30,000 dollars in damage. If X is subsequently charged with recklessly damaging property, X's self-induced state of intoxication at the moment he began hitting golf balls only bolsters a finding that X's conduct manifests a culpable failure to afford the homeowners' property interests a reasonable level of concern. Therefore, X's disregard of the risk—when viewed in light of the circumstances, including his intoxication—would satisfy the gross deviation standard governing the RCC definition of recklessness.

[13] Illustrative is the situation of X, who is unknowingly drugged by someone at house party, thereafter leaves in her vehicle, and then subsequently falls asleep at the wheel, thereby fatally crashing into another driver, V. If X is charged with negligent homicide, X's involuntary state of intoxication strongly suggests that her failure to perceive a substantial risk of death to V does not, in fact, manifest a culpable failure to attend to V's personal safety under the circumstances. Instead, X's conduct appears to be entirely attributable to the influence of sleep inducing drugs, the consumption of which X bears no responsibility. Therefore, X's disregard of the risk—when viewed in light of the circumstances, including her intoxication—would not meet the gross deviation standard applicable to the RCC definition of negligence.

though, these are only general presumptions, each of which is subject to possible exception based upon the facts of a given case.[14]

Subsection (c) establishes a principle of imputation to deal with the culpability issues that self-induced intoxication raises for proof of the subjective component of [14] For example, in rare situations it is possible for a person's self-induced intoxication to be consistent with the ordinary standard of care or conduct. This is perhaps clearest where a person's state of self-induced intoxication is unusual and pathological—i.e. "grossly excessive in degree, given the amount of the intoxicant, to which the actor does not know he is susceptible." Model Penal Code § 2.08(5)(c). The following hypothetical is illustrative. X consumes a single alcoholic beverage at an office holiday party, and immediately thereafter departs to the metro. While waiting for the train, X begins to experience an extremely high level of intoxication—unbeknownst to X, the drink has interacted with an allergy medication she is taking, thereby producing a level of intoxication ten times greater than what X normally experiences from that amount of alcohol. As a result, X has a difficult time standing straight, and ends up stumbling in another train-goer, V, who X fatally knocks onto the tracks just as the train is approaching.

If X is subsequently charged with either reckless manslaughter or negligent homicide on these facts, her self-induced state of intoxication—when viewed in light of the surrounding circumstances—suggests that the gross deviation standard governing the RCC definitions of recklessness and negligence is not satisfied. It may be true that X, but for her intoxicated state, would have been more careful/aware of V's proximity. Nevertheless, X is only liable for recklessly or negligently killing V under the RCC if X grossly deviated from the ordinary standard of care or conduct. And given that X's minimally-culpable decision to consume a single alcoholic beverage while on her allergy medication is the sole reason X fatally stumbled into V, it simply cannot be said that X grossly deviated from the ordinary standard of care or conduct (i.e. that necessary to support a homicide conviction) under the facts presented.

It is also possible, under narrow circumstances, for a person's self-induced intoxication to be more with the ordinary standard of care or conduct even when it is not pathological. This is reflected in the situation of X, who consumes an extremely large amount of alcohol by herself on the second level of her two-story home. Soon thereafter, X's sister, V, makes an unannounced visit to X's home, lets herself in, and then announces that she's going to walk up to the second story to have a conversation with X. A few moments later, X stumbles into V at the top of the stairs, unaware of V's proximity, thereby causing V to fall to her death.

If X is subsequently charged with either reckless manslaughter or negligent homicide on these facts, her self-induced state of intoxication—when viewed in light of the surrounding circumstances—suggests that the gross deviation standard governing the RCC definitions of recklessness and negligence is not satisfied. It may be true that X, but for her intoxicated state, would have been more careful/aware of V's proximity. Nevertheless, X is only liable for recklessly or negligently killing V under the RCC if X's gross deviated from the ordinary standard of care or conduct. And given that X's minimally-culpable decision to consume a large amount of alcohol in the safety of her own home is the sole reason X fatally stumbled into V, it simply cannot be said that X grossly deviated from the ordinary standard of care or conduct (i.e. that necessary to support a homicide conviction) under the facts presented.

Finally, it is important to note that while non self-induced intoxication will typically make a person's conduct consistent with the ordinary standard of care or conduct, this is not a categorical rule—and thus, it is certainly possible for a person to be convicted of a crime of recklessness and negligence while under its influence. The reason? A person's intoxicated state (whatever its origin) may simply have no bearing on why that person failed to exercise an adequate level of concern or attention for the legally protected interests of others. To illustrate, consider the situation of X, who has a regular practice of texting while driving in school zones, and is also mis-prescribed a slightly intoxicating medication for daily use. One morning, while driving under the influence of that medication, X fatally strikes V, a student-pedestrian walking through a crosswalk. At the time of the accident, X was entirely unaware of V's presence because X was reading a text message on his phone (rather than looking in front of himself).

If X is subsequently charged with negligent homicide on these facts, X's non self-induced state of intoxication would not preclude a conviction. So long as D's failure to perceive the substantial risk of death to V is attributable to his lack of concern for the safety and wellbeing of student-pedestrians like V (in contrast to the influence of the mis-prescribed medication), then D's conduct would be a sufficient deviation from the ordinary standard of care to satisfy the RCC definition of negligence.

recklessness. A person who becomes intoxicated in this manner and then goes on to commit a crime of recklessness may argue that, due to that person's intoxicated state, he or she did not "consciously disregard[] a substantial risk" that a prohibited result would occur or that a prohibited circumstance existed.[15] Nevertheless, given the commonly known risks associated with intoxicants, as well as the fact that the person has in effect culpably created the conditions of his or her own defense, it would be inappropriate to allow for intoxication to exonerate under these circumstances.[16] Consistent with these policy considerations, subsection (c) authorizes the factfinder to impute the requisite recklessness as to a result or circumstance element where the government proves beyond a reasonable doubt that: (1) but for the person's intoxicated state he or she would have been aware of a substantial risk as to that result or circumstance; (2) the person's intoxicated state is self-induced; and (3) the person acted negligently as to the requisite result or circumstance.[17] [15] RCC § 22E-206(c)(1)(A) & (2)(A). It should be noted, however, that it is entirely possible for an actor to be under the influence of self-induced intoxication, yet consciously disregard a substantial risk, in which case it would not be necessary to rely upon subsection (c) to establish the first prong of the RCC definition of recklessness.

---

[16] To illustrate, consider again the situation of X, who knowingly drinks a significant amount of alcohol at a rowdy fraternity party, and thereafter, in a highly inebriated state, walks onto the patio, grabs a golf club, and begins hitting golf balls out of the yard, which repeatedly shatter the windows of nearby homes and ultimately causes $30,000 dollars in damage. See supra note 12 (analyzing same hypothetical). Assume that X, due to his intoxicated state, was completely unaware that—at the moment he began hitting golf balls—there was a substantial risk that property damage would result from his conduct. If X is subsequently prosecuted for second-degree criminal damage to property on these facts, X's lack of awareness could, as a matter of logical relevance, preclude the government from securing a conviction under a recklessness theory of liability. See RCC § 22E-2503 ("Recklessly damages or destroys property and, in fact, the amount of damage is $25,000 or more."). But this would be problematic as a matter of policy/fairness: if the reason why X lacks the requisite awareness is because of his prior culpable decision to get recklessly drunk at the fraternity party, then X's self-induced state of intoxication offers an inappropriate basis for exculpation. See, e.g., Gideon Yaffe, Intoxication, Recklessness, and Negligence, 9 OHIO ST. J. CRIM. L. 545, 573 (2012) ("[I]f the defendant's act of becoming intoxicated is unjustified . . . and the defendant is aware of the relevant risked harms when he chooses to become intoxicated, then his act of becoming intoxicated is itself reckless."); Paul H. Robinson, Causing the Conditions of One's Own Defense: A Study in the Limits of Theory in Criminal Law Doctrine, 71 VA. L. REV. 1, 31 (1985) ("Where the actor is not only culpable as to causing the defense conditions, but also has a culpable state of mind as to causing himself to engage in the conduct constituting the offense, the state should be punish him for causing the ultimate justified or excused conduct.") (italics added).

[17] According to the same logic, the general provisions governing the relationship between intoxication and the culpable mental states of purpose, knowledge, and intent (i.e. RCC § 22E-209(b)(1) and (2)) should be construed to preserve liability in situations involving a person's self-induced intoxication, which is intended to create the conditions for an absent-element defense. If, under these circumstances, the actor possesses the statutorily-required purpose, knowledge, or intent at the point in which he or she begins consuming intoxicating substances, then the fact that he or she subsequently lacks the requisite desire or state of awareness at the precise moment the conduct constituting the offense is completed should not preclude a finding that the person satisfied the offense's culpable mental state requirement. See Robinson, supra note 16, at 35 (Observing that, in these kinds of situations, "[t]he actor's liability for the offense may be based on his conduct at the time he becomes voluntary intoxicated and his accompanying state of mind as to the elements of the subsequent offense.").

The following situation is illustrative. X desires to have sex with V, who is happily married and has previously expressed V's firm lack of romantic interest in X on multiple occasions. Soon after the last rejection, X realizes that the only way he'll ever have sex with Y is by force; however, X also realizes that he lacks the temperament necessary to follow through on this criminal intent. To address the perceived Relation to Current District Law. Section 209 codifies, clarifies, fills in gaps, changes, and enhances the proportionality of the District law governing the relationship between intoxication and the culpable mental state requirement governing an individual offense.

As a legislative matter, the D.C. Code is almost entirely silent[18] on when an actor's intoxicated state can or should preclude the government from being able to establish that he or she possessed the state of mind necessary for a conviction.[19] The absence of relevant intoxication legislation has effectively delegated this critical and frequently occurring liability issue to the District's judiciary. However, the judges on the D.C. Superior Court and D.C. Court of Appeals have relied on the ambiguous and confusing distinction between general and specific intent crimes to address the relationship between intoxication and the government's affirmative burden of proof. This has resulted in a body of common law intoxication policies that are frequently confusing, often inconsistent, and almost always piecemeal (as is the case in every other jurisdiction that has relied on offense analysis to develop its law of intoxication).[20] RCC § 22E-209 replaces this judicially created, offense analysis-based approach with a clear and consistent legislative framework for analyzing the relationship between intoxication and culpable mental states on an element-by-element basis.

---

deficiency (and strengthen his resolve), X purchases a large amount of Phencyclidine (PCP) and cocaine, which X subsequently consumes a few hours before a party that he knows V will be attending by herself. Later on that evening, while at the party, X asks Y to step into an empty bedroom for a brief discussion, at which point X proceeds to pin Y's hands behind her back and engage in non-consensual, forceful intercourse. However, due to his extreme state of intoxication, at the time of intercourse X honestly perceives the sexual interaction with Y to be a consensual, passionate expression of long-suppressed mutual affection. X is subsequently prosecuted for first-degree sexual assault on a theory of liability requiring knowledge. See RCC § 22E-1301(a).

On these facts, X's lack of awareness concerning the non-consensual, forceful nature of the intercourse at the moment it occurred should not preclude a finding of guilt, provided the prosecution can establish that X was practically certain that—at the moment he became intoxicated—the forceful sexual act he intended to facilitate would be non-consensual. See Robinson, supra note 16, at 51 ("If an actor's intoxication negates a required culpability element at the time of the offense, such element is nonetheless established if the actor satisfied such element immediately preceding or during the time that he was becoming intoxicated or at any time thereafter until commission of the offense, and the harm or evil he intended, contemplated, or risked is brought about by the actor's subsequent conduct during intoxication.").

[18] One noteworthy example is the District's medical marijuana statute, D.C. Code § 7-1671.03, which establishes that "[t]he use of medical marijuana as authorized by this chapter and the rules issued pursuant to § 7-1671.13 does not create a defense to any crime and does not negate the mens rea element for any crime except to the extent of the voluntary-intoxication defense recognized in District of Columbia law."

[19] This issue, which lies at the intersection of intoxication and the culpable mental state requirement governing individual offenses, is to be distinguished from the relationship between intoxication and affirmative defenses (e.g., insanity), which is not addressed by RCC § 22E-209. See generally, e.g., McNeil v. United States, 933 A.2d 354 (D.C. 2007); Bethea v. United States, 365 A.2d 64, 72 (D.C. 1976).

[20] See generally, e.g., DRESSLER, supra note 1, at § 24.03; Miguel Angel Mendez, A Sisyphean Task: The Common Law Approach to Mens Rea, 28 U.C. DAVIS L. REV. 407 (1995); PAUL H. ROBINSON, 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 65 (Westlaw 2019); Model Penal Code § 2.08 cmt. at 354-59; NATIONAL COMMISSION ON REFORM OF FEDERAL CRIMINAL LAWS, 1WORKING PAPERS OF THE NATIONAL COMMISSION ON REFORM OF FEDERAL CRIMINAL LAWS 224 (1970) (hereinafter "Working Papers").

Under District case law, "a person may not voluntarily become intoxicated and use that condition, generally, as a defense to criminal behavior."[21] Rather, an actor's voluntary intoxication, to the extent it is legally relevant, must create a "reasonable doubt about whether [the defendant] could or did form the intent to [commit the charged crime]."[22] To be entitled to a jury instruction on voluntary intoxication as a defense, the evidence "must reveal such a degree of complete drunkenness that a person is incapable of forming the necessary intent essential to the commission of the crime charged."[23] However, evidence of a defendant's intoxicated state may still be introduced even when it falls short of the standard for a voluntary intoxication jury instruction so long as it negates intent.[24]

To determine when voluntary intoxication can effectively negate intent, District courts typically distinguish between "general intent" crimes, which do not require "an intent that is susceptible to negation through a showing of voluntary intoxication"[25] and "specific intent" crimes, which are susceptible to this kind of negation.[26] According to this dichotomy, an intoxication defense may be raised where a specific intent crime is charged, as reflected in DCCA case law on the availability of an intoxication defense for crimes such as attempted burglary,[27] first degree murder,[28] robbery,[29] and assault with intent to kill.[30] But an intoxication defense is not available where a general intent crime is charged, as reflected in DCCA case law rejecting the viability of an intoxication defense to crimes

---

[21] McNeil, 933 A.2d at 363. The case law discussed in this section generally refers to voluntary (or self-induced) intoxication without saying much about involuntary intoxication. In Easter v. District of Columbia, the CADC observed: "Where the accused becomes intoxicated without his consent, through force or fraud of another person, his condition is that of involuntary drunkenness and a criminal act committed by him while in such state may be defended by whatever the circumstances justify." 209 A.2d 625, 627 (D.C. 1965) (citing Choate v. State, 197 P. 1060 (Okl. 1921)). And in Salzman v. United States, the CADC observed that "where a person has been involuntarily made intoxicated by the actions of others" he or she "may raise involuntariness as a defense to criminal prosecution." 405 F.2d 358, 364 (D.C. Cir. 1968).

[22] D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 9.404; see, e.g., Harris v. United States, 375 A.2d 505, 508 (D.C. 1977).

[23] Bell v. United States, 950 A.2d 56, 65 (D.C. 2008) (quotations and citations omitted); see, e.g., Wilson-Bey v. United States, 903 A.2d 818, 844-45 (D.C. 2006) (en banc); Smith v. United States, 309 A.2d 58, 59 (D.C. 1973); Jones v. Holt, 893 F. Supp. 2d 185, 198 (D.D.C. 2012). In other words, a jury may only be instructed on the issue of voluntary intoxication upon "evidence that the defendant has reached a point of incapacitating intoxication." Washington v. United States, 689 A.2d 568, 573 (D.C. 1997); see Heideman v. United States, 259 F.2d 943, 946 (D.C. Cir. 1958).

[24] See, e.g., Bell, 950 A.2d at 65 n.5; Washington, 689 A.2d at 574; Riddick v. United States, 806 A.2d 631, 640–41 (D.C. 2002). Whether intoxication evidence may be presented when it cannot negate intent is less clear. Compare Carter v. United States, 531 A.2d 956, 959, 963 (D.C. 1987) with Cooper v. United States, 680 A.2d 1370, 1372 (D.C. 1996); Parker v. United States, 359 F.2d 1009, 1012–13 (D.C. Cir. 1966)); see also Buchanan v. United States, 32 A.3d 990, 996 (D.C. 2011) (Ruiz, J., concurring) (discussing Parker).

[25] Parker, 359 F.2d at 1012-13; see, e.g., Washington, 689 A.2d at 573.

[26] Kyle v. United States, 759 A.2d 192, 199-200 (D.C. 2000). In other words, "[i]ntoxication . . . is material only to negate specific intent." Id. (citing Parker, 359 F.2d at 1012).

[27] See Hebble v. United States, 257 A.2d 483 (D.C. 1969).

[28] See Harris, 375 A.2d at 505.

[29] See Bell, 950 A.2d at 74.

[30] See Washington, 689 A.2d at 573.

such as second-degree murder,[31] manslaughter,[32] MDP,[33] assault,[34] and first-degree sex abuse.[35]

The outward clarity and simplicity of this intoxication framework obscures a range of issues, many of which the DCCA has itself generally recognized. At the heart of the problem is the "venerable common law classification" system it relies upon, offense analysis, which "has been the source of a good deal of confusion."[36] The reasons for this confusion are well known: the central culpability terms that comprise the system, "general intent" and "specific intent," are little more than "rote incantations" of "dubious value,"[37] which can "be too vague or misleading to be dispositive or even helpful."[38] Each term envisions a singular "umbrella culpability requirement that applie[s] in a general way to the offense as a whole."[39] Both, therefore, "fail[] to distinguish between elements of the crime, to which different mental states may apply."[40]

The District's reliance on these ambiguous distinctions between general and specific intent to address the relationship between intoxication and the culpable mental state requirement applicable to individual offenses has brought with it the standard litany of problems associated with offense analysis.

First, reliance on the distinction between general intent and specific intent crimes to address issues of intoxication allows for judicial policymaking, given that there is no reliable mechanism, legislative or judicial, for consistently communicating this classification.[41]

Second, absent a reliable mechanism for consistently distinguishing between general intent and specific intent crimes, it can be difficult to predict, ex ante, how a District court will exercise its policy discretion over an intoxication issue of first impression.[42]

Third, judicial reliance on binary, categorical rules concerning whether intoxication constitutes a defense precludes District judges from accounting for those offenses subject

---

[31] See Wheeler, 832 A.2d at 1273.
[32] See Bishop v. United States, 107 F.2d 297, 301 (D.C. Cir. 1939).
[33] See Carter, 531 A.2d at 961.
[34] See Parker, 359 F.2d at 1013.
[35] See Kyle, 759 A.2d at 200.
[36] Ortberg, 81 A.3d at 307 (quoting United States v. Bailey, 444 U.S. 394, 403 (1980)).
[37] Buchanan v. United States, 32 A.3d 990, 1001 (D.C. 2011) (Ruiz, J. concurring).
[38] Perry v. United States, 36 A.3d 799, 809 n.18 (D.C. 2011).
[39] PAUL H. ROBINSON & MICHAEL T. CAHILL, CRIMINAL LAW 155 (2d ed. 2012).
[40] Ortberg, 81 A.3d at 307.
[41] Though some courts have at times spoken as though there exists some intrinsic meaning to the terms general and specific intent, in reality they are little more than "shorthand devices best and most precisely invoked to contrast offenses that, as a matter of policy, may be punished despite the actor's voluntary intoxication . . . with offenses that, also as a matter of policy, may not be punished in light of such intoxication." People v. Whitfield, 7 Cal. 4th 437, 463 (1994) (Mosk, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part); see supra nos. 32-36 and accompanying text. For illustrative examples of this form of judicial policymaking in the District, see, for example, Parker, 359 F.2d at 1013; Carter, 531 A.2d at 961.
[42] Relatedly, even when the DCCA has already determined whether a particular offense is one of specific intent or general intent, a new ruling on the culpability required for the offense outside the intoxication context—even if intended to merely clarify, rather than make new law—has the tendency to reopen litigation over that classification within the intoxication context. See Wheeler v. United States, 832 A.2d 1271, 1274 (D.C. 2003) (discussing Comber v. United States, 584 A.2d 26 (D.C. 1990) (en banc)).

to different culpable mental states, some (but not all) of which might be negated by voluntary intoxication.[43]

Fourth, judicial reliance on the general intent-specific intent dichotomy for resolving intoxication issues may have the pernicious effect of lowering the mens rea for criminal offenses in general so as to avoid the availability of an intoxication defense for particular offenses.[44]

Fifth, judicial reliance on the general intent classification as the basis for excluding evidence of voluntary intoxication leads to inherent contradictions in the case law for so-called general intent offenses that require proof of knowledge as to one or more objective elements.[45]

---

[43] An illustrative example of this kind of offense is the District's current murder of a police officer (MPO) statute, D.C. Code § 22-2106. The conduct prohibited by MPO includes a result element, killing, and a circumstance element, the victim's status as a police officer. However, the statute applies a different culpable mental state to each of these objective elements. Roughly speaking, the result element of killing appears to be subject to a mental state of purpose—"deliberate and premeditated malice"—while the circumstance element regarding the victim's status as a police officer appears to be subject to a mental state of negligence—"reason to know." D.C. Code § 22-2106. As a result, evidence of an actor's voluntary intoxication is plausibly relevant to disproving the existence of the subjective culpability required for the former result element, while such evidence likely cannot disprove the existence of the objective culpability required for the latter circumstance element.

[44] Here's how this phenomenon operates. Initially, courts may deem an offense to be one of "general intent" so as to preclude a voluntary intoxication defense. However, because "theory appears to dictate that intoxication is relevant to negate any subjective mental element," judges feel compelled, for consistency's sake, to "strip the statute defining an defining an offense of subjective mental elements." Eric A. Johnson, The Crime That Wasn't There: Wyoming's Elusive Second-Degree Murder Statute, 7 WYO. L. REV. 1, 44 (2007). The ongoing confusion surrounding the mens rea of assault under District law provides an illustrative example of this phenomenon—as recognized by Judge Ruiz's concurrence in Buchanan v. United States, 32 A.3d 990, 997 (D.C. 2011).

That confusion seems to be rooted in an oft-cited U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit (CADC) decision, Parker v. United States (1966), addressing whether voluntary intoxication is a defense to assault with a dangerous weapon ("ADW"). 359 F.2d at 1009. The Parker court ultimately determined that this District statute does not "require[] an intent that is susceptible to negation through a showing of voluntary intoxication," Id. at 1013, a conclusion that, as Judge Ruiz observes, "appears to rest upon the unstated premise that simple assault is a 'general intent' crime." Buchanan, 32 A.3d at 997. In order to justify this result in a principled fashion, however, the CADC seems to have been led to hold that ADW simply cannot require proof of subjective culpability. Id. at 1012. The CADC's interpretation of the mens rea (or lack thereof) applicable to ADW has thereafter been applied by District courts outside of the ADW context to the offense of simple assault. Relying upon "what [was] arguably an over-extension of [the CADC's] opinion in Parker," Buchanan, 32 A.3d at 1001 n.7, these cases held that because assault is a general intent crime, "there need be no subjective intention to bring about an injury." Anthony v. United States, 361 A.2d 202, 206 n.5 (D.C. 1976). In contrast, more recent DCCA cases indicate that the government is requirement to prove that the defendant not only intended to do the acts constituting the assault—akin to a strict liability standard—but also intended to cause (i.e. purposely or knowingly caused) the resulting bodily injury. See, e.g., Williams v. United States, 887 A.2d 1000, 1003 (D.C. 2005); Buchanan, 32 A.3d at 992.

[45] To determine when voluntary intoxication can negate the culpable mental state requirement governing a given offense, District courts typically ask whether that offense is a "general intent" crime, which does not require "an intent that is susceptible to negation through a showing of voluntary intoxication." Parker, 359 F.2d at 1012-13; see, e.g., Washington, 689 A.2d at 573. However, at times the DCCA has labeled crimes that require proof of knowledge—a culpable mental state that clearly can be negated by voluntary intoxication—as implicating a "general intent." Consider the crime of carrying a pistol without a license, D.C. Code § 22-4504(a) ("No person shall carry within the District of Columbia either openly or concealed on or about their person, a pistol, without a license issued pursuant to District of Columbia law, or any deadly or dangerous weapon."). Whereas the DCCA "ha[s] repeatedly held [this to be] a general intent crime,"

Sixth, and perhaps most problematic of all, the categorical bar on a voluntary intoxication defense for general intent crimes risks convicting those who are not clearly blameworthy of very serious offenses (e.g., murder).[46]

The intoxication framework in RCC § 22E-209 addresses the above problems through a clear and comprehensive policy framework that is broadly consistent with the DCCA's determinations as to the availability of an intoxication defense. The RCC, like District law, views the overarching relevance of intoxication to be a product of whether it

---

Bieder v. United States, 707 A.2d 781, 783 (D.C. 1998), it is also well-established by the DCCA that "a person cannot have the requisite intent to . . . carry[] a pistol without a license . . . unless he or she knows that the object he or she is carrying is, in fact, a pistol." Campos v. United States, 617 A.2d 185, 187-88 (D.C. 1992). Possessing knowledge of the nature of an object, no less than intending to cause harm, is a form of subjective culpability that an actor's voluntary intoxication can certainly negate. See generally RCC § 22E-209(b)(2) and accompanying Explanatory Notes.

For other so-called general intent crimes, which the DCCA has interpreted to require proof of knowledge as to a circumstance include distribution of narcotics, see Lampkins v. United States, 973 A.2d 171, 174 (D.C. 2009), and UUV, see Carter, 531 A.2d at 964 n.13.

[46] The intersection between the District's voluntary intoxication principles and the District's depraved heart form of second-degree murder is illustrative. See D.C. Code § 22-2103 ("Whoever with malice aforethought . . . kills another, is guilty of murder in the second degree."); see also D.C. Code § 22-2104 (second degree murder subject to possible life in prison). Although this version of second-degree murder requires proof that "the perpetrator was subjectively aware that his or her conduct created an extreme risk of death or serious bodily injury," Comber v. United States, 584 A.2d 26, 39 (D.C. 1990) (en banc), the DCCA has deemed depraved heart murder to be a general intent crime, to which an intoxication defense may not be raised. Wheeler v. United States, 832 A.2d 1271 (D.C. 2003); see Davidson v. United States, 137 A.3d 973 (D.C. 2016) (no intoxication defense available for depraved heart version of voluntary manslaughter either); see also King v. United States, 372 F.2d 383, 388 (D.C. Cir. 1967) ("[T]he rule that negatives voluntary intoxication as a defense to crimes . . . like manslaughter in effect holds men responsible for their fateful drinking, without regard to the extent of control at the moment of homicide.") (quoted in Davidson, 137 A.3d at 975). This categorical denial of an intoxication defense seems to create a material risk that a minimally culpable actor could be convicted of second-degree murder.

To illustrate, consider the situation of X, who consumes an extremely large amount of alcohol by herself on the second level of her two-story District home. Soon thereafter, X's sister, V, makes an unannounced visit to X's home, lets herself in, and then announces that she's going to walk up to the second story to have a conversation with X. A few moments later, X stumbles into V at the top of the stairs, unaware of V's proximity, thereby causing V to fall to her death. Under these circumstances, X seems to be minimally culpable (if culpable at all). For if—as this hypothetical assumes—the sole reason X fatally stumbled into V is because of her earlier decision to consume a large amount of alcohol in the safety of her own home, then X's conduct simply does not manifest any lack of concern for the personal safety of V (or anyone else, for that matter).

And yet, should X find herself in D.C. Superior Court charged with depraved heart murder, she might have a difficult time mounting a meaningful defense given that—as appears to be the case under current District law—evidence of her voluntary intoxication could not be presented to negate the "general intent" at issue in this crime. Compare Carter v. United States, 531 A.2d 956, 959, 963 (D.C. 1987) with Cooper v. United States, 680 A.2d 1370, 1372 (D.C. 1996). For example, the government's affirmative case might focus on the fact that an ordinary, reasonable (presumably sober) person in X's position would have possessed the subjective awareness required to establish depraved heart murder—whereas X might have difficulty persuading the factfinder that she lacked this subjective awareness without being able to point to her voluntarily intoxicated state. See, e.g., Larry Alexander, The Supreme Court, Dr. Jekyll, and the Due Process of Proof, 1996 SUP. CT. REV. 191, 200 (1996) (arguing that such an approach, in effect, creates a permissive, but unrebuttable presumption of mens rea in situations of self-induced intoxication); Sanford H. Kadish, Fifty Years of Criminal Law: An Opinionated Review, 87 CAL. L. REV. 943, 955 (1999) (arguing that "retain[ing] a mens rea requirement in the definition of the crime, but keep[ing] the defendant from introducing evidence to rebut its presence would, in effect, "rid[] the law of a culpability requirement").

precludes the government from proving an offense's culpable mental state requirements beyond a reasonable doubt.[47] At the same time, however, the RCC—again consistent with District law—recognizes a policy-based exception to this principle.[48] Under DCCA case law, this exception depends upon whether a crime is one of general intent, in which case an intoxication defense may not be raised.[49] Under the RCC, in contrast, the subjective awareness required for the culpable mental state of recklessness may be imputed based upon the self-induced intoxication of the actor.

Substantively, there is significant overlap between these two frameworks. Subsections (a), (b), and (c) collectively establish that evidence of self-induced (or any other form of) intoxication may be adduced to disprove purpose or knowledge, but generally may not be adduced to disprove recklessness or negligence.[50] This roughly corresponds with the common law framework currently employed by the DCCA: the DCCA typically associates specific intent crimes—to which an intoxication defense may be raised—with offenses requiring proof of purpose or knowledge,[51] while typically associating general intent crimes—to which an intoxication defense may not be raised—with offenses requiring proof of recklessness or negligence.[52]

Importantly, however, this overlap is by no means complete. For example, there are at least a few non-conforming offenses, which do not reflect the above pattern: namely, those offenses that the DCCA has classified as "general intent" crimes, yet also has interpreted to require proof of one or more purpose or knowledge-like mental states.[53] For these non-conforming offenses, adoption of RCC § 22E-209 could—but would not necessarily—change the availability of an intoxication defense as it currently exists under District law.[54]

---

[47] As the District's criminal jury instructions phrase the question facing the fact-finder:

> If evidence of intoxication gives you a reasonable doubt about whether [name of defendant] could or did form the intent to [^] , then you must find him/her not guilty of the offense of [^] . On the other hand, if the government has proved beyond a reasonable doubt that [name of defendant] could and did form the intent to [^], along with every other element of the offense, then you must find him/her guilty of the offense of [^] .

D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 9.404.

[48] See, e.g., Davidson v. United States, 137 A.3d 973 (D.C. 2016); Carter, 531 A.2d at 959.

[49] See sources cited supra notes 10 and 16-20.

[50] Note, however, that intoxication that is not self-induced may negate the culpable mental state of recklessness under RCC § 22E-209(a). See RCC § 22E-209(b)(3).

[51] See, e.g., McNeil, 933 A.2d at 363 (quoting Proctor v. United States, 85 U.S.App. D.C. 341, 342 (1949)); Logan v. United States, 483 A.2d 664, 671 (D.C. 1984); Jones v. United States, 124 A.3d 127, 130 (D.C. 2015).

[52] See, e.g., Carter, 531 A.2d at 962; Wheeler, 832 A.2d at 1275; Ortberg v. United States, 81 A.3d 303, 306 (D.C. 2013).

[53] Potential non-conforming offenses include: (1) D.C. Code § 22-3215, Unlawful Use of Motor Vehicles, see Carter, 531 A.2d at 962 n.13; (2) D.C. Code § 22-3216, Taking Property Without Right, see Schafer v. United States, 656 A.2d 1185, 1188 (D.C. 1995); and (3) D.C. Code § 48-904.01(a)(1) Drug Distribution, see Lampkins v. United States, 973 A.2d 171, 174 (D.C. 2009).

[54] For example, this outcome can be avoided by applying a mental state of recklessly to the revised version of any non-conforming offense in lieu of the purpose or knowledge-like mental state applicable under current law to that offense. Alternatively, offense-specific exceptions to the principles set forth in RCC § 22E-209 could be made through an individual offense definition. Either way, the effect of this general intoxication provision depends on how each specific offense is revised.

In addition, the RCC approach leaves open the possibility that a person's self-induced intoxication[55] could, under narrow circumstances, be relevant to defending against a recklessness or negligence charge.[56] The rationale is that when, due to a person's self-induced state of intoxication, that person's disregard of a risk is not a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct or care, then it would be disproportionate to impose a criminal conviction for a recklessness or negligence crime.[57] The fact that current District law appears to impose a categorical bar on the presentation of evidence of self-induced intoxication to disprove the existence of comparable mental states, in contrast, creates a risk of imposing liability for serious crimes on minimally culpable (or even non-culpable) actors.[58] RCC § 22E-209 effectively removes this categorical bar in the interests of proportionality.

Adoption of RCC § 22E-209 would also change District law in two other general ways. First, it would effectively resolve many unsettled questions of law. For example, there are hundreds of offenses in the D.C. Code that the DCCA has not classified as either "general intent" or "specific intent" crimes for purposes of the District's law of intoxication (or otherwise).[59] Absent a general intoxication provision, the availability of an intoxication defense for each of these offenses will remain unknown and uncertain, left to the DCCA for resolution on an ad hoc basis. Under RCC § 22E-209, in contrast, these issues will be resolved for every offense incorporated into the RCC.

Second, RCC § 22E-209 requires courts to assess the relationship between intoxication and liability on an element-by-element basis. This is in contrast to current District law, which approaches the relationship between intoxication and liability on an offense-by-offense basis—as shown in the DCCA's offense-specific general intent and specific intent rules. Supplanting this offense-level analysis of intoxication issues with an element-level analysis would constitute a break with the DCCA's method of determining liability in cases of intoxication—substantive outcomes aside.

Thus, to address the availability of an intoxication defense under the RCC, it will no longer be necessary to rely on the ambiguous and unpredictable distinctions made by

---

[55] The phrase "self-induced intoxication," employed in the RCC, mirrors the phrase "voluntary intoxication," as employed in current District law.

[56] See RCC § 22E-209(c)-(d) and accompanying Explanatory Notes.

[57] As the Commentary accompanying the RCC definitions of recklessness and negligence observe:

> Because punishment represents the moral condemnation of the community, the imposition of criminal liability can only be justified where a person's risk-taking fails to live up to the community's values—and, therefore, deserves to be condemned—under the circumstances. What ultimately renders an actor's disregard of a risk blameworthy, then, is whether it reflects a level of concern or attention for legally-protected interests that is lower than what a reasonable member of the community placed in the defendant's situation could be expected to exercise.

RCC §§ 22E-206(c)-(d): Explanatory Notes (internal quotations and footnote call numbers omitted). For illustrations of situations where an actor's self-induced intoxication can negate blameworthiness, see supra note 14.

[58] For an illustration of how this could occur, see supra note 46.

[59] CCRC staff analysis has identified over 700 criminal statutes scattered throughout the D.C. Code, the majority of which have never been charged in recent years and are of a quasi-regulatory nature. While there are dozens of DCCA opinions determining whether particular offenses are general or specific intent, these judicial determinations address only a small fraction of District crimes.

District courts over the past century as to whether certain offenses are general intent or specific intent crimes. Instead, District courts will only need to consider whether the government is able to meet its affirmative burden of proof as to the culpable mental state requirement governing each offense based upon the standard rules of liability set forth in RCC § 22E-206, or, alternatively, based upon the rule of recklessness imputation set forth in RCC § 22E-209(c). In either case, the ultimate policy decision as to the effect of intoxication will be a legislative decision that is consistently applied and clearly communicated for each revised offense.[60]

RCC § 22E-210. ACCOMPLICE LIABILITY.

Explanatory Notes. Section 210 establishes general principles of accomplice liability applicable throughout the RCC.

The prefatory clause of subsection (a) establishes that accomplice liability is a means of holding one person liable for "the commission of an offense by another." This clarifies that accomplice liability is derivative in nature.[1] That is, a person is not guilty of an independent offense of "aiding and abetting" under the RCC.[2] Rather, an accomplice's liability is derived from the liability of the principal actor.[3]

---

[60] RCC § 22E-209(d) defines two important terms in the RCC's intoxication framework, "intoxication," id. at § (d)(1), and "self-induced intoxication," id. at § (d)(2). These definitions fill gaps in District law, which does not appear to have developed definitions—either through legislation or case law—for these terms in the culpability context.

Current District law has defined "intoxication" and related terminology in contexts where a person's intoxicated state constitutes an objective element of an offense. See, e.g., D.C. Code § 50-2206.01 (defining intoxication and other related terms for traffic offenses); D.C. Code § 50-2206.11 ("No person shall operate or be in physical control of any vehicle in the District: (1) While the person is intoxicated; or (2) While the person is under the influence of alcohol or any drug or any combination thereof.") (italics added). However, this terminology serves materially distinct functions in these latter contexts, and, therefore, does not provide an appropriate foundation for general culpability definitions.

Conversely, the intoxication-related general culpability definitions incorporated into RCC § 22E-209 should not influence these latter contexts, where a person's intoxicated state constitutes an objective element of an offense. For this reason, the accompanying Explanatory Notes clearly states that these RCC definitions are not intended to have any effect on the meaning of the same or comparable terms when they arise as an objective element in an offense definition.

[1] E.g., JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 30.02 (A)(2) (6th ed. 2012); GEORGE FLETCHER, RETHINKING CRIMINAL LAW § 8.5 (2000); Sanford H. Kadish, Complicity, Cause and Blame: A Study in the Interpretation of Doctrine, 73 CAL. L. REV. 323, 337 (1985).

[2] It should be noted, however, that the same conduct and accompanying state of mind which support derivative liability under section 210 may also provide the basis for non-derivative liability under some other provision in the RCC. The relationship between accomplice liability and the general inchoate crime of conspiracy is illustrative. If A purposely agrees to aid P in the commission of a robbery, and that agreement to aid either materializes or simply solidifies P's resolve to commit the robbery (even in the absence of such assistance), then A is responsible for P's robbery under section 210. On these same facts, however, A also appears to satisfy the requirements for the general inchoate crime of conspiracy (to commit robbery) under section 303. See RCC § 22E-303.

[3] Throughout this commentary, reference is made to "accomplices" and "principals." These labels are primarily employed for explanatory purposes. That is, they provide a useful means of distinguishing between: (1) legal actors who culpably commit the physical acts that constitute an offense (principals); and (2) legal actors who culpably aid or encourage those physical acts (accomplices). See, e.g., WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 13.2 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019). For the most part, the difference between an accomplice and the principal will be immaterial for liability purposes under the RCC. But see RCC § 22E-210(b) (rule of culpable mental state elevation governing circumstance elements of target offense). And in any event, because section 210 authorizes a defendant to be convicted of an offense based on conduct committed by another person, the RCC effectively eliminates the "obscure and technical distinctions between principals and accessories," which historically "derail[ed] prosecutions for reasons unrelated to the merits" at common law. Brooks v. United States, 599 A.2d 1094, 1098–99 (D.C. 1991) ("If the defendant were charged as a principal [at common law], he could not be convicted upon proof that he was an accessory. Likewise, one charged only as an accessory could not be convicted if the evidence established that he was instead a principal."); see, e.g., LAFAVE, supra note 3, at 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 13.1 (Under the "modern approach" to accomplice liability, "a person guilty by accountability is guilty of the substantive crime itself and punishable accordingly."); compare D.C. Code § 22-1805 ("In prosecutions for any criminal offense all persons advising, inciting, or conniving at the offense, or aiding or abetting the principal offender, shall be charged as principals and not as accessories, the intent of this section being that as to all accessories before the fact the law heretofore applicable in cases of misdemeanor only shall apply to all crimes, whatever the punishment may be.").

The derivative nature of accomplice liability has two main implications. First, an accomplice may only be held criminally responsible under section 210 upon proof that the principal actor in fact committed "an offense." This reference to "an offense" includes general inchoate crimes, such as a criminal attempt, solicitation, or conspiracy, all of which may serve as the basis for accomplice liability.[4] Second, an accomplice may be both prosecuted and—contingent upon such proof—punished under section 210 as if he or she were the principal offender.[5]

Paragraphs (a)(1) and (a)(2) establish two alternative means of satisfying the conduct requirement of accomplice liability: by rendering assistance and by offering encouragement.[6] The assistance prong extends to both direct participation in the

---

[4] In practice, this means that accomplice liability can be based on purposely assisting or encouraging an unsuccessful principal who makes enough progress towards his or her criminal objective to satisfy the requirements of an attempt, solicitation, or conspiracy. The following situation is illustrative. A purposely assists P with the planning of a bank robbery that P is to commit by himself, while also volunteering to serve as P's get away driver. However, as P enters the bank (with A waiting in the parking lot), the police—who have been alerted to the plan by a third party—intervene, arresting P just as he begins to remove a weapon from his coat. On these facts, P satisfies the requirements of liability for the general inchoate crime of attempted robbery. See RCC § 22E-301(a) (attempt liability based on intent to commit target offense and dangerous proximity to completion). For this reason, A is—given his purposeful assistance—also liable for attempted robbery on a complicity theory of liability.

This outcome, which involves aiding an attempt, is to be distinguished from the outcome in situations that involve attempts to aid. Under the RCC, an unsuccessful accomplice who tries, but ultimately fails, to provide the principal with any aid or encouragement at all is not subject to liability under section 210, regardless of the principal's ultimate success (and concomitant criminal liability). See infra notes 17-18 and accompanying text (addressing treatment of unsuccessful accomplices under the RCC).

[5] This is not to say that sentencing courts ought to impose the same sentences upon accomplices and principals as a matter of judicial sentencing discretion. Accomplices are often materially less blameworthy than principals, and, where this is the case, there exists strong support for imposing proportionately less severe sentences that account for relevant distinctions in culpability. See, e.g., Michael Serota, Proportional Mens Rea and the Future of Criminal Code Reform, 52 WAKE FOREST L. REV. 1201, 1222 & n.108 (2017) (highlighting "continuous, graduated judgments of relative blameworthiness expressed in both public opinion surveys and scholarly literature" on the punishment of accomplices); see also D.C. VOLUNTARY SENTENCING GUIDELINES § 5.2.3(4) (listing, as a mitigating factor, that "[t]he offense was principally accomplished by another, and the defendant manifested extreme caution or sincere concern for the safety and well-being of a victim").

[6] The categories of assistance and encouragement frequently overlap since knowledge that aid will be given can influence the principal's decision to go forward. Kadish, supra note 1, at 342-43. However, there remains an important analytic difference between the two: whereas assistance is subject to criminal liability because of the accomplice's material contribution to the principal's execution of a crime, encouragement is commission of a crime and any support rendered in the earlier, planning stages.[7] Typically, the assistance prong will be satisfied by conduct of an affirmative nature[8]; however, an omission to act also provides a viable basis for accomplice liability, provided that the defendant is under a legal duty to act[9] and the other requirements of liability are met.[10] The encouragement prong speaks to the promotion of an offense by psychological influence.[11] It extends to various forms of influence, including (but not limited to) the rational or emotional support afforded by a command, request, or agreement, advice or counsel, and instigation, incitement, or provocation.[12]

To satisfy the conduct requirement of accomplice liability under paragraphs (a)(1) and (a)(2), it is not necessary that the principal actor have been subjectively aware of the effect of the accomplice's assistance or encouragement. However, the accomplice's conduct must have actually assisted or encouraged the principal in some non-trivial way.[13] subject to criminal liability because of the accomplice's psychological contribution to the principal's decision to commit a crime. Id.

---

[7] E.g., LAFAVE, supra note 3, at 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 13.2; DRESSLER, supra note 1, at § 30.04.

[8] Illustrative examples of affirmative acts of assistance in support of a bank robbery include: (1) furnishing the principal with the means of committing a bank robbery (e.g., by providing guns, money, supplies or other instrumentalities); or (2) helping the principal with the preparation or execution of the crime (e.g., planning out the details, serving as a lookout, driving the getaway car, signaling the approach of the security guard, or preventing a warning from reaching the security guard). E,g., LAFAVE, supra note 3, at 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 13.2; DRESSLER, supra note 1, at § 30.04.

[9] See generally RCC § 22E-202(c) (proscribing general principles of omission liability).

[10] For example, if A, a corrupt police officer, purposely fails to stop a bank robbery committed by P, based upon P's promise to provide A with a portion of the proceeds, A may be deemed an accomplice to the robbery. Similarly, if A, a parent, purposely fails to prevent the sexual assault of her young child by P, A's boyfriend, based upon P's promise to marry A for allowing it to happen, A may be deemed an accomplice to the sexual assault. E,g., LAFAVE, supra note 3, at 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 13.2; DRESSLER, supra note 1, at § 30.04.

[11] The following example is illustrative. V personally insults P. P is predisposed to let the insult slide, but A persuades P over the phone that P must respond with lethal violence to protect P's reputation. In providing this encouragement, A consciously desires to bring about the death of V, who A also has an outstanding beef with due to a prior perceived slight that V lodged against A a few days earlier. If P proceeds to kill V, A is guilty of murder as P's accomplice under section 210 based on A's purposeful encouragement.

[12] These pathways of influence may, in turn, be communicated directly or by an intermediary, through words or gestures, via threats or promises, and occur either before or at the actual time the crime is being committed. It is therefore, immaterial, for purposes of accomplice liability, whether the encouragement is communicated orally, in writing, or through other means of expression. E,g., LAFAVE, supra note 3, at 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 13.2; DRESSLER, supra note 1, at § 30.04.

[13] See, e.g., Eric A. Johnson, Criminal Liability for Loss of A Chance, 91 IOWA L. REV. 59, 110–11 (2005) (The "words used to define the scope of accomplice liability"—namely, assistance and encouragement—"contain an implicit requirement that the defendant's words or actions contribute somehow to the criminal venture."). However, an accomplice's contribution to a criminal venture need not be substantial or even causally necessary to satisfy the assistance or encouragement prongs under RCC § 22E-210(a). See, e.g., DRESSLER, supra note 1, at § 30.06 ("The prosecution is not required to establish that the crime would not have occurred but for the accessory or that the accomplice contributed a substantial amount of assistance.").

To appreciate the import of this actual assistance or encouragement requirement, consider (again) the relationship between accomplice liability and the general inchoate crime of conspiracy. See supra note 2. A's purposeful agreement to aid P in the commission of a crime provides the basis for a conspiracy conviction even where the promise to help goes unfulfilled, provided that P "engages in an overt act in furtherance of the agreement," RCC § 22E-303(a), and A does not meet the relatively stringent requirements for a renunciation defense under RCC § 22E-306. In contrast, that same unfulfilled agreement to aid will only provide the basis for holding A responsible for P's conduct as an accomplice if its formation bolstered P's criminal resolve, and, therefore, actually encouraged P to commit the target offense under RCC § 22E-

This means that an unsuccessful accomplice—i.e. one who attempts to aid or encourage the principal but fails to promote or facilitate the target offense in any way—is not subject to liability under section 210.[14]

Paragraphs (a)(1) and (a)(2) also clarify that the requisite assistance or encouragement must be accompanied by a purpose to facilitate or promote the principal's criminal conduct.[15] This "purposive attitude" constitutes the foundation of the culpability required for accomplice liability.[16] It can be said to exist when a person, in rendering assistance or encouragement, consciously desires to facilitate or promote another person's criminal conduct.[17]

210(a)(2). Compare DRESSLER, supra note 1, at § 30.09(B)(1)(d) ("In most cases, [A]'s agreement to aid in the commission of an offense serves as encouragement to P and, therefore, functions as a basis for common law accomplice liability."), with Model Penal Code § 2.06(3) (a)(ii) (accomplice liability applies to one who "agrees . . . to aid [an]other person in planning or committing of an offense").

[14] For example, where A attempts to assist P by opening a window to allow P to enter a dwelling unlawfully, but P (unaware of the open window) enters through a door, A is not an accomplice to P's trespass. Likewise, if A utters words of encouragement to P who fails to hear them, but nevertheless proceeds to enter the dwelling unlawfully anyways, A is not an accomplice to P's trespass. Compare Paul H. Robinson & Jane A. Grall, Element Analysis in Defining Criminal Liability: The Model Penal Code and Beyond, 35 STAN. L. REV. 681, 758 (1983) ("At common law, an unsuccessful attempt to aid, one that was unknown to the perpetrator and that neither encouraged nor assisted him, would not support accomplice liability."), with Model Penal Code § 2.06(3) (a)(ii) (accomplice liability applies to one who "attempts to aid [an]other person in planning or committing of an offense") (italics added).

[15] But see LAFAVE, supra note 3, at 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 13.2(c) ("This is not to suggest, however, that an accomplice can escape liability by showing he did not [desire] to aid a crime in the sense that he was unaware that the criminal law covered the conduct of the person he aided. Such is not the case, for here as well the general principle that ignorance of the law is no excuse prevails.").

[16] Wilson-Bey v. United States, 903 A.2d 818, 831 (D.C. 2006) (en banc) ("[T]hroughout centuries of common law," the definitions of complicity "have nothing whatever to do with the probability that the forbidden result would follow upon the accessory's conduct; . . . . [T]hey all demand that he in some sort associate himself with the venture, that he participate in it as in something that he wishes to bring about, that he seek by his action to make it succeed. All the words used-even the most colorless, "abet"-carry an implication of purposive attitude towards it.") (quoting United States v. Peoni, 100 F.2d 401, 402 (2d Cir. 1938) (Hand, J.)); see, e.g., Rosemond v. United States, 134 S. Ct. 1240, 1246 (2014) (quoting Nye & Nissen v. United States, 336 U.S. 613, 619 (1949)).

[17] See generally RCC § 22E-206(a) (purposely defined). The following scenario is illustrative. P seeks to rob a bank on his own, but needs a fast car to implement his plan. P relays his conundrum to his friend, A, who happens to own a vehicle of this nature. Having been informed of this, P offers to purchase A's car for market value. A rejects the offer, but counters with an arrangement wherein A will give P his car in return for a ten percent stake in the profits. P agrees to this arrangement, and, subsequently completes the bank robbery with P's vehicle. However, the next day, both P and A are arrested by the police, who access security camera footage of both P and A's vehicle in the bank's parking lot. On these facts, A can be held liable for robbery as an accomplice to P's crime because, inter alia, A consciously desired to facilitate and promote P's criminal conduct.

That an accomplice must have the purpose to facilitate or promote the principal's criminal conduct does not preclude convictions for recklessness and negligence-based theories of liability concerning the result elements of the target offense, provided that the defendant acts with both the requisite purpose and the "culpability required for the [target] offense," RCC § 22E-210(a). The following example is illustrative. Passenger A tells driver P to exceed the legal speed limit so that they can both get to a party on time, notwithstanding the fact that they're currently driving through a school zone in the middle of the day. P is responsive to the request and quickly steps on the gas. Soon thereafter, P loses control of his car and fatally crashes into V, a nearby child leaving school for the day. Under these circumstances, P can be convicted of reckless homicide provided that: (1) P was aware of a substantial risk of death to V; and (2) that P's disregard of that risk was a gross deviation from the standard of conduct that a reasonable individual would follow.

The corollary to this purpose requirement is that accomplice liability is not supported under section 210 if the defendant's primary motive was to achieve some other, non-criminal objective (e.g., "conduct[ing] an otherwise lawful business in a profitable manner").[18] And this is so even if the would-be accomplice knew that his or her aid or encouragement was likely to promote or facilitate that criminal scheme.[19] Neither awareness of, nor indifference towards, the success of another person's criminal plans is sufficient to satisfy the purpose requirement incorporated into paragraphs (a)(1) and (a)(2).[20]

Along similar lines, A could be also be convicted of reckless homicide on a complicity theory provided that: (1) A consciously desired to encourage P to speed through the school zone; (2) A was aware that speeding through the school zone created a substantial risk of death to V; and that (3) A's disregard of that risk was a gross deviation from the standard of conduct that a reasonable individual would follow. See RCC § 22E-206(c)(1) (definition of recklessness as to result elements). A comparable analysis would govern a negligent homicide charge brought against A under a complicity theory. The only difference is that the government would not need to prove that A was actually aware of a substantial risk of death to V; instead, proof that A should have been aware of such a risk would suffice. See RCC § 22E-206(d)(1) (definition of negligence as to result elements).

[18] See, e.g., United States v. Falcone, 109 F.2d 579, 581 (2d Cir.), aff'd, 311 U.S. 205 (1940) (Hand, J.) ("[T]he law should not be broadened to punish those whose primary motive is to conduct an otherwise lawful business in a profitable manner" because this would "seriously undermin[e] lawful commerce."); Kadish, supra note 1, at 353 (absent purpose requirement, complicity would "cast a pall on ordinary activity" by giving us reason to "fear criminal liability for what others might do simply because our actions made their acts more probable"); Model Penal Code § 2.06 cmt. at 312 & n.42, 314-19 (purpose requirement appropriate because, inter alia, "there is generally more ambiguity in the overt conduct engaged in by the accomplice, and thus a higher risk of convicting the innocent").

[19] It has been observed that:

> Often, if not usually, aid rendered with guilty knowledge implies purpose since it has no other motivation. But there are many and important cases where this is the central question in determining liability. A lessor rents with knowledge that the premises will be used to establish a bordello. A vendor sells with knowledge that the subject of the sale will be used in commission of a crime. A doctor counsels against an abortion during the third trimester but, at the patient's insistence, refers her to a competent abortionist. A utility provides telephone or telegraph service, knowing it is used for bookmaking. An employee puts through a shipment in the course of his employment though he knows the shipment is illegal. A farm boy clears the ground for setting up a still, knowing that the venture is illicit.

Model Penal Code § 2.06 cmt. at 316. In each of these situations, "the person furnishing goods or services is aware of the customer's criminal intentions, but may not care whether the crime is committed." DRESSLER, supra note 1, at § 27.07. However, in the absence of a purposive attitude towards the customer's criminal objective, the seller's mere awareness of probable illegal activity will not suffice for accomplice liability. Id.; see, e.g., Robert Weisberg, Reappraising Complicity, 4 BUFF. CRIM. L. REV. 217, 236 (2000) (purpose requirement reflects majority approach).

[20] To illustrate, consider the following modified version of the scenario presented supra note 21. P seeks to rob a bank on his own, but needs a fast car to implement his plan. P relays his conundrum to his friend, A, who happens to own a vehicle of this nature. Having been informed of this, P offers to purchase A's car for market value. A accepts the offer to sell his car for market value because A was already planning to sell the vehicle, so accepting P's offer will save A the effort of having to list it on his own. However, A thinks the bank robbery is a stupid idea, and tells P this much. P ignores A's advice and soon thereafter proceeds to carry out the bank robbery with P's vehicle. The next day, both P and A are arrested by the police, who access security camera footage of both P and A's vehicle in the bank's parking lot. On these facts, A cannot be held liable for robbery as an accomplice to P's crime because, inter alia, A did not consciously desire to Paragraphs (a)(1) and (a)(2) also clarify that accomplice liability requires that the defendant "acts with the culpability required for that offense."[21] Pursuant to this principle, a defendant may not be held liable as an accomplice under section 210 absent proof that he or she acted, in fact, with, at minimum, the culpable mental state(s)—in addition to any other broader aspect of culpability[22] —required to establish that offense.[23] facilitate or promote P's criminal conduct. (Instead, A's purpose was to save himself the hassle of having to list and sell the vehicle on his own.) That A knew the sale of his car to P would facilitate the bank robbery, and was arguably indifferent as to P's criminal conduct, would not support liability under section 210.

---

[21] See, e.g., DRESSLER, supra note 1, at § 30.05(A)(1) (It is well-established that "to be an accomplice, a person 'must not only have the purpose that someone else engage in the conduct which constitutes the particular crime charged, but the accomplice must also share in the same intent which is required for commission of the substantive offense.") (quoting State v. Williams, 718 A.2d 721, 723 (N.J. Super. Ct. Law Div. 1998)) (italics added); LAFAVE, supra note 3, at 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 13.2(c) ("The prevailing view is that the accomplice must also have the mental state required for the crime of which he is to be convicted on an accomplice theory.").

[22] The term "culpability required" includes, but also goes beyond, the culpable mental state requirement governing an offense. See RCC § 22E-201(e) (culpability required defined). For example, if the offense aided or abetted requires proof of premeditation, deliberation, or the absence of any mitigating circumstances, the government is still required to prove these broader aspects of culpability to secure a conviction. See RCC § 22E-201(e)(3) ("'Culpability required' includes . . . Any other aspect of culpability specifically required for an offense."); id., at Explanatory Notes (noting that "premeditation, deliberation, and absence of mitigating circumstances" would so qualify). And, of course, accomplice liability is subject to the same voluntariness requirement governing all offenses under RCC § 22E-203(a). See RCC § 22E-201(e)(1) (voluntariness requirement also part of culpability required for an offense). For additional principles governing the culpable mental state requirement of accomplice liability, see infra notes 19–32 and accompanying text.

[23] This derivative culpable mental state requirement, which is drawn from the target offense, is to be distinguished from the independent culpable mental state requirement governing the assistance or encouragement at issue in all complicity prosecutions. See infra notes 19-24 and accompanying text. Generally speaking, accomplice liability entails proof that the accused: (1) "intended" to assist or encourage conduct planned to culminate in an offense; and (2) "intended," through that assistance or encouragement, to bring about any result elements or circumstance elements that comprise the target offense. See, e.g., Paul H. Robinson, A Functional Analysis of Criminal Law, 88 NW. U. L. REV. 857, 864 (1994); Kadish, supra note 1, at 349. The following scenario illustrates how these "dual intent" requirements fit together. DRESSLER, supra note 1, at § 30.05.

In this example, police receive a report that someone posing as a janitor in a District of Columbia government building, P, intends to murder a plain-clothes police officer sitting in the lobby to the entrance, V. According to this reliable tip, P's plan is to quickly unhinge a large television that stands high above V, with the hopes that it will kill V upon impact. Soon thereafter, two officers arrive at the front of the building, only to observe an individual, A, with a large collection of packages blocking the front entrance to the building. The officers' entry into the building is delayed due to A's blockage, which in turn enables P to successfully carry out the assassination. If A later finds herself in D.C. Superior Court charged with aiding the murder of a police officer committed by P, can she be convicted as an accomplice? The answer to this question depends upon whether A's state of mind fulfills both of the dual intent requirements governing accomplice liability.

For example, if A was blocking the entrance to the building because she accidentally dropped her packages, then neither requirement is met: A did not intentionally assist the conduct of P which, in fact, resulted in the death of a police officer; nor did A act with the intent that, through her assistance, a police officer be killed.

Alternatively, if A was blocking the entrance to the building because P, posing as a janitor, had asked A to stop anyone from entering the building so that a damaged television could quickly be unhinged, the first requirement is met: A intentionally assisted the conduct of P which, in fact, resulted in the death of a police officer. But the second requirement is not met: A did not intend, through her assistance, to cause the death of anyone, let alone a police officer.

Subsection (b) provides additional clarity concerning the relationship between accomplice liability and the culpability required for the target offense. Whereas the prefatory clause of subsection (a) broadly clarifies that accomplice liability entails proof that the defendant acted with a level of culpability that is no less demanding than that required by the target offense, subsection (b) specifically establishes that the "actor must intend for all circumstance elements required by the offense to exist." The latter requirement incorporates a principle of culpable mental state elevation applicable whenever the target offense is comprised of a circumstance element that may be satisfied by proof of a non-intentional mental state (i.e. recklessness or negligence), or none at all (i.e. strict liability).[24] To satisfy this threshold culpable mental state requirement, the government must prove that the defendant's assistance or encouragement was accompanied by a practically certain belief that the circumstance elements incorporated into the target offense existed, or, alternatively, that the defendant consciously desired for the requisite circumstances to exist.[25]

Subsection (c) addresses the appropriate disposition of complicity prosecutions involving the commission of an offense that is graded by distinctions in culpability as to result elements.[26] In this situation (most common in homicide prosecutions), an

---

Lastly, if A was blocking the entrance to the building because P had approached her with an opportunity to seek retribution against the same officer responsible for disrupting a drug conspiracy A was involved with years ago, then A fulfills both requirements: A acted with both the intent to facilitate P's conduct and the intent that, through her assistance, a police officer be killed. (Note, however, that if A intended to kill V but lacked awareness that V was still a police officer, then the second intent requirement would not be met: although A intended to kill V, A did not intend to kill a police officer.) See generally Kit Kinports, Rosemond, Mens Rea, and the Elements of Complicity, 52 SAN DIEGO L. REV. 133, 135–36 (2015) (developing similar hypothetical and comparable analysis).

[24] See, e.g., Rosemond v. United States, 134 S. Ct. 1240, 1242 (2014) ("[A]iding and abetting requires intent extending to the whole crime…. That requirement is satisfied when a person actively participates in a criminal venture with full knowledge of the circumstances constituting the charged offense."); United States v. Encarnacion-Ruiz, 787 F.3d 581, 589 (1st Cir. 2015) ("[U]nder Rosemond, an aider and abettor of [the crime of producing child pornography] must have known the victim was a minor" although the victim's age is a matter of strict liability for the target offense). For those target offenses that already require proof of intent, knowledge, or purpose as to a circumstance element, subsection (b) does not elevate the applicable culpable mental state.

[25] See generally RCC §§ 22E-206(a)(2) and (b)(2) (defining purposely and intentionally as to circumstance elements). The following scenario involving two thirty year-old males, A and P, is illustrative. A lets P borrow his bedroom to engage in consensual sex with V, a fourteen year-old minor, who P mistakenly believes to be twenty-one and, crucially, who A has never met. Thereafter, P and V have sex in A's room. If P is subsequently prosecuted for a strict liability sexual abuse offense applicable to fourteen year-old victims, P can be convicted notwithstanding his mistake of fact. However, the same mistake of fact would exonerate A under subsection (b) notwithstanding the strict liability nature of the target offense. Although A purposely assisted P with his sexual rendezvous with V, A lacked the intent to facilitate sex with a fourteen year old, which would be required by the principle of culpable mental state elevation codified by subsection (b).

[26] The requirement in subsection (c) that the target "offense" be "graded by distinctions in culpability as to result elements" should be broadly construed to support convictions for greater and lesser-included versions of the same substantive offense. This should be done, moreover, even where the relevant criminal statutes are neither (1) formally described in the RCC as distinct degrees of the same offense, nor (2) codified in the same statutory provision. To illustrate, consider the overlapping, hierarchically related offenses of first-degree murder, second-degree manslaughter, and negligent homicide. These three offenses are not formally described as distinct degrees of the same offense (e.g., homicide) under the RCC, and each is codified in a different section of the code. See generally RCC §§ 22E-1101, 1102, and 1103. However, because all three accomplice is liable for any grade for which he or she possesses the culpability required, although the person who committed the offense acted with a different kind of culpability.[27] Consequently, an accomplice may be convicted of a grade of an offense that is either higher[28] or lower[29] than that committed by the principal actor based upon distinctions between the two (or more) actors' states of mind.

Subsection (d) specifies that an accomplice may be charged as a principal, and is subject to the same maximum penalties as a principal. Under this subsection, an indictment does not need not include a charge of aiding and abetting in order for the theory to be presented to the jury.[30] However, although an accomplice may be charged as a principal, accomplice liability still requires that the government proves the requirements for accomplice liability set forth under this section beyond a reasonable doubt. In addition, although an accomplice is subject to the same maximum penalties as the principal, in some cases it may be appropriate for an accomplice to receive a different sentence than the principal.

---

of these homicide statutes are graded by distinctions in culpability as to the same result element (death), RCC § 22E-210(c) would authorize the imposition of liability for (among other possibilities) the following in a three person criminal scheme: (1) first-degree murder upon P; (2) second-degree manslaughter on A1; and (3) negligent homicide on A2. See, e.g., DRESSLER, supra note 1, at § 30.6 ("It is fair to say [] that when P commits the 'offense' of criminal homicide, this 'crime' is imputed to [A], whose own liability for the homicide should be predicated on his own level of mens rea, whether it is greater or less than that of the primary party."); Sanford H. Kadish, Reckless Complicity, 87 J. CRIM. L. & CRIMINOLOGY 369, 386–87 (1997) (same).

[27] This means that (for example):

> To determine the kind of homicide of which the accomplice is guilty, it is necessary to look to his state of mind; it may have been different from the state of mind of the principal and they thus may be guilty of different offenses. Thus, because first degree murder requires a deliberate and premeditated killing, an accomplice is not guilty of this degree of murder unless he acted with premeditation and deliberation. And, because a killing in a heat of passion is manslaughter and not murder, an accomplice who aids while in such a state is guilty only of manslaughter even though the killer is himself guilty of murder. Likewise, it is equally possible that the killer is guilty only of manslaughter because of his heat of passion but that the accomplice, aiding in a state of cool blood, is guilty of murder.

LAFAVE, supra note 3, at 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 13.2(c).

[28] Consider the following scenario: A gives P a knife and encourages P to throw it at V from a distance. If P is intoxicated, and opts to throw the knife for the thrill of it, P may only be reckless if it ultimately hits/kills V. Nevertheless, A may have concocted the scheme with premeditation/intent. On these facts, A can be convicted of assisting a homicide with the mental state necessary for first-degree murder (i.e. intent/absence of mitigating circumstances), although P can only be convicted of acting with the mental state necessary for second-degree manslaughter (i.e. recklessness).

[29] Consider again the following scenario: A gives P a knife and encourages P to throw it at V from a distance. If A is intoxicated and encourages P to throw the knife for the thrill of it, A may only be reckless if P ultimately hits/kills V. Nevertheless, P may have thrown the knife with premeditation/intent to kill. On these facts, A can be convicted of assisting a homicide with the mental state necessary for second-degree manslaughter (i.e. recklessness), in a case where P can be convicted of acting with the mental state necessary for first-degree murder (i.e. intent/absence of mitigating circumstances).

[30] E.g., Price v. United States, 813 A.2d 169, 176 (D.C. 2002) (citing Head v. United States, 451 A.2d 615, 626 (1982)).

Subsection (e) addresses the relationship between the prosecution of the accomplice and the treatment of the principal actor's criminal conduct.[31] The provision establishes that the legal disposition of the principal actor's situation is generally immaterial to that of the accomplice.[32] This includes the fact that the principal actor has not been arrested, prosecuted, convicted, adjudicated delinquent, or acquitted. In addition to the language in subsection (d), RCC § 22E-216 establishes that an actor can be liable as an accomplice even if the principal actor is under the age of 12 years and is not subject to criminal liability under the RCC.

Section 210 has been drafted in light of, and should be construed in accordance with, prevailing free speech principles. Given the centrality of speech to encouragement, accomplice liability directly implicates a criminal defendant's First Amendment rights.[33] And while the U.S. Supreme Court recently clarified that "[o]ffers to engage in illegal transactions are categorically excluded from First Amendment protection,"[34] it also reaffirmed the "important distinction between a proposal to engage in illegal activity and the abstract advocacy of illegality."[35] The RCC respects this distinction by requiring that the defendant encourage the principal actor to engage in "specific conduct" constituting an offense under paragraph (a)(2).[36] To meet this requirement, it is not necessary that the defendant have gone into great detail as to the manner in which the crime encouraged is to be committed. At the very least, though, it must be proven that the defendant's communication, when viewed in the context of the knowledge and position of the planned recipient, carries meaning in terms of some concrete course of conduct that, if carried to completion, would constitute a criminal offense.[37]

---

[31] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.06(7) ("An accomplice may be convicted on proof of the commission of the offense and of his complicity therein, though the person claimed to have committed the offense has not been prosecuted or convicted or has been convicted of a different offense or degree of offense or has an immunity to prosecution or conviction or has been acquitted.").

[32] See, e.g., Mayfield v. United States, 659 A.2d 1249, 1254 n.4 & 1256 (D.C. 1995) (citing, inter alia, Standefer v. United States, 447 U.S. 10, 14–20 (1980) and Branch v. United States, 382 A.2d 1033, 1035 (D.C. 1978)); Model Penal Code § 2.06(7) cmt. at 327-28.

[33] See, e.g., DRESSLER, supra note 1, at § 28.01 (citing Kent Greenawalt, Speech and Crime, 1980 AM. B. FOUND. RES. J. 645); Eugene Volokh, The "Speech Integral to Criminal Conduct" Exception, 101 CORNELL L. REV. 981 (2016); Eugene Volokh, Crime-Facilitating Speech, 57 STAN. L. REV. 1095 (2005).

[34] United States v. Williams, 553 U.S. 285, 297 (2008) (citing Pittsburgh Press Co. v. Pittsburgh Comm'n on Human Relations, 413 U.S. 376, 388 (1973); Giboney v. Empire Storage & Ice Co., 336 U.S. 490, 498 (1949)).

[35] Williams, 553 U.S. at 298-99 (citing Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444, 447-48 (1969) (per curiam); NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware Co., 458 U.S. 886, 928–929 (1982)).

[36] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.06(3)(a)(i) ("A person is an accomplice of another person in the commission of an offense if," inter alia, he or she "solicits such other person to commit it[.]") (italics added); Model Penal Code § 5.02(1) ("A person is guilty of solicitation to commit a crime if," inter alia, he or she "encourages . . . another person to engage in specific conduct that would constitute such crime . . .") (italics added).

[37] E.g., Model Penal Code § 5.02 cmt. at 376; LAFAVE, supra note 3, at 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.1. So, for example, general, equivocal remarks—such as the espousal of a political philosophy recognizing the purported necessity of violence—would not be sufficiently concrete to satisfy the encouragement prong of accomplice liability. Commentary on Haw. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 705-510. Nor would a general exhortation to "go out and revolt." State v. Johnson, 202 Or. App. 478, 483 (2005); see generally Williams, 553 U.S. at 300 (distinguishing statements such as "I believe that child pornography should be legal" or even "I encourage you to obtain child pornography" with the recommendation of a particular piece of purported child pornography).

Section 210 is intended to preserve existing District law relevant to accomplice liability to the extent it is consistent with the RCC's statutory text and accompanying commentary. Subsections (a), (b), (c), and (d) therefore incorporate existing District legal authorities whenever appropriate.[38]

Relation to Current District Law. Section 210 codifies, clarifies, and fills gaps reflected in District law on the culpable mental state requirement and conduct requirement for accomplice liability, as well as the relation between the prosecution of the accomplice and the treatment of the person who is alleged to have committed the offense.

The D.C. Code addresses accomplice liability through section 22-1805, which establishes that:

> In prosecutions for any criminal offense all persons advising, inciting, or conniving at the offense, or aiding or abetting the principal offender, shall be charged as principals and not as accessories, the intent of this section being that as to all accessories before the fact the law heretofore applicable in cases of misdemeanor only shall apply to all crimes, whatever the punishment may be.[39]

This statute "was enacted by Congress in 1901, eight years before its federal analogue."[40] It was the product of a "reform movement," the purpose of which was to enact complicity legislation "abolish[ing] the distinction between principals and accessories and render[ing] them all principals."[41] While the general purpose sought to be

---

[38] This includes all existing District law relevant to the procedural aspects of accomplice liability, such as, for example: (1) charging, Murchison v. United States, 486 A.2d 77 (D.C. 1984); (2) jury instructions, Dickens v. United States, 163 A.3d 804 (D.C. 2017); (3) juror unanimity, Tyler v. United States, 495 A.2d 1180 (D.C. 1985); and (4) evidentiary considerations, Brooks v. United States, 599 A.2d 1094 (D.C. 1991). See generally D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 3.200.

[39] D.C. Code § 22-1805. This statute is to be distinguished from D.C. Code § 22-1806, the District's criminal statute addressing "accessories after the fact." That statute reads:

> Whoever shall be convicted of being an accessory after the fact to any crime punishable by death shall be punished by imprisonment for not more than 20 years. Whoever shall be convicted of being accessory after the fact to any crime punishable by imprisonment shall be punished by a fine or imprisonment, or both, as the case may be, not more than 1/2 the maximum fine or imprisonment, or both, to which the principal offender may be subjected.

D.C. Code § 22-1806. This statute reflects the "modern view" that an accessory after the fact "is not truly an accomplice in the crime," i.e. "his offense is instead that of interfering with the processes of justice and is best dealt with in those terms." LAFAVE, supra note 3, at 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. §§ 13.3, 13.6.

[40] Wilson-Bey v. United States, 903 A.2d 818, 831 (D.C. 2006) (en banc); see also Hackney v. United States, 389 A.2d 1336, 1342 (D.C. 1978) ("Our aiding and abetting statute does not differ substantially from its federal counterpart."). The original federal aiding and abetting federal statute, initially codified in 18 U.S.C. § 550, provided that "[w]hoever directly commits an act constituting an offense defined in any law of the United States, or aids, abets, counsels, commands, induces or procures its commission, is a principal." The current federal statute, 18 U.S.C. § 2, states that "[w]hoever commits an offense against the United States or aids, abets, counsels, commands, induces or procures its commission, is punishable as a principal."

[41] Dickens v. United States, 163 A.3d 804, 818 (D.C. 2017) (quoting Standefer v. United States, 447 U.S. 10, 18 (1980) and Tann v. United States, 127 A.3d 400, 438 n.19 (D.C. 2015)). As the DCCA in Brooks v. United States observed:

achieved by this statute are clear, its precise contours are more ambiguous. The District's general complicity statute—like its federal analogue—does not define any of the relevant statutory terms it employs. This statutory silence has effectively delegated to District courts the responsibility to establish the elements of accomplice liability.

Consistent with the interests of clarity and consistency, subsections (a), (b), (c), and (d) translate existing principles governing the conduct requirement and culpable mental state requirement of accomplice liability, as well as the relation between the prosecution of the accomplice and the treatment of the person who is alleged to have committed the offense, into a detailed statutory framework. In so doing, these provisions also fill gaps in the District law of complicity.

A more detailed analysis of District law and its relationship with subsections (a), (b), (c), and (d) is provided below. It is organized according to three main topics: (1) the conduct requirement; (2) the culpable mental state requirement; and (3) the relation between the prosecution of the accomplice and the treatment of the person who is alleged to have committed the offense.

RCC § 22E-210(a): Relation to Current District Law on Conduct Requirement. RCC § 22E-210(a) codifies, clarifies, and fills gaps in District law relevant to the conduct requirement of accomplice liability.

It is well established in the District that merely intending to promote or facilitate an offense perpetrated by another is an insufficient basis for accomplice liability; rather, to be held liable as an accomplice, one must have engaged in conduct that in some way contributed to the commission of that offense.[42] At the same time, the essential characteristics of this required contribution are described in a variety of ways.

For example, the District's general complicity statute utilizes a number of terms to express the conduct requirement of complicity: "advising, inciting, or conniving at the offense, or aiding or abetting the principal offender."[43] The first three terms in this

---

> The common law was burdened with obscure and technical distinctions between principals and accessories, and these refinements had the potential for derailing prosecutions for reasons unrelated to the merits. If the defendant were charged as a principal he could not be convicted upon proof that he was an accessory. Likewise, one charged only as an accessory could not be convicted if the evidence established that he was instead a principal. A great deal could depend on the skill and artistry of the pleader.

599 A.2d 1094, 1098–99 (D.C. 1991) (internal quotations and citations omitted).

[42] Buskey v. United States, 148 A.3d 1193, 1207 (D.C. 2016) ("Acting with the intent that a knife be used unlawfully does not in and of itself automatically satisfy the requirement that the accomplice himself do something to further the carrying of the knife by the principal. The accomplice may mentally intend for the knife to be used but may not do anything to assist the principal with the carrying and use of the knife."); D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 3.200 ("For [^] [name of defendant] to be guilty of aiding and abetting the offense of [^] [insert possessory firearm offense], the government must prove beyond a reasonable doubt [both that s/he aided and abetted the commission of [^] [insert name of crime of violence or dangerous crime] and also] that s/he aided and abetted the possession of a firearm. To aid and abet the possession of a firearm, [^] [name of defendant] must have engaged in some affirmative conduct to assist or facilitate the principal's possession of a firearm.]"); see, e.g., Walker v. United States, 167 A.3d 1191, 1202 (D.C. 2017) (analyzing whether defendant "encouraged or aided the commission of [the victim's] murder with malice aforethought").

[43] D.C. Code § 22-1805.

formulation—"advising," "inciting," and "conniving" rarely show up in the case law.[44] Nevertheless, their meaning, when viewed in historical context, is clear enough: they indicate that one may become an accomplice without being "personally present at the commission" of a crime.[45] Instead, as many modern criminal codes phrase it, "solicitation of the crime is enough."[46]

More typical under District law is judicial reliance on the statute's "aiding" or "abetting" language.[47] The standard formulation for accomplice liability, endorsed by the DCCA's en banc opinion in Wilson Bey and captured in the Redbook jury instructions, requires proof that the defendant "knowingly associated [himself or herself] with the commission of the crime, that [he or she] participated in the crime as something [he or she] wished to bring about, and that [he or she] intended by [his or her] actions to make it succeed."[48] Textually speaking, this formulation intertwines the culpable mental state requirement and conduct requirement of accomplice liability together; it is, therefore, not a model of clarity.

More helpful, then, is the DCCA's repeated observation that "one can be found guilty of aiding and abetting by merely encouraging or facilitating a crime."[49] This statement articulates the widely endorsed principle—reflected both inside and outside the [44] See generally Adam Harris Kurland, To "Aid, Abet, Counsel, Command, Induce, or Procure the Commission of an Offense": A Critique of Federal Aiding and Abetting Principles, 57 S.C. L. REV. 85, 135 (2005).

---

[45] Maxey v. United States, 30 App. D.C. 63, 72 (D.C. Cir. 1907); see, e.g., Thompson v. United States, 30 App. D.C. 352, 364 (D.C. Cir. 1908) ("By the common law, all persons who command, advise, instigate, or incite the commission of an offense, though not personally present at its commission, are accessories before the fact, and the object of the aforesaid section was to make all such persons principal offenders. For reasons of public policy it obliterated the common-law distinction between accessories before the fact and principals."); Tomlinson v. United States, 93 F.2d 652, 655 (D.C. Cir. 1937) ("It was not the contention of the government in this case that Tomlinson was physically present at the time and place of the offense, but that he was guilty as a principal, nevertheless, under section 908 of the D.C. Code 1924 . . . The issue in dispute was whether, prior to the robbery, Tomlinson had advised, incited, connived at, aided, or abetted the commission of the offense."). Nor, pursuant to such language, is it "essential that there be any direct communication between the actual perpetrator and the person aiding and abetting." Williams v. United States, 190 A.2d 269, 270 (D.C. 1963) (citing Maxey, 30 App.D.C. at 72–73; Ladrey v. United States, 155 F.2d 417, 420 (D.C. Cir. 1946)).

[46] LAFAVE, supra note 3, at 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 13.2 n.10 (collecting statutory authorities); see also Tann, 127 A.3d at 505 (defining "incitement" in the field of criminal law as "[t]he act of persuading another person to commit a crime") (quoting BLACK'S LAW DICTIONARY 880 (10th ed. 2014)); cf. United States v. Simmons, 431 F. Supp. 2d 38, 48 (D.D.C. 2006), aff'd sub nom. United States v. McGill, 815 F.3d 846 (D.C. Cir. 2016) ("Convictions for first degree murder while armed . . . may be based on evidence that he solicited and facilitated the murder.") (citing Collazo v. United States, 196 F.2d 573, 580 (D.C. Cir. 1952)). With respect to conspiracy, the DCCA has observed that: "Aiding, abetting, and counseling are not terms which presuppose the existence of an agreement. Those terms have a broader application, making the defendant a principal when he consciously shares in a criminal act, regardless of the existence of a conspiracy." Tann, 127 A.3d at 491 (quoting Pereira v. United States, 347 U.S. 1, 11, 74 S.Ct. 358, 98 L.Ed. 435 (1954)).

[47] See also David Luban, Contrived Ignorance, 87 GEO. L. REV. 957, 964 (1999) ("Supervisors implicitly or explicitly encourage their subordinates to meet their targets by any means necessary. That's abetting. Supervisors provide assistance and resources. That's aiding.").

[48] Wilson-Bey, 903 A.2d at 825; D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 3.200.

[49] Evans v. United States, 160 A.3d 1155, 1161 (D.C. 2017); Settles v. United States, 522 A.2d 348, 356 (D.C. 1987).

District—that aider and abettor liability encapsulates two independently sufficient categories of conduct: physical assistance and psychological encouragement.[50]

The following cases are illustrative of the breadth of these alternative requirements under current District law.[51] In Price v. United States, the DCCA upheld a conviction for theft premised on a complicity theory where the defendant took an item off the shelf at a hardware store, and thereafter carted it over to the principal—located within the store—who then tried to make a fraudulent return.[52]

In Wesley v. United States, the DCCA upheld a conviction for armed robbery premised on a complicity theory where the defendant merely engaged in a conversation with a bystander that enabled the principal to "slip into the barbershop" that was ultimately robbed, and perhaps also "serv[ed] as a lookout" for the principal.[53]

And in Creek v. United States, the DCCA upheld a conviction for armed robbery premised on a complicity theory based on the mere fact that the defendant was with the robber immediately before the robbery, retraced his steps back to the victim's home, stationed himself by her front gate while his companion seized her purse, and fled with the thief with whom he remained until caught by the police.[54]

One issue relevant to the conduct requirement of accomplice liability upon which District law appears to be silent is whether assistance by omission can, under appropriate circumstances, suffice for liability. For example, may a corrupt police officer who fails to stop a crime with the intent to aid the perpetrators be deemed an accomplice to that crime? There does not appear to be any DCCA case law directly on point.[55] Nevertheless, general

---

[50] See Walker v. United States, 167 A.3d 1191, 1201–02 (D.C. 2017) (noting the alternative requirements of "encouragement or aid"); Tann, 127 A.3d at 499 n.11 ("Generally, it may be said that accomplice liability exists when the accomplice intentionally encourages or assists, in the sense that his purpose is to encourage or assist another in the commission of a crime as to which the accomplice has the requisite mental state.") (quoting LAFAVE, supra note 3, at 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 13.2); see also Tann, 127 A.3d at 499 n.8 ("Nor has the government been able to find any case, from any jurisdiction, holding a defendant liable as an aider and abettor for the independent criminal act of another that the defendant did not intentionally encourage or assist in some way."); cf. English v. United States, 25 A.3d 46, 53–54 (D.C. 2011) ("This is not a case, for example, in which 'there appears to be some indication in the record before us that [Anderson] may have urged or directed the driver to take evasive action.'") (quoting United States v. Cook, 181 F.3d 1232, 1235 (11th Cir. 1999)).

[51] It is well established under DCCA case law that "[a]lthough mere presence at the scene is not enough to establish guilt under an aiding and abetting theory," little more than such presence is necessary. Porter v. U.S., 826 A.2d 398, 405 (D.C. 2003); see Settles, 522 A.2d at 357 ("[M]ere presence at the scene of the crime, without more, is generally insufficient to prove involvement in the crime, but it will be deemed enough if it is intended to [aid] and does aid the primary actors."); Bolden v. United States, 835 A.2d 532, 538–39 (D.C. 2003); compare Perry v. United States, 276 A.2d 719 (D.C. 1971) (mere presence), with Forsyth v. United States, 318 A.2d 292 (D.C. 1974) (presence coupled with flight and other circumstances).

[52] Price v. United States, 985 A.2d 434, 438 (D.C. 2009).

[53] Wesley v. United States, 547 A.2d 1022, 1026–27 (D.C. 1988).

[54] Creek v. United States, 324 A.2d 688, 689 (D.C. 1974); see In re A.B.H., 343 A.2d 573, 575 (D.C. 1975) (sufficient evidence of aiding and abetting where defendant had a close association with co-respondent prior to and after the purse snatching, defendant was present very near the scene of the crime, and fled from the scene with the co-respondent); Kelly v. United States, 639 A.2d 86, 91 (D.C. 1994) ("[T]he jury could reasonably have found that appellant had participated in planning the robbery, driven his friends across town to the robbery site, waited for them while they robbed the decedent, and then picked them up after the crime. This evidence was sufficient to support the conviction of appellant as an aider and abettor of the robbery.").

[55] Note, however, that the commentary to the D.C. Criminal Jury Instruction on attempt liability, § 7.101, states that:

District authority on omission liability would seem to support imposing liability under these circumstances.[56] So too does the fact that the DCCA has held on multiple occasions that "failure to disassociate" oneself from a criminal scheme alongside "tacit approval" to the offenses perpetrated by the principal will suffice to satisfy the conduct requirement of accomplice liability.[57]

Subsection (a) codifies the above District authorities applicable to the conduct requirement of accomplice liability. More specifically, subsections (a)(1) and (a)(2) establish two alternative means of being an accomplice: by rendering assistance and by offering encouragement.[58] The first prong will most frequently be established by proof of physical assistance rendered by affirmative conduct; however, an omission to act may also provide a viable basis for establishing the assistance prong, provided that the defendant is under a legal duty to act (and the other requirements of liability are met).[59] The encouragement prong, in contrast, encompasses promotion of an offense by psychological influence. It includes various forms of influence, including (but not limited to) the

---

> The court may wish to modify the instruction where an omission might constitute an attempt to commit a crime. For example, if the government alleges that the defendant did not activate the store's alarm system as part of a robbery attempt, the court might wish to modify the instruction that the "defendant omitted to do an act . . . ."

See also English v. United States, 25 A.3d 46, 54 (D.C. 2011) ("Although not directly on point, we note that there is authority for the proposition that, depending on the evidence in a particular case, if the vehicle in which a passenger is riding is involved in an accident causing death or injury, and if he or she fails to stop or to render assistance to the injured person, the passenger may be liable as an aider and abettor.") (collecting cases).

[56] See Commentary to RCC § 22E-202(c): Relation to Current District Law.

[57] Johnson v. United States, 883 A.2d 135, 143 (D.C. 2005) ("[H]aving knowledge of the offenses and failing to withdraw can be sufficient to establish implied approval, and hence aiding and abetting."); Prophet v. United States, 602 A.2d 1087, 1093 (D.C. 1992)("[T]he jury could reasonably conclude that [the defendant] failed to disassociate himself from [his co-defendant] and tacitly approved [his] actions" when he fled with the co-defendant even after "watch[ing] the robbery and murder"); Clark v. United States, 418 A.2d 1059 (D.C. 1980) (sidewalk robbery by co-defendant, who ran through alley into defendant's car; defendant drove at normal speed for one block and stopped car once police emergency lights activated); Gayden v. United States, 584 A.2d 578, 582–83 (D.C. 1990) (there was sufficient evidence to support instruction on aiding and abetting where the defendant "traveled to the scene of the crime [,] . . . was present at the killing[,] and . . . fled the scene with [two possible killers]"); Settles v. United States, 522 A.2d 348, 358 (D.C. 1987) (there was sufficient evidence of aiding and abetting where the defendant was potentially a lookout and "was with Settles before the crime, was present during the crime, and fled with Settles after the crime" because the defendant "must have had actual knowledge that a crime was being committed, but . . . he did nothing to disassociate himself from the criminal activity"). Compare Jones v. United States, 625 A.2d 281 (D.C. 1993) (fact that defendant brushed by the complainant shortly before co-defendant stabbed complainant, then walked away with co-defendant "laughing and talking" insufficient to prove aiding and abetting) with Acker v. United States, 618 A.2d 688 (D.C. 1992) ("jovial quip" to school friend before robbery and failure to prevent robbery of friend insufficient to prove aiding where defendant also failed to facilitate getaway of those actively engaged in the robbery).

[58] Whether assistance or encouragement is at issue, there is no requirement that the principal actor have actually been aware of the effect of the defendant's conduct. However, the defendant's conduct must have, in fact, assisted or encouraged the principle actor in some way (i.e. an unsuccessful accomplice is not subject to criminal liability under RCC § 22E-210).

[59] See generally RCC § 22E-202(c) (setting forth the requirements of omission liability under the RCC).

encouragement afforded by a command, request, or agreement, as well as advice, counsel, instigation, incitement, and provocation.

RCC §§ 210 (a), (b), & (c): Relation to Current District Law on Culpable Mental State Requirement. Subsections (a), (b), and (c) codify and clarify District law concerning the culpable mental state requirement governing accomplice liability.

The DCCA has addressed the culpable mental state requirement of accomplice liability on numerous occasions. Generally speaking, it is well established by such case law that "[t]here is a dual mental state requirement for accomplice liability."[60] The first requirement speaks to the relationship between the accomplice's state of mind and the promotion or facilitation of the requisite criminal conduct committed by the principal. The second requirement, in contrast, speaks to the relationship between the accomplice's state of mind and the results and/or circumstances brought about by the principal (and which are prohibited by the target offense).

As it relates to the first of these two culpable mental state requirements, DCCA case law establishes that the defendant must have acted with the purpose of promoting or facilitating criminal conduct. The basis for this requirement is the DCCA's en banc decision in United States v. Wilson-Bey, which holds that, "[t]o establish a defendant's criminal liability as an aider and abettor, [] the government must prove . . . that the accomplice . . . wished to bring about [the criminal venture], and [] sought by his action to make it succeed."[61]

This requirement of a "purposive attitude" is, as the Wilson-Bey court explained, drawn from Judge Hand's well-known decision in United States v. Peoni.[62] As the DCCA observed:

> Although Peoni was decided sixty-eight years ago, it remains the prevailing authority defining accomplice liability. In 1949 the Supreme Court explicitly adopted Peoni's purpose-based formulation. Nye & Nissen v. United States, 336 U.S. 613, 618, 69 S.Ct. 766, 93 L.Ed. 919 (1949). This court has likewise followed Peoni, see, e.g., [Reginald B.] Brooks v. United States, 599 A.2d 1094, 1099 (D.C.1991); Hackney, 389 A.2d at 1342, and we have held that an accomplice "must be concerned in the commission of the specific crime with which the principal defendant is charged [;] he must [60] Tann, 127 A.3d at 491 ("There is a dual mental state requirement for accomplice liability: the accomplice not only must have the culpable mental state required for the underlying crime committed by the principal; he also must assist[ ] or encourage[ ] the commission of the crime committed by the principal with the intent to promote or facilitate such commission.").

[61] Wilson-Bey v. United States, 903 A.2d 818, 831 (D.C. 2006).

[62] 100 F.2d 401 (2d Cir. 1938). After considering an array of common law authorities, Judge Hand concluded that:

> [A]ll these definitions have nothing whatever to do with the probability that the forbidden result would follow upon the accessory's conduct; . . . . [T]hey all demand that he in some sort associate himself with the venture, that he participate in it as in something that he wishes to bring about, that he seek by his action to make it succeed. All the words used-even the most colorless, "abet"-carry an implication of purposive attitude towards it.

Id.

> be an associate in guilt of that crime." Roy v. United States, 652 A.2d 1098, 1104 (D.C. 1995) (emphasis in original).
>
> Every United States Circuit Court of Appeals has adopted Peoni's requirement that the accomplice be shown to have intended that the principal succeed in committing the charged offense, and the federal appellate courts have thus rejected, explicitly or implicitly, a standard that would permit the conviction of an accomplice without the requisite showing of intent. The majority of state courts have also adopted a purpose-based standard. See also LaFave § 13.2(d), at 349 & n. 97. Federal and state model jury instructions are also generally consistent with Peoni, and require proof that the accomplice intended to help the principal to commit the charged offense.[63]

Since Wilson-Bey, Peoni's purpose-based standard has been incorporated into the District's jury instructions,[64] and reaffirmed in numerous DCCA cases.[65] At the same time, this standard is not a model of clarity, and has led to subsequent litigation.[66] Nevertheless,

---

[63] Wilson-Bey v. United States, 903 A.2d 818, 831 (D.C. 2006).

[64] D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 3.200.

[65] See, e.g., Robinson v. United States, 100 A.3d 95, 106 (D.C. 2014); Gray v. United States, 79 A.3d 326, 338 (D.C. 2013); Joya v. United States, 53 A.3d 309, 314 (D.C. 2012); Ewing v. United States, 36 A.3d 839, 846 (D.C. 2012).

[66] For example, in Tann v. United States, a split panel of the DCCA disagreed over the specificity of the purpose requirement, questioning whether an "aider and abettor who acts, as Wilson–Bey requires, with the same purpose and intent as the principal must also 'intentionally associate' with that specific principal." 127 A.3d at 440. Which is to say, "[m]ore pointedly, the question [raised in Tann was] whether the aider and abettor must know of the presence and conduct of the specific principal and form the intent to help him or her with the commission of his or her crime, as opposed to share simply (with whoever shared the aider and abettor's purpose) in the mens rea required to commit the crime itself." Id. The majority opinion answered this question in the negative, determining that:

> [T]he case law supports the following propositions rooted in the common law and incorporated in our aiding-and-abetting statute: (1) the aider and abettor must have the mens rea of the principal actor, see Wilson–Bey, 903 A.2d at 822, and must have the "purposive attitude towards" the criminal venture described in Peoni, 100 F.2d at 402; (2) a defendant is not responsible for the actions of a third-party who, wholly unassociated with and independent of the defendant, enters into a crime when there is no community of purpose between the defendant and the third-party . . . however, (3) the defendant need not know of the presence of every participant in a group crime (including the principal) in order to be found guilty under an aiding-and-abetting theory of liability . . . and (4) where the criteria in (1) above are met and the evidence at trial proves that the defendants by their action, foreseeably (and thus, the factfinder may conclude, intentionally) incited action by a third party who shared in their community of purpose, aiding-and-abetting liability may be found . . . .

127 A.3d at 444-45. Note that the majority opinion still holds that the government had to prove, inter alia, that "Harris and Tann intended to aid any of their fellow crew members who were present and participating in doing so." Id. at 450.

A partial dissenting opinion written by Judge Glickman reached an opposite conclusion, determining that a person "can[not] be found guilty as an aider and abettor under the law of the District of Columbia without proof that he intended to assist or encourage the principal offender." Id. at 499. This is this much appears to be clear from the relevant District authorities: in order to be held liable as an accomplice, the defendant must, at minimum, have "designedly encouraged or facilitated" the commission of criminal conduct by another.[67]

As DCCA case law relates to the second culpable mental state requirement applicable to accomplice liability, the relationship between the accomplice's state of mind and the results and/or circumstances brought about by the principal (and which are prohibited by the target offense), there are a few well established principles.

Most fundamentally, the government must prove that the defendant acted with, at minimum, "the culpable mental state required for the underlying crime committed by the principal."[68] Practically speaking, this means that a defendant may never be held criminally responsible for the conduct of another as an accomplice absent proof that the defendant acted with the culpable mental states governing the results and circumstances that comprise the offense committed by the principal.[69]

So, for example, the DCCA in Wilson Bey held that, with respect to results, an accomplice to first-degree murder must, like the principal, "be shown to have specifically intended the decedent's death and to have acted with premeditation and deliberation."[70] And, as for circumstances, the DCCA held in Robinson v. United States that, "[i]f the principal offender must know he is armed when he is committing a violent or dangerous not to say that "the accomplice always must know the identity of the principal offender." Id. Indeed, "it is possible in some circumstances to be an aider and abettor—to help or induce another person to commit a crime, and to do so knowingly and intentionally—without knowing who that other person is." Id. ("A typical example is the person who knowingly attaches himself to a large group, such as a lynch mob, a criminal gang, or a vigilante body, that is engaged in or bent on breaking the law.") Id. Even still, "one cannot be liable as an aider and abettor without having the intent to assist or encourage a principal actor at all." Id. That is, "[o]ne cannot be an inadvertent accomplice." Id.

---

[67] Porter v. United States, 826 A.2d 398, 405 (D.C. 2003) (quoting Jefferson v. United States, 463 A.2d 681, 683 (D.C. 1983)); Evans v. United States, 160 A.3d 1155, 1161 (D.C. 2017); see also English v. United States, 25 A.3d 46, 53 (D.C. 2011) ("The key question is whether, drawing all reasonable inferences in the prosecution's favor, an impartial jury could fairly find beyond a reasonable doubt that Anderson intentionally participated in English's reckless flight from the pursuing officer, and that he not only wanted English (and his passengers) to succeed in eluding the police (which Anderson undoubtedly did), but that he also took concrete action to make his hope a reality.").

[68] Tann, 127 A.3d at 444-45; see, e.g., Collins v. United States, 73 A.3d 974, 981 n.3 (D.C. 2013) (in order to convict a defendant as an aider and abettor "the government was required to show that the accomplice had the same intent necessary to prove commission of the underlying substantive offense by the principal"); Lancaster v. United States, 975 A.2d 168, 174 (D.C. 2009) ("Because armed robbery is a specific-intent crime, the government must prove that the aider and abettor shared the same mens rea required of the principals."); Kitt v. United States, 904 A.2d 348, 356 (D.C. 2006) ("[W]here a specific mens rea is an element of a criminal offense, a defendant must have had that mens rea himself to be guilty of that offense, whether he is charged as the principal actor or as an aider and abettor."); Carter v. United States, 957 A.2d 9, 19 (D.C. 2008).

[69] See, e.g., Appleton v. United States, 983 A.2d 970, 977 (D.C. 2009) ("Any instruction on aiding and abetting must make clear that a defendant needs to have the mens rea required of the underlying crime in order to be convicted of the crime as an aider and abettor."); Wheeler v. United States, 977 A.2d 973 (D.C. 2009), reh'g granted, opinion modified, 987 A.2d 431, 431 (D.C. 2010) (per curiam) (The "charged aider and abettor will have to know and intend the steps taken, amounting to the same mental state required of the principal.").

[70] Wilson Bey, 903 A.2d at 840 ("Because the District's aiding and abetting statute requires proof that an accomplice acted with the mental state necessary to convict her as a principal, the government here was required to prove, in order for the jury to find [the defendant] guilty of first-degree murder, that she acted with a specific intent to kill after premeditation and deliberation.").

crime in order to be subject to the 'while armed' enhancement of § 22–4502, then the aider and abettor . . . also must know the principal is armed for the enhancement to be applicable to her as well." [71]

That proof of the culpable mental states governing the results and circumstances that comprise the target offense is necessary to support accomplice liability, however, raises the question of whether it is also sufficient? With respect to results, it would appear that it is; DCCA case law seems to endorse a principle of culpable mental state equivalency under which proof of the minimum culpable mental state requirement applicable to the results of the target offense will suffice for accomplice liability.

For example, in Coleman v. United States, the DCCA held that an accomplice to depraved heart murder must (but need only) possess the extreme recklessness as to death required of the principal of a depraved heart murder.[72] And in Perry v. United States, the DCCA held that an accomplice to aggravated assault must (but need only) possess the extreme recklessness as to serious bodily required of the principal of an aggravated assault.[73]

As for circumstances, DCCA case law is more ambiguous. Generally speaking, the government is required to show in all cases in which accomplice liability is charged that the defendant's "participation was with guilty knowledge."[74] In practice, this appears to amount to a principle of culpable mental state elevation, under which proof of awareness or belief as to the target offense's circumstance elements is necessary to secure a conviction based on accomplice liability.

The clearest statement of this approach is reflected in the DCCA's decision in Robinson v. United States, which specifically held that "[a] person cannot intend to aid an armed offense if she is unaware a weapon will be involved."[75] The basis for such a determination is, as the Robinson court explains, the more general idea that, in order for an accomplice to be deemed "guilty of a crime"—for example, "an offense committed while armed"—the defendant "must, inter alia, intend to facilitate the entire offense."[76]

This effective principle of culpable mental state elevation is, as the Robinson court proceeds to explain, both rooted in the DCCA's en banc opinion in Wilson-Bey, as well as the U.S. Supreme Court's recent decision in Rosemond v. United States, which held that "an aiding and abetting conviction requires not just an act facilitating one or another element, but also a state of mind extending to the entire crime."[77] (Which is to say, as the Rosemond Court explained, "[t]he intent must go to the specific and entire crime charged,"

---

[71] Robinson v. United States, 100 A.3d 95, 105 (D.C. 2014).
[72] Coleman v. United States, 948 A.2d 534, 552 (D.C. 2008); see Tann, 127 A.3d at 430-31 ("Because he was convicted of second-degree murder for aiding and abetting Cooper's shooting of Terrence Jones, the government was required to prove that Tann had, at a minimum, a "depraved heart" with regard to Terrence Jones's death.").
[73] Perry v. United States, 36 A.3d 799, 817–18 (D.C. 2011); see also Story v. United States, 16 F.2d 342, 344 (D.C. Cir. 1926) (upholding accomplice liability based on "criminal negligence" as to causing death).
[74] Tyree v. United States, 942 A.2d 629, 636 (D.C. 2008); see, e.g., Evans v. United States, 160 A.3d 1155, 1162 (D.C. 2017); Tann, 127 A.3d at 434; Buskey v. United States, 148 A.3d 1193, 1207 (D.C. 2016); Wheeler v. United States, 977 A.2d 973, 986 (D.C. 2009), reh'g granted, opinion modified, 987 A.2d 431 (D.C. 2010).
[75] Robinson, 100 A.3d at 105–06.
[76] Robinson, 100 A.3d at 106 and n.17 (citing Wilson–Bey, 903 A.2d at 831).
[77] Robinson, 100 A.3d at 105–06 (quoting Rosemond v. United States, 134 S. Ct. 1240, 1249 (2014)).

such as "predicate crime plus gun use."[78]) Since Robinson was handed down, this rationale has been reaffirmed by the DCCA on multiple occasions.[79]

There exists one additional principle governing the culpable mental state of accomplice liability under District law that bears notice. While an accomplice may never be convicted of an offense absent proof of a culpable mental state that satisfies the requirements of the offense charged,[80] "the principal and the aider and abettor(s) need not have the same mens rea as each other if an offense can be committed with an alternate mens rea." [81] Rather, where an offense is divided into degrees based upon distinctions in culpability (e.g., homicide), "each participant's responsibility [turns] on his or her individual intent or mens rea."[82]

Consistent with this principle, the DCCA in Mayfield v. United States deemed the defendant's conviction for premeditated first-degree murder while armed to be appropriate under an aiding and abetting theory, although the principal who had fired fatal shot was convicted of second-degree murder.[83] Likewise, in at least two other decisions, the DCCA has—again, in accordance with this principle—deemed it appropriate to hold a secondary party liable for second-degree murder, although the principal party committed a premeditated first-degree murder.[84]

Viewed collectively, the above analysis of District law supports four propositions. First, an accomplice must act with the purpose of assisting or encouraging the criminal conduct of another. Second, an accomplice need only act with the culpable mental state

---

[78] See Rosemond, 134 S. Ct. at 1249.

[79] See, e.g., Buskey v. United States, 148 A.3d 1193, 1207 (D.C. 2016); Tann, 127 A.3d at 434; see also Evans v. United States, 160 A.3d 1155, 1162 (D.C. 2017) ("Evans was found guilty of the charges relating to weapons via the aiding and abetting theory and accordingly, the government was required to prove Evans's guilty knowledge.").

[80] Kitt v. United States, 904 A.2d 348, 356 (D.C. 2006).

[81] Commentary on D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 3.200.

[82] Coleman v. United States, 948 A.2d 534, 552 (D.C. 2008) (quoting Wilson–Bey v. United States, 903 A.2d 818 (D.C. 2006) (en banc)).

[83] 659 A.2d 1249, 1254 (D.C. 1995). The U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit, discussing District case law on this point, observes that "[t]here is nothing unfair about [such an outcome]." United States v. Edmond, 924 F.2d 261, 267 (D.C. Cir. 1991).

> First-degree murder requires premeditation, as when a killing is planned and calculated; second-degree murder does not involve planning, although the homicide is committed intentionally and with malice aforethought. Harris v. United States, 375 A.2d 505, 507–08 (D.C.1977); Austin v. United States, 382 F.2d 129, 137 (D.C.Cir.1967). In a joint trial, if a jury thought an aider and abettor carefully conceived a murder but enlisted an executioner only at the last possible moment, it could consistently convict the abettor of first-degree murder while finding the actual perpetrator guilty only of the lesser offense. There is no reason why separate juries in separate trials of the principal and the aider and abettor would be acting inconsistently or unfairly if they did the same. The degree of murder in each case depends on the mens rea of the defendant who is on trial.

Id.

[84] McKnight v. United States, 102 A.3d 284, 285 (D.C. 2014); Coleman v. United States, 948 A.2d 534, 552 (D.C. 2008); see Branch v. United States, 382 A.2d 1033, 1035 (D.C. 1978) ("As voluntary manslaughter while armed is a lesser included offense within second-degree murder while armed, the jury necessarily found that codefendant Simpson's conduct included voluntary manslaughter while armed. Having so found, the jury's conviction of appellant for aiding and abetting that offense is proper.").

applicable to the result element of the offense perpetrated by another. Third, an accomplice must act with at least knowledge of—or intent as to—the circumstances of the offense perpetrated by another, regardless of whether the principal may be convicted based upon some lesser culpable mental state. Fourth, and finally, where an offense is graded based upon distinctions in culpability, an accomplice may be held liable for any grade for which he or she possesses the specified culpability.

Section 210 codifies these propositions as follows. Subsection (a) establishes that the culpability required for accomplice liability necessarily incorporates "the culpability required for the [target] offense." Subparagraphs (a)(1) and (2) thereafter establish that a requirement of purpose is applicable to both the assistance/encouragement as well as to the conduct sought to be brought about by that assistance/encouragement. Next, subsection (b) incorporates a principle of culpable mental state elevation under which proof of intent on behalf of the accomplice is required—regardless of whether the target offense is comprised of a circumstance that may be satisfied by proof of recklessness, negligence, or no mental state at all (i.e. strict liability). Finally, subsection (c) clarifies where an offense "is divided into degrees based upon distinctions in culpability as to results," an accomplice may be held "liable for any grade for which he or she possesses the culpability required."

RCC §§ 22E-210(d) and (e): Relation to Current District Law on Charging and Penalties. Subsections (d) and (e) both codify and clarify current District law concerning the nature of the relationship between an accomplice and the principal.

As described under subsection (a) of the revised statute, it is well established, both inside and outside of the District, that complicity is not a separate crime; rather, it delineates a theory of liability through which one person can be held legally responsible for one or more crimes committed by another person.[85] This is clearly reflected in the District's complicity statute, which establishes that "all persons advising, inciting, or conniving at the offense, or aiding and abetting the principal offender, shall be charged as principals and not as accessories."[86]

One important implication of this aspect of complicity is that liability for "aiding and abetting is predicated upon a proper demonstration of all of the necessary elements of the underlying criminal act."[87] Which is to say, as the District's criminal jury instructions phrase the point: "[f]or a defendant to be convicted as an aider and abettor, the government must prove beyond a reasonable doubt all of the elements of the underlying crime, including commission of the crime by someone other than the accused."[88]

A good illustration of this basic requirement is the DCCA case law on the intersection of complicity and the District offense of carrying a pistol without a license (CPWL). Where a CPWL charge is in play, it is well-established that a "defendant cannot be convicted . . . on an aiding and abetting theory where there is no proof that the person

[85] See, e.g., Hawthorne v. United States, 829 A.2d 948, 952–53 (D.C. 2003); Payton v. United States, 305 A.2d 512, 513 (D.C. 1973).
[86] D.C. Code § 22-1805.
[87] Matter of J. W. Y., 363 A.2d 674, 677 (D.C. 1976); see, e.g., United States v. Wiley, 492 F.2d 547, 551 (D.C. Cir. 1973); Hawthorne, 829 A.2d at 952; Gray v. United States, 260 F.2d 483, 484 (D.C. Cir. 1958); see also D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 3.200 ("[It is not necessary that all the people who committed the crime be caught or identified. It is sufficient if you find beyond a reasonable doubt that the crime was committed by someone and that the defendant knowingly and intentionally aided and abetted in committing the crime.]").
[88] D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 3.200.

in actual possession of the pistol did not have a license to carry it."[89] Relying on this legal proposition, the DCCA has, in turn, overturned complicity-based convictions for CPWL premised upon proof that the defendant him or herself, rather than the principal, lacked the requisite license.[90]

However, while it must be proven that another person committed a crime,[91] District case law also is clear that the principal need not be convicted of the crime. The DCCA has held that: "[a]n aider and abettor may be convicted of an offense even though the principal has not been convicted."[92] Further, an aider and abettor may be convicted of an offense even though the principal has been acquitted.[93] Notably, where there is a conviction of the principal actor, the DCCA has also held that an "aider and abettor may be convicted of a lesser or greater offense than the principal."[94]

Consistent with the above analysis of District law, subsections (d) and (e) address the relation between the prosecution of the accomplice and the treatment of the person who is alleged to have committed the offense as follows. Subsection (d) provides that in terms of charging there is not difference between an accomplice and the principal, and that the offense penalty available to the accomplice is the same as if to a principal. Subsection (e) identifies various ways in which the legal disposition of the principal's situation is immaterial to that of the accomplice, namely, it is not a defense to a prosecution premised on a theory of aiding and abetting that "the principal has not been arrested, prosecuted, convicted, adjudicated delinquent, or acquitted for an offense."

---

[89] Jefferson v. U.S., 558 A.2d 298, 303-04 (D.C. 1989); see Halicki v. United States, 614 A.2d 499, 503–04 (D.C. 1992) ("[W]e have repeatedly held that, in order to convict of CPWL on an aiding and abetting theory, the government must show that the principal (not the aider and abettor) was not licensed to carry the pistol."); Jackson v. U.S., 395 A.2d 99, 103 n.6 (D.C. 1978).

[90] Jefferson, 558 A.2d at 303-04; Jackson, 395 A.2d at 103 n.6.

[91] The offense need not be a completed offense. Rather, a person may be held liable for aiding and abetting an attempt to commit an offense, so long as it is shown that the principal him or herself committed that attempt. See, e.g., Ladrey v. United States, 155 F.2d 417 (D.C. Cir. 1946) (attempted bribery of witness premised on complicity theory); Williams v. United States, 190 A.2d 269 (D.C. 1963) (attempted petit larceny premised on complicity theory); Montgomery v. United States, 384 A.2d 655 (D.C.1978) (same); Carter v. United States, 957 A.2d 9, 17 (D.C. 2008) (attempted armed robbery premised on complicity theory); Felder v. United States, 595 A.2d 974, 975 (D.C. 1991) (same).

[92] Mayfield v. United States, 659 A.2d 1249, 1254 n.4 (D.C. 1995); Murchison v. United States, 486 A.2d 77, 81 (D.C. 1984).

[93] Morriss v. United States, 554 A.2d 784, 790 (D.C. 1989) ("[T]he acquittal of a principal does not preclude conviction of an aider and abettor"); Gray v. U.S., 260 F.2d 483 (D.C. Cir. 1958) (conviction of aider and abettor sustained despite acquittal of the principal); United States v. McCall, 460 F.2d 952, 958 (D.C. Cir. 1972) (acquittal of principal in separate trial does not preclude conviction of aider and abettor); see Mayfield v. United States, 659 A.2d 1249, 1254 n.4 (D.C. 1995) (citing Standefer v. United States, 447 U.S. 10, 14–20 (1980) (conviction of principal is not a prerequisite to an aiding and abetting conviction, even where principal is acquitted in a separate trial)); United States v. McCall, 460 F.2d 952, 958 (D.C. Cir. 1972) (acquittal of principal in separate trial does not preclude conviction of aider and abettor); U.S. v. Edmond, 924 F.2d 261 (D.C. Cir. 1991) (defendant could be convicted as aider and abettor to first degree murder after gunman had been acquitted of offense).

[94] Mayfield v. United States, 659 A.2d 1249, 1254 n.4 (D.C. 1995) (citing Branch v. United States, 382 A.2d 1033, 1035 (D.C. 1978) (aider and abettor convicted of lesser offense).

RCC § 22E-211. LIABILITY FOR CAUSING CRIME BY AN INNOCENT OR IRRESPONSIBLE PERSON.

Explanatory Notes. Section 211 establishes general principles of legal accountability based on causing crime by an innocent or irresponsible person.[1]

The theory of liability codified in this section provide a causal mechanism for holding one party, P, criminally liable for the acts of another party, X, under circumstances where X is innocent or irresponsible, and, therefore, cannot him or herself be held criminally liable.[2] Where, as in these situations, P has effectively used X as a means of achieving a criminal objective, it is appropriate to view X's conduct as an extension of P's for analytical purposes.[3] Section 211 authorizes this form of legal accountability[4] upon proof of three basic requirements.

---

[1] That "one is no less guilty of the commission of a crime because he uses the overt conduct of an innocent or irresponsible agent" is a "universally acknowledged" principle of common law origin. Model Penal Code § 2.06 cmt. at 300; see, e.g., Morrisey v. State, 620 A.2d 207, 211 (Del. 1993) ("It is well-established at common law that an individual is criminally culpable for causing an intermediary to commit a criminal act even though the intermediary has no criminal intent and is innocent of the substantive crime."); Commentary on Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 502.010 ("That an individual may incur criminal liability by procuring a prohibited harm through an act of an innocent or irresponsible agent is a principle of long standing."); see also, e.g., United States v. Lester, 363 F.2d 68, 72 (6th Cir. 1966) ("[This] doctrine is an outgrowth of common law principles of criminal responsibility dating at least as far back as Regina v. Saunders, 2 Plowd. 473 (1575); and of principles of civil responsibility established, by force of the maxim qui facit per alium facit per se, at least as early as the 14th century"); F.B. Sayre, Criminal Responsibility for the Acts of Another, 43 HARV. L. REV. 689 (1930).

[2] Ordinarily, one party cannot be held criminally liable for the conduct of a second party unless the second party actually commits a crime. E.g., WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 13.1 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019). However, where the second party is an innocent or irresponsible agent who has been manipulated by the first party to commit what would be a crime if the second party were not legally excused, then the first party "is considered the perpetrator of the offense, the 'principal in the first degree' in traditional common law parlance, based on the 'innocent instrumentality' doctrine." E.g., JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 30.03 (6th ed. 2012).

The following hypothetical is illustrative. P, a drug dealer, asks X, his sister, to pick up a package for him at the post office. P credibly tells X—who is unaware of her brother's means of employment—that the package is filled with cooking spices. However, the package is actually filled with heroin. Soon after picking up the package from the post office, X is arrested in transit. On these facts, X cannot be convicted of possession of narcotics because she lacks the required culpable mental state (i.e. knowledge) as to the nature of the substance possessed. And because X cannot be convicted for directly possessing the heroin, P cannot be convicted for possessing the heroin as X's accomplice under section 210, which requires "proof of the commission of the offense" by another person. P can, however, be held criminally responsible for possession as a principal under section 211 upon proof that: (1) P caused X to possess the heroin; (2) P acted with the culpable mental state for drug possession; and (3) X lacked the culpable mental state for drug possession.

[3] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.06(2)(a) ("A person is legally accountable for the conduct of another person when . . . acting with the kind of culpability that is sufficient for the commission of the offense, he causes an innocent or irresponsible person to engage in such conduct.").

[4] Accomplice liability and causing crime by an innocent or irresponsible person constitute distinct bases of legal accountability (that is, ways of holding one person criminally responsible for the conduct of another person). To illustrate the different roles these theories play, consider the difference between: (1) aiding and abetting a theft via a solicitation; and (2) causing an innocent person to commit a theft via a solicitation.

In the first scenario, P says the following to X: "V just bought a really expensive television, and I have his house keys. How about I give them to you, you grab the television while V is away, and then I'll sell the TV and we can split the profits?" If X agrees to the plan and the scheme is successful, X is the

The first requirement under subsection (a) is that the intermediary must be "an innocent or irresponsible person," a term defined in subsection (b) that envisions two main types of actors.[5] Pursuant to paragraph (b)(1), there are those who, having engaged in conduct that satisfies the objective elements of an offense, but lack the culpable mental state required for that offense.[6] Pursuant to paragraph (b)(2), there are those who engage in conduct that satisfies the objective elements of an offense, but meet the requirements for a general excuse or justification defense. The definition under subsection (b) is not an exclusive list, however, and other actors may include very young children.[7]

The second requirement, codified under paragraph (a)(1), is one of causation, namely, the defendant must cause the (innocent or irresponsible) intermediary to engage in conduct constituting an offense.[8] To meet this requirement, the nexus between the conduct of the defendant and that of the intermediary must be sufficiently close to satisfy the principles of factual and legal causation set forth in section 204.[9] In this context, the perpetrator of the offense and P is an accomplice to the theft based upon the solicitation under RCC § 22E-210.

---

In the second scenario, P lies to X: "My new television set is at V's house. I let V borrow it, but V no longer needs it and has asked me to pick it up/given me his keys. Would you do me a favor, X, and retrieve the TV for me while V is at school?" If X believes P's false representations and retrieves V's property, P would not be X's accomplice since X did not actually commit theft. (That is, although X took V's property, X did not possess the intent to steal, and, therefore, X cannot be convicted of theft.) P can, however, be convicted of directly perpetrating the theft himself under section 211 based on his having caused innocent person X to satisfy the objective elements of theft with the intent to steal.
See generally DRESSLER, supra note 2, at § 28.01 (employing similar illustration).

[5] The definition of "innocent or irresponsible person" in subsection (b) is not necessarily limited, however, to these two different types of actors. See RCC § 22E-211(b) (use of "includes," rather than "means," in prefatory clause). This non-exclusive definition leaves open the possibility that an intermediary who is justified, or possesses some other defense other than an excuse, may also qualify as an "innocent or irresponsible person" within the meaning of subsection (a). See, e.g., Sanford H. Kadish, Complicity, Cause and Blame: A Study in the Interpretation of Doctrine, 73 CAL. L. REV. 323, 372-85 (1985) (discussing conceptual difficulties relevant to who qualifies as innocent or irresponsible person); PAUL H. ROBINSON, 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 82 (Westlaw 2019) (same); see also, e.g., Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 502.010(2) (use of "includes" in comparable statutory definition of innocent or irresponsible person); Ala. § 13A-2-22(2)(b) (same).

[6] This may apply, for example, in the situation of bank manager, P, who carries out a theft by asking an employee, X, to retrieve funds, based on the lie that the company's CEO has authorized the withdrawal.

[7] See, RCC § 22E-216, Minimum Age for Offense Liability (excluding from offense liability a person under 12 years of age).

[8] RCC § 22E-211(a) ("the person causes an innocent or irresponsible person to engage in conduct constituting an offense"). The phrase "conduct constituting an offense," as employed in this subsection, refers to "the conduct under the circumstances and causing the results proscribed by the offense definition." Paul H. Robinson & Jane Grall, Element Analysis in Defining Criminal Liability: The Model Penal Code and Beyond, 35 STAN. L. REV. 681, 733 (1983) ("The objective elements for causing crime by an innocent are relatively straightforward. The defendant need not satisfy the objective elements of the substantive offense; the point of the provision is to hold him legally accountable when he engages in conduct that causes an innocent or irresponsible person to satisfy the objective requirements."); compare Model Penal Code § 2.06(2)(a) ("A person is legally accountable for the conduct of another person when . . . acting with the kind of culpability that is sufficient for the commission of the offense, he causes an innocent or irresponsible person to engage in such conduct.") (italics added).

[9] See RCC § 22E-204(a) ("No person may be convicted of an offense that contains a result element unless the person's conduct is the factual cause and legal cause of the result."). Section 211 is both based on, but also departs from, normal principles of causation. Typically, "[a]ctions are seen not as caused happenings, but as the product of the actor's self-determined choices, so that it is the actor who is the cause of what he does, not one who set the stage for his action." Sanford H. Kadish, Complicity, Cause and Blame: A Study principle of factual causation entails proof that the defendant did something to manipulate or otherwise impact the innocent or irresponsible person, so that it may be said that, but for the defendant's actions, the intermediary would not have engaged in the prohibited conduct.[10] Even where this empirical prerequisite is met, however, the principle of legal causation precludes liability if the nexus between the conduct of the defendant and that of the intermediary is too remote or attenuated to fairly allow for a conviction.[11] Paragraph (a)(1) uses the term "in fact," to specify that there is no culpable mental state required as to the actor causing the innocent or irresponsible party to engage in conduct constituting the offense. This does not mean that actors are strictly liable for causing conduct of innocent or irresponsible parties. As discussed below, paragraph (a)(2) requires the actor have the same culpability as required by the target offense.

The third requirement, codified under paragraph (a)(2), is that the defendant must act "with the culpability required for [the target] offense."[12] This requirement entails proof that the defendant caused an innocent or irresponsible person to engage in conduct constituting an offense with the state of mind—purpose, knowledge, intent, recklessness, negligence, or none at all (i.e. strict liability)—applicable to each of the objective elements that comprise the offense. In practical effect, this means that a defendant may be held criminally liable for a crime of recklessness or negligence under section 211, provided that they caused the conduct of an innocent or irresponsible person with the requisite non-in the Interpretation of Doctrine, 73 CAL. L. REV. 323, 391 (1985); see, e.g., JOHN KAPLAN ET AL., CRIMINAL LAW 261 (6th ed. 2008) ("Rather than distinguish between foreseeable and unforeseeable intervening events . . . the common law generally assumed that individuals were the exclusive cause of their own actions."). Where, however, one party induces another party to engage in generally prohibited conduct that is legally excused, the analysis materially changes. This is because, "[f]or purposes of causation doctrine, excusable and justifiable actions are not seen as completely freely chosen." Id. at 370. Under these conditions, "the defendant is seen as causing the other's act in the same way he would be seen to cause a physical event" (i.e. "[t]he primary actor becomes 'merely an instrument' of the secondary actor"). Id.

---

[10] DRESSLER, supra note 2, at § 30.03; see RCC § 22E-204(b) ("A person's conduct is the factual cause of a result if: (1) The result would not have occurred but for the person's conduct; or (2) In a situation where the conduct of two or more persons contributes to a result, the conduct of each alone would have been sufficient to produce that result."). For example, where P gives X, an irresponsible agent known to have a penchant for mad driving, the keys to P's car, P is the factual cause of any injuries X subsequently inflicts on the road. If, however, P merely helps X back out of the driveway while X is driving his own car, P would not be a factual cause of any injuries X subsequently inflicts on the road (provided, of course, that P's assistance is not a necessary condition to X's drive).

[11] See RCC § 22E-204(c). For example, if a parent leaves a loaded firearm in his toddler's outdoor play area, and the parent's own toddler find it, and subsequently uses it to injure a playmate at the parent's house, that parent is the legal cause of the subsequent harm caused by the toddler. If, in contrast, the parent leaves the loaded firearm in his toddler's outdoor play area, and an unknown third party thereafter moves the weapon to a park on the other side of the city, the parent would not be the legal cause of any harm caused by another toddler finding the weapon and injuring a playmate at the park.

[12] RCC § 22E-211(a). For example, if the defendant causes an innocent or irresponsible person to engage in conduct constituting an offense, and that offense requires proof of premeditation, deliberation, or the absence of any mitigating circumstances, the government is still required to prove these broader aspects of culpability (as to the defendant) to secure a conviction. See RCC § 22E-201(e)(3) ("'Culpability required' includes . . . Any other aspect of culpability specifically required for an offense."); id., at Explanatory Notes (noting that "premeditation, deliberation, and absence of mitigating circumstances" would so qualify). And, of course, the imposition of liability for causing crime by an innocent under section 211 is subject to the same voluntariness requirement (again, as to the defendant) governing all offenses under RCC § 22E-203(a). See RCC § 22E-201(e)(1) (voluntariness requirement also part of culpability required for an offense).

intentional culpable mental state.[13] Under no circumstances, however, should section 211 be construed to allow for a conviction upon proof of a lesser form of culpability than that required by the target offense.[14]

Subsection (c) specifies that an actor who is criminally liable for the conduct of an innocent or irresponsible person may be charged, and is subject to the same maximum penalties, as if the actor had directly engaged in the conduct constituting the offense. Under this subsection, an indictment does not need not specify that the actor committed the offense via an innocent or irresponsible party in order for the theory to be presented to the jury.[15] However, although an actor may be charged as if they directly engaged in conduct constituting the offense, the government must prove the requirements for liability for conduct by an innocent or irresponsible person set forth under this section beyond a reasonable doubt.

Subsection (d) addresses the relationship between the prosecution of the actor and the treatment of the innocent or irresponsible party. The provision establishes that the legal disposition of the actor's situation is generally immaterial to that of the innocent or irresponsible party. This includes the fact that the innocent or irresponsible person has not been arrested, prosecuted, convicted, adjudicated delinquent, or acquitted. In addition to the language in subsection (d), RCC § 22E-216 establishes that an actor can be liable even if the innocent or irresponsible person is under the age of 12 years and is not subject to criminal liability under the RCC.

Subsection (e) cross references terms defined elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. RCC § 22E-211 codifies, clarifies, and fill in gaps reflected in District law relevant to legal accountability based on causing crime by an innocent or irresponsible person.

There is little District authority on this form of legal accountability. Nevertheless, that which does exist supports the "universally acknowledged principle" that "one is no less guilty of the commission of a crime because he uses the overt conduct of an innocent or irresponsible agent."[16]

---

[13] The following situation is illustrative. P leaves his car keys out around X, an irresponsible agent known to have a penchant for mad driving. X subsequently finds P's keys, takes P's car out, drives in a dangerously erratic manner, and ends up killing pedestrian V. If P is later prosecuted for recklessly killing V (i.e. manslaughter) based on X's conduct, P's guilt will require proof that: (1) P consciously disregarded a substantial risk that, by leaving his keys out, X would take P's car out and kill someone by driving in a dangerous erratic manner; and (2) P's disregard of that risk was a gross deviation from the standard of conduct that a reasonable individual would follow. See RCC § 22E-206(c). See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.06 cmt. at 303; Commentary on Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 502.010.

[14] For example, if obtaining property by false pretenses is a crime only if the false pretenses are made purposely, P does not commit it by negligently causing his lawyer, X, to make statements that are false. Instead, P must do so purposely. See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.06 cmt. at 303; LAFAVE, supra note 2, at 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 13.1. According to the same logic, where an offense is graded by distinctions in culpability as to result elements, the principal's "liability shall extend only as far as his mental state will permit." Commentary on Ala. Code § 13A-2-22. For example, if P recklessly causes his child, X, to intentionally kill V, X is guilty of reckless manslaughter but not murder (i.e. X's intent to kill may not be imputed to P, while P's lack of intent precludes murder liability). See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.06 cmt. at 302-03; LAFAVE, supra note 2, at 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 13.1.

[15] E.g., Price v. United States, 813 A.2d 169, 176 (D.C. 2002) (citing Head v. United States, 451 A.2d 615, 626 (1982)).

[16] Model Penal Code § 2.06 cmt. at 300.

For example, more than a century ago, District courts recognized that criminal liability may attach for an offense committed indirectly, including through unwitting agents, such as, for example, "where one procures poison to be administered by an innocent agent to a third person."[17] And this also remains true today: while there exists uncertainty when it is appropriate to hold one person criminally responsible for causing a culpable actor to engage in prohibited conduct (separate and apart from aider and abettor liability),[18] there seems to be agreement that a causal theory of criminal liability is appropriate where "A uses B as an innocent instrumentality."[19]

Illustrative is the DCCA's decision in Blaize v. United States.[20] At issue in Blaize was the defendant's conviction for voluntary manslaughter, which was based on the following facts: D fires shots at V, sending V running; the noise of the shots also startles X, an illegally parked driver; in response to the shots, X speeds away at a rate of approximately 90 mph; X thereafter hits and kills V.[21] On appeal, the DCCA upheld the conviction applying a causal analysis, premised on the proposition that because "[X's] attempt[] to flee quickly, and without careful attention to pedestrian safety, w[as] entirely predictable," there was no problem with holding D responsible for the death of V although the immediate cause was X's conduct.[22]

Notably, there is also a Redbook jury instruction entitled "willfully causing an act to be done."[23] Premised on the federal statute, 18 U.S.C. § 2(b), that instruction states that the jury may find the defendant guilty of a crime without finding that he or she personally committed each of the acts constituting the offense. :

This instruction is thereafter accompanied by a brief commentary collecting federal cases, which support the proposition that "an individual can be criminally culpable for causing an

---

[17] United States v. Guiteau, 1882 WL 118, at *16 (D.C. Jan. 10, 1882). Similarly, as the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit observed in Maxey v. United States:

> It is the known and familiar principle of criminal jurisprudence, that he who commands or procures a crime to be done, if it is done, is guilty of the crime, and the act is his act. This is so true that even the agent may be innocent, when the procurer or principal may be convicted of guilt, as in the case of infants or idiots employed to administer poison. The proof of the command or procurement may be direct or indirect, positive or circumstantial; but this is matter for the consideration of the jury, and not of legal competency." United States v. Gooding, 12 Wheat. 460, 469, 6 L. ed. 693, 696. See also 1 Bishop, Crim. Law, secs. 649, 651, 652; People v. Adams, 3 Denio, 190, 207, 45 Am. Dec. 468; Seifert v. State, 160 Ind. 464, 467, 98 Am. St. Rep. 340, 67 N. E. 100. Those authorities fully sustain the general principle of law declared by the court, that one may be convicted as a principal, though acting in the commission of the crime through an innocent agent.

30 App. D.C. 63, 74–75 (D.C. Cir. 1907).

[18] See, Fleming v. United States, 224 A.3d 213 (D.C. 2020) (en banc). In Fleming, the DCCA upheld a "gun battle" theory of liability, in which a defendant who engaged in a gun battle was held liable for fatal shots fired by other participants in the gun-battle. However, the DCCA limited its holding to gun-battle scenarios, and stated that principles of causation may operate differently under different theories of homicide liability.

[19] Fleming, 148 A.3d at 1189 n.14 (Easterly, J., dissenting).

[20] Blaize v. United States, 21 A.3d 78, 80 (D.C. 2011).

[21] Blaize, 21 A.3d at 80-81.

[22] Id. at 83.

[23] D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. 3.102.

intermediary to commit a criminal act even though the intermediary has no criminal intent and is innocent of the substantive crime."[24]

RCC § 22E-211 is substantively consistent with the above District authorities, while, at the same time, providing a clearer and more comprehensive approach to liability for causing crime by an innocent or irresponsible person. Subsection (a) establishes that a defendant may be held criminally liable for the acts of an innocent or irresponsible person provided that: (1) the principal actor causes the innocent or irresponsible person to engage in conduct constituting an offense; and (2) the principal actor does so with the culpability required for that offense. Subsection (b) defines circumstances where a human intermediary is "innocent or irresponsible," namely, when a person engages in conduct constituting and offense but does so: (1) lacking the culpable mental state requirement for the offense; or (2) acting under conditions that establish an excuse or justification defense.

[24] See Fraley v. U.S., 858 F.2d 230, 233 (5th Cir. 1988); U.S. v. Cook, 745 F.2d 1311 (10th Cir. 1984); U.S. v. Rucker, 586 F.2d 899, 905 (2d Cir. 1978); U.S. v. Deaton, 563 F.2d 777, 778 (5th Cir. 1977); U.S. v. Ordner, 554 F.2d 24, 29 (2d Cir. 1977); U.S. v. Rapoport, 545 F.2d 802, 805-06 (2d Cir. 1976); U.S. v. Lester, 363 F.2d 68 (6th Cir. 1966).

RCC § 22E-212. EXCLUSIONS FROM LIABILITY FOR CONDUCT OF ANOTHER PERSON.

Explanatory Notes. RCC § 22E-212 establishes two exceptions to the general principles of legal accountability set forth in RCC § 22E-210, Accomplice Liability; and RCC § 22E-211, Liability for Causing Crime by an Innocent or Irresponsible Person.[1] Paragraph (a) uses the defined term "in fact"[2] to specify that there is no culpable mental state as to the requirements of the exclusion.

RCC § 22E-212(a) excludes the victim of an offense from being held legally accountable as an accomplice in the commission of that offense under section 210 or for causing an innocent or irresponsible to commit that offense under section 211.[3] For example, a minor who pursues and agrees to engage in sex with an adult may technically satisfy the requirements of accomplice liability in the sense of having purposefully assisted and encouraged that adult to perpetrate statutory rape against the minor.[4] Nevertheless, RCC § 22E-212(a) precludes holding the minor criminally liable for the statutory rape as an accomplice in the minor's own victimization under section 210.[5] The outcome would not be any different if the adult involved in the relationship suffered from a mental disability sufficient to rise to the level of a complete defense. While it might be said that the minor caused the adult to perpetrate a statutory rape under these circumstances,[6] RCC § 22E-212(a) precludes holding the minor legally accountable for the irresponsible person's conduct under section 211 where the minor was also victimized by it.[7]

RCC § 22E-212(a) also excludes actors who engage in conduct inevitably incident to commission of an offense—as defined by statute[8]—from being held legally accountable

---

[1] See, e.g., WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 3 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 13.3 (2d ed., Westlaw 2018) ("[O]ne is not an accomplice to a crime if (a) he is a victim of the crime; [or] (b) the offense is defined so as to make his conduct inevitably incident thereto . . ."); PAUL H. ROBINSON, 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 83 (Westlaw 2019) (same); see also United States v. Southard, 700 F.2d 1, 19 (1st Cir. 1983) (noting these are "exceptions to the general rule that aiding and abetting goes hand-in-glove with the commission of a substantive crime").

[2] RCC § 22E-207.

[3] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.06(6)(a) ("Unless otherwise provided by the Code or by the law defining the offense, a person is not an accomplice in an offense committed by another person if . . . he is a victim of that offense[.]"). This rule effectively exempts from accomplice liability those who might otherwise satisfy the general requirements of accomplice liability in relation to the commission of the offense perpetrated against themselves. See, e.g., LAFAVE, supra note 1, at 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 13.3 ("[T]he victim of the crime may not be held as an accomplice even though his conduct in a significant sense has assisted in the commission of the crime."); ROBINSON, supra note 1, at 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 83 (same).

[4] See RCC § 22E-210(a).

[5] See, e.g., JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 29.09(d) (6th ed. 2012) ("A [minor] may not be convicted as an accomplice in her own victimization"); LAFAVE, supra note 1, at 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 13.3 (same). The same can also be said about "[t]he businessman who yields to the extortion of a racketeer," or "the parent who pays ransom to the kidnapper." Model Penal Code § 2.06(6) cmt. at 324. Although those "who pay extortion, blackmail, or ransom monies" can be understood to have "significantly assisted in the commission of the crime," the fact they are the "victim of a crime" means that they "may not be indicted as an aider or abettor." Southard, 700 F.2d at 19.

[6] See RCC § 22E-211(a) (Criminal Liability for Conduct by an Innocent or Irresponsible Person.).

[7] See Ala. Code § 13A-2-24(1) (victim exception equally applicable to accomplice liability and causing crime by an innocent); ROBINSON, supra note 1, at 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 83 (There exists "little justification for providing or barring these special exemption defenses to one theory of liability for the conduct of another, but not to the other.").

[8] That a person's conduct must be inevitably incident to commission of an offense as defined by statute clarifies that paragraph (a)(2) only applies when the offense could not have been committed without the

as an accomplice in the commission of that offense under section 210 or for causing an innocent or irresponsible person to commit that offense under section 211.[9] For example, the purchaser in a drug transaction may technically satisfy the requirements of accomplice liability in the sense of having purposefully assisted and encouraged the seller to perpetrate the distribution of a controlled substance.[10] Nevertheless, § 22E-212(a) precludes holding the purchaser criminally liable for the seller's distribution as an accomplice under section 210.[11] The outcome would not be any different if the seller suffered from a mental disability sufficient to rise to the level of a complete defense. While it might be said that defendant's participation under any set of facts. This is to be distinguished from the situation of a defendant whose participation was merely useful or conducive to the commission of a crime as charged in a particular case. See, e.g., LAFAVE, supra note 1, at 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 13.3 (In applying the conduct inevitably incident exception, "the question is whether the crime charged is so defined that the crime could not have been committed without a third party's involvement, not whether the crime 'as charged actually involved a third party whose 'conduct was useful or conducive to' the crime.") (quoting State v. Duffy, 8 S.W.3d 197, 201-202 (Mo. App. 1999)).

---

So, for example, the role of a doorman in protecting a particular drug house from being robbed or ripped off may inextricably be part of the main business of that home, the sale and purchase of controlled substances. Nevertheless, because, as a general matter, it is entirely possible to distribute drugs without the assistance of a doorman, the doorman's conduct—as contrasted with that of the purchaser—is not "inevitably incidental" to the commission of the crime of drug distribution. Therefore, subsection (a)(2) would not preclude holding a doorman who assists a drug dealer liable for aiding the distribution of controlled substances. Wagers v. State, 810 P.2d 172, 175-76 (Alaska Ct. App. 1991) ("[B]ecause [defendant's] role as a doorman/guard was not 'inevitably incidental' to the commission of the crime of possession with intent to deliver, [he] is not exempt from accomplice liability under AS 11.16.120(b)(2).").

For another example, consider a prospective bribery scheme involving bribe offeror, B, go-between G, and public official, P. B gives G $20,000 in cash with instructions to approach P and propose a transaction whereby P will receive the money in return for providing B with a government license to which B is not otherwise entitled. If G agrees with B to participate in this scheme and approaches P, paragraph (a)(2) would not preclude holding G liable for aiding the crime of bribe offering. Although G's agreed-upon role as middleman might be useful and conducive to the crime of bribe offering as perpetrated on these facts, it is not strictly necessary to commit the crime of bribe offering, which can be completed without a go-between. See, e.g., Commonwealth v. Jennings, 490 S.W.3d 339, 345 (Ky. 2016) (holding that, "as a matter of law," defendant's facilitative conduct was not "inevitably incident" to the crime of assault because that offense "does not as defined require one person to identify the victim and another to strike the blow").

[9] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.06(6)(b) ("Unless otherwise provided by the Code or by the law defining the offense, a person is not an accomplice in an offense committed by another person if . . . the offense is so defined that his conduct is inevitably incident to its commission[.]"). This rule effectively exempts from accomplice liability those who might otherwise satisfy the general requirements of accomplice liability in relation to the commission of an offense for which their participation was logically required as a matter of law. See, e.g., LAFAVE, supra note 1, at 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 13.3 (accomplice liability does not apply "where the crime is so defined that participation by another is inevitably incident to its commission"); ROBINSON, supra note 1, at 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 83 (same).

[10] See RCC § 22E-210(a).

[11] That is, because the distribution of narcotics necessarily requires two parties, a seller and a purchaser, the purchaser may not be held criminally responsible as an accomplice to that distribution under the conduct inevitably incident exception. See, e.g., State v. Pinson, 895 P.2d 274, 277 (N.M. Ct. App. 1995) ("When an illegal drug sale is completed, there are two separate crimes committed, trafficking by the seller and possession by the purchaser. Each conduct is necessarily incident to the other crime."); Wheeler v. State, 691 P.2d 599, 602 (Wyo. 1984) ("The purchaser of controlled substances commits the crime of 'possession' and not 'delivery,' and, thus, is not an accomplice to a defendant charged with unlawful distribution."). This rule may apply to parties that broker the sale of a controlled substance, provided the broker does not satisfy the requirements for accomplice liability under RCC § 22E-210 with respect to the seller. Simms v. United States, 17-CM-1137 (D.C. 2021).

the purchaser caused the seller to distribute drugs under these circumstances,[12] § 22E-212 precludes holding the purchaser legally accountable for the irresponsible person's conduct under section 211.[13]

RCC § 22E-212(a) establishes an important limitation on the exclusions to liability for conduct of another person, namely, that the limitations apply *"unless otherwise expressly specified by statute[.]"* This clarifies that section 212 is only a default bar on criminal liability for victims or those who engage in conduct inevitably incident to commission of an offense.[14] It merely establishes that such actors are excluded from the general principles of legal accountability set forth in sections 210 and 211.[15] As such, the legislature is free to impose criminal liability upon these general categories of protected actors on an offense-specific basis.[16] In that case, however, the legislature should draft individual criminal statutes to clearly reflect this determination.[17]

Subsection (b) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC and the D.C. Code.

Relation to Current District Law. RCC § 22E-212 codifies and fills in gaps in current District law to improve the clarity and proportionality of the revised statutes.

---

[12] See RCC § 22E-211 (Criminal Liability for Conduct by an Innocent or Irresponsible Person).

[13] See Ala. Code § 13A-2-24(2) (conduct inevitably incident exception equally applicable to accomplice liability and causing crime by an innocent); ROBINSON, supra note 1, at 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 83 (There exists "little justification for providing or barring these special exemption defenses to one theory of liability for the conduct of another, but not to the other.").

[14] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.06(6) cmt. at 323-24 ("If legislators know that buyers will not be viewed as accomplices in sales unless the statute indicates that this behavior is included in the prohibition, they will focus on the problem as they frame the definition of the crime. And since the exception is confined to conduct 'inevitably incident to' the commission of the crime, the problem inescapably presents itself in defining the crime.").

[15] This reflects the fact that both the victim and conduct inevitably exclusions are justified on the basis of legislative intent. See, e.g., United States v. Blankenship, No. 2:15-CR-00241, 2016 WL 4030943, at *6–7 (S.D.W. Va. July 26, 2016) ("Where the statute in question was enacted for the protection of certain defined persons thought to be in need of special protection, it would clearly be contrary to the legislative purpose to impose accomplice liability upon such a person.") (quoting LAFAVE, supra note 1, at 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 13.3); United States v. Southard, 700 F.2d 1, 19 (1st Cir. 1983) (observing that the standard rationale for the conduct inevitably incident exception is "that the legislature, by specifying the kind of individual who is to be found guilty when participating in a transaction necessarily involving one or more other persons, must not have intended to include the participation by the others in the offense as a crime.") (citing LAFAVE, supra note 1, at 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 13.3).

[16] See, e.g., ROBINSON, supra note 1, at 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 83 ("The controlling test for whether these defenses will be recognized is the intent of the legislature in defining the offense charged. The defense is generally based upon an analysis of the legislative history of the offense definition and an application of the normal rules of statutory construction.").

[17] The following situation is illustrative: X, the bribe giver in a two-person corruption scheme involving public official Y, agrees to give Y $20,000 in cash in return for a government license to which X is not otherwise entitled. On these facts, X cannot be held liable as an accomplice in the commission of the crime of bribe receiving under RCC § 22E-212 since X's conduct is inevitably incident to Y's perpetration of that crime. X can, however, directly be held criminally liable for his own conduct under a statute that, through its express terms, prohibits the offering of a bribe. See, e.g., N.Y. Penal Law § 20.00 cmt. ("[T]he crime of bribe giving by A to B is necessarily incidental to the crime of bribe receiving by B . . . [Therefore] A is not guilty of bribe receiving [as an accomplice]. But, A is criminally liable for his own conduct which constituted the related but separate offense of bribe giving.") (quoted in People v. Manini, 79 N.Y.2d 561, 571 (1992)).

Relation to Current District Law on Legal Accountability for Victims. There is no current District law directly addressing whether, as a general principle of criminal law, a victim can be held legally accountable for the commission of a crime perpetrated against him or herself. That said, this exception is consistent with the legislative intent underlying some current statutory offenses enacted by the D.C. Council. And it also has been explicitly recognized by two century-old judicial decisions from the District interpreting congressionally enacted statutes that have since been repealed.

No current District criminal statute explicitly exempts victims from the scope of general accomplice liability. However, an analysis of the child sex abuse statutes contained in the D.C. Code illustrates why this exception is consistent with legislative intent. For example, the District's first-degree child sex abuse offense subjects to potential life imprisonment a person who, "being at least 4 years older than a child, engages in a sexual act with that child or causes that child to engage in a sexual act."[18] And the District's second-degree child sex abuse offense subjects to ten years of imprisonment a person who, "being at least 4 years older than a child, engages in sexual contact with that child or causes that child to engage in sexual contact."[19] These current offenses exist specifically for the protection of minor-victims.[20]

At the same time, the normal principles of aider and abettor liability derived from the District's general complicity statute, D.C. Code § 22-1805,[21] would appear to authorize treating a minor-victim legally accountable as an accomplice in the perpetration of child sex abuse against him or herself.[22] Consider, for example, the situation of a minor who both initiates and pursues a sexual act or contact with an adult. Under these circumstances, it might be said that the minor purposefully assisted and encouraged the adult to commit statutory rape in a manner sufficient to satisfy the requirements of accomplice liability under D.C. Code § 22-1805.[23] In practical effect, then, applying general principles of aider and abettor liability to the District's child sex abuse statutes would mean that a minor may be subject to the same liability and punishment as the adult who perpetrates the offense.

Treating the minor-victim of a statutory rape in this way seems disproportionate, counterintuitive, and in conflict with the policy goals animating the District's statutory rape offenses. Given these problems, it's unsurprising that reported District case law involving prosecutions for first or second-degree child sex abuse do not appear to include a single prosecution involving charges of this nature. This example may also indicate that—from

---

[18] D.C. Code § 22-3008.
[19] D.C. Code § 22-3009.
[20] See D.C. Code § 22-3011(a) ("Neither mistake of age nor consent is a defense to a prosecution under §§ 22-3008 to 22-3010.01, prosecuted alone or in conjunction with charges under § 22-3018 or § 22-403."); Ballard v. United States, 430 A.2d 483, 486 (D.C. 1981) ("[T]he statutory proscription against carnal knowledge is intended to protect females below the age of sixteen, regardless of the use of force or consent, from any sexual relationship.").
[21] D.C. Code § 22-1805 ("In prosecutions for any criminal offense all persons advising, inciting, or conniving at the offense, or aiding or abetting the principal offender, shall be charged as principals and not as accessories, the intent of this section being that as to all accessories before the fact the law heretofore applicable in cases of misdemeanor only shall apply to all crimes, whatever the punishment may be.").
[22] See generally RCC § 22E-210 and accompanying Commentary.
[23] See id.; Porter v. United States, 826 A.2d 398, 405 (D.C. 2003) (An accomplice is someone who "designedly encouraged or facilitated" the commission of criminal conduct by another) (quoting Jefferson v. United States, 463 A.2d 681, 683 (D.C. 1983)).

a broader legislative and executive perspective—a victim exception to accomplice liability is implicitly understood to exist in District law and practice.

This kind of exception has also been explicitly recognized in two century-old District judicial decisions in the course of interpreting congressionally-enacted statutes that have since been repealed. Although in both cases the victim exceptions to accomplice liability were recognized for testimonial/evidentiary purposes, and not because the would-be accomplices were themselves being prosecuted for aiding or abetting the target offenses, the holding in each case remains directly relevant. In the first case, Yeager v. United States (1900), the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit (CADC) determined that the victim of an offense criminalizing sexual intercourse with a female under sixteen years of age could not be deemed an accomplice to that offense precisely because she was victim of the party committing the act.[24] In the second case, Thompson v. United States (1908), the Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia applied similar reasoning in holding that a woman who consented to an illegal abortion could not be deemed an accomplice in the commission of an offense criminalizing the procurement of a miscarriage.[25]

Another relevant aspect of District law is the de facto victims exception incorporated into the District's prostitution offense. The relevant criminal statute, D.C. Code § 22-2701, codifies a general policy of excluding "children"—defined as anyone under the age of 18[26]—from criminal liability for prostitution.[27] Beyond creating a general immunity from prosecution for victimized children (including, presumably, those who

---

[24] Yeager v. United States, 16 App. D.C. 356, 357, 360 (D.C. Cir. 1900) ("The crime is committed against her, and not with her. She is, by force of the law, victim and not particeps criminis or accomplice.").

The relevant statute, as quoted in Yeager, reads:

> Every person who shall carnally and unlawfully know any female under the age of sixteen years, or who shall be accessory to such carnal and unlawful knowledge before the fact in the District of Columbia or other place, except the territories, over which the United States has exclusive jurisdiction, . . . shall be guilty of a felony, and when convicted thereof shall be punished by imprisonment at hard labor, for the first offense for not more than fifteen years and for each subsequent offense not more than thirty years.

Id.

[25] Thompson v. United States, 30 App. D.C. 352, 362–63 (D.C. Cir. 1908) (the woman whose "miscarriage has been produced, though with her consent, [] is regarded as his victim, rather than an accomplice.").

The relevant statute, as quoted in Thompson, reads:

> Whoever, with intent to procure the miscarriage of any woman, prescribes or administers to her any medicine, drug, or substance whatever, or with like intent uses any instrument or means, unless when necessary to preserve her life or health, and under the direction of a competent licensed practitioner of medicine, shall be imprisoned for not more than five years; or, if the woman or her child dies in consequence of such act, by imprisonment for not less than three nor more than twenty years.

Id.

[26] D.C. Code § 22-2701(d)(3).

[27] See generally D.C. Code § 22-2701. More specifically, subsection (a) of the relevant statute makes it "unlawful for any person to engage in prostitution or to solicit for prostitution," subject to the "[e]xcept[ion] provided in subsection (d)." Id. Thereafter, subsection (d) creates an exception from criminal liability for any "child who engages in or offers to engage in a sexual act or sexual contact in return for receiving anything of value." Id. at § (d)(1).

might otherwise satisfy the requirements of accomplice liability), this statute further requires the police to "refer any child suspected of engaging in or offering to engage in a sexual act or sexual contact in return for receiving anything of value to an organization that provides treatment, housing, or services appropriate for victims of sex trafficking of children under § 22-1834."[28] These provisions appear to reflect the D.C. Council's view, articulated in supporting legislative history, that "[v]ictims of sexual abuse should not be arrested, prosecuted, or convicted."[29]

RCC § 22E-212(a) accords with the above authorities, as well as the policy considerations that support them. These provisions exclude the victim of an offense from being held legally accountable as an accomplice in the commission of that offense under RCC § 22E-210, or for causing an innocent or irresponsible person to commit that offense under RCC § 22E-211, unless expressly provided by the target offense.[30] (This is consistent with the similar exclusion for victims applicable to the general inchoate crimes of solicitation and conspiracy under RCC § 22E-305.[31])

Relation to Current District Law on Legal Accountability for Conduct Inevitably Incident. There is no current District law directly addressing whether, as a general principle of criminal law, a person can be held legally accountable for the commission of a crime in which his or her conduct was inevitably incident. That said, this exception is consistent with the legislative intent underlying current statutory offenses enacted by the D.C. Council. And it has also been implicitly recognized by the DCCA through dicta in the course of interpreting one of those statutes.

No current District criminal statute explicitly recognizes an exemption to accomplice liability for those who engage in conduct inevitably incident to the commission of an offense. However, an analysis of the drug statutes in the D.C. Code illustrates why this exception is consistent with legislative intent.

Compare the District's different approaches to punishing those who distribute and those who merely possess controlled substances. The District's distribution statute makes it a thirty year felony for "any person knowingly or intentionally to manufacture, distribute, or possess, with intent to manufacture or distribute, a controlled substance," which is, in [28] Id. at § (d)(2).

---

[29] COUNCIL OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY AND PUBLIC SAFETY, COMMITTEE REPORT ON BILL 20-714, Sex Trafficking of Children Prevention Amendment Act of 2014, at 5 (Nov. 7, 2014). The Committee Report goes on to observe that:

> Without this immunity, law enforcement can use threats of prosecution to coerce victims into testifying as witnesses and into participating in treatment programs. However, this coercion inevitably creates a relationship of antagonism between the government and these victims, causing victims to fear and distrust the police, prosecutors and services provided by the government, and being less willing to cooperate as trial witnesses or program participants.

Id.

[30] Note that under RCC § 22E-22E-212 the legislature remains free to impose criminal liability upon victims on an offense-specific basis. In that case, however, the legislature should draft individual criminal statutes to clearly reflect this determination.

[31] See generally Commentary on RCC § 22E-305(a)(1).

fact, "a narcotic or abusive drug" subject to classification "in Schedule I or II."[32] In contrast, the District's possession statute makes it a 180 day misdemeanor to "knowingly or intentionally to possess a controlled substance" of a similar nature.[33] This stark contrast in grading appears to reflect a legislative judgment that mere possessors are far less culpable and/or dangerous than distributors, and, therefore, should be subject to significantly less liability.[34]

At the same time, application of the District's normal principles of aider and abettor liability would appear to authorize holding a purchaser-possessor legally accountable for the distribution of drugs by the seller as an accomplice.[35] Consider, for example, the situation of a drug user who both initiates and pursues the purchase of a controlled substance from a seller. Under these circumstances, it might be said that the drug user purposefully assisted and encouraged the seller to commit distribution in a manner sufficient to satisfy the requirements of accomplice liability under D.C. Code § 22-1805.[36] In practical effect, then, applying general principles of aider and abettor liability to the

---

[32] D.C. Code § 48-904.01(a)(1)-(2); see id. at (a)(2)(A) ("Any person who violates this subsection with respect to . . . A controlled substance classified in Schedule I or II that is a narcotic or abusive drug shall be imprisoned for not more than 30 years or fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, or both[.]")

[33] D.C. Code § 48-904.01(d)(1) ("It is unlawful for any person knowingly or intentionally to possess a controlled substance unless the substance was obtained directly from, or pursuant to, a valid prescription or order of a practitioner while acting in the course of his or her professional practice, or except as otherwise authorized by this chapter or Chapter 16B of Title 7, and provided in § 48-1201. Except as provided in paragraph (2) of this subsection, any person who violates this subsection is guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction may be imprisoned for not more than 180 days, fined not more than $1,000, or both."); compare D.C. Code § 48-904.01(d)(2) ("Any person who violates this subsection by knowingly or intentionally possessing the abusive drug phencyclidine in liquid form is guilty of a felony and, upon conviction, may be imprisoned for not more than 3 years, fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, or both.").

[34] Indeed, "[t]he District of Columbia Uniform Controlled Substances Act was enacted, in part, in order to punish offenders according to the seriousness of their conduct." Long v. United States, 623 A.2d 1144, 1151 n.13 (D.C. 1993) (citing Council of the District of Columbia, COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY, REPORT ON BILL 4–123, THE UNIFORM CONTROLLED SUBSTANCES ACT OF 1981, 2–3 (April 8, 1981)) (hereinafter "Committee Report").

For example, the legislative history underlying the District's Uniform Controlled Substances Act observes that:

> While there is dispute over what penalties should be imposed, the proposition that the criminal consequences of prohibited conduct should be tied to the nature of the offense committed is unassailable. Title IV of the CSA would abolish the unilateral approach of the UNA and would introduce a system in which the penalty for prohibited conduct is graded according to the nature of the offense and the schedule of the substance involved.

Id. at 5. See also, e.g., Long, 623 A.2d at 1150 (observing that "the fundamental message [in a federal case]—that the legislature did not intend to treat with equal severity on the one hand, entrepreneurs who profit from distribution of heroin or crack, and on the other hand, addicts who pool their resources to purchase drugs for their own joint use—finds meaningful support in the legislative history of the District's Uniform Controlled Substances Act."); Lowman v. United States, 632 A.2d 88, 98 (D.C. 1993) (Schwelb, J. dissenting) ("[A] central purpose of the enactment of the [District's] local [drug] statute was to abolish the 'unilateral approach' of the former Uniform Narcotics Act, which was viewed as not discriminating sufficiently between serious and less serious offenders, and to introduce a system in which the penalty for prohibited conduct is graded according to the nature of the offense and the schedule of the substance involved.").

[35] See generally RCC § 22E-210 and accompanying Commentary.

[36] See generally RCC § 22E-210 and accompanying Commentary.

District's drug distribution statute would mean that the drug user could be held liable to the same extent as the seller.

Treating the purchaser-possessor in a drug deal in this way seems disproportionate, counterintuitive, and in conflict with the policy goals animating the District's controlled substances offenses.[37] Given these problems, it's unsurprising that reported District case law does not appear to include a single drug distribution prosecution brought against a drug user purchasing for individual use. This example may also indicate that—from a broader legislative and executive perspective—a conduct inevitably incident exception to accomplice liability is implicitly understood to exist in District law and practice.

This conclusion is further bolstered by dicta in at least one reported DCCA opinion. In the relevant case, Lowman v. United States, two of the three judges on the panel held—relying on a line of prior District precedent—that an intermediary who arranges a drug transaction between "a willing buyer [and] a willing seller" can be held criminally liable for distribution as an accomplice.[38] One judge dissented, arguing that, among other problems, the majority's holding could logically support holding the buyer him or herself liable for distribution as an accomplice.[39] In response, the two-judge majority explained that they were "unpersuaded at this point that the court's interpretation of aiding and abetting might result in a buyer of illegal drugs being guilty of the crime of distribution," while citing to federal case law explicitly recognizing that "one who receives drugs does not aid and abet distribution 'since this would totally undermine the statutory scheme [by effectively writing] out of the Act the offense of simple possession."[40]

The bribery statute in the D.C. Code is susceptible to a similar analysis. The relevant District prohibition on bribery applies a statutory maximum of "not more than ten years" to anyone who:

> (1) Corruptly offers, gives, or agrees to give anything of value, directly or indirectly, to a public servant; or
>
> (2) Corruptly solicits, demands, accepts, or agrees to accept anything of value, directly or indirectly, as a public servant;

---

[37] See sources cited supra notes 21-23 and accompanying text; Lowman, 632 A.2d at 96 (Schwelb, J. dissenting) (observing that if every purchaser were to be "deemed an aider and abettor to [distribution]," this would effectively "write out of the Act the offense of simple possession, since under such a theory every drug abuser would be liable for aiding and abetting the distribution which led to his own possession.'") (quoting United States v. Swiderski, 548 F.2d 445, 451 (2d Cir. 1977)).

[38] Lowman v. United States, 632 A.2d 88, 91 (D.C. 1993) (upholding distribution conviction where defendant brought "a willing buyer to a willing seller" and "specifically asked [distributor] if he had any twenty-dollar rocks, the precise drugs that the undercover officer had said he wanted to buy"); see, e.g., Griggs v. United States, 611 A.2d 526, 527, 529 (D.C. 1992) (upholding distribution conviction where an officer approached the defendant and asked if anyone was "working," the defendant escorted the officer to a seller, and the defendant told the seller that the officer "wanted one twenty"); Minor v. United States, 623 A.2d 1182, 1187 (D.C. 1993) ("[B]eing an agent of the buyer is not a defense to a charge of distribution.").

[39] Lowman, 632 A.2d at 96 (Schwelb, J. dissenting) (observing that "if the government's position were adopted, and if everyone who assisted a buyer of drugs were thereby rendered a distributor, then, a fortiori, every purchaser would also logically have to be deemed an aider and abettor to a felony, and would therefore be subject to a mandatory minimum sentence.").

[40] Lowman, 632 A.2d at 92 (quoting United States v. Swiderski, 548 F.2d 445, 451 (2d Cir. 1977)).

> in return for an agreement or understanding that an official act of the public servant will be influenced thereby . . . .[41]

On its face, the District's bribery statute embodies a legislative judgment that bribe giving and receiving are equally culpable acts deserving of no more than ten years of potential imprisonment. That said, application of the District's normal principles of aider and abettor liability would seem to provide the basis for effectively doubling the punishment for either party to a bribery scheme because each party's conduct is inevitably incident to the other.

Consider, for example, that most (if not all) bribe givers will purposely assist and encourage the bribe receiver's violation of D.C. Code § 22-712(a)(2), thereby satisfying the requirements of accomplice liability as to bribe receiving. Conversely, most (if not all) bribe receivers will purposely assist and encourage the bribe giver's violation of D.C. Code § 22-712(a)(1), thereby satisfying the requirements of accomplice liability as to bribe giving. Such an application of accomplice liability, if accepted, would seem to authorize up to twenty years of potential imprisonment in most (if not all) instances of bribery.

Dealing with bribery in this way seems disproportionate, counterintuitive, and in conflict with the penalty structure reflected in the District's bribery statute. Given these problems, it's unsurprising that reported District case law does not appear to include a single prosecution for bribery involving duplicate liability of this nature.[42] This example may also indicate that—from a broader legislative and executive perspective—a conduct inevitably incident exception to accomplice liability is implicitly understood to exist in District law and practice.[43]

RCC § 22E-212(a) accords with this implicit understanding, as well as the policy considerations that support it, by excluding conduct inevitably incident to the commission of an offense as a matter of law from the scope of legal accountability under RCC §§ 22E-210 and 211 unless expressly provided by the target offense.[44] (This is consistent with the similar exclusion for conduct inevitably incident applicable to the general inchoate crimes of conspiracy and solicitation under RCC § 22E-305.[45])

RCC § 22E-213. WITHDRAWAL DEFENSE TO LEGAL ACCOUNTABILITY.

---

[41] D.C. Code § 22-712(a), (c).

[42] The only reported case involving this statute appears to be: Colbert v. United States, 601 A.2d 603, 608 (D.C. 1992). Compare May v. United States, 175 F.2d 994, 1005 (D.C. Cir. 1949) (extending general complicity principles to hold offeror of bribe criminally responsible for aiding and abetting public official's violation of federal statute prohibiting receipt of unlawful compensation).

[43] One other relevant aspect of District law worth noting is the fact that a substantively related exclusion applies to the general inchoate crime of conspiracy by way of the judicially-recognized doctrine of "Wharton's Rule," which "is an exception to the general principle that a conspiracy and the substantive offense that is its immediate end are discrete crimes for which separate sanctions may be imposed." Pearsall v. United States, 812 A.2d 953, 961-62 (D.C. 2002) (quoting Iannelli v. United States, 420 U.S. 770, 95 S. Ct. 1284, 43 L. Ed. 2d 616 (1975)). The meaning and import of DCCA case law on Wharton's Rule are discussed in the Commentary on RCC § 22E-305(a)(2).

[44] Note that under RCC § 22E-212 the legislature remains free to impose criminal liability upon victims on an offense-specific basis. In that case, however, the legislature should draft individual criminal statutes to clearly reflect this determination.

[45] See generally Commentary on RCC § 22E-305(a)(2).

Explanatory Notes. Section 213 establishes an affirmative defense to criminal liability premised upon the general principles of legal accountability set forth in RCC § 22E-210, Accomplice Liability, and RCC § 22E- 211, Liability for Causing Crime by an Innocent or Irresponsible Person.[1]

Subsection (a) sets forth the scope of this affirmative defense, which is comprised of two basic requirements.[2] The first is that the defendant must "terminate[] their efforts to promote or facilitate commission of an offense before it has been committed[.]"[3] This clarifies that only withdrawals from criminal schemes prior to their completion will provide the basis for avoiding legal accountability for the conduct of another under the RCC.[4]

The second requirement is that the defendant's timely withdrawal must be accompanied by "reasonable efforts" at preventing the target offense.[5] Importantly, this does not mean that the defendant's conduct actually needs to prevent the target offense from being completed.[6] Rather, a withdrawal defense to legal accountability remains available under the RCC although the defendant's efforts are unsuccessful.[7] At the very

---

[1] Typically, "an offense is complete and criminal liability attaches and is irrevocable as soon as the actor satisfies all the elements of an offense." PAUL H. ROBINSON, 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 81 (Westlaw 2019). However, there is an important exception applicable to criminal liability based on legal accountability for the conduct of another, which is similarly applicable in the context of general inchoate crimes. Id.; see RCC § 22E-306 (renunciation defense to attempt, solicitation, and conspiracy). In these contexts, the criminal justice system affords an "offender the opportunity to escape liability, even after he has satisfied the elements of these offenses, by renouncing, abandoning, or withdrawing from the criminal enterprise." Id. As it arises in the context of accomplice liability, this defense is typically referred to as "withdrawal." E.g., WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 13.3(d) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019); JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 30.07 (6th ed. 2012).

[2] The idea that "a person who provides assistance to another for the purpose of promoting or facilitating the offense, but who subsequently abandons the criminal endeavor, can avoid accountability for the subsequent criminal acts of the primary party" is both historically rooted and well established. DRESSLER, supra note 1, at § 30.07; see, e.g., United States v. Lothian, 976 F.2d 1257, 1261 (9th Cir. 1992) ("Withdrawal is traditionally a defense to crimes of complicity[.]"); CHARLES E. TORCIA, 1 WHARTON'S CRIMINAL LAW § 37 (15th ed. 2018) ("At common law, a party could withdraw from a criminal transaction and avoid criminal liability by communicating his withdrawal to the other parties in sufficient time for them to consider terminating their criminal plan and refraining from committing the contemplated crime."); Commentary on Ky. Rev. Stat. § 502.040 (observing the "prevailing doctrine which allows an aider or abettor or an accessory before the fact to relieve himself of liability by countermanding his counsel, command or encouragement through a communication delivered in time to allow his principal to govern his actions accordingly"); ROBINSON, supra note 1, at 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 81 ("A majority of jurisdictions recognize some form of withdrawal or abandonment defense to complicity liability.").

[3] RCC § 22E-213(a) (prefatory clause).

[4] See, e.g., DRESSLER, supra note 1, at § 30.07 (A "spontaneous and unannounced withdrawal will not do.") (citing State v. Thomas, 356 A.2d 433, 442 (N.J. Super. Ct. App. Div. 1976), rev'd on other grounds, 387 A.2d 1187 (N.J. 1978)); State v. Formella, 158 N.H. 114, 119 (2008) (It must "be possible for the trier of fact to say that the accused had wholly and effectively detached himself from the criminal enterprise before the act with which he is charged is in the process of consummation or has become so inevitable that it cannot reasonably be stayed.") (quoting People v. Lacey, 49 Ill. App. 2d 301, 307 (1964)).

[5] RCC § 22E-213(a).

[6] E.g., LAFAVE, supra note 1, at 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 13.3(d); DRESSLER, supra note 1, at § 30.07.

[7] For this reason, the withdrawal defense to legal accountability specified in this section is more lenient than the renunciation defense to general inchoate crimes under section 306, which requires proof that the target offense was actually prevented in order to avoid liability for an attempt, solicitation, or conspiracy. See RCC § 22E-306(a) ("It is an affirmative defense to a prosecution for an attempt, solicitation, or conspiracy that . . . the target offense was not committed.") (italics added).

least, though, the defendant must engage in conduct reasonably calculated towards disrupting—whether directly or indirectly—the offense that he or she initially promoted or facilitated.[8] Paragraphs (a)(1), (2), and (3) describe three alternative standards for evaluating the sufficiency of the defendant's conduct in this regard.[9]

Paragraph (a)(1) establishes that a withdrawal defense is available where the defendant ensures their prior efforts are wholly ineffective.[10] The type of conduct that satisfies this standard is necessarily contingent upon the nature of the conduct that provides the basis for the defendant's legal accountability in the first place.[11] For example, where the defendant's contribution to a criminal scheme takes the form of verbal encouragement, a clear (and timely) oral statement of disapproval communicated to his or her co-

---

Another way in which the withdrawal defense to legal accountability is more lenient than the renunciation defense to general inchoate crimes relates to the defendant's motive. Whereas a renunciation defense is unavailable where the defendant was motivated by a desire to avoid getting caught, the withdrawal defense does not incorporate a comparable requirement of blameless intent (i.e. any motive underlying the withdrawal will suffice). Compare RCC § 22E-213(a) (no voluntariness requirement), with RCC § 22E-306(a)(2) (requirement of voluntary renunciation); RCC § 22E-306(b)(1) (renunciation not voluntary when "motivated in whole or in part by a belief that circumstances exist which . . . Increase the probability of detection or apprehension of the actor or another participant in the criminal enterprise; [or] Render accomplishment of the criminal plans more difficult . . . .").

Because of these two differences, it is possible for a defendant to avoid legal accountability for another person's conduct yet still incur general inchoate liability for his or her own conduct under the RCC. The following example is illustrative. V personally insults P. P is predisposed to let the insult slide, but A persuades P over the phone that P must respond with lethal violence to protect P's reputation. In providing this encouragement, A consciously desires to bring about the death of V, who A also has an outstanding beef with due to a prior perceived slight that V earlier made against A. One day later, A has a change of heart, which is motivated, in large part, by A's having been alerted to the fact that the police were monitoring the phone call and are therefore very likely to catch and arrest both P and A. So A decides to again call P, and does his very best to persuade P to desist from violence against V, and, ultimately, to forgive V for the slight. However, A's reasonable efforts at dissuading P from carrying out the planned execution is unsuccessful; P goes on to kill V anyways.

On these facts, A satisfies the standard for withdrawal under section 213, and, therefore, cannot be deemed an accomplice to P's murder of V under section 210. A would not, however, be able to avail himself of a renunciation defense under section 306 to avoid liability for his original solicitation of P (to commit murder) under the RCC's general solicitation statute. See RCC § 22E-302(a). Specifically, a renunciation defense would not be available to A under section 306 because: (1) the target offense at the heart of A's solicitation, the murder of V, was completed; and (2) A's renunciation was not voluntary (i.e. it was motivated by a desire to avoid getting caught).

[8] See, e.g., LAFAVE, supra note 1, at 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 13.3(d) (The defendant must terminate his or her participation in a criminal scheme and: "(1) repudiate his prior aid, or (2) do all that is possible to countermand his prior aid or counsel, and (3) do so before the chain of events has become unstoppable."); DRESSLER, supra note 1, at § 30.07 ("[T]he accomplice must communicate his withdrawal to the principal and make bona fide efforts to neutralize the effect of his prior assistance.").

[9] While the examples and analysis in this commentary entry focus on legal accountability based upon accomplice liability under RCC § 22E-210, a withdrawal defense is similarly available where the defendant has been charged with causing an innocent or irresponsible person to commit a crime under section 211. This ensures equivalency of outcome where the defendant's co-participants in a criminal scheme cannot be held liable due to their being "innocent or irresponsible." RCC § 22E-211.

[10] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.06(6)(c)(i) (withdrawal defense available where defendant "wholly deprives [aid or encouragement] of effectiveness in the commission of the offense").

[11] See, e.g., Commentary on Haw. Rev. Stat. § 702-224 ("What the erstwhile accomplice must do to relieve the accomplice of potential liability will vary depending on the conduct that establishes the accomplice's complicity.").

participants may provide the basis for a withdrawal defense.[12] However, a statement of this nature will not suffice where the defendant's participation involved loaning a weapon central to the scheme's success.[13] In that case, the actual retrieval of the weapon may be necessary to meet the standard proscribed in this paragraph.[14]

Paragraph (a)(2) establishes that a withdrawal defense is available where the defendant "[g]ives timely warning to the appropriate law enforcement authorities."[15] Under this standard, a defendant who provides warning to a law enforcement agency with jurisdiction over the requisite criminal scheme sufficiently early may avoid legal accountability.[16] Under this paragraph, the warning must be "timely." This does not require that the warning be made as early as practicable,[17] but the warning must be made early enough so that law enforcement authorities have a reasonable opportunity to interrupt the criminal endeavor. This paragraph also requires that the actor actually gives warning to law enforcement authorities. It is insufficient if an actor attempts, but fails to actually communicate with law enforcement authorities.[18] This indirect means of withdrawing from an offense is to be encouraged, particularly where it is: (1) unlikely that the defendant will be able to prevent the consummation of the target offense acting alone,[19] or (2) dangerous for the defendant to attempt to do so on his or her own.[20]

Paragraph (a)(3) establishes that a withdrawal defense is available where the defendant "[o]therwise makes reasonable efforts to prevent the commission of the offense."[21] This catchall "reasonable efforts" alternative allows for the possibility that other forms of conduct beyond those proscribed paragraphs (a)(1) and (2) will provide the basis for a withdrawal defense. It is a flexible standard, which accounts for the varying ways in which a participant in a criminal scheme might engage in conduct reasonably

---

[12] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.06(6) cmt. at 326 (If "complicity inhered in request or encouragement, countermanding disapproval may suffice to nullify its influence, providing it is heard in time to allow reconsideration by those planning to commit the crime.").

[13] See, e.g., Commentary on Haw. Rev. Stat. § 702-224 ("More will be required of one who distributes arms than one who offers verbal encouragement.").

[14] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.06(6) cmt. at 326 ("If the behavior consisted of aid, as by providing arms, a statement of withdrawal ought not to be sufficient; what is important is that he get back the arms, and thus wholly deprive his aid of its effectiveness in the commission of the offense.").

[15] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.06(6)(c)(ii) (withdrawal defense available where defendant "gives timely warning to the law enforcement authorities").

[16] See, e.g., DRESSLER, supra note 1, at § 30.07 (In the situation of a defendant who opts to withdraw by notifying law enforcement, that notification must be early enough to provide the police with a reasonable opportunity to disrupt the criminal scheme); LAFAVE, supra note 1, at 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 13.3(d) (same).

[17] Compare with the shoplifting statute, RCC § 22E-2104, which provides qualified immunity for persons who detain suspected shoplifters, provided they notify law enforcement authorities as soon as practicable.

[18] For example, if a person leaves a handwritten note containing information about a planned criminal endeavor on the sidewalk outside of a police station in the hopes that law enforcement authorities will read the note and take action, that would not satisfy the requirements under this paragraph.

[19] For example, where A aids an armed robbery planned to take place in another state by providing a weapon to P1 and P2, alerting the relevant legal authorities in that state in a timely fashion may be the only practical alternative if P1 and P2 later become unreachable by phone or email.

[20] For example, where A aids an armed robbery by loaning a weapon to P1 and P2, but P1 and P2 also have many other weapons available to them, and any attempt by A at retrieving the weapon may pose a risk to D's life, then alerting the relevant legal authorities in a timely fashion would clearly be a more desirable alternative.

[21] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.06(6)(c)(ii) (withdrawal defense available where defendant "otherwise makes proper effort to prevent the commission of the offense.").

calculated towards disrupting it.[22] This standard should be evaluated in light of the totality of the circumstances.[23]

Subsection (b) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. Subsection (a) codifies, clarifies, and fills gaps in District law concerning the availability and burden of proof governing a withdrawal defense to legal accountability.

The D.C. Code does not address the availability of a withdrawal defense; however, the DCCA has discussed it on a few different occasions. The relevant case law can generally be divided into two categories: decisions involving withdrawal from a conspiracy (a topic not addressed by RCC § 22E-213); and decisions involving withdrawal from aider and abettor liability (the focus of RCC § 22E-213).

With respect to the first category, the relevant case law pertains to when an actor may be relieved from the collateral consequences of a conspiracy.[24] For example, "a defendant may attempt to establish his withdrawal as a defense in a prosecution for substantive crimes subsequently committed by the other conspirators."[25] Or the defendant "may want to prove his withdrawal so as to show that as to him the statute of limitations has run."[26] On these kinds of collateral issues, the DCCA recognizes a defense of withdrawal, under which the defendant "must take affirmative action to disavow or defeat the purpose, or definite, decisive and positive steps which indicate a full and complete disassociation."[27]

With respect to the second category, the relevant case law addresses when an actor may be relieved from liability as an aider and abettor.[28] In this context, withdrawal

---

[22] See Model Penal Code § 2.06 cmt. at 326 ("The sort of effort that should be demanded turns so largely on the circumstances that it does not seem advisable to attempt formulation of a more specific rule.").

[23] For example, alerting the victim of a criminal scheme of its existence could constitute "reasonable efforts" at preventing the commission of an offense, where: (1) the disclosure to the victim is timely; and (2) the disclosure provides the victim with a reasonably feasible means of avoiding the target harm. Where, in contrast, the disclosure is made too late, or does not enable to victim to easily and safely escape harm, then the defendant's conduct would not meet the "reasonable efforts" standard.

[24] ROBINSON, supra note 1, at 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 81 (Westlaw 2018) ("Withdrawal," commonly used in reference to the collateral consequences of conspiracy, tends to require only notification of an actor's abandonment to his confederates."); Model Penal Code § 5.03 cmt. at 456 (distinguishing "withdrawal from the conspiracy (1) as a means of commencing the running of time limitations with respect to the actor, or (2) as a means of limiting the admissibility against the actor of subsequent acts and declarations of the other conspirators, or (3) as a defense to substantive crimes subsequently committed by the other conspirators").

[25] LAFAVE, supra note 1, at 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 12.4; see DRESSLER, supra note 1, at § 29.09 ("If a person withdraws from a conspiracy, she may avoid liability for subsequent crimes committed in furtherance of the conspiracy by her former co-conspirators.").

[26] LAFAVE, supra note 1, at 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 12.4; see DRESSLER, supra note 1, at § 27.07 ("[O]nce a person withdraws, the statute of limitations for the conspiracy begins to run in her favor."); Buscemi, supra note 21, at 1168 ("[W]ithdrawal is principally directed toward the time dimension of conspiracy.").

[27] Bost v. United States, 178 A.3d 1156, 1200 (D.C. 2018) (quoting Harris v. United States, 377 A.2d 34, 38 (D.C. 1977) (citing Hyde v. United States, 225 U.S. 347, 369 (1911); United States v. Chester, 407 F.2d 53, 55 (3rd Cir. 1969)); see, e.g., Tann v. United States, 127 A.3d 400, 467 (D.C. 2015) (citing United States v. Moore, 651 F.3d 30, 90 (D.C. Cir. 2011); Baker v. United States, 867 A.2d 988, 1007 n.24 (D.C. 2005).

[28] See Plater v. United States, 745 A.2d 953, 958 (D.C. 2000) ("Legal withdrawal has been defined as '(1) repudiation of the defendant's prior aid or (2) doing all that is possible to countermand his prior aid or counsel, and (3) doing so before the chain of events has become unstoppable.") (quoting LAFAVE, supra note 1, at 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 13.3).

provides the basis for a complete defense to criminal liability.[29] Which is to say, under District law an accomplice who "take[s] affirmative action to disavow or defeat the purpose, or definite, decisive and positive steps which indicate a full and complete disassociation" cannot be convicted of the crime for which he or she has been charged with aiding and abetting.[30]

With respect to both categories, there does not appear to be any reported District case law in which a defendant has successfully raised a withdrawal defense. Rather, the published decisions in these areas of law primarily clarify the kind of proof that fall short of establishing it. For example, in at least two cases the DCCA has determined that where the defendant plays a central role in the planning and facilitation on a crime (e.g., providing a weapon), "[l]eaving the scene before a crime occurs is," by itself, "insufficient to demonstrate withdrawal."[31]

The DCCA has also clarified that a withdrawal defense is unavailable although an accused who was intimately involved in a robbery scheme "may have 'wanted to get out of there, and didn't want to do further damage to the victim'" after the robbery had commenced.[32] Observing the requirement that the defendant take "affirmative action to disavow or defeat the purpose, or definite, decisive and positive steps which indicate a full and complete disassociation,"[33] the court deemed the mere fact that the defendant "regretted the unfolding consequences of the brutal robbery in which he participated" to be insufficient to "relieve him of criminal liability."[34]

---

[29] ROBINSON, supra note 1, at 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 81.

[30] In re D.N., 65 A.3d 88, 95 (D.C. 2013) ("Withdrawal is no defense to accomplice liability unless the defendant takes affirmative action to disavow or defeat the purpose, or definite, decisive and positive steps which indicate a full and complete disassociation.") (quoting Harris v. United States, 377 A.2d 34, 38 (D.C. 1977)); see In re D.N., 65 A.3d at 95 ("Even if D.N. regretted the unfolding consequences of the brutal robbery in which he participated, that does not relieve him of criminal liability."); Kelly v. United States, 639 A.2d 86, 91 (D.C. 1994).

[31] Bost v. United States, 178 A.3d 1156, 1201 (D.C. 2018) (citing Harris, 377 A.2d at 38) (the fact that appellant merely left the scene before the shooting occurred was "insufficient to establish withdrawal as a matter of law"). Relatedly, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit has observed that:

> Whatever may be the other requirements of an effective abandonment of a criminal enterprise, it is certain both as a matter of law and of common sense that there must be some appreciable interval between the alleged abandonment and the act from responsibility for which escape is sought. It must be possible for a jury to say that the accused had wholly and effectively detached himself from the criminal enterprise before the act with which he is charged is in the process of consummation or has become so inevitable that it cannot reasonably be stayed. While it may make no difference whether mere fear or actual repentance is the moving cause, one or the other must lead to an actual and effective retirement before the act in question has become so imminent that its avoidance is practically out of the question.

Mumforde v. United States, 130 F.2d 411, 413 (D.C. Cir. 1942) (quoting People v. Nichols, 230 N.Y. 221, 222, 129 N.E. 883 (1921)).

[32] In re D.N., 65 A.3d 88, 95 (D.C. 2013).

[33] Id. (citing Harris v. United States, 377 A.2d 34, 38 (D.C. 1977)).

[34] Id. (citing Plater v. United States, 745 A.2d 953, 958 (D.C. 2000) ("The defendants' fleeing of the crime scene after participating in the assault does not constitute legal withdrawal.").

One issue relevant to a withdrawal defense that is unresolved by DCCA case law is the burden of proof.[35] The commentary accompanying the District's criminal jury instruction on conspiracy seems to recommend that, "[i]n the event that a defendant claims that he or she withdrew from the conspiracy and the evidence warrants such an instruction," the burden should be on the "government to prove that the defendant was a member of the conspiracy and did not withdraw it."[36] However, recent U.S. Supreme Court case law—cited to in recent DCCA case law—indicates that the burden of proof should instead rest with the defendant.[37] And the commentary accompanying the District's criminal jury instruction on accomplice liability says nothing at all about the burden of proof for a withdrawal defense.[38]

Even assuming that under current District law the burden of persuasion for a withdrawal defense to the collateral consequences of a conspiracy rests with the government, there are sound policy and practical reasons (discussed below) to place the burden of persuasion for a withdrawal defense to accomplice liability (the focus of RCC § 22E-213) on the defendant, subject to a preponderance of the evidence standard. And there is also general District precedent supporting such an approach; many statutory defenses in the D.C. Code are subject to a preponderance of the evidence standard that must be proven by the defendant.[39]

Consistent with the above analysis, the RCC recognizes a broadly applicable affirmative defense to legal accountability, subject to proof by the defendant beyond a

---

[35] As the D.C. Court of Appeals explained in Green v. Dist. of Columbia Dep't of Employment Servs.:

> The term 'burden of proof' [] encompass[es] two separate burdens: the burden of production and the burden of persuasion . . . The former refers to the burden of coming forward with satisfactory evidence of a particular fact in issue . . . The latter constitutes the burden of persuading the trier of fact that the alleged fact is true.

499 A.2d 870, 873 (D.C. 1985) (internal citations omitted).

[36] Commentary on D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 7.102.

[37] Smith v. United States, 568 U.S. 106 (2013) (placing burden on defendant to prove withdrawal from conspiracy under federal law); see Bost v. United States, 178 A.3d 1156, 1201 (D.C. 2018) (citing id.).

[38] See generally D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 3.200.

[39] Most notably, this includes the District's statutory insanity defense, D.C. Code § 24-501 ("No person accused of an offense shall be acquitted on the ground that he was insane at the time of its commission unless his insanity, regardless of who raises the issue, is affirmatively established by a preponderance of the evidence."); see Bell v. United States, 950 A.2d 56, 66 (D.C. 2008) ("To establish a prima facie case, the defendant must present sufficient evidence to show that at the time of the criminal conduct, as a result of a mental illness or defect, he lacked substantial capacity to recognize the wrongfulness of his act or to conform his conduct to the requirements of the law . . . If a defendant fails to establish a prima facie case, the trial court is justified in not presenting the issue to the jury."); see also Bethea v. United States, 365 A.2d 64, 90 (D.C. 1976) ("Reasonably viewed, the concepts of both diminished capacity and insanity involve a moral choice by the community to withhold a finding of responsibility and its consequence of punishment."). For other examples, see D.C. Code § 22-3611 (b) (providing, with respect to penalty enhancement for crimes committed against minors, that it "is an affirmative defense that the accused reasonably believed that the victim was not a minor at the time of the offense," which "defense shall be established by a preponderance of the evidence."); D.C. Code § 22-3601(c) (same for penalty enhancement for crimes committed against minors); D.C. Code § 22-3011(b) (providing, with respect to child sex abuse, that [m]arriage or domestic partnership between the defendant and the child or minor at the time of the offense is a defense, which the defendant must establish by a preponderance of the evidence . . . .").

preponderance of the evidence.[40] (Recognition of a withdrawal defense to legal accountability is broadly congruent with recognition of the renunciation defense to general inchoate crimes under RCC § 22E- 305.[41])

[40] The withdrawal defense established by RCC § 22E-213 also applies to legal accountability based upon culpably causing an innocent or irresponsible person to commit an offense. It is unclear under current District law whether a withdrawal defense would be available in this rare situation. There are only a handful of reported District cases involving this theory of liability and none implicate withdrawal.

[41] See RCC § 22E-306. Note, however, that the RCC renunciation defense differs from the RCC withdrawal defense in two primary ways. First, the renunciation defense incorporates an "actual prevention" standard, which entails that the defendant successfully prevent the target of the general inchoate crime from being consummated—whereas "reasonable efforts" on behalf of the defendant will suffice to establish a withdrawal defense. Second, the renunciation defense incorporates a voluntariness requirement, which entails that the abandonment of criminal purpose have been motivated by something other than a desire to avoid getting caught—whereas the withdrawal defense does not incorporate any subjective requirement. Given these differences, it is possible that a defendant may satisfy the standard for a withdrawal defense, and therefore escape legal accountability under RCC §§ 22E-210 and 211, but fail to satisfy the standard for a renunciation defense, and thus retain criminal liability under one or more of the general inchoate crimes under RCC §§ 22E-301, 302, and 303. See supra note 7 (providing illustration).

RCC § 22E-214. Merger of Related Offenses.

Explanatory Note. Section 214 sets forth a comprehensive framework for addressing issues of sentencing merger[1] that arise when a defendant has been convicted of two or more substantially related criminal offenses[2] arising from the same act or course of conduct.[3] This framework is comprised of general merger principles, which preclude the imposition of multiple liability for violation of overlapping criminal statutes that protect the same (or sufficiently similar) societal interests.[4] Barring the unjust and ineffective

---

[1] The issue of merger is "[o]ne of the more important and vexing legal issues" confronting sentencing courts. Tom Stacy, Relating Kansas Offenses, 56 U. KAN. L. REV. 831, 831-32 (2008); see, e.g., Bruce A. Antkowiak, Picking Up the Pieces of the Gordian Knot: Towards A Sensible Merger Methodology, 41 NEW ENG. L. REV. 259, 285-86 (2007) ("Merger is one of those portal issues that can take us to the center of our basic conceptions about the place criminal law has in our society. What we make criminal generally defines the frontier we establish between the individual and the state in any democratic society."); Com. v. Campbell, 351 Pa. Super. 56, 70 (1986) ("In recent years, there have not been many issues which have received . . . a more uneven treatment than claims that offenses have merged for purposes of sentencing."). At the heart of the problem is the fact that "federal and state codes alike are filled with overlapping crimes, such that a single criminal incident typically violates a half dozen or more prohibitions." William J. Stuntz, The Pathological Politics of Criminal Law, 100 MICH. L. REV. 505, 518-19 (2001); see, e.g., Erik Luna, The Overcriminalization Phenomenon, 54 AM. U. L. REV. 703, 708 (2005) (observing that "Congress has adopted repetitive and overlapping statutes," such as "mostly superfluous offenses like 'carjacking' that deal with conduct addressed by existing provisions such as robbery and kidnapping.").

[2] The merger policies set forth in this section only apply to RCC offenses (in contrast to all criminal offenses in the D.C. Code). This limitation is consistent with RCC § 22E-103(a), which establishes that "[u]nless otherwise provided by law, a provision in this title applies to this title alone." Because of this limitation, the principles and procedures established in section 214 would not govern the merger of multiple District offenses located outside the RCC, nor would they apply to multiple convictions for an RCC offense and one or more non-RCC District offenses.

[3] § 22E-214 addresses what are sometimes referred to as "multiple description claims" of merger, which "arise when a defendant who has been convicted of multiple criminal offenses under different statutes alleges that the statutes punish the same offense." State v. Smith, 436 S.W.3d 751, 766 (Tenn. 2014). In contrast, § 22E-214 does not address what are sometimes referred "unit-of-prosecution claims" of merger, which arise "when a defendant who has been convicted of multiple violations of the same statute asserts that the multiple convictions are for the same offense." Id.; see, e.g., Jeffrey M. Chemerinsky, Counting Offenses, 58 DUKE L.J. 709 (2009); PAUL H. ROBINSON, 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 68 (2d. Westlaw 2019).

[4] Legislation of this nature is appropriate because "[t]he gradation of punishment for an offense is clearly a matter of legislative choice, whether it be as severe as authorizing dual punishment for lesser-included offenses . . . or as mild as prohibiting the imposition of multiple convictions even where two offenses clearly involve different elements." Byrd v. United States, 598 A.2d 386, 398 (D.C. 1991); see, e.g., Model Penal Code § 1.07(1) (recommending legislative specification of "the situations in which conviction for more than one offense based on the same conduct is precluded"). Merger issues, while implicating the Fifth Amendment's prohibition against "twice [placing someone] in jeopardy of life or limb" for the "same offense," are ultimately a matter of legislative intent subject to the safeguards afforded by the constitutional prohibition on cruel and unusual punishment and the due process requirement of fundamental fairness. See, e.g., Anne Bowen Poulin, Double Jeopardy and Multiple Punishment: Cutting the Gordian Knot, 77 U. Colo. L. Rev. 595, 596–97 (2006) ("Under the Double Jeopardy Clause, when the defendant complains only of multiple punishment, and not successive prosecution, the defendant essentially complains that two convictions were obtained and two sentences were imposed where only one was permitted. But the issue is one of legislative intent rather than constitutional limitation."); MICHAEL S. MOORE, ACT AND CRIME 309 (1993) (discussing difference between a double jeopardy question and an Eighth Amendment question). The merger principles incorporated into section 214 provide an express codification of legislative intent, and have been drafted to limit multiple liability well below what the constitutional ceiling on excessive punishments might otherwise allow for. See, e.g., Rachel E. Barkow, The Court of Life and Death: The Two Tracks of aggregation of convictions under these circumstances facilitates proportionate punishment.[5]

The prefatory clause of subsection (a) establishes that the general principles set forth in subsection (a) only address the merger of multiple convictions that "aris[e] from the same act or course of conduct."[6] It is under these circumstances that the imposition of multiple liability most clearly raises issues of proportionality.[7] In contrast, where the defendant's convictions arise from separate courses of conduct, the imposition of multiple liability is less likely to be unfairly duplicative.[8] The principles of merger set forth in subsection (a) are not intended to govern the latter situation.

The first of these principles, set forth in paragraph (a)(1), establishes that merger is required where "[o]ne offense is necessarily established by proof of the elements of the Constitutional Sentencing Law and the Case for Uniformity, 107 MICH. L. REV. 1145 (2009) (observing that in non-capital cases the ceiling for constitutionally excessive punishments is extremely high); Youngjae Lee, Why Proportionality Matters, 160 U. PA. L. REV. 1835 (2012) (discussing relationship between proportionality and the Eighth Amendment).

---

[5] To be sure, the most direct way of avoiding the problem of disproportionate punishment that arises from overlapping criminal statutes is to avoid enacting such statutes in the first place. However, as a practical matter, drafting offenses that perfectly line up next to one another without any overlap (and avoiding gaps in coverage) is extremely difficult. See, e.g., State v. Davis, 68 N.J. 69, 77 (1975) (noting the "inevitable conflict between legislative attempts to stuff all kinds of anti-social conduct into the general language of a limited number of criminal offense categories, and the legislative desire not to be inordinately vague about what behavior is deemed 'criminal.'"). Therefore, while the offenses in the RCC's Special Part strive to achieve that goal to the extent possible, application of the general merger principles specified in this section remains essential to facilitating the overall proportionality of the RCC.

[6] Whether or not two offenses "aris[e] from the same act or course of conduct" is a mixed question of law and fact, which depends upon the factual predicate for both offenses as well as the unit of prosecution that the legislature intended to apply to each. See, e.g., Hanna v. United States, 666 A.2d 845, 852–53 (D.C. 1995); Allen v. United States, 580 A.2d 653, 657 (D.C. 1990).

As a general rule, two offenses arise from the same act or course of conduct when—at minimum—a single act or omission by the defendant satisfies the requirements of liability for each. For example, charges for homicide and assault, if based on the defendant's firing of a single shot at a single victim, arise from the same act or course of conduct. That said, the fact that multiple charges are based on a single act or omission does not necessarily mean they arise from the same conduct, such as, for example, where a defendant's single shot causes the death of V1 and bodily injury to V2, thereby satisfying the requirements of liability for murder against V1 and assault against V2.

Conversely, multiple charges may be based on a series of related acts or omissions yet still arise from the same course of conduct. For example, where X contracts with Y at 8:00am to assault V in Northwest D.C., and Y attempts to fulfill the contract that evening at 8:00pm by shooting V in the leg in Southeast D.C., but is frustrated by the police immediately prior to consummation, both X's solicitation and the subsequent attempted assault by Y—for which X is accountable as an accomplice, see RCC § 22E-210(a)—arise from the same course of conduct. See infra discussing same course of conduct limitation in the context of merger of multiple inchoate crimes under RCC § 22E-214(a)(6).

[7] For example, it would be disproportionate to impose convictions for both: (1) homicide and assault as it pertains to the death of a single victim perpetrated by a single bullet; (2) possession with intent to distribute PCP and distribution of PCP as it pertains to the sale of the same batch of drugs in a single transaction; or (3) theft and intentional damage of property as it pertains to the immediate destruction of a single piece of stolen property.

[8] For example, it would not be disproportionate to impose convictions for both: (1) homicide and assault as it pertains to a non-fatal shooting on one day and a fatal shooting on another day of the same victim; (2) possession with intent to distribute PCP and distribution of PCP as it pertains to the sale of different batches of drugs in different transactions occurring months apart; or (3) theft and intentional damage of property as it pertains to the destruction of different pieces of property stolen from the same actor years apart.

other offense as a matter of law."[9] This language effectively codifies the elements test originally set forth by the U.S. Supreme Court in Blockburger v. United States.[10] The [9] See, e.g., Model Penal Code §§ 1.07(1)(a), (4)(a) (barring multiple liability where one offense is "established by proof of the same or less than all the facts required to establish the commission of the [other] offense"); ROBINSON, supra note 3, at 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 68 ("Most jurisdictions bar conviction for both an offense and a lesser included offense arising from the same conduct. Indeed, this multiple offense limitation is generally accepted to be a constitutional requirement under the double jeopardy clause.") (collecting legal authorities).

[10] 284 U.S. 299, 301 (1932) ("[W]here the same act or transaction constitutes a violation of two distinct statutory provisions, the test to be applied to determine whether there are two offenses or only one, is whether each provision requires proof of a fact which the other does not."); see, e.g., Michael H. Hoffheimer, The Rise and Fall of Lesser Included Offenses, 36 RUTGERS L.J. 351, 400-01 (2005) ("The Blockburger test itself originated as a limit on cumulative punishments, but later cases abandoned the elements test as an absolute bar against multiple punishment and instead deployed the test as a guide to legislative intent.").

It is important to note that the elements test has received significant criticism, particularly where it operates as the sole basis for conducting merger analyses. Four general problems have been highlighted. The first is a marked lack clarity and consistency, namely, the element test "is formally indeterminate, has no ready application to common crimes with alternative elements, and facilitates result-oriented manipulation of elements." Hoffheimer, supra note 10, at 437 ("Growing judicial experience with the elements test demonstrates that the test fails to achieve the simplicity and ease of application promised by its promoters."); Texas v. Cobb, 532 U.S. 162, 185-86 (2001) ("The (elements) test has emerged as a tool in an area of our jurisprudence that the Chief Justice has described as 'a veritable Sargasso Sea which could not fail to challenge the most intrepid judicial navigator.' . . . Some will apply the test successfully; some will not. Legal challenges are inevitable. The result, I believe, will resemble not so much the Sargasso Sea as the criminal law equivalent of Milton's Serbonian Bog . . . Where Armies whole have sunk.") (Breyer, Stevens, Souter, and Ginsburg, JJ., dissenting) (internal quotations and citations omitted).

The second problem is disproportionality in convictions, namely, the elements test, as applied to any criminal code comprised of many substantially related overlapping offenses, effectively treats "defendants who commit what is, in ordinary terminology, a single crime [] as though they committed many different crimes." Stuntz, supra note 1, at 519-20; Douglas Husak, Crimes Outside the Core, 39 TULSA L. REV. 755, 770-71 (2004) ("from the intuitive perspective of a layperson, [in contrast to the elements test,] the defendant has committed a single crime").

The third problem, which follows directly from the second, is that of disproportionality in sentencing exposure. Assuming that the statutory maximum (and mandatory minimum, if any) for individual offenses in a criminal code is proportionate, then it will necessarily be the case that aggregating the punishments for two of more substantially overlapping offenses based on the same act or course of conduct will lead a defendant to face an overall level of sentencing exposure that is disproportionately severe. See, e.g., Tom Stacy, Relating Kansas Offenses, 56 U. KAN. L. REV. 831, 832 (2008); ("Allowing multiple convictions can add years to criminal sentences because consecutive sentences are imposed or because the elevated criminal history score lengthens the term of imprisonment for subsequent offenses."); Whitton v. State, 479 P.2d 302, 306 (Alaska 1970) ("Legislative refinement of an essentially unitary criminal episode into numerous separate violations of the law has resulted in a proliferation of offenses capable of commission by a person at one time and in one criminal transaction . . . But as the separate violations multiply by legislative action, the likelihood increases that [under the elements test] a defendant will actually be punished several times for what is really and basically one criminal act.").

The fourth problem emphasizes the corrosive procedural dynamics that flow from the two proportionality problems just noted. Specifically, it is argued that the narrow scope of merger inherent in the elements test encourages a prosecutorial practice known as "charge-stacking," wherein the government brings as many substantially-overlapping charges as possible, thereby subjecting defendants to more severe punishments and providing defendants with "greater incentives to plead guilty." Husak, supra note 10, at 770-71; Darryl K. Brown, Prosecutors and Overcriminalization: Thoughts on Political Dynamics and A Doctrinal Response, 6 OHIO ST. J. CRIM. L. 453, 453 (2009) ("Redundant and overlapping criminalization poses a considerable risk for prosecutorial misuse in a relatively low-visibility manner that is hard to monitor. Prosecutors can stack charges that drive defendants into hard bargains; even when charges are ultimately dropped, they have done their work as bargaining chips.").

elements test supports merger whenever the elements of one offense are a subset of the other offense.[11] In practice, two offenses share this kind of elemental relationship whenever it is impossible to commit one offense without also committing the other offense.[12]

Paragraph (a)(2) next addresses three particular kinds of variances, which, if constituting the sole distinctions between two or more offenses, support merger.[13] The first, codified by subparagraph (a)(2)(A), is where the offenses differ only in that one requires a less serious injury or risk of injury than is necessary to establish commission of the other offense.[14] The second, codified by subparagraph (a)(2)(B), is where the offenses differ only in that one requires a lower culpable mental state under RCC § 22E-206 or § 22E-207 than the other.[15] And the third, codified by subparagraph (a)(2)(C), is where

---

Section 214 addresses these criticisms by incorporating a range of merger principles—including but also going beyond the elements test—which together constitute a more proportionate approach that is neither "too rigid" nor can be said to "reflexively stack the deck in favor of multiple convictions and punishments." State v. Carruth, 993 P.2d 869, 875 (Utah 1999) ("I believe that the 'statutory elements' test (contained in the state legislation) is too rigid and should be repealed by the legislature and replaced with a more realistic test.") (Howe, C.J., concurring in the result); Stacy, supra note 1, at 856 ("The Blockburger test, and even more so the same-elements test, reflexively stack the deck in favor of multiple [] punishments.").

[11] Compare, for example, a robbery offense defined as "intentionally causing bodily injury in the course of theft" and an assault offense defined as "intentionally causing bodily injury." The elements of the assault offense are a subset of the elements of the robbery offense.

[12] For example, one way to confirm that the elements of assault are a subset of the elements of robbery, as defined supra note 11, is to determine that it is impossible to commit robbery without also committing assault under the relevant statutory definitions. See also Byrd v. United States, 598 A.2d 386, 398 (D.C. 1991) (en banc) (While the Blockburger test, as codified by D.C. Code § 23-112, "uses the phrase 'proof of a fact,' the reference is to what the statutory 'offense' requires in the way of proof, not to the specific 'transaction,'" i.e. "[t]he word 'requires' can refer only to elements, not to whatever facts may be adduced at trial"); but see notes 37-41 and accompanying text (discussing unit of analysis issues, and the concomitant limited relevance of factual considerations, to merger under section 214).

[13] See, e.g., Model Penal Code §§ 1.07(1)(a), (4)(c) (barring multiple liability where one offense "differs from the offense charged only in the respect that a less serious injury or risk of injury to the same person, property or public interest or a lesser kind of culpability suffices to establish its commission."); id. § 1.07(1)(d) (barring multiple liability where "the offenses differ only in that one is defined to prohibit a designated kind of conduct generally and the other to prohibit a specific instance of such conduct."); ROBINSON, supra note 3, at 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 68 (collecting authorities that employ comparable formulations).

[14] An example of two offenses that satisfy this principle are: (1) assault, defined as "intentionally causing bodily injury"; and (2) aggravated assault, defined as "intentionally causing serious bodily injury." See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 1.07, cmt. at 133 (giving the example of an "offense consisting of an intentional infliction of bodily harm" and "the charge of intentional homicide").

[15] An example of two offenses that satisfy this principle are: (1) murder, defined as "intentionally causing death"; and (2) reckless manslaughter, defined as "recklessly causing death." See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 1.07, cmt. at 133 (giving the example of offenses that are "less serious types of homicides," and also observing that this principle would apply to "offenses that are the same [] except that they require recklessness or negligence while the [other] offense [] requires a purpose to bring about the consequences, or, finally, offenses that are the same as the [] except that they require only negligence while the [other] offense [] requires either recklessness or a purpose to bring about the consequences").

This may go beyond the scope of the elements test codified in paragraph (a)(1). Note, for example, that the Commentary to the Hawaii Criminal Code observes that the state's comparable provision, Haw. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 701-109(c), varies from the elements test:

the offenses differ only in that one is defined to prohibit a designated kind of conduct generally and the other to prohibit a specific instance of such conduct.[16] Where two offenses satisfy one or more of these principles, the imposition of multiple liability would be disproportionate.[17]

Paragraph (a)(3) establishes that merger is required where "[o]ne offense requires a finding of fact inconsistent with the requirements for commission of the other offense as a matter of law."[18] This principle applies when the facts required to prove offenses arising from the same course of conduct are legally "inconsistent with each other."[19] Where the proof necessary to establish one offense necessarily precludes the existence of the proof necessary to establish another offense under any set of facts, the imposition of multiple liability would be disproportionate.[20] > in that, although the included offense must produce the same result as the inclusive offense, there may be some dissimilarity in the facts necessary to prove the offense. Therefore [the elements test] would not strictly apply and (c) is needed to fill the gap. For example, negligent homicide would probably not be included in murder under [the elements test], because negligence is different in quality from intention. It would obviously be included under (c), because the result is the same and only the required degree of culpability changes.

Commentary on Haw. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 701-109(c); see also Stepp v. State, 286 Ga. 556, 557, 690 S.E.2d 161 (2010) (describing comparable Georgia provision as one of several "additional statutory provisions concerning prohibitions against multiple convictions for closely related offenses") (citation omitted).

[16] An example of two offenses that satisfy this principle are: (1) robbery, defined as "recklessly causing bodily injury in the course of a theft"; and (2) carjacking, defined as "recklessly causing bodily injury in the course of a theft of an automobile." See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 1.07, cmt. at 114 (giving the example of "a general statute prohibiting lewd conduct and [] a specific-statute prohibiting indecent exposure," and stating that, "[i]n the absence of an expressed intention to the contrary, it is fair to assume that the legislature did not intend that there be more than one conviction under these circumstances.").

[17] An example of two offenses that satisfy all three of these principles are: (1) aggravated carjacking defined as "intentionally causing serious bodily injury in the course of a theft of an automobile"; and (2) robbery, defined as "recklessly causing bodily injury in the course of a theft."

[18] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 1.07(1)(c) (barring multiple liability where "inconsistent findings of fact are required to establish the commission of the offenses"); ROBINSON, supra note 3, at 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 68 (collecting authorities that employ comparable formulations); see also Model Penal Code § 1.07, cmt. at 112 n.32 (observing that this principle accords with longstanding common law and important constitutional considerations).

[19] McClain v. United States, 871 A.2d 1185, 1192 (D.C. 2005) (citing Fuller v. United States, 407 F.2d 1199, 1223 (1967) (en banc)). Compare, for example, a theft offense defined as "taking property of another with intent to permanently deprive" and an unlawful use offense defined as "taking property of another with intent to temporarily deprive." Because a finding that the defendant took property with the intent to permanently deprive logically precludes a finding the defendant took property with the intent to temporarily deprive, paragraph (a)(3) precludes the imposition of multiple liability for these two offenses. See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 1.07, cmt. at 114 (giving the example of "robbery and receiving the stolen property, in which it was clear that the defendant had either robbed or received the goods but could not have done both"). The same analysis would also preclude the imposition of multiple liability for a murder offense defined as "intentionally causing the death of another person absent mitigating circumstances" and a manslaughter offense defined as "intentionally causing the death of another person in the presence of mitigating circumstances."

[20] Precluding multiple liability based on inconsistent guilty verdicts is to be distinguished from, and is therefore not intended to displace, the legal system's well established "tolerat[ion]" of verdicts of guilt and innocence that are inconsistent with one another." Evans v. United States, 987 A.2d 1138, 1140–41 (D.C. 2010) ("[A] logical inconsistency between a guilty verdict and a verdict of acquittal does not impugn the validity of either verdict") (quoting Yeager v. United States, 557 U.S. 110, 112 (2009) (discussing Dunn v.

Paragraph (a)(4) establishes that merger is required where "one offense reasonably accounts for the other offense given the harm or wrong, culpability, and penalty proscribed by each."[21] This principle applies whenever the gravamen of one offense duplicates that of another offense.[22] This purpose-based evaluation goes beyond mere consideration of

---

United States, 284 U.S. 390 (1932))); see, e.g., United States v. Powell, 469 U.S. 57 (1984). For example, whereas paragraph (a)(3) would preclude multiple liability for theft and unlawful use, it would not in any way limit the ability of the fact finder to convict on theft but acquit on unlawful use, notwithstanding the fact that the elements of theft necessarily include the elements of unlawful use.

[21] This proportionality-based merger principle is loosely modeled on a comparable merger principle incorporated into a few other recent code reform projects. See, e.g., Proposed Del. Crim. Code § 210(a)(2017) (barring multiple liability where "two offenses are based on the same conduct and . . . the harm or wrong of one offense is . . . entirely accounted for by the other offense."); Proposed Ill. Crim. Code § 254(1)(a) (2003) (same); Proposed Ky. Penal Code § 502.254(1)(a) (2003) (same). Of all the merger principles codified by section 214, it is the most directly responsive to the four main shortcomings of the elements test discussed supra note 10. See, e.g., Michael T. Cahill, Offense Grading and Multiple Liability: New Challenges for A Model Penal Code Second, 1 OHIO ST. J. CRIM. L. 599, 606 (2004) ("[Rather than] considering the theoretical possibility of committing one offense without committing another" under the elements test, this "proposed ["entirely accounted for"] standard calls for a consideration of the relevant offenses' purposes") (discussing Proposed Ill. Crim. Code § 254(1)(a)); Brown, supra note 10, at 453 (many of the problems implicated by the elements test can be addressed by asking judges to engage in a broader evaluation of "whether the statutes serve the same functional purpose or protect against the same harm and public interest, such that punishment under both for a single act constitutes double punishment"); Stacy, supra note 1, at 855 ("In developing a common law of offense interrelationships, courts [should be] guided first by the overall aims of the criminal code, particularly the code's implicit principle of proportionality, and second by offense relationship doctrines.").

Numerous jurisdictions have adopted comparable proportionality-based approaches through case law. See, e.g., Whitton v. State, 479 P.2d 302, 306 (Alaska 1970) (replacing elements test with an approach that "focus[es] upon the quality of the differences, if any exist, between the separate statutory offenses," with an eye towards discerning whether the "differences relate to the basic interests sought to be vindicated or protected by the statutes") (collecting legal authorities and scholarly commentary that support this kind of approach); Monoker v. State, 582 A.2d 525, 529 (Md. 1990) (complementing elements test with proportionality-based approach founded upon recognition that one of "the most basic considerations in all our [merger] decisions is the principle of fundamental fairness in meting out punishment for a crime"); State v. Davis, 68 N.J. 69, 77, 81 (1975) (adopting proportionality-based approach to merger, which aims to "insure that the punishment imposed is commensurate with the criminal liability," and is "attended by considerations of fairness and fulfillment of reasonable expectations in the light of constitutional and common law goals"). It is important to note, however, that the scope of merger under paragraph (a)(4) is likely narrower than under any of these judicially-created approaches, all of which appear to rest upon consideration of the specific facts presented at trial. See infra notes 40-41 and accompanying text (discussing narrow role of factual considerations under section 214).

Note also that a handful of jurisdictions appear to have legislatively adopted categorical bars on multiple convictions arising from the same conduct—i.e. merger without regard to the nature of the underlying offenses—which are significantly broader than paragraph (a)(4) (as well as any other principle in section 214). See, e.g., Minn. Stat. Ann. § 609.035 ("[I]f a person's conduct constitutes more than one offense under the laws of this state, the person may be punished for only one of the offenses . . . ."); State v. Norregaard, 384 N.W.2d 449, 449 (Minn.1986) (this provision categorically "prohibits multiple sentences, even concurrent sentences, for two or more offenses that were committed as part of a single behavioral incident"); Cal. Penal Code § 654 ("An act or omission that is punishable in different ways by different provisions of law shall be punished under the provision that provides for the longest potential term of imprisonment, but in no case shall the act or omission be punished under more than one provision."); People v. Myers, 59 Cal. App. 4th 1523, 1529, 69 Cal. Rptr. 2d 889, 892 (1997) (observing that this categorical bar on multiple liability ensures that "punishment is commensurate with a defendant's culpability").

[22] See, e.g., Michael T. Cahill, Offense Grading and Multiple Liability: New Challenges for A Model Penal Code Second, 1 OHIO ST. J. CRIM. L. 599, 606 (2004) (arguing that elements test should be replaced with a whether it is theoretically possible to commit one offense without committing another.[23] Instead, it requires evaluation of the harm or wrong, culpability, and penalty proscribed by each offense to determine whether a conviction for one offense reasonably accounts for a conviction for another offense.[24]

Paragraph (a)(5) addresses merger in two different situations involving multiple convictions for general inchoate offenses and completed offenses.[25] The first is where "[o]ne offense consists only of a criminal attempt or criminal solicitation of [t]he other offense."[26] The second is where "[o]ne offense consists only of a criminal attempt or broader principle that "asks whether the gravamen of one offense duplicates that of another"); Antkowiak, supra note 1, at 268 ("If merger is all about legislative intent, then determining legislative intent is all about identifying the harm, evil, or mischief the statute is supposed to remedy."); see also Stacy, supra note 1, at 855 ("So how should a court deal with two crimes whose elements overlap only in part? Unfortunately, there is no simple heuristic. Courts should compare the elements of the two offenses, recognize the ways in which the crimes differ, and then use common sense to determine whether the differences between the crimes fundamentally change the character of one crime relative to the other.").

---

[23] See generally RCC § 22E-214(a)(1).

[24] Compare, for example, the following aggravated theft and carjacking offenses. The aggravated theft offense applies a five-year statutory maximum (and no mandatory minimum) to anyone who "takes property of another valued at more than $25,000 dollars with the intent to permanently deprive." The carjacking offense, in contrast, applies a twenty-year statutory maximum and a five-year mandatory minimum to anyone who "intentionally causes bodily harm to another person in the course of committing theft of a motor vehicle in the immediate possession of another." While the elements of these two offenses are quite similar, they do not satisfy the elements test because, inter alia, it is possible to steal a car worth less than $25,000. As a result, it cannot be said that by committing carjacking one necessarily commits aggravated theft. That being said, a consideration of the harm, culpability, and penalty proscribed by each offense—when viewed in light of the fact that a $25,000 vehicle is well within the norm of carjackings—provides the basis for concluding that a carjacking conviction "reasonably accounts" for an aggravated theft conviction when based on the same act or course of conduct (i.e. the theft of a single automobile from an individual victim).

For another illustration of this merger principle, compare the general inchoate offense of conspiracy, which generally criminalizes agreements to commit crimes, and specific offenses that criminalize particular kinds of consensual transactions, such as, for example, drug distribution. Where dual convictions for conspiracy and a completed target offense that typically involves a mutual transaction both arise from the same act or course of conduct, paragraph (a)(4) would require merger given the overlapping harm, culpability, and penalty proscribed by each offense. Compare infra note 26 (discussing paragraph (a)(5), which generally does not require that conspiracy and completed target offense merge). This means that (for example) where D, a drug dealer, is convicted of both conspiracy to commit drug distribution and drug distribution, and those convictions arise from the same act or course of conduct (e.g., a single drug deal with purchaser X), the conspiracy charge would merge with the drug distribution charge, since the latter, by effectively requiring an agreement to distribute as a precursor, "reasonably accounts" for the former. See also RCC § 22E-304(a), Explanatory Note (explaining that this outcome accords with the narrower, and most justifiable, interpretation of Wharton's Rule, and collecting legal authorities in support).

[25] The merger principle set forth in this paragraph arguably departs from the elements test, codified in paragraph (a)(1), in that convictions for both a substantive offense and an inchoate offense designed to culminate in that same offense "would not necessarily be barred under Blockburger." Model Penal Code § 1.07, cmt. at 108. So, for example, under Blockburger, "convictions of both a substantive offense and its solicitation would be possible since solicitation requires proof of an element, the solicitation, which would not be required to prove the substantive offense, and the substantive offense requires proof of an element, actual commission of the offense, not required to prove the solicitation." Id. Nevertheless, because the general inchoate crime of solicitation is "not designed to cumulate sanctions for different stages of conduct culminating in a criminal offense but to reach the preparatory conduct if the offense is not committed," it "would be a perversion of the legislative intent to [] pyramid convictions and punishment." Id. at 109.

[26] RCC § 22E-2214(a)(5)(A); see, e.g., Model Penal Code § 1.07(1)(a) (establishing that no person may be convicted of more than one offense if one offense is "included in the other charge," which, as defined in criminal solicitation toward commission of . . . "[a]n offense that is related to that offense in the manner described in paragraphs (a)(1)-(a)(4) of this subsection."[27] In the first situation, subparagraph (a)(5)(A) requires merger for engaging in preparation to commit an offense and the subsequent completion of that offense whenever the convictions involve the same criminal objective.[28] In the second situation, subparagraph (a)(5)(B) ensures that Model Penal Code § 1.07(4)(b), includes "an attempt or solicitation to commit the offense charged"); PAUL H. ROBINSON, 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 84 (2d. Westlaw 2019) ("It is almost universally the rule that a defendant may not be convicted of both a substantive offense and an inchoate offense designed to culminate in that same offense").

---

Note that paragraph (a)(5) excludes the general inchoate offense of conspiracy from its reach. This is consistent with the well-established common law rule, which authorizes multiple liability "for both the conspiracy and the completed offense." Model Penal Code § 1.07 cmt. at 109. However, it is inconsistent with the recommendations of the Model Penal Code, which precludes multiple liability where one offense "consists only of a conspiracy or other form of preparation to commit the other." Model Penal Code § 1.07(1)(b).

The drafters of the Model Penal Code sought to overturn the common law rule on the rationale that general inchoate liability largely exists to provide a basis for arresting, incarcerating, and rehabilitating dangerous offenders—which purposes are equally well-served by a conviction for the completed offense. Model Penal Code § 1.07 cmt. at 109 (conviction for a completed offense alone "adequately deals with such conduct"). Since publication of the Model Penal Code, however, "only [] a minority of the modern recodifications" appear to have been persuaded by this position. WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 12.4(d) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) (collecting statutes); see, e.g., JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 29.03 (6th ed. 2012) (contemporary majority approach recognizes that, "[u]nlike the crimes of attempt and solicitation, the offense of conspiracy does not merge into the [] completed offense that was the object of the conspiracy").

Today, most American jurisdictions appear to believe that—consistent with the common law approach—"[conspiratorial] agreement is 'a distinct evil,' which 'may exist and be punished whether or not the substantive crime ensues.'" United States v. Jimenez Recio, 537 U.S. 270, 274 (2003) (quoting Salinas v. United States, 522 U.S. 52, 65 (1997)). Specifically, the argument driving the common law approach is that "collective criminal agreement—partnership in crime—presents a greater potential threat to the public than individual delicts" for three interrelated reasons: (1) it "increases the likelihood that the criminal object will be successfully attained"; (2) it "decreases the probability that the individuals involved will depart from their path of criminality"; and (3) it "makes more likely the commission of crimes unrelated to the original purpose for which the group was formed." Callanan v. United States, 364 U.S. 587, 593-94 (1961). And where, as under the RCC, a criminal code employs a bilateral definition of conspiracy, the argument against categorical merger of all conspiracies rests on an even stronger foundation. See, e.g., DRESSLER, supra note 26, at § 30.01 ("[I]f the focus of the offense is on the dangerousness of the individual conspirator, her punishment should be calibrated to the crime that she threatened to commit; punishing her for both crimes is duplicative. The non-merger rule makes sense, however, if one focuses on the alternative rationale of conspiracy law, i.e. to attack the special dangers thought to inhere in conspiratorial groupings.") (italics added); RCC § 22E-303(a) (requiring proof that the defendant and "at least one other person" agree to commit a crime).

[27] RCC § 22E-2214(a)(5)(B); see, e.g., Proposed Ill. Crim. Code § 254(1)(b) (requiring merger whenever: "one offense consists only of an inchoate offense toward commission of . . . (i) the other offense, or . . . (ii) a substantive offense that is related to the other offense in the manner described in Subsection (1)(a)."); People v. Thomas, 531 N.E.2d 84, 88 (Ill. App. 1988) (vacating aggravated battery conviction where same stabbing was basis for attempted murder conviction); Ala. Code § 13A-1-9(2) ("An offense is an included one if . . . It consists of an attempt or solicitation to commit the offense charged or to commit a lesser included offense."); Kan. Stat. Ann. § 21-5109(4) (same).

[28] Where, for example, X fatally shoots V with intent to kill, X has satisfied the requirements of liability for both the armed murder of V and the attempted armed murder of V. However, subparagraph (a)(5)(A) precludes imposing multiple convictions upon X for both offenses. Likewise, if X successfully persuades Y to fatally shoot V, X has satisfied the requirements of liability for both the armed murder of V (as an accomplice) and solicitation of armed murder of V. However, subparagraph (a)(5)(A) precludes imposing the outcome is the same although the completed offense is not the target of the general inchoate offense, provided that the completed offense and the target of the general inchoate offense: (1) involve the same criminal objective; and (2) would otherwise be subject to merger under any of the other principles specified in subsection (a).[29]

Paragraph (a)(6) addresses merger in two different situations involving multiple convictions for general inchoate offenses.[30] The first is where the general inchoate offenses are "designed to culminate in commission of [t]he same offense."[31] The second is where multiple convictions upon X for both offenses. Note that the above limitations would not apply if the charges for either attempt or solicitation to commit armed murder and the (completed) armed murder involved different victims.

---

[29] Where, for example, X fatally shoots V with intent to kill, X has satisfied the requirements of liability for both the armed murder of V and the attempted (unarmed) murder of V. However, subparagraph (a)(5)(B) precludes imposing multiple convictions upon X for both offenses. Likewise, if X successfully persuades Y to fatally shoot V, then X has satisfied the requirements of liability for both the armed murder of V (as an accomplice) and solicitation of (unarmed) murder of V. However, subparagraph (a)(5)(B) precludes imposing multiple imposing multiple convictions upon X for both offenses because armed murder and murder satisfy the general merger principles set forth in paragraphs (a)(1)-(4). Note that the above principles would not apply if the charges for either attempt or solicitation to commit (unarmed) murder and the (completed) armed murder involved different victims.

[30] The merger principle set forth in this paragraph, like that set forth in paragraph (a)(5), arguably departs from the elements test, codified in paragraph (a)(1). See supra note 25 (providing analysis consistent with this conclusion); Model Penal Code § 5.05, cmt. at 492 (arguing that there's "no warrant for cumulating convictions of attempt, solicitation and conspiracy to commit the same offense").

[31] RCC § 22E-2214(a)(6)(A); see, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.05(3) ("A person may not be convicted of more than one [general inchoate inchoate offense] for conduct designed to commit or to culminate in the commission of the same crime."); PAUL H. ROBINSON, 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 84 (2d. Westlaw 2019) ("Most jurisdictions bar multiple convictions for combinations of inchoate offenses designed to culminate in the same offense.").

Note that paragraph (a)(6) is limited to merger of multiple inchoate offenses that arise from the "same act or course of conduct." This is in contrast to the Model Penal Code approach, which appears to categorically preclude multiple liability for more than one general inchoate crime directed towards a single criminal objective, even where the convictions rest upon separate courses of conduct. See Model Penal Code § 5.05(3) (merger for multiple inchoate crimes whenever they rest upon "conduct designed to commit or to culminate in the commission of the same crime") (italics added); ROBINSON, supra note 3, at 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 84 ("Apparently the drafters [of the Model Penal Code] believe that . . . where there are two inchoate offenses arising out of separate courses of conduct directed toward the same substantive offense there is only one harm."). If this reading of the Model Penal Code is accurate, then subsection 5.05(3) would dictate that (for example) where X unsuccessfully attempts to murder V in 2015, and thereafter unsuccessfully attempts to murder V again (or, alternatively, unsuccessfully solicits Y to murder V) in 2018, X cannot be convicted for more than one general inchoate crime. ROBINSON, supra note 3, at 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 84.

Given the unintuitive nature of this outcome, various jurisdictions appear have revised this aspect of the Model Penal Code to incorporate a "same course of conduct" requirement. See, e.g., Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 506.110(3) ("A person may not be convicted of more than one (1) [general inchoate offense] for a single course of conduct designed to consummate in the commission of the same crime."); State v. Badillo, 317 P.3d 315, 321 (Or. Ct. App. 2013) ("[T]he commission intended [the Oregon Criminal Code] to prevent multiple convictions for attempt, solicitation, and conspiracy on the basis of a defendant's single course of conduct, as opposed to preventing multiple convictions for multiple instances of one or another of the inchoate crimes."). The RCC accomplishes the same through paragraph (a)(6), which effectively limits merger of multiple inchoate offenses to situations where the underlying convictions share a relatively close temporal/substantive relationship to one another. Compare, e.g., State v. Gonzales-Gutierrez, 171 P.3d 384 (Or. Ct. App. 2007) (merging convictions of attempt, solicitation, and conspiracy to commit murder based on a series of phone conversations had between the defendant and the same police officer posing as a hit man), with State v. Badillo, 317 P.3d 315, 321 (Or. Ct. App. 2013) (upholding separate convictions for two the general inchoate offenses "are designed to culminate in commission of "[d]ifferent offenses that are related to one another in the manner described in paragraphs (a)(1)-(a)(4) of this section."[32] In the first situation, subparagraph (a)(6)(A) requires merger for engaging in various forms of preparation to commit the same offense whenever the convictions involve the same criminal objective.[33] In the second situation, subparagraph (a)(6)(B) ensures that the outcome is the same although the general inchoate offenses are oriented towards completion of different target offenses, provided that those target offenses: (1) involve the same criminal objective; and (2) would otherwise be subject to merger under any of the other principles specified in subsection (a).[34]

Subsection (b) establishes three main procedural aspects of the merger analysis set forth in RCC § 22E-214. First, § 22E-214 does not constrain the number of offenses over which the fact finder may deliberate. Rather, the trier of fact may find the defendant guilty of any number of offenses that merge under section 214 for which the requirements of liability have been met.[35] Second, under paragraph (b)(1) a judge can merge offenses that merge under subsection (a) prior to sentencing by vacating all but one of the convictions using the rule of priority in subsection (c) of the section.[36] Third, under paragraph (b)(2) counts of solicitation because the defendant solicited two separate individuals, several days apart); State v. Habibullah 373 P.3d 1259, 1263 (Or. Ct. App. 2016) (upholding multiple convictions for conspiracy/solicitation to commit murder and attempt to murder the same victim because conduct that formed the basis of the conspiracy/solicitation convictions occurred a month after the attempt).

---

[32] RCC § 22E-2214(a)(6)(B); see also sources cited supra note 27 (providing support for comparable principle specified in subparagraph (a)(5)(B)).

[33] Where, for example, X persuades Y to attempt to kill V with a gun, but Y is subsequently intercepted by police immediately prior to pulling the trigger, X has satisfied the requirements of liability for attempted armed murder (as an accomplice to Y), solicitation of armed murder, and conspiracy to commit armed murder. However, subparagraph (a)(6)(A) precludes imposing multiple convictions upon X for more than one of these three offenses. Note that this rule would not apply if the charges for attempted armed murder, solicitation of armed murder, and conspiracy to commit armed murder involved different victims.

[34] Where, for example, X persuades Y to attempt to kill V with a gun, but Y is subsequently intercepted by police immediately prior to pulling the trigger, X has satisfied the requirements of liability for attempted armed murder (as an accomplice to Y), solicitation of (unarmed) murder, and conspiracy to commit aggravated assault. However, subparagraph (a)(6)(B) precludes imposing multiple convictions upon X for more than one of these three offenses because armed murder, murder, and aggravated assault satisfy the general merger principles set forth in paragraphs (a)(1)-(4). Note that this rule would not apply if the charges for attempted armed murder, solicitation of murder, and conspiracy to commit aggravated assault involved different victims.

[35] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 1.07 ("When the same conduct of a defendant may establish the commission of more than one offense, the defendant may be prosecuted for each such offense. He may not, however, be convicted of more than one offense if . . . ."); Alaska Stat. Ann. § 11.31.140(d) ("[The merger principle set forth in this] section does not bar inclusion of multiple counts in a single indictment or information charging commission of a crime defined by AS 11.31.100-11.31.120 and commission of the crime that is the object of the attempt, conspiracy, or solicitation.").

[36] This would be a change compared to current court practice, described immediately below. See also State v. Cloutier, 286 Or. 579, 601–03, 596 P.2d 1278, 1289–91 (1979) ("A trial court might pronounce a judgment of conviction on each of the charges, indicating the sentence he would impose if the conviction stood alone but suspending its execution (or suspending imposition of sentence), and accompany the judgment on each but the gravest charge with an order that the judgment is vacated by its own terms whenever the time for appeal has elapsed or the judgment appealed from has been affirmed.").

In the event that one or more convictions is dismissed by the trial court pursuant to section 214 before sentencing, that dismissal shall not be considered an acquittal on the merits, such that a vacated a judge can proceed to enter a judgment of conviction for each of the offenses that merge and sentence the actor for those offenses. However, if the sentencing court proceeds under paragraph (b)(2), the sentences for offenses that merge must run concurrent to one another[37] and all but, at most,[38] one of the convictions must be vacated using the rule of priority in subsection (c) of this section after the expiration of appellate rights or affirmance on appeal.[39]

When applying the procedure in subsection (b), the sentencing judge confronts questions of law regarding the manner in which the statutory elements of criminal offenses relate to one another under subsecton (a).[40] The determination of whether those principles preclude multiple liability for two or more substantially related offenses should generally be conducted without regard to the underlying facts of a case. [41] It is expected that once a court determines that § 22E-214 requires merger of two or more offenses, that determination would be treated as binding on all future cases involving the same offenses.[42]

Notably, the principles of merger set forth in § 22E-214 do not have legal import for the resolution of issues that go beyond determining when the legislature has authorized the imposition of multiple liability for substantially related offenses prosecuted in a single proceeding. This includes, but is not limited to, determining: (1) when successive conviction may be re-instated in appropriate circumstances (e.g., where the remaining offense is overturned on appeal for reasons that do not effect the vacated offense).

---

[37] Concurrent sentencing helps ensure that a defendant does not serve additional time pending an appeal, or waiting for the time to appeal to have expired.

[38] The language "at most" recognizes the possibility that an appellate court may overturn all convictions that otherwise would merge under RCC § 22E-214.

[39] This clarification is intended to provide D.C. Superior Court judges with sufficient leeway to continue their current practice of entering judgment on all counts for which the defendant has been convicted, thereby leaving merger issues to the D.C. Court of Appeals for resolution on direct review, should they so choose. See, e.g., Garris v. United States, 491 A.2d 511, 514–15 (D.C. 1985); Warrick v. United States, 528 A.2d 438, 443 n.6 (D.C. 1987); Fuller v. United States, 407 F.2d 1199, 1224–25 (D.C. Cir. 1967).

[40] Michael T. Cahill, Offense Grading and Multiple Liability: New Challenges for A Model Penal Code Second, 1 OHIO ST. J. CRIM. L. 599, 607 (2004) (observing that comparable merger principles "would present issues of law regarding how defined offenses relate to each other," and arguing that, because "a court's finding regarding the appropriateness of multiple convictions for two separate offenses could be binding on all future cases involving those same offenses," this would enhance the "predictability, stability, and evenhandedness in the imposition of multiple liability.") (discussing Proposed Ill. Crim. Code § 254(1)(a)); see, e.g., Commentary on Proposed Del. Crim. Code § 210(a).

[41] Note that where the merger analysis involves one or more offenses comprised of alternative elements, then a limited factual inquiry will be necessary to determine the particular basis upon which a conviction for that offense is based (e.g., was the defendant convicted of felony murder-rape or felony murder-burglary). See supra notes and accompanying text discussing appropriate treatment of alternative elements.

[42] Provided, of course, that they arise from the same act or course of conduct. See, e.g., Cahill, 1 OHIO ST. J. CRIM. L. at 607 ("[Under this kind of approach to merger] any bar on multiple convictions would govern only subsequent cases where those two offenses were again based on the same conduct. Multiple convictions for the two offenses would remain acceptable where they are not both based on the same conduct.") (discussing Proposed Ill. Crim. Code § 254(1)(a)); see, e.g., Commentary on Proposed Del. Crim. Code § 210(a).

This same principle of stare decisis also applies where one of the offenses under consideration is comprised of alternative elements of a nature described in subsection (c). While a limited factual analysis may be necessary to determine the particular paragraph of an alternative element statute upon which a criminal conviction rests, a court's holding concerning the relationship between an offense committed pursuant to that paragraph and another offense would still be binding on all future cases involving those same provisions.

prosecutions for substantially related offenses may be brought[43]; (2) when a jury may be instructed on an offense that was not specifically charged in the indictment[44]; and (3) when an appellate court may direct the entry of judgment for an offense over which the jury never deliberated.[45]

Subsection (c) establishes a rule of priority for determining which of two or more merging convictions should be vacated and which should remain.[46] It is comprised of two different principles. The first dictates that where, among any group of merging offenses, one has a higher authorized maximum term of incarceration than the others, the conviction for that offense is the one that should remain. The second proscribes that where, among any group of merging offenses, two or more offenses have the same, highest statutory maximum term of incarceration, then the determination of which among those more severely punished offenses should remain is submitted to the court's discretion.

Subsection (d) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. RCC § 22E-214 codifies, clarifies, changes, and fills in gaps reflected in District law governing merger.

The District's current approach to merger is, as a matter of substantive policy, piecemeal, frequently ambiguous, and unduly narrow. The D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA), construing D.C. Code § 23-112,[47] employs the elements test as the primary basis

---

[43] See, e.g., Grady v. Corbin, 495 U.S. 508, 509, overruled by United States v. Dixon, 509 U.S. 688 (1993) ("Successive prosecutions, whether following acquittals or convictions, raise concerns that extend beyond [] the possibility of an enhanced sentence" implicated by merger/multiple punishment); Anne Bowen Poulin, Double Jeopardy and Multiple Punishment: Cutting the Gordian Knot, 77 U. Colo. L. Rev. 595, 646 (2006) (["T]he courts must distinguish between the analysis appropriate for double jeopardy claims based on successive prosecution, and that appropriate for claims of multiple punishment. Although conflating the two types of analysis has not led to excessive protection against punishment, it has eroded double jeopardy protection against successive prosecution, making it vulnerable to legislative fragmentation of offenses.").

[44] See, e.g., Com. v. Jones, 590 Pa. 356, 369-70 (2006) ("When a defendant may be convicted on a charge absent from the indictment, concerns of fundamental fairness dictate that analysis of potential greater and lesser included offenses proceed in a more narrow fashion than when sentencing merger is at issue."); Matter of D.B.H., 549 A.2d 351, 353 (D.C. 1988) ("[W]hether or not simple assault is a lesser-included offense of a charged robbery in general, it cannot be considered, for purposes of providing sufficient notice to the accused, a lesser-included offense of the robbery charged here."); WAYNE R. LAFAVE ET AL., 6 CRIM. PROC. § 24.8(e)) (4th ed. Westlaw 2019)) ("No area of law relating to jury instructions has created more confusion than that governing when a court may or must put before the jury for its decision a lesser-included offense, that is, an offense not specifically charged in the accusatory pleading that is both lesser in penalty and related to the offense specifically charged.").

[45] See, e.g., Rutledge v. United States, 517 U.S. 292, 306 (1996) ("Consistent with the views expressed by the District of Columbia Circuit, federal appellate courts appear to have uniformly concluded that they may direct the entry of judgment for a lesser included offense when a conviction for a greater offense is reversed on grounds that affect only the greater offense.") (citing, e.g., 8A J. MOORE, FEDERAL PRACTICE ¶ 31.03[5], and n. 54 (2d ed. 1995)).

[46] See, e.g., 42 Pa.C.S. § 9765 ("Where crimes merge for sentencing purposes, the court may sentence the defendant only on the higher graded offense."); Cal. Penal Code § 654 ("An act or omission that is punishable in different ways by different provisions of law shall be punished under the provision that provides for the longest potential term of imprisonment, but in no case shall the act or omission be punished under more than one provision.");

[47] D.C. Code § 23-112 ("A sentence imposed on a person for conviction of an offense shall, unless the court imposing such sentence expressly provides otherwise, run consecutively to any other sentence imposed on such person for conviction of an offense, whether or not the offense (1) arises out of another transaction, or (2) arises out of the same transaction and requires proof of a fact which the other does not.").

for determining whether to impose multiple liability for substantially related offenses arising from the same course of conduct. The court's application of the elements test to address this issue is at times inconsistent, and, in many situations where there is no clear legislative intent, may have the unintended effect of authorizing the imposition of disproportionate punishment. RCC § 22E-214 replaces this judicially developed approach with a comprehensive set of substantive merger policies. Many of these policies are based on current District law, and, therefore, are primarily intended to clarify the mechanics of merger analysis for the purpose of enhancing the consistency and efficiency of District law. However, a few of these policies broaden the District's current approach to merger for purposes of enhancing the proportionality of the D.C. Code.

As a matter of judicial administration, the District's law of merger is currently treated as the sole province of appellate, rather than trial, courts. D.C. Superior Court judges, based on explicit instructions from the DCCA, appear to systematically ignore merger issues at sentencing, leaving them for appellate resolution. This approach brings with it both efficiency gains as well as potential liberty costs. The RCC merger provisions do not resolve this tension. Paragraph (b)(2) enables the substantive policies set forth in subsections (a) to be implemented in a manner consistent with the District's current approach of not addressing merger issues at initial sentencing, without precluding future administrative changes should District courts deem them to be appropriate.

RCC § 22E-214(a): Relation to Current District Law on Substantive Merger Policy. Subsection (a) provides a clear and comprehensive body of substantive merger policies that are in some ways consistent with and in others ways broader than the District's current approach.

It is well established under District law that the Double Jeopardy Clause of the U.S. Constitution prohibits the imposition of multiple punishments when—but only when—doing so would conflict with legislative intent.[48] As a result, the DCCA views "legislative intent [as the] key in determining whether offenses merge, as 'the question of what punishments are constitutionally permissible is not different from the question of what punishments the Legislative Branch intended to be imposed.'"[49] And, in the District, "the Blockburger rule, albeit in less than felicitous language, has been codified as an express declaration of legislative intent" as to merger under D.C. Code § 23-112.[50]

---

[48] E.g., Byrd v. United States, 598 A.2d 386, 388 (D.C. 1991) (en banc) ("The role of the constitutional guarantee [against double jeopardy] is limited to assuring that the court does not exceed its legislative authorization by imposing multiple punishments for the same offense.") (quoting Albernaz v. United States, 450 U.S. 333, 334 (1981)); Robinson v. United States, 608 A.2d 115, 115 (D.C. 1992); Lennon v. United States, 736 A.2d 208, 209 (D.C. 1999). Beyond this limitation on multiple punishments, the DCCA recognizes that the same double jeopardy guarantee has been said to "protect[] against a second prosecution for the same offense after acquittal," as well as a "second prosecution for the same offense after conviction." Byrd, 598 A.2d at 387 n.4 (quoting North Carolina v. Pearce, 395 U.S. 711, 717 (1969)).

[49] Young v. United States, 143 A.3d 751, 760 (D.C. 2016) (quoting Graure v. United States, 18 A.3d 743, 765 n.31 (D.C. 2011)). Because the Double Jeopardy Clause of the Fifth Amendment prohibits "multiple punishments for the same offense," Lennon v. United States, 736 A.2d 208, 209 (D.C. 1999), it "compels merger of duplicative convictions for the same offense, so as to leave only a single sentence for that single offense." McCoy v. United States, 890 A.2d 204, 216 (D.C. 2006).

[50] Byrd, 598 A.2d at 386 (internal quotations and citation omitted); see Blockburger v. United States, 284 U.S. 299, 301 (1932) ("[W]here the same act or transaction constitutes a violation of two distinct statutory provisions, the test to be applied to determine whether there are two offenses or only one, is whether each

The Blockburger rule, as applied to multiple convictions for different offenses prosecuted in a single proceeding, supports a rebuttable presumption of legislative intent[51] as to merger when (but only when) two basic requirements are met: (1) the convictions arise from the same act or course of conduct[52]; and (2) the underlying offenses upon which provision requires proof of a fact which the other does not."). The relevant statute, D.C. Code § 23-112, establishes that:

---

> A sentence imposed on a person for conviction of an offense shall, unless the court imposing such sentence expressly provides otherwise, run consecutively to any other sentence imposed on such person for conviction of an offense, whether or not the offense (1) arises out of another transaction, or (2) arises out of the same transaction and requires proof of a fact which the other does not.

In Whalen v. United States, the U.S. Supreme Court had the occasion to interpret this statute, observing that:

> The legislative history rather clearly confirms that Congress intended the federal courts to adhere strictly to the Blockburger test when construing the penal provisions of the District of Columbia Code. The House Committee Report expressly disapproved several decisions of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit that had not allowed consecutive sentences notwithstanding the fact that the offenses were different under the Blockburger test. See H.R. Rep. No. 91–907, p. 114 (1970). The Report restated the general principle that "whether or not consecutive sentences may be imposed depends on the intent of Congress." Ibid. But "[s]ince Congress in enacting legislation rarely specifies its intent on this matter, the courts have long adhered to the rule that Congress did intend to permit consecutive sentences . . . when each offense "'requires proof of a fact which the other does not,'" ibid., citing Blockburger v. United States, supra, and Gore v. United States, supra. The Committee Report observed that the United States Court of Appeals had "retreated from this settled principle of law" by requiring specific evidence of congressional intent to allow cumulative punishments, H.R. Rep. No.91–907, at 114, and the Report concluded as follows:
>
> > "To obviate the need for the courts to search for legislative intent, section 23–112 clearly states the rule for sentencing on offenses arising from the same transaction. For example, a person convicted of entering a house with intent to steal and stealing therefrom shall be sentenced consecutively on the crimes of burglary and larceny unless the judge provides to the contrary."
>
> We think that the only correct way to read § 23–112, in the light of its history and its evident purpose, is to read it as embodying the Blockburger rule for construing the penal provisions of the District of Columbia Code. Accordingly, where two statutory offenses are not the same under the Blockburger test, the sentences imposed "shall, unless the court expressly provides otherwise, run consecutively." And where the offenses are the same under that test, cumulative sentences are not permitted, unless elsewhere specially authorized by Congress.

445 U.S. 684, 692–93 (1980).

[51] Because the Blockburger rule merely creates a presumption of legislative intent, the results it yields can always be overcome by 'a clearly contrary legislative intent' manifested by the D.C. Council. Sanchez-Rengifo v. United States, 815 A.2d 351, 354 (D.C. 2002).

[52] Hanna v. United States, 666 A.2d 845, 853 (D.C. 1995); Allen v. United States, 580 A.2d 653, 657 (D.C. 1990)); Villines v. United States, 320 A.2d 313, 314 (D.C. 1974); Logan v. United States, 460 A.2d 34, 36 (D.C. 1983).

the convictions are based entail proof of the same facts.[53] The DCCA has expounded upon the contours of each of these requirements through a robust and well-developed body of case law.

Whether, for purposes of the first requirement, multiple convictions arise from separate acts or transaction depends upon an analysis of three factors. The first factor is the appropriate unit of prosecution, which is "generally a question of what the legislature intended to be the act or course of conduct prohibited by the statute for purposes of a single conviction and sentence."[54] The second factor is the duration of the conduct in question; the analysis here focuses on whether there was an "appreciable length of time 'between the acts [alleged to] constitute the [multiple] offenses.'"[55] The third factor asks whether "a subsequent criminal act is '[] not the result of the original impulse, but a fresh one.'"[56] Judicial evaluation of the first factor is purely a matter of law; the inquiry focuses on legislative intent as discerned from the traditional sources of statutory meaning.[57] Judicial evaluation of the latter two factors, in contrast, requires application of "a fact-based approach,"[58] which revolves around whether the defendant reached a "fork-in-the-road."[59]

The second requirement, which is the crux of the Blockburger rule, incorporates what is often referred to as the elements test.[60] The central question presented by the elements test is whether, "where the same act or transaction constitutes a violation of two different statutory provisions, 'each provision require[] proof of a fact which the other does not[?]'"[61] If, based on consideration of the statutory elements of two offenses for which

---

[53] Alfaro v. United States, 859 A.2d 149, 155 (D.C. 2004) (quoting Blockburger, 284 U.S. at 301).

[54] Brown v. State, 535 A.2d 485, 489 (Md. 1988); see, e.g., Briscoe v. United States, 528 A.2d 1243, 1245 (D.C. 1987) ("[W]e must determine whether the Council of the District of Columbia intended to permit multiple punishments for possession of the same drug at the same time and at approximately the same place."). Sometimes, however, the unit of prosecution centers around the kind of interest protected by the statute. For example, in Vines v. United States, the defendant damaged two cars in a single course of conduct, and was later convicted of two counts of MDP. 70 A.3d 1170, 1176-77 (D.C. 2013), as amended (Sept. 19, 2013). On appeal, the defendant argued that this was inappropriate because the MDP statute contemplated the destruction of "property" in a more general sense; thus, because there was only one property-destroying act, there should only be one conviction. Id. A majority of the panel rejected this argument, looking to the legislative intent underlying the statute and finding that "the definition contemplates that an injury to each new victim will constitute a separate offense." Id.

[55] Hanna, 666 A.2d at 853 (quoting Blockburger, 284 U.S. at 303).

[56] Hanna, 666 A.2d at 853. See, e.g., Maddox v. United States, 745 A.2d 284, 294 (D.C. 2000) (Therefore, whether [appellant]'s convictions of armed robbery and assault with a deadly weapon merge, depends on "whether there was any evidence that [appellant] reached a 'fork in the road,' leading to a 'fresh impulse' which resulted in a separate offense."); Bullock v. United States, 709 A.2d 87, 91 (D.C. 1998) (defendant properly convicted both of distribution of drugs and subsequent possession with intent to distribute where defendant reached "fork in the road" but remained on scene as result of "renewed criminal impulse").

[57] See, e.g., Briscoe, 528 A.2d at 1245.

[58] Morris v. United States, 622 A.2d 1116, 1130 (D.C.1993); Gray v. United States, 544 A.2d 1255, 1257–59 (D.C. 1988); Sanchez-Rengifo v. United States, 815 A.2d 351, 354 (D.C. 2002); Spain v. United States, 665 A.2d 658, 661 (D.C. 1995); Cullen v. United States, 886 A.2d 870, 873 (D.C. 2005).

[59] Hanna, 666 A.2d at 853 ("If at the scene of the crime the defendant can be said to have realized that he [or she] has come to a fork in the road, and nevertheless decides to invade a different interest, then his [or her] successive intentions make him [or her] subject to cumulative punishment, and he [or she] must be treated as accepting that risk, whether in fact he [or she] knows of it or not.") (quoting Owens v. United States, 497 A.2d 1086, 1095 (D.C. 1985)).

[60] Alfaro, 859 A.2d at 155.

[61] Robinson v. United States, 608 A.2d 115, 115 (D.C. 1992) (quoting Blockburger, 284 U.S. at 304).

the defendant has been convicted, this question can be answered in the negative, then the operative assumption is that the legislature intended to preclude the imposition of multiple liability and punishments, such that one of the convictions must be vacated.[62] Where, in contrast, an affirmative answer can be rendered—i.e. because element analysis indicates that both offenses of conviction require proof of at least one distinct fact—then it is presumed that the legislature intended to authorize multiple liability and punishments.[63] Judicial application of the elements test is generally understood by the DCCA to entail a pure legal analysis, which is to be conducted without regard to the underlying facts of a case. [64]

This wholly legal approach to the elements test is to be contrasted with the "fact-based analysis in determining whether multiple punishments [are] permissible" frequently applied by the DCCA prior to its en banc decision in Byrd v. United States.[65] Under this broader approach to merger, the DCCA would look beyond "abstract consideration of the statutes involved or the wording of the indictment,"[66] and instead look to the proof presented at trial to assess whether there exists a "significant difference in the nature of

---

[62] See, e.g., Briscoe, 528 A.2d at 1245.

[63] Hanna, 666 A.2d at 854; Sanchez-Rengifo v. United States, 815 A.2d 351, 354 (D.C. 2002).

[64] See, e.g., Spain v. United States, 665 A.2d 658, 662 (D.C. 1995) ("Whether two charged offenses merge into one is not for the jury to decide; rather, it is a question of law for the court.") (citing Hagins v. United States, 639 A.2d 612, 617 (D.C. 1994)); Hanna, 666 A.2d at 859 ("[W]hen more than one offense is founded on the same conduct the merger analysis must focus exclusively on the elements of the various offenses and not on the facts introduced to prove those elements."); Alfaro, 859 A.2d at 155 ("In applying the Blockburger test, the focus is on the statutorily-specified elements of each offense and not the specific facts of a given case.").

[65] 598 A.2d 386, 390 (D.C. 1991); see, e.g., Arnold v. United States, 467 A.2d 136, 138-39 (D.C. 1983) (holding that a defendant could not be punished both for grand larceny and unauthorized use of a motor vehicle, and "observing that with respect to the specific factual situation in that case, the conviction for unauthorized use included proof of no fact not also adduced on the larceny charge"); Worthy v. United States, 509 A.2d 1157 (D.C. 1986) (applying the same fact-based analysis to convictions for unauthorized use of a vehicle and receiving stolen property, deeming Arnold "dispositive").

The District's pre-Byrd application of the "doctrine of merger and lesser included offenses" was based upon the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit's decision in United States v. Whitaker, which the DCCA in Hall v. United States summarized as follows:

> In Whitaker the court held that unlawful entry was a lesser included offense of burglary for the purpose of allowing the defendant to request a jury instruction on unlawful entry, despite the fact that unlawful entry need not have necessarily been established as an element of burglary under the D.C. Code or under the indictment of that case. The Whitaker court reasoned that because unauthorized entry was an element of the vast majority of burglaries it should be considered a lesser included offense where the facts of the particular case indicate that it was a lesser included offense. The court added, however, that its novel analysis of lesser included offenses was given with the caveat that there must also be an inherent relationship between the greater and lesser offenses, i.e. they must relate to the protection of the same interests, and must be so related that in the general nature of these crimes, though not necessarily invariably, proof of the lesser offense is necessarily presented as part of the showing of the commission of the greater offense.

343 A.2d 35, 39 (D.C. 1975) (discussing 447 F.2d 314, 319 (D.C. Cir. 1971)).

[66] Hall, 343 A.2d at 39.

[the defendant's conduct]."[67] In Byrd, however, the en banc court opted to abandon this fact-sensitive analysis, reasoning that prior DCCA cases "erred in concluding that since the facts as actually presented by the government to prove one charge were necessarily used by the government to prove the second charge, the two charges constituted the 'same offense.'"[68] Under Blockburger, as the Byrd court concludes, "the focus should have been on the statutory elements of the two distinct charges," that is, "whether each statutory provision required proof of an element that the other did not."[69]

Although the general applicability of the elements test is clear in principle, District courts frequently struggle to determine when the standard is satisfied as a matter of course.[70] To help clarify matters, the DCCA frequently relies on the concept of a "lesser included offense" (LIO) to guide its analysis.[71] The general rule applied by District courts is that two offenses merge when (but only when) one of two offenses is an LIO of the other.[72] One offense is an LIO of another, in turn, if "the elements of the lesser offense are a subset of the elements of the charged offense."[73] Practically speaking, this means that Offense X is only an LIO of Offense Y if it is literally impossible to commit Offense Y without necessarily also committing Offense X under any set of facts.[74] Where application of this comparative analysis leads to the conclusion that one of two convictions is an LIO of the other, then "the trial court has but one course, to vacate the lesser-included offense," thereby imposing liability and punishment for the greater, more serious offense.[75]

---

[67] Arnold, 467 A.2d at 139 ("In this case there appears to be no significant difference in the nature of appellant's use of the vehicle with regard to the unauthorized use conviction, which might have distinguished it from his use and possession of the vehicle with regard to grand larceny. Unauthorized use required no proof beyond that required for conviction of grand larceny.").

[68] 598 A.2d at 390.

[69] Id.

[70] See, e.g., Rose v. United States, 49 A.3d 1252 (D.C. 2012); Alfaro v. United States, 859 A.2d 149 (D.C. 2004); Mungo v. United States, 772 A.2d 240 (D.C. 2001); see also Byrd, 598 A.2d at 390 ("We recognize that legitimate questions may arise at times with respect to the manner in which the Blockburger test is to be applied in a given case.").

[71] See, e.g., Alfaro, 859 A.2d at 155; Lee v. United States, 668 A.2d 822, 825 (D.C. 1995).

[72] See, e.g., Alfaro, 859 A.2d at 155; Lee, 668 A.2d at 825.

[73] Alfaro, 859 A.2d at 155 (quoting Schmuck v. United States, 489 U.S. 705, 716 (1989)); Mungo, 772 A.2d at 245 (D.C. 2001) ("the statutory elements of the lesser offense are contained within those of the greater charged offense").

[74] Alfaro, 859 A.2d at 155 ("[T]o constitute a lesser-included offense, 'the lesser [offense] must be such that it is impossible to commit the greater without first having committed the lesser.'") (quoting Schmuck, 489 U.S. at 719).

[75] Mooney v. United States, 938 A.2d 710, 724 (D.C. 2007) ("[W]here the illegality of multiple punishments results from convictions of a greater and a lesser-included offense, the double jeopardy bar is fully addressed, and the illegal sentence corrected, by merging the lesser into the greater offense so that only the latter remains . . . ."); Franklin v. United States, 392 A.2d 516, 519 n.3 (D.C. 1978) ("[W]here an appellant has been convicted of both the crime and a lesser included offense, the appropriate appellate remedy is vacation of the lesser included offense.") (citing Franey v. United States, 382 A.2d 1019, 1021 (D.C. 1978)); see, e.g., In re T.M., 155 A.3d 400, 408 (D.C. 2017) ("Appellant's conviction for felony assault . . . merges with her conviction for AAWA because felony assault is a lesser-included offense of AAWA.").

It's worth noting that for a significant amount of time "it was generally thought that the prohibition against multiple punishments applied only to consecutive sentencing." Byrd, 598 A.2d at 393. This view changed, however, in Doepel v. United States, where the DCCA recognized that "even a concurrent sentence is an element of punishment because of potential collateral consequences" and accordingly forbade concurrent sentences for both felony murder and the underlying felony. 434 A.2d 449, 459 (D.C. 1981). And "[t]his interpretation of the result that follows from a Blockburger analysis of multiple punishments was, four

An illustrative example of two crimes that share this kind of element-based, LIO relationship are the District's offenses of second degree murder[76] and murder of a police officer (MPO).[77] Both offenses require a malicious killing; however, MPO, but not second degree murder, requires that the victim be a police officer.[78] Therefore, it cannot be said that each offense "requires proof of a fact which the other does not."[79] Rather, MPO requires proof of the same facts as second degree murder, plus at least one additional fact, namely, that the victim be a police officer.[80] As a result, it impossible to commit MPO without also committing second degree murder. It therefore follows that second degree murder is an LIO of MPO. Under the elements test, then, multiple convictions for both offenses, if based on the same act or course of conduct committed against a single victim, would merge at sentencing, thereby leaving a single conviction for only the greater offense, MPO.

Many (if not most) of the substantially overlapping offenses contained in the D.C. Code do not share this kind of element-based, LIO relationship, and, therefore, are not subject to a presumption of merger under the Blockburger rule. A comparison of the District's carjacking and robbery statutes is illustrative.

The District's robbery statute applies a fifteen year statutory maximum to any person who, "by force or violence, whether against resistance or by sudden or stealthy seizure or snatching, or by putting in fear, shall take from the person or immediate actual possession of another anything of value."[81] Similarly, the District's carjacking statute applies a twenty one year statutory maximum (and seven year mandatory minimum) to any person who "by force or violence, whether against resistance or by sudden or stealthy seizure or snatching, or by putting in fear, or attempts to do so, shall take from another person immediate actual possession of a person's motor vehicle . . . ."[82]

Comparing the elements of carjacking and robbery in Pixley v. United States, the DCCA ultimately concluded that the Blockburger rule supports the imposition of multiple liability and punishment for both offenses when based on the same act or course of conduct.[83] Central to the court's analysis is the theoretical possibility of satisfying the elements of carjacking without also satisfying the elements of robbery. True, "most carjackings" are likely to constitute robberies; however, this is not always the case.[84] years later, confirmed by the Supreme Court in Ball v. United States." Byrd, 598 A.2d at 393 (citing Ball v. United States, 470 U.S. 856 (1985) (because a separate conviction, even with a concurrent sentence, could have collateral consequences, the imposition of concurrent sentences "cannot be squared with Congress' intention")).

---

[76] D.C. Code § 22-2103 ("Whoever with malice aforethought . . . kills another, is guilty of murder in the second degree.")

[77] D.C. Code § 22-2106 ("Whoever, with deliberate and premeditated malice, and with knowledge or reason to know that the victim is a law enforcement officer or public safety employee, kills any law enforcement officer or public safety employee . . . .").

[78] Compare D.C. Code § 22-2103 with D.C. Code § 22-2106.

[79] Blockburger, 284 U.S. at 304.

[80] Note also that MPO requires proof that the malice was "deliberate and premeditated." D.C. Code § 22-2106.

[81] D.C. Code § 22-2801.

[82] D.C. Code § 22-2803(a)(1).

[83] Pixley v. United States, 692 A.2d 438, 440 (D.C. 1997).

[84] Id. at 440 (quoting Letter to the Chairperson of the Committee on the Judiciary from then-Corporation Counsel John Payton (November 17, 1992), at 1 (emphasis added)).

For example, it is possible to commit carjacking without also committing a robbery since robbery requires proof that the property have been carried away.[85] And, of course, it is possible to commit robbery without also committing carjacking since carjacking requires proof that the property at issue be a motor vehicle.[86] Accordingly, the DCCA concluded, the District's carjacking and robbery offenses do not merge under the elements test.[87]

The merger analysis reflected in both the Pixley decision and in many other areas of District law is consistent with the DCCA's frequent assertion that the elements test is to be conducted without regard to the government's theory of prosecution or the specific facts of a case. However, a close reading of DCCA case law post-Byrd reveals the periodic application of a broader, theory-specific/fact-sensitive approach to the elements test.

Illustrative is the District law pertaining to merger of robbery and assault. The DCCA has repeatedly held that convictions for robbery and assault merge.[88] However, this conclusion is contrary to the results generated by a strict application of the elements test, which indicates that each "requires proof of a fact which the other does not."[89] For example, the District's assault offense requires "the unlawful use of force causing injury to another or the attempt to cause injury with the present ability to do so," without regard to whether a theft was involved.[90] In contrast, the District's robbery offense requires the theft of property in the victim's immediate actual possession, without regard to whether an assault was involved (i.e. a taking by "stealthy seizure" or "snatching" will suffice).[91] It

---

[85] Id. ("[W]hile robbery requires a carrying away or asportation, carjacking by its terms does not; as the government points out, it can be committed by putting a gun to the head of the person in possession and ordering the person out of the car.").

[86] Pixley, 692 A.2d at 440 ("Plainly carjacking requires proof of an element that robbery does not: the taking of a person's motor vehicle.").

[87] Id. The Pixley court also observed the inclusion of the culpable mental state of recklessness and an alternative attempts element in the carjacking statute to provide additional reasons weighing against merger. See id.

[88] Simms v. United States, 634 A.2d 442, 447 (D.C. 1993); In re Z.B., 131 A.3d 351, 355 (D.C. 2016) ("[I]t is not possible to commit robbery without also committing assault, and assault accordingly merges as a lesser-included offense."); Beaner v. United States, 845 A.2d 525, 540–41 (D.C. 2004) ("ADW is a lesser included offense of armed robbery when the assault is committed in order to effectuate the robbery."); In re T.H.B., 670 A.2d 895, 899 (D.C. 1996) (assault with intent to rob LIO of robbery). But see Matter of D.B.H., 549 A.2d 351, 353 (D.C. 1988) ("[W]hether or not simple assault is a lesser-included offense of a charged robbery in general, it cannot be considered, for purposes of providing sufficient notice to the accused, a lesser-included offense of the robbery charged here."). For pre-Byrd case law, see, for example, Rogers v. United States, 566 A.2d 69, 71 n.3 (D.C. 1989) (assault LIO of robbery); Norris v. United States, 585 A.2d 1372, 1375 (D.C. 1991) (assault with a dangerous weapon LIO of armed robbery); Harling v. United States, 460 A.2d 571, 574 (D.C. 1983).

[89] Pearsall v. United States, 812 A.2d 953, 961 (D.C. 2002) (quoting Iannelli v. United States, 420 U.S. 770, 777 (1975)).

[90] Mungo v. United States, 772 A.2d 240, 245 (D.C. 2001).

[91] D.C. Code § 22-2801. Although the phrase "stealthy seizure or snatching" was included to address pickpockets, both the DCCA and U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit have interpreted such language to encompass any situation involving the "actual physical taking of the property from the person of another, even though [it is] without his knowledge and consent, and though the property [is] unattached to his person." Ulmer v. United States, 649 A.2d 295, 298 (D.C. 1994) (quoting Turner v. United States, 16 F.2d 535, 536 (D.C. Cir. 1926)). In practical effect, this means that a defendant can be convicted of robbery in the District "when the only force used is that necessary to [move property from Point A to Point B]." United States v. Mathis, 963 F.2d 399, 410 (D.C. Cir. 1992). Indeed, the DCCA has been particularly candid on this point, "consistently and for many years" holding that "any taking" of property in the immediate actual possession of another "is a robbery—not simply larceny." Leak v. United States, 757 A.2d 739, 742 (D.C. 2000).

is, therefore, theoretically possible to commit one of these offenses without necessarily committing the other.[92]

How, then, has the DCCA determined that the District's robbery and assault offenses are subject to merger? The legal basis for this conclusion is not clearly articulated in the case law. However, it seems to rest upon a theory-specific interpretation of robbery by assault (i.e. a taking "against resistance" rather than a taking by "sudden or stealthy seizure or snatching"), under which a fact-based consideration of how the robbery was committed effectively limits the scope of the elements being compared under Blockburger.[93]

This same theory-specific, fact-based approach also appears to be at the heart of District law governing merger of felony murder and the underlying offense. An abstract elemental analysis of felony murder and any particular offense that serves as the source of aggravation—e.g., rape, burglary, arson, etc.—weighs against merger given that each offense "requires proof of a fact which the other does not."[94] For example, felony murder requires proof of a killing, which is not required by any specific enumerated felony. In contrast, each of these specific enumerated felonies requires proof of facts that are not necessary to prove felony murder, since proof of the commission of a different enumerated felony may always suffice. As a result, it is always theoretically possible to commit felony murder without necessarily committing the offense that actually serves as the basis for the aggravation of the homicide in any particular case.

In the face of this abstract elemental analysis, the DCCA (as well as the U.S. Supreme Court interpreting District law[95]) has repeatedly held that "the underlying felony

---

[92] Indeed, the reported cases contain numerous examples of instances of where this has, in fact, occurred See cases cited supra note 95.

[93] That is, an approach that analyzes the elements of robbery by assault, which necessarily include the elements of assault. This has been described as a "pleadings," rather than "statutory," approach. See Model Penal Code § 1.07 cmt. at 130 ("[U]nder the statutory approach, the offense of battery would not be an included offense in a charge of robbery because an element of battery, the use of force, is not a necessary element of robbery; the threat of force suffices to establish robbery. Battery would, however, be included in a charge of robbery under the pleadings approach if the pleading alleged the use of force.").

[94] Pearsall v. United States, 812 A.2d 953, 961 (D.C. 2002) (quoting Iannelli v. United States, 420 U.S. 770, 777 (1975)).

[95] Whalen v. United States, 445 U.S. 684 (1980). The defendant in Whalen was "convicted in the Superior Court of the District of Columbia of rape, and of killing the same victim in the perpetration of rape." Id. at 685. Thereafter, the defendant appealed the convictions (and consecutive sentences) to the DCCA, arguing that "his sentence for the offense of rape must be vacated because that offense merged for purposes of punishment with the felony-murder offense, just as, for example, simple assault is ordinarily held to merge into the offense of assault with a dangerous weapon." Id. at 686. However, the DCCA "disagreed, finding that 'the societal interests which Congress sought to protect by enactment [of the two statutes] are separate and distinct,' and that 'nothing in th[e] legislation . . . suggest[s] that Congress intended' the two offenses to merge." Id. at 687 (quoting Whalen v. United States, 379 A.2d 1152, 1159 (D.C. 1977)). The U.S. Supreme Court subsequently granted the case "to consider the contention that the imposition of cumulative punishments for the two offenses was contrary to federal statutory and constitutional law." Id. at 687. The Whalen court ultimately answered this question in the affirmative, holding that "the District of Columbia Court of Appeals was mistaken in believing that Congress authorized consecutive sentences in the circumstances of this case." Id.; see also Doepel v. United States, 434 A.2d 449, 459 (D.C. 1981) (recognizing that "even a concurrent sentence is an element of punishment because of potential collateral consequences" and accordingly precluding concurrent sentences for both felony murder and the underlying felony).

will merge with [] felony murder."[96] Yet, as with the case law pertaining to merger of assault and robbery, the rationale for this outcome is not explicitly provided by the DCCA. Here again, though, the conclusion only seems supportable if one accounts for the government's theory of liability—as reflected in the charging document and/or facts proven at trial—to ensure that the underlying felony upon which merger is sought is, in fact, the basis for aggravation of homicide.

It's also worth noting that, in rare situations, the DCCA requires merger of overlapping offenses under circumstances that do not seem supportable under any interpretation of the elements test. Illustrative is the District law pertaining to merger of assault and attempt offenses. The DCCA has held that assault with a dangerous weapon is an LIO of, and therefore merges under Blockburger with, the while armed versions of both attempted robbery and attempted aggravated assault.[97] However, neither an abstract elemental analysis of the relevant statutes, nor a more context-sensitive evaluation of those elements in light of the government's theory of prosecution, would seem to support this conclusion. The lesser offense of assault with a dangerous weapon requires proof of a fact—an attempted battery, plus the present ability to commit, a battery[98]—that neither of the greater offenses of attempted robbery and attempted aggravated assault while armed require proof of. Therefore, the DCCA's decision to merge a conviction for assault with a dangerous weapon into both of these substantially overlapping offenses, while both intuitive and seemingly just, does not appear to be consistent with the results generated by a Blockburger analysis.[99] [96] Newman v. United States, 705 A.2d 246, 265 n.19 (D.C. 1997); see, e.g., Mooney, 938 A.2d at 721 n.11 ("Where two different persons are robbed, as here, [] the underlying felony conviction (armed robbery) merges into the felony murder conviction related to the same victim") (citing Green v. United States, 718 A.2d 1042, 1063 (D.C. 1998)); Spencer v. United States, 132 A.3d 1163, 1173–74 (D.C. 2016); Baker v. United States, 867 A.2d 988, 1010 (D.C. 2005); Bonhart v. United States, 691 A.2d 160, 164 (D.C. 1997).

---

[97] See, e.g., Morris v. United States, 622 A.2d 1116, 1129 (D.C. 1993) (holding, post-Byrd, that convictions for attempted armed robbery and assault with a dangerous weapon against the same victim as a part of the same criminal incident merge); Frye v. United States, 926 A.2d 1085, 1098 (D.C. 2005) (same for attempted aggravated assault while armed and assault with a dangerous weapon).

[98] Mungo, 772 A.2d at 245; see, e.g., Joiner-Die v. United States, 899 A.2d 762, 765 (D.C. 2006).

[99] In holding that assault with a dangerous weapon merges with attempted aggravated assault while armed, the Frye court deemed it "doubtful" that the dangerous proximity test applicable to criminal attempts under District law, as applied to the offense of aggravated assault, could be established by proof of "action short of some assaultive conduct." Frye, 926 A.2d at 1099 ("Short of some assaultive conduct or some other specific effort to inflict harm on the victim, it is difficult to discern any overt act which would cross the threshold from mere preparation to an actual attempt for [aggravated assault]."). However, it appears to be well established in both case law and commentary that the dangerous proximity test can indeed be satisfied prior to reaching the present ability requirement of assault. As the Maryland Court of Appeals has observed:

> Because the overt act necessary for an attempt is frequently an assault, the two crimes have a significant overlap. But the overlap is not complete, because an overt act can qualify as an attempt and yet not rise to the level of an assault. For example, an attempted poisoning would qualify as attempted murder, but it would not be an assault, especially if the poison did not come in contact with the victim. See Bittle v. State, 78 Md. 526, 28 A. 405 (1894). An aborted attempt to bomb an airplane would not be an assault, but it would be attempted murder. See People v. Grant, 105 Cal.App.2d 347, 233 P.2d 660 (1951). [] A person who fires a shot at an empty bed where he mistakenly believes the victim is sleeping has committed attempted murder, but not an assault. State v. Mitchell, 170 Mo. 633, 71 S.W. 175 (1902).

Even accounting for the DCCA's periodic de facto application of a broader approach to the elements test, there is little question that the overall scope of merger under District law is exceedingly narrow. Indeed, relatively minor variances between what are otherwise very similar offenses routinely provide District courts with the basis for rejecting claims of merger.[100] This is problematic given that the breadth of liability inherent in such an approach has the potential to be highly disproportionate.

The disproportionality problem is comprised of two different dimensions. The first relates to the disproportionate accumulation of convictions, namely, application of the elements test supports the imposition of multiple convictions for conduct that intuitively reflects a single crime. Second, but relatedly, this accumulation of convictions authorizes the imposition of a disproportionate sentence by effectively summing the statutory maxima of all non-merging offenses.

To illustrate both dimensions, consider again the DCCA's holding in Pixley v. United States that the District's carjacking and robbery offenses do not merge under the elements test.[101] In practical effect, this means that any person who participates in a successful carjacking in the District can always be convicted of both robbery and carjacking—notwithstanding the fact that, from a communicative perspective, a single conviction for carjacking would seem to suffice.[102] And it also means that any person who participates in a successful, unarmed carjacking in the District is subject to thirty-six years of incarceration (regardless of whether any force is actually applied[103]), which is three-and-a-half times the ten year statutory maximum facing someone who commits a "life-threatening or disabling" aggravated assault.[104]

The kinds of disproportionality inherent in the elements test stem from placing a singular focus on whether offenses require proof of different facts. This is problematic from the perspective of proportionate punishment because two substantially overlapping

---

Hardy v. State, 301 Md. 124, 129, 482 A.2d 474, 477 (1984); see, e.g., R. PERKINS, Criminal Law 578 (2d ed. 1969) ("The law of assault crystallizing at a much earlier day than the law of criminal attempt in general, is much more literal in its requirement of 'dangerous proximity to success' (actual or apparent) than is the law in regard to an attempt to commit an offense other than battery.")

[100] See, e.g., Pixley, 692 A.2d at 440; Allen v. United States, 697 A.2d 1, 2 (D.C. 1997) (rejecting claim of merger for UUV and carjacking, notwithstanding the fact that it would take "an improbable scenario" to commit a carjacking without also committing UUV); In re Z.B., 131 A.3d 351, 355 (D.C. 2016) (holding that a conviction for robbery does not merge with threats because "it is possible to commit a robbery without committing verbal threats—that is, through the use of violence or conduct that puts one in fear").

[101] Pixley, 692 A.2d at 440.

[102] Which is to say, that a carjacking conviction by itself would seem to express the nature of what has occurred where a single victim is robbed of his or her automobile. This is, of course, a subjective assertion; however, it seems relatively clear that the most common-sense interpretation of the phrase "X was convicted of both robbery and carjacking" is that X engaged in two separate criminal acts.

[103] Under District law, it appears that a non-violent theft of an automobile located near the owner constitutes carjacking. Young v. United States, 111 A.3d 13, 14 (D.C. 2015); see cases cited supra note 95 (discussing alternative element of "stealthy seizure" in the context of robbery).

[104] D.C. Code § 22-404.01(b) ("Any person convicted of aggravated assault shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or be imprisoned for not more than 10 years, or both."); Swinton v. United States, 902 A.2d 772, 775 (D.C. 2006) (observing that "[t]he injuries in [aggravated assault] cases usually [are] life-threatening or disabling. The victims typically require[] urgent and continuing medical treatment (and, often, surgery), carr[y] visible and long-lasting (if not permanent) scars, and suffer[] other consequential damage, such as significant impairment of their faculties. In short, these cases [are] horrific.").

offenses may require proof of slightly different facts, yet the gravamen of one offense—based upon the harm, culpability, and penalty it proscribes—may still duplicate that of the other.

Here again, a comparison of the District's robbery and carjacking offenses is illustrative. It is certainly true that a person can commit carjacking without necessarily committing robbery. Not only is asportation an essential element of robbery but not carjacking, but carjacking can be proven without regard to the defendant's extremely intoxicated state, which is not true of robbery.[105] These moral distinctions, while narrow, are meaningful: all else being equal, for example, a sober theft of property from a person is more blameworthy than a failed attempt at taking property while in an inebriated state. That said, the existence of these distinctions does not undercut a more general recognition that carjacking speaks to the same combined threat to personal security and property rights addressed by robbery.[106] The central difference is that carjacking affords additional protections—in the form of substantially increased minimum and maximum penalties—where the theft of property implicates an automobile.[107] (This conclusion is further bolstered by a recognition that the elements of an offense only set the floor of liability, while the statutory maximum is geared towards addressing more culpable/harmful variations of the same basic conduct—a characterization that seems to easily fit sober and successful carjackings.[108]) With that in mind, and assuming that the District's robbery and carjacking statutes are individually proportionate, then imposing multiple convictions and punishments for both offenses—where the gravamen of one duplicates that of the other—necessarily leads to the disproportionate duplication of liability and punishment.

It's important to highlight that the disproportionalities inherent in the application of the elements test go well beyond the double counting of similar harms, implicating triple counting and beyond. Consider, for example, the actual extent of liability and punishment confronting an actor who commits an unarmed carjacking in the District based on the following facts:

Unarmed Carjacking. X confronts Y while Y is sitting in her new Mercedes Benz at a gas station. X threatens to inflict physical harm upon Y unless she hands over her keys and immediately exits the vehicle. Y complies with the threat. X thereafter drives away in the vehicle without inflicting any physical harm on Y.

---

[105] See, e.g., Pixley, 692 A.2d at 440.

[106] See Report of the Committee on the Judiciary on Bill 10-16, Carjacking Prevention Amendment Act of 1993, at 2 (Feb. 25, 1993) (hereinafter "Committee Report") ("Background and Need" section of the legislative history notes that "[f]or the victim, carjacking is an especially traumatic experience"); id. at 3 (noting that the bill was passed a month after "[t]he issue of carjacking began to receive media and national attention as a result of the September, 1992 carjacking which ended with the murder of Pamela Basu, who died while being dragged in her car.")

[107] For example, the "Background and Need" section of the Committee Report notes that:

> [C]arjacking takes from its victims their mobility. Where a vehicle is used for employment or transportation to employment, a carjacker has stolen the victim's means of earning a living. Additionally, in a city of renters, their automobile probably represents the most valuable piece of property owned by victims. Even if properly insured, the cost of replacement may be too much to bear.

Id. at 3.

[108] Indeed, sober and successful carjackings are presumably the norm rather than the exception.

In this scenario, Defendant X has not only satisfied the requirements of liability for carjacking and robbery, but also, at least three other District offenses: (1) unauthorized use of a vehicle (UUV), which subjects a person who uses the motor vehicle of another without permission to a five year statutory maximum[109]; (2) felony threats, which subjects a person who makes verbal threats to do bodily harm to a twenty year statutory maximum; and (3) felony theft, which subjects a person who steals property worth more than $1,000 to a ten year statutory maximum.[110]

None of these offenses appear to be subject to a presumption of merger under the elements test. For example, the DCCA has explicitly determined that UUV does not merge with carjacking because UUV, but not carjacking, requires the actual use of the vehicle.[111] DCCA case law likewise suggests that felony threats would not merge with carjacking because "it is possible to commit a robbery without committing verbal threats—that is, through the use of violence or conduct that puts one in fear."[112] And DCCA case law also indicates that felony theft would not merge with carjacking because for felony theft, but not carjacking, the value of the property stolen must be greater than $1,000.[113] (One could imagine, for example, a carjacking implicating a vehicle worth less than $1,000). Under the elements test, then, it appears that Defendant X could be could be convicted of, and cumulatively sentenced for, all five offenses, with an accompanying aggregate statutory maxima of seventy-one years.

Now consider the further accumulation of convictions and aggregation of sentencing exposure that occurs under the elements test when a weapon is introduced into the fact pattern:

Armed Carjacking. X confronts Y while Y is sitting in her new Mercedes Benz at a gas station. X brandishes a firearm and threatens to shoot Y unless she hands over her keys and immediately exits the vehicle. Y complies with the threat. X thereafter drives away in the vehicle without inflicting any physical harm on Y.

In this scenario, Defendant X has satisfied the requirements of liability for at least seven different offenses: (1) armed carjacking, an aggravated form of carjacking that is subject to a forty year statutory maximum alongside a fifteen year mandatory minimum[114]; (2) robbery while armed, a combination offense subject to a forty five year statutory [109] D.C. Code § 22-3215(b) ("A person commits the offense of unauthorized use of a motor vehicle under this paragraph if, without the consent of the owner, the person takes, uses, or operates a motor vehicle, or causes a motor vehicle to be taken, used, or operated, for his or her own profit, use, or purpose.").

---

[110] D.C. Code § 22-3214(a) ("Any person convicted of theft in the first degree shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned for not more than 10 years, or both, if the value of the property obtained or used is $1,000 or more.").

[111] Allen, 697 A.2d at 2.

[112] In re Z.B., 131 A.3d at 353 (comparing robbery and misdemeanor threats, which has essentially the same elements as felony threats).

[113] See Foreman v. United States, 988 A.2d 505, 506 n.1 (D.C. 2010) (parties agreeing that felony theft is not a lesser-included offense of armed robbery).

[114] D.C. Code § 22-2803(b)(1) ("A person commits the offense of armed carjacking if that person, while armed with or having readily available any pistol or other firearm (or imitation thereof) or other dangerous or deadly weapon (including a sawed-off shotgun, shotgun, machine gun, rifle, dirk, bowie knife, butcher knife, switch-blade knife, razor, blackjack, billy, or metallic or other false knuckles), commits or attempts to commit the offense of carjacking."); id. at (b)(2) ("A person convicted of armed carjacking shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 and be imprisoned for a mandatory-minimum term of not less than 15 years and a maximum term of not more than 40 years, or both.").

maximum alongside a five to ten year mandatory minimum[115]; (3) felony theft (ten year statutory maximum); (4) felony threats (twenty year statutory maximum); (5) UUV (five year statutory maximum); (6) possession of a firearm during a crime of violence (PFCOV), which is subject to a fifteen year statutory maximum alongside a five year mandatory minimum[116]; and (7) carrying a pistol without a license (CPWL), which is subject to a five year statutory maximum.[117]

None of these offenses appear to be subject to a presumption of merger under the elements test. The first five offenses—armed carjacking, robbery while armed, felony theft, felony threats, and UUV—would not merge for the same reasons previously mentioned above in the context of an unarmed carjacking. Nor, however, would the PFCOV and CPWL convictions appear to be subject to merger under the elements test either. For example, PFCOV does not merge with either armed carjacking or robbery while armed because, as the DCCA has explained, "proof of possession does not necessarily prove armed with/readily available, and proof of a dangerous weapon does not necessarily prove a firearm or imitation thereof."[118] And CPWL does not merge with either of these offenses because, as the DCCA has explained, CPWL "presupposes an operable and unlicensed pistol outside one's own premises or place of business, but not proof that the pistol was used in a robbery or, for that matter, in any other crime."[119] Finally, the DCCA has determined that PFCOV does not merge with CPWL because, whereas "[t]he lack of a license is an element of CPWL, but not of PFCOV," the "commission of a crime of violence or a dangerous crime while in possession of a firearm or imitation firearm is an element of

---

[115] The applicable enhancement statute, D.C. Code § 22–4502, provides, in relevant part:

> (a) Any person who commits a crime of violence, or a dangerous crime in the District of Columbia when armed with or having readily available any pistol or other firearm . . . .
>
> (1) May, if such person is convicted for the first time of having so committed a crime of violence, or a dangerous crime in the District of Columbia, be sentenced, in addition to the penalty provided for such crime, to a period of imprisonment which may be up to, and including, 30 years for all offenses . . . [and] shall, if convicted of such offenses while armed with any pistol or firearm, be imprisoned for a mandatory-minimum term of not less than 5 years; [or]
>
> (2) [] shall, if convicted of [a] second offense while armed with any pistol or firearm, be imprisoned for a mandatory-minimum term of not less than 10 years . . . .

[116] D.C. Code § 22-4504(b) ("No person shall within the District of Columbia possess a pistol, machine gun, shotgun, rifle, or any other firearm or imitation firearm while committing a crime of violence or dangerous crime as defined in § 22-4501. Upon conviction of a violation of this paragraph, the person may be sentenced to imprisonment for a term not to exceed 15 years and shall be sentenced to imprisonment for a mandatory-minimum term of not less than 5 years and shall not be released on parole, or granted probation or suspension of sentence, prior to serving the mandatory-minimum sentence.")

[117] D.C. Code § 22-4504(a)(1) ("A person who violates this section by carrying a pistol, without a license issued pursuant to District of Columbia law or any deadly or dangerous weapon, in a place other than the person's dwelling place, place of business, or on other land possessed by the person, shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned for not more than 5 years, or both . . . .").

[118] Thomas v. United States, 602 A.2d 647, 655 (D.C. 1992); Stevenson v. United States, 760 A.2d 1034, 1035 (D.C. 2000) ("convictions for PFCV do not merge into the predicate armed offenses").

[119] Rouse v. United States, 402 A.2d 1218, 1221 (D.C. 1979).

PFCOV, but not of CPWL."[120] Pursuant to the elements test, therefore, it appears that Defendant X could be convicted of, and cumulatively sentenced for, all seven offenses, with an accompanying aggregate statutory maxima of over one hundred and thirty years alongside at least twenty five years of aggregated mandatory minima.[121]

It's important to point out that the breadth of liability inherent in the District's approach to merger, while illustrated in the context of a carjacking, is by no means limited to this particular context. Rather, application of the elements test to just about any area of District law is likely to reflect it. To take just one more example, consider the intersection between the elements test and general inchoate liability. Although the inchoate offenses of attempt, solicitation, and conspiracy are similarly targeted at preventing the consummation of criminal offenses, none appear to be subject to a presumption of merger under the elements test.

For example, the DCCA in Robinson v. United States specifically rejected the defendant's claim that conspiracy to commit robbery and attempted robbery merge, observing that:

> There are obvious differences between the two offenses, and each requires proof of a fact which the other does not. Conspiracy is an inchoate offense, the essence of which is an agreement to commit an unlawful act.[] To establish a conspiracy, the government must prove an unlawful agreement among two or more persons. No such proof is required for attempted robbery. To establish attempted robbery, the government must prove that the defendant committed an overt act which was done with the intent to commit the crime and which, but for the intervention of some cause preventing the carrying out of the intent, would have resulted in the commission of the crime. [] No such proof is required for conspiracy, for the "overt act" requirement as to that crime is far less exacting; a preparatory act, innocent in itself, may be sufficient.[122]

Likewise, although the DCCA has never explicitly addressed the issue, the same Blockburger-based rationale would similarly seem to support the imposition of multiple convictions and punishments for both solicitation and attempt, as well as solicitation and conspiracy, to commit a single crime of violence.[123] If true, however, this would mean that

---

[120] Ray v. United States, 620 A.2d 860, 865 (D.C. 1993)

[121] See, e.g., Hanna, 666 A.2d at 859 ("This court has expressly ruled [that the while armed enhancement and PFCOV "do not merge and, therefore, that a defendant subject to a mandatory minimum sentence as a result of a conviction under [PFCOV] may also be subject to the [while armed] enhancement provisions [in the D.C. Code] . . . At resentencing, therefore, appellants are subject to the mandatory minimum sentences required by [both]."") (citing Thomas, 602 A.2d at 654).

[122] Robinson v. United States, 608 A.2d 115, 116 (D.C. 1992); see, e.g., McCullough v. United States, 827 A.2d 48, 59 (D.C. 2003)

[123] The phrase "crime of violence," in turn, is defined in D.C. Code § 23-1331(4) to encompass the following offenses:

> aggravated assault; act of terrorism; arson; assault on a police officer (felony); assault with a dangerous weapon; assault with intent to kill, commit first degree sexual abuse, commit second degree sexual abuse, or commit child sexual abuse; assault with significant bodily injury; assault with intent to commit any other offense; burglary; carjacking; armed a person could—pursuant to the elements test—be convicted of, and sentenced for, attempt, conspiracy, and solicitation to commit the same crime of violence.[124]

Beyond authorizing the imposition of three felony convictions for an effort to accomplish a single criminal objective, the resulting aggregation of punishments could potentially impose a significantly greater level of sentencing exposure upon an actor who fails to accomplish a criminal objective than one who successfully completes it. A comparative analysis of the two following scenarios under District law is illustrative:

Scenario 1. X1 intentionally crushes Y's jaw with a sucker punch to the face. X1's goal is to inflict a horrific but non-fatal injury. X1 is successful; Y's injury requires urgent and continuing medical treatment, and results in visible and long-lasting scars.[125]

Scenario 2. X2 offers Z $1,000 to sucker punch Y in the face. X2's goal is to inflict a horrific but non-fatal injury. Z initially agrees, but, after making substantial preparations, later renounces, informing the police of the plan. X2 subsequently decides to carry out the plan himself. However, as X2 approaches Y, the police intercede, thereby preventing X2 from injuring Y.

In scenario 1, X1 has committed aggravated assault, and is therefore subject to ten years of potential punishment. In scenario 2, X2 came close, but ultimately failed, to commit aggravated assault. He does, however, satisfy the requirements of liability for attempted aggravated assault, and is therefore subject to five years of potential punishment for that general inchoate offense.[126] In addition, X2 has also satisfied the requirements of liability for two other general inchoate offenses: (1) solicitation of aggravated assault, which is subject to ten years of potential punishment[127]; and (2) conspiracy to commit aggravated assault, which is subject to ten years of potential punishment.[128] Assuming, pursuant to the elements test, that convictions for these general inchoate offenses do not merge, then X2 would be facing a maximum sentence of twenty-five years for his carjacking; child sexual abuse; cruelty to children in the first degree; extortion or blackmail accompanied by threats of violence; gang recruitment, participation, or retention by the use or threatened use of force, coercion, or intimidation; kidnapping; malicious disfigurement; manslaughter; manufacture or possession of a weapon of mass destruction; mayhem; murder; robbery; sexual abuse in the first, second, or third degrees; use, dissemination, or detonation of a weapon of mass destruction; or an attempt, solicitation, or conspiracy to commit any of the foregoing offenses.

---

[124] Robinson, 608 A.2d at 116.

[125] See Swinton, 902 A.2d at 775 (observing that "[t]he injuries in [aggravated assault] cases usually [are] life-threatening or disabling. The victims typically require[] urgent and continuing medical treatment (and, often, surgery), carr[y] visible and long-lasting (if not permanent) scars, and suffer[] other consequential damage, such as significant impairment of their faculties. In short, these cases [are] horrific.").

[126] D.C. Code § 22-404.01(c) ("Any person convicted of attempted aggravated assault shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or be imprisoned for not more than 5 years, or both.").

[127] D.C. Code § 22-2107(b) ("Whoever is guilty of soliciting a crime of violence as defined by § 23-1331(4), whether or not such crime occurs, shall be sentenced to a period of imprisonment not exceeding 10 years, a fine not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, or both.").

[128] D.C. Code § 22-1805a(2) ("If 2 or more persons conspire to commit a crime of violence as defined in § 23-1331(4), each shall be . . . imprisoned not more than 15 years nor the maximum imprisonment prescribed for the offense, the commission of which was the object of the conspiracy, whichever is less, or both.").

unsuccessful effort at harming Y. This outcome, when viewed in light of the ten years of potential incarceration confronting X1 for successfully causing the same injury to Y, seems highly disproportionate.

Prior to concluding the proportionality analysis in this section, one important caveat bears notice: the fact that the elements test authorizes the disproportionate aggregation of statutory maxima does not mean that the sentences actually imposed by D.C. Superior Court judges in any particular case will reflect this disproportionality. This is because, while the District's trial judges must determine a sentence for every offense of conviction, they typically have discretion to have those sentences run at the same time, thereby effectively neutralizing the imprisonment terms of all but the most severe sentence—a practice generally referred to as concurrent sentencing.

There are two different sources of legal authority relevant to understanding the scope of concurrent sentencing in the District. The first is the D.C. Code. A handful of District statutes affirmatively require the sentences arising from multiple convictions for two or more substantially overlapping offenses to run concurrently. The most notable example of this kind of legislative provision is D.C. Code § 22-3203, which statutorily requires judges to impose concurrent sentences for certain combinations of overlapping property offenses. More specifically, this provision states that:

> A person may be convicted of any combination of theft, identity theft, fraud, credit card fraud, unauthorized use of a vehicle, commercial piracy, and receiving stolen property for the same act or course of conduct; provided, that no person shall be consecutively sentenced for any such combination or combinations that arise from the same act or course of conduct.[129]

The D.C. Code likewise contains a few additional provisions that impose a comparable requirement of concurrent sentencing on a narrower, offense-specific basis. For example, the District's enticing a child statute establishes the following:

> No person shall be consecutively sentenced for enticing a child or minor to engage in a sexual act or sexual contact . . . and engaging in that sexual act or sexual contact with that child or minor, provided, that the enticement occurred closely associated in time with the sexual act or sexual contact.[130]

The second relevant source of legal authority are the Voluntary D.C. Sentencing Guidelines (DCSG), which direct Superior Court judges to run such overlapping convictions concurrently in a variety of situations. The relevant provision, Rule 6.2, offers the following non-binding[131] guidance:

---

[129] D.C. Code § 22-3203. This provision accordingly dictates that a person who violates two or more of the enumerated property offenses—theft, identity theft, fraud, credit card fraud, unauthorized use of a vehicle, commercial piracy, and receiving stolen property—during a single course of conduct must be sentenced concurrently. See, e.g., Youssef v. United States, 27 A.3d 1202, 1206 (D.C. 2011).

[130] D.C. Code § 22-3010.

[131] The DCSG are completely voluntary. See, e.g., D.C. Code § 3–105(c) (sentencing guidelines promulgated by the D.C. Sentencing Commission "shall not create any legally enforceable rights in any party"); Speaks v. United States, 959 A.2d 712, 718 (D.C. 2008).

6.2 Concurrent Sentences

The following sentences must be imposed concurrently:

For offenses that are not crimes of violence: multiple offenses in a single event, such as passing several bad checks . . . .

The above language—when viewed in light of the relevant DCSG definitions of "crimes of violence"[132] and "event"[133]—indicates that multiple convictions for all non-violent offenses arising from the same act or course of conduct are to be sentenced concurrently. This appears to be true, moreover, without regard to whether there exists any overlap between the offenses of conviction in the first place. So, for example, a judge sentencing a defendant convicted of theft and carrying a dangerous weapon (CDW) based on the same act or course of conduct would, under this rule, impose concurrent sentences for each offense—notwithstanding the fact that CDW and theft are completely different offenses.[134] All the more so, then, Rule 6.2 appears to direct judges to impose concurrent

[132] The DCSG clarify that "[t]he term "crime of violence" under the Guidelines is . . . identical to the crime of violence definition provided in D.C. Code § 23-1331(4)." DCSG R. 7.4. That statutory provision, in turn, denotes the following list of offenses:

> (4) The term "crime of violence" means aggravated assault; act of terrorism; arson; assault on a police officer (felony); assault with a dangerous weapon; assault with intent to kill, commit first degree sexual abuse, commit second degree sexual abuse, or commit child sexual abuse; assault with significant bodily injury; assault with intent to commit any other offense; burglary; carjacking; armed carjacking; child sexual abuse; cruelty to children in the first degree; extortion or blackmail accompanied by threats of violence; gang recruitment, participation, or retention by the use or threatened use of force, coercion, or intimidation; kidnapping; malicious disfigurement; manslaughter; manufacture or possession of a weapon of mass destruction; mayhem; murder; robbery; sexual abuse in the first, second, or third degrees; use, dissemination, or detonation of a weapon of mass destruction; or an attempt, solicitation, or conspiracy to commit any of the foregoing offenses.

D.C. Code § 23-1331(4).

[133] DCSG R. 7.10 provides the following definition of "event":

> [O]ffenses are part of a single event if they were committed at the same time and place or have the same nucleus of facts. Offenses are part of multiple events if they were committed at different times and places or have a different nucleus of facts. When an offense(s) crosses jurisdictional lines (e.g., from Maryland into the District), it may result in multiple cases. However, this should not change the analysis regarding whether the offense(s) constitutes a single or multiple events.

[134] This practice may lead to disproportionate leniency in certain situations. See, e.g., Michael T. Cahill, Offense Grading and Multiple Liability: New Challenges for A Model Penal Code Second, 1 OHIO ST. J. CRIM. L. 599, 605 (2004) (noting that the problem with a system in which courts "impose concurrent sentences for multiple offenses of conviction [when such offenses do not overlap]" is that it "has the obvious and pervasive flaw of trivializing, to the point of complete irrelevance, every offense other than the most serious one. A sensible liability scheme should require, or at least allow, some additional punishment for each such harm—although perhaps incrementally reduced punishment instead of the equally crude alternative of full consecutive sentences for each offense.").

sentences on a defendant who is convicted of multiple non-violent offenses that actually overlap.[135]

The District's concurrent sentencing policies, when viewed collectively, seem to modestly mitigate some of the proportionality problems inherent in the elements test. At the same time, however, the relevant safeguards these policies appear to provide are limited in key ways.

First, various provisions in the D.C. Code affirmatively encourage judges to run the sentences for substantially overlapping offenses back-to-back (hereinafter, "consecutive sentencing"). In some instances, the encouragement is "soft." For example, the DCCA has construed D.C. Code § 23-112 to embody a general "preference . . . that consecutive sentences be imposed when an individual is convicted of two or more offenses, even if the convictions arise out of the same act or transaction."[136] In other instances, however, the D.C. Code legally compels consecutive sentencing. For example, the District's UUV statute establishes that any person who commits the offense "during the course of or to facilitate a crime of violence, shall be," inter alia, "imprisoned for not more than 10 years, or both, consecutive to the penalty imposed for the crime of violence."[137]

Second, the relatively few number of offenses subject to a statutorily mandated rule of concurrent sentencing means that the circumstances in which an accused has a legally enforceable right to concurrent sentencing for substantially overlapping offenses are quite rare.

Third, the concurrent sentencing policies reflected in the DCSG are—their non-binding nature aside[138]—limited in important ways. Most significant is the fact that they only address the sentencing of multiple non-violent offenses arising from the same act or

---

[135] The DCSG provides the following relevant example:

> The defendant sold heroin and cocaine to an undercover narcotics officer as part of a "buy – bust" operation. The defendant was not apprehended at the time of the transaction and a warrant was issued for her arrest. The defendant was arrested three days later. A search of the defendant's person at the time of her arrest uncovered liquid PCP. The defendant was convicted of distribution of heroin, distribution of cocaine, and possession of liquid PCP. The sentences imposed for distribution of heroin and distribution of cocaine should run concurrently because they are non-violent crimes that arose from the same event. The court has the discretion to impose a sentence for possession of liquid PCP that runs either concurrently or consecutively to the sentences imposed for the distribution of heroin and distribution of cocaine convictions because they are not part of the same event.

DCSG R. 6.3.

[136] Jones v. United States, 401 A.2d 473, 475 (D.C. 1979); see, e.g., Banks v. United States, 307 A.2d 767, 769 (D.C. 1973) ("Congress has clearly stated its intent [in the general sentencing statute with respect to consecutive sentences]."); Bragdon v. United States, 717 A.2d 878, 880 (D.C. 1998) (same). In practice, the statutory preference articulated in D.C. Code § 23-112 has little legal effect; for the most part, it merely makes consecutive sentencing the default in the absence of judicial specification. That is, where the sentencing court forgets to specify in a multi-conviction case how the various sentences are supposed to run. At the same time, there's also a local rule of criminal procedure, which more explicitly mandates this outcome as well. See D.C. Super. Ct. R. Crim. P. 32 ("Unless the Court pronouncing a sentence otherwise provides, a sentence imposed on a defendant for conviction of an offense shall run consecutively to any other sentence imposed on such defendant for conviction of an offense.").

[137] D.C. Code § 22-3215(2)(A).

[138] That is, because the DCSG are completely voluntary, an accused sentenced consecutively for committing two or more substantially overlapping offenses in contravention to Rule 6.2 effectively has no legal recourse.

course of conduct.[139] In contrast, the DCSG are completely silent on how to deal with comparable convictions for violent offenses.[140] Further, the relevant DCSG rule applicable to the sentencing of multiple non-violent offenses arising from the same act or course of conduct it itself subject to a "departure principle," under which judges may "deviat[e]" from the "consecutive and concurrent sentencing rules" if they believe that "adhering to them would result in a manifest injustice."[141]

Fourth, and perhaps most fundamentally, concurrent sentencing policies only address one kind of disproportionality arising from multiple convictions for substantially related offenses: the aggregation of sentencing exposure. They do nothing, in contrast, to address the second relevant kind of disproportionality: the accumulation of criminal convictions. The disproportionate accumulation of criminal convictions is a distinct problem given that a criminal conviction is—sentence length aside—a form of punishment.[142] This is a function of "the extra stigma imposed upon one's reputation" by the imposition of multiple criminal convictions.[143] And it is also a function of the collateral consequences associated with those convictions, which may include "the harsher treatment that may be accorded the defendant under the habitual offender statutes of some States; the possible impeachment by prior convictions, if the defendant ever becomes a witness in future cases; and, in some jurisdictions, less favorable parole opportunities."[144]

When viewed as a whole, then, the District's law of merger poses two different sets of problems. First, it suffers from a marked lack of clarity and consistency, as reflected in the DCCA's disparate and conflicting application of the elements test. Second, and perhaps more significant, application of the elements test—under any interpretation—creates the possibility of a disproportionate multiplication of criminal convictions and punishment. With those problems in mind, RCC § 22E-214 incorporates a comprehensive legislative [139] In practical effect, this means that a District judge faced with sentencing an offender like Defendant X in the carjacking hypothetical discussed earlier receives no guidance from the DCSG regarding the critical determination of whether that offender's sentences ought to run concurrently or consecutively.

---

[140] To be sure, there is a provision in the DCSG that addresses the overarching topic of sentencing an offender convicted of multiple violent offenses. However, that provision, Rule 6.1, appears to ignore the issue of how to sentence an offender who has committed multiple violent offenses in a single course of conduct, which involve one victim. See id. at R. 6.1 ("The following sentences must be imposed consecutively: For multiple crimes of violence: multiple victims in multiple events; multiple victims in one event; and one victim in multiple events for offenses sentenced on the same day . . .").

[141] See DCSG R. 6.3 ("The court has discretion to sentence everything else either consecutively or concurrently . . . The departure principles permit deviating from these consecutive and concurrent sentencing rules if adhering to them would result in a manifest injustice . . . ."). Presumably, then, a judge could impose consecutive sentences for the commission of multiple non-violent, substantially overlapping offenses without violating the DCSG at all—so long as the imposition would avoid a "manifest injustice." Id. And of course, this decision would not be subject to any legal review.

[142] Com. v. Jones, 382 Mass. 387, 396 (1981).

[143] O'Clair v. United States, 470 F.2d 1199, 1203 (1st Cir. 1972).

[144] Jones, 382 Mass. at 396 (citing, e.g., Benton v. Maryland, 395 U.S. 784, 790-791 & n.5 (1969); Note, Twice in Jeopardy, 75 YALE L.J. 262, 299-300 n.161 (1965); Note, Collateral Consequences of a Criminal Conviction, 23 VAND. L. REV. 929 (1970)). To be sure, some of these collateral consequences can be dealt with in other ways. Illustrative is the current version of D.C. Code § 22-3203, which also establishes that for the relevant offenses subject to concurrent sentencing, "[c]onvictions arising out of the same act or course of conduct shall be considered as one conviction for purposes of any application of repeat offender sentencing provisions." D.C. Code § 22-3203. Still, this kind of roundabout solution is far from perfect. For example, it only applies to local repeat offender sentencing provisions, and thus presumably would not govern the calculation of an offender's criminal history score in another jurisdiction.

framework for addressing merger issues that is both clearer and broader than the District's current approach, and which is oriented towards improving the consistency and proportionality of District law.[145]

The centerpiece of this framework is RCC § 22E-214(a), which incorporates a cluster of principles to guide the judicial inquiry into legislative intent as to merger where substantially related offenses are based on the same act or course of conduct. The first, and most narrow, of these principles is the elements test. More specifically, paragraph (a)(1) codifies the elements test by requiring merger where "[o]ne offense is established by proof of the same or less than all the facts required to establish the commission of the other offense as a matter of law."[146]

Thereafter, paragraph (a)(2) addresses three particular kinds of variances, which, when constituting the sole distinctions between substantially related offenses, require merger. The first is where the offenses differ only in that one requires a less serious injury or risk of injury than is necessary to establish commission of the other offense (e.g., assault and aggravated assault). The second is where the offenses differ only in that one requires a lesser form of culpability than the other (e.g., murder and manslaughter). And the third is where the offenses differ only in that one is defined to prohibit a designated kind of conduct generally and the other to prohibit a specific instance of such conduct (e.g., murder and murder of a police officer).

Next, paragraph (a)(3) requires merger where "[o]ne offense requires a finding of fact inconsistent with the requirements for commission of the other offense as a matter of law." This limitation on multiple liability is intended to apply to convictions for two or more substantially related offenses that are "inconsistent with each other as a matter of law,"[147] that is, where the proof necessary to establish one offense necessarily precludes the existence of the proof necessary to establish another offense under any set of facts when based on the same act or course of conduct (e.g., intent to steal-theft and intent to use-theft).[148]

Although the District's law of merger is not a paradigm of clarity, it nevertheless appears that that each of the principles in paragraphs (a)(1)-(a)(3) is supported by District

---

[145] To be sure, the most direct way of dealing with the proportionality problems that arise from offense overlap under current District law is to revise individual offenses in a manner that reflects their appropriate breadth, and to eliminate unnecessary offenses that merely duplicate preexisting coverage. CCRC work has endeavored to move in this direction. As a practical matter, however, drafting offenses that perfectly line up next to one another without any overlap (and avoiding gaps in coverage) is unachievable.

[146] See Byrd v. United States, 598 A.2d 386, 398 (D.C. 1991) (en banc) (While the Blockburger test, as codified by D.C. Code § 23-112, "uses the phrase 'proof of a fact,' the reference is to what the statutory 'offense' requires in the way of proof, not to the specific 'transaction,'" i.e. "[t]he word 'requires' can refer only to elements, not to whatever facts may be adduced at trial").

[147] McClain v. United States, 871 A.2d 1185, 1192 (D.C. 2005) (citing Fuller v. United States, 407 F.2d 1199, 1223 (1967) (en banc).

[148] This rule against multiple liability based on inconsistent guilty verdicts is to be distinguished from, and is therefore not intended to displace, the legal system's well established "tolerat[ion]" of verdicts of guilt and innocence that are inconsistent with one another. Evans v. United States, 987 A.2d 1138, 1140–41 (D.C. 2010) ("[A] logical inconsistency between a guilty verdict and a verdict of acquittal does not impugn the validity of either verdict") (quoting Yeager v. United States, 557 U.S. 110, 112 (2009) (discussing Dunn v. United States, 284 U.S. 390 (1932))); see, e.g., United States v. Powell, 469 U.S. 57 (1984).

case law.[149] However, the next merger principle in RCC § 22E-214 clearly goes beyond it.

Specifically, paragraph (a)(4) requires merger where "one offense reasonably accounts for the other offense given the harm or wrong, culpability, and penalty proscribed by each." This principle, which is the broadest in subsection (a), calls for the merger of convictions for two or more substantially related offenses when the gravamen of one offense duplicates that of another. The pertinent evaluation goes beyond consideration of whether it is theoretically possible to commit one offense without committing another. Instead, it asks the court to consider the relevant offenses' purposes, accounting for the harm or wrong, culpability, and penalty proscribed by each.

The final two principles incorporated into RCC § 22E-214(a) address merger of general inchoate offenses. The first principle, codified in paragraph (a)(5), requires merger where "[o]ne offense consists only of a criminal attempt or criminal solicitation of [t]he other offense," or, alternatively, "[a]n offense that is related to that offense in the manner described in paragraphs (1)-(4) of this subsection." The first portion of this provision [149] For District case law in support of the elements test as codified RCC § 22E-2214(a)(1), see, for example, cases cited supra notes 52-68 and accompanying text.

---

For District case law in support of the lesser harm principle as codified in RCC § 22E-2214(a)(2)(A), see, for example, In re T.M., 155 A.3d 400, 408 (D.C. 2017) ("Appellant's conviction for felony assault . . . merges with her conviction for AAWA because felony assault is a lesser-included offense of AAWA."); Medley v. United States, 104 A.3d 115, 132 (D.C. 2014) ("[Felony assault] is a lesser-included offense of aggravated assault.") (quoting Collins v. United States, 73 A.3d 974, 985 (D.C. 2013)).

For District case law in support of the lesser culpability principle as codified in RCC § 22E-2214(a)(2)(B), see, for example, Washington v. United States, 884 A.2d 1080, 1085 (D.C. 2005) (involuntary manslaughter LIO of premeditated murder); In re T.H.B., 670 A.2d 895 (D.C. 1996) (simple assault merges with assault with intent to commit robbery); Teneyck v. United States, 112 A.3d 906, 913 (D.C. 2015) (same).

For District case law in support of the specificity principle as codified in RCC § 22E-2214(a)(2)(C), see, for example, Waller v. United States, 389 A.2d 801, 808 (D.C. 1978) (assault merges with assault with a dangerous weapon).

Note that the District considers these three principles to be an extension of the elements test, whereas in at least some jurisdictions they are considered to be an addition to/expansion of the elements test. See, e.g., Commentary on Haw. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 701-109(c); Fraser v. State, 523 S.W.3d 320, 333 (Tex. App. 2017).

For District case law consistent with RCC § 22E-2214(a)(3), see, for example, Davis v. United States, 37 App. D.C. 126, 133 (D.C. Cir. 1911) (precluding multiple convictions for logically inconsistent offenses of obtaining money by false pretenses and embezzlement of the same money in a case where "the trial court pertinently suggested, that the 'verdict under the embezzlement counts negatives one essential fact in the crime of procuring money by false pretenses, namely, the devesting of the title originally'"); Fulton v. United States, 45 App. D.C. 27, 41–42 (D.C. Cir. 1916) (reaffirming the principle set forth in Davis, namely, that multiple convictions are inappropriate for "counts charging distinct and inconsistent offenses," and holding that guilty verdicts on two embezzlement counts alleging ownership of the same property in different persons could not stand); United States v. Daigle, 149 F. Supp. 409, 414 (D.D.C), aff'd, 248 F.2d 608 (D.C. Cir. 1957) ("[W]here a guilty verdict on one count negatives some fact essential to a finding of guilty on a second count, two guilty verdicts may not stand."); see also Byrd, 598 A.2d at 397 (observing that "theft and RSP [] are closely related to one another, but mutually inconsistent," and that therefore, "unlike a lesser included offense where the lesser offense is committed at the same time as the greater offense, a defendant cannot commit theft and RSP at the same time.") (Belson, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part); compare Edmonds v. United States, 609 A.2d 1131, 1132 (D.C. 1992) ("Even if we assume that the verdicts on these two counts were inconsistent, it has long been recognized that inconsistent verdicts are permissible.").

precludes multiple convictions for an attempt or solicitation and the completed offense (e.g., attempt or solicitation to commit murder and murder). The second portion of this principle extends the same treatment to an attempt or solicitation and a completed offense that varies from the target of the attempt or solicitation in a manner that reflects the other, more general merger principles enumerated in subsection (a) (e.g., attempt or solicitation to commit murder and aggravated assault). This principle appears to at least generally reflect current District law.[150]

The second principle, codified in paragraph (a)(6), requires merger where "[e]ach offense is a general inchoate offense designed to culminate in the commission of [t]he same offense"; or, alternatively, "[d]ifferent offenses that are related to one another in the manner described in paragraphs (1)-(4) of this subsection." The first portion of this provision precludes multiple convictions for attempt, solicitation, and conspiracy to commit the same offense. The second portion of this principle extends the same treatment to multiple convictions for attempt, solicitation, and conspiracy to commit distinct target offenses, provided that the variance between those target offenses reflects the other, more general merger principles enumerated in subsection (a). This principle appears to be contrary to current District law at least insofar as merger of attempt and conspiracy is concerned.[151]

Subsections (a) provides a clear and comprehensive body of substantive merger policies that would broaden the District's current approach to merger in furtherance of the overall proportionality of District law. It's important to note, however, that this expansion would not change the essential nature of the merger inquiry currently facing District courts. This is because, although some of the merger principles enumerated in these provisions go

---

[150] For District case law in support of RCC § 22E-2214(a)(5)(A) as it pertains to criminal attempts, see, for example, In re T.M., 155 A.3d 400, 408 (D.C. 2017) (holding that convictions for attempt and completed offense merge); Ray v. United States, 575 A.2d 1196, 1199 (D.C. 1990) ("Every completed criminal offense necessarily includes an attempt to commit that offense.").

Note that these cases support merger notwithstanding the fact that the offenses of attempt and the completed offense do not always satisfy the elements test. Consider that for a criminal attempt, the government must prove that the accused acted with the intent to cause any result required by the target offense, regardless of whether a lower culpable mental state, such as recklessness or negligence, will suffice to establish the target offense. See Jones v. United States, 124 A.3d 127, 132–34 (D.C. 2015); see also Williams v. United States, 130 A.3d 343, 347 (D.C. 2016) (discussing Jones). Practically speaking, this means that, where the target of an attempt is a crime of recklessness or negligence, it is not necessarily true that one who commits the target offense necessarily also commits an attempt. Compare D.C. SUPER. CT. R. CRIM. P. 31(c) ("A defendant may be found guilty of any of the following: (1) an offense necessarily included in the offense charged; (2) an attempt to commit the offense charged; or (3) an attempt to commit an offense necessarily included in the offense charged, if the attempt is an offense in its own right.").

No District case law on general solicitation liability exists. See Commentary on D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 4.500 (observing, with respect to the District's general solicitation offense, that there does not appear to be a single reported decision "involving this statute"). However, it seems at least plausible that the DCCA would apply a similar approach to dealing with merger of solicitation and the completed offense.

For District case law allowing multiple convictions for conspiracy and the completed offense, see, for example, McCullough v. United States, 827 A.2d 48, 59 (D.C. 2003) (citing Robinson v. United States, 608 A.2d 115, 116 (D.C. 1992)).

For District case law in support of RCC § 22E-2214(a)(5)(B) as it pertains to criminal attempts, see, for example, Frye v. United States, 926 A.2d 1085, 1099 (D.C. 2005) (finding that attempted aggravated assault while armed merges with assault with a dangerous weapon).

[151] See supra notes 21-30 and accompanying text (discussing merger of conspiracy and attempt under District law).

beyond the scope of the elements test as enumerated by the DCCA (and codified in RCC § 22E-214(a)(1)), these principles all share one core similarity: they present questions of law regarding the manner in which the statutory elements of criminal offenses relate to one another. Therefore, the determination of whether those principles preclude multiple liability for two or more substantially related offenses can—as is currently the case in the District[152]—be conducted without regard to the underlying facts of a case.[153]

RCC §§ 22E-214(b) and (c): Relation to Current State of Judicial Administration of Merger Policy. RCC §§ 22E-214(b) and (c) would neither require nor preclude changes to current District law pertaining to judicial administration of merger policy.

In the District, the law of merger is generally deemed to be the province of the appellate courts, with little role for trial judges to play in safeguarding "the double jeopardy bar on multiple punishments for the same offense."[154] This is reflected in the fact that D.C. Superior Court judges appear to systematically ignore all merger issues at sentencing, thereby leaving them for appellate resolution by the DCCA in the first instance. More specifically, the standard procedure followed by the District's trial judges seems to be as follows: (1) sentence the defendant on all counts of conviction without regard to whether any of those counts are likely to merge; and (2) determine whether those counts should run consecutively or concurrently.[155]

---

[152] Note that where the merger analysis involves one or more offenses comprised of alternative elements of a nature described in RCC § 22E-214(c), then a limited factual inquiry will be necessary to determine the particular basis of a conviction (i.e. was the defendant convicted of felony murder-rape or felony murder-burglary). However, this also appears to reflect current District practice in at least some areas of law. See cases cited supra notes 99-106 and accompanying text.

[153] Therefore, the merger analysis under RCC § 22E-2214 is not a return to the fact-based approach disclaimed in Byrd, but rather, an expansion of the current law-based approach.

[154] Mooney v. United States, 938 A.2d 710, 724 (D.C. 2007).

[155] Here's one example from Hanna v. United States:

> After a hearing on January 28, 1992, appellants were sentenced to prison on February 3, 1992 for the first incident as follows: (1) three counts of armed kidnapping (D, E, I), eight to twenty-four years for each count; (2) two counts of first degree burglary while armed (F, G), four to twelve years for each count; (3) two counts of assault with a dangerous weapon (H, J), three to nine years for each count; (4) one count of armed robbery (K), three to nine years; and (5) one count of possession of a firearm during a crime of violence (L), a mandatory minimum sentence of five to fifteen years. Sentences on the two burglary counts (F, G) were concurrent with each other but consecutive to all the other counts. Sentences for the seven crimes of violence counts D, E, H, I, J, K, L were concurrent with each other. The overall sentence for the first incident was 12 to 36 years.
>
> Appellants received prison sentences for the second incident as follows: (1) two counts of first degree burglary while armed (M, N), four to twelve years for each count; (2) five counts of assault with a dangerous weapon (O, P, Q, R, S), three to nine years for each count; (3) one count of armed robbery (T), three to nine years; (4) one count of possession of a firearm during a crime of violence (U), a mandatory minimum sentence of five to fifteen years; (5) one count of carrying a pistol without a license (V), one year; and (6) one count of possession of a prohibited weapon (W), one year. Sentences on the two burglary counts (M, N) were concurrent with each other but consecutive to all other counts; sentences for the seven crimes of violence counts O, P, Q, R, S, T, U were concurrent with each other; and the sentences for carrying a pistol without a license and for possession of

This sentencing regime appears to have its roots in the DCCA's decision in Garris v. United States, where the court explained that:

> Initially permitting convictions on both counts serves the useful purpose of allowing this court to determine whether there is error concerning one of the counts that does not affect the other . . . If so, then no merger problem even arises as only one conviction stands. If not, a remand to the trial court with instructions to vacate one conviction cures the double jeopardy problem without risk to society that an error free count was dismissed . . . .
>
> The policy sought to be vindicated [by sentencing merger] is better served, in cases of appeal on issues other than validity of the sentence alone, by waiting for completion of the appeal process before vacating judgment on one of multiple counts. No legitimate interest of the defendant is served by requiring a trial court to guess which of multiple convictions will survive on appeal. Indeed, if the count chosen is reversed on grounds independent of the validity of the one vacated, a substitution would have to be made [] and a new appeal thereunder must be permitted if error independent of the reversed conviction is to be raised.[156]

> a prohibited weapon were concurrent with all other counts. The overall sentence for the second incident was nine to 27 years.
>
> Appellants' sentences for the two incidents, therefore, totaled 21 to 63 years of imprisonment. In sentencing appellants on all counts, the trial court acted consistently with this court's suggestion that sentence should initially be imposed on all counts to allow this court to review merger issues and to remand to the trial court for resentencing as necessary.

Hanna v. United States, 666 A.2d 845, 859 (D.C. 1995).

[156] Garris v. United States, 491 A.2d 511, 514–15 (D.C. 1985). Nearly two decades earlier, the D.C. Circuit observed in Fuller v. United States that:

> There are sound reasons for permitting the jury to render verdicts as to separate offenses even where consecutive sentences are not permitted. For example, in the murder situation, a prosecutor should be permitted to proceed on both first degree murder theories. Perhaps the jury will believe one and not the other, and perhaps the jury will believe both. We see no reason for a rule of law that would require the prosecutor to elect between the offenses before the case is sent to the jury. Nor do we see why the jury must elect. Permitting a guilty verdict on each count—if warranted by the facts—may serve the useful purpose of avoiding retrials by permitting an appellate court, or a trial court on further reflection, to uphold a conviction where there is error concerning one of the counts that does not infect the other. Moreover, that course precludes a range of double jeopardy contentions.
>
> There is no general reason why the jury should not be permitted to render a verdict on each theory, so long as the offenses are not in conflict and no aspect of the case gives reasonable indication that the jury might be confused or led astray.

407 F.2d 1199, 1224–25 (D.C. Cir. 1967).

In subsequent years, the DCCA has "reiterate[d] the suggestion . . . made in Garris," namely, that:

> [W]hen a jury has returned guilty verdicts on two counts which merge, the trial court need not guess which [] conviction will survive on appeal and enter an acquittal on the other count. [Rather, the trial court should simply leave the issues to be resolved by the DCCA]. This policy will avoid situations [] in which it becomes necessary to remand for substitution of convictions, from which the defendant may take a second appeal.[157]

When, pursuant to this regime, the DCCA is presented with merger issues on appeal, they are subject to a de novo standard of review[158] in which context the court "is limited to assuring that the sentencing court d[id] not exceed its legislative mandate by imposing multiple punishments for the same offense."[159] If, in the course of conducting this review, the DCCA concludes that two or more convictions should merge—or, alternatively, where the government concedes that two or more convictions should merge[160]—then the appellate court will remand the convictions "to the trial court for the limited purpose of merger and resentencing."[161] Importantly, however, "when [157] Warrick v. United States, 528 A.2d 438, 443 n.6 (D.C. 1987) (internal quotations and alterations omitted).

---

[158] Roy v. United States, 871 A.2d 498, 510 (D.C. 2005) ("We review issues of merger de novo, to determine whether there has been a violation of the Double Jeopardy Clause of the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.") (quoting Nixon v. United States, 730 A.2d 145, 151–52 (D.C. 1999)); Robinson v. United States, 50 A.3d 508, 532 (D.C. 2012).
[159] James v. United States, 718 A.2d 1083, 1086–87 (D.C. 1998).
[160] Collins v. United States, 73 A.3d 974, 985 (D.C. 2013) ("The government concedes that appellant's conviction for ASBI of Brown merges with his conviction for aggravated assault of Brown because ASBI is a lesser-included offense.").
[161] Newman v. United States, 705 A.2d 246, 265 (D.C. 1997) (citing Whalen v. United States, 445 U.S. 684 (1980)). Insofar as correction of illegal sentences is concerned, the District's rules of criminal procedure provide:

> Rule 35. Correction or reduction of sentence or collateral; setting aside forfeiture.
>
> (a) Correction of sentence. The Court may correct an illegal sentence at any time and may correct a sentence imposed in an illegal manner within the time provided herein for the reduction of sentence.
>
> (b) Reduction of sentence. A motion to reduce a sentence may be made not later than 120 days after the sentence is imposed or probation is revoked, or not later than 120 days after receipt by the Court of a mandate issued upon affirmance of the judgment or dismissal of the appeal, or not later than 120 days after entry of any order or judgment of the Supreme Court denying review of, or having the effect of upholding, a judgment of conviction or probation revocation. The Court shall determine the motion within a reasonable time. After notice to the parties and an opportunity to be heard, the Court may reduce a sentence without motion, not later than 120 days after the sentence is imposed or probation is revoked, or not later than 120 days after receipt by the Court of a mandate issued upon affirmance of the judgment or dismissal of the appeal, or not later than 120 days after entry of any order or judgment of the Supreme Court, denying review of, or having the effect of upholding, a judgment of conviction or probation revocation. Changing a sentence from a sentence of incarceration to a grant of probation shall constitute a permissible reduction of sentence under this paragraph.

resentencing to respect the double jeopardy bar on multiple punishments for the same offense where the defendant has been convicted of a greater and lesser-included offense, the trial court has but one course, to vacate the lesser-included offense."[162] And, when a defendant's sentences for the merged counts "are concurrent and congruent," it is well-established that "[r]esentencing is not required."[163]

The current state of judicial administration regarding merger issues in the District is notable. The approach to merger proscribed by the DCCA in Garris and its progeny is one that, in effect, seems to require and/or encourage trial judges to disregard clear or potential constitutional violations at initial sentencing, in favor of initial appellate resolution.

The unintuitive-ness of such an approach is well captured by the DCCA's decision Mooney v. United States.[164] On the one hand, the Mooney court recognized that the merger-based remands to trial courts produced by this regime involve a mandate to "correct the illegality of a sentence that violates double jeopardy's bar on the imposition of multiple punishments for the same offense."[165] But, on the other hand, the Mooney court also recognized that the "illegality" of a sentence in this context "does not imply trial court error as [DCCA case law has] established that the trial court should enter convictions on all guilty verdicts returned by the jury, subject to review by this court on appeal on 'issues other than the validity of the sentence alone.'"[166]

As a matter of policy, the current judicial approach favoring initial review of merger issues at the appellate level has mixed support. There surely are, as the Garris decision highlights, important judicial efficiency benefits under the current system, which helps to avoid cases from being sent back and forth between Superior Court and the Court of

---

Super. Ct. Crim R. 35(a) & (b).

[162] Mooney v. United States, 938 A.2d 710, 724 (D.C. 2007); see Franklin v. United States, 392 A.2d 516, 519 n.3 (D.C. 1978) ("[W]here an appellant has been convicted of both the crime and a lesser included offense, the appropriate appellate remedy is vacation of the lesser included offense.") (citing Franey v. United States, 382 A.2d 1019, 1021 (D.C. 1978)).

[163] Collins, 73 A.3d at 985; see, e.g., United States v. Battle, 613 F.3d 258, 266 (D.C. Cir. 2010) ("Because the court sentenced [appellant] to the same, concurrent terms of imprisonment for [both] convictions, resentencing is unnecessary."); Medley v. United States, 104 A.3d 115, 133 (D.C. 2014).

One key procedural question on remand is whether the defendant has a right to allocute. For example, "a defendant is constitutionally 'guaranteed the right to be present at any stage of the criminal proceeding that is critical to its outcome if his [or her] presence would contribute to the fairness of the procedure.'" Kimes v. United States, 569 A.2d 104, 108 (D.C. 1989) (quoting Kentucky v. Stincer, 482 U.S. 730, 745 (1987)). This includes the right to be present upon the imposition of sentence—"a fundamental [right] which implicates the due process clause." Warrick, 551 A.2d at 1334 (citing United States v. Gagnon, 470 U.S. 522, 526 (1985) (per curiam)). Additionally, Superior Court Rule of Criminal Procedure 32(c)(1) provides that at the time of sentencing, the defendant shall have the right to allocute, that is, to present any information in mitigation of punishment, and to make a statement on his or her "own behalf." Super. Ct. Crim R. 32(c)(1). However, Superior Court Rule of Criminal Procedure 43 provides that a defendant is not required to be present "[w]hen the proceeding involves a reduction or correction of sentence under Rule 35." Super. Ct. Crim R. 43(c)(4). Rule 35, in turn, states that the Superior Court "may correct an illegal sentence at any time and may correct a sentence imposed in an illegal manner within the time provided herein . . . . " Super. Ct. Crim. R. 35(a). Typically, therefore, the defendant's presence is only required after an appeal that remands for sentencing based upon a count that was not originally sentenced. Mooney, 938 A.2d at 724.

[164] Mooney, 938 A.2d at 722–23.

[165] Id.

[166] Id.

Appeals for re-adjudication of sentencing issues. At the same time, the Garris decision seems to either overlook or misconstrue at least some of the relevant considerations. The court says little, for example, about the risk of "leav[ing] both sentences standing if for any reason there were no appeal" that exists under the District's present system of dealing with merger issues, which is a concern that has lead at least one state judiciary to explicitly reject adoption of a similar regime.[167]

In addition, the Garris decision seems to highlight—as a supposed benefit of the District's present system of dealing with merger issues—the need to safeguard against a "risk to society that an error free count was dismissed."[168] Yet it is not at all clear that this risk actually exists. The situation envisioned by the Garris court seems to be as follows: (1) the sentencing judge enters a judgment on one conviction and merges the rest; (2) the defendant files an appeal arguing that an (evidentiary) error should lead to that conviction being overturned; (3) the appellate court agrees, but finds that the error does not affect any of the merged offenses. Under these circumstances, it does not appear—contra Garris—that an appellate court would have any difficulty ordering the re-imposition of one of the previously merged offenses by the trial court.

The DCCA's subsequent decision in Warrick v. United States is illustrative.[169] In that case, the trial court merged two convictions for burglary, which were respectively based on an underlying assault and theft committed in the same course of conduct, and sentenced the defendant on the former.[170] On the first appeal, the DCCA overturned the burglary (assault) conviction, and ordered the previously vacated burglary (theft) conviction to be reinstated.[171] Thereafter, the trial court reinstated the burglary (theft) conviction and sentenced the defendant on that conviction.[172] The defendant appealed again arguing that the reinstatement of the burglary (theft) conviction violated the Double Jeopardy Clause.[173] The DCCA rejected this argument, noting that the trial court's "dismissal of the intent to steal count under the merger doctrine was not on the merits."[174]

One other relevant point is the fact that the government may, under District law, "appeal an order which terminates the prosecution in favor of the defendant" so long as it "is not an acquittal on the merits."[175] So, for example, in D.C. v. Whitley, the DCCA asserted jurisdiction over a government appeal of a judge's sua sponte dismissal of a

---

[167] State v. Cloutier, 286 Or. 579, 601 (1979). For at least one case where counsel for the defendant overlooked a meritorious merger argument, see Medley v. United States, 104 A.3d 115, 132 (D.C. 2014) ("Richardson does not argue that his convictions for ADW and ASBI merge with his conviction for AAWA, but we conclude for the foregoing reasons that they do merge."); Carter v. United States, 957 A.2d 9, 22 (D.C. 2008) (raising merger issue sua sponte as to co-appellant).

[168] Garris v. United States, 491 A.2d 511, 514–15 (D.C. 1985).

[169] 551 A.2d 1332, 1336 (D.C. 1988). See, e.g., Byrd, 500 A.2d at 1389 ("If the unvacated murder conviction is subjected later to a successful collateral attack, the trial court should consider favorably a government motion to reinstate the vacated murder conviction"); Garris, 491 A.2d at 515 ("[I]f the count chosen is reversed on grounds independent of the validity of the one vacated, a substitution would have to be made.").

[170] Id.

[171] Id.

[172] Id.

[173] Id.

[174] Id.

[175] United States v. Shorter, 343 A.2d 569, 571 (D.C. 1975); see D.C. Code § 23-104 ("The United States or the District of Columbia may appeal an order dismissing an indictment or information or otherwise terminating a prosecution in favor of a defendant or defendants as to one or more counts thereof, except where there is an acquittal on the merits.").

conviction for want of prosecution, reasoning that "reversal of the dismissal order w[ould] require simple reinstatement of the guilty plea and no further proceedings to determine guilt or innocence."[176]

More generally, U.S. Supreme Court precedent appears to clearly dispense with any constitutional concerns that might arise from a regime in which trial judges conducted merger analyses at initial sentencing. Consider the following passage from United States v. Wilson:

> [W]here there is no threat of either multiple punishment or successive prosecutions, the Double Jeopardy Clause is not offended. In various situations where appellate review would not subject the defendant to a second trial, this Court has held that an order favoring the defendant could constitutionally be appealed by the Government. Since the 1907 Criminal Appeals Act, for example, the Government has been permitted without serious constitutional challenge to appeal from orders arresting judgment after a verdict has been entered against the defendant. See, e.g., United States v. Bramblett, 348 U.S. 503, 75 S.Ct. 504, 99 L.Ed. 594 (1955); United States v. Green, 350 U.S. 415, 76 S.Ct. 522, 100 L.Ed. 494 (1956); Pratt v. United States, 70 App.D.C. 7, 11, 102 F.2d 275, 279 (1939). Since reversal on appeal would merely reinstate the jury's verdict, review of such an order does not offend the policy against multiple prosecution.
>
> Similarly, it is well settled that an appellate court's order reversing a conviction is subject to further review even when the appellate court has ordered the indictment dismissed and the defendant discharged. Forman v. United States, 361 U.S. 416, 426, 80 S.Ct. 481, 487, 4 L.Ed.2d 412, 419 (1960). If reversal by a court of appeals operated to deprive the Government of its right to seek further review, disposition in the court of appeals would be 'tantamount to a verdict of acquittal at the hands of the jury, not subject to review by motion for rehearing, appeal, or certiorari in this Court.' Ibid. See also United States v. Shotwell Mfg. Co., 355 U.S. 233, 243, 78 S.Ct. 245, 251, 2 L.Ed.2d 234, 240 (1957).
>
> It is difficult to see why the rule should be any different simply because the defendant has gotten a favorable postverdict ruling of law from the District Judge rather than from the Court of Appeals, or because the District Judge has relied to some degree on evidence presented at trial in making his ruling. Although review of any ruling of law discharging a defendant obviously enhances the likelihood of conviction and subjects him to continuing expense and anxiety, a defendant has no legitimate claim to benefit from an error of law when that error could > be corrected without subjecting him to a second trial before a second trier of fact.[177]

[176] 934 A.2d 387, 389 (D.C. 2007) (citing United States v. Wilson, 420 U.S. 332, 353 (1975); United States v. Wall, 521 A.2d 1140, 1142 n.2 (D.C. 1987)).

The foregoing passage from the Wilson decision seems to clarify, first, that the improper post-verdict dismissal of a conviction by a trial judge may be appealed by the government without offending the Double Jeopardy Clause so long as there is express statutory authorization to do so; second, that this dismissed conviction may be reinstated by the second tier of appellate review without offending the Double Jeopardy Clause; and third, that if such a conviction is improperly dismissed by the second tier of appellate review, the third tier of appellate review may reinstate it without offending the Double Jeopardy Clause.

Based on the above analysis, it appears that the largest hurdle confronting trial court resolution of merger issues in the District is not constitutional, but rather, pragmatic. Beyond the efficiency issues raised by the Garris decision, shifting the initial burden to conduct merger analyses to Superior Court judges might compel more sweeping procedural changes to current District practice. For example, in order to reliably implement such a system, it would probably be necessary to impose a formal requirement that judges provide on-the-record explanations of their sentencing decisions.[178] Further, one probable byproduct of a system of trial level merger analyses would be a greater imperative for government appeals (e.g., where the sentencing court inappropriately merges one or more offenses), which is a topic that has garnered considerable attention in the District.[179]

---

[177] United States v. Wilson, 420 U.S. 332, 344–45 (1975).

[178] Under current District law "the [sentencing] judge [is not] required to provide an explanation for the sentence imposed." Coles v. United States, 682 A.2d 167, 173 (D.C. 1996). Which is not to say that Superior Court judges need not provide any information relevant to sentencing; District law recognizes that a "defendant has the right to be informed of [the] information" a trial court considers "in evaluating the appropriate sentence for a defendant." Foster v. United States, 615 A.2d 213, 220–21 (D.C. 1992). "This right," in turn, "is intertwined with a defendant's right to allocute and speak to the issue of appropriate punishment, a right which is acknowledged by statute and court rule, but ultimately is a fundamental one which implicates the due process clause." Bradley v. D.C., 107 A.3d 586, 599–600 (D.C. 2015). Nevertheless, while the trial court must specify the facts upon which it is relying for a given sentence, it does not appear that the sentencing judge needs to provide any explanation of why a given sentence is being imposed based on those facts. See also D.C. Super. Ct. R. Crim. P. 32 ("Pronouncement. Sentence shall thereafter be pronounced . . . . Judgment. A judgment of conviction shall set forth the plea, verdict or finding, and the adjudication and sentence . . . .").

[179] See, e.g., D.C. v. Fitzgerald, 953 A.2d 288, 291 (D.C. 2008), opinion amended on denial of reh'g, 964 A.2d 1281 (D.C. 2009); D.C. v. Whitley, 934 A.2d 387, 388 (D.C. 2007). See also D.C. Code § 11-721(a) ("The District of Columbia Court of Appeals has jurisdiction of appeals from—(1) all final orders and judgments of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia . . . . (3) orders or rulings of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia appealed by the United States or the District of Columbia pursuant to section 23-104 or 23-111(d)(2)."); D.C. Code § 23-111(2) ("If the court determines that the person has not been convicted as alleged in the information, that a conviction alleged in the information is invalid, or that the person is otherwise not subject to an increased sentence as a matter of law, the court shall, at the request of the prosecutor, postpone sentence to allow an appeal from that determination. If no such request is made, the court shall impose sentence as provided by law. The person may appeal from an order postponing sentence as if sentence had been pronounced and a final judgment of conviction entered."); D.C. Code § 23-104(c) ("The United States or the District of Columbia may appeal an order dismissing an indictment or information or otherwise terminating a prosecution in favor of a defendant . . . as to one or more counts thereof, except where there is an acquittal on the merits.").

In the final analysis, then, both the District's current appellate-centric approach to adjudicating merger issues and a more conventional trial-level regime present their own set of costs and benefits. With that in mind, and given the distinctively procedural nature of the underlying issues, RCC § 22E-214 has been drafted in a manner that is susceptible to being implemented in accordance with either approach, thereby leaving the discretion to choose between these two systems in the same place that it currently exists: the province of the courts.[180]

The key provision, subsection (b), provides that an an actor may be "found guilty of 2 or more offenses that merge under [RCC § 22E-214]." However, a sentencing judge must either vacate all but one of the offenses that merge prior to sentencing, using the rule of priority in subsection (c), or else enter judgment and sentence the actor for the offenses that merge—provided that, if the latter course is followed, the convictions for all but, at most, one of those offenses shall be vacated after: (1) The time for appeal has expired; or (2) The judgment that was appealed from has been decided. This language in RCC § 22E-214 clarifies that the statute should not be construed as in any way constraining the number of offenses over which the fact finder may deliberate. Rather, the trier of fact may find the defendant guilty of two or more offenses for which sentencing merger is required under RCC § 22E-214.[181] The statute also provides that the merger analysis set forth in RCC § 22E-214 can either be used to vacate findings of guild before imposition of sentence by the trial court, or can be done after the expiration of appellate rights or affirmance on appeal. If the latter procedure is followed, the sentences for offenses that merge must be concurrent.[182]

The latter procedure is intended to provide Superior Court judges with sufficient leeway to continue their current practice of entering judgment on all counts for which the defendant has been convicted, thereby leaving merger issues to the DCCA for resolution on direct review, should they so choose. At the same time, this provision would not preclude Superior Court judges from changing their current practice, and instead conducting merger analyses at initial sentencing, either. Rather, it is sufficiently flexible to accommodate a change in merger practice should District judges deem one to be appropriate.

Subsection (c) establishes a rule of priority for guiding judicial selection of merging offenses. Under this rule, where two or more offenses are subject to merger, the conviction that ultimately survives—whether at trial or on appeal—should be the "offense with the [180] One other alternative worth considering is that proposed by the Oregon Supreme Court in State v. Cloutier:

---

> A trial court might pronounce a judgment of conviction on each of the charges, indicating the sentence he would impose if the conviction stood alone but suspending its execution (or suspending imposition of sentence), and accompany the judgment on each but the gravest charge with an order that the judgment is vacated by its own terms whenever the time for appeal has elapsed or the judgment appealed from has been affirmed. Such an order would make it clear on the record that the conviction on the secondary charge retains no legal effect in the absence of a further order reviving it in case a successful appeal from the judgment on the gravest charge is not followed by a retrial on that charge.

286 Or. 579, 602–03 (1979).

[181] Provided, of course, that the defendant actually satisfies the requirements of liability for those offenses.

[182] Concurrent sentencing helps ensure that a defendant does not serve additional time pending an appeal, or waiting for the time to appeal to have expired.

highest statutory maximum term of incarceration."[183] However, "[i]f the offenses have the same statutory maximum term of incarceration," then "any offense that the court deems appropriate" may remain.[184] This rule of priority is consistent with current District law.

[183] RCC § 22E-214(d)(1).
[184] RCC § 22E-214(d)(2).

RCC § 22E-215. Judicial Dismissal for Minimal or Unforeseen Harms.

Explanatory Notes. RCC § 22E-215 codifies a judicial authority[1] to dismiss a prosecution if the actor's conduct, culpable mental state, and the attendant circumstances are insufficiently blameworthy to warrant the condemnation of a criminal conviction.[2] Although, strictly speaking, such actors may satisfy the minimum requirements of liability for a given offense, RCC § 22E-215 allows a judge to dismiss the prosecution of that offense[3] where doing so would be unjust under the circumstances. Barring the imposition of criminal liability in these situations improves the proportionality of punishments.[4]

Subsection (a) sets forth the scope of considerations that a judge can consider, and paragraphs (a)(1) – (a)(3) specify four situations which can justify dismissal of a

---

[1] Rooted in ancient Roman law, the de minimis defense principally rests on the common law principle of de minimis non curat lex, which means "The law does not concern itself with trifles." Anna Roberts, Dismissals As Justice, 69 ALA. L. REV. 327, 334–35 (2017); see, e.g., HARRY KALVEN & HANS ZEISEL, THE AMERICAN JURY 258 (1966); De Minimis Non Curat Lex, BLACK'S LAW DICTIONARY (9th ed. 2009).

The RCC's codification of this provision is influenced by two main types of legislative sources.

The first and primary sources are Model Penal Code § 2.12 and those state statutes based on Model Penal Code § 2.12, which establishes that courts "shall dismiss" a prosecution if, "having regard to the nature of the conduct charged to constitute an offense and the nature of the attendant circumstances," a judge finds one of three conditions to obtain. See also Anna Roberts, Dismissals As Justice, 69 ALA. L. REV. 327, 335 (2017) (collecting statutes of four states and Guam, which employ a similar approach).

The second type of legislative sources are those statutes that afford courts the authority to dismiss a prosecution in furtherance of justice. Valena E. Beety, Judicial Dismissal in the Interest of Justice, 80 MO. L. REV. 629, 631 (2015) ("In the judicial branch, some state courts have the power to dismiss cases sua sponte. Acting 'in the furtherance of justice,' these courts can consider context, as well as the just or unjust application of laws."); see, e.g., Anna Roberts, Dismissals As Justice, 69 ALA. L. REV. 327, 332 (2017) (collecting statutes from 15 states and Puerto Rico, which employ this approach). In New York, for example, courts are empowered to dismiss a prosecution in furtherance of justice when "such dismissal is required as a matter of judicial discretion by the existence of some compelling factor, consideration or circumstance clearly demonstrating that conviction or prosecution of the defendant upon such [indictment] or count would constitute or result in injustice." N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 210.40 (enumerating factors to consider).

Codification of this provision is not intended to limit government authority to drop charges under similar circumstances. See Model Penal Code § 2.12 cmt. at 402. ("It is not meant to suggest that it is inappropriate for the prosecutor to have a parallel power to enter a nol pros without leave of court. It is inappropriate, however, to suggest that this is a power that can be exercised only by the prosecutor, as though he somehow had a patent upon wise decision in such matters. [internal citation omitted] Once a criminal case has formally begun, it is very much the court's business to see that a just disposition, which in appropriate cases may include a dismissal of the prosecution, is reached.").

[2] While the court already has the power to sentence for a nominal or no period of incarceration upon conviction (except if there should be a mandatory minimum sentence), this provision recognizes a judicial power to act at an earlier stage of proceeding. This power recognizes and provides a remedy for the fact that conviction alone may carry severe collateral consequences that are disproportionate to an actor's conduct in a particular case.

[3] A single count in a multi-count case may be dismissed under RCC § 22E-215.

[4] The most direct way of avoiding the disproportionate punishment addressed by RCC § 22E-215 would be to draft criminal statutes to exclude such actors from liability in the first place. However, as a practical matter, drafting offenses that solely extend to actors whose conduct and accompanying state of mind are sufficiently blameworthy to warrant the condemnation of a criminal conviction, without also creating gaps in coverage, is extremely difficult. While the offenses in the RCC's Special Part have been drafted to exclude insufficiently blameworthy actors to the extent possible, application of the general de minimis defense specified in this section is essential to facilitating the overall proportionality of the RCC.

prosecution. RCC § 22E-215 applies to the prosecution of any offense under the RCC.[5] Under the provision the court reviews the nature of the actor's alleged conduct, the actor's culpable mental state,[6] and the attendant circumstances—not just the circumstance elements that must be proven for the charged offense, but the circumstances surrounding the alleged crime generally. The scope of considerations is broad and includes both subjective and objective aspects of the crime and its surrounding circumstances. The term "in fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates no additional culpable mental state by the actor applies to any of the following terms.[7]

Paragraph (a)(1) codifies the first situation where judicial dismissal under RCC § 22E-215 may be appropriate. Specifically, paragraph (a)(1) refers to conduct that "was within a customary license or tolerance, neither expressly negatived by the person whose

---

[5] This is consistent with Model Penal Code § 2.12 and comparable state statutes, which authorize a de minimis defense to any criminal charge (i.e. without regard to offense severity). See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.12 ("The court shall dismiss a[ny] prosecution") (italics added); Anna Roberts, Dismissals As Justice, 69 ALA. L. REV. 327, 380 (2017) ("While one might assume from their name that de minimis dismissals are limited to 'minor' alleged offenses, none of the de minimis statutes exclude any particular type of charge from their coverage."); State v. Zarrilli, 523 A.2d 284, 287 (Law. Div.), aff'd, 532 A.2d 1131 (App. Div. 1987) ("The de minimis statute applies to all prohibited conduct."); State v. Vance, 61 Haw. 291, 307, 602 P.2d 933, 944 (1979) (recognizing the possibility of applying the de minimis doctrine in felony cases); Martin H. Belsky, Joseph Dougherty & Steven H. Goldblatt, Three Prosecutors Look at the New Pennsylvania Crimes Code, 12 DUQ. L. REV. 793, 807 (1974) (noting that "[de minimis] Section 312 gives the judiciary power to dismiss any prosecution at any stage or for any crime."); see also State v. Fitzpatrick, 772 A.2d 1093, 1096 (Vt. 2001) (indicating that "serious" charges do not preclude an in furtherance dismissal).

[6] Textually speaking, RCC § 22E-215's explicit inclusion of mental state considerations departs from Model Penal Code § 2.12 and comparable state statutes, which seem to largely emphasize the "objective harmfulness of the conduct charged to the social interest protected by the statute in question." Stanislaw Pomorski, On Multiculturalism, Concepts of Crime, and the "De Minimis" Defense, 1997 B.Y.U. L. REV. 51, 94–98 (1997); but see Model Penal Code § 2.12, cmt. at 402 (describing the de minimis defense as an "ameliorative device[]" for ensuring that outcomes reflect the "proper level of the defendant's culpability."). That said, numerous state judicial decisions interpreting these Model Penal Code-based de minimis statutes extend "beyond the objective aspect of the offending conduct and have also found subjective, mental elements to have bearing on the issue of triviality of harm or evil." See also Anna Roberts, Dismissals As Justice, 69 ALA. L. REV. 327, 375-76 (2017) ("The traditional view within criminal law is that defendants' alleged motives are irrelevant to the question of liability. [Yet there exists a large] body of case law challenges that view. Again and again, one finds judges moved to dismiss in light of their assessment of defendants' motives. When those motives are ones esteemed as noble—when, for example, they are focused on the welfare of children—courts show no hesitation in deeming motive a ground for dismissal.").

For example, Hawaii's de minimis statute, while nearly identical to Model Penal Code § 2.12, is understood to implicitly incorporate various mental state-based factors, such as: "the background, experience and character of [an actor] which may indicate whether they knew of, or ought to have known, the requirements of [the prohibition violate[d]; the knowledge on the part of [an actor] of the consequences to be incurred by them upon the violation of the statute; [] the mitigating circumstances, if any, as to [an actor]; [] and any other data which may reveal the nature and degree of the culpability in the offense committed by [the actor]"). State v. Park, 55 Haw. 610, 617, 525 P.2d 586, 591 (1974) (interpreting Haw. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 702-236). And the New Jersey courts have offered a nearly identical reading of the state's Model Penal Code-based de minimis statute. State v. Halloran, 446 N.J. Super. 381, 386–87 (Law. Div. 2014) (interpreting N.J. Stat. Ann. § 2C:2-11); see, e.g., State v. Cabana, 315 N.J. Super. 84, 88 (Law. Div. 1997) (New Jersey's de minimis statute clearly "contemplates" a "threshold consideration of criminal culpability" which is "dependent upon the state of mind of the actor and [requires] a fact-sensitive analysis on a case by case basis.").

[7] For example, the actor need not be aware that they were acting pursuant to a customary license or that the legislature could not reasonably have envisioned the conduct at issue when creating the criminal offense.

interest was infringed nor inconsistent with the goal of the law defining the offense". This language is nearly identical to Model Penal Code § 2.12(1),[8] with only non-substantive language differences. Both RCC § 22E-215 and Model Penal Code § 2.12(1) would allow for dismissal when a neighbor who had previously been allowed to use a landowner's yard as a shortcut crossed land without first getting permission."[9] For various RCC offenses that involve lack of consent as an element,[10] or use the defined term "property of another" in RCC § 22E-701 (which in turn refers to consent), paragraph (a)(1) provides a mechanism to avoid liability when there was reliance on a customary license or tolerance that is not expressly refused.

Paragraph (a)(2) codifies two additional situations where judicial dismissal under RCC § 22E-215 may be appropriate in a particular case. The first situation is where the actor did not actually cause or threaten the harm or evil sought to be prevented by the law defining the offense. Such a mismatch between the formal articulation of an offense and the conduct of a particular case may arise in various ways.[11] One instance of such a mismatch addressed by this provision is when a person engages in a conspiracy, attempt, or similar inchoate offense, meeting all the elements, but there is little chance of success.[12] Another possibility that may occur under this provision is the occurrence of mitigating circumstances that so transform the character of the actor's conduct that it no longer fits the harm or evil targeted by the offense.[13] In determining whether the harm or evil sought to be prevented by the law is at issue in a particular case under this first prong of paragraph (a)(2), the court also may give weight to the attitude of the complainant with respect to the conduct.[14]

---

[8] Model Penal Code § 2.12 (1) ("was within a customary license or tolerance, neither expressly negatived by the person whose interest was infringed nor inconsistent with the purpose of the law defining the offense;").
[9] See Model Penal Code § 2.12 cmt. at 402-03; Commentary on Del. Reform Code § 209(a).
[10] RCC § 22E-1402, Criminal Restraint.
[11] See Stanislaw Pomorski, On Multiculturalism, Concepts of Crime, and the "De Minimis" Defense, 1997 B.Y.U. L. Rev. 51, 73–74 (1997) (discussing this prong of the corresponding MPC de minimis provision and stating: "As a general rule, acts in violation of statutory norms display antisocial qualities. However, this is not always so. In some presumably exceptional cases, a discrepancy develops between the abstract, general legal assessment, on the one hand, and the specific, fact-bound, substantive assessment on the other; conduct generally prohibited may have no antisocial substance in its individual, concrete manifestation. In such situations the decision maker confronts two conflicting assessments: legal and substantive. Consistent with the substantive concept of crime, the substantive assessment is given primacy over the formal, legal one.").
[12] Commentary to Model Penal Code § 2.12(2) ("This is a generalization of the provision in Section 5.05(2), which-provides for attempt, solicitation and conspiracy-all inchoate offenses that the prosecution can be dismissed in extreme cases if the particular conduct charged is "so inherently unlikely to result or culminate in-the commission of a crime-that neither such conduct nor the actor presents a public-danger….").
[13] Mitigating circumstances such as those recognized in murder case law might provide a basis for dismissal under paragraph (a)(2) even in the absence of an available defense. For example, a parent who witnesses the killing of their child and immediately afterward punches and kicks at the murderer as they retreat may not meet the requirements for any general justification or excuse defense as to their assault. However, conduct under such mitigating circumstances may not be fairly said to address the socially-destructive harm or evil targeted by the assault statute.
[14] For example, if the complainant does not experience the actor's conduct as harmful, that may (but need not) be relevant to the court's judgment whether, despite meeting the technical requirements of an offense, the actor's conduct in a given case does not actually cause or threaten the harm or evil sought to be prevented by the law. See, e.g., N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 170.40(1)(I) (McKinney 2007) (motion to dismiss in furtherance of justice includes judicial consideration of "where the court deems it appropriate, the attitude of the complainant or victim with respect to the motion."). See, generally, Anna Roberts, Dismissals As Justice,

The second situation described in paragraph (a)(2) involves an actor who causes or threatens a harm so trivial that the condemnation of a criminal conviction would not be warranted under the circumstances. This kind of situation is most likely to arise in the context of prosecutions for low-level offenses, which effectively draw the line between criminal and non-criminal conduct—for example, the misdemeanor versions of theft, destruction of property, assault, and drug possession. For offenses of this nature, it is difficult to draft the objective elements (or actus reus) in a manner that captures only those forms of conduct deserving of criminal sanction without also extending to at least some forms of conduct that are insufficiently blameworthy to warrant the condemnation of a criminal conviction.[15] It is therefore necessary to provide actors who engage in such conduct with a means of escaping criminal liability in the event they are subject to a criminal prosecution. This situation may also arise, however, in felony offenses where the harm addressed by the offense was actually committed but the harm was so minor that a conviction for the felony would be disproportionate.[16]

Illustrative examples of this second type of situation in paragraph (a)(2) include: (1) a prosecution for theft premised on the defendant's having intentionally stolen a single piece of chewing gum from a convenience store; (2) a prosecution for offensive physical contact premised on the defendant's having intentionally brushed up against co-riders on public transportation in an effort to be the first to the door; (3) a prosecution for destruction of property premised on the defendant's having intentionally stepped on one flower in another person's garden; (4) a prosecution for drug possession premised on the defendant's having intentionally held a plastic bag with microscopic but measurable amounts of cocaine inside; or (5) a complicity-based prosecution for any of the above misdemeanors premised on the defendant's having purposely assisted or encouraged similar acts principally perpetrated by another.

Paragraph (a)(3) establishes that a fourth situation when judicial dismissal is justified is when the conduct cannot reasonably be regarded as envisioned by the legislature in forbidding the charged offense.[17] This provision functions as a sort of "rule of reason in the interpretation of [a] []statute."[18] Unusual or novel circumstances, which go beyond what the legislative intent underlying passage of a given criminal statute can fairly be 69 Ala. L. Rev. 327, 330 (2017) (analyzing the common function of state statutes and judicial procedures allowing dismissals "in furtherance of justice" and "de minimis" prosecutions.").

---

[15] See OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES, THE COMMON LAW 108 (Boston, Little, Brown & Co. 1881) ("The standards of the law are standards of general application. The law takes no account of the infinite varieties of temperament, intellect, and education which make the internal character of a given act so different in different men. It does not attempt to see men as God sees them ….").

[16] The fact that certain conduct is too minor to warrant conviction under a given charge per RCC § 22E-215(a)(2) does not mean that a prosecution for that same conduct could not be successfully brought on another charge that is more appropriate. For example, while a minor harm may not warrant the condemnation of a felony conviction, the minor harm may warrant the condemnation of a misdemeanor conviction. Many RCC offenses are structured with lesser included offenses to provide prosecutorial discretion over which level of charge to bring.

[17] Compare Model Penal Code § 2.12(3) ("The Court shall dismiss a prosecution if," inter alia, "it finds that the defendant's conduct … presents such other extenuations that it cannot reasonably be regarded as envisaged by the legislature in forbidding the offense."); Id., cmt. at 404 ("In a sense, this suggests to the court a rule of reason in the interpretation of the basic statute, as indeed do the other provisions of this section."); N.J. Stat. Ann. § 2C:2-11(c) (same); Haw. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 702-236(1)(c) (same).

[18] Model Penal Code § 2.12(3).

understood to reach, are within the scope of subsection (a)(3). (In contrast, where the defendant's conduct is merely a typical instance of a statutory violation of a particular offense, paragraph (a)(3) is inapplicable.) Paragraph (a)(3) also covers conflicts and gaps between statutes that the legislature is unlikely to have been aware. For example, there may be instances where an actor's conduct occurs in the presence of one or more mitigating circumstances that come close to, but ultimately fail to establish, one or more recognized justification or excuse defenses under Chapters 4 and 5 of the RCC. Or the actor's conduct occurs in the presence of circumstances that call deeply into question the voluntariness of the actor's conduct under RCC § 22E-203, but ultimately pass muster under the terms of that statute. In these situations, it may well be that the legislature cannot reasonably have foreseen the particular interaction between the instant offense and the other statutory provisions. In such an instance, continuing to hold an actor liable for the offense may not meet the legislative intent.

Subsection (b) of the statute imposes a special findings requirement for a dismissal.[19] Specifically, the court is required to "state its specific findings of facts… or findings of law under this section in open court or in a written decision or opinion."[20] In addition, subsection (b) specifies the relevant burden of proof for findings of fact in support

---

[19] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.12 ("The Court shall not dismiss a prosecution under Subsection (3) of this Section without filing a written statement of its reasons.") (citing subsection (3), which authorizes a de minimis dismissal when the defendant's conduct "presents such other extenuations that it cannot reasonably be regarded as envisaged by the legislature in forbidding the offense"); Id., cmt. at 404 ("Because the authority in Subsection (3) [is] stated in terms of such generality, it is appropriate to require that the court explain, in a written opinion, its reasons when exercising the authority that the subsection grants."); see also Paul H. Robinson, Criminal Law Defenses, 1 Crim. L. Def. § 67 at 1 ("The requirement of written reasons may be useful in many situations, but it seems particularly useful where, as here, the court is stating what it believes to be the legislature's intent. These statements permit the legislature to easily review the court's interpretation and to take legislative action to overrule it if the court's interpretation is incorrect."); compare id. at 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 67 ("A few jurisdictions have extended this to require a written statement of reasons for a dismissal under any ground.") (collecting state statutes).

[20] This phrase should be construed in accordance with, the D.C. Superior Court Rules of Criminal Procedure. Id., Rule 23(c) ("In a case tried without a jury, the court must find the defendant guilty or not guilty. If a party requests before the finding of guilty or not guilty, the court must state its specific findings of fact in open court or in a written decision or opinion.") (italics added); see, e.g., Saidi v. United States, 110 A.3d 606, 612 (D.C. 2015) ("[S]pecial findings in a non-jury criminal trial inform an appellate court of the specific grounds relied on by the trial judge in reaching a verdict and enable the appellate court to undertake its review of the record with a clear understanding of the bases of the trial judge's decision.") (citations omitted).

Through such language, subsection (b) is also intended to further many of the same policy interests that underwrite the District's current approach to special findings. As the DCCA has observed:

> Special findings [] serve an important access to justice function and advance the goal of procedural fairness in the criminal justice system. A clear statement by a trial judge explaining the ruling in a case informs the parties of the reasons underlying the court's decision and provides critical assurance to an unsuccessful litigant that positions advanced at trial have been considered fairly and decided on the merits in accordance with governing law. The resulting increase in transparency promotes acceptance of the court's ruling and fosters compliance with its requirements.

Saidi, 110 A.3d at 612 (citing United States v. Snow, 484 F.2d 811, 812 (D.C. Cir. 1973) ("The requirement that a trial judge prepare findings which will cast light on his reasoning is not a trivial matter. It is an important element of fairness to the accused…. The existence of a rationale may not make the hurt pleasant, or even just. But the absence, or refusal, of reasons is a hallmark of injustice.")).

of dismissal—preponderance of the evidence. There is no restriction as to when the court may dismiss a prosecution, and a court ruling to dismiss under RCC § 22E-215 need not await the end of a trial if sufficient facts or law sooner establish the appropriateness of dismissal.

Subsection (c) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC and the D.C. Code.

Relation to Current District Law. RCC § 22E-215 changes current District law by establishing a judicial mechanism for those actors whose conduct, culpable mental state, or surrounding circumstances establish that they are insufficiently blameworthy to warrant the condemnation of a criminal conviction. Barring the imposition of criminal liability in this way improves the proportionality of District law.

While current District case law does not recognize what is commonly called a "de minimis" defense, it provides some support for its adoption. Specifically, the D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) has, in two cases, recognized the potential benefits of a de minimis defense.

The first case, Dunn v. United States,[21] involved an animal rights activist convicted of simple assault based on his slight, non-harmful shoving of a security guard, which occurred during a protest.[22] On appeal, the defendant argued that the misdemeanor assault conviction should be overturned "because his violation of the law, if any, was de minimis."[23] The DCCA ultimately declined the defendant's invitation to accept this kind of "de minimis defense" to assault through "judicial decree."[24] In so doing, however, the Dunn court observed that:

> Similar minor violations of the assault statute may well happen every day, yet it is exceedingly rare for the U.S. Attorney's Office to get involved. Why, then, should Dunn not be able to argue that his shove was too minor to warrant a criminal penalty?
>
> The answer is that [the defendant] fails to cite any authority for a de minimis defense in the District. Some jurisdictions have recognized de minimis-type defenses, but they have done so through legislation[]. New York, for instance, has a statute that permits trial judges to dismiss certain criminal charges where "some compelling factor, consideration or circumstances clearly demonstrat[es] that conviction or prosecution of the defendant . . . would constitute or result in injustice." N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 170.40(1) (1979). And a few other states have adopted provisions based on Model Penal Code § 2.12 (2001), which "authorizes courts to exercise a power inherent in other agencies of criminal justice to ignore merely technical violations of law." Id., Explanatory Note; see Stanislaw Pomorski, On Multiculturalism, Concepts of Crime, and the "De Minimis" Defense, 1997 B.Y.U. L. REV. 51 & n. 2; see, e.g., N.J. Stat. Ann. 2C:2-11

[21] 976 A.2d 217 (D.C. 2009).
[22] Specifically, the defendant "moved his hands only five to six inches in striking" the victim. Id. at 222.
[23] Id.
[24] Id.

> (2005); Me. Rev. Stat. Ann. 17-A, § 12 (2006); 18 Pa. Cons. Stat. § 312 (1998). The D.C. Council, however, has not joined ranks with the "very limited" number of states that have adopted the defense.[25]

Accordingly, while recognizing the potential merits of a de minimis defense, the Dunn court nevertheless concluded that it "lack[ed] the power to give [defendant] the relief that he seeks" in the absence of explicit legislative authorization.[26]

The second relevant case, Watson v. United States,[27] involved a simple assault conviction arising from a marital dispute. After an aggravating experience at the DMV, the defendant and his wife engaged in a "heated conversation" in the parking lot during which "his wife flipped open her mobile telephone to make a call, and he grabbed the phone's flip top to stop her, accidently breaking it loose."[28] The defendant was thereafter prosecuted for simple assault.[29]

At trial, and after the close of the government's case, the defendant submitted a motion for judgment of acquittal, which the court ultimately denied finding that the government had established a prima facie case of simple assault:

> [W]hile [the trial judge] had difficulty determining exactly what had occurred outside the DMV, appellant's own testimony about grabbing and breaking the mobile telephone was enough to establish an assault under [prior DCCA precedent]. The [trial judge] further found that [the defendant's] grabbing of the telephone was deliberate, that it occurred in the context of an argument, that it was unprovoked, and that it constituted a battery in that it was a touching without consent.[30]

Next, the defendant appealed his conviction for simple assault to the DCCA, "arguing that the government failed to prove the elements of assault beyond a reasonable doubt."[31] All three of the judges on the panel rejected this argument; however, one of the three—Judge Schwelb—wrote a separate opinion concurring in the judgment but dissenting in part from the analysis.[32]

In his separate opinion, Judge Schwelb argued that the defendant's conduct "was, at most, a de minimis and inconsequential violation of the assault statute," such that it was "disproportionate and unjust to saddle [the defendant] with a criminal conviction under all of the circumstances of this case."[33] However, "[i]n light of [the DCCA's] recent decision in Dunn v. United States," Judge Schwelb ultimately concluded that this "court lacks the power, in the absence of statutory authorization, to vacate Watson's conviction on de

[25] Id. at 222-23.
[26] Id. at 223.
[27] 979 A.2d 1254 (D.C. 2009).
[28] Id. at 1255.
[29] Id.
[30] Id.
[31] Id. at 1256.
[32] See id. at 1258.
[33] Id.

minimis grounds."[34] Nevertheless, Judge Schwelb also thought it important to explain why he believed that it would be "appropriate to propose a legislative remedy for this type of situation."[35] Specifically, Judge Schwelb suggested that:

> [T]he Council of the District of Columbia consider adopting the approach of the Model Penal Code (MPC) § 2.12 (2001), as several other jurisdictions have done, see Brent G. Filbert, Annotation: Defense of Inconsequential or De Minimis Violation in Criminal Prosecution, 68 A.L.R. 5th 299 (1999 & Supp. 2006), and that District of Columbia courts be authorized to dismiss criminal charges where the circumstances "clearly demonstrat[e] that conviction or prosecution of the defendant . . . would constitute or result in injustice." N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 170.40(1) (1979) (quoted in Dunn, at 223).[36]

In support of this proposal, Judge Schwelb's separate opinion provides a comprehensive overview of national legal trends (at the time) relevant to adoption of statutory de minimis provisions, beginning with the basis for many such provisions, Model Penal Code § 2.12, which "provides in pertinent part as follows":

> De Minimis Infractions.

---

[34] Id. The defense originates from the common law maxim "de minimis non curat lex," which means that "the law does not concern itself with trifling matters." 68 A.L.R. 5th 299 (1999); see Watson, 979 A.2d at 1258 n.1.

[35] Id. On this point, Judge Schwelb observed that:

> Although proposing a legislative remedy to a problem raised in a particular case goes beyond a judge's conventional responsibilities, courts (or concurring or dissenting judges) occasionally do so in the interests of justice. "We have heretofore deemed it appropriate in an opinion to suggest statutory changes." Zalkind v. Scheinman, 139 F.2d 895, 898 n. 3(b) (2d Cir.1943) (Frank, J., joined by Learned Hand, J.) (citations omitted); see also Moravian School Advisory Bd. v. Rawlins, 70 F.3d 270, 279 (3rd Cir. 1995) (Becker, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part); Am. Mach. & Metals, Inc. v. De Bothezat Impeller Co., Inc., 173 F.2d 890, 893 (2d Cir.1949) (Frank, J., dissenting); Parke-Davis & Co. v. H.K. Mulford Co., 189 F. 95, 115 (C.C.S.D.N.Y. 1911) (Learned Hand, J.).

Watson, 979 A.2d at 1258 n.2.

[36] Id. at 1258–59. Judge Schwelb's separate opinion caught the eye of at least one commentator, who summarized it accordingly:

> [I]n a recent District of Columbia case, one concurring judge wished that the court were able to dismiss on grounds that the prosecution was de minimis. Give us what Hawaii and New Jersey have, he urged the legislature, as he was forced to go along with the affirmation of a conviction for snatching at a cell phone at the end of a long hot day at the Department of Motor Vehicles. "De minimis non curat lex" read the heading of his opinion, but his call to reclaim this principle went unheeded.

Anna Roberts, Dismissals As Justice, 69 ALA. L. REV. 327, 338 (2017).

The Court shall dismiss a prosecution[37] if, having regard to the nature of the conduct charged to constitute an offense and the nature of the attendant circumstances, it finds that the defendant's conduct:

(1) was within a customary license or tolerance, neither expressly negatived by the person whose interest was infringed nor inconsistent with the purpose of the law defining the offense; or

(2) did not actually cause or threaten the harm or evil sought to be prevented by the law defining the offense or did so only to an extent too trivial to warrant the condemnation of conviction . . . .[38]

From there, Judge Schwelb's separate opinion proceeds to observe that:

> The exercise by a court of the power to dismiss a prosecution by resort to the maxim "de minimis non curat lex" is judicial in nature, and the vesting of that authority in the judicial branch does not contravene the doctrine of separation of powers. State v. Park, 55 Haw. 610, 525 P.2d 586, 592 (1974).
>
> The purpose of a de minimis statute is to remove "petty" infractions from the reach of the criminal law. In re R.W., 855 A.2d 107, 109 (Pa. Super. Ct. 2004). Under these provisions, dismissal of a prosecution by the court is contemplated where no harm was done by the defendant either to the victim or to society. Commonwealth v. Moses, 350 Pa.Super. 231, 504 A.2d 330, 332 (1986). Dismissal is appropriate where the matter is too trivial to warrant the condemnation of a conviction, for "mere trifles or technicalities must yield to practical common sense and substantial justice." State v. Brown, 188 N.J.Super. 656, 458 A.2d 165, 169 (1983) (citation omitted). "The Legislature in recognition of the serious consequences which may attend a conviction has granted this dismissal option to avoid an injustice in a case of technical but trivial guilt." Smith, supra note 10, 480 A.2d at 241.
>
> The de minimis doctrine is designed to provide the court with discretion similar to that exercised by the police, prosecutors and grand jurors, who constantly make decisions as to whether it is appropriate to seek a conviction under the particular circumstances. State v. Wells, 336 N.J.Super. 139, 763 A.2d 1279, 1281 (2000). That discretion is appropriately exercised by the court, which is the institution best equipped to resolve such issues impartially. In exercising its discretion, the court may consider a wide variety of "attendant circumstances." Park, 525 P.2d

[37] As Judge Schwelb observes: "The statutes of at least two states provide that the court 'may' rather than 'shall' dismiss a prosecution if the conditions set forth in those statutes are met. See N.J. Stat. Ann. § 2C:2.11[]; Haw. Rev. Stat. § 702-236(1)." Watson, 979 A.2d at 1265 n.15.
[38] Watson, 979 A.2d at 1265.

> at 591; Cabana, 716 A.2d at 579 (defendant's conduct "under the de minimis statute is not viewed in isolation, but coupled with the surrounding circumstances which play an integral part herein to explain the what, why and how of defendant's intent.").[39]

Judge Schwelb's separate opinion also specifically focuses on the New Jersey Law Revision Commission's recommendation to adopt that state's de minimis statute, which highlighted that:

> [T]he police, prosecutors and grand jurors must frequently deal with the question whether particular conduct merits prosecution and conviction. The Commission surmised that some judges may also decline to convict defendants for technical violations if the conviction would bring about an absurd result. The Commission continued:
>
> > The drafters of the MPC summarize all of this as a "kind of unarticulated authority to mitigate the general provisions of the criminal law to prevent absurd applications." In order to bring this exercise of discretion to the surface and to be sure that it is exercised uniformly throughout the judicial system, [the de minimis] Section of the Code has been included.[40]

Based on the above analysis, Judge Schwelb's separate opinion proceeds to argue that the record in the Watson case itself "reflects the soundness of a policy which would permit a court to act as a gatekeeper, and, at least, to give serious consideration to vacating Watson's conviction."[41] In so doing, Judge Schwelb was careful not to "criticize the government for initiating the prosecution, for the accusation directed at Watson by his wife was not de minimis, and probable cause existed for charging an assault based on arm-twisting and the like."[42] Nevertheless, Judge Schwelb asserted that "once the judge had made his findings and rejected Ms. Sellers-Watson's most serious allegations, it was at least arguably unjust and disproportionate to burden Watson with a criminal conviction."[43]

With that in mind, and in closing, Judge Schwelb's separate opinion again specifically:

> recommends a legislative remedy in this case . . . because, in [his] view, the adoption of the relevant provisions of the MPC (or of the Hawaii and New Jersey variations of the MPC) would promote justice by protecting citizens from significant burdens attendant upon a criminal conviction when they have committed, at most, trifling and essentially harmless violations of the law. "Proportionality is of consummate importance in judicious adjudication." Allen v. United States, 603 A.2d 1219, 1227 (D.C. 1992) (en

[39] Watson, 979 A.2d at 1265–66.
[40] Watson, 979 A.2d at 1267.
[41] Id.
[42] Id.
[43] Watson, 979 A.2d at 1267-68.

banc), cert. denied 505 U.S. 1227, 112 S.Ct. 3050, 120 L.Ed.2d 916 (1992).[44]

Consistent with the above considerations of District law, national legal trends, and policy analysis, legislative adoption of a de minimis defense—codified here as RCC § 22E-215, minimal or unforeseen harms—is both appropriate and necessary under the circumstances.[45] Compelling considerations of legislative drafting further bolster this conclusion. Ideally, for example, the District's criminal statutes should be drafted sufficiently narrow as to exclude de minimis conduct from criminal liability in the first place. However, as a practical matter, drafting offenses that solely extend to actors whose conduct and accompanying state of mind are sufficiently blameworthy to warrant the condemnation of a criminal conviction, without also creating gaps in coverage, is extremely difficult. Therefore, while the offenses in the RCC's Special Part strive to achieve that goal to the extent possible, the employment of RCC § 22E-215 is essential to facilitating the overall proportionality of District law.

RCC § 22E-215 is based on, but departs in minor ways from, Model Penal Code § 2.12. Unlike Model Penal Code § 2.12, the RCC approach to a de minimis defense does two critical things. First, RCC § 22E-215 explicitly clarifies that mental state considerations are a central part of the de minimis analysis—whereas Model Penal Code § 2.12 is silent as to culpable mental states. Second, RCC § 22E-215 specifies a preponderance of the evidence standard for findings of fact in support of dismissal—in contrast to the Model Penal Code § 2.12, which does not specify any evidentiary burden on which dismissal must be based. Third, unlike Model Penal Code § 2.12 but following other states' codification of a de minimis defense, [46] RCC § 22E-215 states that the court "may" (rather than "shall") dismiss a case under the stated conditions. This clarifies the discretionary nature of the dismissal. [47] Fourth, the revised statute, like some other

---

[44] Id.

[45] It should be noted that while only "four states (Hawaii, Maine, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania) and Guam enacted statutes based on MPC 2.12," "[f]ifteen states and Puerto Rico have enacted statutes that give the courts power to dismiss a prosecution in furtherance of justice." Anna Roberts, Dismissals As Justice, 69 ALA. L. REV. 327, 332 n. 32 (2017) (collecting citations).

For a sense of the range of conduct to which de minimis statutes apply, consider the following dismissals; State v. Akina, 828 P.2d 269 (Haw. 1992) (giving shelter to a runaway teenager ("custodial interference")); New Jersey v. Bazin, 912 F. Supp. 106 (D.N.J. 1995) (verbal harassment); State v. Zarrilli, 523 A.2d 284 (N.J. Super. Ct. Law Div. 1987) (taking a single sip of beer by an underage boy attending a church function); State v. Smith, 480 A.2d 236 (N.J. Super. Ct. Law Div. 1984) (shoplifting three pieces of bubble gum worth 15¢); State v. Nevens, 485 A.2d 345 (N.J. Super. Ct. Law Div. 1984) (taking fruit from the premises of a buffet-type restaurant after paying for the meal); Commonwealth v. Moll, 543 A.2d 1221 (Pa. Super. Ct. 1988) (damaging a drainage pipe belonging to the town to prevent flooding of the defendant's land (mischief)); Commonwealth v. Jackson, 510 A.2d 1389 (Pa. Super. Ct. 1986) (riot and failure to disperse by prison inmates upon official order); Commonwealth v. Houck, 335 A.2d 389 (Pa. Super. Ct. 1975) (verbal harassment—calling the victim on the phone "morally rotten" and "lower than dirt"); see also State v. Cabana, 315 N.J. Super. 84, 716 A.2d 576 (Law Div. 1997), aff'd without opinion, 318 N.J. Super. 259, 723 A.2d 635 (App. Div. 1999) (defendant's conduct in striking a fellow politician's chin while waving a flier during a confrontation was an "offensive touching" not sufficiently serious to warrant prosecution for a simple assault).

[46] See, e.g., Haw. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 702-236 (West); Me. Rev. Stat. tit. 17-A, § 12.

[47] Paul H. Robinson, Criminal Law Defenses, 1 Crim. L. Def. § 67 ("[U]nder Model Penal Code § 2.12 the court is directed to 'dismiss a prosecution' when the requirements of the defense are met. It can thus provide authorities,[48] requires a judicial statement of reasons for a dismissal under any prong ((a)(1)-(a)(3)) of the revised statute rather than just the legislative intent prong in Model Penal Code § 2.12(3). These minor departures clarify and improve the operation of the provision.

not just a defense to conviction, but also a bar to prosecution. However, some jurisdictions have altered the Model Penal Code's 'shall dismiss' to a permissive 'may dismiss,' in an attempt to give the court broader discretion in the matter.") (collecting statutes).

[48] See, e.g., Me. Rev. Stat. tit. 17-A, § 12.

RCC § 22E-216. Minimum Age for Offense Liability.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes a minimum age for offense liability for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The RCC minimum age for offense liability statute establishes 12 as the minimum age for a child to be held liable for an offense. As criminal charges against children under 12 are otherwise barred by District law, the exception to liability for those under 12 applies to delinquency proceedings. The RCC minimum age for offense liability statute replaces the common law defense of doli incapax that may still be applicable in the District

Subsection (a) specifies that an actor does not commit an offense[49] when the actor, in fact, is under 12 years of age. Paragraph (a) uses the defined term "in fact" to specify that there is no culpable mental state required as to the age of the actor. Per RCC § 22E-201, if there is any evidence of the statutory exclusion, the government must prove the absence of all elements of the exclusion beyond a reasonable doubt.

Subsection (b) specifies that when a person is liable for an offense based on the conduct of another, that person remains liable for the offense notwithstanding the fact that the conduct is committed by a person under 12 years of age. The subsection clarifies that the fact that one person is not liable because they are under 12 years of age, does not affect the offense liability of others based on the conduct of the 12 year old. For example, liability as an accomplice under RCC § 22E-210, for conspiracy under RCC § 22E-303, or for the contributing to the delinquency of a minor offense under RCC § 22E-4601 based on the conduct of another is the same regardless of the fact that the other person is under 12 and not themselves liable for an offense under subsection (a).

Subsection (c) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC and the D.C. Code.

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC minimum age for offense liability clearly changes current District law in one main ways.

The RCC developmental incapacity provision bars liability for any offense for all actors under 12 years of age but does not bar liability for those 12 or 13 years of age. The current D.C. Code is silent[50] as to whether there is any minimum age of liability for juvenile delinquency proceedings,[51] and there is no case law on point. However, the D.C.

---

[49] As discussed below, the statute effectively precludes juvenile delinquency proceedings for persons under 12 years of age. See D.C. Code § 16–2301(7) ("The term 'delinquent act' means an act designated as an offense under the law of the District of Columbia, or of a State if the act occurred in a State, or under Federal law. Traffic offenses shall not be deemed delinquent acts unless committed by an individual who is under the age of sixteen.").

[50] The current D.C. Code is silent as to virtually all general defenses to criminal liability, including frequently used defenses such self-defense. These defenses exist solely as a matter of common law, statutorily recognized through the reception statute, D.C. Code § 45–401(a). The only general defense recognized in the D.C. Code is an insanity defense, which applies to juvenile delinquency and criminal proceedings. See D.C. Code § 24–501(c) ("When any person tried upon an indictment or information for an offense, or tried in the Family Division of the Superior Court of the District of Columbia for an offense, is acquitted solely on the ground that he was insane at the time of its commission, that fact shall be set forth by the jury in their verdict.").

[51] The D.C. Code contains jurisdictional provisions that refer to maximum ages for delinquency proceedings, but these jurisdictional provisions are silent as to any minimum age of liability. D.C. Code § 11–1101 states, in relevant part, that the Family Court of the Superior Court has jurisdiction over "proceedings in which a

Code "reception statute" broadly provides that the common law remains in force except insofar as it is "inconsistent with, or [] replaced by" statute.[52] At common law, the doli incapax rule provides that a child under age 7 is incapable of committing an offense,[53] and there is a rebuttable presumption that a child ages 7-13 is incapable of committing an offense.[54] There does not appear to be any statement by Congressional or District legislators that the creation of a juvenile delinquency system in the District or other legislation was intended to displace the common law doli incapax doctrine for children.[55] child, as defined in § 16-2301, is alleged to be delinquent, neglected, or in need of supervision." A "child" in turn is defined by D.C. Code § 16-2301(3) as "an individual who is under 18 years of age" while excluding certain 16- and 17-year-olds charged by the United States Attorney with certain crimes or charged with a traffic offense.

---

Recently, the Council specified in D.C. Code § 16–2320(c)(2) a minimum age of 10, for transfer of custody of delinquent children to the Department of Youth Rehabilitation Services (DYRS). See Committee on the Judiciary, Report on Bill 21-0683, the "Comprehensive Youth Justice Amendment Act of 2016" (Oct. 5, 2016) at 7-8 (citing other states' minimum age for delinquency adjudication but noting the bill only limits commitment to DYRS). This appears to be the first record of legislative discussion of a minimum age for criminal responsibility and does not address the applicability of a common law defense or address prosecution of children although this latter point was raised by a public witness. See Statement of Tim Curry, Director of Training and Technical Assistance, National Juvenile Defender Center (May 31, 2016) in Committee on the Judiciary, Report on Bill 21-0683, the "Comprehensive Youth Justice Amendment Act of 2016" (Oct. 5, 2016) at 364-365.

[52] D.C. Code § 45–401(a) ("The common law, all British statutes in force in Maryland on February 27, 1801, the principles of equity and admiralty, all general acts of Congress not locally inapplicable in the District of Columbia, and all acts of Congress by their terms applicable to the District of Columbia and to other places under the jurisdiction of the United States, in force in the District of Columbia on March 3, 1901, shall remain in force except insofar as the same are inconsistent with, or are replaced by, some provision of the 1901 Code.").

[53] See, Adams v. State, 262 A.2d 69, 71-72 (Md. 1980) ("Since the Code of Hammurabi (circa 2250 B.C.) and down through the ages, society, under the law, has viewed and treated offenders of tender years in a light differently and more favorably than that accorded adults accused of breaching the law. Over the centuries and during the evolution of the common law of England, there emerged a rule of law governing 'the responsibility of infants' under which an individual below the age of seven years cannot be found guilty of committing a crime; an individual above fourteen years charged with a crime is to be adjudged as an adult; and between the ages of seven and fourteen there is a rebuttable presumption that such individual is incapable of committing a crime. In the absence of any pertinent legislative enactment in this State, the common law principles, as stated above, would appear to govern in Maryland and we so hold."); Linkins v. Protestant Episcopal Cathedral Found. of the D.C., 187 F.2d 357, 360 (D.C. Cir. 1950) ("The common law, particularly as derived from the common law of Maryland, is the fundamental part of the law in this jurisdiction to which we look in the absence of statutory enactment." (internal citation omitted)). The only record the CCRC has located of incapax doli being used under the common law in the District dates to 1822. John Young, a 13-year-old "free boy" held three months in a "loathsome gaol" on a charge of theft, claimed to be incapax doli in a habeas petition to the District of Columbia Circuit Court. See Marguerite Ross Howell and Nicole Marcon Mazgaj, The Southern Debate Over Slavery: Petitions to Southern county courts, 1775-1867 at 113 (2001).

[54] Allen v. United States, 150 U.S. 551, 558 (1893). This presumption was conclusive as to charges of rape and "the weight of the presumption was said to decrease as the child approached the age of discretion. 2 Subst. Crim. L. § 9.6(a) (3d ed.).

[55] To date, CCRC research has found no case law or legislative history on point and the agency's Advisory Group members have not provided any case law or legislative history indicating that the doli incapax doctrine is no longer good law. Notably, however, District case law does generally describe the juvenile delinquency system created by Congress—as far back as the first Juvenile Court in 1906—as intended to benefit juveniles and, accordingly, statutory language should be strictly construed insofar as it may lead to detention. See, In re Poff, 135 F. Supp. 224, 225 (D.D.C 1955) ("The original Juvenile Court Act enacted in the District of Absent evidence that the juvenile delinquency system in District law was to replace the common law doctrine, it appears that the doli incapax doctrine remains current law in the District and while delinquency proceedings notwithstanding the apparent lack of any modern litigation or prosecutorial policy regarding the doctrine in the District. In contrast, the RCC minimum age for offense liability specifies that an actor does not commit an offense when the actor is a child under 12. This minimum age of responsibility is supported by recent brain science research on the capacity of young children[56] and criminological research indicating that involvement of young children in the juvenile justice system increases future criminal behavior.[57] A minimum age of 12 is consistent with minimum standards of international law[58] and recent state reforms.[59] This change improves the proportionality of the revised statutes.

Beyond this one change to current District law, one other aspect of the revised statute may constitute a substantive change to District law.

The RCC minimum age for offense liability statute specifies that whenever an actor is liable for an offense based on the conduct of another person, the fact that the other person is a child under 12 (and not themselves liable for an offense under RCC § 22E-216(a)) does not relieve the actor of liability. The current D.C. Code is silent as to whether there is a minimum age of liability for an offense, let alone whether a person who is an accomplice Columbia in 1906, [], was devised to afford the juvenile protections in addition to those he already possessed under the Federal Constitution…In order that the beneficient purpose of the act may be effectuated, it should be construed liberally, except in-so-far as it purports to restrain the liberty of the child, in which case it should be strictly construed.[]" (internal citations omitted)); see also United States v. Tucker, 407 A.2d 1067, 1070 (D.C. 1979) ("Moreover, we believe that in view of the rehabilitative purposes of our juvenile justice system, D.C.Code 1973, s 16-2301(3) should be strictly construed against the prosecution and in favor of the person being proceeded against.").

---

[56] See, e.g., Thomas Grisso et al., Juveniles' Competence to Stand Trial: A Comparison of Adolescents' and Adults' Capacities as Trial Defendants, 27 Law & Hum. Behav. 333, 356 (2003) ("Our results indicate that juveniles aged 15 and younger are significantly more likely than older adolescents and young adults to be impaired in ways that compromise their ability to serve as competent defendants in a criminal proceeding."); see also Committee on the Judiciary, Report on Bill 21-0683, the "Comprehensive Youth Justice Amendment Act of 2016" (Oct. 5, 2016) at 3-4 (citing child development research indicating the differences in adolescent brain development).

[57] See Anthony Petrosino, Carolyn Turpin-Petrosino, and Sarah Guckenburg, Formal System Processing of Juveniles: Effects on Delinquency, No. 9 of Crime Prevention Research Review, U.S. Department of Justice, Office of Community Oriented Policing Services (2013) (examining the results of 29 randomized controlled trials, finding no evidence that formally moving juveniles through the juvenile justice system has a crime control effect and, in fact, processing increased delinquency); Barry Holman and Jason Zeidenburg, Dangers of Detention: The Impact of Incarcerating Youth in Detention and Other Secure Facilities, Justice Policy Institute (2013) (reviewing costs and effects of juvenile detention and alternatives).

[58] See United Nations Committee on the Rights of the Child, General Comment No. 10: Children's rights in juvenile justice (2007) at paragraph 32 ("From these recommendations, it can be concluded that a minimum age of criminal responsibility below the age of 12 years is considered by the Committee not to be internationally acceptable. States parties are encouraged to increase their lower MACR to the age of 12 years as the absolute minimum age and to continue to increase it to a higher age level.").

[59] See, e.g., California and Massachusetts recently adopting a minimum age of 12. Cal. Welf. & Inst. Code § 602 (2019); Mass. Gen. Laws Ann. ch. 119, § 52 (2018). Note, however, that California law provides exceptions for murder and certain sex offenses. Cal. Welf. & Inst. Code § 602. The Massachusetts reform has been in operation long enough that analyses of its effects have been published, with favorable findings. See Massachusetts Juvenile Justice Policy and Data Board, Early Impacts of "An Act Relative to Criminal Justice Reform," (Nov. 2019).

to,[60] conspires with,[61] or is otherwise liable for the actions of another remains liable when the other person is a young child who is immune from liability. There is no District case law on point. The District's current contributing to the delinquency of a minor (CDM) statute is clear that there is no defense to the crime that the "minor does not engage in" conduct described in the offense.[62] However, the elements of CDM require in relevant part for a person to "invite, solicit, recruit, assist, support, cause, encourage, enable, induce, advise, incite, facilitate, permit, or allow the minor to…violate any criminal law of the District of Columbia,"[63] and it remains unclear whether the offense elements can be satisfied with regard to a very young child for whom it is legally impossible to violate a District criminal law. There is no case law on point. Resolving these ambiguities, the revised statute specifies that an actor who is otherwise liable for an offense based on the conduct of another remains liable for the offense even though the other is a person under 12 years of age who is not liable under subsection (a) of the statute. This change clarifies and improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statutes.

[60] D.C. Code §22-1805 ("In prosecutions for any criminal offense all persons advising, inciting, or conniving at the offense, or aiding or abetting the principal offender, shall be charged as principals and not as accessories, the intent of this section being that as to all accessories before the fact the law heretofore applicable in cases of misdemeanor only shall apply to all crimes, whatever the punishment may be.").
[61] D.C. Code §22-1805a.
[62] D.C. Code §22-811(d).
[63] D.C. Code §22-811(a).

RCC § 22E-301. Criminal Attempt.

Explanatory Note. RCC § 22E-301 provides a comprehensive statement of general attempt liability under the RCC. This statement establishes the culpable mental state requirement and conduct requirement of a criminal attempt, the relationship between a criminal attempt and the target offense, and the penalties applicable to a criminal attempt. Section 301 replaces the District's current general attempt statute, D.C. Code § 22-1803.

Paragraphs (a)(1) and (a)(2) establish two basic culpability principles governing general attempt liability. The first principle, set forth in paragraph (a)(1), is that an attempt entails proof that the defendant "plans to engage in conduct constituting an offense."[1] Paragraph (a)(1) uses "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that here means there is no culpable mental state requirement that must be proven as to the actor planning to engage in conduct constituting an offense. This planning requirement is the foundation of attempt liability[2]; it communicates the basic tenet that attempting to commit an offense involves, among other things, being committed to a course of conduct that, if carried out, would[3] satisfy the objective elements of that offense.[4]

---

[1] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.01(1)(c) (liability for incomplete attempt entails proof of, inter alia, "a course of conduct planned to culminate in his commission of the crime").

[2] See, e.g., Gideon Yaffe, Criminal Attempts, 124 YALE L.J. 92, 109 (2014) ("Plans play various roles in making possible and effective organized behavior that takes place over extended periods of time."); Paul H. Robinson, A Functional Analysis of Criminal Law, 88 NW. U. L. REV. 857, 864 (1994) (planning requirement, referred to as "future conduct intention," has "a critical independent role to play" in criminal code); Larry Alexander & Kimberly D. Kessler, Mens Rea and Inchoate Crimes, 87 J. CRIM. L. & CRIMINOLOGY 1138, 1170 (1997) ("[T]he most coherent justification [for attempt liability] rests on the assumption that forming an intention to engage in future criminal conduct is itself a culpable act[.]").

[3] That is, assuming "the situation was as the actor perceived it," which is a requirement of the RCC criminal attempt statute and is discussed later in this commentary.

[4] See, e.g., Michael T. Cahill, Defining Inchoate Crime: An Incomplete Attempt, 9 OHIO ST. J. CRIM. L. 751, 755 (2012) (with a charge of attempted purposeful murder, "the key question is not (only) whether the actor desires the death of the victim, but whether he is committed to a course of conduct that would, if completed, bring about the death of the victim"); Gideon Yaffe, Attempt, Risk-Creation, and Change of Mind: Reflections on Herzog, 9 OHIO ST. J. CRIM. L. 779, 781 (2012) ("To attempt murder is to have an intention that commits one to causing another's death and to be guided by that intention in one's conduct.").

This planning requirement is largely implicit in the other elements of a criminal attempt. For example, to hold that a defendant arrested by the police two blocks away from a bank in possession of a mask and firearm was "dangerously close to completing" a bank robbery, see RCC § 22E-301(a)(4)(A), necessarily entails a determination that the defendant was planning to engage in conduct that, but for the police intervention, would have culminated in a bank robbery. Conversely, if the only reason the defendant's criminal scheme failed is because the bank manager, upon threat of death, was unable or unwilling to hand over physical currency, then the requisite plans would be established by the fact that the defendant's scheme was actually carried out.

This planning requirement is to be distinguished from the voluntariness requirement under RCC § 22E-203. The voluntariness requirement, which implicates what is sometimes referred to as a "present conduct intention," can be "satisfied simply by showing that the actor did in fact intend to perform the bodily movements that he performed." Paul H. Robinson, A Functional Analysis of Criminal Law, 88 NW. U. L. REV. 857, 864 (1994) . In contrast, the planning requirement, which implicates what is sometimes referred to as a "future conduct intention," "serves to show that the actor is planning to do more than what he has already done." Id.

In this sense, the term "planning" as employed in this section is substantively identical to the term "intent" under RCC § 22E-206, and thus should not be read to incorporate additional requirements such as premeditation or deliberation (i.e. a person who, having been provoked, is stopped by police immediately

The second principle, set forth in paragraph (a)(2), establishes an additional aspect of the conduct requirement governing attempt liability—that the defendant's conduct must have been "reasonably adapted" to completion of the target offense.[5] This reasonable adaptation requirement is intended to limit attempt liability to those situations where there exists a basic relationship between the defendant's conduct and the criminal objective sought to be achieved.[6] Requiring the government to establish this basic relationship both limits the risk that innocent conduct will be misconstrued as criminal and precludes convictions for inherently impossible attempts.[7] Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § prior to firing his weapon in retaliation has "planned" to kill). Paragraph (a)(1) of the RCC criminal attempt statute could have just as easily been drafted to state "intending to engage in conduct constituting [an] offense," however, that drafting would potentially cause confusion between the planning requirement and the culpability required of the target offense. See RCC § 22E-301(a)(2) (defendant must act "with the culpability required for the [target] offense").

---

For example, an actor may plan to carry out a course of conduct that, if completed, would cause the prohibited result of death without being culpable at all—as would be the case where a demolition operator is stopped just before destroying an apparently abandoned building that, unbeknownst to the operator, is occupied by a person who would have died in the ensuing destruction. Alternatively, that same demolition operator may have sought to cause that result culpably, e.g., if the operator knew that a person was residing in the building and acted with the intent to kill. In both versions of the hypothetical, the question of whether the operator acted with the culpable mental state requirement of murder (i.e. whether the operator intended to kill the occupant) is a separate and distinct question from whether the operator "planned to engage in conduct constituting" murder (i.e. whether the operator planned to demolish the building, which was in fact occupied). Use of the term "planning," as opposed to "with intent," in paragraph (a)(1) helps to distinguish these concepts.

[5] RCC § 22E-301(a)(2). This standard is drawn directly from D.C. Court of Appeals case law. E.g., Seeney v. United States, 563 A.2d 1081, 1083 (D.C. 1989); Robinson v. United States, 608 A.2d 115, 116 (D.C. 1992); Johnson v. United States, 756 A.2d 458, 463 n.3 (D.C. 2000). However, numerous other jurisdictions employ comparable standards, whether through case law or by statute. See John F. Preis, Witch Doctors and Battleship Stalkers: The Edges of Exculpation in Entrapment Cases, 52 VAND. L. REV. 1869, 1902-04 (1999) (collecting relevant legal authorities); compare Model Penal Code § 5.05(2) (providing sentencing mitigation for an attempt that "is so inherently unlikely to result or culminate in the commission of a crime that neither such conduct nor the actor presents a public danger warranting the grading of such offense under this Section").

[6] See, e.g., Edwin R. Keedy*, Criminal Attempts at Common Law*, 102 U. PA. L. REV. 464, 469 (1954) (where "the means employed are not reasonably adapted to carry out" the actor's intent to commit a crime, an attempt conviction is not justified "for in such case there can be no damage or danger of damage"); Ken Levy, It's Not Too Difficult: A Plea to Resurrect the Impossibility Defense, 45 N.M. L. REV. 225, 273 (2014) ("[I]t is difficult to see how a state could justify criminalizing [an attempt which lacks this basic relationship.] Criminalizing attempted murder by means of implausible causal theories seems dangerously close to criminalizing the sincere hope that somebody dies accompanied by the slightest act in this direction—for example, a diary entry. And this kind of infringement on a person's thoughts is not only unjust; it is unconstitutional.").

[7] Inherent impossibility is an issue in attempt prosecutions where the defendant "employs means which a reasonable man would view as totally inappropriate to the objective sought." WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.5(a)(4) at 2 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019); see also Peter Westen, Impossibility Attempts: A Speculative Thesis, 5 OHIO ST. J. CRIM. L. 523, 564 (2008) (attempt liability should entail proof that the defendant was "a substantial threat to the interests that the law declaring X to be an offense seeks to protect"). Conduct of this nature would not be "reasonably adapted" to completion of the target offense under paragraph (a)(2), and, therefore, could constitute a (failure of proof) defense to attempt liability under the RCC. In practice, however, it will take more than a "routine miscalculation of attendant circumstances, as in cases of factual or hybrid [] impossibility," to call into question the necessary relationship between the defendant's conduct and the criminal objective sought to be achieved. See John F. Preis, Witch Doctors and Battleship Stalkers: The Edges of Exculpation in Entrapment Cases, 52 VAND. L. REV. 1869, 1904 (1999). Rather, only

22E-207, the "in fact" specified in paragraph (a)(1) applies to the elements in paragraph (a)(2) and there is no culpable mental state required for the fact that the actor engages in conduct that is reasonably adapted to completion of the offense. Paragraph (a)(3) requires that the defendant acts with "the culpability required for the [target] offense."[8] Pursuant to this principle, a defendant may not be convicted of a criminal attempt absent proof that he or she acted with, at minimum, the culpable mental state(s)[9]—in addition to any broader aspect of culpability[10]—required to establish that offense.[11] Per the rules of

---

"an exceedingly unreasonable miscalculation of circumstances" would be relevant (insofar as impossibility is concerned) to the determination of whether the reasonable adaptation standard is met. Id.

So, for example, the fact that the defendant in an attempted murder prosecution tried to kill the victim by pulling the trigger on a broken firearm that she mistakenly believed to be operable would not call into question whether the defendant's conduct was reasonably adapted to the completion of murder. In contrast, the fact that a defendant in an attempted murder prosecution tried to kill the victim by shooting a fully functional firearm at a voodoo doll with the victim's picture attached to it would be relevant—and ultimately preclude the attachment of attempt liability under the RCC criminal attempt statute. See, e.g., Edwin R. Keedy*, Criminal Attempts at Common Law*, 102 U. PA. L. REV. 464, 470 (1954) (where the defendant "invokes witchcraft, charms, incantations, maledictions, hexing or voodoo," such conduct "cannot constitute an attempt to murder since the means employed are not in any way adapted to accomplish the intended result") (collecting authorities).

[8] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.01(1) (government must prove that the defendant "acted with the kind of culpability otherwise required for commission of the crime").

[9] It is possible, and may sometimes be necessary, to distinguish between an attemptor's state of mind as to: the planning requirement; the result elements of the target offense; and the circumstance elements of the target offense.

To illustrate, consider the situation of an individual who is arrested by police just as he's about to set off an explosive device near an unmarked metropolitan police department building in the middle of a work day. This individual is subsequently prosecuted for attempting to murder a police officer under a statute that prohibits: "(1) knowingly killing another person, (2) reckless as to whether the person is a police officer." On these facts, the defendant satisfies the planning requirement, namely, he planned to engage in conduct that, if carried out, would have resulted in the death of a police officer. Likewise, the defendant also seems to satisfy the culpable mental state governing the result element incorporated into prong (1), namely, he either desired to kill or was practically certain that his conduct would result in the death of a person (i.e. the unmarked building's occupants). Less clear (and also a separate question), however, is whether the defendant satisfies the culpable mental state governing the circumstance element incorporated into prong (2), namely, that he was aware of a substantial risk that he would kill a police officer (i.e. that one of the unmarked building's occupants was a police officer). Absent proof of such recklessness, which is required by the target offense, the defendant could not be convicted of attempting to murder a police officer. This commentary discusses elsewhere the treatment of culpability as to circumstance elements in the RCC criminal attempt statute

[10] The term "culpability" includes, but also goes beyond, the culpable mental state requirement governing an offense. See RCC § 22E-201 (culpability required defined). For example, if the target offense requires proof of premeditation, deliberation, or the absence of any mitigating circumstances, the government is still required to prove these broader aspects of culpability to secure a conviction. See RCC § 22E-201. And, of course, attempt liability is subject to the same voluntariness requirement governing all offenses under RCC § 22E-203. See RCC § 22E-201 (voluntariness requirement also part of culpability required for an offense).

[11] Note that whereas the culpable mental state(s) governing the result element(s) of the target offense are subject to an additional principle of culpable mental state elevation under subsection (b), the culpable mental state(s) governing the circumstances element(s) of the target offense are not (discussed elsewhere in this commentary). This means that, with respect to circumstance elements, it is both "[necessary and] sufficient that the actor possessed the degree of culpability required to commit the target offense." JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 27.09(C) (6th ed. 2012).

So, for example, "if D would be guilty of statutory rape on proof that he was reckless as to the girl's age (the attendant circumstance), then he may be convicted of attempted statutory rape if he was reckless, interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "in fact" specified in paragraph (a)(1) applies to the elements in paragraph (a)(3) and there is no additional culpable mental state required for the fact that the actor acts with the culpability required for the offense.

Paragraph (a)(4) establishes that attempt liability under the RCC rests upon dangerous proximity to completion of the target offense. This addresses a complex issue of longstanding disagreement in the criminal law:[12] at what point has an actor, intending to commit an offense, made sufficient progress towards the completion of his or her criminal objective to be subject to attempt liability?[13] Under RCC § 22E-301(a)(4)(A), the requisite line between preparation and perpetration is crossed when an actor engages in conduct that is "dangerously close to completing that offense."[14] This threshold does not entail proof but not if he was negligent or innocent, as to the girl's age." Id. And, along similar lines, "[i]f the material element of the girl's age is one of strict liability, i.e. D may be convicted of statutory rape although he reasonably believed that she was old enough to consent, then he may also be convicted of attempted statutory rape although he lacked a culpable mental state as to this attendant circumstance." Id.; see, e.g., Commentary on Haw. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 705-500 ("[I]t would be anomalous to hold that . . . the defendant's lack of intent with respect to an attendant circumstance precludes penal liability for the attempt," whereas "had the defendant succeeded, and the substantive crime been consummated, the defendant would be guilty of the substantive crime[.]"); JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 27.05(d) (6th ed. 2012) ("There is relatively little case law on point, but virtually all commentators agree that the ordinary specific-intent requirement of attempt law should not apply to attendant circumstances[.]").

---

[12] See, e.g., O.W. HOLMES, JR., THE COMMON LAW 68 (1881) ("Eminent judges" have long "been puzzled where to draw the line" of where an attempt begins, "or even to state the principle on which it should be drawn . . . ."); Mims v. United States, 375 F.2d 135, 148 (5th Cir. 1967) ("Much ink has been spilt in an attempt to arrive at a satisfactory standard for telling where preparations ends and attempt begins").

[13] At the heart of the issue is the fact that the intentional perpetration of a crime "is the result of a six-stage process," which has been described accordingly:

> First, the actor conceives the idea of committing a crime. Second, she evaluates the idea, in order to determine whether she should proceed. Third, she fully forms the intention, i.e. resolves, to go forward and commit the crime. Fourth, she prepares to commit the crime, for example, by obtaining any instruments necessary for its commission. Fifth, she commences commission of the offense. Sixth, she completes her actions[.]

JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 27.01 (6th ed. 2012)§ 27.01; see GEORGE P. FLETCHER, RETHINKING CRIMINAL LAW § 3.3.2 (2000).

It is well established that attempt liability is not supportable during the first three stages of the process. JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 27.01 (6th ed. 2012) ("Until the third step occurs, the actor lacks a mens rea," and "[e]ven after the mens rea is formed, she is not punished . . . for thoughts alone."). Conversely, it is equally well established that once a person reaches the sixth stage, and has carried out all that he or she plans to do in order to consummate an offense, attempt liability is appropriate. See, e.g., United States v. Coplon, 185 F.2d 629, 633 (2d Cir. 1950) (all who engage in last proximate act may be subject to attempt liability); Model Penal Code § 5.01 cmt. at 321 n.97 ("No jurisdiction operating within the framework of Anglo-American law requires that the last proximate act occur before an attempt can be charged."). The controversy over the conduct requirement governing criminal attempts thus focuses on "[a]ctivity in the middle ranges, i.e. after the formation of the mens rea but short of attainment of the criminal goal." JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 27.01 (6th ed. 2012)

[14] The dangerous proximity standard is rooted in the writings of former U.S. Supreme Court Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, and has subsequently been adopted by many jurisdictions, including the District of Columbia. See, e.g., Jones v. United States, 386 A.2d 308, 312 (D.C. 1978) ("The act [necessary for attempt liability] must carry the criminal venture forward to within dangerous proximity of the criminal end sought to be attained. This 'dangerous proximity' test, formulated by Justice Holmes, does not require that appellants have commenced the last act sufficient to produce the crime but focuses instead on the proximity of appellants' behavior to the crime intended.") (quoting CRIMINAL JURY INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE DISTRICT that the actor carried out every part of his or her criminal scheme.[15] However, it does require that the actor have taken more than a mere "substantial step" towards completion of the target offense.[16] In evaluating whether the dangerous proximity standard is met, the

---

OF COLUMBIA, No. 4.04 (2d ed. 1972)); Com. v. Bell, 455 Mass. 408, 425 (2009) (discussing genesis of dangerous proximity standard); GEORGE P. FLETCHER, RETHINKING CRIMINAL LAW § 3.3.2-4 (2000) (discussing relevant policy and philosophical considerations).

Explicitly, the dangerous proximity standard addresses incomplete attempts, which involve situations where an attempt fails because external events frustrate a person from carrying out all that he or she planned to do. See Michael T. Cahill, Attempt, Reckless Homicide, and the Design of Criminal Law, 78 U. COLO. L. REV. 879, 901 n.59 (2007) ("An incomplete attempt would be one where the shot has not yet been fired, but the actor has done enough to be liable for an attempt—say, buying the gun, loading it, pursuing the victim, aiming and preparing to fire."). Implicitly, however, this standard also covers complete attempts, which involve situations where the person has, in some sense, done everything he or she plans to do, yet the target offense is not consummated by virtue of an accident on behalf of the person. Id. ("A classic completed attempt is the shoot-and-miss scenario, where no further act is need beyond firing the shot; the attempt fails only because of the inaccuracy of the shot.").

[15] So, for example, an armed bank robber arrested blocks away from his intended target has committed an attempt to commit armed bank robbery under this standard. See Jones, 386 A.2d at 312 (upholding attempt liability on such facts). Along similar lines, the dangerous proximity standard could also be established in the following illustrative contexts: (1) the attempted murder prosecution of a person whose pistol accidentally slips from that person's hand and breaks as he or she, with the intent to kill, is walking towards the front door of the victim's residence; (2) the attempted felony assault prosecution of a person who suffers a debilitating heart attack minutes before he or she plans to walk across the street and repeatedly beat, with the intent to cause significant bodily injury, a neighbor mowing her front lawn; and (3) the attempted arson prosecution of a person who is arrested at the site of a building she intends to burn down upon exiting her vehicle with flammable materials in her trunk.

[16] This means that conduct which satisfies the Model Penal Code's widely adopted substantial step standard may nevertheless fail to provide the basis for attempt liability under the revised criminal attempt statute. See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.01(1) (attempt liability where, inter alia, defendant engages in an "act or omission constituting a substantial step in a course of conduct planned to culminate in his commission of the crime") (italics added); id. § 5.01(2) (enumerating situations that, "if strongly corroborative of the actor's criminal purpose, shall not be held insufficient as a matter of law" under the "substantial step" standard). Indeed, the drafters of the Model Penal Code developed the substantial step standard for the express purpose of "broadening liability" beyond that provided for under common law tests such as the dangerous proximity standard. Model Penal Code § 5.01, cmt. at 294; see id. at 333 (enumerated situations in subsection (2) will support "convictions on the basis of circumstances that courts have considered insufficient").

At the heart of the Model Penal Code's expansion of attempt liability was a belief that "[c]onduct designed to cause or culminate in the commission of a crime obviously yields an indication that the actor is disposed towards such activity, not alone on this occasion but on others." Id. at 294, 331. In accordance with this line of reasoning, the drafters of the Model Penal Code argued that attempters present "a special danger," who must "be made amenable to the corrective process that the law provides," without regard to proximity to completion. Id. at 294, 331.

These policy arguments are "a reflection of the so-called rehabilitative ideal," which has been described as a "future-oriented predictively based theory of guilt and of punishment" under which "personal dangerousness justifies the decision to prohibit attempts equally as much as it justifies sentencing and correctional decisions." Paul R. Hoeber, The Abandonment Defense to Criminal Attempt and Other Problems of Temporal Individuation, 74 CAL. L. REV. 377, 384 (1986). While popular during the mid-twentieth century, the "rehabilitative ideal, of which the concept of dangerousness is a cornerstone, has [more] recently undergone a rather painful process of demystification." Thomas Weigend, Why Lady Eldon Should Be Acquitted: The Social Harm in Attempting the Impossible, 27 DEPAUL L. REV. 231, 235 (1978). That is, "[t]he optimistic view . . . that we are able to diagnose an individual's dangerous propensities and to treat him effectively . . . has given way to widespread skepticism." Id.

focus should be placed on closeness to completion considered in light of "the gravity of the crime, the uncertainty of the result, and the seriousness of the apprehension."[17] Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "in fact" specified in paragraph (a)(1) applies to the elements in subparagraph (a)(4)(A) and there is no culpable mental state required for the fact that the actor comes dangerously close to completing the offense.

Paragraph (a)(4) also codifies an alternative formulation of the dangerous proximity standard, which is articulated in terms of the actor's view of the situation. This reframing addresses yet another complex criminal law issue of longstanding disagreement[18]: is impossibility—i.e. the fact that the target offense cannot be consummated under the circumstances due to a mistake on behalf of the defendant—a defense to attempt liability?[19]

This skepticism is clearly reflected in, for example, the recently completed Model Penal Code Sentencing Project, which retreats from the dangerousness-based rationales at the heart of many of the original Code's provisions (including the substantial step standard), based upon a recognition that:

> There are undenied elements of inefficacy and injustice in the Code's endorsement of incapacitation as a ground for incarceration, particularly when authorities misapprehend the dangerousness of individual offenders. Any sentencing policy based on predictions of future misconduct will yield a significant number of "false positives"—that is, individuals who have been classified as dangerous when, in fact, they would not reoffend if released or would commit only minor crimes.

Model Penal Code: Sentencing § 6.06 PFD (2017); see, e.g., Model Penal Code: Sentencing § 1.02(2) TD No 1 (2007) ("[I]t is not reasonably feasible to pursue the goal of incapacitation of dangerous offenders through the confinement of individuals who pose little or no risk of serious reoffending."); Hoeber, supra note 13, at 386 (questioning whether the MPC drafters "can explain why personal dangerousness should nevertheless continue to be thought an appropriate basis for criminalizing attempts").

[17] Com. v. Kennedy, 170 Mass. 18, 22 (1897) (Holmes, J.):

> Any unlawful application of poison is an evil which threatens death according to common apprehension, and the gravity of the crime, the uncertainty of the result, and the seriousness of the apprehension, coupled with the great harm likely to result from poison, even if not enough to kill, would warrant holding the liability for an attempt to begin at a point more remote from the possibility of accomplishing what is expected than might be the case with lighter crimes.

[18] See, e.g., JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 27.07 (6th ed. 2012) ("Many pages of court opinions and scholarly literature have been filled in a largely fruitless effort to explain and justify the difference between factual and legal impossibility. Perhaps no aspect of the criminal law is more confusing and confused than the common law of impossible attempts"); Jerome Hall, Criminal Attempt—A Study of Foundations of Criminal Liability, 49 YALE L.J. 789, 789 (1940) ("Whoever has speculated on criminal attempt will agree that the problem is as fascinating as it is intricate.").

[19] The defendant in this kind of situation may admit that he or she possessed the requisite intent to commit that target offense and engaged in significant conduct, but nevertheless argue that impossibility of completion should by itself preclude the imposition of attempt liability. See, e.g., WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.5(a) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019); JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 27.07 (6th ed. 2012). In resolving this claim, there are four general categories of impossibility that might be considered for evaluative purposes (i.e. these are not analytically perfect distinctions).

The first category is pure factual impossibility, which arises when a person whose intended end constitutes a crime is precluded from consummating that crime because of circumstances unknown to her or beyond her control. Illustrative scenarios include: (1) a pickpocket who is unable to consummate the intended theft because, unbeknownst to her, she picked the pocket of the wrong victim (namely, one whose wallet is missing); and (2) a murderer-for-hire who is unable to complete the job because, unbeknownst to him, his murder weapon malfunctions.

The RCC largely answers this question in the negative through RCC § 22E-301(a)(4)(B), which authorizes the fact-finder to evaluate whether the dangerous proximity standard is met based on "the situation . . . as the actor perceived it."[20] Reliance on the defendant's perspective renders the vast majority of impossibility claims immaterial by authorizing an attempt conviction under circumstances in which the person's conduct would have been dangerously close to committing an offense had the person's view of the situation been accurate.[21] Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "in fact" specified in

---

The second category is pure legal impossibility, which arises where a person acts under a mistaken belief that the law criminalizes his or her intended objective. For an illustrative scenario, consider the attempted statutory rape prosecution of a 44-year-old male who: (1) has consensual sexual intercourse with someone he knows to be 17 years of age; (2) in a jurisdiction that sets the age of consent for intercourse at 16; (3) while mistakenly believing the age of consent in that jurisdiction to be 18. See JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 27.07 (6th ed. 2012) ("This is a mirror image of the usual mistake-of-law case, in which an actor believes that her conduct is lawful, but it is not. [In this context,] "D believed that he was violating a law, but he was wrong," [thereby raising the following question:] "If ignorance of the law does not ordinarily exculpate, may it nonetheless inculpate?").

The third category is hybrid impossibility, which arises where an actor's goal is illegal, but commission of the offense is impossible due to a factual mistake regarding the legal status of some attendant circumstance that constitutes an element of the charged offense. Illustrative scenarios include: (1) the prosecution of a defendant who sends illicit photographs to a person he believes to be an underage female, but who is actually an undercover police officer, for attempted distribution of obscene material to a minor; and (2) the prosecution of a defendant who purchases what he believes to be stolen property in a sting operation, but which property is not in fact stolen, for attempted receipt of stolen property.

The fourth category of impossibility is inherent impossibility, which arises where the actor "employs means which a reasonable man would view as totally inappropriate to the objective sought." WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.5(a)(4) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019). Inherent impossibility can take the form of pure factual impossibility, such as, for example, where a person attempts to kill by a fantastic superstitious practice or by throwing red pepper in the eyes of another. And it can also take the form of hybrid impossibility, such as, for example, where a person, with intent to kill a person, shoots at what is obviously a manikin or statute. See Kyle S. Brodie, The Obviously Impossible Attempt: A Proposed Revision to the Model Penal Code, 15 N. ILL. U. L. REV. 237, 244-45 (1995) (common denominator underlying inherent impossibility is that the "attemptor's actions are so absurd or patently ineffective that the completion of the crime would always be impossible under the same set of circumstances").

[20] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.01(1)(c) ("[A] person is guilty of an attempt to commit a crime if," inter alia, the person engages in conduct that would satisfy the actus reus requirement "under the circumstances as he believes them to be[.]"). Note that the phrase "the situation [] as the person perceived it," for purposes of the subjective approach incorporated into RCC § 22E-301(a)(4)(B), does not include a defendant's (inculpatory) mistaken belief that his or her (innocent) conduct is criminalized, as is discussed elsewhere in this commentary.

[21] Specifically, the subjective approach incorporated into RCC § 22E-301(a)(4)(B) renders pure factual and hybrid impossibility claims immaterial. For example, under the RCC it would not be a defense to attempted murder that: (1) the would-be victim was already dead, provided that the defendant mistakenly believed the person to be alive at the moment he pulled the trigger; or that (2) the murder weapon was empty, provided that the defendant mistakenly believed it be loaded. Nor would it preclude liability for attempted theft under the RCC that: (1) the owner of the target property consented to its taking, provided that the defendant mistakenly believed it to be absent; or that (2) the safe targeted by the defendant is empty, provided that the defendant mistakenly believed it be filled with valuable objects. See, e.g., PAUL H. ROBINSON, 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 85 (Westlaw 2019) ("The modern trend, evident in most jurisdictions, is to reject both [forms of] impossibility as defenses."); JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 27.07 (6th ed. 2012) (same).

In contrast, pure legal impossibility remains a viable theory of defense under the RCC. However, this does not hinge on RCC § 22E-301(a)(4)(B), or any other provision in section 301. See generally Larry Alexander, Inculpatory and Exculpatory Mistakes and the Fact/Law Distinction: An Essay in Memory of paragraph (a)(1) applies to the elements in subparagraph (a)(4)(B) and there is no culpable mental state required for the fact that the actor would have come dangerously close to completing the offense if the situation as was the actor perceived it to be.

Subsection (b) provides additional clarity concerning the culpable mental state requirement governing a criminal attempt as it relates to the result elements (if any) of the target offense. Whereas subsection (a) generally clarifies that an attempt conviction entails proof that the defendant acted with a level of culpability that is no less demanding than that required by the target offense, subsection (b) specifically establishes that the "actor must intend to cause all result elements required for the offense."[22] The latter requirement incorporates a principle of culpable mental state elevation applicable whenever the target

---

Mike Bayles, 12 LAW & PHIL. 33 (1992). Rather, the "underlying basis for acquittal is the principle of legality," which "provides that we should not punish people—no matter culpable or dangerous they are—for conduct that does not constitute the charged offense at the time of the action." JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 27.07 (6th ed. 2012); see Model Penal Code § 5.01 cmt. at 318 ("It is of course necessary that the result desired or intended by the actor constitute a crime. If . . . the result desired or intended is not a crime, the actor will not be guilty of an attempt, even though he firmly believes that his goal is criminal.").

For example, "it is not a crime to throw even a [District of Columbia] steak into a garbage can." JEROME HALL, GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF THE CRIMINAL LAW 595 (2d ed. 1960). So if after a loss against the Washington Nationals, the Oriole Bird—the Baltimore Orioles mascot—places a local District steak in the garbage, he is not guilty of committing any offense. Nor could the Oriole Bird be convicted of an attempt to commit an imaginary offense of this nature although he honestly believed such conduct to be prohibited by the D.C. Code. E.g., JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 27.07 (6th ed. 2012) ("Just as a person may not ordinarily escape punishment on the ground that she is ignorant of a law's existence, it is also true that we cannot punish people under laws that are purely the figments of their guilty imaginations."). Along similar lines (and perhaps more realistically), an actor is not guilty of a criminal attempt if, unknown to her, the legislature has repealed a statute that she believes that she is violating. "For example, if D attempts to sell 'bootleg' liquor after the repeal of the Prohibition laws, she is not guilty of an attempt even though she is unaware of their repeal." Id..

Inherent impossibility also remains a viable (if exceedingly limited) theory of defense under the reasonable adaptation standard codified the RCC criminal attempt provision, which is discussed elsewhere in this commentary.

[22] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.01(1)(b) ("[W]hen causing a particular result is an element of the crime," a person is guilty if he "does or omits to do anything with the purpose of causing or with the belief that it will cause such result without further conduct on his part[.]") (italics added); see also JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 27.09(c) (6th ed. 2012) (this provision of the Model Penal Code, while explicitly addressing complete attempts, "implicitly" applies to incomplete attempts) (citing Model Penal Code § 5.01 cmt. at 305 n.17 (paragraphs (b) and (c) are to be "read in conjunction with [one another]")); Cf. Paul H. Robinson & Jane A. Grall, Element Analysis in Defining Criminal Liability: The Model Penal Code and Beyond, 35 STAN. L. REV. 681, 758 n.301 (1983) ("'Belief' is the conditional form of 'know,' [which] is required here because in an impossible attempt the actor cannot 'know' that he will cause the result, since he in fact cannot.").

Note that RCC § 22E-301(b) expresses a principle of intent elevation, not purpose elevation. This means that (for example) if "the actor's purpose were to demolish a building and, knowing that persons were in the building and that they would be killed by the explosion, he nevertheless detonated a bomb that turned out to be defective, he could be prosecuted for attempted murder even though it was no part of his purpose that the inhabitants of the building would be killed." Model Penal Code § 501 cmt. at 305 (For both purposeful and knowing attempts, "a deliberate choice is made to bring about the consequence forbidden by the criminal laws, and the actor has done all within his power to cause this result to occur. The absence in one instance of any desire for the forbidden result is not, under these circumstances, a sufficient basis for differentiating between the two types of conduct involved."); Commentary on Haw. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 705-500 (same).

offense is comprised of a result that may be satisfied by proof of a non-intentional mental state (i.e. recklessness or negligence), or none at all (i.e. strict liability).[23] To satisfy this threshold culpable mental state requirement, the government must prove that the defendant acted with either a practically certain belief[24] that the prohibited result would occur, or,

[23] Which is to say, subsection (b) dictates that, "[w]here criminal liability rests on the causation of a prohibited result, the actor must have an intent to achieve that result even though violation of the substantive offense may require some lesser mens rea." Commentary on Haw. Rev. Stat. § 705-500 (quoting Prop. Mich. Rev. Cr. Code, comments at 82). This principle of culpable mental state elevation does not preclude the government from charging attempts to commit target offenses subject to non-intentional culpable mental states. However, to secure an attempt conviction for such offenses, proof that the accused acted with the intent to cause the required results is necessary. Id. ("A person charged with the substantive crime of manslaughter may be liable as a result of [] recklessness causing death, but the same recklessness would not be sufficient if the victim did not die and the actor were only charged with attempt; here, the state would have to show an intent to achieve the prohibited end result, death of the victim.").

This limitation on reckless and negligent attempt liability (as to result elements) precludes a wide range of endangerment activities, including, perhaps most notably, risky driving, from being treated as attempts to commit serious crimes (e.g., homicide). See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.01, cmt. at 304 ("[T]he scope of the criminal law would be unduly extended if one could be liable for an attempt whenever he recklessly or negligently created a risk of any result whose actual occurrence would lead to criminal responsibility."); Alan C. Michaels, Acceptance: The Missing Mental State, 71 S. CAL. L. REV. 953, 1033 (1998) (observing that such treatment would open the "floodgates to attempt liability").

To illustrate, consider how reckless attempt liability could authorize many instances of consciously risky driving to be charged as multiple counts of attempted manslaughter: (1) as to actus reus, the reckless driver who closely speeds past pedestrians has engaged in conduct dangerously close to causing the death of others; and (2) as to mens rea, that same driver has consciously disregarded a substantial risk of death as to every pedestrian he or she passes on the road. Along similar lines, acceptance of negligent attempt liability could transform many instances of inadvertently risky driving into multiple counts of attempted negligent homicide along similar lines: (1) as to a*ctus reus*, the negligent driver who closely speeds past pedestrians has engaged in conduct dangerously close to causing the death of others; and (2) as to mens rea, that same driver should have been aware that he or she was creating a substantial risk of death as to every pedestrian he or she passes on the road.

Subsection (b), by requiring proof of (at minimum) intent as to result elements, rejects these recklessness and negligence-based theories of attempt liability. See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.01(1)(b) (excluding such theories through belief culpability threshold); WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.3 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) ("Under the prevailing view, an attempt thus cannot be committed by recklessness or negligence or on a strict liability basis, even if the underlying crime can be so committed."); Commentary on Haw. Rev. Stat. § 705-500 ("Reckless driving . . . does not constitute attempted manslaughter."); State v. Holbron, 904 P.2d 912, 920, 930 (Haw. 1995) ("We agree with the rest of the Anglo-American jurisprudential world that there can be no attempt to commit involuntary manslaughter."). And, according to the same reasoning, subsection (b) would also preclude attempt liability premised on the aggravated forms of recklessness at issue in depraved heart murder and aggravated assault. See, e.g., JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 27.09 (6th ed. 2012) ("For example, if D blindfolds herself and fires a loaded pistol into a room that she knows is occupied, she may be convicted of murder if someone is killed. Such a killing, although unintentional, is malicious (the mens rea of murder), because it evinces a reckless disregard for the value of human life. However, if D's reckless act does not kill anyone in the room, almost all jurisdictions would rule that she is not guilty of attempted murder."); Michael T. Cahill, Attempt, Reckless Homicide, and the Design of Criminal Law, 78 U. Colo. L. Rev. 879, 882 (2007) ("In nearly all jurisdictions to consider the question [of whether attempted enhanced reckless murder exists], courts have held that no such offense exists.").

[24] RCC § 22E-206 (definition of intent as to result elements).

When formulating jury instructions for an attempt to commit a target offense subject to a culpable mental state of knowledge (whether as to a result or circumstance element), the term "intent," as defined in RCC § 22E-206, should instead be substituted for the term knowledge. This substitution is appropriate given alternatively, that the defendant consciously desired to cause that result.[25] It is not necessary to prove that the actor caused the required result elements.

Subsection (c) clarifies the relationship between a criminal attempt and the target offense. Specifically, this provision establishes that the government may, as an alternative to proving the requirements set forth in subsections (a) and (b), secure a conviction for an attempt by proving that the defendant satisfies the elements of the target offense itself.[26] In that case, however, subsection (c) also establishes that the accused may not be convicted of both the completed offense and an attempt to commit the same based on the same act or course of conduct.[27]

Subsection (d) establishes the penalties for criminal attempts under the RCC: a fifty percent decrease in the maximum term of imprisonment and fine applicable to the target offense,[28] after the application of any penalty enhancements.

---

that the term "knowledge" can be misleading in the context of inchoate offenses—whereas the substantively identical term "intent" is not. See RCC § 22E-206, Explanatory Note.

[25] RCC § 22E-206 (definition of purpose as to result elements).

[26] This alternative basis of attempt liability serves three related functions. First, it clarifies that failure to consummate the target offense is not an element of an attempt. See, e.g., Richardson v. State, 390 So. 2d 4, 5 (Ala. 1980) ("Although the crime of attempt is sometimes defined as if failure were an essential element, the modern view is that a defendant may be convicted on a charge of attempt even if it is shown that the crime was completed.") (quoting WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.5 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019)). Second, it avoids any procedural complications that might result from the fact that a criminal attempt is not always a lesser-included offense of the target offense in light of the principle of culpable mental state elevation set forth in subsection (b). See, e.g., WAYNE R. LAFAVE & GERALD ISRAEL, 6 CRIM. PROC. § 24.8(e) (4th ed. Westlaw 2017) ("When attempt carries a more demanding mens rea than a completed offense, it may not be considered a lesser included offense.") (citing, e.g., People v. Bailey, 54 Cal.4th 740 (2012)). And third, it provides greater flexibility for reaching appropriate sentencing outcomes in individual cases. Cf. Com. v. LaBrie, 473 Mass. 754, 764 (2016) ("[R]equiring the government to prove failure as an element of attempt would lead to the anomalous result that, if there were a reasonable doubt concerning whether or not a crime had been completed, a jury could find the defendant guilty neither of a completed offense nor of an attempt.") (quoting United States v. York, 578 F.2d 1036, 1039 (5th Cir. 1978)).

[27] See, e.g., Model Penal Code §§ 1.07(1)(a), (1)(b), and (4)(b) (barring convictions for general inchoate offense and target offense); PAUL H. ROBINSON, 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 84 (Westlaw 2019) ("It is almost universally the rule that a defendant may not be convicted of both a substantive offense and an inchoate offense designed to culminate in that same offense."). This merger principle is similarly established in RCC § 22E-214. See RCC § 22E-214 (barring multiple convictions for an attempt or solicitation to commit an offense and the target offense when arising from the same course of conduct).

[28] See, e.g., JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 27.04(b)(1) (6th ed. 2012) ("At common law and in most jurisdictions today, an attempt to commit a felony is considered a less serious crime and, therefore, is punished less severely, than the target offense."); WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.5(c) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) (modern attempt legislation typically grades attempts at "one degree below the object crime.") (collecting statutes). This penalty reduction is to be contrasted with the Model Penal Code approach, which grades most criminal attempts as "crimes of the same grade and degree as the most serious offense which is attempted." Model Penal Code § 5.05(1); but see id. ("[An] attempt . . . to commit a [capital crime or a] felony of the first degree is a felony of the second degree.").

The drafters of the Model Penal Code adopted this policy of attempt penalty equalization—which was a stark departure from prevailing common law trends—on the basis of the same dangerousness-based rationale that motivated their endorsement of the substantial step standard. See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.05, cmt. at 490 ("To the extent that sentencing depends on the anti-social disposition of the actor and the demonstrated need for a corrective sanction, there is likely to be little difference in the gravity of the required measures depending on the consummation or the failure of the plan."). However, as discussed supra note 13, this rationale for punishment has been called into question by many on empirical grounds, including, perhaps most notably, by the drafters of the recent Model Penal Code Sentencing Project. See, e.g., Model Subsection (e) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. RCC § 22E-301 clarifies, improves the proportionality of, and fill in gaps in the District law of criminal attempts.

The D.C. Code provides for attempt liability in a variety of ways. Most prominently, the D.C. Code contains a general attempt penalty provision that applies to a relatively broad group of offenses.[29] Additionally, the D.C. Code contains a variety of semi-general attempt penalty provisions, which create attempt liability for narrower groups of offenses with related social harms.[30] Finally, some specific offenses in the D.C. Code individually provide for attempt liability by incorporating the term "attempt" as an element of the offense.[31]

The District's recognized "patchwork of attempt statutes"[32] presents two main problems. The first is that it fails to clearly communicate the elements of a criminal attempt. In no place, for example, does the D.C. Code define the term attempt. This statutory silence has effectively delegated to District courts the responsibility to establish the contours of attempt liability. Over the years, the DCCA has issued numerous opinions and proffered a variety of statements relevant to determining the contours of attempt liability under District law. The case law in this area reflects the piecemeal evolution of doctrine over more than a century: it is sometimes ambiguous, occasionally internally inconsistent, and has never been clearly synthesized into a single analytical framework. Nonetheless, a holistic reading of District authority reveals basic and fundamental principles governing the contours of attempt liability. Consistent with the interests of

---

Penal Code: Sentencing § 6.06 PFD (2017) ("There are undenied elements of inefficacy and injustice in the Code's endorsement of incapacitation as a ground for incarceration, particularly when authorities misapprehend the dangerousness of individual offenders.").

The (original) Model Penal Code's equalization of attempt penalties also conflicts with a strong intuitive sense, captured by public opinion surveys, that resultant harm should matter for grading purposes. See, e.g., Paul H. Robinson & John M. Darley, Objectivist Versus Subjectivist Views of Criminality: A Study in the Role of Social Science in Criminal Law Theory, 18 OXFORD J. LEGAL STUDIES 409, 429-30 (1998) (failure to consummate an offense generates, at minimum, "a reduction in liability of about 1.7 grades" by lay jurors, while the earlier the defendant's plans are frustrated, the greater this "no harm" discount). This may explain why only a minority of "modern American codes that are highly influenced by the Model Penal Code" equalize penalties for criminal attempts. Paul H. Robinson, The Role of Harm and Evil in Criminal Law: A Study in Legislative Deception?, 1994 J. CONTEMP. LEGAL ISSUES 299, 320 (1994) ("Nearly two-thirds of American jurisdictions have adopted codes that have been heavily influenced by the Model Penal Code, but less than 30% of these have adopted the Code's inchoate grading provision or something akin to."). And it may also provide at least a partial explanation for why, "even when the legislature imposes similar sanctions for attempts and completed crimes, in practice the punishment for an attempt is less than the punishment for a consummated crime." Omri Ben-Shahar & Alon Harel, The Economics of the Law of Criminal Attempts, 145 U. PA. L. REV. 299, 319 n.44 (1996) (citing GLANVILLE WILLIAMS, TEXTBOOK ON CRIMINAL LAW 404 (2d ed. 1983)).

[29] D.C. Code § 22-1803 ("Whoever shall attempt to commit any crime, which attempt is not otherwise made punishable by chapter 19 of An Act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901 (31 Stat. 1321), shall be punished . . . .").

[30] E.g., D.C. Code § 22-1837 (setting forth attempt penalties for the human trafficking related offenses); D.C. Code § 22-3018 (setting forth attempt penalties for the sexual offenses).

[31] E.g., D.C. Code § 22-2601 (prison escape); D.C. Code § 22-951(c)(1)(a) (forcible gang participation).

[32] 1978 D.C. Code Rev. § 22-201 cmt. at 113.

clarity and consistency, RCC § 22E-301 translates these principles into a detailed statutory framework.

The second main problem reflected in the District's attempt statutes is that they lack a consistent grading principle. For example, some District attempts are subject to statutory maxima that are many orders of magnitude below the statutory maxima governing the completed offense. Other District attempts, in contrast, are subject to the same statutory maxima governing the completed offense. And still other District attempt statutes are subject to statutory maxima pegged to, but half as severe as, the statutory maxima applicable to the completed offense. Viewed collectively, then, the D.C. Code manifests at least three fundamentally different patterns in how it grades attempts, without any discernible rationale for the variances. This produces a penalty scheme which authorizes the imposition of sentences that are, at least in relation to one another, quite disproportionate. Consistent with the interests of consistency and proportionality, RCC § 22E-301 changes District law by adopting a uniform approach to grading attempts at one half the severity of the completed offense.

A more detailed analysis of District attempt law and its relationship with RCC § 22E-301 is provided below. It is organized according to five main topics: (1) the culpable mental state requirement governing as attempt; (2) the definition of an incomplete attempt; (3) impossible attempts; (4) the relationship between an attempt and the completed offense; and (5) attempt penalties.

RCC § 22E-301(a) & (b): Relation to Current District Law on Culpable Mental State Requirement. Subsections (a) and (b) codify, clarify, and fill in gaps reflected in District law governing the culpable mental state requirement of an attempt.

The DCCA has addressed the culpable mental state requirement of an attempt on a handful of occasions. While unclear and, in at least one important sense, contradictory, pertinent case law generally supports two propositions: (1) a principle of culpable mental state elevation applies to the results of the target offense when charged as an attempt; and (2) a principle of culpable mental state equivalency applies to the circumstances of the target offense when charged as an attempt. Subsections (a) and (b) respectively codify each of these principles.

Most of the DCCA case law relevant to the culpable mental state of an attempt focuses on whether a principle of culpable mental state elevation applies to the results of the target offense. On this issue, there exists two different lines of cases: one which points towards a principle of culpable mental state elevation and another in support of a principle of culpable mental state equivalency. This "inconsistency" in District law was recently recognized in, and summarized by, Judge Beckwith's concurring opinion in Jones v. United States.[33] Three aspects of Judge Beckwith's analysis, abstracted in the accompanying footnote, are worth highlighting.[34]

---

[33] 124 A.3d 127, 132–34 (D.C. 2015); see also Williams v. United States, 130 A.3d 343, 347 (D.C. 2016) (discussing Jones).

[34] Judge Beckwith observes, in relevant part:

> In Sellers v. United States, 131 A.2d 300 (D.C. 1957), the Municipal Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia defined the elements of attempt as follows: "any overt act done with intent to commit the crime and which, except for the interference of some cause preventing the carrying out of the intent, would have resulted in the commission of the crime." Id. at 301 (quoting 14 Am. Jur., Criminal Law, § 65, p. 813). Thirty years later, in Wormsley v. United States, 526 A.2d 1373 (D.C. 1987), this court upheld the appellant's conviction for attempted taking property without right after concluding that the record contained sufficient evidence that she intended to steal a dress because of her "apparent dissemblance in folding the blue dress and concealing it inside her sweater, as well as her change of story about what she had done with the dress." Id. at 1375. Appellant's specific intent to commit a crime was central to the court's holding, even though the underlying crime required only general intent to commit the act constituting the crime. See Fogle v. United States, 336 A.2d 833, 835 (D.C. 1975).

Then in Ray v. United States, 575 A.2d 1196 (D.C. 1990), we stated that "[e]very completed criminal offense necessarily includes an attempt to commit that offense." Id. at 1199 (holding that appellant was guilty of the "attempted-battery" type of assault even though the evidence showed a completed battery). In reaching this conclusion, Ray did not grapple with Wormsley's premise that an attempt requires specific intent. We later applied Ray to an attempted threats charge . . . in Evans v. United States, 779 A.2d 891 (D.C. 2001), holding that the government could charge attempted threats "even though it could prove the completed offense." Id. at 894. In other words, the government needed only to prove general intent to sustain a conviction for attempted threats. See also Jenkins v. United States, 902 A.2d 79, 87 (D.C. 2006) (noting that Evans analyzed threats as a general intent crime). While the court in Evans acknowledged Wormsley's holding on attempt, Wormsley did not control its analysis. Relying principally on Ray, the court explained that "[o]ur decisions have repeatedly held that 'a person charged with an attempt to commit a crime may be convicted even though the evidence shows a completed offense, not merely an attempt.'" Evans, 779 A.2d at 894 (quoting Ray, 575 A.2d at 1199).

In Smith v. United States, 813 A.2d 216 (D.C. 2002), this court recognized the difficulty of the attempt issue, stating that "[t]o speak of 'specific intent' in the context of a prosecution for attempted anything is, in our view, somewhat misleading." Id. at 219. The court reiterated Wormsley's premise that "[t]he only intent required to commit the crime of attempt is an intent to commit the offense allegedly attempted." Id. (citing Wormsley, 526 A.2d at 1375). But the court also stated that "[o]ur decision in Evans necessarily means that when an attempt is proven by evidence that the defendant committed the crime alleged to have been attempted, the intent required to commit the crime of attempt can be no greater than the intent required to commit the completed crime." Id. (citing Evans, 779 A.2d at 894). The court then held that there was sufficient evidence of attempted second-degree cruelty to children when the appellant "intended to commit the acts which resulted in . . . the grave risk of injury" to the child, even though he did not intend to injure the child. Id. at 219–20.

Yet while Evans continues to feature prominently in our case law, other recent cases have required specific intent for an attempt conviction. For example, in Brawner v. United States, 979 A.2d 1191 (D.C. 2009), the court held that for an attempted escape conviction, the government must prove "the mental state of intending to commit the underlying offense," that is, "intent to escape," even though a charge for a completed escape did not involve such intent. Id. at 1194. And in Dauphine v. United States, 73 A.3d 1029 (D.C. 2013), this court held that animal cruelty is a general intent crime but nonetheless stated that "where the government charges an individual with attempt, as it did here, the government must demonstrate that the defendant possessed the intent to commit the offense allegedly attempted." Id. at 1033 (citation and internal quotation marks omitted). We held that the record contained sufficient evidence that the "appellant acted with intent to commit the crime of cruelty to animals," and we affirmed her conviction. Id.

The Wormsley-Brawner-Dauphine line of cases requiring the government to prove specific intent to commit the crime intended appears to be in direct tension with the Evans-Smith line of cases that does not require such proof . . .

124 A.3d at 133–34.

First, although the discussion in Judge Beckwith's concurring opinion is framed around whether an attempt requires proof of "a specific intent to commit the unlawful act,"[35] the primary import of the relevant case law she discusses relates to whether the culpable mental state governing the results of the target offense must be elevated to one of "intent" when charged as an attempt. So, for example, while proof of recklessness as to the alternative results of second-degree child cruelty[36]—actually harming a child or creating a grave risk of harm to a child—will suffice to satisfy the completed offense, must the government prove an intent to cause such harm or, at the very least, an intent to create a risk of such harm in order to secure a conviction for attempted second-degree child cruelty?[37]

Second, although DCCA case law points in different directions on this issue, the reading that best synthesizes the relevant authorities is that a principle of culpable mental state elevation applies to attempts, but that this principle is subject to an exception when the government proceeds on a theory that the offense attempted was actually completed. In support of this reading is the fact that the reported opinions that involve traditional attempt prosecutions (i.e. decisions implicating conduct that falls short of completion)—what Judge Beckwith refers to as the Wormsley-Brawner-Dauphine line of cases—seem to favor a principle of culpable mental state elevation, while the conflicting reported opinions—what Judge Beckwith describes as the Smith-Evans line of cases—involve attempt prosecutions premised upon proof that the target offense was actually completed.[38]

In the latter context, it is not surprising that the DCCA has held that "the intent required to commit the crime of attempt can be no greater than the intent required to commit the completed crime."[39] "To hold otherwise," after all, "would create the anomalous result that appellant could be convicted of the completed crime . . . but, on the same facts, could not be convicted of an attempt to commit that same crime."[40] What the Smith-Evans line of cases does not discuss, however, are the consequences of this position—separate and apart from ensuring that "a person charged with an attempt to commit a crime may be convicted even though the evidence shows a completed offense, not merely an attempt.'"[41]

For example, if the culpable mental state requirement governing the results of an attempt is identical to that of the target offense, then it means that the government may charge, and a defendant may be convicted of, reckless or negligent attempts—such as, for example, attempted depraved heart murder, attempted involuntary manslaughter, or [35] Jones, 124 A.3d at 132-33 (citing Morissette v. United States, 342 U.S. 246, 263 (1952)).

---

[36] See D.C. Code § 22-1101(b)(1) ("A person commits the crime of cruelty to children in the second degree if that person intentionally, knowingly, or recklessly . . . Maltreats a child or engages in conduct which causes a grave risk of bodily injury to a child . . . .").

[37] See generally Smith v. United States, 813 A.2d 216 (D.C. 2002).

[38] Compare Jones, 124 A.3d at 134 n.4 ("As the elements of a crime are determined by what offense the government charges, not by what evidence it presents at trial, Evans and Smith cannot be distinguished from Wormsley, Brawner, and Dauphine on the ground that the government proved a completed offense in the former cases and an attempted offense in the latter."), with D.C. SUPER. CT. R. CRIM. P. 31(c) ("A defendant may be found guilty of any of the following: (1) an offense necessarily included in the offense charged; (2) an attempt to commit the offense charged; or (3) an attempt to commit an offense necessarily included in the offense charged, if the attempt is an offense in its own right."). For further discussion of the relevant issues, see the discussion in this commentary for RCC § 22E-301(b).

[39] Smith, 813 A.2d at 219.

[40] Id.; see, e.g., Ray v. United States, 575 A.2d 1196, 1199 (D.C. 1990); Jones, 124 A.3d at 129-31.

[41] Evans, 779 A.2d at 894 (quoting Ray, 575 A.2d at 1199).

attempted vehicular homicide. (Indeed, under the Smith-Evans view, wherein the government need only prove that the defendant "intended to commit the acts" that would constitute the offense, even strict liability attempts would seem to provide a viable basis for liability.[42]) However, one does not see such theories of liability, which would entail proof that the defendant recklessly or negligently attempted to kill, being raised by the government or accepted by District courts—indeed, the Jones court itself appears to tacitly disclaim offenses such as "attempted involuntary manslaughter or attempted negligence."[43]

Perhaps this explains why, in those cases that involve traditional attempt prosecutions, one sees the DCCA articulating a principle of culpable mental state elevation as to results. Illustrative is Brawner v. United States.[44]

At issue in Brawner was the culpable mental state governing the result of attempted prison escape, the departure from physical confinement. This issue was central to the case "[b]ecause appellant was apprehended within the jail, as opposed to outside the facility," thereby requiring "the government [to proceed] on an attempted escape theory."[45] At trial, "[t]he defense's theory of the case was that appellant lacked the intent to escape and so could not be convicted of attempted escape."[46] On appeal, the defendant "argue[d] that the trial court's failure to instruct the jury that the government was required to prove [t]his intent to leave the jail warrant[ed] reversal."[47]

In adjudicating this claim, the Brawner court determined that the culpable mental state requirement governing attempted prison escape was "distinguishable" from that of the completed offense. "[A]ttempted escape, like other inchoate offenses, requires the mental state of intending to commit the underlying offense."[48] Therefore, the DCCA concluded, "in a trial for attempted escape," that "the government must prove what the defendant was attempting to do, and, therefore, must prove intent to escape."[49]

---

[42] Smith, 813 A.2d at 219. As discussed in the Commentary on RCC § 22E-205(a), an intent to engage in conduct is synonymous with voluntarily having engaged in an act or omission. Robinson, supra note 2, at 864. However, requiring proof of voluntary conduct, and nothing more, is entirely consistent with strict liability. See, e.g., Buchanan v. United States, 32 A.3d 990, 1000 (D.C. 2011) (Ruiz, J., concurring) (noting that the "intent to act" interpretation of simple assault, if taken literally, would allow "the prosecution of individuals for criminal assault for actions taken with a complete lack of culpability"). Consider, for example, how the intent-to-act interpretation suggested in Smith would play out in the context of an attempted aggravated assault prosecution premised on the following facts. Imagine that D's plan is to fire a paintball gun into what appears to be an abandoned building to impress his friends. Although D reasonably believes the building to be unoccupied, it is actually occupied by a family. If D fires the paintball gun into the building and causes serious bodily injury to someone inside, he couldn't be convicted of aggravated assault, D.C. Code § 22-404.01, since he does not consciously disregard an extreme risk of death or serious bodily injury, see Perry v. United States, 36 A.3d 799, 816 (D.C. 2011). Nevertheless, the intent-to-act interpretation suggested in Smith would appear to indicate that a conviction for attempted aggravated assault would be appropriate in this situation—after all, D surely "intended to engage in the acts that caused the serious bodily injury."

[43] See Jones, 124 A.3d at 130 (apparently agreeing with the defendant that "[i]t makes no sense to speak of attempted involuntary manslaughter or attempted negligence," but noting that "[t]his maxim is irrelevant here because the misdemeanor offense of threats does require intent to act—intent to utter statements that constitute a threat").

[44] 979 A.2d 1191 (D.C. 2009).

[45] Id. at 1193.

[46] Id.

[47] Id. at 1192.

[48] Id. at 1194.

[49] Id.

The third, and final, point is that the precise contours of the principle of culpable mental state elevation supported by the Wormsley-Brawner-Dauphine line of cases is unclear in an important sense—namely, what does "intent" mean? For example, "[t]he element of intent in the criminal law has traditionally been viewed as a bifurcated concept embracing either the specific requirement of purpose," which entails proof of a conscious desire, "or the more general one of knowledge," which entails proof of belief that one's conduct is practically certain to cause a result.[50] That said, intent is also sometimes used as a synonym for purpose, in which context proof of a practically certain belief would not provide an adequate basis for liability.[51]

Although the DCCA's understanding of intent (frequently referred to as "specific intent") is generally ambiguous,[52] the interpretation most consistent with the case law is the traditional understanding, namely, that "one intends certain consequences when he desires that his acts cause those consequences or knows that those consequences are substantially certain to result from his acts."[53]

The DCCA's robust but conflicting body of case law on the culpable mental state requirement applicable to the results of an attempt stands in contrast with the small, but essentially uniform, body of District authority on circumstances. In this context, the relevant authorities indicate that a principle of culpable mental state equivalency applies to the circumstances of an attempt.

For example, the DCCA's recent decision in Hailstock v. United States clarifies that the culpable mental state requirement governing the circumstance of attempted misdemeanor sexual abuse (MSA), absence of permission, is no different than that applicable to the completed version of the offense—both can be satisfied by proof of something akin to negligence[54]

Likewise, the DCCA's recent decision in Fatumabahirtu v. United States suggests the same is true with respect to the circumstance of illegal use under the District's sale of drug paraphernalia (SDP) offense—whether charged as an attempt or as a completed offense, the relevant circumstance can be satisfied by proof of something akin to negligence regarding the relevant circumstance.[55]

The District's statutory scheme applicable to child sex abuse offenses similarly support the conclusion that circumstances are not subject to a rule of culpable mental state elevation.[56] For example, whether prosecuted as an attempt or as a completed offense,

---

[50] United States v. U.S. Gypsum Co., 438 U.S. 422, 445 (1978); see Tison v. Arizona, 481 U.S. 137, 150 (1987).
[51] See WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 5.2 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019).
[52] See, e.g., Wormsley, 526 A.2d at 1375; Brawner, 979 A.2d at 1194 (discussing United States v. Bailey, 444 U.S. 394, 405 (1980) and Model Penal Code § 2.02, cmt. at 125); Wilson-Bey v. United States, 903 A.2d 818, 833-34 (D.C. 2006) (en banc); Logan v. United States, 483 A.2d 664, 671 (D.C. 1984); Perry v. United States, 36 A.3d 799, 816-17 (D.C. 2011).
[53] Tison, 481 U.S. at 150.
[54] Hailstock v. United States, 85 A.3d 1277, 1282 (D.C. 2014). That is, both MSA and attempted MSA can be satisfied by proof that the defendant "knew or should have known that he did not have the complainant's permission to engage in the sexual act or sexual contact." Id.
[55] Fatumabahirtu v. United States, 26 A.3d 322, 336 (D.C. 2011). That is, both SDP and attempted SDP can be satisfied by proof that the defendant "knew or reasonably should have known that the buyer would use these items to inject, ingest, or inhale a controlled substance." Id.
[56] D.C. Code §§ 22-3008 to 22-3010.01.

"mistake of age" is not a defense to sex crimes involving children.[57] In practical effect, this means that the circumstance of age remains a matter of strict liability even when an attempt to commit a child sex abuse offense is charged.[58]

In accordance with the above analysis of District law, RCC § 22E-301(a) and (b) codify the culpable mental state requirement of attempt as follows. RCC § 22E-301(a)(3) establishes that the culpable mental state requirement governing an attempt necessarily incorporates "the culpability required for the [target] offense." Pursuant to this principle, a defendant may not be convicted of a criminal attempt absent proof that he or she acted with, at minimum, the culpable mental state(s)—in addition to any other broader aspect of culpability—governing the results and circumstances required to establish that offense.

Thereafter, RCC § 22E-301(b) codifies a general principle of culpable mental state elevation, rooted in the Wormsley-Brawner-Dauphine line of cases, applicable to results.[59] At the same time, RCC § 22E-301(b) also fills in a key ambiguity left unresolved by the Wormsley-Brawner-Dauphine line of cases—what level of elevation is required for results. This provision establishes that acting with the intent to cause any results will suffice.

Finally, the absence of a comparable provision governing circumstances, when viewed in light of RCC § 22E-301(a), clarifies that circumstances are not subject to a comparable principle of culpable mental state elevation, but rather, are subject to the principle of culpable mental state equivalency reflected in pertinent District authorities.

RCC § 22E-301(a)(4)(A): Relation to Current District Law on Incomplete Attempts. Subparagraph (a)(4)(A) codifies, clarifies, and fills in gaps reflected in District law governing incomplete attempts.

It is well-established under District law that a person who plans to commit an offense must do more than "mere[ly] prepar[e]" to commit an offense; further progress toward a criminal objective is required to prove an attempt.[60] It is also clear, moreover, that once a person has carried out her criminal plans and all that remains to be seen is whether her efforts were successful (i.e. engaged in a complete attempt), liability may attach.[61] Less clear, however, is the point at which the line between mere preparation and actual perpetration has been crossed, such that police intervention prior to completion may lead to an attempt charge. On this issue of an incomplete attempt, the DCCA has, over the years, articulated a variety of standards. However, viewed as a whole and in relevant context, DCCA case law indicates that the dangerous proximity standard reflects current District law. Subparagraph (a)(4)(A) incorporates that standard into the RCC.

---

[57] D.C. Code § 22-3011(a) ("Neither mistake of age nor consent is a defense to a prosecution under §§ 22-3008 to 22-3010.01, prosecuted alone or in conjunction with charges under § 22-3018 or § 22-403.");

[58] See In re E.F., 740 A.2d 547, 550 (D.C. 1999) ("Nothing in the present statutory scheme implies that the Council of the District of Columbia, in revising the definition of sexual crimes against children, meant to impose a knowledge requirement not theretofore in existence.").

[59] The primary concern addressed by the Evans-Smith line of cases—avoiding "the anomalous result that appellant could be convicted of the completed crime . . . but, on the same facts, could not be convicted of an attempt to commit that same crime," Smith, 813 A.2d at 219—is explicitly addressed by RCC § 22E-301(c), discussed elsewhere in this commentary.

[60] See, e.g., Johnson v. United States, 756 A.2d 458, 463 n.3 (D.C. 2000); Dauphine v. United States, 73 A.3d 1029, 1033 (D.C. 2013).

[61] See, e.g., Washington v. United States, 965 A.2d 35, 43 n.24 (D.C. 2009); Riley v. United States, 647 A.2d 1165, 1172 (D.C. 1994).

The earliest incomplete attempt standard endorsed by a local District court is the so-called probable desistance test. Originally adopted in the Municipal Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia's decision in Sellers v. United States, this test requires proof of conduct which, "except for the interference of some cause preventing the carrying out of the intent, would have resulted in the commission of the crime."[62]

Although the Sellers decision predates the creation of the DCCA, the probable desistance standard enunciated has been referenced by the DCCA on multiple occasions.[63] At the same time, the DCCA has also "often noted [that the probable desistance] formulation . . . is imperfect."[64] The DCCA's critique of this standard is understandable when viewed in relevant context: not only does the probable desistance test improperly suggest that "failure is . . . an essential element of criminal attempt,"[65] but, as a variety of legal authorities have observed, there simply "exists no basis for making . . . judgments [of] when desistance is no longer probable or when the normal citizen would stop."[66] In practice, then, the closeness of the actor's conduct to completion is ultimately the only foundation for making the threshold determination of the likelihood of desistance.[67]

Proximity of this nature is, in turn, more explicitly addressed by the second incomplete attempt standard reflected in District authorities, the dangerous proximity test. Originally adopted by the DCCA in Jones v. United States, this standard requires proof of an "act [that goes] beyond mere preparation and [which carries] the criminal venture forward to within dangerous proximity of the criminal end sought to be attained."[68]

---

[62] Sellers v. United States, 131 A.2d 300, 301-02 (D.C. 1957) (emphasis added). At issue in Sellers was whether the defendant had committed an attempt to arrange prostitution services on the following facts: (1) the defendant had "originated [a] proposition" to two MPD officers; (2) "specified the price per girl and the amount of [the defendant's] commission": and (3) "secured an acceptance" on that commission. Id. The Sellers court further noted, in setting forth the probable desistance standard, that whether "preparation . . . progress[es] to the point of attempt . . . is a question of degree which can only be resolved on the basis of the facts in each individual case." Id. at 301.

[63] See, e.g., Wormsley v. United States, 526 A.2d 1373, 1375 (D.C. 1987) (quoting Sellers, 131 A.2d at 301).

[64] In re Doe, 855 A.2d 1100, 1107 n.11 (D.C. 2004). This may explain the fact that the standard is omitted from the District's jury instructions on criminal attempts. See D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 7.101.

[65] In re Doe, 855 A.2d at 1107 n.11 (citing Evans, 779 A.2d at 894).

[66] WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.4 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) (collecting authorities).

[67] See id. As the drafters of the Model Penal Code observe: "[I]n actual operation the probable desistance test is linked entirely to the nearness of the actor's conduct to completion, this being the sole basis of unsubstantiated judicial appraisals of the probabilities of desistance. The test as applied appears to be little more than the physical proximity approach." Herbert Wechsler et al., The Treatment of Inchoate Crimes in the Model Penal Code of the American Law Institute: Attempt, Solicitation, and Conspiracy, 61 COLUM. L. REV. 571, 589 (1961).

[68] Jones, 386 A.2d at 312 (quoting D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 4.04 (2d ed. 1978)). At issue in Jones was whether to uphold an attempted robbery conviction against multiple defendants that had planned a bank robbery, but were stopped by police prior to execution of their plan. The defendants in the case "had made careful plans as to the role of each in the robbery, including the nature of each of their disguises, and had conducted a dry run on the preceding day." Id. Thereafter, they "launched their plans [at the appointed time], going their respective ways toward the location of the bank in three cars[,] . . . armed with shotguns and other weapons as they entered a busy downtown area in the middle of a business day, and had disguised themselves as construction workers." Id. at 312-13. At the point in which the defendants were apprehended, one defendant was "approaching the target bank and was but a block away when the police intervened," while another "was proceeding toward the bank according to plan and was no further than four blocks away, turning back only when he heard police sirens and concluded that something had gone wrong." Id. at 313. Applying the dangerous proximity test, the DCCA determined that an attempt had occurred. See id. The Jones court further clarified that this test "does not require that appellants have commenced the last act sufficient to

Since Jones, the dangerous proximity test seems to have become the most authoritative standard reflected in District law. For example, this standard is routinely relied upon by the DCCA.[69] And it is also central to the District's jury instructions on criminal attempts, which, apart from the general statement that the accused "must have done more than prepare to commit" the target offense, makes the dangerous proximity standard the District's sole approach to dealing with incomplete attempts.[70]

Jury instructions aside, there is one additional conduct requirement that is occasionally referenced in District case law, the substantial step test. Originally developed by the drafters of the Model Penal Code to expand attempt liability beyond that provided for under the proximity-based standards, this test would allow for an attempt conviction to rest upon proof of a "substantial step in a course of conduct planned to culminate in his commission of the crime."[71]

The earliest reference to the substantial step test was made in the 2004 case of In Re Doe, where the DCCA observed by way of dicta in a footnote that "the day may come when we reexamine and, perhaps, reformulate, the way we speak of the kind of 'act' that is required for a criminal attempt," in adherence to "the formulation favored by the Model Penal Code and adopted in a number of jurisdictions . . . ."[72] Thereafter, a decade later, the DCCA specifically referenced the substantial step test in the course of formulating the standard governing an incomplete attempt in a pair of 2014 decisions, Hailstock v. United States[73] and Mobley v. United States.[74] However, neither of these references appears to have changed District law's reliance on the dangerous proximity test.

Perhaps most notable is the fact that both of these decisions reference the substantial step test in the context of defining the dangerous proximity test. For example, in Hailstock, the DCCA explained that:

> [t]he test of dangerous proximity of completing a crime is met where, except for some interference, a defendant's overt acts would have resulted in commission of the completed crime . . . or where the defendant has taken a substantial step toward commission of the crime[.][75]

---

produce the crime but focuses instead on the proximity of appellants' behavior to the crime intended." Id. at 312.

[69] See, e.g., Robinson v. United States, 608 A.2d 115, 116 (D.C. 1992); Frye v. United States, 926 A.2d 1085, 1099 (D.C. 2005); Nkop v. United States, 945 A.2d 617, 620 (D.C. 2008); Johnson, 756 A.2d at 463 n.3; Euceda v. United States, 66 A.3d 994, 1000 (D.C. 2013); Fortune v. United States, 59 A.3d 949, 960 (D.C. 2013); Gee v. United States, 54 A.3d 1249, 1271 (D.C. 2012).

[70] As section 7.101 of the District's criminal jury instructions reads:

> The elements of the crime of attempted [specify crime], each of which the government must prove beyond a reasonable doubt, are that . . . . [Name of defendant] did an act reasonably adapted to accomplishing the crime of [specify crime]. [Name of defendant] must have done more than prepare to commit [specify crime]. His/her act must have come dangerously close to committing the crime. [You may convict the defendant of an attempt to commit a crime even if the evidence shows the crime was completed.]

[71] Model Penal Code § 5.01(1)(c).

[72] 855 A.2d at 1107 n.11.

[73] Hailstock v. United States, 85 A.3d 1277, 1283 (D.C. 2014).

[74] Mobley v. United States, 101 A.3d 406, 425 (D.C. 2014).

[75] Hailstock, 85 A.3d at 1282-83.

Thereafter, the DCCA in Mobley articulated precisely the same standard quoting from Hailstock.[76]

The intended meaning of the hybrid formulation announced in Hailstock and Mobley—which appears to be a novelty both inside and outside of the District—is far from clear. Traditionally, for example, the dangerous proximity test and substantial step test are understood to constitute distinct and competing approaches to resolving the same issue.[77]

At minimum, it is unlikely that either decision intended to supplant the dangerous proximity test with the substantial step test. It is well established under District law, for example, that the DCCA does not "give opinions upon moot questions or abstract propositions, or . . . declare principles or rules of law which cannot affect the matter in issue in the case before it."[78] Yet the relevant conduct in both Hailstock[79] and Mobley[80] appears to easily satisfy the traditional understanding of the dangerous proximity test reflected in prior case law. Therefore, neither decision seems appropriately situated to supplant that test with a broader standard.

Finally, any inference that the foregoing references to the substantial step test were intended to change District law is belied by more recent decisions, which clearly endorse the standard articulation of dangerous proximity test—without reference to the substantial step test—as reflecting current District law.[81]

---

[76] Mobley, 101 A.3d at 424-25.

[77] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.01 cmt. at 329; PETER W. LOW, CRIMINAL LAW 459 (3d ed. 2009).

[78] In re D.T., 977 A.2d 346, 352 (D.C. 2009) (quoting Alpert v. Wolf, 73 A.2d 525, 528 (D.C. 1950)).

[79] At issue in Hailstock was, inter alia, whether the evidence supported a finding of attempted sexual contact in a situation where "[a]ppellant entered the bedroom where [the victim] was resting and got onto the bed with her," and, "[e]ven after [the victim] said 'no' to appellant's expressed intent to 'get down' with her and even after she pushed him away, appellant continued in his efforts, pulling on her robe and touching her breast in the process." 85 A.3d at 1283. On these facts, the defendant came dangerously close to "engag[ing] in a sexual act or sexual contact" with the victim under circumstances in which the defendant "should have [had] knowledge or reason to know that the act was committed without [the victim's] permission," D.C. Code § 22-3006. See Hailstock, 85 A.3d at 1283 ("The evidence in this case satisfied these tests.").

[80] At issue is Mobley was, inter alia, whether the evidence supported a finding of attempted tampering in a situation where appellant, after speaking with a co-defendant spoke over the phone about the specific location of a gun that had been used in the commission of multiple crimes and was thereafter tossed away in the vicinity of a housing complex, went to the spot and expended significant effort searching for the gun with the intent of disposing of it. 101 A.3d at 424-25. On these facts, the defendant was dangerously close to "alter[ing], destroy[ing], mutilat[ing], conceal[ing], or remov[ing]" the gun "with intent to impair its integrity or its availability for use in the official proceeding," D.C. Code § 22-723—assuming, at least, the situation was as the person perceived it, see Mobley, 101 A.3d at 425 ("[R]easonable jurors could infer that except for Mr. Bartlett finding a gun, Mr. Thompkins's act of searching for it in the spot where it was thrown would have been successful.")

[81] For example, the DCCA in Corbin v. United States recently explained that the court has "adopted the 'dangerous proximity' theory of attempt," summarizing the current state of District law as follows:

> An attempt consists of an act which is done with the intent to commit a particular crime and is reasonably adapted to the accomplishment of that end. The act must go beyond mere preparation and must carry the criminal venture forward to within dangerous proximity of the criminal end sought to be attained. This "dangerous proximity" test, formulated by Justice Holmes, does not require that appellants have commenced the last act sufficient to produce the crime but focuses instead on the proximity of appellants' behavior to the crime intended. Jones v. United States, 386 A.2d 308, 312 (D.C. 1978) (footnote omitted). "[M]ere preparation is not an attempt, but preparation may progress to the point of attempt. Whether

Consistent with the foregoing analysis of District authorities, the dangerous proximity test appears to most accurately reflect current District law. It is directly codified by subparagraph (a)(4)(A).

RCC §§ 22E-301(a)(2) and 22E-301(a)(4)(B): Relation to Current District Law on Impossibility. Paragraph (a)(2) and subparagraph (a)(4)(B) codify, clarify, and fill in gaps reflected in District law governing impossible attempts.

Under District law, two basic propositions concerning the limits of attempt liability seem clear. First, impossibility is generally not a defense to an attempt charge—i.e. the fact that a criminal undertaking fails because of a defendant's mistaken beliefs concerning the situation in which he or she acts is generally irrelevant for purposes of attempt liability. Second, there is a requirement that a person's conduct must be reasonably adapted to completion of the target offense in order to support attempt liability. Paragraph (a)(2) and subparagraph (a)(4)(A) codify both of these principles.

The most significant decision on impossibility is the DCCA's opinion in the 2004 case of In re Doe, where the court rejected the applicability of an impossibility defense to the offense of attempted enticement of a child through an exceptionally circuitous route.[82] Procedural issues aside, at the heart of the case is the defendant's argument that it is "legally impossible" to commit attempted enticement of a child under District law where the intended victim is (unbeknownst to the perpetrator) not a child.[83]

In resolving the appellant's claim, the In re Doe court was careful to distinguish, at the outset, between "factual impossibility," which arises where "the intended substantive crime is impossible of accomplishment merely because of some physical impossibility unknown to the defendant," and "legal impossibility," which "arises only when the

---

it has is a question of degree which can only be resolved on the basis of the facts in each individual case." Id. at 313 n.2. It is sufficient for the government to prove that "except for some interference," defendant's "overt act done with the intent to commit a crime . . . would have resulted in the commission of the crime." Evans v. United States, 779 A.2d 891, 894 (D.C. 2001).

120 A.3d 588, 602 n.20 (D.C. 2015).

[82] 855 A.2d 1100, 1101 (D.C. 2004). At issue in In re Doe was whether the trial court's determination that the accused had to register as a sex offender under the District of Columbia's Sex Offender Registration Act of 1999 ("SORA") was appropriate. Id. at 1106. This determination, in turn, was based upon the court's assessment that the accused's earlier conviction in federal court for violating 18 U.S.C. § 2423(b) by traveling in interstate commerce for the purpose of engaging in a sexual act with a person under eighteen years of age "involved conduct that would constitute" or was "substantially similar" to District offense that would require registration under SORA. Id. at 1102; see D.C. Code § 22-4001(6) & (8). Notably, however, the accused's prior federal conviction arose from a sting operation: he sought to rendezvous with an undercover officer posing as a fourteen-year-old girl. In re Doe, 855 A.2d at 1102. Notwithstanding this wrinkle, CSOSA and the Superior Court nevertheless determined that the federal offense involved conduct that was "substantially similar" to the conduct described by, inter alia, the registration offense of attempted enticement of a child in violation of D.C. Code § 22-3010 and D.C. Code § 22-3018. Id. at 1104. Under that District offense, a person attempts to entice a "child"—defined as "a person who has not yet attained the age of 16 years," D.C. Code § 22-3001(3)—when that person, "being at least 4 years older than a child, [attempts to] take[] that child to any place, or entices, allures, or persuade[] a child to go to any place for the purpose of committing" an act of sexual abuse, D.C. Code § 22-3010.

[83] In re Doe, 855 A.2d at 1106.

defendant's objective is to do something that is not a crime."[84] Whereas the former claim is "not a defense" to an attempt charge, the latter claim "remains a defense to an attempt offense."[85] (It is important to point out, however, that this narrow construal of legal impossibility does little more than protect defendants from being convicted of attempts to commit imaginary crimes.)

Consistent with the foregoing classification scheme, the In re Doe court noted that the defendant's argument raised an issue of factual impossibility (albeit one with a legal dimension): where the actor intends to commit enticement of a child, but commission of the offense is impossible due to a factual mistake regarding the legal status of some attendant circumstance (here, the age of the victim), should that mistake provide grounds for exoneration?

The DCCA answered this question in the negative, stating that—consistent with the general rule governing factual impossibility—the court had "no reason to think that it would be a defense in the District of Columbia to a charge of attempted enticement of a child that the defendant was fooled because his target was in reality an undercover law enforcement officer."[86] After all, as the In re Doe court reasoned, "[w]hether the targeted victim is a child or an undercover agent, the defendant's conduct, intent, culpability, and dangerousness are all exactly the same."[87]

The broad rejection of an impossibility defense reflected in In re Doe is similarly in accordance with older DCCA case law construing drug statutes. For example, in Seeney v. United States, the DCCA clarified that "the defense of impossibility is not available to one charged with the crime of attempted [narcotics offenses] under the District of Columbia Code."[88] Which is to say, as the DCCA further clarified in Fields v. United States, that proof of "the defendant's belief that he was dealing in controlled substances," rather than proof that the substances implicated are in fact controlled substances, will suffice to establish an attempt conviction in this context.[89]

Also consistent with a broad rejection of an impossibility defense under District law are two District statutes, trafficking in stolen property (TSP) and receiving stolen property (RSP), which seem to legislatively endorse a similar approach to that reflected in the foregoing cases.[90] More specifically, under each statute, convictions for the completed offenses of TSP and RSP may rest on a mistaken belief that property at issue was stolen,

---

[84] Id. (citing German v. United States, 525 A.2d 596, 606 n.20 (D.C. 1987) and WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.5 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019)).

[85] In re Doe, 855 A.2d at 1106. These principles are also recognized in the commentary to § 7.101 of the District's criminal jury instructions, which observes that "factual impossibility, where the intended substantive crime is impossible of accomplishment merely because of some physical impossibility unknown to the defendant, is not a defense" under District law, while "legal impossibility"—that is, "where a defendant's objective 'is to do something that is not a crime'"—is the only form of impossibility that may constitute an offense under District law.

[86] In re Doe, 855 A.2d at 1106.

[87] Id.

[88] 563 A.2d 1081, 1083 (D.C. 1989).

[89] 952 A.2d 859, 865 (D.C. 2008).

[90] See D.C. Code § 22-3231(b) ("A person commits the offense of trafficking in stolen property if, on 2 or more separate occasions, that person traffics in stolen property, knowing or having reason to believe that the property has been stolen"); D.C. Code § 22-3232(a) ("A person commits the offense of receiving stolen property if that person buys, receives, possesses, or obtains control of stolen property, knowing or having reason to believe that the property was stolen.").

even if it wasn't stolen (as is the case in sting operations), and, therefore, consummation of the target harm was practically impossible. This is articulated, inter alia, through identical provisions clarifying that for each offense "[i]t shall not be a defense . . . [that] the property was not in fact stolen, if the accused engages in conduct which would constitute the crime if the attendant circumstances were as the accused believed them to be."[91]

It's important to note that while the foregoing authorities indicate that District law reflects what the DCCA has deemed "[t]he modern and better rule . . . [that] impossibility is not a defense when the defendant's actual intent (not limited by the true facts unknown to him) was to do an act or bring about a result proscribed by law,"[92] there is one aspect of District law that potentially complicates the foregoing analysis. This is the well-established requirement of reasonable adaptation.

Originally articulated by the DCCA in Jones v. United States alongside the court's endorsement of the dangerous proximity test, this requirement entails proof that the defendant's conduct have been "reasonably adapted to the accomplishment of [the target offense]."[93] Since Jones, this "reasonably adapted" language has been recited in many DCCA attempt opinions.[94] And it is also a central part of the District's jury instructions on attempts.[95]

Notwithstanding its pervasiveness, however, neither any published DCCA opinion nor the commentary to the District's criminal jury instructions appears to explain the significance of the requirement. Instead, all that District authority reveals is that: (1) the reasonable adaptation requirement seems to be part of the conduct requirement of an attempt; and (2) that it is most important where impossibility—such as, for example,

---

[91] D.C. Code § 22-3231(c); D.C. Code § 22-3232(b); see also German, 525 A.2d at 607 (noting that, with respect to RSP, the "same acts could be punished under [the District's general] attempt statute" even without the foregoing subjective specification reflected in D.C. Code § 22-3232(b), on the grounds that impossibility is not a defense to an attempt charge).

[92] In re Doe, 855 A.2d at 1106 (quoting WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.5 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019)).

[93] More specifically, the DCCA in Jones v. United States endorsed the formulation provided in "Criminal Jury Instructions for the District of Columbia, No. 4.04 (2d ed. 1972)" which read:

> An attempt consists of an act which is done with the intent to commit a particular crime and is reasonably adapted to the accomplishment of that end. The act must go beyond mere preparation and must carry the criminal venture forward to within dangerous proximity of the criminal end sought to be attained.

386 A.2d 308, 312 (D.C. 1978).

[94] See, e.g., Seeney v. United States, 563 A.2d 1081, 1083 (D.C. 1989); Robinson, 608 A.2d at 116; Johnson, 756 A.2d at 464; Thompson v. United States, 678 A.2d 24, 27 (D.C. 1996); Williams v. United States, 966 A.2d 844, 848 (D.C. 2009); Doreus v. United States, 964 A.2d 154, 158 (D.C. 2009); Corbin v. United States, 120 A.3d 588, 602 n.20 (D.C. 2015).

[95] As section 7.101 of the District's criminal jury instructions reads:

> The elements of the crime of attempted [specify crime], each of which the government must prove beyond a reasonable doubt, are that . . . . [Name of defendant] did an act reasonably adapted to accomplishing the crime of [specify crime].

attempted drug prosecutions premised upon the defendant's belief that the object possessed was a controlled substance—is at issue.[96]

Both of the foregoing general propositions are consistent with common law authorities, which more clearly describe the requirement as a limitation on the general rejection of a factual impossibility defense to an attempt charge. As one commentator summarizes the common law approach: where "the means employed are not reasonably adapted to carry out" the actor's intent to commit a crime, an attempt conviction is not justified "for in such case there can be no damage or danger of damage."[97] This means, for example, that if a person attempts to kill another by "invok[ing] witchcraft, charms, incantations, maledictions, hexing or voodoo," such conduct "cannot constitute an attempt to murder since the means employed are not in any way adapted to accomplish the intended result."[98] Nor, according to the same reasoning, can "[s]triking a man with a small switch [] constitute an attempt to murder him."[99]

To be sure, there's no DCCA case law specifically addressing these kinds of issues. However, this is not surprising since attempt prosecutions premised upon "inherently impossible" attempts of this nature "seldom confront the courts."[100] Nevertheless, the DCCA has affirmatively upheld attempt convictions in impossibility cases based upon the premise that the defendant's conduct was reasonably adapted to completion of an offense.[101] The implication, then, is that where a defendant's conduct is not reasonably adapted to completion of an offense—as would be the case with attempted murder by means of witchcraft—attempt liability could not attach.[102]

---

[96] For example, in Seeney v. United States, the DCCA determined that the "defense of impossibility is not available to one charged with the crime of attempted possession with intent to distribute controlled substances under the District of Columbia Code." 563 A.2d at 1083. Which in turn led the court to hold the following:

> With respect to the offense of attempted possession with intent to distribute . . . it is not necessary to establish that the substance a defendant attempted to possess was the proscribed substance. The government must establish conduct by the defendant that is reasonably adapted to the accomplishment of the crime of possession of the proscribed substance, and the requisite criminal intent.

Id. Thereafter, in Thompson v. United States the DCCA held that:

> [The foregoing] rule, applied in Seeney to attempted PWID, is equally applicable to a case involving attempted distribution . . . In an attempt case involving a purported illegal drug, what Seeney teaches is that the government is not required to prove the identity of the substance in question, but rather conduct by the defendant that is reasonably adapted to the accomplishment of the crime of [distribution] and the requisite criminal intent . . . This is no different from what must be proved in any case in which the defendant is charged with an attempt to commit a crime: an intent to commit the crime and the performance of some act toward its commission.

678 A.2d at 27.

[97] Edwin R. Keedy, Criminal Attempts at Common Law, 102 U. PA. L. REV. 464, 469 (1954).

[98] Id. at 470 (collecting citations).

[99] Id.

[100] WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.5 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019).

[101] See, e.g., Seeney, 563 A.2d at 1083; Thompson, 678 A.2d at 27.

[102] This conclusion is also consistent with the DCCA's policy rationale for generally rejecting impossibility defenses. For example, in In re Doe, the DCCA rejected an impossibility defense on the rationale that Paragraph (a)(2) codifies the foregoing District authorities in a manner that better clarifies the interrelationship of the relevant principles. First, paragraph (a)(2) places an important, if narrow, limitation on the dangerous proximity requirement: the person's conduct must, at minimum, be "reasonably adapted to completion of the offense." Consistent with relevant DCCA case law and the common law underpinnings of the reasonable adaptation requirement, this language demands that there exist some minimum relationship between the accused's criminal plans and the objective sought to be achieved. Where, in contrast, this relationship is lacking—such as where the defendant has engaged in an inherently impossible attempt—liability cannot attach.

Second, subparagraph (a)(4)(B) incorporates what the DCCA has deemed "[t]he modern and better" approach to impossibility, namely, to recognize that "impossibility is not a defense [to a charge of criminal attempt] when the defendant's actual intent (not limited by the true facts unknown to him) was to do an act or bring about a result proscribed by law."[103] It does so, however, in an accessible and simple manner: rather than relying on confusing classification-based distinctions between legal and factual impossibility, the critical issue is whether the person's conduct satisfied the dangerous proximity standard when the situation is viewed as the actor perceived it.

RCC § 22E-301(c): Relation to Current District Law on Relationship Between Completed Offense and Attempt. Subsection (c) codifies, clarifies, and fills in a gap reflected in District law governing the relationship between a completed offense and a criminal attempt.

The D.C. Code is silent on the relationship between the elements of an attempt and the elements of a completed offense, which has effectively submitted the topic to the discretion of the DCCA.[104] The relevant case law establishes that the government may secure an attempt conviction based upon proof that the target offense was actually completed. Subsection (c) expressly codifies this legal proposition.

Under DCCA case law, it is well-established that "a person charged with an attempt to commit a crime may be convicted even though the evidence shows a completed offense, not merely an attempt.'"[105] This policy, as promulgated by the DCCA, is understood to rest on two basic underlying principles: (1) "failure is not an essential element of criminal

"[w]hether the targeted victim is a child or an undercover agent, the defendant's conduct, intent, culpability, and dangerousness are all exactly the same." 855 A.2d at 1106. Where, however, a person attempts to commit a crime by means not otherwise reasonably adapted to commission of the target offense—for example, where the defendant's sole means of enticing a child is by performing a witchcraft ceremony in his own home—this rationale does not hold since the person's conduct and dangerousness seem qualitatively different.

[103] In re Doe, 855 A.2d at 1106 (quoting WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.5 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019)).

[104] Note, however, that D.C. Super. Ct. R. Crim. P. 31(c) establishes that: "A defendant may be found guilty of any of the following: (1) an offense necessarily included in the offense charged; (2) an attempt to commit the offense charged; or (3) an attempt to commit an offense necessarily included in the offense charged, if the attempt is an offense in its own right."

[105] Evans v. United States, 779 A.2d 891, 894 (D.C. 2001); see, e.g., United States v. Fleming, 215 A.2d 839 (D.C. 1966); Ray v. United States, 575 A.2d 1196, 1199–200 (D.C. 1990).

attempt"[106]; and (2) "[a]n attempt is a lesser-included offense of the completed crime."[107]Potentially problematic, however, is the DCCA's second rationale: that proof of a completed offense may substitute for proof of an attempt because an attempt is a lesser-included offense (LIO) of the completed crime

At the heart of the issue is the legal standard by which the DCCA determines when one offense is an LIO of another offense, the so-called elements test.[108] Under the elements test, the DCCA analyzes "whether the statutory elements of the lesser offense are contained within those of the greater charged offense."[109] Which is to say that one offense is an LIO of another offense when (and only when) "the greater offense cannot be committed without also committing the lesser."[110] In practice, "the determination [of] whether an offense is a 'lesser included' offense of an allegedly 'greater' offense is made by comparing the statutory elements of the two offenses," without regard to the facts of a case.[111]

Viewed through the elements test, an attempt often will be an LIO of the completed offense, but not always, assuming it is subject to a principle of culpable mental state elevation. Under this principle, the government must prove that the accused acted with the intent to cause any result required by the target offense, regardless of whether a lower culpable mental state, such as recklessness or negligence, will suffice to establish the completed offense. Based solely on a comparison of statutory elements, then, it is not always the case that an attempt—occasionally subject to a higher culpable mental state—is an LIO of the completed offense under a principle of culpable mental state elevation.[112]

In accordance with the following analysis, the DCCA's reliance on the elements test has produced a line of cases that appear to reject a principle of culpable mental state elevation applicable to attempts in the interests of ensuring that proof of a completed offense can substitute for proof of an attempt.

Illustrative is United States v. Smith.[113] The defendant in Smith was prosecuted for attempted second-degree child cruelty on a theory that the defendant recklessly committed the completed offense.[114] On appeal, the defendant argued that, in light of the fact that an attempt was charged, "the government was required, but failed, to prove that he specifically intended to injure his child" pursuant to a principle of culpable mental state elevation.[115] The DCCA ultimately rejected this argument, deeming that "the intent required to commit the crime of attempt can be no greater than the intent required to commit the completed

---

[106] Evans, 779 A.2d at 894; see, e.g., In re Doe, 855 A.2d 1100, 1107 (D.C. 2004); Ray, 575 A.2d at 1199–200 (citing United States v. Dupree, 544 F.2d 1050, 1052 (9th Cir.1976) and United States v. Jacobs, 632 F.2d 695, 697 (7th Cir. 1980)).
[107] Evans, 779 A.2d at 894; see, e.g., Ray, 575 A.2d at 1199; Washington v. United States, 965 A.2d 35, 42 (D.C. 2009).
[108] See, e.g., Mungo v. United States, 772 A.2d 240, 245 (D.C. 2001); Pixley v. United States, 692 A.2d 438, 440 (D.C. 1997); see Schmuck v. United States, 489 U.S. 705, 716 (1989).
[109] Mungo, 772 A.2d at 245.
[110] Warner v. United States, 124 A.3d 79, 85 (D.C. 2015).
[111] Id.; see also Mungo, 772 A.2d at 245 ("Although simple assault is not defined by the statute, analysis under the 'elements" test for lesser-included offenses is still appropriate and the elements to be examined are those found in the common law definition of assault.")
[112] See, e.g., WAYNE R. LAFAVE & GERALD ISRAEL, 6 CRIM. PROC. § 24.8(e) (4th ed. Westlaw 2017).
[113] 813 A.2d 216, 219 (D.C. 2002).
[114] See id.
[115] Id.

crime."[116] "To hold otherwise," after all, would "create the anomalous result that appellant could be convicted of the completed crime . . . but, on the same facts, could not be convicted of an attempt to commit that same crime."[117]

Viewed in context, the holding in Smith (and comparable cases) is not surprising.[118] Assuming the practice of allowing proof of the completed offense to suffice for an attempt rests upon a strict comparison of the statutory elements alone, then application of a principle of culpable mental state elevation would indeed be problematic. At the same time, however, application of the principle of culpable mental state equivalency implied in these cases in a broader context is even more problematic. Were it true, for example, that "the intent required to commit the crime of attempt can be no greater than the intent required to commit the completed crime,"[119] regardless of the situation, then attempt charges premised on theories of recklessness, negligence, or even strict liability would be viable in the District. And this in turn would provide for expansive liability in derogation of both DCCA case law and nearly universal national legal trends.[120]

Fortunately, the foregoing tension is easily resolvable by adopting a statutory provision clarifying that proof of the completed offense is an explicitly authorized means of proving an attempt. By establishing that the elements of the completed offense constitute a viable alternative basis for establishing attempt liability, this kind of legislative statement obviates the relevant LIO-related complications arising in cases where the government seeks to prove an attempt—otherwise subject to a generally applicable principle of culpable mental state elevation, see RCC § 22E-301(b)—with evidence of the completed offense. Consistent with the interests of clarity, consistency, and the preservation of current District law, then, subsection (c) provides this legislative statement.

RCC § 22E-301(d): Relation to Current District Law on Attempt Penalties.

Subsection (d) establishes a uniform and proportionate grading scheme for criminal attempts, which clarifies, simplifies, and changes District law.

The D.C. Code's general attempt penalty statute, D.C. Code § 22-1803, establishes a default penalty framework for attempt offenses comprised of two basic rules.[121] First,

---

[116] Id.

[117] Id.

[118] The DCCA has likewise relied on similar reasoning to uphold convictions for attempts to commit so-called general intent crimes, such as simple assault and threats, based upon facts indicating that the completed offense had been committed—but in the absence of proof of an elevated mental state beyond the "general intent" necessary for the underlying offense. See Ray v. United States, 575 A.2d 1196, 199 (D.C. 1990); Jones v. United States, 124 A.3d 127, 129-31 (D.C. 2015).

[119] Evans, 779 A.2d at 894.

[120] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.01, cmt. at 304 ("[T]he scope of the criminal law would be unduly extended if one could be liable for an attempt whenever he recklessly or negligently created a risk of any result whose actual occurrence would lead to criminal responsibility."); Alan C. Michaels, Acceptance: The Missing Mental State, 71 S. CAL. L. REV. 953, 1033 (1998) (observing that such treatment would open the "floodgates to attempt liability"); WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.3 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) ("Under the prevailing view, an attempt thus cannot be committed by recklessness or negligence or on a strict liability basis, even if the underlying crime can be so committed."); Commentary on Haw. Rev. Stat. § 705-500 ("Reckless driving . . . does not constitute attempted manslaughter."); State v. Holbron, 904 P.2d 912, 920, 930 (Haw. 1995) ("We agree with the rest of the Anglo-American jurisprudential world that there can be no attempt to commit involuntary manslaughter.").

[121] D.C. Code § 22-1803 ("Whoever shall attempt to commit any crime, which attempt is not otherwise made punishable by chapter 19 of An Act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia, approved March attempts to commit offenses other than "crimes of violence" are punishable by a maximum of 180 days incarceration, $1000 fine, or both.[122] And second, attempts to commit "crimes of violence"[123] are punishable by a maximum of 5 years incarceration, $12,500 fine, or both.[124]

The District's general attempt penalty statute also explicitly recognizes an exception to these two default rules: any attempt offense "made punishable by chapter 19 of An Act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901" (hereafter, "1901 Code") is subject to the penalties specified in the relevant statutory provisions.[125] This reflects the fact that the 1901 Code explicitly made several kinds of attempts punishable in a manner different from the default penalty, which at the time was set at one-year imprisonment or a $1,000 fine, or both.[126]

For example, two common felonies in the 1901 Code were defined in a manner that effectively punished attempted versions of the offense the same as completed versions of 3, 1901 (31 Stat. 1321), shall be punished by a fine not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or by imprisonment for not more than 180 days, or both. Except, whoever shall attempt to commit a crime of violence as defined in § 23-1331 shall be punished by a fine not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or by imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both.").

---

[122] See D.C. Code § 22-3571.01(4) (setting fines at "$1,000 if the offense is punishable by imprisonment for 180 days, or 6 months, or less but more than 90 days").

[123] D.C. Code § 23-1331(4) ("The term 'crime of violence' means aggravated assault; act of terrorism; arson; assault on a police officer (felony); assault with a dangerous weapon; assault with intent to kill, commit first degree sexual abuse, commit second degree sexual abuse, or commit child sexual abuse; assault with significant bodily injury; assault with intent to commit any other offense; burglary; carjacking; armed carjacking; child sexual abuse; cruelty to children in the first degree; extortion or blackmail accompanied by threats of violence; gang recruitment, participation, or retention by the use or threatened use of force, coercion, or intimidation; kidnapping; malicious disfigurement; manslaughter; manufacture or possession of a weapon of mass destruction; mayhem; murder; robbery; sexual abuse in the first, second, or third degrees; use, dissemination, or detonation of a weapon of mass destruction; or an attempt, solicitation, or conspiracy to commit any of the foregoing offenses.").

[124] See D.C. Code § 22-3571.01(6) (setting fines at "$12,500 if the offense is punishable by imprisonment for 5 years or less but more than one year").

[125] D.C. Code § 22-1803.

[126] See D.C. Code § 906 (1901); Act of March 3, 1901, ch. 19, § 906, 31 Stat. 1321, 1337 ("Whoever shall attempt to commit any crime, which attempt is not otherwise made punishable by this chapter [Chapter 19], shall be punished by a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars or by imprisonment for not more than one year, or both."). Since being enacted in 1901, the District's general attempt penalty statute has undergone two substantive policy revisions. Most importantly, in 1994, the D.C. Council amended it to establish separate default penalty rules for attempts to commit non-violent crimes—subject to a maximum of 180 days incarceration and/or a $1000 fine—and for attempts to commit violent crimes—subject to a maximum 5 years incarceration and/or a $5,000 fine. See OMNIBUS CRIMINAL JUSTICE REFORM AMENDMENT ACT OF 1994, 1994 District of Columbia Laws 10-151 (Act 10–238), sec. 105, § 906 (1994). These changes occurred as part of a larger effort to increase judicial case processing by reducing the penalties for more than 40 offenses to make them non-jury demandable (i.e. subject only to a bench trial by a judge rather than a jury) under D.C. Code § 22-705. See CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY, JAMES E. NATHANSON, Bill 10-98, the "Omnibus Criminal Justice Reform Amendment Act of 1994, at 3-4 (January 26, 1994) [hereinafter Judiciary Committee Report]. Supported by both the D.C. Superior Court and Office of the United States Attorney, the 1994 Act was intended to "relieve pressure on current misdemeanor calendars, allow for more cases to be heard by hearing commissioners, and allow for more felony cases to be scheduled at an earlier date." Id. Subsequently, in 2012, the D.C. Council raised the maximum fine for attempts to commit violent crimes from $5,000 to $12,500 consistent with the Criminal Fine Proportionality Amendment Act. See CRIMINAL FINE PROPORTIONALITY AMENDMENT ACT of 2012, 2012 District of Columbia Laws 19-317 (Act 19-641), sec. 101 (2012); see also D.C. Code § 22-1803; D.C. Code § 22-3571.01.

the offense, namely, attempted arson,[127] and attempted malicious destruction of property.[128] And attempted robbery had its own statutory provision subject to a penalty in derogation from the default rule.[129] Accompanying these three explicit exceptions to the 1901 Code's default penalty rule for criminal attempts were three implicit exceptions: "assault-with-intent to" (AWI) crimes,[130] which were enacted to allow "a court to impose a more appropriate penalty for an assaultive act that results from an unsuccessful attempt to commit a felony or some other proscribed end."[131]

The 1901 Code's explicit and implicit statutory exceptions to the default penalty for attempts have undergone little or no change to date.[132] At the same time, many other offense-specific exceptions to the general attempt penalty statute have been added to the D.C. Code over the last century.

Some of these exceptions are communicated through the penalty provisions governing attempts to commit individual or certain groupings of offenses. Illustrative provisions include the D.C. Code provisions setting forth penalties for attempts to commit: (1) various human trafficking related offenses[133]; (2) various sexual abuse-related [127] D.C. Code § 820 (1901); Act of March 3, 1901, ch. 19, § 820.

[128] D.C. Code § 848 (1901); Act of March 3, 1901, ch. 19, § 848; see also D.C. Code § 824 (1901); Act of March 3, 1901, ch. 19, § 824 (unlawful entry of property).
[129] D.C. Code § 811 (1901); Act of March 3, 1901, ch. 19, § 811.
[130] See D.C. Code §§ 804-06 (1901); Act of March 3, 1901, ch. 19, §§ 804-06.
[131] Perry v. United States, 36 A.3d 799, 809 (D.C. 2011). These AWI offenses effectively created a complementary form of attempt liability, which subjected actors to greater punishment for unconsummated conduct that reached the point of an assault. Both AWIs and criminal attempts punish an unconsummated intent to commit a criminal offense; the only difference is that, whereas a criminal attempt requires proof of conduct that is dangerously close to committing that offense, an AWI offense requires proof of a simple assault.
[132] Like the 1901 Code's attempted arson, malicious destruction of property, and robbery provisions, the 1901 Code's AWI offenses also still "remain on the books to this day" in essentially the same form. Perry, 36 A.3d at 810-11. First, there is D.C. Code § 22-401—the current version of § 803 of the 1901 Code—which subjects "any assault with intent to kill or to commit first degree sexual abuse, second degree sexual abuse, or child sexual abuse, or to commit robbery . . . . to imprisonment for not less than 2 years or more than 15 years." Second, there is D.C. Code § 22-402—the current version of § 804 of the 1901 Code—which subjects any "assault with intent to commit mayhem . . . . to imprisonment for not more than 10 years." And third, there is D.C. Code § 22-403—the current version of § 805 of the 1901 Code—which subjects an "assault[] with intent to commit any other offense . . . . [to] not more than 5 years." Only minor modifications have been made to these offenses since their enactment. For example, §§ 804 and 805 of the 1901 Code are essentially identical to §§ 22-402 and 403 of the current D.C. Code. And § 803 of the 1901 Code, currently reflected in D.C. Code § 22-401, has only been lightly revised: the offense of assault with intent to commit "rape" has been replaced with the related offenses of assault with intent to commit first degree sexual abuse, assault with intent to commit second degree sexual abuse, and assault with intent to commit child sexual abuse. Other than that, the AWI offenses currently contained in Title 22 are substantively the same as those enacted in 1901.
[133] See D.C. Code § 22-1837(d) ("Whoever attempts to violate § 22-1832, § 22-1833, § 22-1834, § 22-1835 or § 22-1836 shall be fined not more than 1/2 the maximum fine otherwise authorized for the offense, imprisoned for not more than 1/2 the maximum term otherwise authorized for the offense, or both.") offenses[134]; (3) various drug-related offenses[135]; (4) manufacture or possession of a weapon of mass destruction[136]; and (5) use, dissemination, or detonation of a weapon of mass destruction.[137]

Other exceptions to the general attempt penalty statute are communicated through incorporation of the term "attempts" into the definition of a given offense, effectively providing that an attempt to commit that offense is subject to the same punishment as the completed offense.[138] Illustrative provisions in the D.C. Code include the statutory

[134] See D.C. Code § 22-3018 ("Any person who attempts to commit an offense under this subchapter shall be imprisoned for a term of years not to exceed 15 years where the maximum prison term authorized for the offense is life or for not more than 1/2 of the maximum prison sentence authorized for the offense and, in addition, may be fined an amount not to exceed 1/2 of the maximum fine authorized for the offense.")

[135] See D.C. Code § 48-904.09 ("Any person who attempts or conspires to commit any offense defined in this subchapter is punishable by imprisonment or fine or both which may not exceed the maximum punishment prescribed for the offense, the commission of which was the object of the attempt or conspiracy.").

[136] See D.C. Code § 22-3154(b) ("A person who attempts or conspires to manufacture or possess a weapon of mass destruction capable of causing multiple deaths, serious bodily injuries to multiple persons, or massive destruction of property may, upon conviction, be punished by imprisonment for not more than 30 years.")

[137] See D.C. Code § 22-3155(b) ("A person who attempts or conspires to use, disseminate, or detonate a weapon of mass destruction capable of causing multiple deaths, serious bodily injuries to multiple persons, or massive destruction of property may, upon conviction, be punished by imprisonment for not more than 30 years.").

[138] These fully inchoate attempt offenses are to be distinguished from the District's partially inchoate attempt offenses, which incorporate the term "attempt" into a statutory definition, but apply it to only some of the elements in that offense, such as the District's carjacking statute. See D.C. Code § 22-2803 (a)(1) ("A person commits the offense of carjacking if, by any means, that person knowingly or recklessly by force or violence, whether against resistance or by sudden or stealthy seizure or snatching, or by putting in fear, or attempts to do so, shall take from another person immediate actual possession of a person's motor vehicle."); see also Corbin v. United States, 120 A.3d 588 (D.C. 2015) (interpreting the phrase "or attempts to do so" to apply only to the force or violence requirement, such that proof that the defendant actually took the vehicle is necessary for a conviction brought under this statute (rather than attempted carjacking, brought under the District's general attempt statute)). Other statutes potentially subject to this kind of partially inchoate reading include: D.C. Code § 22-851 (Protection of district public officials); D.C. Code § 22-1211 (Tampering with a detection device); D.C. Code § 22-1404 (Falsely impersonating public officer or minister); D.C. Code § 22-1409 (Use of official insignia; penalty for unauthorized use); D.C. Code § 22-1713 (Corrupt influence in connection with athletic contests); D.C. Code § 22-1835 (Unlawful conduct with respect to documents in furtherance of human trafficking); D.C. Code § 22-1836 (Benefitting financially from human trafficking); D.C. Code § 22-2707 (Procuring; receiving money or other valuable thing for arranging assignation); D.C. Code § 22-3237.02 (Identity theft); D.C. Code § 22-3251 (Extortion); D.C. Code § 22-3535(f) (Voyeurism); and D.C. Code § 50-2201.05b (Fleeing from law enforcement).

definitions of (1) enticing a child or minor,[139] (2) voter fraud,[140] and (3) public assistance fraud.[141]

Collectively, the District's "patchwork of attempt statutes"[142] presents two main problems: (1) it lacks a consistent grading principle; and (2) it is confusingly communicated. With respect to the first problem, at least three fundamentally different grading patterns appear to be reflected in the penalties governing attempts to commit both crimes of violence and non-violent crimes under the D.C. Code.

The first grading pattern, which might be referred to as a "substantial punishment discount," is reflected in the numerous District attempt offenses subject to statutory maxima that are many orders of magnitude below the statutory maxima governing the completed offense. Most often, this kind of substantial punishment discount is produced by a straightforward application of the general attempt penalty statute's default rules.[143]

---

[139] See D.C. Code § 22-3010(a) ("Whoever, being at least 4 years older than a child or being in a significant relationship with a minor . . . seduces, entices, allures, convinces, or persuades or attempts to seduce, entice, allure, convince, or persuade a child or minor to engage in a sexual act or contact shall be imprisoned for not more than 5 years or may be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, or both."); D.C. Code § 22-3010(b)("Whoever, being at least 4 years older than the purported age of a person who represents himself or herself to be a child, attempts (1) to seduce, entice, allure, convince, or persuade any person who represents himself or herself to be a child to engage in a sexual act or contact . . . shall be imprisoned for not more than 5 years or may be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, or both.").

[140] See D.C. Code § 1-1001.14(a) ("Any person who shall register, or attempt to register, or vote or attempt to vote under the provisions of this subchapter and make any false representations as to his or her qualifications for registering or voting or for holding elective office, or be guilty of violating § 1-1001.07(d)(2)(D), § 1-1001.09, § 1-1001.12, or § 1-1001.13 or be guilty of bribery or intimidation of any voter at an election, or being registered, shall vote or attempt to vote more than once in any election so held, or shall purloin or secrete any of the votes cast in an election, or attempt to vote in an election held by a political party other than that to which he or she has declared himself or herself to be affiliated, or, if employed in the counting of votes in any election held pursuant to this subchapter, knowingly make a false report in regard thereto, and every candidate, person, or official of any political committee who shall knowingly make any expenditure or contribution in violation of subchapter I of Chapter 11 of this title, shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than $10,000 or be imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both.").

[141] See D.C. Code § 4-218.01(a) ("Any person who, with the intent to defraud, by means of false statement, failure to disclose information, or impersonation, or by other fraudulent device, obtains or attempts to obtain or any person who knowingly aids or abets such person in the obtaining or attempting to obtain: (1) any grant or payment of public assistance to which he is not entitled; (2) a larger amount of public assistance than that to which he or she is entitled; (3) payment of any forfeited grant of public assistance; or (4) a public assistance identification card; or any person who with intent to defraud the District aids or abets in the buying or in any way disposing of the real property of a recipient of public assistance shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be sentenced to pay a fine of not more than $500, or to imprisonment not to exceed one year, or both.").

[142] 1978 D.C. Code Rev. § 22-201 cmt. at 113.

[143] As noted above, the relevant legislative history underlying the Omnibus Criminal Justice Reform Amendment Act of 1994 indicates that the default rule for non-crimes of violence was set at 180 days to ensure they were non-jury demandable, and, therefore, to increase judicial efficiency. See CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY, JAMES E. NATHANSON, Bill 10-98, the "Omnibus Criminal Justice Reform Amendment Act of 1994, at 3-4 (January 26, 1994) [hereinafter Judiciary Committee Report] (noting that the act was intended to "relieve pressure on current misdemeanor calendars, allow for more cases to be heard by hearing commissioners, and allow for more felony cases to be scheduled at an earlier date"). At first glance, this seems to explain the substantial punishment discount applied to grade attempts to commit non-crimes of violence. As discussed below, however, the penalties governing many attempts to commit non-crimes of violence under the D.C. Code reflect fundamentally different grading patterns—namely, a proportionate punishment variance or equalized punishment. Likewise, the penalties governing attempts to commit crimes of violence under the D.C. Code also reflect all three of these fundamentally different grading patterns.

A substantial penalty discount is perhaps most clearly reflected in the grading of attempts to commit various non-violent crimes. For example, whereas the statutory maxima for felony property offenses such as first degree theft,[144] first[145] and second degree[146] fraud, first degree receiving stolen property,[147] first degree financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult or elderly person,[148] unauthorized use of a motor vehicle,[149] and blackmail[150] (not involving a threat of violence[151]) range between 5 and 10 years, an attempt to commit any of those offenses is subject to the 180 day default rule governing attempts to commit non-crimes of violence under the general attempt penalty statute.[152] Likewise, the 10 year statutory maxima applicable to second degree cruelty to children[153] as well as the 20 year statutory maximum applicable to felony threats[154] are also reduced to 180 days under the first default rule.[155] (Neither of these offenses is a crime of violence.[156])

A pattern of substantial punishment discounting also can be seen in the penalties governing a wide range of attempts to commit crimes of violence. For example, whereas [144] D.C. Code § 22-3212(a) ("Any person convicted of theft in the first degree shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned for not more than 10 years, or both, if the value of the property obtained or used is $1,000 or more.").

[145] D.C. Code § 22-3221(a)(1) ("Any person convicted of fraud in the first degree shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or twice the value of the property obtained or lost, whichever is greater, or imprisoned for not more than 10 years, or both, if the value of the property obtained or lost is $1,000 or more . . . .").
[146] D.C. Code § 22-3221(b)(1) ("Any person convicted of fraud in the second degree shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or twice the value of the property which was the object of the scheme or systematic course of conduct, whichever is greater, or imprisoned for not more than 3 years, or both, if the value of the property which was the object of the scheme or systematic course of conduct is $1,000 or more . . . .").
[147] D.C. Code § 22-3232(c)(1) ("Any person convicted of receiving stolen property shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not more than 7 years, or both, if the value of the stolen property is $1,000 or more.").
[148] D.C. Code § 22-936.01(a) ("Any person who commits the offense of financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult or elderly person in violation of § 22-933.01 shall be subject to the following criminal penalties . . . When the value of the property or legal obligation is $1,000 or more, a fine of not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, or imprisonment for not more than 10 years, or both.").
[149] D.C. Code § 22-3215(d)(1) ("[A] person convicted of unauthorized use of a motor vehicle under subsection (b) of this section shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, imprisoned for not more than 5 years, or both.").
[150] D.C. Code § 22-3252 (b) ("Any person convicted of blackmail shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned for not more than 5 years, or both.").
[151] See D.C. Code § 23-1331(4).
[152] D.C. Code § 22-1803.
[153] D.C. Code § 22-1101(b)(2) ("Any person convicted of cruelty to children in the second degree shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or be imprisoned not more than 10 years, or both.").
[154] D.C. Code § 22-1810 ("Whoever threatens within the District of Columbia to kidnap any person or to injure the person of another or physically damage the property of any person or of another person, in whole or in part, shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not more than 20 years, or both.").
[155] See D.C. Code § 22-1803.
[156] See D.C. Code § 23-1331(4).

first-degree murder[157] and second-degree murder[158] are both potentially subject to a sentence of life in prison under the D.C. Code, an attempt to commit either of those offenses is subject to 5 year default rule governing attempts to commit crimes of violence under the general attempt penalty statute.[159] Likewise, the 30 year statutory maxima applicable to kidnapping[160] and first degree burglary,[161] as well as the 15 year statutory maxima applicable to first degree cruelty to children[162] and second degree burglary[163] are also reduced to 5 years under the second default rule.[164] And the District's stand-alone attempted robbery statute effectively reduces the 15 year statutory maximum applicable to the completed offense[165] to 3 years for an attempt.[166]

These substantially discounted attempt penalties are to be contrasted with those that reflect a grading pattern that might be referred as "equal punishment," namely, they subject attempts to the same statutory maximum governing the completed offense. The D.C. Code is comprised of numerous attempt offenses that effectively equalize the sanction for attempts, though the D.C. Council has authorized this outcome in a variety of ways.

Most explicit is the District's semi-general penalty provision for drug crimes, D.C. Code § 48-904.09, which broadly states that all attempted drug crimes may be punished as seriously as completed drug crimes.[167] In practical effect, this means that, inter alia, an attempt to manufacture, distribute, or possess, with intent to manufacture or distribute, a [157] D.C. Code § 22-2104(a)("The punishment for murder in the first degree shall be not less than 30 years nor more than life imprisonment without release . . . .").

[158] D.C. Code § 22-2104(c) ("Whoever is guilty of murder in the second degree shall be sentenced to a period of incarceration of not more than life . . . .").
[159] See D.C. Code § 22-1803. Note, however, that the District's most severe AWI statute partially softens this discount by applying a 15 year statutory maximum to attempted murders that progress to the point of an assault. See D.C. Code § 22-401.
[160] D.C. Code § 22-2001 ("Whoever shall be guilty of, or of aiding or abetting in, seizing, confining, inveigling, enticing, decoying, kidnapping, abducting, concealing, or carrying away any individual by any means whatsoever, and holding or detaining, or with the intent to hold or detain, such individual for ransom or reward or otherwise, except, in the case of a minor, by a parent thereof, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by imprisonment for not more than 30 years.").
[161] D.C. Code § 22-801(a) ("Burglary in the first degree shall be punished by imprisonment for not less than 5 years nor more than 30 years.").
[162] D.C. Code § 22-1101(c)(1) ("Any person convicted of cruelty to children in the first degree shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or be imprisoned not more than 15 years, or both.").
[163] D.C. Code § 22-801(b) ("Burglary in the second degree shall be punished by imprisonment for not less than 2 years nor more than 15 years.").
[164] See D.C. Code § 22-1803.
[165] D.C. Code § 22-2801 ("Whoever by force or violence, whether against resistance or by sudden or stealthy seizure or snatching, or by putting in fear, shall take from the person or immediate actual possession of another anything of value, is guilty of robbery, and any person convicted thereof shall suffer imprisonment for not less than 2 years nor more than 15 years. In addition to any other penalty provided under this section, a person may be fined an amount not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01.").
[166] D.C. Code § 22-2802 ("Whoever attempts to commit robbery, as defined in § 22-2801, by an overt act, shall be imprisoned for not more than 3 years or be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, or both.").
[167] D.C. Code § 48-904.09 ("Any person who attempts . . . to commit any offense defined in this subchapter is punishable by imprisonment or fine or both which may not exceed the maximum punishment prescribed for the offense, the commission of which was the object of the attempt . . . .")

Schedule I or II controlled substance is subject to the same 30 statutory maximum governing the completed offense.[168]

A pattern of equal punishment is also apparent in those District offenses that statutorily incorporate the term "attempts" into their statutory definition. This includes property offenses such as arson[169] malicious destruction of property,[170] and extortion[171] all of which, by virtue of incorporating the term attempts into their offense definition, subject attempts to the same 10 year statutory maximum applicable to the completed offense.[172] It also includes prison escape[173] and enticing a child[174] which ensure, through similar means, that attempts to commit those offenses are subject to the same 5 year statutory maxima governing the completed versions of those offenses.[175]

---

[168] See D.C. Code § 48-904.01(2)(A) ("Any person who violates this subsection with respect to . . . A controlled substance classified in Schedule I or II that is a narcotic or abusive drug shall be imprisoned for not more than 30 years or fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, or both.").

[169] D.C. Code § 22-301 ("Whoever shall maliciously burn or attempt to burn any dwelling, or house, barn, or stable adjoining thereto, or any store, barn, or outhouse, or any shop, office, stable, store, warehouse, or any other building, or any steamboat, vessel, canal boat, or other watercraft, or any railroad car, the property, in whole or in part, of another person, or any church, meetinghouse, schoolhouse, or any of the public buildings in the District, belonging to the United States or to the District of Columbia, shall suffer imprisonment for not less than 1 year nor more than 10 years. In addition to any other penalty provided under this section, a person may be fined an amount not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01.").

[170] D.C. Code § 22-303 ("Whoever maliciously injures or breaks or destroys, or attempts to injure or break or destroy, by fire or otherwise, any public or private property, whether real or personal, not his or her own, of the value of $1,000 or more, shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or shall be imprisoned for not more than 10 years, or both, and if the property has some value shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned for not more than 180 days, or both.").

[171] D.C. Code §§ 22-3251(a)-(b) ("A person commits the offense of extortion if . . . That person obtains or attempts to obtain the property of another with the other's consent which was induced by wrongful use of actual or threatened force or violence or by wrongful threat of economic injury; or . . . That person obtains or attempts to obtain property of another with the other's consent which was obtained under color or pretense of official right . . . Any person convicted of extortion shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned for not more than 10 years, or both.").

[172] Arson is a crime of violence, MDP is not a crime of violence, and extortion is sometimes a crime of violence. See D.C. Code § 23-1331(4).

[173] D.C. Code §§ 22-2601(a)-(b) ("No person shall escape or attempt to escape from [specified institutions] . . . . Any person who violates subsection (a) of this section shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both . . . .").

[174] D.C. Code § 22-3010(a) ("Whoever, being at least 4 years older than a child or being in a significant relationship with a minor, (1) takes that child or minor to any place for the purpose of committing any offense set forth in §§ 22-3002 to 22-3006 and §§ 22-3008 to 22-3009.02, or (2) seduces, entices, allures, convinces, or persuades or attempts to seduce, entice, allure, convince, or persuade a child or minor to engage in a sexual act or contact shall be imprisoned for not more than 5 years or may be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, or both."); D.C. Code § 22-3010(b) ("Whoever, being at least 4 years older than the purported age of a person who represents himself or herself to be a child, attempts (1) to seduce, entice, allure, convince, or persuade any person who represents himself or herself to be a child to engage in a sexual act or contact, or (2) to entice, allure, convince, or persuade any person who represents himself or herself to be a child to go to any place for the purpose of engaging in a sexual act or contact shall be imprisoned for not more than 5 years or may be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, or both.").

[175] See also D.C. Code § 22-3302(a)(1) ("Any person who, without lawful authority, shall enter, or attempt to enter, any private dwelling, building, or other property, or part of such dwelling, building, or other property, against the will of the lawful occupant or of the person lawfully in charge thereof, or being therein or thereon, without lawful authority to remain therein or thereon shall refuse to quit the same on the demand of the lawful occupant, or of the person lawfully in charge thereof, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor,

A great many other District attempt offenses exhibit a pattern of equal punishment through more convoluted means. For example, the District's while armed enhancement applies the same flat 30 year statutory maximum add-on to numerous crimes, without regard to whether the underlying crime is completed or merely attempted, through the D.C. Code's definition of "crimes of violence" and "dangerous crimes."[176] In addition, attempts to commit the least severe forms of theft,[177] fraud,[178] receiving stolen property,[179] financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult or elderly person,[180] and assault[181] are all subject to the same penalty as the completed offense by virtue of the default 180 day rule applicable to non-violent crimes in the general attempt statute.[182] And similarly, an attempt to commit blackmail[183]—when committed in a manner so as to render it a crime of violence[184]—is subject to the same statutory maximum applicable to the completed offense pursuant to the 5 year default rule governing crimes of violence under the general attempt statute.[185] and on conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine of not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, imprisonment for not more than 180 days, or both.").

---

[176] More specifically, D.C. Code § 22–4502(a)(1) establishes that anyone who commits a violent or dangerous crime:

> May, if such person is convicted for the first time of having so committed a crime of violence, or a dangerous crime in the District of Columbia, be sentenced, in addition to the penalty provided for such crime, to a period of imprisonment which may be up to, and including, 30 years for all offenses . . . and shall, if convicted of such offenses while armed with any pistol or firearm, be imprisoned for a mandatory-minimum term of not less than 5 years . . . .

See also D.C. Code § 22-2803(b)(1) ("A person commits the offense of armed carjacking if that person, while armed with or having readily available any pistol or other firearm (or imitation thereof) or other dangerous or deadly weapon (including a sawed-off shotgun, shotgun, machine gun, rifle, dirk, bowie knife, butcher knife, switch-blade knife, razor, blackjack, billy, or metallic or other false knuckles), commits or attempts to commit the offense of carjacking.").

[177] D.C. Code § 22-3212(b) ("Any person convicted of theft in the second degree shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned for not more than 180 days, or both, if the property obtained or used has some value.").

[178] D.C. Code § 22-3222(b)(2) ("Any person convicted of fraud in the second degree shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned for not more than 180 days, or both, if the property that was the object of the scheme or systematic course of conduct has some value.").

[179] D.C. Code § 22-3232(c)(2) ("Any person convicted of receiving stolen property shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not more than 180 days, or both, if the stolen property has some value.").

[180] D.C. Code § 22-936.01(a)("Any person who commits the offense of financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult or elderly person in violation of § 22-933.01 shall be subject to the following criminal penalties . . . . When the property or legal obligation has some value, a fine of not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, or imprisonment for not more than 180 days, or both.").

[181] D.C. Code § 22-404 ("Whoever unlawfully assaults, or threatens another in a menacing manner, shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or be imprisoned not more than 180 days, or both.").

[182] See D.C. Code § 22-1803.

[183] D.C. Code §§ 22-3252(a)-(b) ("A person commits the offense of blackmail, if, with intent to obtain property of another or to cause another to do or refrain from doing any act, that person threatens [to do one of three kinds of acts] . . . . Any person convicted of blackmail shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned for not more than 5 years, or both.").

[184] See D.C. Code § 23-1331(4).

[185] See D.C. Code § 22-1803.

Perhaps most confusingly and contradictory, however, is that equal punishment appears in a handful of District statutes which, textually speaking, authorize attempts to be punished more severely than the completed offense. For example, whereas the completed version of assault with significant bodily injury is subject to a 3 year statutory maximum,[186] an attempt to commit that offense appears to be subject to a statutory maxima of 5 years pursuant to the general attempt penalty statute's default rule for crimes of violence.[187] And whereas the completed versions of unlawful entry of a motor vehicle[188] and taking property without right[189] are subject to 90 days in prison, an attempt to commit either of those offenses appears to be subject to the 180 day default rule for non-violent crimes under the general attempt penalty statute.[190] Notwithstanding these textual anachronisms, however, District case law appears to preclude a defendant from receiving a sentence for an attempt greater than that authorized for the completed offense.[191] Consequently, these statutes also reflect a pattern of equal punishment.

The District's attempt statutes manifest one other important grading pattern, which is both harsher than a substantial punishment discount but more lenient than equal punishment—what might be referred to as a "proportionate punishment discount." This pattern is reflected in many of the District's more recent attempt offenses, which are subject to a statutory maximum that is pegged to, and is half as severe as, the statutory maximum applicable to the completed offense.

One illustrative example is the semi-general attempt penalty provision incorporated into the Anti-Sexual Abuse Act of 1994,[192] which sets attempt penalties at "1/2 of the maximum prison sentence authorized for the [completed] offense."[193] In practical effect, this applies a proportionate punishment discount to a wide range of sex offenses, including [186] DC. Code § 22-404(a)(2) ("Whoever unlawfully assaults, or threatens another in a menacing manner, and intentionally, knowingly, or recklessly causes significant bodily injury to another shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or be imprisoned not more than 3 years, or both.").

---

[187] See D.C. Code § 22-1803.

[188] D.C. Code § 22-1341 ("It is unlawful to enter or be inside of the motor vehicle of another person without the permission of the owner or person lawfully in charge of the motor vehicle. A person who violates this subsection shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, imprisoned for not more than 90 days, or both.").

[189] D.C. Code § 22-3216 ("A person commits the offense of taking property without right if that person takes and carries away the property of another without right to do so. A person convicted of taking property without right shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned for not more than 90 days, or both.").

[190] See D.C. Code § 22-1803.

[191] In United States v. Pearson, the D.C. Municipal Court of Appeals indicated that where the maximum statutory penalty for attempt is higher than the penalty for the completed crime, the court cannot sentence the defendant to a penalty higher than the statutory maximum penalty for the completed offense. United States v. Pearson, 202 A.2d 392, 393-94 (D.C. 1964). Specifically, the court held that a defendant convicted of attempted petit larceny could not be sentenced to a higher penalty than the maximum penalty for the completed offense. The court declined to declare the attempt statute invalid but suggested that Congress may want to rewrite the penalties and suggested the statute's validity may come into question only where, unlike in Pearson, a defendant is sentenced to a greater penalty than the maximum for the completed offense. Id.

[192] See ANTI-SEXUAL ABUSE OF 1994, D.C. Law 10-257, § 217, 42 DCR 53 (May 23, 1995).

[193] See D.C. Code § 22-3018 ("Any person who attempts to commit an offense under this subchapter shall be imprisoned for a term of years not to exceed 15 years where the maximum prison term authorized for the offense is life or for not more than 1/2 of the maximum prison sentence authorized for the offense and, in addition, may be fined an amount not to exceed 1/2 of the maximum fine authorized for the offense.") second,[194] third,[195] and fourth degree sexual abuse,[196] second degree child sexual abuse,[197] first[198] and second degree[199] sexual abuse of a minor, and first[200] and second degree[201] sexual abuse of a secondary education student.

Another illustrative example is the similar semi-general attempt penalty provision incorporated into the Prohibition Against Human Trafficking Amendment Act of 2010.[202] That provision also sets attempt penalties at "1/2 the maximum term otherwise authorized for the [completed] offense."[203] In practical effect, this applies a proportionate penalty discount to a wide range of human trafficking offenses, including attempts to commit forced labor,[204] trafficking in labor or commercial sex acts,[205] sex trafficking of children,[206] unlawful conduct with respect to documents in furtherance of human trafficking,[207] and benefitting financially from human trafficking.[208]

The D.C. Council has also, on occasion, applied a proportionate punishment discount to individual offenses through specific attempt penalty provisions. For example, the District's aggravated assault statute—enacted in 1994 as part of the Omnibus Criminal Justice Reform Amendment Act[209]—contains a specific attempt penalty provision halving the 10 year statutory maximum governing the completed offense to 5 years.[210]

Viewed as a whole, then, the District's approach to grading criminal attempts does not reflect any consistent principle of punishment: the D.C. Code manifests at least three fundamentally different patterns in how it grades attempts, without any discernible rationale for the variances. In practical effect, this produces a penalty scheme which authorizes the imposition of sentences that are, at least in relation to one another, quite disproportionate.

At the same time, these potential disproportionalities are not immediately apparent given the second fundamental flaw reflected in the District law of attempts, namely, its

---

[194] See D.C. Code § 22–3003.
[195] See D.C. Code § 22–3004.
[196] See D.C. Code § 22–3005.
[197] See D.C. Code § 22–3009.
[198] See D.C. Code § 22–3009.01.
[199] See D.C. Code § 22–3009.02.
[200] See D.C. Code § 22–3009.03.
[201] See D.C. Code § 22–3009.04.
[202] See PROHIBITION AGAINST HUMAN TRAFFICKING AMENDMENT ACT of 2010, D.C. Law 18-239, § 107, 57 DCR 5405 (October 23, 2010).
[203] Compare D.C. Code § 22-1837(a)(1) ("[W]hoever violates § 22-1832, § 22-1833, or § 22-1834 shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, imprisoned for not more than 20 years, or both.") with D.C. Code § 22-1837(d) ("Whoever attempts to violate § 22-1832, § 22-1833, § 22-1834, § 22-1835 or § 22-1836 shall be fined not more than 1/2 the maximum fine otherwise authorized for the offense, imprisoned for not more than 1/2 the maximum term otherwise authorized for the offense, or both.")
[204] See D.C. Code § 22–1832.
[205] See D.C. Code § 22–1833.
[206] See D.C. Code § 22–1833.
[207] See D.C. Code § 22–1835.
[208] See D.C. Code § 22–1836.
[209] See Perry v. United States, 36 A.3d 799, 814 (D.C. 2011) (citing OMNIBUS CRIMINAL JUSTICE REFORM AMENDMENT ACT OF 1994, D.C. Law 10–151 (Aug. 20, 1994)).
[210] Compare D.C. Code § 22-404.01(b) ("Any person convicted of aggravated assault shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or be imprisoned for not more than 10 years, or both.") with D.C. Code § 22-404.01(c) ("Any person convicted of attempted aggravated assault shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or be imprisoned for not more than 5 years, or both.").

disorganized approach to codification. For example, notwithstanding the fact that the District's general attempt statute is worded in a way which suggests that the 1901 attempt penalty exceptions remain the only exceptions to the current default penalty rules, the reality is that the D.C. Code is littered with statutory attempt provisions that establish penalties in derogation from these rules. Further, the manner in which these exceptions are communicated is quite inconsistent: some are communicated through individual penalty provisions incorporated into a single offense; others are communicated through semi-general attempt penalty provisions that apply to groups of offenses; and still other exceptions are communicated by including the word "attempt" in the definition of the offense. And on top of all of this complexity rests the District's AWI offenses, which add yet another "unnecessary" layer of confusion to the grading of criminal attempts provided by the D.C. Code.[211]

RCC § 22E-301(d) endeavors to remedy these issues by establishing a clear and consistent approach to grading attempts, which renders offense penalties more proportionate. First, subsection (d)adopts a single generally applicable grading principle: a proportionate penalty discount under which the statutory maximum and fine for an attempt is set at one-half of the statutory maximum and fine of the completed offense. Subsection (d) also specifies that the maximum penalty for criminal attempt shall be decreased by 50% after application of any penalty enhancements to the target offense.

The effect of this penalty scheme on current District law varies depending on the scope, gradations, and classifications applied to individual revised offenses.

To the extent the RCC penalty scheme changes current District law, the changes enhance the proportionality of the District's statutorily authorized punishments. And to the extent that the D.C. Council has, in many of its more recently enacted statutes, applied a proportionate punishment discount, they are supported by current District law.

[211] As the DCCA observed in Perry v. United States, AWI offenses have been rendered "unnecessary" by the "[m]odern grading of attempt according to the gravity of the underlying offense." Perry, 36 A.3d at 825 (citation and quotation omitted). Specifically, AWI offenses were originally created to supplement the "relatively trivial sanctions" afforded by criminal attempt offenses employed at common law. Model Penal Code § 211.1 cmt. at 181-82. Since then, however, the District, along with every other jurisdiction in America, has come to realize that attempts can themselves be graded more seriously, contingent upon the severity of the target offense WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 16.2 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019).

RCC § 22E-302. Criminal Solicitation.

Explanatory Note. RCC § 22E-302 provides a comprehensive statement of general solicitation liability under the RCC.[1] This statement: (1) establishes the culpable mental state requirement and conduct requirement of a criminal solicitation; (2) addresses the import of an uncommunicated solicitation; and (3) specifies the penalties applicable to a criminal solicitation. § 22E-302 replaces the District's current general solicitation statute, D.C. Code § 22-2107.

Subsection (a) specifies the required elements for a criminal solicitation. First, paragraph (a)(1) requires that the actor "purposely commands, requests, or tries to persuade another person to engage in or aid the planning or commission of specific conduct." "Purposely" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means that the actor must consciously desire that he or she commands, requests, or tries to persuade another person to engage in specific conduct. Paragraph (a)(1) further requires that if the conduct is carried out, "in fact" the conduct will constitute an offense or an attempt to commit an offense. "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element, here that the conduct, if carried out, will constitute an offense or an attempt to commit an offense.

Paragraph (a)(2) states that a criminal solicitation incorporates "the culpability required for the [target] offense."[2] Pursuant to this principle, a defendant may not be convicted of a criminal solicitation absent proof that he or she acted with, at minimum, the culpable mental state(s)—in addition to any broader aspect of culpability[3]—required to establish that offense.[4] Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "in fact"

---

[1] Many of the same conceptual and policy issues addressed in this commentary entry are also discussed—sometimes more comprehensively—in the commentary accompanying criminal conspiracy, RCC § 22E-303.

[2] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.02(1) (government must prove that the defendant "acted with the kind of culpability otherwise required for commission of the crime"); Mizrahi v. Gonzales, 492 F.3d 156, 160–61 (2d Cir. 2007) ("[Culpability] of solicitation cannot be determined . . . except by reference to the statutory definition of the object crime."); WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 12.3(a) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) ("[W]here the prohibited result involves special circumstances as to which a mens rea requirement is imposed, the solicitor cannot be said to have intended that result unless he personally had this added mental state.") (citing Porter v. State, 455 Md. 220, 166 A.3d 1044 (2017) (because murder requires proof of malice, solicitation of murder also requires proof of malice)).

[3] The term "culpability" includes, but also goes beyond, the culpable mental state requirement governing an offense. See RCC § 22E-201 (culpability required defined). For example, if the target offense requires proof of premeditation, deliberation, or the absence of any mitigating circumstances, the government is still required to prove these broader aspects of culpability to secure a conviction. See RCC § 22E-201 ("'Culpability required' includes . . . Any other aspect of culpability specifically required for an offense."); id., at Explanatory Note (noting that "premeditation, deliberation, and absence of mitigating circumstances" would so qualify). And, of course, solicitation liability is subject to the same voluntariness requirement governing all offenses under RCC § 22E-203. See RCC § 22E-201 (voluntariness requirement also part of culpability required for an offense).

[4] This derivative culpable mental state requirement, which is drawn from the target offense, is to be distinguished from the independent culpable mental state requirement governing the command, request, or efforts at persuasion (hereinafter, "request") at issue in all solicitation prosecutions, and which is discussed later in this commentary..

Generally speaking, solicitation liability entails proof that the accused: (1) "intended," by his or her request, to have the solicitee engage in conduct planned to culminate in an offense; and (2) "intended," through that request, to bring about any result elements or circumstance elements that comprise the target offense. See, e.g., Paul H. Robinson & Jane A. Grall, Element Analysis in Defining Criminal Liability: The specified in paragraph (a)(1) applies to the elements in paragraph (a)(2) and there is no (additional) culpable mental state required for the fact that the actor acts with the culpability required for the offense.

Subsection (a) establishes the nature of the act required for general solicitation liability.[5] In so doing, it recognizes three types of attempted influence, each of which may

Model Penal Code and Beyond, 35 STAN. L. REV. 681, 754–55 (1983); State v. Garrison, 40 S.W.3d 426, 432-34 (Tenn. 2000) (discussing dual intent requirements of solicitation). Here and in the following examples "intent" is used in the way common in many jurisdictions, equivalent to the RCC term "purpose."

To illustrate how these "dual intent" requirements fit together, consider the following scenario. Police receive a report that a janitor working at a District of Columbia government building, S, intends to murder a plain-clothes police officer, V, who is standing immediately outside the building's uncovered loading dock area conducting investigative work. According to this tip, S's plan is to have a large object thrown off the back end of the thirtieth floor balcony, thereby killing V upon impact. Soon thereafter, two officers arrive at the thirtieth floor balcony, at which point they hear S instruct a more junior janitor, X, to drop an old, out-of-use television off the right side of the balcony. Given that V is, in fact, located immediately below the right side of the balcony, the police immediately intercede, thereby preventing X from engaging in conduct that would result in death to V. If S later finds himself in D.C. Superior Court charged with soliciting the murder of a police officer, can he be convicted? The answer to this question depends upon whether S's state of mind fulfills both of the dual intent requirements governing general solicitation liability.

For example, if S had misspoken, and meant to instruct X to drop the old, out-of-use television off the left (rather than right) side of the balcony, below which there is an unaccompanied trash receptacle, then neither requirement is met: S did not intentionally request that X engage in conduct, which, if carried out, would have resulted in V's death; nor did S act with the intent that, through his request, anyone be killed, let alone a police officer.

Alternatively, if S did mean to ask X to drop the TV off the right side of the balcony, but was completely unaware that V (or any other person) was located below the drop point (e.g., because S believed another unaccompanied trash receptacle was located below the right side, too), then the first requirement is met: S intentionally requested that X engage in conduct, which, if carried out, would have resulted in V's death. But the second requirement is not met: S did not intend, through his request, to cause the death of anyone, let alone a police officer.

Lastly, if S had asked X to drop the TV off the right side of the balcony, while aware of V's presence below, in order to seek retribution against the same officer responsible for disrupting a drug conspiracy S was involved with years ago, then S fulfills both requirements: S intentionally requested that X engage in conduct, which, if carried out, would have resulted in V's death; and S also intended, through that request, to actually kill a police officer. (Note: if S intended to kill V but lacked awareness that V was a police officer, then the second intent requirement would not be met—although S intended to kill someone, S did not intend to kill a police officer.)

[5] Over the years, "[c]ourts, legislatures and commentators have utilized a great variety of words to describe the required acts for solicitation." WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.1 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019); see, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.02, cmt. at 372 n.25 (collecting different statutory formulations). That said, the essence of the crime is "trying to persuade another to commit a crime that the solicitor desires and intends to have committed." Ira P. Robbins, Double Inchoate Crimes, 26 HARV. J. ON LEGIS. 1, 29 (1989); see WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.1 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) ("[T]he essence of the crime of solicitation is asking a person to commit a crime"); People v. Nelson, 240 Cal. App. 4th 488, 496 (2015) ("The essence of criminal solicitation is an attempt to induce another to commit a criminal offense.").

satisfy the RCC criminal solicitation statute.[6] The first, and strongest, is a "command,"[7] which implies an order or direction, commonly by one with some authority over the other.[8] Less strong, but just as direct, is a "request,"[9] which occurs when one person explicitly asks another person to engage in specified conduct.[10] The third form of influence contemplated in paragraph (a)(1) is "tr[ying] to persuade,"[11] which covers less direct means of communication.[12]

Importantly, none of these forms of attempted influence entail proof that the solicitee actually agreed, consented, or was persuaded to engage in the solicited conduct,[13]

---

[6] These varying forms of influence may, in turn, be communicated directly or by an intermediary, through words or gestures, via threats or promises, and occur either before or at the actual time the crime is being committed. It is therefore, immaterial, for purposes of solicitation liability, whether the rational or emotional support is communicated orally, in writing, or through other means of expression. E,g., WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.1 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) (well-established that "solicitation c[an] be committed by speech, writing, or nonverbal conduct); State v. Johnson, 202 Or. App. 478, 483-84 (2005) (rejecting "the proposition that the state must produce the actual words used by the solicitor (or, for that matter, that words must be used)"). Nor is proof of a "quid pro quo" between the solicitor and the party solicited necessary. E,g., WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.1 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019); Johnson, 202 Or. App. at 483-84 (2005) (rejecting "the proposition that the state must prove that the solicitor offered the solicitee a quid pro quo").

[7] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.02(1) (basing solicitation liability on a "command[]"); WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.1(c) n.88 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) (collecting statutes in accordance).

[8] Such as, for example, where S, the mob boss, orders X, the loyal lieutenant, to kill V for his failure to make good on an outstanding debt owed to S. Note that "command" does not entail any actual influence on the recipient, so it would be immaterial for purposes of section 302 that X declined to follow through on the order to kill V. See also RCC § 22E-302(c) (addressing uncommunicated solicitations).

[9] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.02(1) (basing solicitation liability on a "request[]"); WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.1(c) n.88 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) (collecting statutes in accordance).

[10] Such as, for example, where S, the loyal lieutenant, asks X, the mob boss, to order a hit on V for his failure to make good on an outstanding debt to S. Note that "request" does not entail any actual influence on the recipient, so it would be immaterial for purposes of the RCC criminal solicitation statute that X declined to grant S's request to kill V. See also RCC § 22E-302(c) (addressing uncommunicated solicitations).

[11] See, e.g., Colo. Rev. Stat. § 18-2-301(1) (basing solicitation liability on an "attempt[] to persuade another person"); State v. Jensen, 164 Wash. 2d 943, 951 (2008) ([T]he actus reus . . . solicitation is an attempt to persuade another to commit a specific offense."); 1 NATIONAL COMM'N ON REFORM OF FEDERAL CRIMINAL LAWS, WORKING PAPERS 371 (1970) (attempt to persuade formulation should avoid liability in "equivocal situations too close to casual remarks or even to free speech"); compare Model Penal Code § 5.02(1) (basing solicitation liability on "encourage[ment]"); Model Penal Code § 5.02(1), cmt. at 372 ("'Encourages' is the most expansive of these terms and encompasses actors who bolster the fortitude of those who have already decided to commit crimes, so long as the encouragement is done with the requisite criminal purpose."); id. at 372 n.25 (collecting statutes in support of both formulations).

[12] Such as, for example, where S, the cousin of mob boss X, sends X a letter with a comprehensive and detailed list of reasons of why X should order a hit on V, but which does not expressly request or command X to do so. Note that "trying to persuade" (in contrast to "persuades") does not entail any actual influence on the recipient, so it would be immaterial for purposes of the RCC criminal solicitation statute that X was not, in fact, persuaded by S's case for killing V. See also RCC § 22E-302(c) (addressing uncommunicated solicitations).

[13] It is therefore immaterial under the RCC criminal solicitation statute that the solicitee rejects the solicitation, or verbally agrees but does not actually intend to commit the crime—such as, for example, where the solicitee is an undercover police officer feigning intent. E.g., WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.1 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019); JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 28.01 (6th ed. 2012). This is to be contrasted with the bilateral understanding of conspiracy reflected in the RCC conspiracy statute, which requires proof that the defendant "and at least one other person" actually agree to commit a crime. RCC § 22E-303. For example, if S asks X to engage in or aid the planning or commission of criminal let alone that any of the relevant parties (i.e. solicitor or solicitee) engaged in an overt act (or any other conduct) in furtherance of the solicitation.[14] Rather, under the RCC criminal solicitation statute, a solicitation is complete the moment the request, command, or efforts at persuasion has been expressed by the defendant.

Subsection (a) also addresses three fundamental issues concerning the scope and applicability of general solicitation liability. The first relates to the relationship between solicitation and complicity, namely, whether soliciting another person to act as an accomplice provides the basis for general solicitation liability. Subsection (a) establishes, in relevant part, that general solicitation liability is appropriate under the RCC where the defendant asks another person to "aid the planning or commission" of criminal conduct.[15] This alternative formulation clarifies that solicitations to assist with or otherwise facilitate the planning or commission of a crime, no less than solicitations to directly engage in the requisite criminal conduct, provide an adequate basis for general solicitation liability, provided that the other requirements of the RCC criminal solicitation statute are met.[16] conduct, and X agrees, then a criminal conspiracy has been formed under the RCC conspiracy statute. But if X doesn't agree, then there's no conspiracy between S and X under the RCC's bilateral approach. However, S is guilty of solicitation under the RCC criminal solicitation statute. Compare Allen v. State, 91 Md.App. 705, 605 A.2d 960 (1992) (observing that a "solicitee's acquiescence to a solicitation, even if lawfully made by an undercover agent, does not make the solicitee guilty of solicitation").

---

[14] See, e.g., People v. Cheathem, 658 N.Y.S.2d 84, 85 (1997); People v. Burt, 288 P.2d 503, 505 (Cal. 1955). For this reason, a criminal solicitation is "the most inchoate of the anticipatory offenses." WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.1 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019); see, e.g., State v. Jensen, 195 P.3d 512, 517 (Wash. 2008); State v. Carr, 110 A.3d 829, 835 (N.H. 2015); Model Penal Code § 5.02 cmt. at 365-66. The following analysis is illustrative:

> Assume that A wishes to have his enemy B killed, and thus—perhaps because he lacks the nerve to do the deed himself—A asks C to kill B. If C acts upon A's request and fatally shoots B, then both A and C are guilty of murder. If, again, C proceeds with the plan to kill B, but he is unsuccessful, then both A and C are guilty of attempted murder. If C agrees to A's plan to kill B but the killing is not accomplished or even attempted, A and C are nonetheless guilty of the crime of conspiracy. But what if C immediately rejects A's homicidal scheme, so that there is never even any agreement between A and C with respect to the intended crime? Quite obviously, C has committed no crime at all. A, however, because of his bad state of mind in intending that B be killed and his bad conduct in importuning C to do the killing, is guilty of the crime of solicitation.

WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.1 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019).

[15] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.02(1)("A person is guilty of solicitation to commit a crime if . . . he commands, encourages or requests another person to engage in specific conduct that would constitute such crime or an attempt to commit such crime or would establish his complicity in its commission or attempted commission.") (italics added);" WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.1 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) (It is "sufficient that A requested B to get involved in the scheme to kill C in any way which would establish B's complicity in the killing of C were that to occur.").

[16] In this sense, solicitation liability runs parallel with conspiracy liability under RCC § 22E-303, which similarly criminalizes agreements to aid in the planning or commission of a crime. See also Model Penal Code § 5.03(1)(b) (conspiracy liability where one person "agrees to aid [an]other person or persons in the planning or commission of [a] crime") (italics added); Salinas v. United States, 522 U.S. 52, 65 (1997) ("A conspirator must intend to further an endeavor which, if completed, would satisfy all of the elements of a substantive criminal offense, but it suffices that he adopt the goal of furthering or facilitating the criminal endeavor. He may do so in any number of ways short of agreeing to undertake all of the acts necessary for the crime's completion.") (italics added).

The second issue focuses on the relationship between the defendant's state of mind and the conduct being solicited.[17] Subsection (a) establishes, in relevant part, that general solicitation liability only applies to those who act with the purpose of bringing about conduct planned to culminate in an offense.[18] This "purposive attitude" also constitutes the foundation of the culpability required both accomplice liability and the general inchoate crime of conspiracy.[19] It can be said to exist when a person, through his or her request, consciously desires to facilitate or promote conduct planned to culminate in an offense.[20]

---

[17] The nature of this relationship "is crucial to the resolution of the difficult problems presented when a charge of [solicitation or conspiracy] is leveled against a person whose relationship to a criminal plan is essentially peripheral":

> Typical is the case of the person who sells sugar to the producers of illicit whiskey. He may have little interest in the success of the distilling operation and be motivated mainly by the desire to make the normal profit from an otherwise lawful sale. To be criminally liable, of course, he must at least have knowledge of the use to which the materials are being put, but the difficult issue presented is whether knowingly facilitating the commission of a crime ought to be sufficient, absent a true purpose to advance the criminal end. In this case conflicting interests are involved: that of the vendors in freedom to engage in gainful and otherwise lawful activities without policing their vendees, and that of the community in preventing behavior that facilitates the commission of crimes.

Model Penal Code § 5.03, cmt. at 404.

[18] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.02(1) (solicitation liability entails proof of must "the purpose of promoting or facilitating the commission of the crime"); Id., Explanatory Note ("A purpose to promote or facilitate the commission of a crime is required, together with a command, encouragement or request to another person that he engage in specific conduct that would constitute the crime . . . "); ." WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.1 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) ("Virtually all of the more recently enacted solicitation statutes" appear to have endorsed the position that a conscious desire to promote or facilitate criminal conduct is necessary).

This purpose requirement does not extend to whether the solicited conduct is, in fact, illegal or otherwise constitutes an offense. See also WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 13.2(c) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) (accomplice cannot "escape liability by showing he did not [desire] to aid a crime in the sense that he was unaware that the criminal law covered the conduct of the person he aided. Such is not the case, for here as well the general principle that ignorance of the law is no excuse prevails.").

[19] See, e.g., United States v. Peoni, 100 F.2d 401, 402 (2d Cir. 1938) (Hand, J.) ("[Every definition of complicity requires that the defendant in] some sort associate himself with the venture, that he participate in it as in something that he wishes to bring about, that he seek by his action to make it succeed. All the words used-even the most colorless, 'abet,' carry an implication of purposive attitude towards it.") (italics added); United States v. Falcone, 109 F.2d 579, 581 (2d Cir.), aff'd, 311 U.S. 205, 61 S. Ct. 204, 85 L. Ed. 128 (1940) (Hand, J.) ("There are indeed instances . . . where the law imposes punishment merely because the accused did not forbear to do that from which the wrong was likely to follow; but in prosecutions for conspiracy or abetting, his attitude towards the forbidden undertaking must be more positive. It is not enough that he does not forego a normally lawful activity, of the fruits of which he knows that others will make an unlawful use; he must in some sense promote their venture himself, make it his own, have a stake in its outcome.") (italics added); Model Penal Code § 5.02 cmt. at 371 (noting that the same purpose requirement governing complicity and conspiracy is also applicable to solicitation).

[20] See generally RCC § 22E-206 (purposely defined). The following scenario is illustrative. X is considering whether to rob a bank on his own, which would require a fast car and a small firearm, both of which X lacks. X relays his conundrum over the phone to his friend, S, who happens to own a vehicle and firearm of this nature. Having been informed of this, S proposes the following arrangement: S will lend X his car and gun in return for a ten percent stake in the profits from the bank robbery. X is initially uncertain about whether the robbery or arrangement is good idea, but S makes a very persuasive case for both positions. X asks for a few days to think about S's proposal, but soon thereafter the police—who had tapped A's phone, and thus

The corollary to this purpose requirement is that general solicitation liability is not supported under the RCC criminal solicitation statute where a defendant's primary motive in making a request is to achieve some other, non-criminal objective (e.g., "conduct[ing] an otherwise lawful business in a profitable manner").[21] And this is so even if the defendant knew that his or her solicitation was likely to facilitate or promote a criminal scheme.[22] overheard the conversation—arrest both S and X. On these facts, S may be held liable for solicitation because S, through his efforts at persuasion, consciously desired to facilitate and promote specific conduct, which, if carried out, would have constituted robbery.

---

That a solicitor must have the purpose to facilitate or promote conduct planned to culminate in an offense does not preclude convictions for knowledge-based theories of liability concerning the result elements of the target offense. The following example involving environmental activists S and X is illustrative. S asks X to help him blow up a coal-processing facility during the evening/afterhours when only a single person, the on-duty night guard, V, will be present. S is practically certain that V will die from the blast, though S would very much prefer that V not be injured. The police intercede soon after S communicates the request, thereby saving V's life. On these facts, S may be convicted of solicitation to commit (knowing) murder, premised on the fact that S's request was accompanied by: (1) a desire for X to aid conduct, which, if carried out, would have culminated in murder; and (2) S's awareness as to a practical certainty that such conduct would result in V's death. See also Paul H. Robinson & Jane A. Grall, Element Analysis in Defining Criminal Liability: The Model Penal Code and Beyond, 35 STAN. L. REV. 681, 758 (1983) ("When causing a particular result is an element of the object offense and such result does not occur, the actor, to be liable for conspiracy under Subsection (1), must have the purpose or belief that the conduct contemplated by the agreement will cause such result."); Note, Developments in the Law—Criminal Conspiracy, 72 HARV. L. REV. 920, 926 (1959)) ("[A] person may be held to intend that which is the anticipated consequence of a particular action to which he agrees[.]"); but see also Model Penal Code § 5.03 cmt. at 408 ("[I]t would not be sufficient [for conspiracy], as it is under the attempt provisions of the Code, if the actor only believed that the result would be produced but did not consciously plan or desire to produce it.").

[21] See, e.g., Falcone, 109 F.2d at 581 (Hand, J.) ("[T]he law should not be broadened to punish those whose primary motive is to conduct an otherwise lawful business in a profitable manner" because this would "seriously undermin[e] lawful commerce."); Sanford H. Kadish, Complicity, Cause and Blame: A Study in the Interpretation of Doctrine, 73 CAL. L. REV. 323, 353 (1985) (absent a purpose requirement, the criminal law would "cast a pall on ordinary activity" by giving us reason to "fear criminal liability for what others might do simply because our actions made their acts more probable"); Model Penal Code § 5.03 cmt. at 406 (observing that "the complicity provisions of the Code" require "a purpose to advance the criminal end," and deeming "the case" for this resolution to be an "even stronger one" in the context of conspiracy, such that "[a] conspiracy does not exist [under the Code] if a provider of goods or services is aware of, but fails to share, another person's criminal purpose").

[22] The commentary accompanying Model Penal Code § 5.02 states, in relevant part:

> It is not enough for a person to be aware that his words may lead to a criminal act or even to be quite sure they will do so; it must be the actor's purpose that the crime be committed. The language of the section may bar conviction even in some situations in which an actor does hope that his words will lead to commission of a crime. Suppose a young man seeks out a pacifist and asks for advice whether he should violate his registration obligation under the selective service laws. This particular pacifist believes all cooperation with the selective service system to be immoral and he so advises the young man. Although he may hope that the young man will refuse to register, his honest response to a request for advice might not be thought to constitute a purpose of promoting or facilitating commission of the offense. If he were tried it would be a question of fact whether his advice evidenced purpose.

Model Penal Code § 5.02 cmt. at 371.

Neither awareness of, nor indifference towards, another person's criminal plans are sufficient to satisfy the purpose requirement incorporated into subsection (a).[23]

The third issue is the relevance of impossibility to general solicitation liability—i.e. the fact that the target offense cannot be consummated under the circumstances due to a mistake on behalf of the defendant.[24] Subsection (a) establishes, in relevant part, that

---

[23] To illustrate, consider the following modified version of the scenario presented supra note 21. S is in dire need of money to pay for his sick child's medical bills, so he decides to sell his expensive sports car. S begins calling friends to see if anyone has interest in purchasing it, which would save S the time of listing it. S subsequently calls X. At the start of the conversation, X tells S that he is considering robbing a bank on his own, and will need a fast car to carry out the plan. S says that he thinks the envisioned robbery would be a terrible idea, but that, as it turns out, he was actually calling X to see if X had any interest in purchasing S's sports car, which would likely serve as an excellent get-away vehicle. S offers to sell X the car for market value, and X tentatively accepts subject to a later inspection. Soon thereafter, however, the police—who had tapped X's phone, and thus overheard the proposal—arrest both S and X. On these facts, S cannot be held liable for soliciting to commit robbery because, inter alia, A did not consciously desire to facilitate or promote X's criminal conduct. Instead, S's purpose was to raise money for his child's medical bills, and to save himself the hassle of having to list and sell the vehicle on his own. That S knew the sale of his car to X would facilitate the bank robbery, and was arguably indifferent as to X's criminal conduct, would not support liability under the RCC criminal solicitation statute.

[24] The defendant in this kind of situation may admit that he or she possessed the requisite intent to commit that target offense and engaged in significant conduct, but nevertheless argue that impossibility of completion should by itself preclude the imposition of solicitation liability. See, e.g., WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.5 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019); JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 27.07 (6th ed. 2012). In resolving this claim, there are four general categories of impossibility that might be considered for evaluative purposes (i.e. these are not analytically perfect distinctions).

The first category is pure factual impossibility, which arises where the object of the solicitation cannot be consummated because of circumstances unknown to the solicitor or beyond his or her control. The following situations are illustrative: (1) S asks X to pickpocket V's jacket, believing it to contain valuable items, when it is actually empty; and (2) S asks X to shoot into the bedroom where V customarily sleeps, believing V to be there, when V is, in fact, on vacation.

The second category of impossibility is pure legal impossibility, which arises where the solicitor acts under a mistaken belief that the law criminalizes his or her intended objective (e.g., solicitation of a lawful act). The following situation is illustrative. S, a 50 year-old male, asks X to arrange a sexual encounter with Z, a 20 year-old woman. S knows X is 20; however, X also believes that the age of consent is 21—when, in fact, it is 18. Therefore, X believes himself to be soliciting aid for a statutory rape.

The third category is hybrid impossibility, which arises where the object of the solicitation constitutes a crime, but commission of the target offense is impossible due to a factual mistake regarding the legal status of some attendant circumstance that constitutes an element of the target offense. The following situations are illustrative: (1) S asks X to purchase property on the black market, believing it to be stolen, when, in fact, the property is part of a sting operation; and (2) S asks X to arrange consensual sexual relations with V, believing V to be a nine year-old child, when, in fact, V is an undercover police officer posing as a young child.

The fourth category of impossibility is inherent impossibility, which arises where one person solicits another to commit a crime by "employing means which a reasonable man would view as totally inappropriate to the objective sought." WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.5(a)(4) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019). The following situations are illustrative: (1) S asks X to kill V via incantation or voodoo; (2) S asks X to perform sex acts with V, a manikin that S believes to be a 9 year-old child. See Kyle S. Brodie, The Obviously Impossible Attempt: A Proposed Revision to the Model Penal Code, 15 N. ILL. U. L. REV. 237, 244-45 (1995) (common denominator underlying inherent impossibility is that the defendant's "actions are so absurd or patently ineffective that the completion of the crime would always be impossible under the same set of circumstances").

It should be noted that the law of impossibility is relatively underdeveloped in the context of solicitation liability. See, e.g., PAUL H. ROBINSON, 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 85 (Westlaw 2019). Courts rarely seem to publish opinions addressing impossibility issues outside the attempt context, and, even when they do, those solicitations to directly engage in or provide accessorial support to conduct that, if carried out, would merely constitute an "attempt to commit an offense" can also provide the basis for general solicitation liability.[25] This reference to attempts imports the broad abolition of impossibility claims employed in the RCC's general attempt provision into the solicitation context.[26] Under this approach, it is generally immaterial that the proposed criminal scheme could never have succeeded under the circumstances.[27] So long as the solicitor sought to bring about conduct that would have culminated in the target offense if "the situation was as [solicitor] perceived it" then solicitation liability may attach,[28] opinions shy away from the "lengthy explorations of the distinction between [different kinds of] impossibility" that characterize attempt jurisprudence. WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.5 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019). Rather, courts are more likely to generally state—as the U.S. Supreme Court recently observed in United States v. Williams—that "impossibility of completing the crime because the facts were not as the defendant believed is not a defense [to solicitation]" and move on. United States v. Williams, 553 U.S. 285, 300 (2008).

---

[25] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.02(1) (solicitation liability where one person asks "another person to engage in specific conduct that would constitute such crime or an attempt to commit such crime") (italics added). Here's how the drafters of the Model Penal Code explain the significance of this language:

> It ordinarily should not be necessary to charge an actor with soliciting another to attempt to commit a crime, since a rational solicitation would seek not an unsuccessful effort but the completed crime; the charge, therefore, should be one of solicitation to commit the completed crime. But in some cases the actor may solicit conduct that he and the party solicited believe would constitute the completed crime, but that, for reasons discussed in connection with the defense of impossibility in attempts, does not in fact constitute the crime. Such conduct by the person solicited would constitute an attempt under Section 5.01, and the actor would therefore be liable under Section 5.02 for having solicited conduct that would constitute an attempt if performed.

Model Penal Code § 5.02, cmt. at 373-74; see also Model Penal Code § 5.03 cmt. at 421 ("[If an] actor agrees that he or another will engage in conduct that he believes to constitute the elements of the offense, but that fortuitously does not in fact involve those elements, he would under this section be guilty of an agreement to attempt the offense, since attempt liability could be made out under [the MPC's general attempt provision] if the contemplated conduct had occurred.").

[26] Under RCC § 22E-301(a)(4)(B), a person commits an attempt if, inter alia, he or she "engages in conduct that . . . [w]ould have come dangerously close to completing the offense if the situation was as the actor perceived it." Paragraph (a)(3) further requires that the person's conduct must have been "reasonably adapted to completion of that offense."

[27] See RCC § 22E-301(a), Explanatory Note.

[28] RCC § 22E-301(a)(4)(B). Specifically, the subjective approach incorporated into RCC § 22E-302(a) renders pure factual and hybrid impossibility claims immaterial. For example, under the RCC it would not be a defense to solicitation to commit murder that: (1) the intended victim was already dead, provided that the solicitor mistakenly believed the person to be alive; or that (2) the murder weapon provided by the solicitor to the hit man was inoperable, provided that the solicitor mistakenly believed it be operable. Nor would it preclude liability for solicitation to commit murder under the RCC that: (1) the solicitee is unable to commit the target offense—such as, for example, when S sends a letter to a well-regarded hit man, X, soliciting the murder of V, only to discover that X is in a coma due to a near-fatal car accident; or that (2) the solicitee is unwilling to commit the target offense—such as, for example, when S asks X to commit a murder for hire, only to discover that X is an undercover officer merely posing as a willing participant in a criminal offense. See, e.g., PAUL H. ROBINSON, 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 85 (Westlaw 2019) ("The modern trend, evident in most jurisdictions, is to reject both [forms of] impossibility as defenses."); United States v. Devorkin, 159 F.3d 465, 468 (9th Cir. 1998) ("It is not a defense" to solicitation that "the person solicited could not commit the crime, or . . . would [not] have committed the crime solicited.") (quoting WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.1 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019)).

provided that the requested course of conduct was at least "reasonably adapted" to commission of the target offense.[29]

Subsection (b) establishes the target offenses subject to general solicitation liability. It establishes that only an offense against persons as defined in Subtitle II of Title 22E, or a felony property offense as defined in Subtitle III of Title 22E, may provide the basis for general solicitation liability. Solicitations that involve other forms of prohibited conduct (e.g., prostitution) may be criminalized under specific provisions in the RCC. But the general inchoate crime of solicitation codified in the RCC criminal solicitation statute only

---

In contrast, pure legal impossibility remains a viable theory of defense under the RCC. See supra note 25 (defining this category). However, this does not hinge on RCC § 22E-301(a)(4)(B), or any other provision in section 301. Rather, the "underlying basis for acquittal is the principle of legality," which "provides that we should not punish people—no matter culpable or dangerous they are—for conduct that does not constitute the charged offense at the time of the action." JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 27.07 (6th ed. 2012); see Model Penal Code § 5.01 cmt. at 318 ("[If] the result desired or intended is not a crime, the actor will not be guilty of an attempt, even though he firmly believes that his goal is criminal.").

For example, "it is not a crime to throw even a [District of Columbia] steak into a garbage can." JEROME HALL, GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF THE CRIMINAL LAW 595 (2d ed. 1960). So if after losses against the Washington Nationals, the Oriole Bird, the Baltimore Orioles mascot, and Phillie Phanatic, the Philadelphia Phillies mascot, together place a local District steak in the garbage, neither is guilty of committing any offense. Nor could the Oriole Bird be convicted of soliciting an imaginary offense for asking the Phillie Phanatic to place a District steak in the garbage, although the Oriole Bird honestly believed such conduct to be prohibited by the D.C. Code. E.g., JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 27.07 (6th ed. 2012) ("Just as a person may not ordinarily escape punishment on the ground that she is ignorant of a law's existence, it is also true that we cannot punish people under laws that are purely the figments of their guilty imaginations.").

Inherent impossibility also remains a viable (if exceedingly limited) theory of defense under the reasonable adaptation standard codified in paragraph (a)(2) of RCC § 22E-301.

[29] RCC § 22E-301.

Inherent impossibility is an issue in solicitation prosecutions where S asks X to commit an offense by "employing means which a reasonable man would view as totally inappropriate to the objective sought." WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.5(a)(4) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019). See also John F. Preis, Witch Doctors and Battleship Stalkers: The Edges of Exculpation in Entrapment Cases, 52 VAND. L. REV. 1869, 1904 (1999) (recognition of inherent impossibility defense to attempt most strongly supported by relevant case law, statutes, and commentary); compare Model Penal Code § 5.05(2) (providing sentencing mitigation for a solicitation that "is so inherently unlikely to result or culminate in the commission of a crime that neither such conduct nor the actor presents a public danger warranting the grading of such offense under this Section"). Conduct of this nature would not be "reasonably adapted" to completion of the target offense under RCC § 22E-301, and, therefore, could constitute a (failure of proof) defense to solicitation liability under the RCC.

For example, the fact that the defendant in a solicitation to murder prosecution asked another person to kill the victim by pulling the trigger on a broken firearm that the defendant mistakenly believed to be operable would not call into question whether the defendant's conduct was reasonably adapted to the completion of murder. In contrast, the fact that the defendant in a solicitation to murder prosecution asked another person to kill the victim by shooting a fully functional firearm at a voodoo doll with the victim's picture attached to it would be relevant to evaluating the reasonable adaptation standard—and ultimately preclude the attachment of solicitation liability under the RCC criminal solicitation statute. See, e.g., Edwin R. Keedy*, Criminal Attempts at Common Law*, 102 U. PA. L. REV. 464, 470 (1954) (where the defendant "invokes witchcraft, charms, incantations, maledictions, hexing or voodoo," such conduct "cannot constitute an attempt to murder since the means employed are not in any way adapted to accomplish the intended result.") (collecting authorities).

applies to offenses against persons and felony property offenses in the RCC.[30] Subsection (b) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable [30] That RCC § 22E-302 only applies to a limited set of offenses in contrast with RCC §§ 22E-301 and 303 of the RCC, which respectively criminalize attempts and conspiracies to commit any criminal offense. See RCC §§ 22E-301, 303.

This limitation on general solicitation liability generally corresponds with the District's prior general solicitation statute, which only applies to crimes of violence. See Omnibus Public Safety Act of 2006, 2006 DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA LAWS 16-306 (Act 16–482), as added Apr. 24, 2007, D.C. Law 16-306, § 209, 53 DCR 8610 ("Whoever is guilty of soliciting a crime of violence as defined by § 23-1331(4), whether or not such crime occurs, shall be sentenced to a period of imprisonment not exceeding 10 years, a fine not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, or both."). With the exception of the lowest gradation of burglary, the approach of the RCC criminal solicitation statute to apply to all offenses against persons and felony property offenses includes all the conduct under the current D.C. Code definition of a "crime of violence" under § 23-1331(4). The RCC criminal solicitation statute goes further, however, including liability for serious property offenses and an array of offenses against persons, many of which are quite serious (e.g. human trafficking). The limitation not to extend solicitation further, to all crimes, also respects the fact that solicitation is, given its status as the "most inchoate of the anticipatory offenses," a particularly "controversial offense." E.g., WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.1 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) (quoting State v. Jensen, 164 Wash.2d 943, 195 P.3d 512 (2008); JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 28.01 (6th ed. 2012).

Some have argued, for example, that "a mere solicitation to commit a crime, not accompanied by agreement or action by the person solicited, presents no significant social danger." WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.1(b) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019); see Ira P. Robbins, Double Inchoate Crimes, 26 HARV. J. ON LEGIS. 1, 116(1989); ("By placing an independent actor between the potential crime and himself, the solicitor has both reduced the likelihood of success in the ultimate criminal object and manifested an unwillingness to commit the crime himself."). The "extremely inchoate nature of the crime" has also led others to question general solicitation liability on the basis that it essentially "punish[es] evil intent alone." Ira P. Robbins, Double Inchoate Crimes, 26 HARV. J. ON LEGIS. 1, 116 (1989); see JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 28.01 (6th ed. 2012) ("According to Glanville Williams, the purpose of the offense is to enable police to 'nip criminal tendencies in the bud.' In fact, however, his metaphor would be more accurate if he had stated that its purpose is to nip criminal tendencies at the stem."). And finally, even those who generally support expansive solicitation liability admit that the basic "risk[s] inherent in the punishment of almost all inchoate crimes"—namely the possibility "that false charges may readily be brought, either out of a misunderstanding as to what the defendant said or for purposes of harassment"—are even more pronounced in the solicitation context given that "the crime may be committed merely by speaking." WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.1(b) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019; see, e.g., People v. Lubow, 29 N.Y.2d 58, 66, 272 N.E.2d 331 (1971) ("[T]here are dangers in the misinterpretation of innuendos or remarks which could be taken as invitations to commit sexual offenses."); 1 NATIONAL COMM'N ON REFORM OF FEDERAL CRIMINAL LAWS, WORKING PAPERS 372 (1970) ("[E]ven for persons trained in the art of speech, words do not always perfectly express what is in a man's mind. Thus in cold print or even through misplaced emphasis, a rhetorical question may appear to be a solicitation. The erroneous omission of a word could turn an innocent statement into a criminal one.").

The controversial nature of solicitation liability is also reflected in national legal trends. Although the drafters of the Model Penal Code recommended criminalizing solicitations to commit "any offense" under section 5.02(1) of the MPC, "[t]he majority of jurisdictions only regard as criminal the solicitation of the more serious crimes." Commentary on Haw. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 705-510. More broadly, there remains considerable variation in American criminal codes concerning the scope and availability of general solicitation liability.

> Even in those jurisdictions with modern recodifications, it is not uncommon for there to be no statute making solicitation a crime, [and in] those states with solicitation statutes, there is considerable variation in their coverage. Some extend to the solicitation of all crimes, some only the solicitation of felonies, particular classes of felonies, or all felonies plus particular classes of misdemeanors, and one only the solicitation of certain specified mental state requirement as to a given element, here whether the conduct solicited actually qualifies as an offense against persons or felony property offense under the RCC.

Subsection (c) provides additional clarity concerning the culpable mental state requirement governing a criminal solicitation as it relates to the results and circumstances of the target offense.[31] Whereas subsection (a) generally clarifies that a solicitation conviction entails proof that the person acted with a level of culpability that is no less demanding than that required by the target offense, subsection (c) specifically establishes that the person must: (1) "[i]ntend to cause all result elements required for that offense"[32]; offenses.

---

WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.1(a) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019; see id. ("This suggests, as does language in some of the reported cases, that there is not a uniformity of opinion on the necessity of declaring criminal the soliciting of others to commit offenses.").

Limiting general solicitation liability to crimes of violence (as was previously the case under District law) as well as felony property offenses and all offenses against persons sensibly reconciles these policy considerations and diverse national legal trends.

[31] It should be noted that "[c]ase law is almost nonexistent" on the culpable mental state issues addressed by subsection (b), while their treatment by modern criminal statutes is almost always unclear. Larry Alexander & Kimberly D. Kessler, Mens Rea and Inchoate Crimes, 87 J. CRIM. L. & CRIMINOLOGY 1138, 1166 (1997). This is due, at least in part, to the fact that the Model Penal Code's general solicitation provision "deliberately le[aves] open" the relevant culpability issues addressed by subsection (b) for judicial resolution. Model Penal Code § 5.02(1), cmt. at 371 n.23. As the Model Penal Code commentary highlights:

> Note should be made of a question that can arise as to the need for the defendant to have contemplated all of the elements of the crime that he solicits. If, for example, strict liability or negligence will suffice for a circumstance element of the offense being solicited, will the same culpability on the part of the defendant suffice for his conviction of solicitation, or must he actually know of the existence of the circumstance? The point arises also in charges of conspiracy, where it is treated in some detail. [The Model Penal Code does not resolve these issues in either context.]

Id.

In the absence of much legal authority on these issues in the context of solicitation, the best indicator of national legal trends is the more ample legal authority on these issues in the context of conspiracy, which is a very similar form of general inchoate liability. See, e.g., Marianne Wesson, Mens Rea and the Colorado Criminal Code, 52 U. COLO. L. REV. 167, 210 (1981) ("Because of its similarities to conspiracy, solicitation should require the same mental state as conspiracy."); State v. Carr, 110 A.3d 829, 835 (N.H. 2015) (criminal solicitation constitutes an "attempted conspiracy"). That said, legal authority on complicity is also relevant given that solicitation provides one of two bases (abetting) for holding someone criminally responsible as an accomplice. E.g., WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.1(b) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019. Some of these legal authorities are discussed elsewhere in this commentary; however, a more extensive overview and analysis can be found in the Explanatory Note accompanying RCC §§ 22E-303 and 210.

[32] WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.1(b) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019 ("[A]s to those crimes which are defined in terms of certain prohibited results, it is necessary that the solicitor intend to achieve that result through the participation of another. If he does not intend such a result, then the crime has not been solicited, and this is true even though the person solicited will have committed the crime if he proceeds with the requested conduct and thereby causes the prohibited result."); see generally, e.g., JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 28.01 (6th ed. 2012) ("A person is not guilty of solicitation unless he intentionally commits the actus reus of the inchoate offense—he intentionally invites, requests, commands, hires, or encourages another to commit a crime—with the specific intent that the other person consummate the solicited crime."); Mizrahi v. Gonzales, 492 F.3d 156 (2d Cir. 2007) ("[T]he specific intent element of solicitation cannot be determined . . . except by reference to the statutory definition of the object crime."); see also, e.g., RCC § 22E-303(b) (applying same culpability principle general conspiracy liability WAYNE R.

and (2) "[i]ntend for all circumstance elements required for that offense to exist."[33] In effect, subsection (c) incorporates dual principles of culpable mental state elevation[34] applicable whenever the target offense is comprised of a result or circumstance element that may be satisfied by proof of a non-intentional mental state (i.e. recklessness or negligence), or none at all (i.e. strict liability).[35]

LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 12.2(c) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) ("[T]here is no such thing as a conspiracy to commit a crime which is defined in terms of recklessly or negligently causing a result."); State v. Donohue, 150 N.H. 180, 184, 834 A.2d 253, 256 (2003) (deeming this position to be well-established, and collecting authorities in accordance).

To illustrate, suppose that S asks X to set fire to an occupied structure in order to claim the insurance proceeds. If the resulting fire kills occupants, they may be convicted of murder on the ground that the deaths, although unintentional, were recklessly caused. S is not guilty of solicitation to commit murder, however, because he only intended to destroy the building, rather than the death of another person. JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 29.05(B) (6th ed. 2012) (providing similar illustration in the context of conspiracy liability) (citing State v. Beccia, 505 A.2d 683, 684 (Conn. 1986) (holding that conspiracy to commit reckless arson is not a cognizable offense)); see, e.g., WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.1 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019 ("[I]f B were to engage in criminally negligent conduct which caused the death of C, then B would be guilty of manslaughter; but it would not be a criminal solicitation to commit murder or manslaughter for A to request B to engage in such conduct unless A did so for the purpose of causing C's death.").

[33] Commentary on Haw. Rev. Stat. Ann. §§ 705-510, 520 ("[The general solicitation statute] makes clear that, with respect to the culpability of the defendant, the defendant must act with the intent to promote or facilitate the commission of a crime," which language in the conspiracy context "requires an awareness on the part of the conspirator that the circumstances exist"); see generally, e.g., JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 28.01 (6th ed. 2012) ("A person is not guilty of solicitation unless he intentionally commits the actus reus of the inchoate offense—he intentionally invites, requests, commands, hires, or encourages another to commit a crime—with the specific intent that the other person consummate the solicited crime."); Mizrahi, 492 F.3d at 156 ("[T]he specific intent element of solicitation cannot be determined . . . except by reference to the statutory definition of the object crime."); see also, e.g., RCC §§ 22E-210, 303 (applying same culpability principle to accomplice liability and general conspiracy liability); Rosemond v. United States, 134 S. Ct. 1240, 1242 (2014) ("[A]iding and abetting requires intent extending to the whole crime . . . . That requirement is satisfied when a person actively participates in a criminal venture with full knowledge of the circumstances constituting the charged offense.") (italics added); State v. Pond, 315 Conn. 451, 484, 108 A.3d 1083, 1102 (2015) (deeming intent elevation as to circumstances to be well-established in the context of conspiracy liability, and collecting authorities in accordance).

To illustrate how this principle operates in the context of a strict liability crime, consider the following scenario involving two twenty one year-old male college students, S and X. One evening, X tells S that he met a girl, V, at a sorority party who, after being shown a picture of S, expressed interest in having sexual intercourse. In response, S asks X if he'd be willing to call the girl over, and lend S his college dorm to facilitate the sexual engagement. Both S and X reasonably believe that V is a 20 year-old college student; however, V is actually a fourteen year-old minor visiting her older (of age) sister. If S actually has sex with V, and is subsequently prosecuted for a strict liability sexual abuse offense applicable to fourteen year-old victims, S can be convicted notwithstanding his mistake of fact. However, if S does not have sex with her, and is instead prosecuted for soliciting X to aid in S's commission of statutory rape, the same mistake of fact would exonerate S under subsection (b) notwithstanding the strict liability nature of the target offense. Although S purposely asked X to aid S in his sexual rendezvous with V (a minor), S lacked the intent for X to aid sex with a fourteen year old, which would be required by the principle of culpable mental state elevation codified by subsection (b).

[34] Note that for those target offenses that already require proof of intent, knowledge, or purpose as to any result or circumstance element, subsection (b) does not elevate the applicable culpable mental state for a solicitation charge.

[35] Importantly, neither of these principles of culpable mental state elevation precludes the government from charging solicitations to commit target offenses comprised of result or circumstance elements subject to recklessness, negligence, or strict liability. However, to secure a solicitation conviction for such offenses,

To satisfy the first principle, codified in paragraph (c)(1), the government must prove that the defendant's purposeful solicitation was accompanied by a practically certain belief that the requested course of conduct would cause the result element(s) required by the target offense, or, alternatively, by a conscious desire for that course of conduct to cause the result(s). It is not necessary to prove that the actor caused the required result elements, only that the actor believed to a practical certainty that he or she would cause the required result elements. Similarly, to satisfy the second principle, codified in paragraph (c)(2), the government must prove that the defendant's purposeful solicitation was accompanied by a practically certain belief that the circumstance element(s) incorporated into the target offense exist, or, alternatively, by a conscious desire for the requisite circumstance(s) to exist.[36] It is not necessary to prove that all required circumstance elements actually existed, only that the actor believed to a practical certainty that they did.

Subsection (d) addresses the import of an uncommunicated solicitation, which arises when the planned recipient of the defendant's command, request, or efforts at persuasion never receives the message due to external factors (e.g., police interference or carrier malfeasance).[37] Under subsection (d), the fact that the message is never received is generally "immaterial" for purposes of solicitation liability.[38] There is, however, one important limitation placed on this principle: the person must have "done everything he or she plans to do to transmit the message."[39] The latter proviso requires proof that, where an proof that the solicitor acted with the intent to cause every result and circumstance element that constitutes the target offense is necessary.

---

[36] When formulating jury instructions for a solicitation to commit a target offense subject to a culpable mental state of knowledge (whether as to a result or circumstance element), the term "intent," as defined in RCC § 22E-206, should instead be substituted for the term knowledge. This substitution is appropriate given that the term "knowledge" can be misleading in the context of inchoate offenses—whereas the substantively identical term "intent" is not. See RCC § 22E-206, Explanatory Note.

[37] Note that a solicitor may fail to communicate with another person because the planned recipient never receives the message—e.g., the police intercept a murder for hire letter already placed in the mail by the defendant. Or, alternatively, a solicitor may fail to communicate with the planned recipient because the message is never sent—e.g., the police intercept the solicitor holding a murder for hire letter while making his way to the post office. In the first situation, the person has engaged in what might be considered a "complete attempt" at communication—that is, the person failed to achieve his criminal objective notwithstanding the fact that he was able to carry out the entirety of his criminal plans (i.e. placing the letter in the mail). In the second situation, in contrast, the person has only engaged in what might be considered an "incomplete attempt" at communication—that is, the person was unable to carry out the entirety of his criminal plans due to external interference. Subsection (c) authorizes solicitation liability in the first, but not the second, situation.

[38] See, e.g., WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.1(c) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) ("What if the solicitor's message never reaches the person intended to be solicited, as where an intermediary fails to pass on the communication or the solicitor's letter is intercepted before it reaches the addressee? The act is nonetheless criminal . . . .").

[39] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.02(2) ("It is immaterial under Subsection (1) of this Section that the actor fails to communicate with the person he solicits to commit a crime if his conduct was designed to effect such communication."). In support of this approach, the drafters of the Model Penal Code argue: that:

> [T]he last proximate act to effect communication with the party whom the actor intends to solicit should be required before liability attaches on this ground. Conduct falling short of the last act should be excluded because it is too remote from the completed crime to manifest sufficient firmness of purpose by the actor. The crucial manifestation of dangerousness lies in the endeavor to communicate the incriminating message to another person, it being wholly fortuitous whether the message was actually received. Liability uncommunicated solicitation is at issue, the defendant engaged in the last proximate act necessary to transmit the message.[40]

Subsection (e) establishes the penalties for criminal solicitations. Subsection (e) states the default rule governing the punishment of criminal solicitations under the RCC: a fifty percent decrease in the maximum term of imprisonment and fine applicable to the target offense.[41] Subsection (e) also specifies that the maximum penalty for solicitation should attach, therefore, even though the message is not received by the contemplated recipient, and should also attach even though further conduct might be required on the solicitor's part before the party solicited could proceed to the crime.

---

Model Penal Code § 5.02, cmt. at 381; see WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.1(c) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) ("Liability properly attaches under these circumstances, as the solicitor has manifested his dangerousness and should not escape punishment because of a fortuitous event beyond his control.").

The Model Penal Code approach to uncommunicated solicitations has been adopted by various state codes. See, e.g., Haw. Rev. Stat. § 705-510; Utah Code Ann. §§ 76-4-203. However, there are also numerous jurisdictions that, "while not specifically addressing the uncommunicated solicitation situation, might also permit a conviction in such circumstances . . . because the solicitation statute itself includes, in the alternative, the defendant's "attempt" to [solicit]." WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.1(c) n.98 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) (collecting statutes and case law); see, e.g., N.Y. Penal Law § 100.05 (solicitation liability where a person "solicits, requests, commands, importunes or otherwise attempts to cause such other person to engage in such conduct") (italics added); People v. Lubow, 29 N.Y.2d 58, 62, 272 N.E.2d 331 (1971) (italicized language in NY statute "would seem literally to embrace as an attempt an undelivered letter or message initiated with the necessary intent.").

[40] Consistent with this principle of liability, a solicitation conviction would be appropriate where: (1) S mails a written request for murder to X, but where the letter is then lost by the mail carrier (and thereafter handed over to the police) before A ever has an opportunity to read it; and where (2) S places a written request for murder to X in the mail, but where the letter is then immediately intercepted by the police before X ever has an opportunity to read it. In both situations, solicitation liability is supported by subsection (c) because S has done everything he plans to do to transmit the message.

If, in contrast, S, intending to mail a written request for murder to X, is arrested by the police on his way to the post office with the letter in hand, subsection (c) would not support liability in light of the fact that S has not engaged in the last proximate act necessary to effect such communication (e.g., placing the letter in the mail).

[41] See, e.g., Paul H. Robinson, The Role of Harm and Evil in Criminal Law: A Study in Legislative Deception?, 1994 J. CONTEMP. LEGAL ISSUES 299, 305 (1994) ("Adhering to an objective view of grading, a majority of jurisdictions reduce the grade of inchoate conduct below that of the corresponding substantive offense."). This penalty reduction is to be contrasted with the Model Penal Code, which grades most criminal solicitations as "crimes of the same grade and degree as the most serious offense which is attempted." Model Penal Code § 5.05(1); but see id. ("[A] solicitation . . . to commit a [capital crime or a] felony of the first degree is a felony of the second degree.").

The (original) Model Penal Code's equalization of solicitation penalties also conflicts with a strong intuitive sense, captured by public opinion surveys, that resultant harm should matter for grading purposes. See, e.g., Paul H. Robinson & John M. Darley, Objectivist Versus Subjectivist Views of Criminality: A Study in the Role of Social Science in Criminal Law Theory, 18 OXFORD J. LEGAL STUDIES 409, 429-30 (1998) (failure to consummate an offense generates, at minimum, "a reduction in liability of about 1.7 grades" by lay jurors, while the earlier the defendant's plans are frustrated, the greater this "no harm" discount). This may explain why, "[i]n the United States, three-quarters of the jurisdictions reject the notion of grading inchoate offenses the same as the completed offense." Paul H. Robinson, The Role of Harm and Evil in Criminal Law: A Study in Legislative Deception?, 1994 J. CONTEMP. LEGAL ISSUES 299, 320 (1994) ("Nearly two-thirds of American jurisdictions have adopted codes that have been heavily influenced by the Model Penal Code, but less than 30% of these have adopted the Code's inchoate grading provision or something akin to.").

should be decreased by 50% after application of any penalty enhancements to the target offense.

Subsection (f) cross-references relevant definitions.

The RCC criminal solicitation statute has been drafted in light of, and should be construed in accordance with, prevailing free speech principles. Given the centrality of speech to encouragement, solicitation liability directly implicates a criminal defendant's First Amendment rights.[42] And while the U.S. Supreme Court recently clarified that "[o]ffers to engage in illegal transactions are categorically excluded from First Amendment protection,"[43] it also reaffirmed the "important distinction between a proposal to engage in illegal activity and the abstract advocacy of illegality."[44] The RCC respects this distinction by requiring that the defendant solicit another person to engage in "specific conduct" constituting an offense under subsection (a).[45] To meet this requirement, it is not necessary that the defendant have gone into great detail as to the manner in which the crime encouraged is to be committed. At the very least, though, it must be proven that the defendant's communication, when viewed in the context of the knowledge and position of the planned recipient, carries meaning in terms of some concrete course of conduct that, if carried to completion, would constitute a criminal offense.[46]

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC criminal solicitation statute clarifies, improves the proportionality of, and fill in gaps in the District law of criminal solicitations.

The District's general solicitation statute is codified by D.C. Code § 22-2107.[47] Subsection (a) of the current statute broadly prohibits "soliciting a murder," whether or not [42] See, e.g., JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 28.01 (6th ed. 2012) (citing Kent Greenawalt, Speech and Crime, 1980 AM. B. FOUND. RES. J. 645); Eugene Volokh, The "Speech Integral to Criminal Conduct" Exception, 101 CORNELL L. REV. 981 (2016); Eugene Volokh, Crime-Facilitating Speech, 57 STAN. L. REV. 1095 (2005).

---

[43] United States v. Williams, 553 U.S. 285, 297 (2008) (citing Pittsburgh Press Co. v. Pittsburgh Comm'n on Human Relations, 413 U.S. 376, 388 (1973); Giboney v. Empire Storage & Ice Co., 336 U.S. 490, 498 (1949)).

[44] Williams, 553 U.S. at 298-99 (citing Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444, 447-48 (1969) (per curiam); NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware Co., 458 U.S. 886, 928–929 (1982)).

[45] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.02(1) ("A person is guilty of solicitation to commit a crime if," inter alia, he or she "commands, encourages, or requests another person to engage in specific conduct that would constitute such crime . . .") (italics added). This is consistent with accomplice liability under section 210, which similarly employs a "specific conduct" standard where complicity is based on encouragement. RCC § 22E-210(a)(2) ("Purposely encourages another person to engage in specific conduct constituting that offense."); see, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.06(3)(a)(i) ("A person is an accomplice of another person in the commission of an offense if," inter alia, he or she "solicits such other person to commit it[.]") (italics added).

[46] E.g., Model Penal Code § 5.02 cmt. at 376; WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.1 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019). So, for example, general, equivocal remarks—such as the espousal of a political philosophy recognizing the purported necessity of violence—would not be sufficiently concrete to satisfy the RCC criminal solicitation statute. Commentary on Haw. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 705-510. Nor would a general exhortation to "go out and revolt." State v. Johnson, 202 Or. App. 478, 483 (2005); see generally Williams, 553 U.S. at 300 (distinguishing statements such as "I believe that child pornography should be legal" or even "I encourage you to obtain child pornography" with the recommendation of a particular piece of purported child pornography).

[47] Enacted as part of the Omnibus Public Safety Act of 2006, the relevant provisions reads:

a murder actually "occurs," and is subject to a 20-year statutory maximum.[48] Likewise, subsection (b) of the current statute broadly prohibits "soliciting a crime of violence," whether or not that crime of violence actually "occurs," and is subject to a 10-year statutory maximum.[49]

Aside from these general prohibitions and penalties, D.C. Code § 22-2107 provides no further information concerning the contours of general solicitation liability under District law. Nor, for that matter, does the legislative history underling these code provisions, which is essentially non-existent.[50] And the same is also true of DCCA case law, which, as the commentary to the District's criminal jury instructions observes, does not appear to contain a single reported decision "involving this statute."[51]

The D.C. Code also contains a variety of more narrowly tailored solicitation statutes, which individually provide for solicitation liability in particular contexts by incorporating the term "solicits" as an element of the offense. However, these kinds of context-specific solicitation statutes provide little, if any, clarity on the contours of general solicitation liability under current District law.

For example, the District's contributing to the delinquency of a minor offense, D.C. Code § 22-811, prohibits, among other acts, "an adult, being 4 or more years older than a minor" from "solicit[ing]" that minor to commit a crime.[52] Likewise, D.C. Code § 22-2701

> (a) Whoever is guilty of soliciting a murder, whether or not such murder occurs, shall be sentenced to a period of imprisonment not exceeding 20 years, a fine not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, or both.
>
> (b) Whoever is guilty of soliciting a crime of violence as defined by § 23-1331(4), whether or not such crime occurs, shall be sentenced to a period of imprisonment not exceeding 10 years, a fine not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, or both.

2006 DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA LAWS 16-306 (Act 16–482), as added Apr. 24, 2007, D.C. Law 16-306, § 209, 53 DCR 8610.

[48] Id.

[49] The phrase "crime of violence," in turn, is defined in D.C. Code § 23-1331(4) to encompass the following offenses:

> aggravated assault; act of terrorism; arson; assault on a police officer (felony); assault with a dangerous weapon; assault with intent to kill, commit first degree sexual abuse, commit second degree sexual abuse, or commit child sexual abuse; assault with significant bodily injury; assault with intent to commit any other offense; burglary; carjacking; armed carjacking; child sexual abuse; cruelty to children in the first degree; extortion or blackmail accompanied by threats of violence; gang recruitment, participation, or retention by the use or threatened use of force, coercion, or intimidation; kidnapping; malicious disfigurement; manslaughter; manufacture or possession of a weapon of mass destruction; mayhem; murder; robbery; sexual abuse in the first, second, or third degrees; use, dissemination, or detonation of a weapon of mass destruction; or an attempt, solicitation, or conspiracy to commit any of the foregoing offenses.

[50] See generally COUNCIL OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, Judiciary Committee Report on Bill 16-247, "Omnibus Public Safety Act of 2006" (April 28, 2006).

[51] Commentary on D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 4.500.

[52] See also D.C. Code § 22-3010(b)(1) ("Whoever, being at least 4 years older than the purported age of a person who represents himself or herself to be a child, attempts . . . to seduce, entice, allure, convince, or persuade any person who represents himself or herself to be a child to engage in a sexual act or contact . . . .") makes it "unlawful for any person to . . . solicit for prostitution," while D.C. Code § 22-951 makes it "unlawful for a person to solicit . . . another individual to become a member of, remain in, or actively participate in what the person knows to be a criminal street gang."[53]

Most of these specific solicitation statutes, like D.C. Code § 22-2107, are completely silent on the meaning of solicitation in the relevant contexts.[54] And case law interpreting these statutes is sparse, though that which does exist establishes that solicitation liability is constitutional, at least insofar as it entails proof of a criminal intent.[55]

In practice, it appears that the elements of the general solicitation liability, as codified by D.C. Code § 22-2107, are determined in the District by reference to the criminal jury instructions.[56] The relevant instruction states, in its entirety, that:

> The elements of solicitation of [insert crime of violence], each of which the government must prove beyond a reasonable doubt, are that:

---

[53] Relatedly, D.C. Code § 22-1312 criminalizes an "indecent sexual proposal," which, as the DCCA has explained, "connotes virtually the same conduct or speech-conduct as a sexual solicitation." Pinckney v. United States, 906 A.2d 301, 307 (D.C. 2006) (quoting D.C. v. Garcia, 335 A.2d 217, 221 (D.C. 1975)); see D.C. v. Garcia, 335 A.2d 217, 221 (D.C. 1975) (noting that a "sexual proposal," as used in the statute, "connotes virtually the same conduct or speech-conduct as a sexual solicitation; the term clearly implies a personal importunity addressed to a particular individual to do some sexual act.").

[54] There is, however, one exception: the District's statute criminalizing solicitation of prostitution, D.C. Code § 22-2701. That statute is accompanied by a general definition of "[s]olicit for prostitution," which, pursuant to D.C. Code § 22-2701.01, "means to invite, entice, offer, persuade, or agree to engage in prostitution or address for the purpose of inviting, enticing, offering, persuading, or agreeing to engage in prostitution." See SAFE STREETS FORFEITURE AMENDMENT ACT OF 1992, 1992 District of Columbia Laws 9-267 (Act 9–250).

[55] More specifically, the DCCA, in Ford v. United States, upheld the constitutionality of the District's solicitation of prostitution statute on the basis that it "prohibits specified conduct for the purpose of prostitution," thereby "clearly" affording District residents "notice of the illegality" of such conduct. 498 A.2d 1135, 1139–40 (D.C. 1985) ("Such a 'scienter requirement may mitigate a law's vagueness, especially with respect to the adequacy of notice to the complainant that his conduct is proscribed") (quoting Vill. of Hoffman Estates v. Flipside, Hoffman Estates, Inc., 455 U.S. 489, 499 (1982)).

Likewise, in D.C. v. Garcia, the DCCA upheld the constitutionality of D.C. Code § 22-1312, which criminalizes an "indecent sexual proposal," observing that

> It is important to emphasize the precise nature of the speech which the sexual proposal clause . . . proscribes. The principle is well established that the constitutional guarantees of free speech and free press do not permit a State to forbid or proscribe advocacy of the use of force or of law violation except where such advocacy is directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and is likely to incite or produce such action. However, there is a significant distinction between advocacy and solicitation of law violation in the context of freedom of expression. Advocacy is the act of pleading for, supporting, or recommending; active espousal and, as an act of public expression, is not readily disassociated from the arena of ideas and causes, whether political or academic. Solicitation, on the other hand, implies no ideological motivation but rather is the act of enticing or importuning on a personal basis for personal benefit or gain. Thus advocacy of sodomy as socially beneficial and solicitation to commit sodomy present entirely distinguishable threshold questions in terms of the First Amendment freedom of speech. The latter, we hold, is not protected speech.

335 A.2d 217, 224 (D.C. 1975).

[56] Cf. Commentary on D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 4.500 (failing to reference any of the District's specific solicitation statutes as relevant legal authority for the elements of the general inchoate crime of solicitation).

> 1. [Name of defendant] solicited [another person] [insert name of other person] to commit [insert crime of violence]; and,
>
> 2. [Name of defendant] did so voluntarily, on purpose, and not by mistake or accident.
>
> "Solicit" means to request, command, or attempt to persuade.
>
> It is not necessary that [insert crime of violence] actually occur in order to find [name of defendant] guilty of solicitation.[57]

Three aspects of above statement of the elements of a criminal solicitation provided by this instruction bear notice. First, it leaves ambiguous the culpable mental state requirement governing the offense. This is because the jury instruction fails to respect the admonition that, as the DCCA observed in Ortberg v. United States, "clear analysis requires that the question of the kind of culpability required to establish the commission of an offense be faced separately with respect to each material element of the crime."[58] To say, for example, that a person must solicit another person "voluntarily, on purpose, and not by mistake or accident" does not specify whether the culpability required applies to the (1) the conduct planned to culminate in that offense; (2) the circumstances surrounding that conduct; or (3) the results, if any, that conduct would cause if carried out.[59]

Second, it is unclear what the third prong of the conduct requirement, described as "attempt[ing] to persuade," actually entails given the various meanings of the term attempts. Generally speaking, for example, there are two main categories of attempts: (1) complete attempts, which are attempts that fail to achieve the actor's criminal objectives notwithstanding the fact that he or she carried out the entirety of his or her criminal plans (i.e. shoot and miss); and (2) incomplete attempts, which are attempts that fail to achieve the actor's criminal objectives because he or she is frustrated by outside forces (e.g., police interception). Incomplete attempts, in turn, can be further differentiated according to the extent of the progress an actor makes before his or her plans are disrupted (e.g., taking a substantial step towards completion vs. being dangerously close to completion). With these variances in mind, it is unclear just how far along an actor must be in his efforts to convince another to commit a crime to be deemed to have engaged in "attempt[ed] persua[sion]."[60]

---

[57] D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 4.500.

[58] Ortberg v. United States, 81 A.3d 303, 307 (D.C. 2013) (citations, quotations, and alterations omitted).

[59] For example, to secure a conviction for solicitation to commit robbery against a senior citizen, must the government (merely) prove that the solicitor consciously desired to bring about conduct planned to culminate in the offense (e.g., knocking down and taking the wallet of victim X, who is over the age of 65)? Or, alternatively, must the government also prove that the solicitor consciously desired the relevant circumstance to exist (e.g., that victim X actually be over the age of 65)?

[60] For example, it seems clear that where D1 mails a written request for murder to D2, but where the letter is intercepted by the police (or lost by the mail carrier and thereafter handed over to the policy) before D2 ever has an opportunity to read it, this constitutes attempted persuasion. But what about where D1, intending to mail a written request for murder to D2, is arrested by the police on his way to the post office with the letter in hand?

Third, and more generally, the criminal jury instruction is silent on a variety of corollary issues relevant to understanding the scope of general solicitation liability. To take just one example, consider that of impossibility. In the solicitation context, impossibility issues arise where one party asks another to engage in or facilitate conduct that would culminate in a consummate criminal offense if—but only if—the conditions were as the solicitor perceived them. In this kind of situation, the solicitor might argue that criminal liability should not attach due to the fact that, by virtue of a mistake concerning the surrounding conditions, completion of the target offense was impossible. If presented with such a claim, District judges would have to determine whether the particular kind of mistake rendering the criminal objective at the heart of a solicitation prosecution impossible constitutes a defense. On this issue, among others, the District's jury instruction (and accompanying commentary) is silent.

Aside from this silence on the elements of solicitation, another aspect of District law that is problematic relates to grading. This is reflected in the fact that solicitations to commit all "crimes of violence"[61] other than murder are subjected to the same 10-year statutory maxima under D.C. Code § 22-2107, notwithstanding significant distinctions between the relevant underlying offenses. For example, an assault with significant bodily injury[62] is distinct from an aggravated assault,[63] which is distinct from first degree sexual abuse[64] or child sexual abuse.[65] These crimes of violence are, based on their elements and the varying penalties afforded to them, offenses of quite differential seriousness. At the same time, however, D.C. Code § 22-2107 effectively treats solicitations to commit each of them as an offense of the same seriousness given the flat 10-year statutory maximum provided to them under subsection (b).

Another way to appreciate the comparative disproportionality presented by the District's current approach to grading solicitations is reflected in the impact that the flat 10

---

[61] D.C. Code § 23-1331(4) ("The term 'crime of violence' means aggravated assault; act of terrorism; arson; assault on a police officer (felony); assault with a dangerous weapon; assault with intent to kill, commit first degree sexual abuse, commit second degree sexual abuse, or commit child sexual abuse; assault with significant bodily injury; assault with intent to commit any other offense; burglary; carjacking; armed carjacking; child sexual abuse; cruelty to children in the first degree; extortion or blackmail accompanied by threats of violence; gang recruitment, participation, or retention by the use or threatened use of force, coercion, or intimidation; kidnapping; malicious disfigurement; manslaughter; manufacture or possession of a weapon of mass destruction; mayhem; murder; robbery; sexual abuse in the first, second, or third degrees; use, dissemination, or detonation of a weapon of mass destruction; or an attempt, solicitation, or conspiracy to commit any of the foregoing offenses.").

[62] D.C. Code § 22-404(a)(2) ("Whoever unlawfully assaults, or threatens another in a menacing manner, and intentionally, knowingly, or recklessly causes significant bodily injury to another shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or be imprisoned not more than 3 years, or both.").

[63] D.C. Code § 22-404.01(b) ("Any person convicted of aggravated assault shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or be imprisoned for not more than 10 years, or both.")

[64] D.C. Code § 22-3002 ("A person shall be imprisoned for any term of years or for life, and in addition, may be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, if that person engages in or causes another person to engage in or submit to a sexual act in the following manner . . . .").

[65] D.C. Code § 22-3008 ("Whoever, being at least 4 years older than a child, engages in a sexual act with that child or causes that child to engage in a sexual act shall be imprisoned for any term of years or for life and, in addition, may be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01. However, the court may impose a prison sentence in excess of 30 years only in accordance with § 22-3020 or § 24-403.01(b-2). For purposes of imprisonment following revocation of release authorized by § 24-403.01(b)(7), the offense defined by this section is a Class A felony.").

year statutory maximum has on particular crimes of violence. For example, the 3-year statutory maximum governing the consummated version of assault with significant bodily injury is multiplied many times over by the flat 10-year statutory maximum under subsection (b).[66] In contrast, this same flat 10-year statutory maximum effectively treats solicitations to commit aggravated assault as equivalent in seriousness to consummated aggravated assaults, which are similarly subject to a 10-year statutory maximum.[67] And solicitations to commit first degree sexual abuse[68] or child sexual abuse[69] are treated as significantly less serious than the completed versions of such offenses under subsection (b) given that the completed version of these offenses are subject to potential life sentences.

Viewed as a whole, then, the District's approach to grading criminal solicitations does not reflect any consistent principle of punishment. And this, in turn, produces a penalty scheme which authorizes the imposition of sentences that are, at least in relation to one another, quite disproportionate.

The RCC criminal solicitation statute addresses the above-described problems as follows. First, subsections (a), (b), (c), and (d) provide a full description of the elements of a general criminal solicitation, which is consistent with element analysis and resolves the ambiguities surrounding the diverse set of liability issues mentioned above. When viewed collectively, this statement will improve the clarity, consistency, and comprehensiveness of the revised statutes. Second, subsection (e) establishes a principled and consistent approach to punishing solicitations (i.e. a fifty percent penalty discount), which renders offense penalties more proportionate.[70]

---

[66] D.C. Code § 22-404(a)(2) ("Whoever unlawfully assaults, or threatens another in a menacing manner, and intentionally, knowingly, or recklessly causes significant bodily injury to another shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or be imprisoned not more than 3 years, or both.").

[67] D.C. Code § 22-404.01(b) ("Any person convicted of aggravated assault shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or be imprisoned for not more than 10 years, or both."). Note also that attempted aggravated assault is only subject to a 5-year statutory maximum. D.C. Code § 22-404.01(c) ("Any person convicted of attempted aggravated assault shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or be imprisoned for not more than 5 years, or both.").

[68] D.C. Code § 22-3002 ("A person shall be imprisoned for any term of years or for life, and in addition, may be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, if that person engages in or causes another person to engage in or submit to a sexual act in the following manner . . . .").

[69] D.C. Code § 22-3008 ("Whoever, being at least 4 years older than a child, engages in a sexual act with that child or causes that child to engage in a sexual act shall be imprisoned for any term of years or for life and, in addition, may be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01. However, the court may impose a prison sentence in excess of 30 years only in accordance with § 22-3020 or § 24-403.01(b-2). For purposes of imprisonment following revocation of release authorized by § 24-403.01(b)(7), the offense defined by this section is a Class A felony.").

[70] The effect of this penalty scheme on current District law varies depending on the scope, gradations, and classifications applied to individual revised offenses. For a detailed analysis of this nature in the context of attempt penalties, which is broadly applicable here, see Explanatory Note to RCC § 22E-301(d)

RCC § 22E-303. Criminal Conspiracy.

Explanatory Note. RCC § 22E-303 provides a comprehensive statement of general conspiracy liability under the RCC.[1] This statement: (1) establishes the culpable mental state requirement and conduct requirement of a criminal conspiracy; (2) specifies the penalties applicable to a criminal conspiracy; and (3) addresses particular jurisdictional issues relevant to general conspiracy liability in the District of Columbia. RCC § 22E-303 replaces the District's current general conspiracy statute, D.C. Code § 22-1805a.

Subsection (a) establishes the requirements for the RCC criminal conspiracy statute. Generally, for criminal conspiracy liability, both the defendant "and at least one other person" must actually conspire in order for criminal liability to attach under the revised statute.[2] This establishes a bilateral approach to conspiracy, which excludes

---

[1] By way of historical background:

> [T]he crime of conspiracy itself is of relatively modern origins. The notion that one may be punished merely for agreeing to engage in criminal conduct was unknown to the early common law . . . Until the late seventeenth century, the only recognized form of criminal conspiracy was an agreement to make false accusations or otherwise to misuse the judicial process . . . And it was not until the nineteenth century that courts in the United States began to view conspiracies as distinct evils . . . .

State v. Pond, 108 A.3d 1083, 1096-97 (Conn. 2015) (internal citations and quotations omitted).

Today, the crime of conspiracy is widely understood to serve "two important but different functions: (1) as with solicitation and attempt, it is a means for preventive intervention against persons who manifest a disposition to criminality; and (2) it is also a means of striking against the special danger incident to group activity." WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 12.3(a) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019). At the same time, however, conspiracy is also an "extremely controversial crime." JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 29.01 (6th ed. 2012). This is so for two basic reasons.

First, conspiracy "is so vague that it almost defies definition." Krulewitch v. United States, 336 U.S. 440, 446 (1949) (Jackson, J., concurring); id. at 477 (describing the crime as "chameleon-like."). This vagueness, it is argued, provides prosecutors with "a powerful tool . . . to suppress inchoate conduct that they consider potentially dangerous or morally undesirable." JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 29.01 (6th ed. 2012); see Harrison v. United States, 7 F.2d 259, 263 (2d Cir. 1925) (describing the offense as the "darling of the modern prosecutor's nursery.") (Hand, J.). "Historically," for example, "conspiracy laws have been used to suppress controversial activity, such as strikes by workers and public dissent against governmental policies." JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 29.01 (6th ed. 2012).

Second, conspiracy is "predominantly mental in composition, because it consists primarily of a meeting of minds and an intent"—very little conduct is required. Krulewitch, 336 U.S. at 447–48 (Jackson, J., concurring). In light of the offense's "highly inchoate nature," a "few courts and more scholars" have questioned whether conspiracies merit punishment at all. JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 29.01 (6th ed. 2012) (collecting authorities). More often, though, it is argued that, because of conspiracy's focus on mens rea and concomitant disregard of actus reus, "persons will be punished for what they say rather than for what they do, or [simply] for associating with others who are found culpable." Phillip E. Johnson, The Unnecessary Crime of Conspiracy, 61 CAL. L. REV. 1137 (1973).

[2] E.g., D.C. Code § 22-1805a (defining conspiracy in terms of "two or more persons"); 18 U.S.C.A. § 371 (same). Compare, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.03(1)(a) ("A person is guilty of conspiracy with another person or persons to commit a crime if . . . he . . . agrees with such other person or persons that they or one or more of them will engage in conduct that constitutes such crime[.]") (italics added); id., Explanatory Note (it is sufficient under the Model Penal Code approach that the defendant "believe that he is agreeing[] with another that they will engage in the criminal offense or in solicitation to commit it").

unilateral agreements to engage in or aid crimes from the scope of general conspiracy liability.[3] Absent proof that "two or more persons"[4] satisfy both the culpable mental state

"Most modern codes, as does the Model Penal Code, define conspiracy in terms of a single actor agreeing with another, rather than as an agreement between two or more persons." WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 12.2(c)(6) n.30 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019). That said, numerous state courts in the jurisdictions with these unilateral formulations have interpreted their general conspiracy statutes in bilateral terms. Id. (collecting cases).

[3] The difference between the bilateral and unilateral views of conspiracy is most significant in cases in which one person, committed to furthering a criminal enterprise, approaches another seeking to enlist his or her cooperation. Marianne Wesson, Mens Rea and the Colorado Criminal Code, 52 U. COLO. L. REV. 167, 220 (1981). If the other party seems to agree, but secretly withholds agreement (perhaps even resolving to notify the authorities), the initiating person is not guilty of conspiracy under the bilateral approach, but would be guilty under the unilateral approach. Id.; see WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 12.2(c)(6) n.30 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) (bilateral approach also rejects conspiracy liability where the only other party to an alleged conspiracy is mentally incapable of agreeing) (citing Regle v. State, 9 Md. App. 346 (1970)).

In support of the bilateral approach, and concomitant rejection of the unilateral approach, various courts and commentators have argued that:

> The primary reason for making conspiracy a separate offense from the substantive crime is the increased danger to society posed by group criminal activity[.] However, the increased danger is nonexistent when a person "conspires" with a government agent who pretends agreement. In the feigned conspiracy there is no increased chance the criminal enterprise will succeed, no continuing criminal enterprise, no educating in criminal practices, and no greater difficulty of detection[.] Indeed, it is questionable whether the unilateral conspiracy punishes criminal activity or merely criminal intentions[.] The "agreement" in a unilateral conspiracy is a legal fiction, a technical way of transforming nonconspiratorial conduct into a prohibited conspiracy[.] When one party merely pretends to agree, the other party, whatever he or she may believe about the pretender, is in fact not conspiring with anyone. Although the deluded party has the requisite criminal intent, there has been no criminal act[.]

State v. Pacheco, 125 Wash. 2d 150, 156–57, 882 P.2d 183, 186–87 (1994) (quoting from and citing to state case law, federal case law, and legal commentary); see also id. (highlighting the "potential for abuse" in a unilateral regime because "the State not only plays an active role in creating the offense, but also becomes the chief witness in proving the crime at trial"); compare Model Penal Code § 5.03 cmt. at 393 (highlighting crime prevention concerns that support unilateral approach to conspiracy).

[4] D.C. Code § 22-1805a; 18 U.S.C.A. § 371.

requirement[5] and conduct requirement[6] stated in subsections (a) and (b), no single person is subject to general conspiracy liability under § 22E-303.[7]

---

[5] See, e.g., JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 29.06 (6th ed. 2012) (conspiracy prosecution "must fail in the absence of proof that at least two persons possessed the requisite mens rea of a conspiracy, i.e. the intent to agree and the specific intent that the object of their agreement be achieved."); WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 12.2(c)(6) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) ("[B]ecause of the plurality requirement it must be shown that the requisite intent existed as to at least two persons. That is, there must be a common design, so that if only one party to the agreement has the necessary mental state then even that person may not be convicted of conspiracy."). The following scenario illustrates the intersection between the bilateral agreement requirement and dual intent requirements governing conspiracy liability.

Police receive a report that someone posing as a janitor in a District of Columbia government building, P, intends to murder a plain-clothes police officer sitting in the lobby to the entrance, V. According to this reliable tip, P's plan is to quickly unhinge a large television that stands high above V, with the hopes that it will kill V upon impact. Soon thereafter, two officers arrive at the front of the building, and find P engaged in a conversation with another individual, A, a real janitor employed by the District, who is in control of a large cart of cleaning supplies. The police overhear P asking A if she'd be willing to park her cart of supplies right in front of the entrance immediately after P enters so as to block other people from entering the building. A agrees to do so, at which point both A and P begin to make their way towards the building's entrance with A's supply cart in tow. Moments later, however, the police intercede, and arrest both A and P.

If P later finds himself in D.C. Superior Court charged with conspiracy to murder a police officer based upon his agreement with A, can he be convicted? The answer to this question depends upon whether A's state of mind fulfills both of the dual intent requirements governing conspiracy liability, so that it can be said that P and "at least one other person" agreed to murder a police officer. (Note: there's little question that P possesses the requisite dual intents.)

For example, if A had agreed to block the entrance to the building with her cart of supplies because P had asked her to help facilitate P's cleaning of the lobby windows, then neither requirement is met: A did not intentionally agree to facilitate P's conduct, which, if carried out, would have resulted in the death of a police officer (the unhinging of the large television); nor did A act with the intent that, through her agreement, a police officer be killed. Alternatively, if A had agreed to block the entrance to the building with her cart of supplies because P had asked her to help facilitate P's removal of the television, then the first requirement is met: A intentionally agreed to facilitate the conduct of P which, if carried out, would have resulted in the death of a police officer. But the second requirement is not met: A did not intend, through her agreed-upon participation, to cause the death of anyone, let alone a police officer. Because, in both of the above sets of circumstances, A does not satisfy the dual intent requirements of conspiracy, P cannot be convicted of conspiracy to murder a police officer. (Which is not to say that P would escape liability entirely; on these facts P likely can be convicted of attempted murder of a police officer, on the basis that he intended to kill police officer V, and came dangerously close to doing so. See RCC § 22E-301(a).)

If, in contrast, A had agreed to block the entrance to the building because P had approached her with an opportunity to seek retribution against the same officer responsible for disrupting a drug conspiracy A was involved with years ago, then A fulfills both requirements: A acted with both the intent to facilitate P's planned course of conduct and the intent that, through her agreed-upon assistance, a police officer would be killed. Because, in this last scenario, A possesses both of the necessary dual intents—as well as the fact that the other elements of conspiracy are met, e.g., the presence of an "overt act," RCC § 22E-303(a)(3)—P can be convicted of conspiracy to murder a police officer.

[6] That is, engage in the necessary mutual agreement. The plurality requirement does not apply to the overt act requirement, which only needs to be met by one party to a conspiracy, which is discussed elsewhere in this commentary.

[7] It is important to note that while two or more persons must satisfy the culpability and conduct requirements of conspiracy under the revised criminal solicitation statute, it is not necessary for two or more persons to be prosecuted and/or convicted of conspiracy in order to support a conviction as to any one person. E.g., JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 29.06 (6th ed. 2012) ("The plurality rule does not require, however, that two persons be prosecuted and convicted of conspiracy . . . Thus, the conviction of a conspirator is not in jeopardy simply because the other person involved in the arrangement is unapprehended, dead, or unknown, or cannot be prosecuted because he has been granted immunity.") (collecting cases). In this sense,

Subsection (a) and paragraph (a)(1) require that the actor and at least one other person "purposely agree to engage in or aid the planning or commission of conduct." "Purposely" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means that the actor and at least one other person must consciously desire that they agree to engage in or aid the planning or commission of conduct. Paragraph (a)(1) further requires that if carried out, "in fact" the conduct will constitute an offense or a criminal attempt to commit an offense. "In fact" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that indicates there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element, here that the conduct, if carried out, will constitute an offense or a criminal attempt to commit an offense. These requirements establish that only criminal objectives fall within the scope of general conspiracy liability under the RCC.[8]

Paragraph (a)(1) codifies the agreement requirement at the heart of the general inchoate crime of conspiracy.[9] In so doing, this paragraph broadly clarifies that a conspiracy is comprised of a joint criminal agreement to commit the same offense.[10] And it also more specifically addresses three fundamental issues concerning the scope and applicability of general conspiracy liability.

The first issue relates to the nature of the agreed-upon participation in a criminal scheme that will support a conspiracy conviction. Paragraph (a)(1) establishes, in relevant part, that general conspiracy liability is appropriate under the RCC where two or more parties agree to "engage in" or "aid the planning or commission" of criminal conduct.[11] the general inchoate crime of conspiracy under the revised criminal solicitation statute is similar to the legal accountability as an accomplice under RCC §22E-210, which requires proof that another person satisfies the elements of the offense for which the defendant is being prosecuted, yet does not preclude liability although the other person claimed to have committed the offense has not been prosecuted or convicted. RCC § 22E-210; compare United States v. Bell, 651 F.2d 1255, 1258 (8th Cir. 1981) (Where "all other alleged coconspirators are acquitted, the conviction of one person for conspiracy will not be upheld.").

---

[8] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.03(1) (limiting general conspiracy liability to agreements to commit "crime[s]"); WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 12.3(a) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) ("[M]ost states" and all of the "most recent recodifications" follow the "far better" approach of "provid[ing] that the object of a criminal conspiracy must be some crime or some felony"); see also JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 29.04(c) (6th ed. 2012) ("People are entitled to fair notice that their planned conduct is subject to criminal sanction . . . If the legislature has not made a specified act criminal it is unfair to surprise people by punishing the agreement to commit the noncriminal act.").

[9] See, e.g., United States v. Jimenez Recio, 537 U.S. 270, 274 (2003) (agreement is "essence" of a conspiracy is the agreement); Jens David Ohlin, Joint Intentions to Commit International Crimes, 11 CHI. J. INT'L L. 693, 695 (2011) ("[T]he agreement takes the law beyond the individual mental states of the parties, in which each person separately intends to participate in the commission of an unlawful act, to a shared intent and mutual goal, to a spoken or unspoken understanding by the parties that they will proceed in unity toward their shared goal.").

[10] Specifically, paragraph (a)(1) requires that two or more parties to a conspiracy "agree to engage in or aid the planning or commission of conduct which, if carried out, will constitute an [the same] offense or a criminal attempt to commit an [same] offense[.]" This language effectively precludes conspiracy liability where each participant intended to commit a different offense. So, for example, if the evidence in a two-person criminal scheme demonstrates that X believed the agreed-upon conduct was to rob V, but Y believed the agreed-upon conduct was to assault V, a charge for conspiracy to commit robbery cannot be sustained against X or Y due to the lack of mutual agreement concerning the taking-related element of robbery.

[11] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.03(1)(b) (conspiracy liability where one person "agrees to aid [an]other person or persons in the planning or commission of [a] crime") (italics added); Salinas v. United States, 522 U.S. 52, 65 (1997) ("A conspirator must intend to further an endeavor which, if completed, would satisfy all of the elements of a substantive criminal offense, but it suffices that he adopt the goal of furthering or

This two-part formulation clarifies that agreements to assist with or otherwise facilitate the planning or commission of a crime, no less than agreements to directly engage in the requisite criminal conduct, provide an adequate basis for a conspiracy conviction, provided that the other requirements of the revised statute are met.[12]

The second issue focuses on the relationship between the defendant's state of mind and his or her agreed-upon facilitation of a criminal scheme.[13] Paragraph (a)(1) establishes, facilitating the criminal endeavor. He may do so in any number of ways short of agreeing to undertake all of the acts necessary for the crime's completion.") (italics added).

---

[12] See, e.g., Ocasio v. United States, 136 S. Ct. 1423, 1430 (2016) ("[A] specific intent to distribute drugs oneself is not required to secure a conviction for participating in a drug-trafficking conspiracy. Agreeing to store drugs at one's house in support of the conspiracy may be sufficient."); JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 29.04 n.77 (6th ed. 2012) (Where "D1 agrees to provide D2 with a gun to be used to kill V, D1 is guilty of conspiracy to commit murder, although she did not agree to commit the offense herself.").

That an agreement to aid provides an appropriate basis for liability under the RCC conspiracy statute reflects the well-established idea that complicity and conspiracy "normally go hand-in-hand." ROLLIN M. PERKINS & RONALD N. BOYCE, CRIMINAL LAW 703 (3d ed. 1982)). Indeed, "in most cases an accomplice is a co-conspirator, and vice-versa." JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 38.08(a) (6th ed. 2012). For example, if A purposely agrees to aid P in the commission of a robbery, and that agreement to aid either materializes or simply solidifies P's resolve to commit the robbery (even in the absence of such assistance), then A is responsible for P's robbery as an accomplice under section 210. On these same facts, however, A and P also appear to satisfy the requirements for general conspiracy liability (to commit robbery) under the revised criminal solicitation statute.

Nevertheless, there are important differences between these two legal concepts. For example, "[a]n agreement between two or more persons to participate in the commission of a crime is the key to a conspiracy and, therefore, to conspiratorial liability." JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 38.08(a) (6th ed. 2012). Importantly, "[a]ctual assistance in the crime is not required." Id. In contrast, "[a]ccomplice liability requires proof that an actor at least indirectly participated (assisted) in the crime; an agreement to do so is not needed." Id.

In light of these conceptual distinctions, it is possible for one person to conspire with another person to commit an offense without also being an accomplice (i.e. in the event that the other person commits that offense on his or her own). For example, if, in the above illustration, A's purposeful agreement to aid P in the commission of a crime had gone unfulfilled, and more generally failed to encourage P to commit that crime (e.g., it didn't bolster P's resolve), yet P nevertheless proceeded to commit the robbery by himself, then A (and P) would likely satisfy the requirements for general conspiracy liability under the revised criminal solicitation statute. At the same time, however, A would not satisfy the requirements for accomplice liability under RCC § 22E-210.

Conversely, it also is possible one person to be an accomplice in the commission of an offense committed by another person without also having conspired to commit it. The following situation is illustrative. P enters a bank to rob it, at which point, A, an unaffiliated customer, observes P's actions and silently assists in the crime by disabling a bank security camera. Because P and A never agreed to commit the robbery together, they do not satisfy the requirements of the revised criminal solicitation statute. That said, because A purposely assisted P with the commission of the robbery, A may be held liable for the robbery under RCC § 22E-210.

[13] The nature of this relationship issue "is crucial to the resolution of the difficult problems presented when a charge of conspiracy is leveled against a person whose relationship to a criminal plan is essentially peripheral":

> Typical is the case of the person who sells sugar to the producers of illicit whiskey. He may have little interest in the success of the distilling operation and be motivated mainly by the desire to make the normal profit from an otherwise lawful sale. To be criminally liable, of course, he must at least have knowledge of the use to which the materials are being put, but the difficult issue presented is whether knowingly facilitating the

in relevant part, that general conspiracy liability only applies to those who act with the purpose of bringing about conduct planned to culminate in an offense.[14] This "purposive attitude" constitutes the foundation of the culpability required for both accomplice liability as well as the general inchoate crime of conspiracy.[15] It can be said to exist when a person, through his or her agreement, consciously desires to facilitate conduct planned to culminate in an offense.[16] > commission of a crime ought to be sufficient, absent a true purpose to advance the criminal end. In this case conflicting interests are involved: that of the vendors in freedom to engage in gainful and otherwise lawful activities without policing their vendees, and that of the community in preventing behavior that facilitates the commission of crimes.

Model Penal Code § 5.03, cmt. at 404.

[14] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.03(1) (agreement must be accompanied by "the purpose of promoting or facilitating the commission of the crime"); Id., Explanatory Note ("The purpose requirement is meant to extend to [the] conduct elements of the offense that is the object of the conspiracy."); WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 12.2(c)(3) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) (purpose requirement is strong majority approach); Peter Buscemi, Conspiracy: Statutory Reform Since the Model Penal Code, 75 COLUM. L. REV. 1122, 1145-46 (1975) (same). This purpose requirement does not extend to whether the requisite conduct is, in fact, illegal or otherwise constitutes an offense. See WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 12.3(c) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) (accomplice cannot "escape liability by showing he did not [desire] to aid a crime in the sense that he was unaware that the criminal law covered the conduct of the person he aided. Such is not the case, for here as well the general principle that ignorance of the law is no excuse prevails.").

[15] See, e.g., United States v. Peoni, 100 F.2d 401, 402 (2d Cir. 1938) (Hand, J.) ("[Every definition of complicity requires that the defendant in] some sort associate himself with the venture, that he participate in it as in something that he wishes to bring about, that he seek by his action to make it succeed. All the words used-even the most colorless, 'abet,' carry an implication of purposive attitude towards it.") (italics added); United States v. Falcone, 109 F.2d 579, 581 (2d Cir.), aff'd, 311 U.S. 205, 61 S. Ct. 204, 85 L. Ed. 128 (1940) (Hand, J.) ("There are indeed instances . . . where the law imposes punishment merely because the accused did not forbear to do that from which the wrong was likely to follow; but in prosecutions for conspiracy or abetting, his attitude towards the forbidden undertaking must be more positive. It is not enough that he does not forego a normally lawful activity, of the fruits of which he knows that others will make an unlawful use; he must in some sense promote their venture himself, make it his own, have a stake in its outcome.") (italics added); Model Penal Code § 5.03 cmt. at 406 ("Under the conspiracy provision, the same purpose requirement that governs complicity is essential for conspiracy; the actor must have 'the purpose of promoting or facilitating' the commission of the crime").

[16] See generally RCC § 22E-206 (purposely defined). The following scenario is illustrative. P seeks to rob a bank on his own, but needs a fast car to implement his plan. P relays his conundrum to his friend, A, who happens to own a vehicle of this nature, over the phone. Having been informed of this, P offers to purchase A's car for market value. A rejects the offer, but counters with an arrangement wherein A will give P his car in return for a ten percent stake in the profits. P agrees to this arrangement, and begins his initial preparations for the robbery. Soon thereafter, however, the police—who had tapped A's phone, and thus overheard the agreement—arrest both A and P. On these facts, A (and P) can be held liable for conspiring to commit robbery because A, through his agreement with P, consciously desired to facilitate and promote P's criminal conduct.

That a conspirator must have the purpose to facilitate or promote conduct planned to culminate in an offense does not preclude convictions for knowledge-based theories of liability concerning the result elements of the target offense. The following example is illustrative. Environmental activists X and Y agree to blow up a coal-processing facility during the evening/afterhours when only a single person, the on-duty night guard, V, will be present. Both X and Y are practically certain that V will die from the blast, though they'd very much prefer that V not be injured. The police intercede right before X and Y are able to set off the explosives, thereby saving V's life. On these facts, both X and Y can be convicted of conspiracy to commit (knowing) murder, premised on the fact that their agreement was accompanied by: (1) a desire to engage in conduct, which, if carried out, would have culminated in murder (i.e. blowing up the facility); and

The corollary to this purpose requirement is that general conspiracy liability is not supported under the revised statute where a defendant's primary motive in agreeing to facilitate a criminal scheme is to achieve some other, non-criminal objective (e.g., "conduct[ing] an otherwise lawful business in a profitable manner").[17] And this is so even if the defendant knew that his or her agreement was likely to facilitate that scheme.[18] Neither awareness of, nor indifference towards, the success of another person's criminal scheme is sufficient to satisfy the purpose requirement incorporated into paragraph (a)(1).[19]

---

(2) their awareness as to a practical certainty that such conduct would result in V's death. See Paul H. Robinson & Jane A. Grall, Element Analysis in Defining Criminal Liability: The Model Penal Code and Beyond, 35 STAN. L. REV. 681, 757 (1983) ("When causing a particular result is an element of the object offense and such result does not occur, the actor, to be liable for conspiracy under Subsection (1), must have the purpose or belief that the conduct contemplated by the agreement will cause such result."); Note, Developments in the Law—Criminal Conspiracy, 72 HARV. L. REV. 920, 926 (1959)) ("[A] person may be held to intend that which is the anticipated consequence of a particular action to which he agrees[.]"); but see Model Penal Code § 5.03 cmt. at 408 ("[I]t would not be sufficient, as it is under the attempt provisions of the Code, if the actor only believed that the result would be produced but did not consciously plan or desire to produce it.").

[17] See, e.g., Falcone, 109 F.2d at 581 (Hand, J.) ("[T]he law should not be broadened to punish those whose primary motive is to conduct an otherwise lawful business in a profitable manner" because this would "seriously undermin[e] lawful commerce."); Sanford H. Kadish, Complicity, Cause and Blame: A Study in the Interpretation of Doctrine, 73 CAL. L. REV. 323, 353 (1985) (absent purpose requirement, the criminal law would "cast a pall on ordinary activity" by giving us reason to "fear criminal liability for what others might do simply because our actions made their acts more probable"); Model Penal Code § 5.03 cmt. at 406 (observing that "the complicity provisions of the Code" require "a purpose to advance the criminal end," and deeming "the case" for this resolution to be an "even stronger one" in the context of conspiracy, such that "[a] conspiracy does not exist [under the Code] if a provider of goods or services is aware of, but fails to share, another person's criminal purpose").

This purpose requirement should also "dispel the ambiguity inherent in many judicial formulations that predicate conspiracy on merely 'joining' or 'adhering' to a criminal organization or speak of an 'implied agreement' with the conspirators by aiding them 'knowing in a general way their purpose to break the law.'" Model Penal Code § 5.03 cmt. at 406

[18] It has been observed that, "[o]ften, if not usually, aid rendered with guilty knowledge implies purpose since it has no other motivation." Model Penal Code § 2.06 cmt. at 316. And the same is also presumably true of agreements to aid. That said, "there are many and important cases where this is the central question in determining liability." Id.; see, e.g., State v. Maldonado, 114 P.3d 379, 382 (N.M. 2005) ("Defendant's conviction presents a recurring question in the law of conspiracy: does a defendant whose only involvement is supplying generally available goods or services become a co-conspirator merely because he knows that the goods or services he provides may or will be used by another for a criminal purpose?"); United States v. Falcone, 311 U.S. 205, 208-10 (1940) (same).

[19] To illustrate, consider the following modified version of the scenario presented elsewhere in this commentary. P seeks to rob a bank on his own, but needs a fast car to implement his plan. P relays his conundrum to his friend, A, who happens to own a vehicle of this nature, over the phone. Having been informed of this, P offers to purchase A's car for market value. A accepts the offer to sell his car for market value because A was already planning to sell the vehicle, so accepting P's offer will save A the effort of having to list it on his own. However, A thinks the bank robbery is a stupid idea, and tells P this much. P ignores A's advice and subsequently begins his initial preparations for the robbery. Soon thereafter, however, the police—who had tapped A's phone, and thus overheard the agreement—arrest both A and P. On these facts, A (and therefore P) cannot be held liable for conspiring to commit robbery because, inter alia, A did not consciously desire to facilitate or promote P's criminal conduct. Instead, A's purpose was to save himself the hassle of having to list and sell the vehicle on his own. That A knew the sale of his car to P would facilitate the bank robbery, and was arguably indifferent as to P's criminal conduct, would not support liability under the revised criminal liability statute.

The third issue is the relevance of impossibility to general conspiracy liability—i.e. the fact that the target offense cannot be consummated under the circumstances due to a mistake on behalf of the defendant(s).[20] Paragraph (a)(1) establishes, in relevant part, that agreements to directly engage in or provide accessorial support to conduct that, if carried out, would merely constitute an "attempt to commit an offense" can also provide the basis for general conspiracy liability.[21] This reference to attempts imports the broad [20] The defendant in this kind of situation may admit that he or she possessed the requisite intent to commit that target offense and engaged in significant conduct, but nevertheless argue that impossibility of completion should by itself preclude the imposition of conspiracy liability. See, e.g., WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.5 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019); JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 29.07 (6th ed. 2012). In resolving this claim, there are four general categories of impossibility that might be considered for evaluative purposes (i.e. these are not analytically perfect distinctions).

The first category is pure factual impossibility, which arises where the parties to an agreement to commit a crime are precluded from consummating that crime because of circumstances unknown to them or beyond their control. The following situation is illustrative: X and Y, adult males, agree to arrange a sexual encounter with Z, a young child, at a specified time/location. Unbeknownst to X and Y, the police have been alerted to the arrangement and are awaiting the arrival of X and Y. If charged with conspiracy to commit statutory rape, this situation presents an issue of pure factual impossibility because the object of the conspiracy, sexual activity with a minor, cannot be consummated because of circumstances beyond the parties' control, namely, police intervention.

The second category of impossibility is pure legal impossibility, which arises where the parties to an agreement act under a mistaken belief that the law criminalizes their intended objective. The following situation is illustrative. X and Y, adult males, agree to arrange a sexual encounter with Z, a 20 year-old woman. X and Y know Z is 20; however, they believe that the age of consent is 21—when, in fact, it is 18. Therefore, X and Y believe themselves to be conspiring to commit statutory rape. If charged with conspiracy to commit statutory rape, this situation presents an issue of pure legal impossibility because X and Y have acted under a mistaken belief that the law criminalizes their intended objective, sexual activity with a 20 year-old woman.

The third category is hybrid impossibility, which arises where the object of an agreement between two or more parties constitutes a crime, but commission of the target offense is impossible due to a factual mistake regarding the legal status of some attendant circumstance that constitutes an element of the target offense. The following situation is illustrative. X and Y, adult males, agree to arrange a sexual encounter with Z, an undercover police officer posing as a young child. X and Y believe that Z is a young child. If charged with conspiracy to commit statutory rape, this situation presents an issue of hybrid impossibility because the object of X and Y's agreement, sexual activity with a minor, is illegal, but commission of the target offense is impossible due to a factual mistake regarding the legal status of some attendant circumstance that constitutes an element of the target offense, namely, whether Z is, in fact, a minor.

The fourth category of impossibility is inherent impossibility, which arises where the parties to an agreement to commit a crime plan to "employ[] means which a reasonable man would view as totally inappropriate to the objective sought." WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.5(a)(4) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019). The following situation is illustrative. X and Y, adult males, agree to arrange a sexual encounter with Z, a child-like manikin sitting in a shop window. X and Y believe that Z is an actual child, a mistake that is patently unreasonable under the circumstances. If charged with conspiracy to commit statutory rape, this situation presents an issue of inherent impossibility because any reasonable person would have known that the manikin was not a child. See Kyle S. Brodie, The Obviously Impossible Attempt: A Proposed Revision to the Model Penal Code, 15 N. ILL. U. L. REV. 237, 244-45 (1995) (common denominator underlying inherent impossibility is that the parties' "actions are so absurd or patently ineffective that the completion of the crime would always be impossible under the same set of circumstances").

[21] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.03(1) (conspiracy liability where one person agrees with another person that "they or one of them will engage in conduct that constitutes . . . an attempt … to commit such crime," or if he or she "agrees to aid such other person or persons . . . in an attempt . . . to commit such crime."); Model Penal Code § 5.03 cmt. at 421 ("[If an] actor agrees that he or another will engage in conduct that he believes to constitute the elements of the offense, but that fortuitously does not in fact involve those elements, he abolition of impossibility claims employed in the RCC's general attempt provision into the conspiracy context.[22] Under this approach, it is generally immaterial that the agreed-upon criminal scheme could never have succeeded under the circumstances.[23] So long as the parties agreed to bring about conduct that would have culminated in an offense if "the situation was as [the parties] perceived it" then conspiracy liability may attach,[24] provided that the agreed-upon plan of action was at least "reasonably adapted" to commission of the target offense.[25] would under this section be guilty of an agreement to attempt the offense, since attempt liability could be made out under [the MPC's general attempt provision] if the contemplated conduct had occurred.").

---

[22] Under RCC § 22E-301(a)(4)(B), a person commits an attempt if, inter alia, he or she "engages in conduct that . . . [w]ould have come dangerously close to completing that offense if the situation was as the person perceived it." Subparagraph (a)(3) further requires that the person's conduct must have been "reasonably adapted to completion of that offense."

[23] See RCC § 22E-301(a), Explanatory Note.

[24] RCC § 22E-301(a)(4)(B). Specifically, the subjective approach incorporated into RCC § 22E-303renders pure factual and hybrid impossibility claims immaterial. For example, under the RCC it would not be a defense to conspiracy to commit murder that: (1) the intended victim was already dead, provided that the parties to the conspiracy mistakenly believed the person to be alive at the moment one of them engaged in an overt act; or that (2) the intended murder weapon was inoperable, provided that the parties mistakenly believed it be operable. Nor would it preclude liability for conspiracy to commit theft under the RCC that: (1) the owner of the target property consented to its taking, provided that the parties to the conspiracy mistakenly believed it to be absent; or that (2) the safe targeted is empty, provided that the parties believed it be filled with valuable objects. See, e.g., PAUL H. ROBINSON, 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 85 (Westlaw 2019) ("The modern trend, evident in most jurisdictions, is to reject both [forms of] impossibility as defenses."); JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 27.07 (6th ed. 2012) (same).

In contrast, pure legal impossibility remains a viable theory of defense under the RCC. However, this does not hinge on RCC § 22E-301(a)(4)(B), or any other provision in section 301. Rather, the "underlying basis for acquittal is the principle of legality," which "provides that we should not punish people—no matter culpable or dangerous they are—for conduct that does not constitute the charged offense at the time of the action." JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 27.07 (6th ed. 2012); see Model Penal Code § 5.01 cmt. at 318 ("[If] the result desired or intended is not a crime, the actor will not be guilty of an attempt, even though he firmly believes that his goal is criminal.").

For example, "it is not a crime to throw even a [District of Columbia] steak into a garbage can." JEROME HALL, GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF THE CRIMINAL LAW 595 (2d ed. 1960). So if after losses against the Washington Nationals, the Oriole Bird, the Baltimore Orioles mascot, and the Phillie Phanatic, the Philadelphia Phillies mascot, together place a local District steak in the garbage, neither is guilty of committing any offense. Nor could the Oriole Bird and the Phillie Phanatic be convicted of conspiring to commit an imaginary offense of this nature although they honestly believed such conduct to be prohibited by the D.C. Code. E.g., JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 27.07 (6th ed. 2012) ("Just as a person may not ordinarily escape punishment on the ground that she is ignorant of a law's existence, it is also true that we cannot punish people under laws that are purely the figments of their guilty imaginations."); In re Sealed Cases, 223 F.3d 775 (D.C. Cir. 2000) (just as "[a] hunter cannot be convicted of attempting to shoot a deer if the law does not prohibit shooting deer in the first place," so too "a charge of conspiracy to shoot a deer would be equally untenable" although the parties themselves believed deer hunting to be criminally prohibited").

Inherent impossibility also remains a viable (if exceedingly limited) theory of defense under the reasonable adaptation standard codified in paragraph (a)(2) of RCC § 22E-301.

[25] RCC § 22E-301.

Inherent impossibility is an issue in conspiracy prosecutions where the parties to a criminal agreement plan to "employ[] means which a reasonable man would view as totally inappropriate to the objective sought." WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.5(a)(4) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019); see, e.g., John F. Preis, Witch Doctors and Battleship Stalkers: The Edges of Exculpation in Entrapment Cases, 52 VAND. L. REV. 1869, 1904 (1999) (recognition of inherent impossibility defense to attempt most strongly supported

Paragraph (a)(2) requires that a criminal conspiracy necessarily incorporates "the culpability required for the [target] offense."[26] Pursuant to this principle, a defendant may not be convicted of a criminal conspiracy under § 22E-303 absent proof that he or she acted with, at minimum, the culpable mental state(s)—in addition to any broader aspect of culpability[27]—required to establish that offense.[28] Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "in fact" specified in paragraph (a)(1) applies to the elements in paragraph by relevant case law, statutes, and commentary); Ventimiglia v. United States, 242 F.2d 620, 622 (4th Cir. 1957) (recognizing inherent impossibility defense to conspiracy); compare Model Penal Code § 5.05(2) (providing sentencing mitigation for a conspiracy that "is so inherently unlikely to result or culminate in the commission of a crime that neither such conduct nor the actor presents a public danger warranting the grading of such offense under this Section"). Conduct of this nature would not be "reasonably adapted" to completion of the target offense under RCC § 22E-301, and, therefore, could constitute a (failure of proof) defense to conspiracy liability under the RCC.

---

For example, the fact that the defendant in a conspiracy to murder prosecution agreed with another person to kill the victim by pulling the trigger on a broken firearm that the parties mistakenly believed to be operable would not call into question whether the defendant's conduct was reasonably adapted to the completion of murder. In contrast, the fact that the defendant in a conspiracy to murder prosecution agreed with another person to kill the victim by shooting a fully functional firearm at a voodoo doll with the victim's picture attached to it would be relevant to evaluating the reasonable adaptation standard—and ultimately preclude the attachment of conspiracy liability under paragraph (a)(2). See, e.g., Ventimiglia v. United States, 242 F.2d 620, 622 (4th Cir. 1957) ("[A]n attack on a wooden [dummy] cannot be an assault and battery (though it might constitute malicious destruction of property), and hence a combination and agreement to do so cannot be a conspiracy to commit assault and battery, although the defendants, before acting, thought the 'victim' a living person.")

[26] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.03(1) (government must prove that the defendant "acted with the kind of culpability otherwise required for commission of the crime"); WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 12.2(c)(2) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) ("Clearly, a 'conspiracy to commit a particular substantive offense cannot exist without at least the degree of criminal intent necessary for the substantive offense itself.'") (quoting Ingram v. United States, 360 U.S. 672, 678 (1959)) (italics added).

[27] The term "culpability" includes, but also goes beyond, the culpable mental state requirement governing an offense. See RCC § 22E-201 (culpability required defined). For example, if the target offense requires proof of premeditation, deliberation, or the absence of any mitigating circumstances, the government is still required to prove these broader aspects of culpability to secure a conviction. See RCC § 22E-201 ("'Culpability required' includes . . . Any other aspect of culpability specifically required for an offense."); id., at Explanatory Note (noting that "premeditation, deliberation, and absence of mitigating circumstances" would so qualify). And, of course, conspiracy liability is subject to the same voluntariness requirement governing all offenses under RCC § 22E-203. See RCC § 22E-201 (voluntariness requirement also part of culpability required).

[28] This derivative culpable mental state requirement, which is drawn from the target offense, is to be distinguished from the independent culpable mental state requirement governing the agreement at issue in all conspiracy prosecutions, discussed elsewhere in this commentary.

Generally speaking, conspiracy liability entails proof that the accused: (1) "intended," by his or her agreement, to assist or directly engage in conduct planned to culminate in an offense; and (2) "intended," through that agreement, to bring about any result elements or circumstance elements that comprise the target offense. See, e.g., Paul H. Robinson & Jane A. Grall, Element Analysis in Defining Criminal Liability: The Model Penal Code and Beyond, 35 STAN. L. REV. 681, 754–55 (1983); State v. Maldonado, 114 P.3d 379, 382 (N.M. 2005) (discussing "twin intent requirements of conspiracy").

"One of these intents may exist without the other," such as, for example, "where A and B agree to burn certain property and A knows the property belongs to C but B (perhaps because he has been misled by A) believes that the property belongs to A." WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 12.2(c)(1) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019). Here, B intends, through his agreement with A, to facilitate the destruction of another person's property. However, B does not intend the property destruction to occur against the will of the owner, a key circumstance element of a destruction of property offense.

(a)(2) and there is no culpable mental state requirement for the fact that the actor and other parties to the agreement act with the culpability required for the offense. Paragraph (a)(3) establishes that an overt act in furtherance of the conspiracy by either the defendant or a person with whom he or she has conspired is a necessary element of general conspiracy liability.[29] This overt act requirement is quite narrow.[30] For example, it does not require proof of progress sufficient to rise to the level of an attempt to commit the target offense.[31] Nor must the act be illegal.[32] While not particularly demanding, however, the requisite overt act must be proven beyond a reasonable doubt in order to support a conspiracy conviction.[33]

Subsection (b) provides additional clarity concerning the culpable mental state requirement governing a criminal conspiracy as it relates to the result and circumstance elements of the target offense. Whereas paragraph (a)(2) generally establishes that a conspiracy conviction entails proof that the defendant acted with a level of culpability that is no less demanding than that required by the target offense, subsection (b) specifically establishes that the "actor and at least one other person" must both: (1) "[i]ntend to cause all result elements required for the offense"[34]; and (2) "[i]ntend for all circumstance

---

[29] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.03(5) ("No person may be convicted of conspiracy to commit a crime, other than a felony of the first or second degree, unless an overt act in pursuance of such conspiracy is alleged and proved to have been done by him or by a person with whom he conspired."); JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 29.04 (6th ed. 2012) (overt act requirement has gained "wide acceptance" among the states, while "[m]ost penal code revisions" apply it to all conspiracies); Whitfield v. United States, 543 U.S. 209, 216 (2005) ("Congress has included an express overt-act requirement in at least [23] current conspiracy statutes.").

[30] See, e.g., WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 12.2(b) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) ("If the agreement has been established but the object has not been attained, virtually any act will satisfy the overt act requirement.") (collecting cases); Model Penal Code § 5.03(5) cmt. at 387, 454 (same).

[31] See, e.g., WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 12.2(b) n.81 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) ("The overt act need not rise to the level of a 'substantial step' required for an attempt to commit the felony that is the conspiracy's object.") (quoting Owens v. State, 929 N.E.2d 754 (Ind. 2010)); JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 29.04(d) (6th ed. 2012) (overt act "need not constitute an attempt to commit the target offense").

[32] See, e.g., JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 29.04(d) (6th ed. 2012) ("overt act need not be illegal"); State v. Heitman, 262 Neb. 185, 198, 629 N.W.2d 542, 553 (2001) (same). This means that otherwise innocent conduct, such as writing a letter, making a phone call, purchasing an instrumentality, or attending a meeting, can, when made pursuant to an unlawful agreement, satisfy the overt act requirement. JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 29.04(d) (6th ed. 2012) (citing Yates v. United States, 354 U.S. 298, 333–34 (1957), overruled on other grounds in Burks v. United States, 437 U.S. 1 (1978)); WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 12.2(b) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) (noting comparable examples).

[33] E.g., Model Penal Code § 5.03, cmt. at 454 ("[W]hen an overt act is required, it is of course an element of the crime of conspiracy, since it must be alleged and proved to support a conviction."); see, e.g., id. at 453 (overt act "affords at least a minimal added assurance, beyond the bare agreement, that a socially dangerous combination exists"); People v. Russo, 25 P.3d 641, 645 (Cal. 2001) (overt act appropriately respects the admonition that "evil thoughts alone cannot constitute a criminal offense."); United States v. Sassi, 966 F.2d 283, 284 (7th Cir. 1992) (overt act helps "to separate truly dangerous agreements from banter and other exchanges that pose less risk.").

[34] See, e.g., WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 12.2(c) n.81 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) ("[T]here is no such thing as a conspiracy to commit a crime which is defined in terms of recklessly or negligently causing a result."); State v. Donohue, 150 N.H. 180, 184, 834 A.2d 253, 256 (2003) (deeming this position to be well-established, and collecting authorities in accordance).

Dressler illustrates operation of this principle in the context of a result element crime subject to recklessness accordingly:

elements required for the offense to exist."[35] In effect, subsection (b) incorporates dual principles of culpable mental state elevation[36] applicable whenever the target offense is comprised of a result or circumstance that may be satisfied by proof of a non-intentional mental state (i.e. recklessness or negligence), or none at all (i.e. strict liability).[37]

To satisfy the first principle, codified in paragraph (b)(1), the government must prove that the defendant and at least one other person had a practically certain belief that the agreed-upon course of conduct would cause the result element(s) required by the target offense, or, alternatively, had a conscious desire for that course of conduct to cause the result(s). Similarly, to satisfy the second principle, codified in paragraph (b)(2), the government must prove that the defendant and at least one other person had a practically

> It follows from the specific-intent nature of conspiracy that the culpability required for conviction of conspiracy at times must be greater than is required for conviction of the object of the agreement. For example, suppose that D1 and D2 agree to set fire to an occupied structure in order to claim the insurance proceeds. If the resulting fire kills occupants, they may be convicted of murder on the ground that the deaths, although unintentional, were recklessly caused. They are not guilty of conspiracy to commit murder, however, because their objective was to destroy the building, rather than to kill someone. Put another away, as a matter of logic, one "cannot agree to accomplish a required specific result unintentionally."

JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 29.05(b) (6th ed. 2012) (quoting State v. Beccia, 505 A.2d 683, 684 (Conn. 1986) (holding that conspiracy to commit reckless arson is not a cognizable offense)).

[35] See, e.g., Commentary on Haw. Rev. Stat. § 705-520 ("It seems clear [] that, because of the preparatory nature of conspiracy, intention to promote or facilitate the commission of the offense requires an awareness on the part of the conspirator that the circumstances exist."); State v. Pond, 315 Conn. 451, 484, 108 A.3d 1083, 1102 (2015) (deeming this position to be well-established, and collecting authorities in accordance); see also, e.g., Rosemond v. United States, 134 S. Ct. 1240, 1242 (2014) ("[A]iding and abetting requires intent extending to the whole crime . . . . That requirement is satisfied when a person actively participates in a criminal venture with full knowledge of the circumstances constituting the charged offense."); United States v. Encarnacion-Ruiz, 787 F.3d 581, 589 (1st Cir. 2015) ("[U]nder Rosemond, an aider and abettor of [the crime of producing child pornography] must have known the victim was a minor" although the victim's age is a matter of strict liability for the target offense).

To illustrate how this principle operates in the context of a strict liability crime, consider the following scenario involving two twenty one year-old male college students, P and A. One evening, P asks A if he can borrow A's college dorm room to have consensual sex with V, a girl P just met at a fraternity party. Unbeknownst to both A and P, however, V is a fourteen year-old minor, who P mistakenly believes to be twenty-one and, crucially, who A has never met. A agrees to let P use his room, hands P his keys, and, thereafter, P and V have sex in A's room. If P is subsequently prosecuted for a strict liability sexual abuse offense applicable to fourteen year-old victims, P can be convicted notwithstanding his mistake of fact. However, the same mistake of fact would exonerate A under subsection (b) notwithstanding the strict liability nature of the target offense. Although A purposely agreed to aid P with his sexual rendezvous with V, A lacked the intent to facilitate sex with a fourteen year old, which would be required by the principle of culpable mental state elevation codified by subsection (b).

[36] Note that for those target offenses that already require proof of intent, knowledge, or purpose as to any result or circumstance, subsection (b) does not elevate the applicable culpable mental state for a conspiracy charge.

[37] Importantly, neither of these principles of culpable mental state elevation precludes the government from charging conspiracies to commit target offenses comprised of result or circumstance elements subject to recklessness, negligence, or strict liability. However, to secure a conspiracy conviction for such offenses, proof that the parties to the agreement acted with the intent to cause every result and circumstance element that constitutes the target offense is necessary.

certain belief that the circumstance element(s) incorporated into the target offense exist, or, alternatively, by a conscious desire for the requisite circumstance(s) to exist.[38] It is not necessary to prove that the actor and at least one other person caused the required result elements or that the required circumstance elements actually existed.

Subsection (c) establishes the penalties for criminal conspiracies. Paragraph (c)(1) states the default rule governing the punishment of criminal conspiracies under the RCC: a fifty percent decrease in the maximum term of imprisonment and fine applicable to the offense after the application of any penalty enhancements.[39]

Subsections (d), (e), and (f) recodify the jurisdictional provisions set forth in D.C. Code § 22-1805a,[40] and, in so doing, address two issues relevant to general conspiracy

---

[38] When formulating jury instructions for a conspiracy to commit a target offense subject to a culpable mental state of knowledge (whether as to a result or circumstance), the term "intent," as defined in RCC § 22E-206(b), should instead be substituted for the term knowledge. This substitution is appropriate given that the term "knowledge" can be misleading in the context of inchoate offenses—whereas the substantively identical term "intent" is not. See RCC § 22E-206, Explanatory Note.

[39] See, e.g., Paul H. Robinson, The Role of Harm and Evil in Criminal Law: A Study in Legislative Deception?, 1994 J. CONTEMP. LEGAL ISSUES 299, 305 (1994) ("Adhering to an objective view of grading, a majority of jurisdictions reduce the grade of inchoate conduct below that of the corresponding substantive offense."); WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 12.4(d) n.81 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) (nearly half of American jurisdictions "provide that the conspiracy crime is one class lower than the object crime") (collecting statutes); Model Penal Code § 5.05 cmt. at 489 n.19 ("Many recent revisions generally grade conspiracy one level below the object offense."). This penalty reduction is to be contrasted with the Model Penal Code, which grades most criminal conspiracies as "crimes of the same grade and degree as the most serious offense which is attempted." Model Penal Code § 5.05(1); but see id. ("[A] conspiracy . . . to commit a [capital crime or a] felony of the first degree is a felony of the second degree.").

The drafters of the Model Penal Code adopted this policy of conspiracy penalty equalization, in a significant departure from the prevailing common law approach, on the basis of the same dangerousness-based rationale that motivated their endorsement of a unilateral approach to conspiracy and equalizing the penalty for other general inchoate crimes, such as attempt. See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.05, cmt. at 490 ("To the extent that sentencing depends on the anti-social disposition of the actor and the demonstrated need for a corrective sanction, there is likely to be little difference in the gravity of the required measures depending on the consummation or the failure of the plan."). However, as discussed in the Explanatory Note accompanying RCC § 22E-301(d), this rationale for punishment has been called into question by many on empirical grounds, including, perhaps most notably, by the drafters of the recent Model Penal Code Sentencing Project. See, e.g., Model Penal Code: Sentencing § 6.06 PFD (2017) ("There are undenied elements of inefficacy and injustice in the Code's endorsement of incapacitation as a ground for incarceration, particularly when authorities misapprehend the dangerousness of individual offenders.").

The (original) Model Penal Code's equalization of conspiracy penalties also conflicts with a strong intuitive sense, captured by public opinion surveys, that resultant harm should matter for grading purposes. See, e.g., Paul H. Robinson & John M. Darley, Objectivist Versus Subjectivist Views of Criminality: A Study in the Role of Social Science in Criminal Law Theory, 18 OXFORD J. LEGAL STUDIES 409, 429-30 (1998) (failure to consummate an offense generates, at minimum, "a reduction in liability of about 1.7 grades" by lay jurors, while the earlier the defendant's plans are frustrated, the greater this "no harm" discount). This may explain why, "[i]n the United States, three-quarters of the jurisdictions reject the notion of grading inchoate offenses the same as the completed offense." Paul H. Robinson, The Role of Harm and Evil in Criminal Law: A Study in Legislative Deception?, 1994 J. CONTEMP. LEGAL ISSUES 299, 320 (1994) ("Nearly two-thirds of American jurisdictions have adopted codes that have been heavily influenced by the Model Penal Code, but less than 30% of these have adopted the Code's inchoate grading provision or something akin to.").

[40] The relevant statutory provisions, subsections (c) and (d), read:

> (c) When the object of a conspiracy contrived within the District of Columbia is to engage in conduct in a jurisdiction outside the District of Columbia which would constitute a liability under the RCC. The first is whether and to what extent the revised statute applies to conspiracies to commit target offenses outside the District of Columbia. And the second is whether and to what extent the revised statute applies to conspiracies formed outside the District of Columbia.

Subsection (d) addresses the first situation, where the requisite agreement is formed within the District of Columbia, but where the object of the agreement is to engage in conduct outside the District of Columbia. Paragraph (d)(1) establishes that general conspiracy liability applies only if the conduct to be performed outside the District of Columbia would constitute a criminal offense under the statutory laws of the District of Columbia if performed inside the District of Columbia, provided that one of the conditions under paragraph (d)(2) is met. First, under paragraph (d)(2) and subparagraph (d)(2)(A), that conduct would constitute a criminal offense under the statutory laws of that other jurisdiction if performed in that jurisdiction.[41] Second, and alternatively under paragraph (d)(2) and subparagraph (d)(2)(B), that conduct would constitute a criminal offense under the statutory laws of the District of Columbia even if it was performed outside the District of Columbia.[42]

Subsection (e) addresses the second situation, where the requisite agreement is formed outside the District of Columbia, but where the object of the agreement is to engage in conduct inside the District of Columbia. Paragraph (e)(1) establishes that general conspiracy liability applies if the conduct to be performed inside the District of Columbia would constitute a criminal offense under the statutory laws of the District of Columbia, > criminal offense under an act of Congress applicable exclusively to the District of Columbia if performed therein, the conspiracy is a violation of this section if:

---

>
> > (1) Such conduct would also constitute a crime under the laws of the other jurisdiction if performed therein; or
> >
> > (2) Such conduct would constitute a criminal offense under an act of Congress exclusively applicable to the District of Columbia even if performed outside the District of Columbia.
>
> (d) A conspiracy contrived in another jurisdiction to engage in conduct within the District of Columbia which would constitute a criminal offense under an act of Congress exclusively applicable to the District of Columbia if performed within the District of Columbia is a violation of this section when an overt act pursuant to the conspiracy is committed within the District of Columbia. Under such circumstances, it is immaterial and no defense to a prosecution for conspiracy that the conduct which is the object of the conspiracy would not constitute a crime under the laws of the other jurisdiction.

D.C. Code § 22-1805a. Note that the prior references to "act[s] of Congress exclusively applicable to the District of Columbia" in the old District statute have been replaced with the phrase "statutory laws of the District of Columbia" in RCC § 22E-303(d), (e), and (f). This explicitly clarifies that these jurisdictional provisions apply to all criminal offenses in the D.C. Code, rather than just congressionally enacted offenses.

[41] For example, if two people form a conspiracy within the District to manufacture a controlled substance in another jurisdiction, it is a violation of this statute only if manufacturing that substance is a criminal offense under the District's statutory laws.

[42] For example, if two people form a conspiracy within the District to transmit criminal threats from another jurisdiction to a person residing within the District, they may be convicted of a criminal conspiracy because the statutory laws of the District criminalize transmitting a criminal threat from outside of the jurisdiction to a person located within the District.

provided that an overt act in furtherance of the conspiracy is committed within the District of Columbia (paragraph (e)(2). Under these circumstances, subsection (e) clarifies that it is no defense that the conduct that is the object of the conspiracy would not constitute a criminal offense under the laws of that other jurisdiction.[43]

The RCC conspiracy statute is intended to preserve existing District law relevant to conspiracy liability to the extent it is consistent with the RCC's statutory text and accompanying commentary.[44] Subsections (a)-(e) therefore incorporate existing District legal authorities whenever appropriate.[45]

Subsection (f) specifies that when the requirements under paragraphs (e)(1) and (e)(2) are proven, it is not a defense to prosecution for conspiracy that the object of the conspiracy would not constitute a criminal offense in the jurisdiction in which the conspiracy was formed. If two or more persons agree in another jurisdiction to engage in conduct in the District that constitutes a crime in the District, and an overt act in furtherance of the conspiracy is committed within the District, it is irrelevant that the object of the conspiracy would not constitute a criminal offense in the jurisdiction where the conspiracy was originally formed.

Relation to Current District Law. The RCC conspiracy statute clarifies, improves the proportionality of, and fill in gaps in the District law of criminal conspiracies.

The D.C. Code provides for conspiracy liability in a variety of ways. Most prominently, the D.C. Code contains a general conspiracy penalty provision that applies to a relatively broad group of offenses. [46] Additionally, the D.C. Code contains a variety of [43] Nothing in subsection (e) should be construed as lessening the government's burden to prove the culpable mental state requirement for conspiracy under RCC § 22E-303(a) and (b).

---

[44] This includes both those topics explicitly addressed by subsections (a)-(e) as well as those that are not, such as, for example: (1) determining the scope, duration, and number of conspiracies, see McCullough v. United States, 827 A.2d 48, 60 (D.C. 2003); (2) unanimity, see D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 7.102 (citing U.S. v. Treadwell, 760 F.2d 327, 336-37 (D.C. Cir. 1985)); (3) charging, see Tann v. United States, 127 A.3d 400, 430 (D.C. 2015); (4) joinder, see McCray v. United States, 133 A.3d 205 (D.C.), cert. denied sub nom. Fortson v. United States, 137 S. Ct. 581, 196 L. Ed. 2d 455 (2016), and (5) the fact-finder's role in determining whether the relevant jurisdictional bases have been met, see Gilliam v. United States, 80 A.3d 192 (D.C. 2013).

[45] For an example of an area of the District's law of conspiracy changed by the RCC, compare D.C. Code § 22-1805a(a)(1) ("If 2 or more persons conspire either to commit a criminal offense or to defraud the District of Columbia or any court or agency thereof in any manner or for any purpose . . . .") with RCC § 22E-303(a) ("An actor commits criminal conspiracy to commit an offense when the actor and at least one other person. . . .").

[46] That provision, D.C. Code § 22-1805a, establishes in relevant part:

> (a)(1) If 2 or more persons conspire either to commit a criminal offense or to defraud the District of Columbia or any court or agency thereof in any manner or for any purpose, each shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both, except that if the object of the conspiracy is a criminal offense punishable by less than 5 years, the maximum penalty for the conspiracy shall not exceed the maximum penalty provided for that offense.
>
> (2) If 2 or more persons conspire to commit a crime of violence as defined in § 23-1331(4), each shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 nor the maximum fine prescribed for the offense, the commission of which was the object of the conspiracy, whichever is less, or imprisoned not more than 15 years nor the maximum imprisonment

semi-general conspiracy penalty provisions, which create conspiracy liability for narrower groups of offenses with related social harms.[47] Finally, some specific offenses in the D.C. Code individually provide for conspiracy liability by incorporating the term "conspires" as an element of the offense.[48]

The District's scattered collection of conspiracy statutes present the same two basic problems reflected in the District's "patchwork of attempt statutes."[49] The first is that the District's conspiracy statutes fail to clearly communicate the elements of a criminal conspiracy. In no place, for example, does the D.C. Code define the term conspiracy. This statutory silence has effectively delegated to District courts the responsibility to establish the contours of conspiracy liability. Over the years, the DCCA has issued numerous opinions and proffered a variety of statements relevant to determining the contours of conspiracy liability under District law. The case law in this area reflects the piecemeal evolution of doctrine over more than a century: it is sometimes ambiguous, occasionally internally inconsistent, and has never been clearly synthesized into a single analytical framework. Nonetheless, a holistic reading of District authority reveals basic and fundamental principles governing the contours of conspiracy liability. Consistent with the interests of clarity and consistency, the revised conspiracy statute translates these principles into a detailed statutory framework.

The second main problem in the District's conspiracy statutes is that they lack a consistent grading principle. For example, some District conspiracies are subject to the same statutory maxima governing the completed offense. Many other District conspiracies, in contrast, are subject to a statutory maximum less severe than (typically one-half) the statutory maximum applicable to the completed offense. Viewed collectively, then, the D.C. Code manifests at least two fundamentally different patterns in how it grades conspiracies, without any discernible rationale for the variances. This produces a penalty scheme which authorizes the imposition of sentences that are, at least in relation to one another, quite disproportionate. Consistent with the interests of consistency and proportionality, the revised conspiracy statute changes District law by adopting a uniform approach to grading conspiracies at one half the severity of the completed offense.

A more detailed analysis of District conspiracy law and its relationship with the revised conspiracy statute is provided below. It is organized according to seven main prescribed for the offense, the commission of which was the object of the conspiracy, whichever is less, or both.

---

The first subparagraph was created by Congress in 1970. See 84 Stat. 599, Pub. L. 91-358, title II, § 202, at 599 (July 29, 1970). The latter subparagraph was added by the D.C. Council in 2009 as part of the Omnibus Public Safety and Justice Amendment Act of 2009. See D.C. Law 18-88, § 209, 56 DCR 7413, 2009 District of Columbia Laws 18-88 (Dec. 10, 2009). Both subparagraphs were subject to the Criminal Fine Proportionality Act of 2012, see D.C. Law 19-317, § 201(z), 60 DCR 2064 (June 11, 2013).

[47] See D.C. Code § 48-904.09 (setting forth penalties for conspiracy to commit various drug offenses); D.C. Code § 8-417 (setting forth penalties for conspiracy to commit various pesticide-related violations); D.C. Code § 50-1331.08 (setting forth penalties for conspiracy to commit various false title-related violations).

[48] See D.C. Code § 22-3153 (conspiracy to commit particular crimes of violence as acts of terrorism); D.C. Code § 22-3154 (conspiracy to manufacture or possess a weapon of mass destruction); D.C. Code § 22-3155 (conspiracy to use, disseminate, or detonate a weapon of mass destruction); D.C. Code § 22-2001 (conspiracy to kidnap); D.C. Code § 21-591 (conspiracy to violate various fiduciary obligations); D.C. Code § 1-1001.14 (conspiracy to engage in corrupt election practices).

[49] 1978 D.C. Code Rev. § 22-201 cmt. at 113.

topics: (1) the plurality requirement; (2) the agreement requirement; (3) the culpable mental state requirement; (4) impossibility; (5) the overt act requirement; (6) the treatment of non-criminal objectives; (7) penalties; and (8) jurisdictional issues.

RCC § 22E-303(a) (Prefatory Clause): Relation to Current District Law on Plurality Requirement. The prefatory clause of RCC § 22E-303(a) both codifies and clarifies the bilateral approach to conspiracy currently applied in the District.

One fundamental policy issue at the heart of conspiracy liability is whether the offense is bilateral or unilateral in nature. This distinction can be summarized as follows:

> The bilateral approach asks whether there is an agreement between two or more persons to commit a criminal act. Its focus is on the content of the agreement and whether there is a shared understanding between the conspirators. The unilateral approach is not concerned with the content of the agreement or whether there is a meeting of minds. Its sole concern is whether the agreement, shared or not, objectively manifests the criminal intent of at least one of the conspirators.[50]

Under current District law, it is well established that conspiracy is a bilateral, rather than unilateral, offense. The genesis of this approach is the District's general conspiracy statute, which explicitly states that "2 or more persons [must] conspire" to commit an offense.[51] The DCCA, in turn, has observed that this language means what it says, namely, that at least two of the relevant parties must actually agree.[52]

District practice, as captured by the Redbook jury instructions, also reflects a bilateral approach to conspiracy. More specifically, the Redbook states that the government must prove that "an agreement existed between two or more people to commit

---

[50] State v. Pacheco, 125 Wash. 2d 150, 160 (1994).

[51] D.C. Code §§ 22-1805a(1)-(2). Note that a person who merely solicits another to commit a crime of violence is subject to criminal liability under the District's general solicitation statute. See D.C. Code § 22-2107(b) ("Whoever is guilty of soliciting a crime of violence as defined by § 23-1331(4), whether or not such crime occurs, shall be sentenced to a period of imprisonment not exceeding 10 years, a fine not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, or both.") Under District law, a "crime of violence" means:

> aggravated assault; act of terrorism; arson; assault on a police officer (felony); assault with a dangerous weapon; assault with intent to kill, commit first degree sexual abuse, commit second degree sexual abuse, or commit child sexual abuse; assault with significant bodily injury; assault with intent to commit any other offense; burglary; carjacking; armed carjacking; child sexual abuse; cruelty to children in the first degree; extortion or blackmail accompanied by threats of violence; gang recruitment, participation, or retention by the use or threatened use of force, coercion, or intimidation; kidnapping; malicious disfigurement; manslaughter; manufacture or possession of a weapon of mass destruction; mayhem; murder; robbery; sexual abuse in the first, second, or third degrees; use, dissemination, or detonation of a weapon of mass destruction; or an attempt, solicitation, or conspiracy to commit any of the foregoing offenses.

D.C. Code § 23-1331(4).

[52] E.g., McCullough v. United States, 827 A.2d 48, 58 (D.C. 2003); Gibson v. United States, 700 A.2d 776, 779 (D.C. 1997); see De Camp v. United States, 10 F.2d 984, 985 (D.C. Cir. 1926) ("It is true that a conspiracy can only exist between two or more persons, and a single defendant could not be guilty of the crime.").

the crime" that constitutes the object of the conspiracy.[53] This aspect of the jury instructions does not entail proof of "a formal agreement or plan, in which everyone involved sat down together and worked out the details."[54] At the very least, however, the government must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that "there was a common understanding among those who were involved to commit the crime," which constitutes the object of the conspiracy.[55]

Under current District law, therefore, "[t]he existence of an agreement between [the defendant] and at least one other person, in the sense of a 'joint commitment' to a criminal endeavor, is not a mere technicality but 'the fundamental characteristic of a conspiracy.'"[56]

Consistent with the interests of clarity, as well as the preservation of current District law, the RCC codifies this bilateral approach to conspiracy. This is reflected in the prefatory clause of the revised conspiracy statute, which establishes that a person is guilty of a conspiracy to commit an offense when, inter alia, that "actor and at least one other person" satisfy the elements of a conspiracy. This italicized language, drawn from DCCA case law, replaces the "2 or more persons" language employed in the District's current general conspiracy statute.[57] It more clearly communicates the required joint commitment at the heart of the bilateral approach to conspiracy under District law.

RCC § 22E-303(a)(1): Relation to Current District Law on Agreement Requirement. RCC § 22E-303(a)(1) codifies District law relevant to the agreement requirement of a criminal conspiracy.

The agreement constitutes both the "gist of"[58] and "[t]he essential element"[59] of a conspiracy under District law. Absent a statutory clarification of the agreement requirement in D.C. Code § 22-1805a, however, it has fallen to the DCCA to determine the contours of this essential element. The body of case law that has resulted can be subdivided into two different dimensions: (1) substantive (i.e. the principles of liability governing the agreement requirement); and (2) evidentiary (i.e. the kind of proof that will satisfy those principles). This section focuses on the substantive dimension.

The scope of the agreement requirement is quite broad under DCCA case law, encompassing a wide range of conduct. For example, it is well established that a defendant can be deemed to have agreed with others to pursue criminal objectives without "knowing the identity of all the other people . . . participating in the agreement."[60] Nor, for that [53] D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 7.102.

[54] Id.
[55] Id.
[56] In re T.M., 155 A.3d at 413 (Beckwith, J., concurring in part and dissenting in part) (quoting Ocasio v. United States, 136 S. Ct. 1423, 1429 (2016)).
[57] D.C. Code § 22-1805a(a).
[58] Wilson-Bey v. United States, 903 A.2d 818, 841 (D.C. 2006) (en banc) (quotations and citations omitted).
[59] Pearsall v. United States, 812 A.2d 953, 961 (D.C. 2002) (citation omitted).
[60] Thomas v. United States, 748 A.2d 931, 939 (D.C. 2000); Green v. United States, 718 A.2d 1042, 1057 (D.C. 1998); see Irving v. United States, 673 A.2d 1284, 1288 (D.C. 1996) (rejecting appellant's argument that he did not knowingly participate in a conspiracy because he had never been sure with whom he conspired); see also Rogers v. United States, 340 U.S. 367, 375 (1951) ("[A]t least two persons are required to constitute a conspiracy but the identity of the other members of the conspiracy is not needed inasmuch as one person can be convicted of conspiracy with persons whose names are unknown.") (cited in D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 7.102).

matter, does the defendant need to have "agreed to all the details" of a scheme to be deemed to have agreed to pursue its objectives.[61]

Perhaps most importantly, a defendant can be convicted of a conspiracy under District law "even if that person agrees to play only a minor part as long as that person understands the unlawful nature of the plan."[62] This seems to mean that an agreement to aid another in the planning or commission of an offense, just like an agreement to directly commit that offense, can provide the basis for conspiracy liability "provided there is assent to contribute to a common enterprise."[63] Consistent with this principle, proof that a person agreed to participate in "every phase of the criminal venture" is neither a necessary nor essential component of conspiracy liability under District law.[64]

Paragraph (a)(1) of the revised conspiracy statute codifies the above District authorities applicable to understanding the scope of the agreement requirement. Paragraph (a)(1) establishes that an "[a]gree[ment] to engage in or aid the planning or commission" of criminal conduct is sufficient to establish general conspiracy liability under the RCC. This two-part formulation clarifies that agreements to aid (i.e. assist[65]), no less than agreements to directly commit, an offense constitute a sufficient basis for general conspiracy liability. This is consistent with current District law pertaining to the scope of the agreement requirement, and, as such, should preserve current District law pertaining to proof of the agreement requirement.[66]

---

[61] Thomas, 748 A.2d at 939; Green, 718 A.2d at 1057. So, for example, as the DCCA observed in Collins v. United States:

> The formation of a conspiracy to rob does not necessarily require agreement either as to the means of committing the robbery, or as to the particular person to be robbed . . . . Indeed, conspirators may leave room for improvisation or refinement of details so long as they have agreed upon their fundamental goal . . . .

73 A.3d 974, 983 (D.C. 2013) (citations and quotations omitted).

[62] Thomas, 748 A.2d at 939; Green, 718 A.2d at 1057.

[63] Long v. United States, 169 A.3d 369, 378 (D.C. 2017) (quoting United States v. Gardiner, 463 F.3d 445, 457 (6th Cir. 2006)); see, e.g., In re T.M., 155 A.3d at 404 (conspiracy conviction upheld where one party to agreement was "walking with and advising [the other party] on how to evade detection" after shooting); McCoy v. United States, 890 A.2d at 210 (conspiracy conviction upheld where one party to agreement shouted instructions at the other to drive the car in close range of the victim's car in furtherance of shooting); Hairston v. United States, 905 A.2d 765, 784 (D.C. 2006) (conspiracy conviction upheld where defendant "obtain[ed] guns and ammunition and join[ed] efforts to 'catch' members of [rival gang]"); Green, 718 A.2d at 1058 (upholding conspiracy conviction where defendant "joined the agreement with an understanding of its objective and with the intent to assist in its accomplishment").

[64] Long, 2017 WL 4248198, at *7 (quoting Gardiner, 463 F.3d at 457). The fact that agreements which envision accessorial support, no less than agreements to directly commit an offense, fall within the scope of conspiracy liability under District law seems to reflect the fact that concerted criminal activity is a social harm of the "gravest character, sometimes quite outweighing, in injury to the public, the mere commission of the contemplated crime." Wilson-Bey, 903 A.2d at 841 (discussing when "two or more to confederate and combine together to commit or cause to be committed a breach of the criminal laws") (quoting Pinkerton, 328 U.S. at 644).

[65] See generally Tann v. United States, 127 A.3d 400 (D.C. 2015), cert. denied sub nom. Arnette v. United States, No. 16-8523, 2017 WL 1200942 (U.S. May 1, 2017); Johnson v. United States, 883 A.2d 135 (D.C. 2005); Prophet v. United States, 602 A.2d 1087 (D.C. 1992).

[66] As an evidentiary matter, DCCA case law clarifies that the agreement requirement need not be "proven by direct evidence." Mitchell v. United States, 985 A.2d 1125, 1135 (D.C. 2009) (quotations and citations omitted). Instead, they may be—and frequently must be—"inferred from a development and a collocation

RCC § 22E-303(a) & (b): Relation to Current District Law on Culpable Mental State Requirement. RCC § 22E-303(a) and (b) codify and fills gaps in District law concerning the culpable mental state requirement governing a conspiracy.

The precise contours of the culpable mental state requirement applicable to conspiracy under District law are ambiguous. The DCCA has generally recognized that there exists "two separate intents" at issue in conspiracy, "the intent to agree and the intent to achieve the criminal objective."[67] And, consistent with this understanding, the court has repeatedly held that the government is required to prove that the defendant both: (1) "intentionally joined [an] agreement"; and (2) did so "with the intent to advance or further the unlawful object of the conspiracy."[68] Upon closer consideration, however, the actual import of this particular formulation is less than clear.[69]

Consider that the first requirement, an intent to join an agreement, is a relatively insignificant part of any conspiracy offense. It is well established, for example, that "[t]he term 'agree' is commonly understood to include an 'intent to agree,'"[70] and that such an intent is "without moral content."[71] As a result, the larger, and more significant, issue is "what objective the parties intended to achieve by their agreement."[72] This is the issue that the second requirement of the previously quoted District formulation purports to address; it requires the government to prove an "intent to advance or further the unlawful object of the conspiracy."[73] Yet this formulation begs at least two different questions, neither of which is clearly resolved by the case law. First, what does "intent" mean in the context of an "intent to advance or further the unlawful object of the conspiracy"? And second, how does this intent requirement interact with the elements of the target offense, which may, or may not, be considered part of the "unlawful object of the conspiracy"?

---

of circumstances." Id. (noting that evidentiary concerns are particularly significant in conspiracy cases given the difficulty of directly establishing the existence of an agreement.) The relevant circumstances considered by District courts as a matter of course "include the conduct of defendants in mutually carrying out a common illegal purpose, the nature of the act done, the relationship of the parties and the interests of the alleged conspirators." Castillo–Campos v. United States, 987 A.2d 476, 483 (D.C. 2010) (internal quotation marks and alterations omitted).

[67] Green v. United States, 718 A.2d 1042, 1057–58 (D.C. 1998).

[68] Id.; see, e.g., Thomas v. United States, 748 A.2d 931, 939 (D.C. 2000); D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 7.102(2).

[69] Note that other DCCA cases use the phrase "knowing and voluntary participation in the agreement" instead of "intentionally joining an agreement." E.g., Campos-Alvarez v. United States, 16 A.3d 954, 965 (D.C. 2011); In re T.M., 155 A.3d 400, 404 (D.C. 2017); McCullough v. United States, 827 A.2d 48, 58 (D.C. 2003); Gibson v. United States, 700 A.2d 776, 779 (D.C. 1997). These appear to be substantively identical formulations, though one could read the term "participation" in the latter formulation to impose an additional conduct requirement, above and beyond agreement. One problem with such a reading, however, is that it would seem to render the overt act requirement superfluous in the sense that the element of participation would by itself always satisfy the overt act requirement. See generally Commentary to RCC § 22E-303. In any event, as a matter of mens rea, this formulation does not alter the analysis of District law presented in this section. See United States v. Childress, 58 F.3d 693, 709 (D.C. Cir. 1995) (explaining why the "knowing and voluntary participation" language does not alter the fact that conspiracy is a "specific intent" crime).

[70] Paul H. Robinson & Jane A. Grall, Element Analysis in Defining Criminal Liability: The Model Penal Code and Beyond, 35 STAN. L. REV. 681, 752-53 (1983).

[71] WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 12.2 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019).

[72] Id.

[73] McCrae v. United States, 980 A.2d 1082, 1089 (D.C. 2009).

Confounding the first question is the fact that the term "intent" is defined in two different ways by common law authorities. Historically, intent has been "viewed as a bifurcated concept embracing either the specific requirement of purpose," which entails proof of a conscious desire, "or the more general one of knowledge," which entails proof of a belief as to a practical certainty.[74] But there are exceptions to this bifurcated understanding. In specific contexts, for example, intent is employed as a synonym for purpose, thereby excluding knowledge as a viable basis for liability.[75] The law of conspiracy has typically been considered to be one such context by common law authorities.

A careful reading of District authorities suggests that existing District law likely accords with the common law view. For example, as the DCCA—quoting from U.S. Supreme Court case law—observed in Brawner v. United States:

> In certain narrow classes of crimes . . . heightened culpability has been thought to merit special attention . . . . [One] such example is the law of inchoate offenses such as . . . conspiracy, where a heightened mental state separates criminality itself from otherwise innocuous behavior.[76]

Consistent with this understanding of conspiracy as an offense that entails proof of a "heightened mental state," the DCCA has seemingly equated the "intent" at issue in conspiracy with an "unlawful purpose"[77] or "illegal purpose."[78] This kind of purpose-based interpretation also accords with persuasive precedent—cited by the Redbook—from the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit, which explicitly clarifies that "a purposeful state of mind [is] required" for conspiracy.[79]

Also relevant to this issue is the DCCA's observation in McCoy v. United States that "[m]ere [] awareness" is "insufficient to make out a conviction for either aiding and abetting or conspiracy."[80] The requirement of a "purposive attitude" is, as recognized by the DCCA's en banc decision in Wilson-Bey, an essential component of complicity liability under District law.[81] It therefore stands to reason—and is likewise indicated by the McCoy decision—that the same kind of "purposive attitude" is a necessary component of conspiracy liability.

---

[74] United States v. U.S. Gypsum Co., 438 U.S. 422, 445 (1978); see Tison v. Arizona, 481 U.S. 137, 150 (1987).

[75] See United States v. Bailey, 444 U.S. 394, 405 (1980); Model Penal Code § 2.02, cmt. at 125; WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 12.2 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019).

[76] 979 A.2d 1191, 1194 (D.C. 2009) (quoting Bailey, 444 U.S. at 405); see Childress, 58 F.3d at 707–08.

[77] Green v. United States, 718 A.2d 1042, 1058 (D.C. 1998).

[78] Castillo-Campos, 987 A.2d at 483; see also Thomas, 748 A.2d at 934 (for conspiracy requiring proof that the accused "knowingly and intentionally agrees.").

[79] Childress, 58 F.3d at 709; see United States v. Clarke, 24 F.3d 257, 264–65 (D.C. Cir. 1994) (to convict defendants of conspiracy to possess drugs with intent to distribute, "the government had to establish . . . that the defendants purposefully agreed to act in partnership"); see also Commentary to D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 7.102 (citing Childress for the proposition that an erroneous instruction that conspiracy was a "general intent" crime was harmless since the instruction clearly informed the jury that a purposeful state of mind was required).

[80] McCoy v. United States, 890 A.2d 204, 211 (D.C. 2006), as amended (Feb. 23, 2006) (citing Bolden v. United States, 835 A.2d 532, 535 (D.C. 2003); Speight v. United States, 599 A.2d 794, 796-97 (D.C. 1991).

[81] Wilson-Bey v. United States, 903 A.2d 818, 831 (D.C. 2006) (en banc).

Even assuming intent means purpose in the context of the phrase "intent to advance or further the unlawful object of the conspiracy," however, the culpable mental state requirement applicable to conspiracy under District law still remains ambiguous. The reason? It fails to respect the admonition that, as the DCCA observed in Ortberg v. United States, "clear analysis requires that the question of the kind of culpability required to establish the commission of an offense be faced separately with respect to each material element of the crime."[82] To say, for example, that the parties to an agreement must desire to "advance or further the unlawful object of the conspiracy" does not specify whether the requisite purpose requirement applies to the (1) the conduct planned to culminate in that offense; (2) the circumstances surrounding that conduct; or (3) the results, if any, that conduct would cause if carried out.

It seems relatively clear that, at minimum, the parties to the agreement must desire to bring about the conduct planned to culminate in an offense. Less clear, however, is whether and to what extent this purpose requirement—or any other principle of culpable mental state elevation—applies to the results and circumstances of the target offense.

For example, to secure a conviction for conspiracy to commit robbery against a senior citizen, must the government (merely) prove that the parties consciously desired to bring about conduct planned to culminate in the offense (e.g., knocking down and taking the wallet of victim X, who is over the age of 65)? Or, alternatively, must the government also prove that the parties consciously desired the relevant circumstance to exist (e.g., that victim X actually be over the age of 65)?

Likewise, where a target offense involving a result element is involved (e.g., homicide), must the government prove a conscious desire to bring about that result as well? Or, alternatively will a lesser mental state suffice (e.g., could two persons be convicted of conspiracy to commit second-degree murder where they agreed to blow up a housing project they were practically certain to be inhabited if their purpose was the destruction of building, and not to kill any of its inhabitants)?

Existing DCCA case law on conspiracy sheds little light on these issues.[83] The best one can do, then, is look to other legal contexts, where awareness—but likely nothing less than awareness—seems to suffice for liability.

---

[82] Ortberg v. United States, 81 A.3d 303, 307 (D.C. 2013) (citations, quotations, and alterations omitted).

[83] This is perhaps unsurprising given that, under the Pinkerton doctrine, the government can, in many cases, use proof of a conspiracy to commit any offense plus negligence as to the results or circumstances of a greater or distinct offense to secure full liability for the latter offense. See Pinkerton v. United States, 328 U.S. 640 (1946). Here's how the DCCA summarized the Pinkerton doctrine in Wilson-Bey:

> [T]he Pinkerton doctrine provides that "a co-conspirator who does not directly commit a substantive offense may [nevertheless] be held liable for that offense if it was committed by another co-conspirator in furtherance of the conspiracy and was a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the conspiratorial agreement." Gordon v. United States, 783 A.2d 575, 582 (D.C. 2001). Thus, in order to secure a conviction in conformity with Pinkerton, the prosecution must prove that an agreement existed, that a substantive crime was committed by a co-conspirator in furtherance of that agreement, and that the substantive crime was a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the agreement between the conspirators. Pinkerton, 328 U.S. at 646-47, 66 S.Ct. 1180; Gordon, 783 A.2d at 582. The government is not, however, required to establish that the co-conspirator actually aided the perpetrator in the commission of the substantive crime, but only that the crime was committed in furtherance of the conspiracy.

For example, DCCA case law on attempt—described in the Commentary to RCC § 22E-301—appears to indicate that a principle of intent elevation governs the results of the target offense.[84] If true, this would mean that, where an attempt to commit a result element crime is charged, the government must prove that the defendant acted with either a belief that it was practically certain that the person's conduct would cause that result, or, alternatively, that the person consciously desired to cause any results of the target offense—regardless of whether that result is subject to a less demanding culpable mental state.[85] (It would also mean, however, that purpose as to a result, while sufficient, is not necessary for an attempt conviction.[86])

Given that conspiracy, which merely requires proof of an agreement and a mere overt act in furtherance of it,[87] is even more inchoate than attempt, which requires proof of conduct dangerously close to completion,[88] it stands to reason that the culpable mental state requirement applicable to the results of a conspiracy would, at minimum, entail a principle of culpable mental state elevation at least as demanding as that applicable to attempt.[89]

For circumstances, on the other hand, DCCA case law on accomplice liability provides a relevant point of departure. In this context, the DCCA in Robinson v. United States recently observed that—quoting from U.S. Supreme Court case law—"[a]n aiding and abetting conviction requires not just an act facilitating one or another element, but also a state of mind extending to the entire crime . . . . [T]he intent must go to the specific and entire crime charged."[90] It therefore follows, as the Robinson court concluded, that "[a] person cannot intend to aid an armed offense if she is unaware a weapon will be involved."[91]

The Robinson decision indicates that, whatever the culpable mental state governing the circumstances of the target offense, a person cannot be deemed an accomplice of that offense without knowledge (or perhaps a belief) that they existed—regardless of whether a less demanding culpable mental state, such as recklessness or negligence, will suffice to establish to target offense.[92] (It also indicates, however, that a purpose requirement does not govern the circumstances of the target offense when charged under a complicity theory.[93])

Given that accomplice liability requires proof that the target offense was completed—whereas conspiracy liability does not—it stands to reason that the culpable

---

903 A.2d at 840. Note that the Pinkerton doctrine, while requiring proof of the elements of a conspiracy, is actually a theory of complicity. JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 30.08 (6th ed. 2012). Therefore, it is not addressed in this Report, but will instead be considered alongside accomplice liability in the CCRC's forthcoming work on complicity. The provisions that comprise RCC § 22E-303 neither preclude nor necessitate continued recognition of the Pinkerton doctrine.

[84] See Explanatory Note to RCC § 22E-301.

[85] See id.

[86] See id.

[87] See WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.5 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019); JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 27.07 (6th ed. 2012).

[88] Robinson v. United States, 608 A.2d 115, 116 (D.C. 1992) (citing Iannelli v. United States, 420 U.S. 770, 786 n.17 (1975).

[89] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.01 cmt. at 408-09.

[90] Robinson, 100 A.3d at 105–06 (quoting Rosemond v. United States, 134 S. Ct. 1240, 1249 (2014)).

[91] Id.

[92] See id.

[93] See Rosemond, 134 S. Ct. at 1249.

mental state requirement applicable to the circumstances of a conspiracy would, at minimum, entail principles of culpable mental state elevation that are at least as demanding as those applicable to those of accomplice liability.[94]

One question left open by this analysis is whether an even more demanding principle of purpose elevation might apply to the results and circumstances of the target offense when a conspiracy is charged.[95] While purpose elevation is possible,[96] it's hard to see why anything more demanding than intent as to the results and circumstances of the target offense should be necessary to ground a conspiracy conviction as a policy matter.[97]

In accordance with this section's analysis of District law, subsections (a) and (b) codify the culpable mental state requirement of conspiracy as follows. Paragraph (a)(2) establishes that the culpability required for a criminal conspiracy necessarily incorporates "the culpability required for the [target] offense." Paragraph (a)(1) establishes a requirement of purpose applicable to both the agreement itself as well as to the conduct envisioned by the agreement, i.e. the parties must "[p]urposely agree to engage in or aid the planning or commission" of criminal conduct. These requirements are consistent with current District law on conspiracy.

Finally, subsection (b) establishes that the "defendant and at least one other person" must both: (1) "[i]ntend to cause all result elements required for that offense"; and (2) "[i]ntend for all circumstance elements required for that offense to exist." This language incorporates dual principles of culpable mental state elevation[98] applicable whenever the target offense is comprised of a result or circumstance that may be satisfied by proof of a non-intentional mental state (i.e. recklessness or negligence), or none at all (i.e. strict liability).[99] In this case, proof of intent on behalf of two or more parties is required. These

---

[94] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.01 cmt. at 408-09.

[95] But see Rosemond, 134 S. Ct. at 1249.

[96] But see Childress, 58 F.3d at 707–08; compare with Clarke, 24 F.3d at 264–65 and United States v. Haldeman, 559 F.2d 31, 112 (D.C. Cir. 1976).

[97] The following example is illustrative. Environmental activists X and Y agree to blow up a coal-processing facility during the evening/afterhours when only a single person, the on-duty night guard, V, will be present. Both X and Y are practically certain that V will die from the blast, though they'd very much prefer that V not be injured. The police intercede right before X and Y are able to set off the explosives, thereby saving V's life. On these facts, both X and Y should be able to be convicted of conspiracy to commit (knowing) murder, premised on the fact that their agreement was accompanied by: (1) a desire to engage in conduct, which, if carried out, would have culminated in murder (i.e. blowing up the facility); and (2) their awareness as to a practical certainty that such conduct would result in V's death. See Paul H. Robinson & Jane A. Grall, Element Analysis in Defining Criminal Liability: The Model Penal Code and Beyond, 35 STAN. L. REV. 681, 757 (1983) ("When causing a particular result is an element of the object offense and such result does not occur, the actor, to be liable for conspiracy under Subsection (1), must have the purpose or belief that the conduct contemplated by the agreement will cause such result."). See also Model Penal Code § 5.03 cmt. at 408 ("[I]t would not be sufficient, as it is under the attempt provisions of the Code, if the actor only believed that the result would be produced but did not consciously plan or desire to produce it.").

[98] Note that for those target offenses that already require proof of intent, knowledge, or purpose as to any result or circumstance, subsection (b) does not elevate the applicable culpable mental state for a conspiracy charge.

[99] Importantly, neither of these principles of culpable mental state elevation precludes the government from charging conspiracies to commit target offenses comprised of result or circumstance elements subject to recklessness, negligence, or strict liability. However, to secure a conspiracy conviction for such offenses, proof that the parties to the agreement acted with the intent to cause every result and circumstance element that constitutes the target offense is necessary.

two policies fill a gap in the District law of conspiracy in a manner that is broadly consistent with District law applicable in other relevant contexts.

RCC § 22E-303(a)(1): Relation to Current District Law on Impossibility. RCC § 22E-303(a)(1) fills gaps in District law pertaining to the relevance of impossibility to conspiracy prosecutions in a manner that is consistent with the District approach to impossibility in the context of attempt prosecutions.

The issue of impossibility arises in the conspiracy context wherein two or more parties agree to engage in or facilitate conduct that would culminate in a consummate criminal offense if—but only if—the conditions were as they perceived them. In this kind of situation, one or more parties charged with conspiracy might argue that liability should not attach due to the fact that, by virtue of a mistake concerning the surrounding conditions, completion of the target offense was impossible.[100] If presented with such a claim, the court would then have to determine whether and to what extent the particular kind of mistake rendering the criminal objective at the heart of a conspiracy prosecution impossible constitutes a defense.

There does not appear to be any District legal authority governing this particular kind of situation. No District statute speaks directly to the relationship between conspiracy and impossibility, and the DCCA does not appear to have published any opinions addressing it either.[101] The closest issue that District law addresses is the relationship between attempt and impossibility.

The commentary to RCC § 22E-301 provides a detailed discussion of the relevant legal trends in the District concerning this issue.[102] Generally speaking, impossibility is not a defense to an attempt charge under District law. In practical effect, this means that the fact that a criminal undertaking fails because of a defendant's mistaken beliefs concerning the situation in which he or she acts is typically deemed to be irrelevant for purposes of assessing attempt liability.

This broad rejection of impossibility claims extends to two different situations: (1) those involving pure factual impossibility, i.e. where "the intended substantive crime is impossible of accomplishment [] because of some physical impossibility unknown to the defendant"[103]; and (2) those involving hybrid impossibility, i.e. where the object of an agreement is illegal, but commission of the target offense is impossible due to a factual mistake regarding the legal status of some attendant circumstance that constitutes an

[100] See WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.5 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019); JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 27.07 (6th ed. 2012).
[101] See also WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 12.4 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019) (noting that "the issue of impossibility has been dealt with in the law of attempts . . . with much greater frequency").
[102] See Explanatory Note to RCC § 22E-301.
[103] In re Doe, 855 A.2d 1100, 1106 (D.C. 2004) (citing German v. United States, 525 A.2d 596, 606 n.20 (D.C. 1987) and WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.5 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019). Impossibility of this nature may result from the defendant's mistake as to the victim: consider, for example, a pickpocket who is unable to consummate the intended theft because, unbeknownst to her, she picked the pocket of the wrong victim (namely, one whose wallet is missing). See JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 27.07 (6th ed. 2012). Alternatively, impossibility of this nature may also result from the defendant's mistake as to the means of commission: consider, for example, the situation of a murderer-for-hire who is unable to complete the job because, unbeknownst to him, his murder weapon malfunctions. See id.

element of the target offense.[104] The reason for this broad rejection of impossibility is that in either of these situations, the defendant's "conduct, intent, culpability, and dangerousness are all exactly the same."[105]

At the same time, the District law of attempts also appears to recognize a narrow exception to this general rejection of impossibility. More specifically, it appears that impossibility may constitute a defense where the defendant's conduct is not "reasonably adapted" to completion of the target offense.[106] So, for example, if a person attempts to kill another by "invok[ing] witchcraft, charms, incantations, maledictions, hexing or voodoo," such conduct could not "constitute an attempt to murder since the means employed are not in any way adapted to accomplish the intended result."[107] By requiring a basic relationship between the defendant's conduct and the criminal objective sought to be achieved, this reasonable adaptation requirement would seem to both preclude convictions for inherently impossible attempts[108] and limits the risk that innocent conduct will be misconstrued as criminal.[109]

These impossibility principles recognized by the DCCA in the attempt context are relevant to understanding contours of conspiracy liability under District law for two reasons. First, it's at least possible that these principles have actually been statutorily incorporated into the District's law of conspiracy. More specifically, the District's general conspiracy statute criminalizes conspiracies to commit any "crime of violence."[110] The

---

[104] JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 27.07 (6th ed. 2012); see In re Doe, 855 A.2d at 1106. Illustrative scenarios of hybrid impossibility involve defendants caught in police sting operations. Consider, for example, the prosecution of a defendant who sends illicit photographs to a person he believes to be an underage female, but who is actually an undercover police officer, for attempted distribution of obscene material to a minor. See People v. Thousand, 631 N.W.2d 694 (Mich. 2001).

[105] In re Doe, 855 A.2d at 1106.

[106] See, e.g., Seeney v. United States, 563 A.2d 1081, 1083 (D.C. 1989); Thompson v. United States, 678 A.2d 24, 27 (D.C. 1996); Williams v. United States, 966 A.2d 844, 848 (D.C. 2009); Doreus v. United States, 964 A.2d 154, 158 (D.C. 2009); Corbin v. United States, 120 A.3d 588, 602 n.20 (D.C. 2015).

[107] Edwin R. Keedy*, Criminal Attempts at Common Law*, 102 U. PA. L. REV. 464, 469 (1954). As explained in the commentary to RCC § 22E-301(a), there's no DCCA case law specifically addressing these kinds of issues. However, this is not surprising since attempt prosecutions premised upon "inherently impossible" attempts of this nature "seldom confront the courts." WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.5 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019). Nevertheless, the DCCA has affirmatively upheld attempt convictions in impossibility cases based upon the premise that the defendant's conduct was reasonably adapted to commission of an offense. See, e.g., Seeney, 563 A.2d at 1083; Thompson, 678 A.2d at 27. The implication, then, is that where a defendant's conduct is not reasonably adapted to commission of an offense—as would be the case with attempted murder by means of witchcraft—attempt liability could not attach.

[108] An inherently impossible attempt is one "where any reasonable person would have known from the outset that the means being employed could not accomplish the ends sought." WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.5 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019). An illustrative example is an attempt to kill implemented by means of witchcraft, incantation, or any other superstitious practice.

[109] This conclusion is also consistent with the DCCA's policy rationale for generally rejecting impossibility defenses. For example, in In re Doe, the DCCA rejected an impossibility defense on the rationale that "[w]hether the targeted victim is a child or an undercover agent, the defendant's conduct, intent, culpability, and dangerousness are all exactly the same." 855 A.2d at 1106. Where, however, a person attempts to commit a crime by means not otherwise reasonably adapted to commission of the target offense—for example, where the defendant's sole means of enticing a child is by performing a witchcraft ceremony in his own home—this rationale does not hold since the person's conduct and dangerousness seem qualitatively different.

[110] D.C. Code § 22-1805a(a) establishes in relevant part:

latter category, in turn, is defined by D.C. Code § 23-1331 to include "attempt[s]" to commit a long list of designated offenses.[111] When viewed collectively, then, the possibility of liability for a conspiracy to attempt a crime of violence could be understood to cover impossible conspiracies.[112]

Second, and perhaps more important, is that the policy considerations relevant to the resolution of impossibility claims are the same whether in the context of attempt liability or conspiracy liability. Indeed, if anything, the policy considerations that weigh against recognizing impossibility claims in the attempt context weigh even more heavily in favor against recognizing impossibility claims in the conspiracy context.[113]

With these considerations in mind, and given the interests of clarity, consistency, and proportionality, the RCC applies the same approach to impossibility in the context of

---

> (2) If 2 or more persons conspire to commit a crime of violence as defined in § 23-1331(4), each shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 nor the maximum fine prescribed for the offense, the commission of which was the object of the conspiracy, whichever is less, or imprisoned not more than 15 years nor the maximum imprisonment prescribed for the offense, the commission of which was the object of the conspiracy, whichever is less, or both.

[111] More specifically, D.C. Code § 23-1331 "defines" a crime of violence by reference to a list of offenses so designated, which includes criminal attempts:

> (4) The term "crime of violence" means aggravated assault; act of terrorism; arson; assault on a police officer (felony); assault with a dangerous weapon; assault with intent to kill, commit first degree sexual abuse, commit second degree sexual abuse, or commit child sexual abuse; assault with significant bodily injury; assault with intent to commit any other offense; burglary; carjacking; armed carjacking; child sexual abuse; cruelty to children in the first degree; extortion or blackmail accompanied by threats of violence; gang recruitment, participation, or retention by the use or threatened use of force, coercion, or intimidation; kidnapping; malicious disfigurement; manslaughter; manufacture or possession of a weapon of mass destruction; mayhem; murder; robbery; sexual abuse in the first, second, or third degrees; use, dissemination, or detonation of a weapon of mass destruction; or an attempt, solicitation, or conspiracy to commit any of the foregoing offenses.

D.C. Code § 23-1331(4) (emphasis added).

[112] For a discussion of federal case law on conspiracy to attempt, see Ira P. Robbins, Double Inchoate Crimes, 26 HARV. J. ON LEGIS. 1, 60 (1989).

[113] As one court has framed the point:

> The case has been argued as though, for purposes of the defense of impossibility, a conspiracy charge is the same as a charge of attempting to commit a crime. It seems that such an equation could not be sustained, however, because . . . a conspiracy charge focuses primarily on the intent of the defendants, while in an attempt case the primary inquiry centers on the defendants' conduct tending toward the commission of the substantive crime. The crime of conspiracy is complete once the conspirators, having formed the intent to commit a crime, take any step in preparation; mere preparation, however, is an inadequate basis for an attempt conviction regardless of the intent . . . Thus, the impossibility that the defendants' conduct will result in the consummation of the contemplated crime is not as pertinent in a conspiracy case as it might be in an attempt prosecution.

State v. Moretti, 52 N.J. 182, 187 (1968).

attempts—itself a codification of current District law—to impossibility in the context of conspiracy. This outcome is achieved by means of incorporation. Paragraph (a)(1) establishes, in relevant part, that agreements to directly engage in or provide accessorial support to conduct that, if carried out, would merely constitute an "attempt to commit an offense" can also provide the basis for general conspiracy liability. This reference to attempts imports the broad abolition of impossibility claims employed in the RCC's general attempt provision into the conspiracy context.[114] Under this approach, it is generally immaterial that the agreed-upon criminal scheme could never have succeeded under the circumstances.[115] So long as the parties agreed to bring about conduct that would have culminated in an offense if "the situation was as [the parties] perceived it" then conspiracy liability may attach,[116] provided that the agreed-upon plan of action was at least "reasonably adapted" to commission of the target offense.[117]

RCC § 22E-303(a)(2): Relation to Current District Law on Overt Act Requirement. RCC § 22E-303(a)(2) both codifies and clarifies current District law on the overt act requirement.

It is well established under District law that proof of a bilateral agreement to commit a crime and the requisite intent is not, by itself, sufficient to secure a conviction for conspiracy. Rather, "[u]nder D.C. law, a conspiracy requires proof of both agreement and action."[118] The latter component of action is reflected in the overt act requirement, which is expressly codified by the District's general conspiracy statute.

More specifically, D.C. Code § 22-1805a(b) states that: "No person may be convicted of conspiracy unless an overt act is alleged and proved to have been committed by 1 of the conspirators pursuant to the conspiracy and to effect its purpose."[119] Construing this language, the DCCA has held that the overt act requirement entails proof that "during the life of the conspiracy, and in furtherance of its objective, the commission by at least one conspirator of at least one of the overt acts specified in the indictment."[120]

This overt act requirement often is not difficult to satisfy as a matter of practice.[121] In contrast to the conduct requirement of an attempt, for example, the DCCA has observed that conspiracy's overt act requirement "is far less exacting; a preparatory act, innocent in

[114] Under RCC § 22E-301(a)(4)(B), a person commits an attempt if, inter alia, he or she "engages in conduct that . . . [w]ould have come dangerously close to completing that offense if the situation was as the actor perceived it." Subparagraph (a)(3) of the statute further requires that the person's conduct must have been "reasonably adapted to completion of that offense."
[115] See RCC § 22E-301, Explanatory Note ("Reliance on the defendant's perspective renders the vast majority of impossibility claims immaterial by authorizing an attempt conviction under circumstances in which the person's conduct would have been dangerously close to committing an offense had the person's view of the situation been accurate.").
[116] RCC § 22E-301(a)(4)(B);.
[117] RCC § 22E-301..
[118] Gilliam v. United States, 80 A.3d 192, 208 (D.C. 2013) (quoting Gibson v. United States, 700 A.2d 776, 779 (D.C. 1997).
[119] D.C. Code § 22-1805a(b).
[120] Hairston v. United States, 905 A.2d 765, 784 (D.C. 2006); see, e.g., Mitchell v. United States, 985 A.2d 1125, 1135 (D.C. 2009). Likewise, the District's criminal jury instructions further clarify that this overt act must have been committed "for the purpose of carrying out the conspiracy." D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 7.102.
[121] See, e.g., Hairston, 905 A.2d at 784; Mitchell, 985 A.2d at 1135.

itself, may be sufficient."[122] All the same, it seems clear from both case law and statute that the overt act requirement is nevertheless an element of the offense of conspiracy.[123]

Consistent with these legal authorities, the RCC codifies the overt act requirement reflected in current District law. The relevant language employed in RCC § 22E-303(a)(2) requires proof that "[o]ne of the parties to the agreement engages in an overt act in furtherance of the agreement." This language is intended to be substantively identical to that employed in D.C. Code § 1805a(b); however, two clarifying revisions bear notice.

First, the phrase "alleged and proved," employed in D.C. Code § 1805a(b), is omitted as superfluous. This is a product of the fact that the RCC incorporates the overt act requirement into the definition of a conspiracy, rather than treating it through a separate subsection as is presently the case under D.C. Code § 1805a(b). Due to this reorganization, it is clear that the overt act requirement is an element of a conspiracy under the RCC. There is, then, no need to affirmatively state that the overt act requirement is entitled to the same procedural protections afforded to any other element of an offense.

Second, the phrase "pursuant to the conspiracy and to effect its purpose," employed in D.C. Code § 1805a(b), is replaced with the phrase "in furtherance of the agreement" under RCC § 22E-303(a)(3). This substitution more accessibly communicates the contours of the overt act requirement in District law.[124]

RCC §§ 22E-303(a) and (b) (Generally): Relation to Current District Law on Agreements to Achieve Non-Criminal Objectives. RCC §§ 22E-303(a) and (b) clarify, but may also change, District law by excluding non-criminal objectives from the scope of general conspiracy liability.

Under current District law, agreements to engage in non-criminal objectives also provide the basis for conspiracy liability under limited circumstances. This is a product of the fact that the District's general conspiracy statute criminalizes conspiring "either to commit a criminal offense or to defraud the District of Columbia or any court or agency thereof in any manner or for any purpose."[125] As the DCCA recently explained in Long v. United States: "The use of the word "either" in the conspiracy statute envisions two types of conspiracies: (1) a conspiracy to defraud the District of Columbia or any court or agency; and (2) a conspiracy to commit a specific offense."[126]

The contours of conspiracy to defraud liability under District law are ill defined. The relevant statutory language seems to expand criminal liability beyond that provided

---

[122] Robinson v. United States, 608 A.2d 115, 116 (D.C. 1992) (citing Iannelli v. United States, 420 U.S. 770, 786 n.17 (1975)).

[123] See, e.g., Mitchell, 985 A.2d at 1135. Note, however, that while D.C. Code § 1805a(b) requires for an overt act to be "alleged and proved," the DCCA has observed that "the overt act requirement is not a part of the 'corpus delicti' of conspiracy," which is to say the "body, substance or foundation of the crime." Irving v. United States, 673 A.2d 1284, 1288 (D.C. 1996). Rather, as the court in Irving v. United States phrased it: "The substance of the crime of conspiracy is knowing participation in an agreement to accomplish an unlawful act; the requirement of an overt act is merely an evidentiary prophylactic." Id. at 1288. This is relevant for evidentiary reasons. See Bellanger v. United States, 548 A.2d 501, 502–03 (D.C. 1988) (holding that proof of overt act is not required to support admission of evidence of statement of coconspirator during course of conspiracy).

[124] See, e.g., Hairston, 905 A.2d at 784; Mitchell, 985 A.2d at 1135.

[125] D.C. Code § 22-1805a(1).

[126] Long v. United States, 169 A.3d 369, 376 (D.C. 2017) (citing Eaglin v. District of Columbia, 123 A.3d 953, 956 (D.C. 2015)).

for by a charge of conspiracy to commit fraud (e.g., it seems to cover forms of fraud that would not be criminal if committed by a single individual). Just how far this expansion is intended to go, however, is unclear: the relevant statutory language is quite vague,[127] while reported conspiracy cases premised on "defraud[ing] the District of Columbia or any court or agency" appear to be exceedingly rare. At minimum, though, relevant case law clarifies that such language is capacious enough to encompass at least some public corruption schemes.

For example, in United States v. Lewis, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit (CADC) upheld a conviction for conspiracy to defraud under the District's general conspiracy statute where the defendant, the owner of a restaurant-bar, agreed with two government officials to a scheme in which the officials would pressure a shopping center to provide the defendant with a lease to a liquor store in exchange for a portion of that store's profits.[128] In so doing, the CADC held that the District's general conspiracy statute covers "conspiring to defraud the District of Columbia of its lawful governmental functions including its right to have the disinterested official services of [the defendants], and its right to have its business conducted honestly."[129]

The DCCA's recent decision in Long v. United States is similarly in accordance.[130] In that case, the Court of Appeals upheld a conviction for conspiracy to defraud based upon the defendant's participation in a public corruption scheme, wherein he agreed to: (1) serve as the driver for a mayoral candidate paid off the books in order to avoid campaign finances laws; and (2) arrange a meeting for one mayoral candidate to endorse another in exchange for some form of compensation.[131]

Aside from these two decisions, the contours of the conspiracy to defraud prong of D.C. Code § 22-1805a are undefined by existing case law. At the same time, there is general support in the case law for the proposition that the conspiracy to defraud prong of D.C. Code § 22-1805a should be construed in accordance with the comparable prong in the federal conspiracy statute, 18 U.S.C. § 371, which criminalizes conspiracies "to defraud the United States, or any agency thereof in any manner or for any purpose." For example, the CADC in Lewis observed that:

> Though the legislative history does not expressly indicate Congress's desire to model the D.C. provision after the federal provision, the similarity of language and the routine construction of D.C.'s local statutes in accord with their federal counterparts lend strong support to the view that the D.C. provision should be interpreted along the lines of the federal provision.[132]

---

[127] See generally Abraham S. Goldstein, Conspiracy to Defraud the United States, 68 YALE L.J. 405, 414 (1959) (noting that similar language in the federal conspiracy to defraud statute is extremely vague).

[128] United States v. Lewis, 716 F.2d 16, 22-23 (D.C. Cir. 1983). Having been convicted by the federal trial court of conspiracy to defraud under the District's general conspiracy statute, the defendant argued on appeal that his conviction ought to be overturned because the conspiracy to defraud prong of that statute "should be limited to fraud on the government involving money or property and not be read to reach fraud which impairs governmental functions." Id. at 23.

[129] Id.

[130] Long v. United States, 169 A.3d 369, 376 (D.C. 2017).

[131] See id.

[132] Lewis, 716 F.2d at 23 (citing Dennis v. United States, 384 U.S. 855, 859-864 (1966); Hammerschmidt v. United States, 265 U.S. 182, 188 (1924)).

Likewise, the DCCA's Long decision seems to be consistent with this reading. In that case, the court observed that the federal conspiracy statute "contains essentially the same language as the District's statute," and, therefore, indicated that it should be construed in accordance with the federal statute.[133]

Assuming the breadth of these two provisions are identical, however, raises a host of problems. As further discussed below,[134] the federal conspiracy to defraud provision is oft-criticized for the use of language that is "shadowy" at best.[135] The relevant ambiguities, in turn, have produced criminal liability of "such broad and imprecise proportions as to trench . . . the standards of fair trial and on constitutional prohibitions against vagueness and double jeopardy."[136] In light of these problems, today "most states provide that the object of a criminal conspiracy must be some crime, or some felony."[137]

Given these policy and practice considerations, and consistent with the interests of clarity and consistency, the RCC's general conspiracy provision excludes any reference to conspiracies "to defraud the District of Columbia or any court or agency thereof in any manner or for any purpose." RCC §§ 22E-303(a) and (b) are instead limited to agreements to commit criminal "offenses," including the revised and expanded fraud offense.[138] This exclusion will ensure that the RCC clearly communicates the elements of general conspiracy liability. This change may—but need not necessarily—circumscribe the limits of conspiracy liability under District law.[139]

RCC §§ 22E-303(c): Relation to Current District Law on Conspiracy Penalties. Subsection (c) establishes a uniform and proportionate grading scheme for criminal conspiracies, which clarifies, simplifies, and changes District law.

The D.C. Code's general conspiracy statute, D.C. Code § 22-1805a, establishes a default penalty framework for conspiracy offenses comprised of two basic rules. First, conspiracies to commit offenses other than "crimes of violence" are punishable by a maximum of 5 years incarceration, "except that if the object of the conspiracy is a criminal offense punishable by less than 5 years, the maximum penalty for the conspiracy shall not exceed the maximum penalty provided for that offense."[140] And second, conspiracies to

---

[133] Long v. United States, 169 A.3d 369, 376 (D.C. 2017).
[134] See Explanatory Note to RCC § 22E-303(a) & (b).
[135] Abraham S. Goldstein, Conspiracy to Defraud the United States, 68 YALE L.J. 405, 408 (1959); see In re McBride, 602 A.2d 626, 633 (D.C. 1992) (citing id.).
[136] Abraham S. Goldstein, Conspiracy to Defraud the United States, 68 YALE L.J. 405, 408 (1959) .
[137] WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 12.3 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019).
[138] By implication, conspiracy liability does not attach to agreements to engage in conduct that would not otherwise be criminal if committed by an individual.
[139] Whether this constitutes a change in law depends, first, upon whether there is a meaningful policy difference between conspiring to "defraud the District of Columbia or any court or agency thereof in any manner or for any purpose" under current law, and conspiring to commit the revised fraud statute. Assuming the answer to this question is yes, then the existence of a change in law depends upon, second, whether the RCC codifies a specific public corruption conspiracy offense, which might otherwise fill the foregoing gap in liability.
[140] See D.C. Code § 22-1805a(a)(1) ("If 2 or more persons conspire either to commit a criminal offense or to defraud the District of Columbia or any court or agency thereof in any manner or for any purpose, each shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both, except that if the object of the conspiracy is a criminal offense punishable by less than 5 years, the maximum penalty for the conspiracy shall not exceed the maximum penalty provided for that offense.").

commit "crimes of violence"[141] are punishable by a maximum of either "15 years []or the maximum imprisonment prescribed for the offense, the commission of which was the object of the conspiracy, whichever is less, or both."[142]

Notwithstanding these two generally applicable rules, numerous District statutes communicate important penalty exceptions. Some of these exceptions are communicated through the penalty provisions governing conspiracies to commit individual or certain groupings of offenses. Illustrative provisions include the D.C. Code provisions setting forth penalties for conspiracies to commit: (1) various drug-related offenses[143]; (2) the

---

Note that this provision also subjects conspiracies "to defraud the District of Columbia or any court or agency thereof in any manner or for any purpose" to a maximum 5-year penalty. Interpreting this language, the DCCA has observed that:

> The use of the word "either" in the conspiracy statute envisions two types of conspiracies: (1) a conspiracy to defraud the District of Columbia or any court or agency; and (2) a conspiracy to commit a specific offense. See Eaglin v. District of Columbia, 123 A.3d 953, 956 (D.C. 2015) ("If the plain meaning of statutory language is clear and unambiguous and will not produce an absurd result, we will look no further." (citation, internal quotation marks, and brackets omitted)). The statute also contemplates a default five-year maximum prison term for conspiracy, except if the charge is a conspiracy to commit a specific offense and the specific offense alleged has a lower maximum prison term than five years. See D.C. Code § 22–1805a(a)(1).

Long v. United States, 169 A.3d 369, 375–77 (D.C. 2017) (upholding conspiracy to defraud charge, and concomitant five year statutory maximum, notwithstanding the "fact that the government could have charged appellant with a misdemeanor conspiracy to commit the specific offense of funding and concealing contributions to Mayoral Campaign A in excess of those permitted under the Campaign Finance Reform Act") (citing District of Columbia v. Economides, 968 A.2d 1032, 1036 (D.C. 2009) ("[T]he decision of whether or not to prosecute, and what charges to file . . . generally rests entirely in the prosecutor's discretion.").

[141] D.C. Code § 23-1331(4) ("The term 'crime of violence' means aggravated assault; act of terrorism; arson; assault on a police officer (felony); assault with a dangerous weapon; assault with intent to kill, commit first degree sexual abuse, commit second degree sexual abuse, or commit child sexual abuse; assault with significant bodily injury; assault with intent to commit any other offense; burglary; carjacking; armed carjacking; child sexual abuse; cruelty to children in the first degree; extortion or blackmail accompanied by threats of violence; gang recruitment, participation, or retention by the use or threatened use of force, coercion, or intimidation; kidnapping; malicious disfigurement; manslaughter; manufacture or possession of a weapon of mass destruction; mayhem; murder; robbery; sexual abuse in the first, second, or third degrees; use, dissemination, or detonation of a weapon of mass destruction; or an attempt, solicitation, or conspiracy to commit any of the foregoing offenses.").

[142] See D.C. Code § 22-1805a(a)(2) ("If 2 or more persons conspire to commit a crime of violence as defined in § 23-1331(4), each shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 nor the maximum fine prescribed for the offense, the commission of which was the object of the conspiracy, whichever is less, or imprisoned not more than 15 years nor the maximum imprisonment prescribed for the offense, the commission of which was the object of the conspiracy, whichever is less, or both.").

[143] See D.C. Code § 48-904.09 ("Any person who attempts or conspires to commit any offense defined in this subchapter is punishable by imprisonment or fine or both which may not exceed the maximum punishment prescribed for the offense, the commission of which was the object of the attempt or conspiracy.").

manufacture or possession of a weapon of mass destruction[144]; and (3) the use, dissemination, or detonation of a weapon of mass destruction.[145]

Other exceptions to the District's general conspiracy penalty rules are communicated through incorporation of the term "conspires" into the definition of a given offense, effectively providing that a conspiracy to commit that offense is subject to the same punishment as the completed offense. Illustrative provisions in the D.C. Code include the statutory definitions of (1) kidnapping,[146] (2) criminal violations of fiduciary obligations,[147] and (3) corrupt election practices.[148]

Collectively, the District's scattered approach to penalizing conspiracies presents two main problems: (1) it lacks a consistent grading principle; and (2) it is confusingly communicated. With respect to the first problem, at least two fundamentally different grading patterns appear in the penalties governing conspiracies to commit both crimes of violence and non-violent crimes under the D.C. Code.

The first grading pattern, which might be referred to as a "significant punishment discount," is reflected in the numerous District conspiracy offenses subject to statutory maxima that are significantly less severe than (typically half) the statutory maxima governing the completed offense.

A penalty discount of this nature is perhaps most clearly reflected in the grading of conspiracies to commit various non-violent crimes. For example, whereas the statutory

---

[144] See D.C. Code § 22-3154(b) ("A person who attempts or conspires to manufacture or possess a weapon of mass destruction capable of causing multiple deaths, serious bodily injuries to multiple persons, or massive destruction of property may, upon conviction, be punished by imprisonment for not more than 30 years.")

[145] See D.C. Code § 22-3155(b) ("A person who attempts or conspires to use, disseminate, or detonate a weapon of mass destruction capable of causing multiple deaths, serious bodily injuries to multiple persons, or massive destruction of property may, upon conviction, be punished by imprisonment for not more than 30 years.").

[146] See D.C. Code § 22-2001 ("If 2 or more individuals enter into any agreement or conspiracy to do any act or acts which would constitute a violation of the provisions of this section, and 1 or more of such individuals do any act to effect the object of such agreement or conspiracy, each such individual shall be deemed to have violated the provisions of this section.").

[147] See D.C. Code § 21-591 ("Whoever: (1) without probable cause for believing a person to be mentally ill: (A) causes or conspires with or assists another person to cause the hospitalization, under this chapter, of the person first referred to; or (B) executes a petition, application, or certificate pursuant to this chapter, by which he secures or attempts to secure the apprehension, hospitalization, detention, or restraint of the person first referred to; or (2) causes or conspires with or assists another person to cause the denial to a person of a right accorded to him by this chapter; or (3) being a physician, psychiatrist or qualified psychologist, knowingly makes a false certificate or application pursuant to this chapter as to the mental condition of a person -- shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in [§ 22-3571.01] or imprisoned not more than three years, or both.").

[148] See D.C. Code § 1-1001.14 (a-1)(1) ("A person shall not knowingly or willfully: (A) Pay, offer to pay, or accept payment of any consideration, compensation, gratuity, reward, or thing of value for registration to vote or for voting; (B) Give false information as to his or her name, address, or period of residence for the purpose of establishing his eligibility to register or vote, that is known by the person to be false; (C) Procure or submit voter registration applications that are known by the person to be materially false, fictitious, or fraudulent; (D) Procure, cast, or tabulate ballots that are known by the person to be materially false, fictitious, or fraudulent; or (E) Conspire with another individual to do any of the above."); id. at § (a)(2) ("A person who violates paragraph (1) of this subsection shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than $10,000, be imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both.").

maxima for felony property offenses such as first degree theft,[149] first degree fraud,[150] and first degree financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult or elderly person[151] are set at 10 years, a conspiracy to commit any of those offenses is subject to the 5 year default rule governing conspiracies to commit non-crimes of violence under the general conspiracy statute.[152] In addition, the 7-year statutory maximum applicable to first degree receiving stolen property[153] is reduced to 5 years under this default rule.[154] And the 10-year statutory maxima applicable to second degree cruelty to children,[155] as well as the 20-year statutory maximum applicable to felony threats,[156] are also reduced to five years under the first default rule.[157] (Neither of these offenses is a crime of violence.[158])

A pattern of significant punishment discounting can also be seen in the penalties governing numerous conspiracies to commit crimes of violence. For example, whereas first-degree murder[159] and second-degree murder[160] are both potentially subject to a sentence of life in prison under the D.C. Code, a conspiracy to commit either of those offenses is subject to the 15 year default rule governing conspiracies to commit crimes of violence under the general conspiracy statute.[161] Likewise, the 30 year statutory maxima applicable to first degree burglary[162] is also reduced to 15 years under the default rule governing conspiracies to commit crimes of violence.[163]

These significantly discounted conspiracy penalties are to be contrasted with those that reflect a grading pattern that might be referred as "equal punishment," namely, they

---

[149] D.C. Code § 22-3212(a) ("Any person convicted of theft in the first degree shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned for not more than 10 years, or both, if the value of the property obtained or used is $1,000 or more.").
[150] D.C. Code § 22-3221(a)(1) ("Any person convicted of fraud in the first degree shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or twice the value of the property obtained or lost, whichever is greater, or imprisoned for not more than 10 years, or both, if the value of the property obtained or lost is $1,000 or more . . . .").
[151] D.C. Code § 22-936.01(a) ("Any person who commits the offense of financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult or elderly person in violation of § 22-933.01 shall be subject to the following criminal penalties . . . When the value of the property or legal obligation is $1,000 or more, a fine of not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, or imprisonment for not more than 10 years, or both.").
[152] D.C. Code § 22-1805a(a)(1).
[153] D.C. Code § 22-3232(c)(1) ("Any person convicted of receiving stolen property shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not more than 7 years, or both, if the value of the stolen property is $1,000 or more.").
[154] See D.C. Code § 22-1805a(a)(1).
[155] D.C. Code § 22-1101(b)(2) ("Any person convicted of cruelty to children in the second degree shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or be imprisoned not more than 10 years, or both.").
[156] D.C. Code § 22-1810 ("Whoever threatens within the District of Columbia to kidnap any person or to injure the person of another or physically damage the property of any person or of another person, in whole or in part, shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not more than 20 years, or both.").
[157] See D.C. Code § 22-1805a(a)(1).
[158] See D.C. Code § 23-1331(4).
[159] D.C. Code § 22-2104(a)("The punishment for murder in the first degree shall be not less than 30 years nor more than life imprisonment without release . . . .").
[160] D.C. Code § 22-2104(c) ("Whoever is guilty of murder in the second degree shall be sentenced to a period of incarceration of not more than life . . . .").
[161] See D.C. Code § 22-1805a(a)(2).
[162] D.C. Code § 22-801(a) ("Burglary in the first degree shall be punished by imprisonment for not less than 5 years nor more than 30 years.").
[163] See D.C. Code § 22-1805a(a)(2).

subject conspiracies to the same statutory maximum governing the completed offense. The D.C. Code is comprised of numerous conspiracy offenses that effectively equalize the sanction for conspiracies, though the D.C. Council has authorized this outcome in a variety of ways.

Most explicit is the District's semi-general penalty provision for drug crimes, D.C. Code § 48-904.09, which broadly states that conspiracies to commit drug crimes may be punished as seriously as completed drug crimes.[164] In practical effect, this means that, inter alia, conspiracies to manufacture, distribute, or possess, with intent to manufacture or distribute, a Schedule I or II controlled substance are subject to the same 30 statutory maximum governing the completed offense.[165]

A pattern of equal punishment is also apparent in those District offenses that statutorily incorporate the term "conspires" into their statutory definition. Illustrative provisions in the D.C. Code include the statutory definitions of (1) kidnapping,[166] (2) criminal violations of fiduciary obligations,[167] and (3) corrupt election practices.[168]

Numerous other District conspiracy offenses exhibit a pattern of equal punishment through more convoluted means. For example, the District's while armed enhancement applies the same flat 30-year statutory maximum add-on to numerous crimes, without regard to whether the underlying crime is completed or merely attempted, through the D.C. Code's definition of "crimes of violence" and "dangerous crimes."[169]

---

[164] D.C. Code § 48-904.09 ("Any person who attempts or conspires to commit any offense defined in this subchapter is punishable by imprisonment or fine or both which may not exceed the maximum punishment prescribed for the offense, the commission of which was the object of the attempt or conspiracy[.]").

[165] See D.C. Code § 48-904.01(2)(A) ("Any person who violates this subsection with respect to . . . A controlled substance classified in Schedule I or II that is a narcotic or abusive drug shall be imprisoned for not more than 30 years or fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, or both.").

[166] See D.C. Code § 22-2001 ("If 2 or more individuals enter into any agreement or conspiracy to do any act or acts which would constitute a violation of the provisions of this section, and 1 or more of such individuals do any act to effect the object of such agreement or conspiracy, each such individual shall be deemed to have violated the provisions of this section.").

[167] See D.C. Code § 21-591 ("Whoever: (1) without probable cause for believing a person to be mentally ill: (A) causes or conspires with or assists another person to cause the hospitalization, under this chapter, of the person first referred to; or (B) executes a petition, application, or certificate pursuant to this chapter, by which he secures or attempts to secure the apprehension, hospitalization, detention, or restraint of the person first referred to; or (2) causes or conspires with or assists another person to cause the denial to a person of a right accorded to him by this chapter; or (3) being a physician, psychiatrist or qualified psychologist, knowingly makes a false certificate or application pursuant to this chapter as to the mental condition of a person -- shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in [§ 22-3571.01] or imprisoned not more than three years, or both.").

[168] See D.C. Code § 1-1001.14 (a-1)(1) ("A person shall not knowingly or willfully: (A) Pay, offer to pay, or accept payment of any consideration, compensation, gratuity, reward, or thing of value for registration to vote or for voting; (B) Give false information as to his or her name, address, or period of residence for the purpose of establishing his eligibility to register or vote, that is known by the person to be false; (C) Procure or submit voter registration applications that are known by the person to be materially false, fictitious, or fraudulent; (D) Procure, cast, or tabulate ballots that are known by the person to be materially false, fictitious, or fraudulent; or (E) Conspire with another individual to do any of the above."); id. at § (a)(2) ("A person who violates paragraph (1) of this subsection shall, upon conviction, be fined not more than $10,000, be imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both.").

[169] More specifically, D.C. Code § 22–4502(a)(1) establishes that anyone who commits a violent or dangerous crime:

In addition, conspiracies to commit second degree fraud,[170] unauthorized use of a motor vehicle,[171] and blackmail[172] (not involving a threat of violence[173]) are all subject to the same 5-year penalty as the completed offense by virtue of the default rule applicable to non-violent crimes in the general conspiracy statute.[174] And, along similar lines, conspiracies to commit the least severe forms of theft,[175] fraud,[176] receiving stolen property,[177] financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult or elderly person,[178] and assault[179] are all subject to the same 180-day penalty as the completed offense (again) by virtue of the default rule applicable to non-violent crimes in the general conspiracy statute.[180]

Finally, conspiracies to commit first degree cruelty to children,[181] second degree burglary,[182] and robbery[183] are all subject to the same 15-year statutory maximum

---

> May, if such person is convicted for the first time of having so committed a crime of violence, or a dangerous crime in the District of Columbia, be sentenced, in addition to the penalty provided for such crime, to a period of imprisonment which may be up to, and including, 30 years for all offenses . . . and shall, if convicted of such offenses while armed with any pistol or firearm, be imprisoned for a mandatory-minimum term of not less than 5 years . . . .

See D.C. Code § 23-1331(4) ("The term 'crime of violence' means . . . [a] conspiracy to commit any of the foregoing [enumerated] offenses.").

[170] D.C. Code § 22-3221(b)(1) ("Any person convicted of fraud in the second degree shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or twice the value of the property which was the object of the scheme or systematic course of conduct, whichever is greater, or imprisoned for not more than 3 years, or both, if the value of the property which was the object of the scheme or systematic course of conduct is $1,000 or more . . . .").

[171] D.C. Code § 22-3215(d)(1) ("[A] person convicted of unauthorized use of a motor vehicle under subsection (b) of this section shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, imprisoned for not more than 5 years, or both.").

[172] D.C. Code § 22-3252 (b) ("Any person convicted of blackmail shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned for not more than 5 years, or both.").

[173] See D.C. Code § 23-1331(4).

[174] See D.C. Code § 22-1805a(a)(1).

[175] D.C. Code § 22-3212(b) ("Any person convicted of theft in the second degree shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned for not more than 180 days, or both, if the property obtained or used has some value.").

[176] D.C. Code § 22-3222(b)(2) ("Any person convicted of fraud in the second degree shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned for not more than 180 days, or both, if the property that was the object of the scheme or systematic course of conduct has some value.").

[177] D.C. Code § 22-3232(c)(2) ("Any person convicted of receiving stolen property shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not more than 180 days, or both, if the stolen property has some value.").

[178] D.C. Code § 22-936.01(a) ("Any person who commits the offense of financial exploitation of a vulnerable adult or elderly person in violation of § 22-933.01 shall be subject to the following criminal penalties . . . . When the property or legal obligation has some value, a fine of not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, or imprisonment for not more than 180 days, or both.").

[179] D.C. Code § 22-404 ("Whoever unlawfully assaults, or threatens another in a menacing manner, shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or be imprisoned not more than 180 days, or both.").

[180] See D.C. Code § 22-1805a(a)(1).

[181] D.C. Code § 22-1101(c)(1) ("Any person convicted of cruelty to children in the first degree shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or be imprisoned not more than 15 years, or both.").

[182] D.C. Code § 22-801(b) ("Burglary in the second degree shall be punished by imprisonment for not less than 2 years nor more than 15 years.").

[183] D.C. Code § 22-2801 ("Whoever by force or violence, whether against resistance or by sudden or stealthy seizure or snatching, or by putting in fear, shall take from the person or immediate actual possession of applicable to the completed offense by virtue of the default rule applicable to violent crimes under the District's general conspiracy statute.[184]

Viewed as a whole, then, the District's approach to grading criminal conspiracies does not reflect any consistent principle of punishment. Indeed, the D.C. Code manifests at least two fundamentally different patterns in how it grades conspiracies, without any discernible rationale for the variances. In practical effect, this produces a penalty scheme which authorizes the imposition of sentences that are, at least in relation to one another, quite disproportionate.

At the same time, these potential disproportionalities are not immediately apparent given the second fundamental flaw reflected in the District law of conspiracies, namely, its disorganized approach to codification. For example, notwithstanding the fact that the District's general conspiracy statute purports to articulate the District's overarching penalization scheme, the D.C. Code contains numerous exceptions to these rules. Further, the manner in which these exceptions are communicated is quite inconsistent: some are communicated through individual penalty provisions incorporated into a single offense; others are communicated through semi-general conspiracy penalty provisions that apply to groups of offenses; and still other exceptions are communicated by including the word "conspires" in the definition of the offense.

RCC § 22E-303(c) endeavors to remedy these issues by establishing a clear and consistent approach to grading conspiracies, which renders offense penalties more proportionate: a proportionate penalty discount under which the statutory maximum and fine for a conspiracy is set at one-half of the statutory maximum and fine of the completed offense. This general principle is similarly applicable to criminal attempts and criminal solicitations under the RCC.

RCC §§ 22E-303(d), (e), and (f): Relation to Current District Law on Jurisdiction. Subsections (d), (e), and (f) are in accord with, but may also fill a potential gap in, current District law governing jurisdiction in conspiracy prosecutions.

The District's general conspiracy statute currently contains two provisions, D.C. Code §§ 22-1805a(c) and (d), which address separate jurisdictional issues. The relevant statutory provisions read:

> (c) When the object of a conspiracy contrived within the District of Columbia is to engage in conduct in a jurisdiction outside the District of Columbia which would constitute a criminal offense under an act of Congress applicable exclusively to the District of Columbia if performed therein, the conspiracy is a violation of this section if:
>
> (1) Such conduct would also constitute a crime under the laws of the other jurisdiction if performed therein; or another anything of value, is guilty of robbery, and any person convicted thereof shall suffer imprisonment for not less than 2 years nor more than 15 years. In addition to any other penalty provided under this section, a person may be fined an amount not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01.").

[184] See D.C. Code § 22-1805a(a)(2).

> (2) Such conduct would constitute a criminal offense under an act of Congress exclusively applicable to the District of Columbia even if performed outside the District of Columbia.
>
> (d) A conspiracy contrived in another jurisdiction to engage in conduct within the District of Columbia which would constitute a criminal offense under an act of Congress exclusively applicable to the District of Columbia if performed within the District of Columbia is a violation of this section when an overt act pursuant to the conspiracy is committed within the District of Columbia. Under such circumstances, it is immaterial and no defense to a prosecution for conspiracy that the conduct which is the object of the conspiracy would not constitute a crime under the laws of the other jurisdiction.[185]

The general import of these provisions, enacted as part of the District of Columbia Court Reform and Criminal Procedure Act of 1970, is relatively clear: they proscribe basic jurisdictional principles for dealing with conspiracies formed inside the District to commit crimes outside the District, D.C. Code § 22-1805a(c), as well as for conspiracies formed outside the District to commit crimes inside the District, D.C. Code § 22-1805a(d). However, there is scant District authority illuminating the precise meaning of these provisions. Relevant legislative history in the House Committee Report only indicates a general recognition that this language was "modeled" on the law of conspiracy in New York, "rather than Federal law, because of the need for greater specificity in a statute applicable to a geographically limited area within the United States."[186]

One issue that both the statutory text and legislative history leave unclear is whether and to what extent D.C. Code §§ 22-1805a(c) and (d) were intended to apply to criminal offenses passed by the D.C. Council. The lack of clarity on this issue is a product of the fact that D.C. Code §§ 22-1805a(c) and (d) make continuous reference to "an act of

---

[185] D.C. Code §§ 22-1805a(c)-(d).

[186] DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA COURT REFORM AND CRIMINAL PROCEDURE ACT OF 1970: REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ON THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA ON H.R. 16196, at 66 (March 13, 1970). The relevant provision in the New York Penal Code reads:

> 1. A person may be prosecuted for conspiracy in the county in which he entered into such conspiracy or in any county in which an overt act in furtherance thereof was committed.
>
> 2. An agreement made within this state to engage in or cause the performance of conduct in another jurisdiction is punishable herein as a conspiracy only when such conduct would constitute a crime both under the laws of this state if performed herein and under the laws of the other jurisdiction if performed therein.
>
> 3. An agreement made in another jurisdiction to engage in or cause the performance of conduct within this state, which would constitute a crime herein, is punishable herein only when an overt act in furtherance of such conspiracy is committed within this state. Under such circumstances, it is no defense to a prosecution for conspiracy that the conduct which is the objective of the conspiracy would not constitute a crime under the laws of the other jurisdiction if performed therein.

N.Y. Penal Law § 105.25.

Congress applicable exclusively to the District of Columbia." This phrasing reflects the pre-Home Rule reality that, when the relevant jurisdictional provisions were enacted in 1970, local criminal laws were written by Congress. Since Home Rule, however, the D.C Council has been responsible for passing nearly all of the District's criminal laws.[187] Which raises the following question: are conspiracies to commit such offenses, enacted by the D.C. Council, covered by the jurisdictional provisions set forth in D.C. Code §§ 22-1805a(c) and (d)?[188]

There does not appear to be any case law addressing this particular issue, and the reported decisions even mentioning these jurisdictional provisions is scant.[189] However, the one DCCA case directly addressing them, Gilliam v. United States, seems to provide indirect support for the proposition that conspiracies to commit offenses enacted by the D.C. Council might be covered by the relevant jurisdictional provisions.[190] After quoting to the text of D.C. Code § 22-1805a(d), for example, the Gilliam decision states that:

> We understand this provision to mean that when a prosecution for conspiracy is predicated on an agreement made in another jurisdiction, the government must prove that an overt act pursuant to the conspiracy was committed within the District of Columbia in order to prove the offense.[191]

Notably absent from this statement is any reference to conspiracies to commit offenses specifically passed by Congress; instead, the court merely references "a prosecution for

---

[187] See, e.g., D.C. Code § 22-3002 (sexual abuse); D.C. Code § 22-3053 (revenge porn).

[188] Note that D.C. Code §§ 22-1805a(c)-(d) do not purport to address jurisdiction over all conspiracy prosecutions, only those where: (1) "the object of a conspiracy contrived within the District of Columbia is to engage in conduct in a jurisdiction outside the District of Columbia"; or (2) "[a] conspiracy [is] contrived in another jurisdiction to engage in conduct within the District of Columbia"); see Gilliam v. United States, 80 A.3d 192, 209-10 (D.C. 2013) (noting that these provisions address two particular situations).

[189] See United States v. Lewis, 716 F.2d 16, 23 (D.C. Cir. 1983) (noting that the "venue and jurisdiction" provisions of D.C. Code § 22-1805a reflect the "necessity of greater specificity in a statute applicable to a geographically limited area within the United States").

[190] At issue in Gilliam were indictments charging "that appellants entered into an agreement within the District of Columbia to murder [the victim]" in Maryland. 80 A.3d at 192. More specifically, the indictments alleged that the appellants "committed nine overt acts during and in furtherance of that conspiracy—four acts in Maryland [] and five acts in the District[]." Id. At trial, the court instructed the jury that "proof of any one of [these overt acts] would support a conviction for conspiracy." Id. The appellants were thereafter convicted by the jury. On appeal, the appellants argued that "the trial court improperly allowed the jury to convict them for conspiracy based solely on acts occurring outside the District of Columbia over which . . . the Superior Court lacked jurisdiction." Id. at 209. The DCCA ultimately agreed, deeming it "plausible that the jury relied solely on overt acts in Maryland in convicting appellants of conspiracy." Id.

[191] Id. at 209–10. The DCCA ultimately concluded that the foregoing "statutory requirement was overlooked" by the trial court given that:

> the jury could have convicted appellants of conspiracy based solely on a finding that they entered into an agreement in Maryland and that they committed an overt act in Maryland—i.e. without finding any conspiratorial agreement made or joined, or overt act committed, within the District of Columbia.

Id.

conspiracy."[192] (That said, such a reference would not have been necessary because the charge at issue in the Gillam case was conspiracy to commit murder.)

Lastly, in 2009 the D.C. Council amended the District's general conspiracy statute to more severely punish conspiracies "to commit a crime of violence as defined in § 23-1331(4)."[193] The latter category of offenses specifically includes a variety of crimes enacted by the D.C. Council since Home Rule.[194] With that in mind, it seems unlikely that the D.C. Council would have declined to revise the relevant jurisdictional provisions had they been understood to exclude many of the very offenses that were receiving enhanced penalties under the Omnibus Public Safety and Justice Amendment Act.

Subsections (d), (e), and (f) accord with the previously discussed District authorities. These three subsections recodify D.C. Code §§ 22-1805a(c) and (d), making one potential change to District law and three kinds of non-substantive revisions to the current statutory text.

The potential change is that the revised jurisdictional provisions replace the phrase "an act of Congress applicable exclusively to the District of Columbia" with a reference to "the statutory laws of the District." This definitively resolves the issue discussed above: conspiracies to commit offenses enacted by the D.C. Council are explicitly covered by the jurisdictional provisions set forth in D.C. Code §§ 22-1805a(c) and (d). It is unlikely this constitutes a departure from current District law, but, to the extent it does, it fills an unjustifiable (and likely unintended) gap created by the advent of home rule in the District.

The three kinds of non-substantive revisions, which improve the clarity and consistency of current District law governing jurisdiction in conspiracy prosecutions, are as follows. First, the revised jurisdictional provisions rephrase the current jurisdictional provisions in a more accessible manner. For example, the legalistic term "contrived," employed in both D.C. Code §§ 22-1805a(c) and (d), is replaced with the simpler term "formed" in both RCC §§ 22E-303(d) and (e).

Second, the revised jurisdictional provisions reorganize the current jurisdictional provisions in a more intuitive way. For example, the substantive requirement that the relevant conduct "constitute a criminal offense under an act of Congress applicable exclusively to the District of Columbia if performed therein," employed in both D.C. Code

---

[192] Id.

[193] This new penalty provision was part of the Omnibus Public Safety and Justice Amendment Act of 2009. See D.C. Law 18-88, § 209, 56 DCR 7413, 2009 District of Columbia Laws 18-88 (Dec. 10, 2009).

[194] Under District law, a "crime of violence" means:

> aggravated assault; act of terrorism; arson; assault on a police officer (felony); assault with a dangerous weapon; assault with intent to kill, commit first degree sexual abuse, commit second degree sexual abuse, or commit child sexual abuse; assault with significant bodily injury; assault with intent to commit any other offense; burglary; carjacking; armed carjacking; child sexual abuse; cruelty to children in the first degree; extortion or blackmail accompanied by threats of violence; gang recruitment, participation, or retention by the use or threatened use of force, coercion, or intimidation; kidnapping; malicious disfigurement; manslaughter; manufacture or possession of a weapon of mass destruction; mayhem; murder; robbery; sexual abuse in the first, second, or third degrees; use, dissemination, or detonation of a weapon of mass destruction; or an attempt, solicitation, or conspiracy to commit any of the foregoing offenses.

D.C. Code § 23-1331(4). Many of these offenses—for example, aggravated assault, carjacking, sexual abuse, and child sex abuse, among others—were enacted by the D.C. Council.

§§ 22-1805a(c) and (d), is broken out into its own separate subsection in both RCC §§ 22E-303(d) and (e). In addition, the clarification stated in D.C. Code § 22-1805a(d)—that "it is immaterial and no defense to a prosecution for conspiracy that the conduct which is the object of the conspiracy would not constitute a crime under the statutory laws of the other jurisdiction" where the substantive requirements stated in subsection (e) are met—is placed in its own subsection, RCC § 22E-303(f).

Third, the revised jurisdictional provisions rephrase the current jurisdictional provisions in a more descriptively accurate manner. For example, the vague use of "therein" employed throughout D.C. Code §§ 22-1805a(c) and (d) is replaced with a more specific reference to the relevant location in both RCC §§ 22E-303(d) and (e).

When viewed collectively, RCC §§ 22E-303(d), (e), and (f) both improve upon and preserve current District law governing jurisdiction in conspiracy prosecutions.

RCC § 22E-304. Limitation on Vicarious Liability for Conspirators.

Explanatory Note. This section specifies that a party to a criminal conspiracy under RCC § 22E-303 may not be held liable for a criminal act of another party to the conspiracy unless an independent basis of liability is established under the RCC provisions concerning accomplice liability, liability for causing crime by an innocent actor, or liability for criminal solicitation, or under a District statute that otherwise expressly specifies such liability to exist. This section negates existing District case law recognizing what is commonly referred to as the Pinkerton doctrine.

Subsection (a) specifies that a person who commits a criminal conspiracy as defined under RCC § 22E-303 is not liable for a criminal offense committed by another participant in the conspiracy, unless an independent basis for liability is established in one of two ways. This subsection codifies that there is no general, vicarious liability for co-conspirators while recognizing that other statutes may provide a basis for vicarious liability. As used here, "criminal conspiracy" refers to the crime defined under RCC § 22E-303, whether or not another person is charged with or convicted of such a crime.

Paragraphs (a)(1) and (a)(2) include two alternative circumstances in which an actor may be held liable for the acts committed by another participant in the conspiracy. Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that a person may be vicariously liable for an offense committed by another party to the conspiracy if that person satisfies requirements for criminal liability specified in RCC §§ 22E-210, 22E-211, or 22E-302. These sections specify the requirements for accomplice liability, liability for causing crime by an innocent actor, and solicitation. A person has vicarious liability for an offense committed by a co-conspirator if these other bases of liability satisfied, and a prosecution may proceed under one or more of these bases of liability. Subsection (a) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "in fact" specified in subsection (a) applies to the elements in paragraph (a)(1) and there is no culpable mental state for the fact that the actor satisfies the requirements for criminal liability in RCC §§ 22E-210, 22E-211, or 22E-302.

Paragraph (a)(2) provides, in the alternative, that a person may be held liable for an offense committed by another party to the conspiracy if another statutory provision expressly specifies that a person may be liable for a criminal offense committed by a fellow party to a conspiracy. A prosecution may proceed under such a statutorily-specified basis of liability. Subsection (a) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "in fact" specified in subsection (a) applies to the elements in paragraph (a)(2) and there is no culpable mental state for the fact that another statute expressly specifies that a party to a conspiracy may be held criminally liable for an offense committed by another party to the conspiracy.

Relation to Current District Law. RCC § 22E-304 changes current District law by barring general, vicarious liability for the substantive crimes of a co-conspirator.

The current D.C. Code does not provide general, vicarious liability for the substantive crimes of a co-conspirator. A person may be subject to vicarious liability for actions of another under the current conspiracy statute, D.C. Code § 22–1805a, under the aiding and abetting statute, D.C. Code § 22–1805, or under the statute for soliciting a crime of violence D.C. Code § 22–2107. However, District case law has established that, in addition to conspiracy, accomplice, and solicitation liability, a person can be held liable for the substantive offenses committed by a co-conspirator when such a crime was in furtherance of the conspiracy and reasonably foreseeable.[1] This District case law follows the U.S. Supreme Court ruling in Pinkerton v. United States that a party to a conspiracy to violate federal crimes in the Internal Revenue Code may be held liable for a criminal offense committed by another party to the conspiracy if the offense is in furtherance of the conspiracy, and was reasonably foreseeable.[2] This theory of liability has become commonly known as the Pinkerton doctrine, and has been adopted by many United States jurisdictions[3] (though several jurisdictions have rejected the approach[4]).

RCC § 22E-304 supersedes District case law expanding criminal liability under the Pinkerton doctrine. Beyond the liability a person faces for entering into a conspiracy, soliciting another to commit a crime or acting as an accomplice, the doctrine imposes additional liability for criminal offenses committed by others in a manner that arguably results in either improper punishment for the acts of another or double punishment for the conspiracy.[5] Under Pinkerton, a person who is party to a conspiracy may be held liable for any reasonably foreseeable crimes committed by other parties in furtherance of the conspiracy. This effectively lowers the requisite mental state for the other offense to negligence, the least culpable mental state codified under the RCC.[6] Consequently, a person may be held liable for a crime committed by another under Pinkerton, even if that person did not intend, or have any suspicion, that another party to the conspiracy would commit an additional offense in furtherance of the conspiracy.[7] This approach may be

---

[1] Wilson–Bey v. United States, 903 A.2d 818, 840 (D.C.2006) (en banc) (quoting Gordon v. United States, 783 A.2d 575, 582 (D.C.2001)) (""a co-conspirator who does not directly commit a substantive offense may [nevertheless] be held liable for that offense if it was committed by another co-conspirator in furtherance of the conspiracy and was a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the conspiratorial agreement").

[2] Pinkerton v. United States, 328 U.S. 640, 647-48 (1946).

[3] E.g., Minn. Stat. § 609.05; Tex. Penal Code Ann. § 7.02; Wis. Stat. § 939.05. State v. Walton, 630 A.2d 990, 998-99 (Ct 1993); People v. Bell, 447 N.E.2d 909, 916 (Ill. App. Ct. 1983); Smith v. State, 549 N.E.2d 1036, 1038 (Ind. 1990); State v. Tyler, 840 P.2d 413, 424 (Kan. 1992); State v. Stein, 360 A.2d 347, 358 (N.J. 1976); Commonwealth v. Roux, 350 A.2d 867, 871-72 (Pa. 1976); State v. Kukis, 237 P. 476, 481 (Utah 1925).

[4] E.g., Ala. Code § 13A-4-3; HRS § 702-22; Mont. Code Ann. § 45-2-302; N.H. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 626:8. State ex rel. Woods v. Cohen, 844 P.2d 1147, 1151 (Ariz. 1992); People v. McGee, 399 N.E.2d 1177, 1182 (N.Y. 1979); State v. Lind, 322 N.W.2d 826, 841-42 (N.D. 1982); State v. Stein, 27 P.3d 184, 189 (2001).

[5] See, e.g., Pinkerton, 328 U.S. at 649-650 ("If [the Pinkerton doctrine] does not violate the letter of constitutional right, it fractures the spirit.") (J. Rutledge dissenting).

[6] See, e.g., Alex Kreit, Vicarious Criminal Liability and the Constitutional Dimensions of Pinkerton, 57 Am. U. L. Rev. 585, 589 (2008) ("The 'reasonably foreseeable' requirement, for instance, imposes a minimum mens rea of negligence for vicarious liability stemming from a conspiracy"). Commentators have argued that the "reasonable foreseeability" requirement "provid[es] no meaningful limits on vicarious liability." Mark Noferi, Towards Attenuation: A "New" Due Process Limit on Pinkerton Conspiracy Liability, 33 Am. J. Crim. L. 91, 113 (2006).

[7] For example, A and B agree to distribute a controlled substance. Unbeknownst to A, B decides to kill rival C in order to increase the volume of sales. Under the Pinkerton theory, A could be held liable for murder, even though he did not kill anyone, or know that B intended to kill anyone.

consistent with some civil law standards for imposing liability,[8] but has been sharply criticized for being inconsistent with culpable mental state requirements throughout American criminal law.[9]

The Pinkerton doctrine contrasts sharply with RCC § 22E-210, which defines the requirements for accomplice liability in the RCC, and current District law regarding accomplice liability. Under RCC § 22E-210, an actor may be held liable for a criminal offense committed by another only if the actor "acts with the culpability required for that offense."[10] This reflects well established District case law requiring that an accomplice has "the culpable mental state required for the underlying crime committed by the principal."[11] In addition, accomplice liability requires that the actor purposely assists or encourages the principal to engage in conduct constituting the offense. Only when these stringent mental state requirements are satisfied can a person be held liable as an accomplice to another person's criminal conduct. Pinkerton, by contrast imposes liability for criminal offenses committed by others while lowering the requisite culpable mental state.[12]

Consider the following hypothetical. A and B agree to run an illegal bookmaking operation. Without informing B, A decides to take out the competition by severely beating a rival bookmaker C with a weapon, demanding that he stop taking bets. B did not know that A was going to beat C, and had no intent that the bookmaking operation would lead to violence. Nonetheless, under the Pinkerton doctrine, B could be held liable for felony assault and is subject to the same penalties as if he had beaten C himself, provided that A's conduct was reasonably foreseeable and in furtherance of the conspiracy. Although B acted culpably by entering into the conspiracy in the first place, the penalties provided for criminal conspiracy under RCC § 22E-303 adequately provide a proportionate penalty.

RCC § 22E-304 changes current District law by reversing DCCA case law that recognizes the Pinkerton doctrine. This change improves the proportionality of the revised criminal statutes.

---

[8] See, e.g., George P. Fletcher, Rethinking Criminal Law 663 (1978) (noting that while vicarious liability "might make some sense in the field of torts . . . it is patently absurd to think of conspirators controlling each other's acts.").

[9] See, e.g., Matthew A. Pauley, The Pinkerton Doctrine and Murder, 4 Pierce L. Rev. 1, 3 (2005) ("the Pinkerton rule, is one of the most controversial doctrines in modern criminal law"); Wayne LaFave, § 13.3(a)Complicity and conspiracy distinguished, 2 Subst. Crim. L. § 13.3(a) (3d ed.) (noting "the Pinkerton rule never gained broad acceptance").
Both the Model Penal Code and proposed revised Federal criminal code reject Pinkerton liability. Proposed New Federal Criminal Code § 401 (1971) expressly provides that if one is a co-conspirator he is also liable as an accomplice only if the usual requirements are met.

[10] RCC § 22E-210.

[11] Tann v. United States, 127 A.3d 400, 444-45 (D.C. 2015).

[12] Although Pinkerton requires that the actor was negligent as to the additional offense, nearly all criminal offenses in the RCC require at least recklessness. See Elonis v. United States, 135 S. Ct. 2001, 2009 (2015) ("[O]ur cases have explained that a defendant generally must 'know the facts that make his conduct fit the definition of the offense,' even if he does not know that those facts give rise to a crime. (Internal citation omitted)").

RCC § 22E-305. Exceptions to General Inchoate Liability.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes two exceptions to the RCC general inchoate offenses of criminal solicitation (RCC § 22E-302) and criminal conspiracy (RCC § 22E-303).[1]

Paragraph (a)(1) excludes the victim of an offense from being held liable for soliciting its commission under RCC § 22E-302 or conspiring in its commission under RCC § 22E-330.[2] For example, a minor who asks an adult to engage in sex may technically satisfy the requirements of general solicitation liability in the sense of having purposefully requested that adult to commit statutory rape.[3] And if that adult accepts the solicitation, then the minor may technically satisfy the requirements of general conspiracy liability under the RCC in the sense of having purposefully agreed to the commission of statutory rape.[4] Nevertheless, paragraph (a)(1) precludes holding the minor criminally liable for soliciting or conspiring in the commission of the minor's own victimization under sections 302 and 303 of the RCC.[5] Subsection (a) uses "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207,

---

[1] Within American criminal law, there are a range of situations where "an actor may technically satisfy the requirements of an offense definition, yet be of a class of persons that was not in fact intended to be included within the scope of the offense." PAUL H. ROBINSON, 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 83 (Westlaw 2019). Two such situations arise in the context of the general inchoate crimes of solicitation and conspiracy where: (1) the would-be solicitor/conspirator is also a victim of the target offense; and (2) the criminal objective of the would-be solicitor/conspirator is inevitably incident to commission of the target offense. Id.

Sometimes, the exceptions to general inchoate liability available to these classes of individuals are stated or discussed directly. See, e.g., Ark. Code Ann. § 5-3-103(a) ("It is a defense to a prosecution for solicitation or conspiracy to commit an offense that: (1) The defendant is a victim of the offense; or (2) The offense is defined so that the defendant's conduct is inevitably incident to the commission of the offense."); JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 29.09(D)(1) (6th ed. 2012) ("A person may not be convicted of conspiracy to violate an offense if her conviction would frustrate a legislative purpose to exempt her from prosecution for the underlying substantive crime.").

More common (though less clear), however, is for these exceptions to be articulated by reference to the comparable exceptions governing legal accountability from which they've been derived. See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.04(2) ("It is a defense to a charge of solicitation or conspiracy to commit a crime that if the criminal object were achieved, the actor would not be guilty of a crime under the law defining the offense or as an accomplice[.]"); Model Penal Code § 2.06(6)(a) ("Unless otherwise provided by the Code or by the law defining the offense, a person is not an accomplice in an offense committed by another person if . . . he is a victim of that offense; or [] the offense is so defined that his conduct is inevitably incident to its commission[.]"); WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 12.4 (3d ed., Westlaw 2017) ("[O]ne who is in a legislatively protected class and thus could not even be guilty as an accessory of the crime which is the objective is likewise not guilty of conspiracy to commit that crime.").

Both the statutory text of the revised statute and this commentary employ the first (and clearer) approach of directly addressing the relevant exceptions to general inchoate liability, without express reliance on the parallel exclusions from liability for conduct of another person that otherwise exist under the RCC. See RCC § 22E-211 (Criminal liability for conduct by an innocent or irresponsible person).

[2] This rule effectively exempts from general inchoate liability those who might otherwise satisfy the general requirements of solicitation or conspiracy in relation to the commission of the offense perpetrated against themselves. See, e.g., PAUL H. ROBINSON, 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 83 (Westlaw 2019); JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 29.09(D)(1) (6th ed. 2012); Alan C. Michaels, Fastow and Arthur Andersen: Some Reflections on Corporate Criminality, Victim Status, and Retribution, 1 OHIO ST. J. CRIM. L. 551, 562 (2004).

[3] See RCC § 22E-302(a) (criminal solicitation defined).

[4] See RCC § 22E-303(a) (criminal conspiracy defined).

[5] See, e.g., JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 29.09(D)(1) (6th ed. 2012) ("[I]n the absence of express legislative authority to the contrary, if a male and an underage female have sexual to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "in fact" specified in subsection (a) applies to the elements in paragraph (a)(1) and there is no culpable mental state required for the fact that the person is a victim of the target offense.

Paragraph (a)(2) excludes a person whose criminal objective is inevitably incident to commission of an offense—as defined by statute[6]—from being held liable for soliciting or conspiring to commit that offense.[7] For example, a prospective purchaser who intercourse, the female may not be convicted as an accomplice in her own "victimization." [] And, because underage females [] cannot be convicted as accomplices[], they are also immune from prosecution for conspiracy to commit [statutory rape] upon themselves."); In re Meagan R., 42 Cal. App. 4th 17, 21–22 (1996) (minor "cannot be liable as [a] coconspirator to the crime of her own statutory rape"). This same exception would also apply to many other kinds of "people who are victims of the underlying offense—such as, for example, a person who agrees to pay money to an extortionist, thereby technically entering into a 'conspiracy' with the extortionist." Commentary on Proposed Del. Crim. Code § 705 (2017). Although those "who pay extortion, blackmail, or ransom monies" can be understood to have agreed to "significantly assist[] in the commission of the crime," the fact they are the "victim of a crime" means that they "may not be indicted" on conspiracy or solicitation charges. United States v. Southard, 700 F.2d 1, 19 (1st Cir. 1983) (analyzing comparable exceptions in the context of complicity).

---

[6] That the person's criminal objective must be inevitably incident to commission of an offense as defined by statute clarifies that paragraph (a)(2) only applies when the target offense could not have been committed without the defendant's planned participation under any set of facts. This is to be distinguished from the situation of a defendant whose planned participation was merely useful or conducive to the commission of target offense as charged in a particular case. See, e.g., WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 13.3 (3d ed., Westlaw 2017) (In applying the inevitably incident exception, "the question is whether the crime charged is so defined that the crime could not have been committed without a third party's involvement, not whether the crime 'as charged actually involved a third party whose 'conduct was useful or conducive to' the crime.") (quoting State v. Duffy, 8 S.W.3d 197, 201-202 (Mo. App. 1999)).

So, for example, the role of a doorman in protecting a particular drug house from being robbed or ripped off may inextricably be part of the main business of that home, the sale and purchase of controlled substances. However, because it is entirely possible to distribute controlled substances without the assistance of a doorman, the doorman's criminal objective—as contrasted with that of the purchaser—is not inevitably incident to the commission of the crime of drug distribution. Therefore, paragraph (a)(2) would not preclude holding a prospective doorman who offers a drug dealer his services in return for a portion of the proceeds liable for soliciting or conspiring to commit the distribution of controlled substances. Wagers v. State, 810 P.2d 172, 175-76 (Alaska Ct. App. 1991) ("[B]ecause [defendant's] role as a doorman/guard was not 'inevitably incidental' to the commission of the crime of possession with intent to deliver, [he] is not exempt[.]").

For another example, consider a prospective bribery scheme involving bribe offeror, B, go-between G, and public official, P. B gives G $20,000 in cash with instructions to approach P and propose a transaction whereby P will receive the money in return for providing B with a government license to which B is not otherwise entitled. If G agrees with B to participate in this scheme and approaches P, paragraph (a)(2) would not preclude holding G liable for conspiring with B to commit the crime of bribe offering. Although G's criminal objective—to act as a middleman, and facilitate the offering of a bribe—might be useful and conducive to the crime of bribe offering as perpetrated on these facts, it is not strictly necessary to commit the crime of bribe offering, which can be completed without a go-between. See, e.g., WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 12.4(c)(4) (3d ed., Westlaw 2017) (observing that a conspiracy exists where "D and E agreed to bribe F") (citing United States v. Burke, 221 F. 1014 (D.N.Y. 1915)); Tyler v. State, 587 So. 2d 1238, 1243 (Ala. Crim. App. 1991) ("The crime of solicitation to commit the offense of distribution of a controlled substance is committed where A solicits B to distribute drugs to C. If the solicited crime were consummated, both A and B would be guilty of the distribution.").

[7] This rule effectively exempts from general solicitation and conspiracy liability those who might otherwise satisfy the requirements for these general inchoate crimes in relation to the commission of an offense for approaches a dealer in the hopes of securing a supply for personal use may technically satisfy the requirements of general solicitation liability in the sense of having purposefully requested the seller to perpetrate the distribution of a controlled substance.[8] And if that dealer accepts the solicitation, then the purchaser may technically satisfy the requirements of general conspiracy liability in the sense of having purposefully agreed with the seller to perpetrate the distribution of a controlled substance.[9] Nevertheless, because the purchaser's criminal objective—the acquisition of controlled substances—is inevitably incident to the distribution of controlled substances, paragraph (a)(2) precludes holding the purchaser criminally liable for soliciting or conspiring in the commission of drug distribution.[10] Subsection (a) uses "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207, that which their planned participation was logically required as a matter of law. See, e.g., Commentary on Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 502.040; Commentary on Ala. Code § 13A-4-3.

---

[8] See RCC § 22E-302(a) (criminal solicitation defined).

[9] See RCC § 22E-303(a) (criminal conspiracy defined).

[10] See, e.g., Tyler, 587 So. 2d at 1241 ("[W]here A solicits B only to sell drugs to A, and A does not receive any controlled substance, A . . . is not guilty of solicitation to commit the offense of distribution of a controlled substance."); People v. Allen, 92 N.Y.2d 378, 681 N.Y.S.2d 216, 703 N.E.2d 1229 (1998) (same); Com. v. Fisher, 426 Pa. Super. 391, 394, 627 A.2d 732, 733 (1993) (same); United States v. Parker, 554 F.3d 230 (2d Cir. 2009) ("[T]he objective to transfer the drugs from the seller to the buyer cannot serve as the basis for a charge of conspiracy to transfer drugs"). Along similar lines, paragraph (a)(2) would also preclude holding the dealer criminally liable for soliciting or conspiring in the commission of drug possession.

In contrast, paragraph (a)(2) would not preclude holding the dealer liable for conspiring to distribute controlled substances based on an agreement with the purchaser. See Ex parte Parker, 136 So. 3d 1092, 1095 (Ala. 2013) (assuming that drug transaction is sufficient to support conspiracy to distribute conviction against seller). This is because the dealer's criminal objective—the distribution of controlled substances—is not inevitably incident to commission of the target offense, but rather, actually constitutes the target offense (i.e. provides the actual basis for a drug distribution charge). See also Tyler, 587 So. 2d at 1242 ("In a prosecution against the seller, where the statutorily proscribed conduct is the sale of the controlled substance, [it is] the buyer's conduct [that] would be "inevitably or necessarily incidental" to the sale."). And, according to the same logic, subsection (a)(2) would neither preclude holding the purchaser liable for conspiring to possess controlled substances based on an agreement with the dealer. See also Tyler, 587 So. 2d at 1243 ("Similarly, in a prosecution against the buyer, where the proscribed conduct is the possession of the controlled substance, [it is] the seller's conduct [that] would be 'inevitably or necessarily incidental' to that possession.").

This treatment is consistent with the RCC approach to dealing with conduct inevitably incident in the context of complicity. See RCC § 22E-212(a) ("Unless otherwise expressly specified by statute, a person is not liable for the conduct of another under RCC § 22E-210 or RCC § 22E-211 when, in fact . . . the person's conduct is inevitably incident to commission of the offense"). For example, RCC § 22E-212(a) generally precludes holding: (1) a drug purchaser liable for distribution as an accomplice to the drug dealer; and (2) a drug dealer liable for possession as an accomplice to the drug purchaser. See id., Explanatory Note. Conversely, RCC § 22E-212(a) does not preclude holding: (1) a drug dealer directly liable for distribution; or (2) a drug purchaser directly liable for possession. And because such actors can be held directly liable for committing an offense, RCC § 22E-305(a)(2) would not preclude holding them liable for conspiring to commit that offense.

This parallel treatment of the conduct inevitably incident exception to conspiracy liability is, however, inconsistent with the broadest interpretation of Wharton's Rule, under which "[n]o person may be convicted of conspiracy to commit a crime when an element of that crime is agreement with the person with whom he is alleged to have conspired[.]" Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 506.050; see WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 12.4(c)(4) (3d ed., Westlaw 2017) ("[This includes] the buying and selling of contraband goods, and the giving and receiving of bribes.") (citing 2 F. WHARTON, CRIMINAL LAW § 1604 (12th ed. 1932)). However, this expansive interpretation of Wharton's Rule is also the least defensible and has been subject to significant criticism. See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.04(2) cmt. at 481 ("[Such an approach] completely overlooks the functions of conspiracy as an inchoate crime. That an offense inevitably requires concert is no indicates that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "in fact" specified in subsection (a) applies to the elements in paragraph (a)(2) and there is no culpable mental state required for the fact that the person's criminal objective is inevitably incident to commission of the target offense as defined by statute.

Subsection (b) establishes an important limitation on the exceptions to solicitation and conspiracy liability set forth in subsection (a), namely, that they do not apply when "criminal liability [is] expressly specified by statute." This clarifies that the revised statute is only a default bar on criminal liability for victims and individuals whose criminal objective is inevitably incident to commission of an offense.[11] It merely establishes that such individuals are excluded from the general principles of solicitation and conspiracy liability set forth in RCC § 22E-302 and RCC § 22E-303.[12] As such, the legislature is free reason to immunize criminal preparation to commit it."); WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 12.4(c)(4) (3d ed., Westlaw 2017).

---

On the narrower and more defensible reading, in contrast, Wharton's Rule merely "supports a presumption" that, "absent legislative intent to the contrary," charges for conspiracy and a substantive offense that requires "concerted criminal activity" should "merge when the substantive offense is proved." Iannelli v. United States, 420 U.S. 770, 785–86 (1975); see, e.g., Pearsall v. United States, 812 A.2d 953, 962 & n.11 (D.C. 2002) ("Wharton's Rule [merely] bar[s] convictions for both the substantive offense and conspiracy to commit that same offense," so, "[e]ven if the rule applies, initial dismissal of the conspiracy count is not required because the purpose of the rule is avoidance of dual punishment."); WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 12.4(c)(4) (3d ed., Westlaw 2017)("To the extent [Wharton's Rule simply] avoids cumulative punishment for conspiracy and the completed offense, [the doctrine] makes sense."); Model Penal Code § 5.04(2) cmt. at 481 ("[Wharton's] rule is supportable only insofar as it avoids cumulative punishment for conspiracy and the completed substantive crime, for it is clear that the legislature would have taken the factor of concert into account in grading a crime that inevitably requires concert."). Section 304 does not preclude this outcome, while the RCC's general merger provision effectively requires it. See RCC § 22E-214(a)(4) (establishing presumption of merger whenever "[o]ne offense reasonably accounts for the other offense given the harm or wrong, culpability, and penalty proscribed by each"); id., Explanatory Note ("For example, where D, a drug dealer, is convicted of both conspiracy to commit drug distribution and drug distribution, and those convictions arise from the same course of conduct (e.g., a single drug deal with purchaser X), the conspiracy charge would merge with the drug distribution charge, since the latter, by effectively requiring an agreement to distribute as a precursor, 'reasonably accounts' for the former.").

[11] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.04(2) cmt. at 481 ("The position [] adopted for conspiracy and solicitation[] is to leave to the legislature in defining each particular offense the selective judgment that must be made as to whether more than one participant ought to be subject to liability. Since the exception is confined to behavior 'inevitably incident' to the commission of the crime, the problem inescapably presents itself in defining the crime.").

[12] This reflects the fact that both the victim and conduct inevitably incident exceptions to solicitation and conspiracy are justified on the basis of legislative intent. See, e.g., JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 29.09 n.195 (6th ed. 2012) ("It would frustrate legislative intent[] if the underage party [in a statutory rape prosecution] were subject to prosecution for conspiracy in her own victimization."); Gebardi v. United States, 287 U.S. 112, 123, 53 S.Ct. 35, 77 L.Ed. 206 (1932) ("[W]e perceive in the failure of the Mann Act to condemn the woman's participation in those transportations which are effected with her mere consent, evidence of an affirmative legislative policy to leave her acquiescence unpunished."); Commonwealth v. Jennings, 490 S.W.3d 339, 344 n.4 (Ky. 2016) ("[T]he legislature, by specifying the kind of individual who was guilty when involved in a transaction necessarily involving two or more parties, must have intended to leave the participation by the others unpunished.") (quotations and citations omitted); WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 12.41(d) (3d ed., Westlaw 2017) ("Were the [exemptions for solicitation liability] otherwise, the law of criminal solicitation would conflict with the policies expressed in the definitions of the substantive criminal law."); Alan C. Michaels, Fastow and Arthur Andersen: Some Reflections on Corporate Criminality, Victim Status, and Retribution, 1 OHIO ST. J. CRIM. L. 551, 571 (2004) to impose criminal liability upon these general categories of protected individuals on an offense-specific basis.[13] In that case, however, the legislature must draft individual criminal statutes to clearly reflect this determination.[14]

("This rule is often cast in the form of not permitting a conviction for conspiracy to commit an offense when doing so would undermine the legislative purpose in creating the offense.").

Underlying this legislative intent rationale are considerations of proportionate punishment. For example, it has been observed that subjecting drug purchasers to liability for conspiracy or solicitation to distribute would conflict with:

> [A] policy judgment that persons who acquire or possess illegal drugs for their own consumption because they are addicted are less reprehensible and should not be punished with the severity directed against those who distribute drugs . . . .
>
> [I]f an addicted purchaser, who acquired drugs for his own use and without intent to distribute it to others, were deemed to have joined in a conspiracy with his seller for the illegal transfer of the drugs from the seller to himself, the purchaser would be guilty of substantially the same crime, and liable for the same punishment, as the seller. The policy to distinguish between transfer of an illegal drug and the acquisition or possession of the drug would be frustrated.

United States v. Parker, 554 F.3d 230, 235 (2d Cir. 2009); see, e.g., Abuelhawa v. United States, 556 U.S. 816, 820 (2009) ("The traditional law is that where a statute treats one side of a bilateral transaction more leniently . . . adding to the penalty of the party on that side for facilitating the action by the other would upend the calibration of punishment set by the legislature."); Tyler v. State, 587 So. 2d 1238, 1241–43 (Ala. Crim. App. 1991) ("Under the State's argument, a purchaser convicted of soliciting the sale of a controlled substance (a Class B felony) would be punished more harshly then either a seller convicted of soliciting the purchase of a controlled substance (a Class C felony) or a purchaser who actually received the controlled substance (a Class C felony). Such an interpretation is unreasonable.").

[13] See, e.g. PAUL H. ROBINSON, 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 83 (Westlaw 2019) ("The controlling test for whether these defenses will be recognized is the intent of the legislature in defining the offense charged. The defense is generally based upon an analysis of the legislative history of the offense definition and an application of the normal rules of statutory construction."); see also, e.g., Ala. Code § 13A-4-1(c) ("When the solicitation constitutes an offense other than criminal solicitation which is related to but separate from the offense solicited, defendant is guilty of such related offense only and not of criminal solicitation."); N.Y. Penal Law § 100.20 ("When under such circumstances the solicitation constitutes an offense other than criminal solicitation which is related to but separate from the crime solicited, the actor is guilty of such related and separate offense only and not of criminal solicitation.").

[14] The following situation is illustrative: X, the bribe offeror in a two-person corruption scheme involving public official Y, proposes to give Y $20,000 in cash in return for a government license to which X is not otherwise entitled. On these facts, X cannot be held liable for soliciting the commission of the crime of bribe receiving under section 305 since X's criminal objective—the giving of a bribe—is inevitably incident to Y's perpetration of that crime. X can, however, be held criminally liable for his conduct under a statute that, through its express terms, prohibits the offering of a bribe.

The same analysis is applicable to general conspiracy liability. For example, if Y agrees to the transaction, X cannot be held liable for conspiring in the commission of the crime of bribe receiving under section 305 since X's criminal objective—the giving of a bribe—is inevitably incident to Y's perpetration of that crime. X can, however, be held criminally liable for his own conduct under a statute that, through its express terms, prohibits bribery agreements.

Section 305 should also be construed to exclude victims and conduct inevitably incident from the scope of general attempt liability based on a solicitation (or conspiracy). For example, where a prospective drug purchaser asks a dealer to sell him his daily supply, knowing that the dealer will agree and has the drugs on his person, the purchaser's solicitation could potentially satisfy the requirements for attempted distribution of controlled substances. (And, where the seller accepts the invitation, all the more could the resultant conspiracy potentially satisfy the requirements for attempted distribution of controlled substances.) See

Relation to Current District Law. The revised statute clarifies, improves the proportionality of, and fill in gaps in the District law of general inchoate liability.

RCC § 22E-305(a)(1) and (b): Relation to Current District Law on General Inchoate Liability for Victims. There is no current D.C. Code provision or case law directly addressing whether, as a general principle of criminal law, a victim can be held criminally liable for soliciting or conspiring in the commission of a crime perpetrated against him or herself. That said, this exception is consistent with the legislative intent underlying some current statutory offenses enacted by the D.C. Council. And it also has been explicitly recognized by two century-old judicial decisions from the District interpreting congressionally enacted statutes that have since been repealed in the context of accomplice liability.

No current District criminal statute explicitly exempts victims from the scope of general solicitation or conspiracy liability. However, an analysis of the child sex abuse statutes contained in the D.C. Code illustrates why this exception is consistent with legislative intent. For example, the District's current first-degree child sex abuse offense subjects to potential life imprisonment a person who, "being at least 4 years older than a child, engages in a sexual act with that child or causes that child to engage in a sexual act."[15] And the District's current second-degree child sex abuse offense subjects to ten years of imprisonment a person who, "being at least 4 years older than a child, engages in sexual contact with that child or causes that child to engage in sexual contact."[16] These current offenses exist specifically for the protection of minor-victims.[17]

At the same time, the normal principles of general inchoate liability derived from the District's general solicitation statute, D.C. Code § 22-2107,[18] and general conspiracy statute, D.C. Code § 22-1805a,[19] would appear to authorize treating a minor-victim generally RCC § 22E-301(a) (attempt generally requires intent to commit offense and dangerous proximity to completion). Under these circumstances, subsection (a)(2) should be understood to preclude holding the purchaser criminally liable for an attempt to perpetrate the distribution of controlled substances just as it would preclude comparable theories of solicitation or conspiracy liability.

---

[15] D.C. Code § 22-3008.

[16] D.C. Code § 22-3009.

[17] See D.C. Code § 22-3011(a) ("Neither mistake of age nor consent is a defense to a prosecution under §§ 22-3008 to 22-3010.01, prosecuted alone or in conjunction with charges under § 22-3018 or § 22-403."); Ballard v. United States, 430 A.2d 483, 486 (D.C. 1981) ("[T]he statutory proscription against carnal knowledge is intended to protect females below the age of sixteen, regardless of the use of force or consent, from any sexual relationship.").

[18] The relevant statutory text reads:

> (a) Whoever is guilty of soliciting a murder, whether or not such murder occurs, shall be sentenced to a period of imprisonment not exceeding 20 years, a fine not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, or both.
>
> (b) Whoever is guilty of soliciting a crime of violence as defined by § 23-1331(4), whether or not such crime occurs, shall be sentenced to a period of imprisonment not exceeding 10 years, a fine not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, or both.

D.C. Code § 22-2107.

[19] The relevant statutory text reads:

criminally liable for soliciting or conspiring in the perpetration of child sex abuse against him or herself.[20] Consider, for example, the situation of a minor who both initiates and agrees to a sexual act or contact with an adult. Under these circumstances, it might be said that the minor purposefully solicited and conspired with the adult to commit statutory rape in a manner sufficient to satisfy the requirements of general inchoate liability. In practical effect, then, applying general principles of solicitation and conspiracy liability to the District's child sex abuse statutes would mean that a minor may be subject to significant levels of criminal liability.

Treating the minor-victim of a statutory rape in this way seems disproportionate, counterintuitive, and in conflict with the policy goals animating the District's statutory rape offenses. Given these problems, it's unsurprising that reported District case law involving prosecutions for first or second-degree child sex abuse does not appear to ever include charges of this nature. This example may also indicate that—from a broader legislative and executive perspective—a victim exception to general inchoate liability is implicitly understood to exist in District law and practice.

This kind of exception has also been explicitly recognized in the complicity context through two century-old District judicial decisions in the course of interpreting

---

> (a)(1) If 2 or more persons conspire either to commit a criminal offense or to defraud the District of Columbia or any court or agency thereof in any manner or for any purpose, each shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 or imprisoned not more than 5 years, or both, except that if the object of the conspiracy is a criminal offense punishable by less than 5 years, the maximum penalty for the conspiracy shall not exceed the maximum penalty provided for that offense.
>
> (2) If 2 or more persons conspire to commit a crime of violence as defined in § 23-1331(4), each shall be fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01 nor the maximum fine prescribed for the offense, the commission of which was the object of the conspiracy, whichever is less, or imprisoned not more than 15 years nor the maximum imprisonment prescribed for the offense, the commission of which was the object of the conspiracy, whichever is less, or both.
>
> (b) No person may be convicted of conspiracy unless an overt act is alleged and proved to have been committed by 1 of the conspirators pursuant to the conspiracy and to effect its purpose . . . .

D.C. Code § 22-1805a.

[20] The District's jury instruction on solicitation liability summarizes current District law as follows: "[The defendant solicited another person] voluntarily, on purpose, and not by mistake or accident. 'Solicit' means to request, command, or attempt to persuade." CRIMINAL JURY INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, INSTRUCTION NO. 4.500—SOLICITATION (5th ed. 2017).

And the District's jury instruction on conspiracy liability summarizes current District law as follows:

> [A] conspiracy is a kind of partnership in crime. For any defendant to be convicted of the crime of conspiracy, the government must prove two [three] things beyond a reasonable doubt: first, that [during (the charged time period)] there was an agreement to [^] [describe object of conspiracy]; [and] second, that [^] [name of defendant] intentionally joined in that agreement; [and third, that one of the people involved in the conspiracy did one of the overt acts charged].

Id. at § 7.102.

congressionally-enacted statutes that have since been repealed. Although in both cases the victim exceptions to accomplice liability were recognized for testimonial/evidentiary purposes, and not because the would-be accomplices were themselves being prosecuted for aiding or abetting the target offenses, the holding in each case remains relevant. In the first case, Yeager v. United States (1900), the U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit (CADC) determined that the victim of an offense criminalizing sexual intercourse with a female under sixteen years of age could not be deemed an accomplice to that offense precisely because she was victim of the party committing the act.[21] In the second case, Thompson v. United States (1908), the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia applied similar reasoning in holding that a woman who consented to an illegal abortion could not be deemed an accomplice in the commission of an offense criminalizing the procurement of a miscarriage.[22]

Another relevant aspect of District law is the de facto victims exception incorporated into the District's prostitution offense. The relevant criminal statute, D.C. Code § 22-2701, codifies a general policy of excluding "children"—defined as anyone under the age of 18[23]—from criminal liability for prostitution.[24] Beyond creating a general immunity from prosecution for victimized children (including, presumably, those who might otherwise satisfy the requirements of accomplice liability), this statute further requires the police to "refer any child suspected of engaging in or offering to engage in a sexual act or sexual contact in return for receiving anything of value to an organization that

---

[21] Yeager v. United States, 16 App. D.C. 356, 357, 360 (D.C. Cir. 1900) ("The crime is committed against her, and not with her. She is, by force of the law, victim and not particeps criminis or accomplice.").

The relevant statute, as quoted in Yeager, reads:

> Every person who shall carnally and unlawfully know any female under the age of sixteen years, or who shall be accessory to such carnal and unlawful knowledge before the fact in the District of Columbia or other place, except the territories, over which the United States has exclusive jurisdiction, . . . shall be guilty of a felony, and when convicted thereof shall be punished by imprisonment at hard labor, for the first offense for not more than fifteen years and for each subsequent offense not more than thirty years.

Id.

[22] Thompson v. United States, 30 App. D.C. 352, 362–63 (D.C. Cir. 1908) (the woman whose "miscarriage has been produced, though with her consent, [] is regarded as his victim, rather than an accomplice.").

The relevant statute, as quoted in Thompson, reads:

> Whoever, with intent to procure the miscarriage of any woman, prescribes or administers to her any medicine, drug, or substance whatever, or with like intent uses any instrument or means, unless when necessary to preserve her life or health, and under the direction of a competent licensed practitioner of medicine, shall be imprisoned for not more than five years; or, if the woman or her child dies in consequence of such act, by imprisonment for not less than three nor more than twenty years.

Id.

[23] D.C. Code § 22-2701(d)(3).

[24] See generally D.C. Code § 22-2701. More specifically, subsection (a) of the relevant statute makes it "unlawful for any person to engage in prostitution or to solicit for prostitution," subject to the "[e]xcept[ion] provided in subsection (d)." Id. Thereafter, subsection (d) creates an exception from criminal liability for any "child who engages in or offers to engage in a sexual act or sexual contact in return for receiving anything of value." Id. at § (d)(1).

provides treatment, housing, or services appropriate for victims of sex trafficking of children under § 22-1834."[25] These provisions appear to reflect the D.C. Council's view, articulated in supporting legislative history, that "[v]ictims of sexual abuse should not be arrested, prosecuted, or convicted."[26]

RCC § 22E-305(a)(1) and (b) accords with the above authorities, as well as the policy considerations that support them, by excluding the victim of an offense from the scope of general solicitation and conspiracy liability unless expressly provided by statute.[27] (This is consistent with the similar exclusion for victims applicable to legal accountability under RCC § 22E-212.[28])

RCC § 22E-305(a)(2) and (b): Relation to Current District Law on General Inchoate Liability for Conduct Inevitably Incident. A conduct inevitably incident exception to general inchoate liability is generally consistent with District case law recognizing Wharton's Rule. This exception is also consistent with the legislative intent underlying current statutory offenses enacted by the D.C. Council. And it is consistent with conduct inevitably incident exception to accomplice liability, which the D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) has implicitly recognized through dicta on at least one occasion.

No current District criminal statute explicitly recognizes an exemption to general solicitation or conspiracy liability for an actor whose criminal objective is inevitably incident to the commission of an offense. That said, DCCA case law recognizes the doctrine known as Wharton's Rule, which has been described as a "specialized application" of the conduct inevitably incident exception to conspiracy liability.[29]

Specifically, Wharton's Rule "is an 'exception to the general principle that a conspiracy and the substantive offense that is its immediate end' are discrete crimes for which separate sanctions may be imposed."[30] As the court in Pearsall v. United States observed:

> Under Wharton's Rule, an agreement by two people to commit a particular crime cannot be prosecuted as a conspiracy when the crime is of

---

[25] Id. at § (d)(2).

[26] COUNCIL OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY AND PUBLIC SAFETY, COMMITTEE REPORT ON BILL 20-714, Sex Trafficking of Children Prevention Amendment Act of 2014, at 5 (Nov. 7, 2014). The Committee Report goes on to observe that:

> Without this immunity, law enforcement can use threats of prosecution to coerce victims into testifying as witnesses and into participating in treatment programs. However, this coercion inevitably creates a relationship of antagonism between the government and these victims, causing victims to fear and distrust the police, prosecutors and services provided by the government, and being less willing to cooperate as trial witnesses or program participants.

Id.

[27] Note that under RCC § 22E-305(b) the legislature remains free to subject victims to general inchoate liability on an offense-specific basis. In that case, however, the legislature should draft individual criminal statutes to clearly reflect this determination.

[28] See generally Commentary on RCC § 22E-212(a).

[29] PAUL H. ROBINSON, 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 83 (2d. Westlaw 2018).

[30] Pearsall v. United States, 812 A.2d 953, 961-62 (D.C. 2002) (quoting Iannelli v. United States, 420 U.S. 770, 95 S. Ct. 1284, 43 L. Ed. 2d 616 (1975)).

> such a nature as to require necessarily the participation of two people for its commission. [] For example, Wharton's Rule applies to offenses such as adultery, incest, bigamy, and duelling that require concerted criminal activity, a plurality of criminal agents and is essentially an aid to the determination of legislative intent. [] Only where it is impossible under any circumstances to commit the substantive offense without cooperative action, does Wharton's Rule bar convictions for both the substantive offense and conspiracy to commit that same offense . . . . .
>
> In determining whether more than one person is necessary to commit the offense, it is recognized that a participant is necessary to the commission of a crime, for purposes of merging substantive and conspiracy counts, if the substantive statute requires the [participant's] existence as an abstract legal element of the crime . . . .
>
> The crimes that traditionally fall under Wharton's Rule share three characteristics:
>
> [1] [t]he parties to the agreement are the only persons who participate in commission of the substantive offense . . . . [2] the immediate consequences of the crime rest on the parties themselves rather than on society at large . . . . and [3] the agreement that attends the substantive offense does not appear likely to pose the distinct kinds of threats to society that the law of conspiracy seeks to avert.[31]

In light of these principles, the Pearsall court rejected the defendant's claim that his dual convictions for (1) conspiracy to commit armed robbery and (2) armed robbery premised on his role as an accomplice violated Wharton's Rule.[32]

At the heart of the DCCA's reasoning is a recognition that it is "entirely possible for appellant to commit the offense of armed robbery . . . without the participation of anyone else."[33] True, consummation of "armed robbery may be easier with the assistance of others."[34] Nevertheless, "such assistance is not necessary to commit the offense," i.e. "[a]rmed robbery does not require proof that there was more than the one actor."[35] And "[s]ince the focus of a Wharton's Rule inquiry is on the statutory elements, rather than the facts proved at trial, that the evidence showed several persons participated in the armed robbery does not make the rule applicable."[36] Accordingly, the Pearsall court concluded, "Wharton's Rule does not preclude conviction in a single trial of conspiracy to commit armed robbery and the substantive offense of armed robbery or its lesser-included offense

---

[31] Pearsall, 812 A.2d at 962 (internal citations, quotations, and footnotes removed); see also id. n.11 ("Even if the rule applies, initial dismissal of the conspiracy count is not required because the purpose of the rule is avoidance of dual punishment.").

[32] Id. at 962.

[33] Id.

[34] Id.

[35] Id.

[36] Id. (internal citations and quotations omitted).

of attempted armed robbery."[37]

Both the general recognition of Wharton's Rule in Pearsall as well as DCCA's decision to uphold the defendant's conspiracy conviction in light of it provides judicial support for a conduct inevitably incident exception to conspiracy liability.[38] The conduct inevitably incident exception, like Wharton's Rule, has the practical effect of curtailing general conspiracy liability where the target offense necessarily requires the participation of two parties as a matter of law.[39] And the conduct inevitably incident exception, like Wharton's Rule, has no application where—as was the case in Pearsall—the participation of one party was merely helpful to completion of the target offense based on the facts of the case.[40]

Case law aside, an analysis of the drug statutes in the current D.C. Code illustrates why a conduct inevitably incident exception to general inchoate liability is consistent with legislative intent. Compare the District's different approaches to punishing those who distribute and those who merely possess controlled substances.

The District's current distribution statute makes it a thirty year felony for "any person knowingly or intentionally to manufacture, distribute, or possess, with intent to manufacture or distribute, a controlled substance," which is, in fact, "a narcotic or abusive drug" subject to classification "in Schedule I or II."[41] In contrast, the District's current

---

[37] Id. at 963.

[38] As the commentary to the D.C. jury instruction on conspiracy observes:

> Under Wharton's Rule, an agreement by two people to commit a particular crime cannot be prosecuted as a conspiracy when the crime is of such a nature as to necessarily require the participation of two people for its commission. Typically, this Rule applies to offenses such as adultery, incest, bigamy, and dueling that require concerted activity. Only where it is impossible under any circumstances to commit the substantive offense without cooperative action, does Wharton's Rule, under a double jeopardy analysis, bar convictions for both the substantive offense and the conspiracy to commit that same offense. See Pearsall v. U.S., 812 A.2d 953 (D.C. 2002); U.S. v. Payan, 992 F.2d 1387, 1390 (5th Cir. 1993). The focus of Wharton's Rule is on the statutory elements of an offense, rather than the facts proved at trial. Thus, an armed robbery, for example, does not require proof that there was more than one actor and Wharton's Rule does not apply in such circumstances. Pearsall, 812 A.2d at 962.

CRIMINAL JURY INSTRUCTIONS FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA, INSTRUCTION NO. 7.102—CONSPIRACY (5th ed. 2017).

[39] See, e.g., State v. Roldan, 314 N.J. Super. 173, 182–83, 714 A.2d 351, 356 (App. Div. 1998) (Wharton's Rule holds that "where an agreement between two parties is inevitably incident to the commission of a crime, such as a sale of contraband, 'conspiracy, which assumes the voluntary accession of a person to a crime of such a character that it is aggravated by a plurality of agents, cannot be maintained.'") (quoting Iannelli v. United States, 420 U.S. 770, 773, 95 S.Ct. 1284, 1288, 43 *L. Ed.*2d 616, 620 (1975)). For discussion of the differences between Wharton's Rule and the conduct inevitably incident exception to conspiracy, see PAUL H. ROBINSON, 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 83 (Westlaw 2019).

[40] Roldan, 314 N.J. Super. at 182–83, 714 A.2d at 356 (noting that no exception where "the evidence shows that two or more parties have entered into an agreement to engage in concerted criminal activity which goes beyond the kind of simple agreement inevitably incident to the sale of contraband") (citing Iannelli, 420 U.S. at 778, 95 S.Ct. at 1290, 43 L.Ed.2d at 623) (quoting Callanan v. United States, 364 U.S. 587, 593-94, 81 S.Ct. 321, 325, 5 L.Ed.2d 312, 317 (1961)).

[41] D.C. Code § 48-904.01(a)(1)-(2); see id. at (a)(2)(A) ("Any person who violates this subsection with respect to . . . A controlled substance classified in Schedule I or II that is a narcotic or abusive drug shall be possession statute makes it a 180 day misdemeanor to "knowingly or intentionally to possess a controlled substance" of a similar nature.[42]

These different approaches are likewise reflected in the District's current drug offense-specific attempt and conspiracy penalty provision, D.C. Code § 48-904.09, which penalizes an attempt or conspiracy to commit any particular drug offense at precisely the same level as the completed version of that drug offense.[43] This stark contrast in grading appears to reflect a legislative judgment that mere possessors are far less culpable and/or dangerous than distributors, and, therefore, should be subject to significantly less liability.[44]

At the same time, application of the District's normal principles of conspiracy liability would appear to authorize holding a purchaser-possessor criminally liable for conspiring in the distribution of drugs by the seller to the purchaser-possessor. Consider, for example, the situation of a drug user who both initiates and pursues the purchase of a controlled substance from a seller. Under these circumstances, it might be said that the drug user purposefully agreed to commit distribution in a manner sufficient to satisfy the imprisoned for not more than 30 years or fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, or both[.]").

---

[42] D.C. Code § 48-904.01(d)(1) ("It is unlawful for any person knowingly or intentionally to possess a controlled substance unless the substance was obtained directly from, or pursuant to, a valid prescription or order of a practitioner while acting in the course of his or her professional practice, or except as otherwise authorized by this chapter or Chapter 16B of Title 7, and provided in § 48-1201. Except as provided in paragraph (2) of this subsection, any person who violates this subsection is guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction may be imprisoned for not more than 180 days, fined not more than $1,000, or both."); compare D.C. Code § 48-904.01(d)(2) ("Any person who violates this subsection by knowingly or intentionally possessing the abusive drug phencyclidine in liquid form is guilty of a felony and, upon conviction, may be imprisoned for not more than 3 years, fined not more than the amount set forth in § 22-3571.01, or both.").

[43] D.C. Code § 48-904.09 ("Any person who attempts or conspires to commit any offense defined in this subchapter is punishable by imprisonment or fine or both which may not exceed the maximum punishment prescribed for the offense, the commission of which was the object of the attempt or conspiracy.").

[44] Indeed, "[t]he District of Columbia Uniform Controlled Substances Act was enacted, in part, in order to punish offenders according to the seriousness of their conduct." Long v. United States, 623 A.2d 1144, 1151 n.13 (D.C. 1993) (citing Council of the District of Columbia*, Committee on the Judiciary, Report on Bill 4–123*, The Uniform Controlled Substances Act of 1981, 2–3 (April 8, 1981)) (hereinafter "Committee Report"). For example, the legislative history underlying the District's Uniform Controlled Substances Act observes that:

> While there is dispute over what penalties should be imposed, the proposition that the criminal consequences of prohibited conduct should be tied to the nature of the offense committed is unassailable. Title IV of the CSA would abolish the unilateral approach of the UNA and would introduce a system in which the penalty for prohibited conduct is graded according to the nature of the offense and the schedule of the substance involved.

Committee Report, at 5. See also, e.g., Long, 623 A.2d at 1150 (observing that "the fundamental message [in a federal case]—that the legislature did not intend to treat with equal severity on the one hand, entrepreneurs who profit from distribution of heroin or crack, and on the other hand, addicts who pool their resources to purchase drugs for their own joint use—finds meaningful support in the legislative history of the District's Uniform Controlled Substances Act."); Lowman v. United States, 632 A.2d 88, 98 (D.C. 1993) (Schwelb, J. dissenting) ("[A] central purpose of the enactment of the [District's] local [drug] statute was to abolish the 'unilateral approach' of the former Uniform Narcotics Act, which was viewed as not discriminating sufficiently between serious and less serious offenders, and to introduce a system in which the penalty for prohibited conduct is graded according to the nature of the offense and the schedule of the substance involved.").

requirements of conspiracy liability under D.C. Code § 22-1805(a). In practical effect, then, applying general principles of conspiracy liability to the District's drug distribution statute would mean that the drug user could be held liable to the same extent as the seller under D.C. Code § 48-904.09.

A similar analysis is likewise applicable to solicitation. Although the District's current general solicitation statute, D.C. Code § 22-2107, only applies to crimes of violence[45] (and therefore not to drug distribution), a solicitation might also provide the basis for attempt liability.[46] For example, where a prospective drug purchaser asks a dealer to sell him his daily supply, knowing that the dealer will agree and has the drugs on his person, the purchaser's solicitation might potentially satisfy the conduct requirement for attempt liability, given both the proximity to and likelihood that the solicitation would result in the distribution of controlled substances.[47] If true, however, then it would follow that the drug user, by attempting to perpetrate the distribution of controlled substances, could be held liable to the same extent as the seller under D.C. Code § 48-904.09.

Treating the purchaser-possessor in a drug deal in either of the ways described above seems disproportionate, counterintuitive, and in conflict with the policy goals animating the District's current controlled substances offenses.[48] Given these problems, it's unsurprising that reported District case law does not appear to include a single drug distribution prosecution involving general inchoate crimes brought against a drug user purchasing for individual use. This example may also indicate that—from a broader legislative and executive perspective—a conduct inevitably incident exception to general inchoate liability is implicitly understood to exist in District law and practice.

This conclusion is further bolstered by the conduct inevitably incident exception to accomplice liability, which the DCCA has implicitly recognized through dicta. In the relevant case, Lowman v. United States, two of the three judges on the panel held—relying on a line of prior District precedent—that an intermediary who arranges a drug transaction

---

[45] The phrase "crime of violence" is defined in D.C. Code § 23-1331(4) to encompass the following offenses:

> aggravated assault; act of terrorism; arson; assault on a police officer (felony); assault with a dangerous weapon; assault with intent to kill, commit first degree sexual abuse, commit second degree sexual abuse, or commit child sexual abuse; assault with significant bodily injury; assault with intent to commit any other offense; burglary; carjacking; armed carjacking; child sexual abuse; cruelty to children in the first degree; extortion or blackmail accompanied by threats of violence; gang recruitment, participation, or retention by the use or threatened use of force, coercion, or intimidation; kidnapping; malicious disfigurement; manslaughter; manufacture or possession of a weapon of mass destruction; mayhem; murder; robbery; sexual abuse in the first, second, or third degrees; use, dissemination, or detonation of a weapon of mass destruction; or an attempt, solicitation, or conspiracy to commit any of the foregoing offenses.

[46] See generally Commentary on RCC § 22E-301(a).

[47] Id.; see also State v. Fristoe, 135 Ariz. 25, 658 P.2d 825 (Ariz. App. 1982) (mere solicitation can amount to an attempt); Ward v. State, 528 N.E.2d 52 (Ind. 1988) (same); but see Tyler v. State, 587 So. 2d 1238 (Ala. Crim. App. 1991) (mere solicitation cannot amount to attempt).

[48] See Lowman, 632 A.2d at 96 (Schwelb, J. dissenting) (observing that if every purchaser were to be "deemed an aider and abettor to [distribution]," this would effectively "write out of the Act the offense of simple possession, since under such a theory every drug abuser would be liable for aiding and abetting the distribution which led to his own possession.'") (quoting United States v. Swiderski, 548 F.2d 445, 451 (2d Cir. 1977)).

between "a willing buyer [and] a willing seller" can be held criminally liable for distribution as an accomplice.[49] One judge dissented, arguing that, among other problems, the majority's holding could logically support holding the buyer him or herself liable for distribution as an accomplice.[50] In response, the two-judge majority explained that they were "unpersuaded at this point that the court's interpretation of aiding and abetting might result in a buyer of illegal drugs being guilty of the crime of distribution," while citing to federal case law explicitly recognizing that "one who receives drugs does not aid and abet distribution 'since this would totally undermine the statutory scheme [by effectively writing] out of the Act the offense of simple possession."[51]

RCC § 22E-305(a)(2) and (b) accords with the above authorities, as well as the policy considerations that support them, by excluding an actor whose criminal objective is inevitably incident to the commission of an offense as a matter of law from the scope of general solicitation and conspiracy liability unless expressly provided by statute. [52] (This is consistent with the similar exclusion for conduct inevitably incident applicable to legal accountability under RCC § 22E-212.[53])

RCC § 22E-306. Renunciation Defense to Attempt, Conspiracy, and Solicitation

Explanatory Note. RCC § 22E-306 establishes a renunciation defense to liability for a criminal attempt under RCC § 22E-301, a criminal solicitation under RCC § 22E-302 , or a criminal conspiracy under RCC § 22E-303.[1]

---

[49] Lowman v. United States, 632 A.2d 88, 91 (D.C. 1993) (upholding distribution conviction where defendant brought "a willing buyer to a willing seller" and "specifically asked [distributor] if he had any twenty-dollar rocks, the precise drugs that the undercover officer had said he wanted to buy"); see, e.g., Griggs v. United States, 611 A.2d 526, 527, 529 (D.C. 1992) (upholding distribution conviction where an officer approached the defendant and asked if anyone was "working," the defendant escorted the officer to a seller, and the defendant told the seller that the officer "wanted one twenty"); Minor v. United States, 623 A.2d 1182, 1187 (D.C. 1993) ("[B]eing an agent of the buyer is not a defense to a charge of distribution.").

[50] Lowman, 632 A.2d at 96 (Schwelb, J. dissenting) (observing that "if the government's position were adopted, and if everyone who assisted a buyer of drugs were thereby rendered a distributor, then, a fortiori, every purchaser would also logically have to be deemed an aider and abettor to a felony, and would therefore be subject to a mandatory minimum sentence.").

[51] Lowman, 632 A.2d at 92 (quoting United States v. Swiderski, 548 F.2d 445, 451 (2d Cir. 1977)).

[52] Note that under RCC § 22E-305(b) the legislature remains free to impose general inchoate liability on those whose criminal objectives are inevitably incident to an offense on an offense-specific basis. In that case, however, the legislature should draft individual criminal statutes to clearly reflect this determination.

[53] See generally Commentary on RCC § 22E-212(a).

[1] Typically, "an offense is complete and criminal liability attaches and is irrevocable as soon as the actor satisfies all the elements of an offense." PAUL H. ROBINSON, 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 81 (Westlaw 2019). However, where a defendant has been charged with a general inchoate offense (e.g., attempt, solicitation, and conspiracy) or an offense premised on legal accountability (e.g., complicity), the criminal justice system affords an "offender the opportunity to escape liability, even after he has satisfied the elements of these offenses, by renouncing, abandoning, or withdrawing from the criminal enterprise." Id; see, e.g., JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 28.03 (6th ed. 2012); WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.5(b) (3d ed. Westlaw 2019). As it arises in the context of general inchoate liability, this widely recognized (though seldom raised) defense is typically referred to as "renunciation." Daniel G. Moriarty, Extending the Defense of Renunciation, 62 TEMP. L. REV. 1 (1989); see, e.g., PAUL H. ROBINSON, 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 81 (Westlaw 2019) (observing that "[a] majority of American jurisdictions recognize some form of renunciation defense to an attempt to commit an offense," while "[n]early every jurisdiction permits some form of renunciation defense to a charge of criminal solicitation" and "to a charge of conspiracy."); Model Penal Code § 5.01 cmt. at 361 ("Instances of renunciation of criminal purpose are not frequent.").

The affirmative defense set forth in § 22E-306 is comprised of three basic requirements, each of which will be discussed in detail in this commentary. Generally, however, paragraph (a)(1) requires that the defendant made reasonable efforts aimed at preventing the target of the charged attempt, solicitation, or conspiracy. Paragraph (a)(2) requires that the defendant's conduct must have been motivated by a genuine desire to avoid the social harm implicated by the target offense (in contrast to more pragmatic goals, such as a desire to avoid arrest or postpone completion of the offense). Finally, paragraph (a)(3) requires that the target offense underlying the charged inchoate crime must not have been consummated, whether due to the defendant's preventative efforts or otherwise.[2] Subsection (a) specifies "in fact," a defined term in RCC § 22E-207 that is used to indicate that there is no culpable mental state requirement as to a given element. Per the rules of

---

[2] Widespread recognition of "renunciation as an affirmative defense to inchoate crimes" is often said to be driven by "two basic reasons":

> First, renunciation indicates a lack of firmness of that purpose which evidences criminal dangerousness. The same rationale underlies the reluctance to make merely "preparatory" activity a basis for liability in criminal attempt: the criminal law does not seek to condemn where there is an insufficient showing that the defendant has a firm purpose to bring about the conduct or result which the penal law seeks to prevent. Where the defendant has performed acts which indicate, prima facie, sufficient firmness of purpose, the defendant should be allowed to rebut the inference to be drawn from such acts by showing that the defendant has plainly demonstrated the defendant's lack of firm purpose by completely renouncing the defendant's purpose to bring about the conduct or result which the law seeks to prevent.
>
> Second, it is thought that the law should provide a means for encouraging persons to abandon courses of criminal activity which they have already undertaken. In the very cases where the first reason becomes weakest, this second reason shows its greatest strength. That is, in the penultimate stage, where purpose is most likely to be firmly set, any inducement to desist achieves its greatest value.

Commentary on Haw. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 705-530 (citing Model Penal Code § 5.01 cmt. at 361); see, e.g., Daniel G. Moriarty, Extending the Defense of Renunciation, 62 TEMP. L. REV. 1, 5-6 (1989) (observing that a renunciation defense is "[a] cost-effective technique to . . . concentra[ting] our resources on those who seem most likely to commit crime, and to target our measures of social defense at those persons who are most dangerous."); Id. at 5 ("Just as the degree structure of criminal [provides] greater deterrence for the higher degrees of crime [through more severe punishments], so too can the reward of remission of punishment motivate persons who have not yet caused the more aggravated species of harm to abandon their enterprise and refrain from causing more damage than they have already.").

Perhaps a better explanation of the renunciation defense's recognition, though, is "[r]etributively oriented," namely, that voluntary and complete renunciation "makes us reassess our vision of the defendant's blameworthiness." Mark Kelman, Interpretive Construction in the Substantive Criminal Law, 33 STAN. L. REV. 591, 612 (1981). As numerous legal authorities have recognized:

> All of us, or most of us, at some time or other harbor what may be described as a criminal intent to effect unlawful consequences. Many of us take some steps—often slight enough in character—to bring the consequences about; but most of us, when we reach a certain point, desist, and return to our roles as law-abiding citizens.

Hernandez-Cruz v. Holder, 651 F.3d 1094, 1103 (9th Cir. 2011). See also WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.4 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019); PAUL H. ROBINSON & JOHN DARLEY, INTUITIONS OF JUSTICE & THE UTILITY OF DESERT 247-57 (2014) (finding strong support in public opinion for renunciation defense).

interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, the "in fact" specified in subsection (a) applies to the elements in paragraphs (a)(1), (a)(2), and (a)(3) and there is no culpable mental state required for any of the elements in these paragraphs.

The general provision in RCC § 22E-201 establishes the requirements for the burden of production and the burden of proof for all affirmative defenses in the RCC.

Paragraph (a)(1) codifies a "reasonable efforts" standard for evaluating the sufficiency of the defendant's attempt at preventing the target offense.[3] This standard requires a context-sensitive analysis, which calls upon the fact-finder to determine whether the defendant's efforts, when evaluated in light of the totality of the circumstances, were reasonably calculated to disrupt the criminal scheme in which he or she participated.[4] The type of conduct sufficient to satisfy this standard will, by necessity, be contingent upon the nature of the inchoate crime at issue. For example, in most attempt prosecutions, the defendant's abandonment of his or her criminal scheme will satisfy the reasonable efforts standard.[5] Where, however, a solicitation or conspiracy charge is at issue, and the

---

[3] RCC § 22E-306(a)(1) ("The actor made reasonable efforts to prevent commission of the target offense[.]"); see, e.g., R. Michael Cassidy & Gregory I. Massing, The Model Penal Code's Wrong Turn: Renunciation As A Defense to Criminal Conspiracy, 64 FLA. L. REV. 353, 368 n.88 (2012) (collecting and analyzing state renunciation statutes that require a "reasonable," "substantial," or "proper" effort to prevent the crime); compare Model Penal Code §§ 5.01(4), 5.02(3), 5.03(6) (defendant's renunciation must have "prevented [offense's] commission").

Notably, the same "reasonable efforts" standard is employed in the RCC's withdrawal defense to legal accountability. RCC § 22E-213(a).

[4] While RCC § 22E-306 requires that the underlying target offense not be committed, the RCC approach does not require proof that it was the defendant's reasonable efforts that actually prevented the target offense, as is discussed elsewhere in this commentary. Among other implications, this allows for the possibility of a renunciation defense in impossibility situations, such as, for example, where the defendant's general inchoate liability arises in the context of a sting operation. See, e.g., People v. Sisselman, 147 A.D.2d 261 (N.Y. Sup. Ct. 1989) (recognizing renunciation defense in impossibility situations as a matter of basic fairness); Daniel G. Moriarty, Extending the Defense of Renunciation, 62 TEMP. L. REV. 1, 37 (1989) ("[It would be an] absurd result to deny [a renunciation] defense to those who have unwittingly attempted the impossible and offer it to all others. There seems to be no reason to distinguish between the two classes on the basis of either social danger or susceptibility to having their choices influenced by our offers."); see also RCC § 22E-301 Explanatory Note (providing overview of impossibility situations).

The following fact pattern is illustrative. D solicits Y, an undercover informant, to assault V. Soon thereafter, however, D reconsiders his proposal, regrets having made the request, and then wholeheartedly tries to persuade Y not to carry out the assault (unaware that Y is, in fact, a police officer). See Sisselman, 147 A.D.2d at 261 (case with similar facts). In this situation, D cannot actually persuade Y to desist or otherwise prevent the assault from occurring since Y never intended to go through with it in the first place. See id. at 264 ("The real problem here is that defendant was in no position to prevent the object crime since [the informant] never intended to carry out the solicited assault."). Nevertheless, D would still be eligible for a renunciation defense under section 306 since such conduct meets the reasonable efforts standard. As is discussed elsewhere in this commentary, attempting to deprive one's contribution to a criminal scheme of its effectiveness constitutes reasonable preventative efforts.

[5] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.01(4) (it is an "affirmative defense" to attempt that the defendant, inter alia, "abandoned his effort to commit the crime or otherwise prevented its commission") (italics added). The exception is where a defendant has set in motion forces that will culminate in a crime independent of his or her subsequent abandonment, such as, for example, where D, intending to destroy a building, starts the timer on an explosive device placed in the basement and then later—but prior to the explosion—thinks better of the criminal scheme. See Model Penal Code § 5.03 cmt. at 458 ("Since attempt involves only an individual actor, abandonment will generally prevent completion of the crime, although in some cases the actor may have to put a stop to forces that he has set in motion and that would otherwise bring about the substantive crime independently of his will."). In this situation, D's abandonment would not, by itself, constitute defendant facilitates or promotes a criminal scheme that involves the participation of others, then mere desistance is unlikely to suffice.[6] In these contexts, a more proactive approach aimed at disrupting the collective criminal enterprise will be necessary. This includes, among other possibilities: (1) engaging in conduct sufficient to deprive one's prior contribution to a criminal scheme of its effectiveness[7]; (2) providing reasonable notice to law enforcement[8]; or (3) providing reasonable notice to the victim.[9]

Paragraph (a)(2) codifies a "voluntary and complete"[10] standard as the basis for evaluating the sufficiency of the defendant's motivations in undertaking his or her preventative efforts.[11] This standard, as further clarified in subsection (b), denies a reasonable efforts at preventing commission of the target offense. Instead, a more proactive effort, e.g., providing timely notification to the police, would be necessary.

---

[6] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.02(3) (it is an "affirmative defense" to solicitation that the defendant, inter alia, "persuaded him not to do so or otherwise prevented the commission of the crime") (italics added); Model Penal Code § 5.03(6) (it is an "affirmative defense" to conspiracy that the defendant, inter alia, "thwarted the success of the conspiracy") (italics added).

[7] Whether conduct is sufficient to deprive one's prior contribution to a criminal scheme of its effectiveness is contingent upon the nature of the contribution. For example, where the defendant's involvement goes no further than an initial request or tentative agreement to assist the commission of a crime, then a clear (and timely) statement of disapproval communicated to his or her co-participants would likely satisfy the reasonable efforts standard. However, a statement of this nature would not suffice if the defendant's participation was more significant, such as, for example, loaning a weapon central to the scheme's success. In that case, the actual retrieval of the weapon would be necessary to deprive one's prior contribution to a criminal scheme of its effectiveness.

[8] That is, notice to law enforcement, which is: (1) timely; (2) communicated to the appropriate agency (i.e. one with jurisdiction over the requisite criminal scheme); and (3) provides that agency with a reasonably feasible means of preventing the criminal scheme. Where, in contrast, notice is provided too late, relayed to the wrong agency, or does not provide a reasonably feasible means of preventing the criminal scheme, then the defendant's conduct would not meet the "reasonable efforts" standard.

[9] That is, notice to the victim, which is: (1) timely; and (2) provides the victim with a reasonably feasible means of avoiding the target harm. Where, in contrast, the notice is provided too late, or does not enable the victim to easily and safely escape harm, then the defendant's conduct would not meet the "reasonable efforts" standard.

[10] The voluntariness component of this renunciation defense is to be distinguished from the voluntariness requirement applicable to all criminal offenses under section 203. See RCC § 22E-203(a). With respect to the latter voluntariness requirement, the question presented is relatively narrow: was the act (or omission) "the product of conscious effort or determination, or [] otherwise subject to the person's control." RCC § 22E-203(b). Where, in contrast, the voluntariness of a defendant's renunciation is concerned, the focus is on the individual's reasons for action in a broader moral sense (i.e. whether the defendant's desistance was motivated by a concern for the legally protected interests of others). Compare Model Penal Code § 5.01(4), cmt. at 359 ("A 'voluntary' abandonment occurs when there is a change in the actor's purpose that is not influenced by outside circumstances[.] Lack of resolution or timidity may suffice. A reappraisal by the actor of the criminal sanctions applicable to his contemplated conduct would presumably be a motivation of the voluntary type as long as the actor's fear of the law is not related to a particular threat of apprehension or detection."), with id. ("An 'involuntary' abandonment occurs when the actor ceases his criminal endeavor because he fears detection or apprehension, or because he decides he will wait for a better opportunity, or because his powers or instruments are inadequate for completing the crime[.]").

[11] RCC § 22E-306(a)(2) ("Under circumstances manifesting a voluntary and complete renunciation of the actor's criminal intent"); see, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.01(4) (abandonment of attempt must occur "under circumstances manifesting a complete and voluntary renunciation of his criminal purpose."); Model Penal Code § 5.02(3) (repudiation of solicitation must occur "under circumstances manifesting a complete and voluntary renunciation of his criminal purpose"); Model Penal Code § 5.03(6) (repudiation of conspiracy must occur "under circumstances manifesting a complete and voluntary renunciation of his criminal purpose").

renunciation defense to two different kinds of actors. The first, addressed in paragraph (b)(1) and it subparagraphs, are those whose preventative efforts are motivated (to any extent) by a belief in the existence of circumstances which either: (1) increase the probability of detection or apprehension of the defendant or another participant in the criminal enterprise; or (2) render accomplishment of the criminal plans more difficult.[12] In the alternative, the second kind of actors, addressed in paragraph (b)(2), are those whose preventative efforts are motivated (again, to any extent) by a decision to: (1) postpone the criminal conduct until another time; or (2) transfer the criminal effort to another victim or a different but similar objective.[13]

Paragraph (a)(3) establishes that a renunciation defense is only available when "the target offense was not committed." This non-consummation requirement categorically bars a renunciation defense in any situation where the target of an attempt, solicitation, or conspiracy is successful, without regard to why it was successful.[14] Where, in contrast, the

---

Generally speaking, the requirement of a voluntary and complete renunciation envisions that the defendant's preventative conduct have been motivated by a genuine repudiation of his or her criminal plans, rather than by external influences. That said, a defendant's renunciation can be motivated by external influences in a way that is nevertheless consistent with this kind of genuine repudiation, such as, for example, where D, a participant in a nascent drug conspiracy, is persuaded by his parents to renounce because carrying out a criminal scheme would be the "wrong thing to do."

[12] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.01(4) ("renunciation of criminal purpose is not voluntary if it is motivated, in whole or in part, by circumstances, not present or apparent at the inception of the actor's course of conduct, that increase the probability of detection or apprehension or that make more difficult the accomplishment of the criminal purpose."). For example, if D arrives at a bank, intending to rob the bank, but ultimately decides against it based upon a determination that it is too risky to go ahead or because she lacks something essential to the completion of the crime, D's abandonment is not voluntary.

[13] See Model Penal Code § 5.01(4) ("Renunciation is not complete if it is motivated by a decision to postpone the criminal conduct until a more advantageous time or to transfer the criminal effort to another but similar objective or victim."). For example, if D arrives at a bank, intending to rob the bank, but ultimately decides against it based upon a determination that waiting another day or robbing a different bank would be preferable, D's subsequent abandonment is not complete.

[14] For this reason, the renunciation defense to general inchoate crimes under section 306 is narrower than the withdrawal defense to legal accountability under section 213, which is available even where the target offense is successfully completed. See generally RCC § 22E-213(a), Explanatory Note (observing that it is not necessary for the target offense to have been prevented or frustrated to raise withdrawal defense).

Another way in which the renunciation defense to general inchoate crimes is narrower than the withdrawal defense to legal accountability relates to the defendant's motive. Whereas a renunciation defense is unavailable where the defendant was motivated by a desire to avoid getting caught or postpone commission of the offense, the withdrawal defense does not incorporate a comparable requirement of non-culpable intent. See generally RCC § 22E-213(a), Explanatory Note (observing that any motive will suffice for withdrawal defense).

Because of these two differences, it is possible for a defendant to avoid legal accountability for another person's conduct yet still incur general inchoate liability for his or her own conduct under the RCC. The following example is illustrative. V personally insults P. P is predisposed to let the insult slide, but A persuades P over the phone that P must respond with lethal violence to protect P's reputation. In providing this encouragement, A consciously desires to bring about the death of V, who A also has an outstanding beef with due to a prior perceived slight that V earlier made against A. One day later, A has a change of heart, which is motivated, in large part, by A's having been alerted to the fact that the police were monitoring the phone call and are therefore very likely to catch and arrest both P and A. So A decides to again call P, and does his very best to persuade P to desist from violence against V, and, ultimately, to forgive V for the slight. However, A's reasonable efforts at dissuading P from carrying out the planned execution is unsuccessful; P goes on to kill V anyways.

target of the attempt, solicitation, or conspiracy is unsuccessful, there is no requirement under paragraph (a)(3) that the defendant have actually contributed to its prevention, let alone been the factual (i.e. but for) cause of the prevention.[15] It is sufficient for purposes of section 306 that the offense attempted, solicited, or conspired failed for reasons entirely unrelated to the defendant's preventative efforts—provided that those efforts were reasonable and undertaken with the appropriate motivations.[16]

Subsection (c) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised statute clarifies and fills gaps in District law concerning the availability and burden of proof governing a renunciation defense.

The current state of District law concerning the renunciation defense is unclear. The D.C. Code does not codify any general defenses to criminal conduct, including renunciation. There also does not appear to be any District case law directly addressing the issue in the context of attempt, solicitation, or conspiracy. At the same time, some District authority relevant to the renunciation defense exists, providing modest support for its recognition.

In the attempt context, District courts apply a conduct requirement that, in drawing the line between preparation and perpetration, seems to imply the absence of renunciation. This so-called probable desistance test requires proof of conduct which, "except for the interference of some cause preventing the carrying out of the intent, would have resulted in the commission of the crime."[17] As various commentators have observed, this formulation of attempt liability appears to be part and parcel with a renunciation defense in the sense that a "voluntary abandonment demonstr[ates] that the agent would not have 'committ[ed] the crime except for' extraneous intervention."[18] Which is to say, the fact that a defendant genuinely repudiates his or her criminal plans establishes that, with or without external interference, the outcome would have been the same: failure to consummate the target offense.

On these facts, A satisfies the standard for withdrawal under section 213, and, therefore, cannot be deemed an accomplice to P's murder of V under section 210. A would not, however, be able to avail himself of a renunciation defense under section 306 to avoid liability for his original solicitation of P (to commit murder) under the RCC's general solicitation statute. See RCC § 22E-302(a). Specifically, a renunciation defense would not be available to A under the revised statute because: (1) the target offense at the heart of A's solicitation, the murder of V, was completed; and (2) A's renunciation was not voluntary (i.e. it was motivated by a desire to avoid getting caught).

[15] So, for example, a defendant in a multi-party scheme would not need to prove that his timely warning to the police was essential—or even helpful—to the subsequent disruption by law enforcement.

[16] So, for example, a renunciation defense would remain available where the defendant's timely warning to law enforcement is rendered superfluous by identical information earlier transmitted by another source.

[17] E.g., Wormsley v. United States, 526 A.2d 1373, 1375 (D.C. 1987) (quoting Sellers v. United States, 131 A.2d 300, 301-02 (D.C. 1957)) (emphasis added); see also In re Doe, 855 A.2d 1100, 1107 and n.11 (D.C. 2004) (quoting Wormsley but noting this formulation is "imperfect" in the sense that "failure is not an essential element of criminal attempt").

[18] R.A. DUFF, CRIMINAL ATTEMPTS 395-96 (1996); see, e.g., Model Penal Code § 5.01 cmt. at 357-58; WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 11.5 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019).

In the conspiracy context, the DCCA has addressed an issue closely related to renunciation: withdrawal.[19] Withdrawal, unlike renunciation, does not speak to when an actor is relieved from conspiracy liability. Instead, it addresses when an actor may be relieved from the collateral consequences of a conspiracy.[20] For example, "a defendant may attempt to establish his withdrawal as a defense in a prosecution for substantive crimes subsequently committed by the other conspirators."[21] Or the defendant "may want to prove his withdrawal so as to show that as to him the statute of limitations has run."[22] On these kinds of collateral issues, DCCA case law recognizes a withdrawal defense, under which the defendant "must take affirmative action to disavow or defeat the purpose, or definite, decisive and positive steps which indicate a full and complete disassociation."[23] And, "[i]n the event that a defendant claims that he or she withdrew from the conspiracy and the evidence warrants such an instruction," the criminal jury instructions indicate that the burden is on the "government to prove that the defendant was a member of the conspiracy and did not withdraw it."[24]

In the solicitation context, there does not appear to be any DCCA case law on the contours of this form of general inchoate liability—let alone any case law on renunciation.[25]

In the absence of District authority directly addressing the viability of a renunciation defense to the general inchoate crimes of attempt, conspiracy, and solicitation, the most relevant aspect of District law is the intersection between withdrawal and accomplice liability. The DCCA appears to recognize that the same withdrawal defense applicable in the conspiracy context is also available to those being prosecuted as aiders and abettors.[26] In this context, however, withdrawal provides the basis for a complete defense. Which is to say, an accomplice that "take[s] affirmative action to disavow or defeat the purpose, or definite, decisive and positive steps which indicate a full and [19] There does not appear to be any DCCA case law on the general inchoate crime of solicitation. See generally Commentary on D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 4.500 (observing that does not appear to contain a single reported decision "involving [the District's general solicitation] statute.")

[20] PAUL H. ROBINSON, 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 81 (Westlaw 2018) (collecting authorities).

[21] WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 12.4 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019); see JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 29.09 (6th ed. 2012) ("If a person withdraws from a conspiracy, she may avoid liability for subsequent crimes committed in furtherance of the conspiracy by her former co-conspirators.").

[22] WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 12.4 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019); see JOSHUA DRESSLER, UNDERSTANDING CRIMINAL LAW § 27.07 (6th ed. 2012) ("[O]nce a person withdraws, the statute of limitations for the conspiracy begins to run in her favor.").

[23] Bost v. United States, No. 12-CF-1589, 2018 WL 893993, at *28 (D.C. Feb. 15, 2018) (quoting Harris v. United States, 377 A.2d 34, 38 (D.C. 1977) (citing Hyde v. United States, 225 U.S. 347, 369 (1911); United States v. Chester, 407 F.2d 53, 55 (3rd Cir. 1969)); see, e.g., Kelly v. United States, 639 A.2d 86, 91 (D.C. 1994); Baker v. United States, 867 A.2d 988, 1007 (D.C. 2005).

[24] Commentary on D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 7.102.

[25] See generally Commentary on D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 4.500.

[26] See Plater v. United States, 745 A.2d 953, 958 (D.C. 2000) ("Legal withdrawal [as a defense to accomplice liability] has been defined as '(1) repudiation of the defendant's prior aid or (2) doing all that is possible to countermand his prior aid or counsel, and (3) doing so before the chain of events has become unstoppable.") (quoting WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 13.3 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019)).

complete disassociation" cannot be convicted of the crime for which he or she has been charged with aiding and abetting.[27]

Recognition of a withdrawal defense to accomplice liability is congruent with recognition of a renunciation defense to general inchoate crimes. This is clearest in the context of conspiracy and solicitation liability given that the elements of accomplice liability are nearly identical—indeed, soliciting or conspiring with another person to commit a crime are two ways of aiding and abetting its commission.[28] But it is also true in the context of attempts, given the broader sense in which holding someone criminally responsible as an aider and abettor effectively "constitute[s] a form of inchoate liability."[29] And, perhaps most importantly, the elements of a withdrawal defense are not only similar to, but are necessarily included within, the more stringent elements of a renunciation defense, which typically requires non-consummation of the target offense under circumstances manifesting a voluntary and complete repudiation of criminal intent.[30] Arguably, then, the failure to recognize a renunciation defense to general inchoate crimes would be "inconsistent with the doctrine allowing an analogous defense in the complicity area."[31]

This is not to say, however, that the burden of proof governing a renunciation defense should be the same as that applicable to a withdrawal defense.[32] Even assuming

---

[27] In re D.N., 65 A.3d 88, 95 (D.C. 2013) ("Withdrawal is no defense to accomplice liability unless the defendant takes affirmative action to disavow or defeat the purpose, or definite, decisive and positive steps which indicate a full and complete disassociation.") (quoting Harris v. United States, 377 A.2d 34, 38 (D.C. 1977)); see In re D.N., 65 A.3d at 95 ("Even if D.N. regretted the unfolding consequences of the brutal robbery in which he participated, that does not relieve him of criminal liability.").

[28] See, e.g., Tann v. United States, 127 A.3d 400, 499 n.11 ("Generally, it may be said that accomplice liability exists when the accomplice intentionally encourages or assists, in the sense that his purpose is to encourage or assist another in the commission of a crime as to which the accomplice has the requisite mental state.") (quoting WAYNE R. LAFAVE, 2 SUBST. CRIM. L. § 13.2 (3d ed. Westlaw 2019)); United States v. Simmons, 431 F. Supp. 2d 38, 48 (D.D.C. 2006), aff'd sub nom. United States v. McGill, 815 F.3d 846 (D.C. Cir. 2016) ("Convictions for first degree murder while armed . . . may be based on evidence that he solicited and facilitated the murder.") (citing Collazo v. United States, 196 F.2d 573, 580 (D.C. Cir. 1952)); see also Adam Harris Kurland, To "Aid, Abet, Counsel, Command, Induce, or Procure the Commission of an Offense": A Critique of Federal Aiding and Abetting Principles, 57 S.C. L. REV. 85 (2005); Model Penal Code § 2.06(3).

[29] Michael T. Cahill, Defining Inchoate Crime: An Incomplete Attempt, 9 OHIO ST. J. CRIM. L. 751, 756 n.14 (2012).

[30] As one commentator phrases the distinction:

> "Withdrawal," commonly used in reference to the collateral consequences of conspiracy, tends to require only notification of an actor's abandonment to his confederates. "Renunciation" generally requires not only desistance, but more active rejection, and usually contains specific subjective requirements, such as a complete and voluntary renunciation.

PAUL H. ROBINSON, 1 CRIM. L. DEF. § 81 at 1 (Westlaw 2018).

[31] Model Penal Code § 5.03 cmt. at 457.

[32] As the D.C. Court of Appeals explained in Green v. Dist. of Columbia Dep't of Employment Servs.:

> The term 'burden of proof' [] encompass[es] two separate burdens: the burden of production and the burden of persuasion . . . The former refers to the burden of coming forward with satisfactory evidence of a particular fact in issue . . . The latter constitutes the burden of persuading the trier of fact that the alleged fact is true.

that the burden of persuasion for a withdrawal defense ultimately rests with the government under current District law,[33] there are nevertheless sound policy and practical reasons to place the burden of persuasion for a renunciation defense on the defendant, subject to a preponderance of the evidence standard. And there is also general District precedent supporting such an approach; many statutory defenses in the D.C. Code are subject to a preponderance of the evidence standard that must be proven by the defendant.[34]

Consistent with the above analysis, the RCC recognizes a broadly applicable renunciation defense, subject to proof by the defendant beyond a preponderance of the evidence, to the general inchoate crimes of attempt, solicitation, and conspiracy.

499 A.2d 870, 873 (D.C. 1985) (internal citations omitted).

[33] Compare Commentary on D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 7.102 ("In the event that a defendant claims that he or she withdrew from the conspiracy and the evidence warrants such an instruction, [then the] burden [is] on government to prove that the defendant was a member of the conspiracy and did not withdraw it.") with Smith v. United States, 568 U.S. 106 (2013) (placing burden on defendant to prove withdrawal from conspiracy under federal law).

[34] Most notably, this includes the District's statutory insanity defense, D.C. Code § 24-501 ("No person accused of an offense shall be acquitted on the ground that he was insane at the time of its commission unless his insanity, regardless of who raises the issue, is affirmatively established by a preponderance of the evidence."); see Bell v. United States, 950 A.2d 56, 66 (D.C. 2008) ("To establish a prima facie case, the defendant must present sufficient evidence to show that at the time of the criminal conduct, as a result of a mental illness or defect, he lacked substantial capacity to recognize the wrongfulness of his act or to conform his conduct to the requirements of the law . . . If a defendant fails to establish a prima facie case, the trial court is justified in not presenting the issue to the jury."); see also Bethea v. United States, 365 A.2d 64, 90 (D.C. 1976) ("Properly viewed, the concepts of both diminished capacity and insanity involve a moral choice by the community to withhold a finding of responsibility and its consequence of punishment."). For other examples, see D.C. Code § 22-3611 (b) (providing, with respect to penalty enhancement for crimes committed against minors, that it "is an affirmative defense that the accused reasonably believed that the victim was not a minor at the time of the offense," which "defense shall be established by a preponderance of the evidence."); D.C. Code § 22-3601(c) (same for penalty enhancement for crimes committed against minors); D.C. Code § 22-3011(b) (providing, with respect to child sex abuse, that [m]arriage or domestic partnership between the defendant and the child or minor at the time of the offense is a defense, which the defendant must establish by a preponderance of the evidence . . . .").

RCC § 22E-401. Lesser Harm.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes a lesser harm defense for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The defense applies where a person acts under a reasonable belief that they are acting to avert a greater harm.[1] The RCC lesser harm defense is the first codification of such a defense (also known as a necessity defense[2] or lesser evils defense) in the District.

Subsection (a) establishes the requirements for the defense. The term "in fact" specifies that the person is strictly liable as to whether the elements in paragraphs (a)(1) (a)(2), and (a)(3) are satisfied or not.[3]

Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that the person must reasonably believe[4] that someone is in imminent danger of a specific, identifiable harm.[5] The word "imminent" should be construed to mean ready to take place or dangerously near. It should not be construed to have the same meaning as "immediate" or to require that the harm will occur at a specific moment in time.[6] The term "harm" is not defined and is intended to be construed broadly per its ordinary meaning to encompass damage, injury, loss, or risk thereof. The person's

[1] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 3.02 cmt. at 9-10 (1985) ("Under this section, property may be destroyed to prevent the spread of a fire. A speed limit may be violated in pursuing a suspected criminal. An ambulance may pass a traffic light. Mountain climbers lost in a storm may take refuge in a house or may appropriate provisions. Cargo may be jettisoned or an embargo violated to preserve the vessel. An alien may violate a curfew in order to reach an air raid shelter. A druggist may dispense a drug without the requisite prescription to alleviate grave distress in an emergency. A developed legal system must have better ways of dealing with such problems than to refer only to the letter of particular prohibitions, framed without reference to cases of this kind.")

[2] A necessity defense excuses criminal actions taken in response to exigent circumstances. See Reale v. United States, 573 A.2d 13, 15 (D.C. 1990).

[3] RCC § 22E-207. Namely, under (a)(1), the person's belief must, in fact, be reasonable and, under (a)(2), the harm avoided must, in fact, be greater than the harm caused. However, there is no additional proof required as to the person's desire or awareness with respect to (a)(1) and (a)(2).

[4] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist.

[5] The defense does not apply where a person takes proactive measures to avoid a risk of some indeterminate harm. Consider, for example, a person who believes that an elected official will reallocate funds from community health services funds to benefit a wealthy developer. That person is not justified in kidnapping the elected official to prevent such a generalized, ambiguous harm to others.

[6] Consider, for example, Person A knows that Person B is frequently prone to suicidal ideations and specific and identifiable forms of physical self-harm. Person A may be justified in removing a dangerous weapon or poison from Person B's home, in violation of RCC § 22E-2101 (Unauthorized Use of Property). Person A does not need to wait until a suicide is attempted before the defense applies.

belief that the harm will occur may be mistaken,[7] but it must be objectively reasonable.[8] Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[9]

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies that the person must reasonably believe[10] that the conduct constituting the offense will prevent a harm from occurring.[11] The actor must also reasonably believe that the conduct constituting the offense is necessary in degree.[12]

---

[7] Consider, for example, a person who believes that a child is at risk of imminently dying and speeds through a series of red lights to get the child to the emergency room. First, the person's conduct may be justified under the lesser harm defense even if it turns out that the child was experiencing a non-life threatening allergic reaction. Second, the person's conduct may be justified under the lesser harm defense even if it turns out that no amount of rushing would have been enough to save the child and that the attempt was futile. Third, the person's conduct may be justified under the lesser harm defense even if it turns out that taking the child to the emergency room actually made the illness or injury worse.

[8] Consider, for example, a person who believes in a superstition that a black cat crossing their path causes bad luck. That person is not justified in injuring black cats to prevent them from crossing anyone's path. Consider also, for example, a person who genuinely fears that every person of a particular race, religion, or sexual orientation is a violent predator. The lesser harm defense is unavailable if the factfinder determines the belief is objectively unreasonable.

[9] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

[10] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist.

[11] See Griffin v. U. S., 447 A.2d 776, 778 (D.C. 1982) ("[A]ppellants had failed to proffer evidence sufficient to establish the elements of the defense because: (1) their proffer did not set forth any evidence concerning a specific, immediate, identifiable harm, reasonably perceived to be avoided by appellants' action…" (Emphasis added.)).

[12] Consider, for example, a police agency that uses an algorithm to determine which citizens are most likely to commit a violent crime that has proven to be an accurate predictor of behavior. That agency is not justified in arresting and preventatively detaining someone based on their risk assessment alone when less severe alternatives (e.g., investigation or monitoring) are readily available because such conduct would not be necessary. Consider also, for example, a group of people who stranded together on a boat and learn that one passenger has a highly contagious, deadly virus. The group is not justified in throwing that passenger overboard when less severe alternatives (e.g., quarantine, vaccination, protective personal equipment) are readily available because such conduct would not be necessary.

Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[13] Conduct is not necessary in degree if the greater harm can be avoided by a reasonable "legal alternative available to the defendants that does not involve violation of the law."[14]

Paragraph (a)(3) specifies that the harm to be avoided must be significantly greater than the harm caused by the conduct constituting the offense.[15] Unlike paragraph (a)(1) and paragraph (a)(2), paragraph (a)(3) is not satisfied by action with a reasonable belief. The question of whether one harm outweighs another harm is not committed to the private judgment of the person engaging in the conduct,[16] rather it is a mixed question of fact and law for determination at trial.[17] In most instances, the infliction of bodily injury to a person exceeds other harms.[18] However, there are exceptions to this general rule.[19] Causing the death of a person significantly exceeds every harm other than the death of one or more other persons.

---

[13] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

[14] Griffin v. U.S., 447 A.2d 776, 778 (D.C. 1982) (citing United States v. Bailey, 444 U.S. 394, 410 (1980) ("Under any definition of these defenses one principle remains constant: if there was a reasonable, legal alternative to violating the law, "a chance both to refuse to do the criminal act and also to avoid the threatened harm," the defenses will fail.")).

[15] See Griffin v. U. S., 447 A.2d 776, 777 (D.C. 1982) ("[T]he necessity defense exonerates persons who commit a crime under the 'pressure of circumstances,' if the harm that would have resulted from compliance with the law would have significantly exceeded the harm actually resulting from the defendants' breach of the law." (Emphasis added.)).

[16] See Swisher v. United States, 572 A.2d 85 (D.C. App. 1990) (where a desire to attend a funeral did not constitute "necessity" as a defense to charge of contempt of court for failing to appear, although the defendant may have subjectively believed it was necessary to attend).

[17] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 3.02 cmt. at 12 ("[I]t requires that the harm or evil sought to be avoided be greater than that which would be caused by the commission of the offense, not that the defendant believe it to be so.").

[18] For example, a person is not justified in beating up a habitual thief to teach him a lesson.

[19] For example, a person who recklessly shoves a bystander out of the way while running away from a purse snatcher may have a lesser harm defense. Consider also, for example, a person who is experiencing homelessness and takes shelter without permission in an empty building by breaking through a window. The factfinder must consider whether the risk of bodily harm (e.g., discomfort, possible hypothermia) significantly exceeds the degree of the trespassory intrusion and property damage (e.g., momentary shelter in an entryway, moving in and locking the owners out).

Subsection (b) establishes three exceptions to the lesser harm defense.

Paragraph (b)(1) and (b)(2) preclude application of the defense if an objective element of the offense must be proven, the objective element requires either a reckless or negligent mental state, and the actor brought about the circumstances requiring the choice of harms, recklessly or negligently.[20] Recklessness and negligence are defined in RCC § 22E-206. The term "brings about" requires that the actor caused the situation requiring the defense. The actor's conduct must have been a but-for cause of the situation, and the situation must have been reasonably foreseeable.[21] An actor can bring about the situation either by instigating others, or by placing him or herself in circumstances in which others pose a risk of harm.[22]

Paragraph (b)(3) specifies that the defense does not apply in circumstances where the legislature has more specifically addressed the conduct in question in another codified defense or exclusion from liability.[23]

Subsection (c) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. Four aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to District law.

First, the revised statute does not categorically require that the harm to be avoided be an immediate harm. The current D.C. Code does not codify a lesser harm defense. However, District case law requires evidence of "a specific, immediate, identifiable harm." That the danger is "imminent" is sometimes stated in District case law as a requirement,

---

[20] For example, this limitation would preclude a necessity defense when an actor recklessly causes a fire, then recklessly damages property in an attempt to prevent the spread of the fire (e.g., throwing an expensive painting away from the fire but toward the vicinity of a puddle, which damages the painting). Even assuming the actor meets the other requirements of a necessity defense, the defense is not available for criminal destruction of property, RCC § 22E-2503(e).

See Model Penal Code § 3.02 cmt. at 14 (1985) ("When the actor has made a proper choice of values, his belief in the necessity of his conduct to serve the higher value will exculpate unless the crime involved can be committed recklessly or negligently. When the latter is the case, recklessness or negligence in bringing about the situation requiring the choice of evils or in appraising the necessity for his conduct may be the basis for conviction. This treatment of the matter thus precludes conviction of a purposeful offense when the actor's culpability inheres in recklessness or negligence, while sanctioning conviction for a crime for which that level of culpability is otherwise sufficient to convict.").

[21] Legal causation as defined in RCC § 22E-204 requires that the result is reasonably foreseeable, and that if the result is due to another person's volitional conduct, the actor may be justly be held responsible for the result. However, the term "brings about" only requires that the actor's conduct was a but-for cause of the situation, and that it was reasonably foreseeable. When the situation is the result of another person's volitional conduct, it is not necessary to prove that the actor is justly responsible for the situation.

[22] For example, if a person chooses to participate in a criminal enterprise, reckless that a failure to commit criminal acts will be punished by physical harm, the defense may be unavailable if the person commits a criminal offense due to fear of the physical harm.

[23] For example, a teacher could not spank a child to prevent further misbehavior and justify their conduct under the lesser harm defense. The legislature has already considered such circumstances in the special responsibility defenses (RCC § 22E-408) and determined that for a teacher, misbehavior does not outweigh the harm of spanking a child. See Model Penal Code § 3.02 cmt. at 13 (1985) ("...the general choice of evils defense cannot succeed if the issue of competing values has been previously foreclosed by a deliberate legislative choice, as when some provision of the law deals explicitly with the specific situation that presents the choice of evils or a legislative purpose to exclude the claimed justification otherwise appears.").

although the meaning of the word is not clear and at least in some instances appears to mean "immediate" in a temporal sense.[24] To resolve this ambiguity, the RCC statute requires the harm be imminent, but does not limit the precise timing of harm to be avoided. In unusual circumstances, conduct may be necessary to avoid a much later but otherwise inevitable harm.[25] This change improves the proportionality of the revised offenses.

Second, the RCC lesser harm defense does not apply when recklessness or negligence is the culpable mental state for an objective element of an offense that must be proven, and the actor is reckless or negligent, as the case may be, in bringing about the situation requiring a choice of harms or in appraising the necessity for the actor's conduct. The current D.C. Code does not codify a lesser harm defense and current District case law on the lesser harm defense[26] does not address the actor's culpability where the actor is reckless or negligent in bringing about the circumstances requiring a choice of harms. Resolving this ambiguity, the RCC lesser harm defense expressly limits the defense when the actor recklessly or negligently created or appraised the underlying situation that appeared to require a choice of evils. This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Third, the revised defense does not apply when the conduct constituting the offense is expressly addressed by another available defense, affirmative defense, or exclusion from liability. The current D.C. Code does not codify a lesser harm defense or other general defenses and current District case law on the lesser harm defense[27] does not address whether the defense is available when other general defenses are available. To resolve this ambiguity, the revised statute bars use of the lesser harm defense when the conduct is expressly addressed by another defense, affirmative defense, or exclusion from liability. The lesser harm defense is broadly worded given the wide range of circumstances in which it may be invoked, but it is not intended to replace or be an alternative to more specific requirements for defenses, affirmative defenses, or exclusions from liability that have been [24] See Griffin v. U. S., 447 A.2d 776, 778 (D.C. 1982) ("The defense is not available where…(2) the harm to be prevented is neither imminent, nor would be directly affected by the defendants' actions.... … Appellants' motion makes clear that their actions were designed to focus attention on the plight of the homeless; they were not undertaken as a last resort, after all else had been attempted, to avoid an immediate harm."); see also Morgan v. Foretich, 546 A.2d 407, 411 (D.C. 1988); Fleet v. Fleet, 137 A.3d 983, 988 (D.C. 2016) (explaining, "This defense of necessity does not require proof that harm is actually occurring, but only that the defendant have a reasonable belief that harm is imminent.").

---

[25] As the Model Penal Code commentary explains, "[I]t is a mistake to erect imminence as an absolute requirement, since there may be situations in which an otherwise illegal act is necessary to avoid an evil that may occur in the future. If, for example, A and B have driven in A's car to a remote mountain location for a month's stay and B learns that A plans to kill him near the end of the stay, B would be justified in escaping with A's car although the threatened harm will not occur for three weeks." The revised defense applies in this scenario. See Model Penal Code § 3.02 cmt. at 17 (1985).

[26] Griffin v. United States, 447 A.2d 776, (D.C.1982), cert. den. sub nom. Snyder v. United States, 461 U.S. 907 (1983).

[27] Id.

codified by the legislature.[28] This change eliminates a possible gap in liability in the revised statutes.

Fourth, the RCC lesser harm defense requires a person to have reasonable belief but otherwise requires no proof as to subjective mental state. The current D.C. Code does not codify a lesser harm defense and current District case law on the lesser harm defense[29] does not address what state of mind, if any, must be proven regarding the necessity for the otherwise criminal conduct or the fact that it is a significantly lesser harm. To resolve this ambiguity, the RCC lesser harm defense clarifies that there is no culpable mental state for the defense besides proof that the person "reasonably believes" that there is imminent danger of a specific, identifiable harm and that the conduct constituting the offense will protect against the harm and is necessary in degree. A reasonable mistake as to the facts of the situation and available alternatives does not negate the defense. This change clarifies that the revised statutes.

[28] For example, the special responsibility defenses in RCC § 22E-408 are carefully limited to persons who bear a special relationship to the complaining witness. It is drafted to allow a parent to physically discipline a child but to prohibit corporal punishment by schoolteachers. Subsection (b)(3) of the revised statute makes clear that a teacher could not use the lesser harm defense to justify corporal punishment because that situation is already accounted for by the special responsibility defense. See the Model Penal Code's necessity defense ("Justification Generally: Choice of Evils") in § 3.02(a)(2), which requires that "neither the Code nor other law defining the offense provides exceptions or defenses dealing with the specific situation involved."

[29] Griffin v. United States, 447 A.2d 776, (D.C.1982), cert. den. sub nom. Snyder v. United States, 461 U.S. 907 (1983).

RCC § 22E-402. Execution of Public Duty.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes an execution of public duty defense for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The defense applies when a court order or another law requires or authorizes a person to engaged in conduct that otherwise constitutes a criminal offense. The RCC execution of public duty defense is the first codification of such a defense in the District.

Subsection (a) establishes the requirements for the defense. The term "in fact" specifies that the person is strictly liable as to whether the elements in paragraphs (a)(1) – (3) are satisfied or not.[1] An actor may satisfy the defense requirements under paragraph (a)(1), (a)(2), or (a)(3).

Paragraph (a)(1) applies where the conduct constituting the offense is required or authorized by one of six kinds of laws. Subparagraph (a)(1)(A) provides a defense where the person complies with a court order. The term "court order" includes any judicial directive, oral or written.[2] Subparagraph (a)(1)(B) provides a defense where a person complies with a law governing the armed services or the lawful conduct of war. Subparagraph (a)(1)(C) applies where a public official complies with a law defining their duties. This includes civil law.[3] The term "public official" is a defined term that means a government employee, government contractor, law enforcement officer, or public official as defined in D.C. Code § 1-1161.01(47). The phrase "a law" is intended to make clear that the defense applies where there are two or more conflicting laws and at least one of them requires or authorizes the conduct. Subparagraph (a)(1)(D) applies where a person assists a public official in the performance of that official's duties. Subparagraph (a)(1)(E) applies where a person is serving process in accordance with the law. Subparagraph (a)(1)(F) applies when any other law imposes a public duty, whether on public officials or private citizens.[4] The word "law" should be construed broadly to include any statute or municipal regulation.[5]

Paragraphs (a)(2) and (a)(3) provide that, alternatively, there are two instances in which the defense applies to a person who mistakenly but reasonably believes[6] that their conduct is authorized by law. Per the rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207, a person

---

[1] RCC § 22E-207.

[2] Consider, for example, a person who is ordered to remain in court for a hearing, after the time that they are due to return to a halfway house has passed. That person has an execution of public duty defense to violation of work release under RCC § 24-241.05A.

[3] See Model Penal Code § 3.03 cmt. at 26 (1985) (explaining the defense may include civil cases governing officers' immunity from tort liability).

[4] See Model Penal Code § 3.03 cmt. at 23 (1985) ("Because public duties of immense variety can be found in the statutory and common law of every state, in a section like this it would be unwieldy to attempt a complete catalogue giving attention to the precise contours of each public responsibility.").

[5] See Model Penal Code § 3.03 cmt. at 25 (1985) (explaining a "formal administrative regulation" is sufficient for the defense).

[6] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist.

is strictly liable as to whether their mistaken belief is reasonable.[7] Paragraph (a)(2) specifies that the defense applies where a person reasonably believes their conduct is authorized by a court order or warrant. The person must reasonably believe that the order or warrant authorizes the conduct and that they are personally authorized to perform it. Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[8] Paragraph (a)(3) specifies that the defense applies to private citizens who reasonably believe that they are required or authorized to assist a public officer in the performance of their official duties. Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[9] This defense is available even if the officer is exceeding their authority.[10]

Subsection (b) establishes two exceptions to the execution of public duty defense. Paragraph (b)(1) specifies that the defense does not apply in circumstances where the legislature has more specifically addressed the conduct in question in another codified justification defense.[11] Paragraph (b)(2) disallows the defense in cases involving use of force unless the law clearly authorizes the use of deadly force in that instance.[12]

Subsection (c) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. Execution of public duty is a new general defense and, in that sense, all aspects of the revised statute are substantive changes to District law.

---

[7] See id. at 28 (explaining that criminal liability will attach where the mistaken belief was formed recklessly or negligently).

[8] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

[9] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

[10] However, this defense is not available where the conduct is the use of deadly force. See Model Penal Code § 3.03 cmt. at 28.

[11] See Model Penal Code § 3.03 cmt. at 26 (1985) (explaining that "explicit, carefully worked out provisions of the criminal law should control the general law of public duties in the cases to which they speak.").

[12] For example, the law expressly authorizes the use of deadly force by private corrections officers. See D.C. Code § 24-261.02.

RCC § 22E-403. Defense of Self or Another Person.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes the defense of self or another person defense for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The defense applies where a person acts under a reasonable belief that they are protecting themselves or another person from a specified physical harm. The RCC defense of self or another person defense is the first codification of such a defense in the District.

Subsection (a) establishes the requirements for the defense. The term "in fact" indicates that no culpable mental state need be proven for the defense requirements in subsection (a).

Paragraph (a)(1) requires that the person must reasonably believe[1] that the conduct constituting the offense will prevent a specified physical harm to the actor or to another person from occurring or continuing.[2] The word "imminent" should be construed to mean ready to take place or dangerously near. It should not be construed to have the same meaning as "immediate" or to require that the harm will occur at a specific moment in time.[3] The harm at issue may be a physical contact, bodily injury, sexual act, sexual contact, confinement, or death and must be specific and identifiable. The harm could be caused by a criminal act or an accident.[4] The terms "bodily injury," "sexual act," and "sexual contact" are defined in RCC § 22E-701 and include a wide array of conduct.[5] The phrase "physical contact" should be construed to have the same meaning as in RCC § 22E-1205. The word "confinement" is undefined and is intended to broadly include confining a person in a closed space, limiting a person's movements by applying physical restraints to the body, and taking a person to another location against their will. The actor's belief that the harm will occur may be mistaken,[6] but it must be objectively reasonable.

---

[1] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist.

[2] An additional motive, such as animus or hatred toward the complainant, does not defeat an otherwise valid claim of self-defense or defense of another person. Parker v. United States, 155 A.3d 835 (D.C. 2017).

[3] Consider, for example, a person who is stranded without access to food or water and fears that they might eventually die of starvation. That person may be justified in taking an abandoned vehicle to get to safety in violation of RCC § 22E-2101 (Unauthorized Use of Property). The person does not need to wait until they are on the very brink of death to act.

[4] Consider, for example, a baseball coach who observes Player A is about to take a practice swing that will accidentally hit Player B. The coach may be justified in assaulting Player A, roughly pushing them out of the way, to protect Player B from being injured.

[5] The fact that a person may defend against even the most minor bodily injury or sexual contact is offset by the requirement that the conduct must be necessary in its degree. For example, an actor may be justified in using a great amount physical force to protect against a beating about the head or a prolonged groping of the breast and be unjustified in using the same degree of force to protect against a mere grazing of the arm or buttocks.

[6] Sloan v. United States, 527 A.2d 1277 (D.C. 1987); Jackson v. United States, 645 A.2d 1099 (D.C. 1994).

Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[7]

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies that the actor must reasonably believe[8] that the conduct constituting the offense will protect against the harm and that it is necessary in degree.[9] Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[10] It may be reasonable for person acting in the heat of passion to believe a greater degree of force is necessary than would seem necessary to a calm mind.[11] Conduct is not necessary in degree if the harm can be avoided by a reasonable "legal alternative available to the defendants that does not involve violation of the law."[12]

---

[7] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

[8] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist.

[9] The reasonableness of the belief that the conduct is necessary is fact-sensitive and depends in part on the type of harm that is being threatened, the degree of harm that is being threatened, and, in the case of defense of a third person, that third person's ability to protect themselves. The actor's awareness of the complainant's reputation for violence is also a relevant consideration. See, e.g., Hart v. United States, 863 A.2d 866, 870 (D.C. 2004)

[10] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

[11] Fersner v. United States, 482 A.2d 387, 392 (D.C. 1984) ("[W]hen it comes to determining whether—and to what degree—force is reasonably necessary to defend a third person under attack, the focus ultimately must be on the intervenor's, not the victim's, reasonable perceptions of the situation."). See also Lee v. United States, 61 A.3d 655, 660 (D.C. 2013); Jones v. United States, 555 A.2d 1024, 1027–28 (D.C. 1989); Graves v. United States, 554 A.2d 1145, 1147–49 (D.C. 1989).

[12] See Commentary to RCC § 22E-401, Lesser Harm; Griffin v. United States, 447 A.2d 776, 778 (D.C. 1982) (citing United States v. Bailey, 444 U.S. 394, 410 (1980) ("Under any definition of these defenses one principle remains constant: if there was a reasonable,

Retreat may be a reasonable way to avoid a harm, however an actor has no affirmative duty to retreat when the requirements of the defense are otherwise satisfied.[13]

Subsection (b) establishes three exceptions to the defense of self or another person defense.

Paragraph (b)(1) limits the availability of the defense when the actor uses or attempts to use deadly force. The term "deadly force" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and means any physical force that is likely to cause serious bodily injury or death or death. A person may use deadly force even if the person does not intend to cause a serious injury[14] and even if death or serious injury does not occur.[15] The word "attempt" in paragraph (b)(1) should be construed to have the same meaning as in Criminal Attempt under RCC § 22E-301. That is, a person attempts to use deadly force if they engage in conduct that is reasonably adapted to causing serious bodily injury or death.[16] Under paragraph (b)(1), however, the actor must reasonably believe[17] that they or another are in imminent danger. Sub-subparagraph (b)(1)(A)(i) applies to any actor in any location and permits deadly force only to protect against serious bodily injury, a sexual act, confinement or death. Sub-subparagraph (b)(1)(A)(ii) applies only when the actor is inside their own individual dwelling unit[18] and permits deadly force to protect against bodily injury and sexual contact, legal alternative to violating the law, "a chance both to refuse to do the criminal act and also to avoid the threatened harm," the defenses will fail.")).

---

[13] Gillis v. U. S., 400 A.2d 311, 313 (D.C. 1979) (explaining there is no affirmative duty to retreat because "when faced with a real or apparent threat of serious bodily harm or death itself, the average person lacks the ability to reason in a restrained manner how best to save himself and whether it is safe to retreat" but that a jury may consider whether a defendant "could have avoided further encounter by stepping back or walking away" in deciding whether the defendant was actually or apparently in danger).

[14] For example, a factfinder may find that an actor who repeatedly stabs a person in the abdomen with a long knife used deadly force that was objectively likely to kill the person, even though the actor subjectively intended to only inflict a superficial wound. Expert testimony may be required to assist the factfinder in understanding whether particular conduct is likely to cause death or serious bodily injury.

[15] For example, a factfinder may find that a bullet wound was likely to cause a serious bodily injury if not for immediate intervention by a medical professional. Expert testimony may be required to assist the factfinder in understanding whether a particular injury is likely to cause death or serious bodily injury.

[16] A person does not attempt to use deadly force by merely desiring to seriously injure the other person. For example, a person who intends to kill someone by pinching their arm does not attempt to use deadly force.

[17] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist.

[18] The word "inside" should be construed to mean inside the boundaries of the structure and to include a sunroom or balcony that is exposed to outdoor elements. The term "dwelling" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and does not require proof of ownership or long-term residency. The words "individual" and "unit" make clear that the communal areas of multi-unit housing buildings are not included.

provided that other requirements of the defense are met. The actor must also reasonably believe[19] that their conduct will protect against the harm and is necessary in degree.

Paragraph (b)(2) precludes application of the defense if the defendant is the initial aggressor.[20] That is, if the actor purposely provokes or brings about the situation that necessitates the defense, the defense will not apply. "Purposely" is defined in RCC § 22E-206 and here requires that the person consciously desire that the specific danger[21] occur. The term "brings about" requires that the actor caused the situation requiring the defense. The actor's conduct must have been a but-for cause of the situation, and the situation must have been reasonably foreseeable.[22] An actor can bring about the situation either by instigating others, or by placing him or herself in circumstances in which others pose a risk of harm.[23]

Paragraph (b)(2) allows for two circumstances in which a person may claim self-defense or defense of another person even though they were the initial aggressor. First, the defense is available if the actor provokes the danger through speech[24] or presence alone.[25]

---

[19] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist.

[20] Consider, for example, an actor who learns of a protest in a neighboring town and wants to confront the protestors and cause a violent scene. The actor arms himself with a concealed firearm and begins assaulting protestors, hoping that one will fight back and give him a reason to use deadly force to in self-defense.

[21] If after a confrontation begins, the actor becomes subject to an unforeseeable amount of force, the actor may nevertheless respond in self-defense. Under these circumstances, it cannot be said that the person purposefully provoked the danger. See Andrews v. United States, 125 A.3d 316, 323 n.22 (D.C. 2015) (defense available when complainant "unjustifiably escalate[d] the ... level of violence[.]"); see also Lee v. United States, 61 A.3d 655, 658 n.2 (D.C. 2013).

[22] Legal causation as defined in RCC § 22E-204 requires that the result is reasonably foreseeable, and that if the result is due to another person's volitional conduct, the actor may be justly be held responsible for the result. However, the term "brings about" only requires that the actor's conduct was a but-for cause of the situation, and that it was reasonably foreseeable. When the situation is the result of another person's volitional conduct, it is not necessary that the actor is justly responsible for the situation.

[23] For example, if a person chooses to participate in a criminal enterprise, reckless that a failure to commit criminal acts will be punished by physical harm, the defense may be unavailable if the person commits a criminal offense due to fear of the physical harm.

[24] Consider, for example, an actor who appears at a political demonstration fighting for racial justice wearing a t-shirt with racist slurs written on it, fully intending and expecting that it will provoke a physical attack. If a demonstrator attacks the actor, the actor still has a right to use the degree of force necessary to protect herself from further assault. While political speech enjoys the greatest protection under the First Amendment, the exercise of other forms of speech does not alone constitute a provocation that bars the speaker from subsequently defending themselves or others if they are attacked and otherwise meet the requirements of the defense.

[25] The phrase "speech or presence alone" does not include menacing under RCC § 22E-1203, criminal threats under RCC § 22E-1204, or the tort of assault, defined as "putting

The term "speech" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and means oral or written language, symbols, or gestures. Second, the defense is available to an initial aggressor who withdraws[26] or makes reasonable efforts to withdraw.[27] Efforts to withdraw include communicating a desire to withdraw.

Paragraph (b)(3) precludes application of the defense if the actor is reckless as to the fact that they are protecting against conduct that is lawful.[28] The term "reckless" is defined in RCC § 22E-206 and here requires that the person consciously disregard a substantial risk that the physical harm at issue is lawful and that the actor's conduct is a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct. The exception does not require proof that the actor knows the specific law at issue but does require conscious disregard of a substantial risk that the physical harm is lawful in some manner.[29]

Subsection (c) requires a factfinder to consider certain specific facts when determining whether an actor who is a law enforcement officer and uses deadly force satisfies the requirements of the defense. The terms "law enforcement officer" and "deadly force" are defined in RCC § 22E-701. The term "in fact" indicates that the actor is strictly liable with respect to whether they are a law enforcement officer and with respect to whether the force used is deadly force.[30] The list is not exhaustive and the factfinder may consider other factors.

Subsection (d) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised defense of self or another person defense clearly changes current District law in two main ways.

First, the revised defense provides that the use of deadly force is justified if the actor is inside their own dwelling and reasonably believes that the actor or another person is in imminent danger of harms that may fall short of death or serious bodily harm—including a bodily injury, a sexual act, a sexual contact, or confinement. The D.C. Code does not codify a defense of self or another person defense. District case law provides that another in apprehension of an immediate and harmful or offensive conduct." See Madden v. D.C. Transit System, Inc., 307 A.2d 756, 767 (D.C. 1973); Person v. Children's Hosp. Nat Medical Center, 562 A.2d 648, 650 (D.C. 1989).

---

[26] If the defendant disengages, he is able to defend himself against any subsequent attack. See Rorie v. United States, 882 A.2d 763, 775 (D.C. 2005).

[27] Consider, for example, a Bar Patron A who challenges Bar Patron B to meet outside for a fight. When a large crowd gathers, A has second thoughts and tries to run away. B prevents A from fleeing and begins severely beating A. A may be now be justified in committing assault against B in self-defense.

[28] For example, an actor is not justified in committing an assault against a corrections officer to protect themselves against being confined inside D.C. Jail.

[29] Consider, for example, an actor who physically attacks a bouncer, in defense of a person the bouncer is removing at a bar. It is inconsequential that the actor does not know the specific law that authorizes a bouncer to act. If the actor recklessly disregards the fact that bouncer's conduct is lawful, the defense of another person defense does not apply.

[30] RCC § 22E-207.

a person may use deadly force to protect against death or "serious bodily harm,"[31] but has not defined the term "harm" in this context,[32] as distinguishable from "serious bodily injury" found elsewhere in the D.C. Code and case law.[33] While ambiguous, the scope of "serious bodily harm" clearly does not include non-serious bodily harm. With respect to a dwelling, the DCCA has not squarely decided to accept or reject the "castle doctrine" that one who through no fault of their own is attacked in one's own home is under no duty to retreat and may use deadly force even when not threatened with deadly force themselves.[34] The DCCA has adopted a "middle ground" approach to analyzing whether a person has a duty to retreat, holding that while there is no affirmative duty to retreat, a failure to retreat may be evidence of whether a defendant was actually or apparently in danger.[35] However, the court has held that the doctrine does not apply when the attacker is a co-occupant of the same home.[36]

In contrast, the revised defense includes a somewhat broader right to self-defense inside one's dwelling,[37] as defined in RCC § 22E-701, permitting the use of deadly force to protect against more than serious bodily injury or death, irrespective of the complainant's co-occupancy. Deadly force may be used to protect the actor or another person from bodily injury, a sexual act, a sexual contact, or confinement when the actor is

---

[31] Sacrini v. United States, 38 App. D.C. 371, 378 (D.C. Cir. 1912); Gillis v. U. S., 400 A.2d 311, 313 (D.C. 1979).

[32] But see Brown v. United States, 139 A.3d 870, 872 (D.C. 2016) (defining "serious bodily harm" to have the same meaning as "serious bodily injury" with respect to the meaning of "deadly force"); Stewart v. United States, 370 A.2d 1374, 1376 (D.C. 1977) (recognizing in dicta that other jurisdictions include sexual attacks as a bodily harm that is a possible predicate for a duress defense but then describing only serious bodily injury and death as predicates in the District).

[33] "Serious bodily injury" in other contexts has been construed to mean injury that involves a substantial risk of death, unconsciousness, extreme physical pain, protracted and obvious disfigurement, or loss or impairment of a bodily member or function. Brown v. United States, 139 A.3d 870, 876 (D.C. 2016) (regarding the meaning of "serious bodily injury" in defense of property); Jackson v. United States, 970 A.2d 277, 279 (D.C. 2009) (citing Jackson v. United States, 940 A.2d 981, 986 (D.C. 2008); Bolanos v. United States, 938 A.2d 672, 677 (D.C. 2007); Payne v. United States, 932 A.2d 1095, 1099 (D.C. 2007); Swinton v. United States, 902 A.2d 772, 776–77 (D.C. 2006)); see also RCC § 22E-701.

[34] Cooper v. United States, 512 A.2d 1002, 1005 (D.C. 1986); see also Smith v. United States, 686 A.2d 537, 545 (D.C. 1996) ("We need not decide definitively whether the castle rule should apply.").

[35] Gillis v. United States, 400 A.2d 311, 313 (D.C. 1979).

[36] Cooper v. United States, 512 A.2d 1002, 1005–06 (D.C. 1986). The court reasoned that co-occupants are usually related and have some obligation to attempt to defuse the situation. The court stated that even unrelated roommates have a heightened obligation to treat each other with a degree of tolerance and respect.

[37] Unlike some jurisdictions, the revised defense does not offer any broader protection inside one's place of business.

in their dwelling and the other requirements of the defense are met.[38] The revised defense specifically recognizes that protection against even lower-level bodily harms that occur in the home (versus another location) involve special consideration and a blanket ban on the use of deadly force for such lesser harms is unwarranted. This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Second, the revised statute provides that a law enforcement officer may be justified in using deadly force to protect a person from a sexual act or confinement. The Comprehensive Policing and Justice Reform Second Emergency Amendment Act of 2020 forbids a law enforcement officer from using deadly force unless it is immediately necessary to protect a person from serious bodily injury or death.[39] In contrast, although there are few circumstances in which it would reasonably appear necessary in degree to use deadly force to stop such harms, the revised statute permits the defense should such circumstances arise.[40] This change improves the proportionality of the revised statutes.

Beyond these two changes to current District law, seven other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to District law.

First, the revised defense applies to all offenses. The D.C. Code does not codify a self-defense or defense of others defense. The DCCA has recognized that self-defense is a defense to various offenses, including assault, possession of a prohibited weapon and threats.[41] However, the scope of offenses to which the current self-defense and defense of others defense applies is largely undefined. To resolve this ambiguity, the RCC clarifies that defense of self or another person may justify any offense. Limiting the defense to crimes involving the use of physical force, as is common in many jurisdictions,[42] may lead to counterintuitive and undesirable outcomes.[43] This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statutes.

---

[38] Instances where deadly force is reasonably necessary in degree to protect against a bodily injury or sexual contact are expected to be extremely rare, as other means of protection such as withdrawal or more moderate use of force may avoid the harm. However, should a person's only means of stopping the conduct while in their home be the use of deadly force, it may be justified under this defense. Consider for example a small-framed person who is pinned by a much larger assailant who forces them to submit to a sexual contact, but there appears to be no danger of a sexual act. Depending on the facts of the case, if the person being attacked can reach and use a deadly weapon to stop the attack, such use of deadly force may be justified.

[39] Act 23-336.

[40] Consider, for example, an assailant who has confined a large number of people in an internment camp, where they are routinely being raped and tortured but not sustaining serious bodily injuries. If all other reasonable legal alternatives have been exhausted, an officer may be justified in using a less-lethal weapon that is likely (though not certain) to kill the assailant.

[41] McBride v. United States, 441 A.2d 644 (D.C. 1982); Potter v. United States, 534 A.2d 943 (D.C. 1987); Reid v. United States, 581 A.2d 359 (D.C. 1990); Douglas v. United States, 859 A.2d 641 (D.C. 2004); Hernandez v. United States, 853 A.2d 202 (D.C. 2004).

[42] See Model Penal Code §§ 3.04 and 3.05.

[43] Consider, for example, an actor who picks up a large tree branch to protect themselves from an assault in a public park. Under the Model Penal Code's formulation, the actor

Second, the revised statute does not categorically require that the harm to be avoided be immediate. The current D.C. Code does not codify a self-defense or defense of others defense. That the danger is "imminent" is frequently stated in District case law[44] and the District's current pattern jury instruction.[45] as a requirement, but the meaning of the word is not clear and at least in some instances appears to mean "immediate" in a temporal sense.[46] To resolve this ambiguity, the RCC statute requires that the harm be imminent, but does not limit the precise timing of the harm to be avoided. In unusual circumstances, conduct may be necessary to avoid non-immediate but otherwise inevitable harm.[47] This change improves the proportionality of the revised statutes.

Third, the revised defense allows the factfinder to consider the actor's failure to retreat in non-homicide cases. The D.C. Code does not codify a defense of self or another person defense. In deadly force cases, the District of Columbia Court of Appeals (DCCA) has adopted a "middle ground" approach to analyzing whether a person has a duty to retreat, holding that while there is no affirmative duty to retreat, a failure to retreat is some evidence of whether a defendant was actually or apparently in danger.[48] The DCCA has not squarely addressed this issue of the defendant's ability to retreat in non-deadly force cases.[49] To resolve this ambiguity, the RCC adopts a middle ground approach in non-deadly force cases as well. However, the ability to consider the defendant's ability to avoid the criminal conduct (and the defendant's awareness of that ability) may be relevant in non-would have a defense to assault for hitting the attacker with the tree branch but would have no defense to disorderly conduct for instead swinging the branch around wildly to create an appearance of danger.

---

[44] See, e.g., Parker v. U.S., 155 A.3d 835 (D.C. 2017).

[45] Crim. Jury Inst. for DC Instruction § 9.500 (2019).

[46] Sacrini v. United States, 38 App. D.C. 371, 378 (D.C. Cir. 1912) ("[I]t is necessary before one may kill another in self-defense, that he shall actually have believed in his own mind at the very moment he strikes the blow, that then either his life is in danger, or that he is in danger of great bodily harm."); Dawkins v. United States, 189 A.3d 223, 233, 235 (D.C. 2019).

[47] As the Model Penal Code commentary to Necessity explains, "[I]t is a mistake to erect imminence as an absolute requirement, since there may be situations in which an otherwise illegal act is necessary to avoid an evil that may occur in the future. If, for example, A and B have driven in A's car to a remote mountain location for a month's stay and B learns that A plans to kill him near the end of the stay, B would be justified in escaping with A's car although the threatened harm will not occur for three weeks." See Model Penal Code § 3.02 cmt. at 17 (1985).

[48] Gillis v. United States, 400 A.2d 311, 313 (D.C. 1979).

[49] In Dawkins, the court stated that there is no duty to disengage from every potential interpersonal conflict and no duty to safely retreat before using nondeadly force. However, the court did not hold that a factfinder is prohibited from considering a defendant's ability to retreat (and the defendant's awareness of that ability) before engaging in the conduct constituting the offense.

deadly force cases and fact patterns.[50] This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statute.

Fourth, the revised statute provides that an actor may be justified in using deadly force to protect against a sexual act or confinement. The current D.C. Code does not codify a self-defense or defense of others defense. District case law provides that a person may use deadly force to protect against "serious bodily harm,"[51] but has not defined the term "harm" in this context,[52] as distinguishable from "serious bodily injury" found elsewhere in the D.C. Code and case law.[53] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised statute permits the defense should such circumstances arise, provided that the conduct reasonably appears necessary in degree. This change clarifies and may improve the proportionality of the revised statutes.

Fifth, the revised statute defines clear parameters for when the defense is available to a someone who provokes an attack. District case law has held that self-defense is not available to someone who "deliberately places himself in a position where he has reason to believe his presence would provoke trouble."[54] The DCCA has adopted a "middle

---

[50] Consider, for example, person A awaits a bus on a public sidewalk when person B, out for a run, yells "get out of my way" and heads in the direction of person A. Person A does not move aside and, when person B comes within arm's reach, pushes person B to the side and onto the ground, causing bodily injury. If person A is charged with an assault and claims self-defense, the revised statute does not allow the government to argue that person A had a duty to retreat. However, the revised statute also does not prohibit the factfinder from considering the feasibility of taking a step to be out of the runner's path when assessing the reasonableness of the A's belief that an assault was imminent.

[51] Sacrini v. United States, 38 App. D.C. 371, 378 (D.C. Cir. 1912); Gillis v. U. S., 400 A.2d 311, 313 (D.C. 1979).

[52] But see Brown v. United States, 139 A.3d 870, 872 (D.C. 2016) (defining "serious bodily harm" to have the same meaning as "serious bodily injury" with respect to the meaning of "deadly force"); Stewart v. United States, 370 A.2d 1374, 1376 (D.C. 1977) (recognizing in dicta that other jurisdictions include sexual attacks as a bodily harm that is a possible predicate for a duress defense but then describing only serious bodily injury and death as predicates in the District).

[53] "Serious bodily injury" in other contexts has been construed to mean injury that involves a substantial risk of death, unconsciousness, extreme physical pain, protracted and obvious disfigurement, or loss or impairment of a bodily member or function. Brown v. United States, 139 A.3d 870, 876 (D.C. 2016) (regarding the meaning of "serious bodily injury" in defense of property); Jackson v. United States, 970 A.2d 277, 279 (D.C. 2009) (citing Jackson v. United States, 940 A.2d 981, 986 (D.C. 2008); Bolanos v. United States, 938 A.2d 672, 677 (D.C. 2007); Payne v. United States, 932 A.2d 1095, 1099 (D.C. 2007); Swinton v. United States, 902 A.2d 772, 776–77 (D.C. 2006)); see also RCC § 22E-701.

[54] Rowe v. United States, 370 F.2d 240, 241 (D.C. Cir. 1966); Harris v. United States, 364 F.2d 701 (D.C. Cir. 1966) ("One cannot provoke fight and then rely on claim of self-defense when such provocation results in counterattack unless he has previously withdrawn from fray and communicated such withdrawal."); Nowlin v. United States, 382 A.2d 9, 14 n.7 (D.C. 1978); Howard v. United States, 656 A.2d 1106, 1111 (D.C. 1995).

ground" approach[55] to analyzing whether a person has a duty to retreat, holding that while there is no affirmative duty to retreat, a failure to retreat is some evidence of whether a defendant was actually or apparently in danger.[56] The ambiguity of this rule has resulted in courts requiring a duty to retreat in some cases and not others, with sometimes inconsistent and counterintuitive outcomes.[57] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised statute applies the RCC's standardized definition of "purpose"[58] and clarifies that any person (other than a person engaging in mere speech or presence alone[59]) who provokes the danger necessitating the defense loses the right to self-defense, unless they retreat or make reasonable efforts to retreat.[60] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Sixth, the revised defense does not apply when the person is reckless as to the fact that they are protecting against conduct that is lawful.[61] The current D.C. Code does not codify a defense of self or others defense. District case law has held that a person has no right to defend against an apparently lawful arrest or other apparently lawful restraint by a police officer,[62] but has not yet addressed other lawful conduct.[63] Resolving this ambiguity, the revised statute clarifies that a person cannot assert the offense if they are defending against a physical contact, bodily injury, sexual act, sexual contact, confinement, or death that is lawful and they are reckless as the fact that it is lawful. This change clarifies the revised statute.

---

[55] Consider, for example, person A awaits a bus on a public sidewalk when person B, out for a run, yells "get out of my way" and heads in the direction of person A. Person A does not move aside and, when person B comes within arm's reach, pushes person B to the side and onto the ground, causing bodily injury. If person A is charged with an assault and claims self-defense, the revised statute does not allow the government to argue that person A had a duty to retreat. However, the revised statute also does not prohibit the factfinder from considering the feasibility of taking a step to be out of the runner's path when assessing the reasonableness of the A's belief that an assault was imminent.

[56] Gillis v. United States, 400 A.2d 311, 313 (D.C. 1979).

[57] Compare Laney v. United States, 294 F. 412, 414 (D.C. Cir. 1923) (finding that self-defense was unavailable to a man who ran away from a mob of 100 men yelling "Catch the nigger," and "Kill the nigger," because he reached a place of "comparative safety" and could have gone home) with Marshall v. United States, 45 App. D.C. 373 (1916) (finding no duty to retreat during a fight over a craps game and stating, "The right of a defendant when in imminent danger to take life does not depend upon whether there was an opportunity to escape.").

[58] RCC § 22E-701.

[59] See Crim. Jury Inst. for DC Instruction § 9.504 (2019).

[60] See Harris v. United States, 364 F.2d 701, 702 (D.C. Cir. 1966); Parker v. United States, 158 F.2d 185, 186 (D.C. Cir. 1946); Rowe v. United States, 164 U.S. 546 (1896); Bedney v. United States, 471 A.2d 1022, 1023–24 (D.C. 1984).

[61] For example, an actor is not justified in committing an assault against a corrections officer to protect themselves against being confined inside D.C. Jail.

[62] Speed v. United States, 562 A.2d 124, 128 (D.C. 1989).

[63] E.g., a parent who is disciplining a child.

Seventh, the revised statute amends the list of factors that a factfinder should consider when determining whether a law enforcement officer's use of deadly force satisfies the requirements of the defense. The Comprehensive Policing and Justice Reform Second Emergency Amendment Act of 2020 states that a factfinder should consider the totality of the circumstances and provides a non-exhaustive list of factors.[64] One of these factors is: "Whether the subject of the use of deadly force [] [p]ossessed or appeared to possess a deadly weapon."[65] The scope and meaning of "possession" of a deadly weapon, whether an officer's training and experience is relevant, and other factors in this statute are unclear and there is no case law to date. To resolve these ambiguities, the revised statute clarifies the provision regarding possession of a weapon[66] and expands the list to include the officer's training and experience[67] and whether the law enforcement officer made all reasonable efforts to prevent a loss of a life. This clarifies the revised statute.

[64] Act 23-336.
[65] Id.
[66] Current law requires the factfinder to consider whether the complainant "Possessed or appeared to possess a deadly weapon," whereas the revised statute focuses on whether it appeared to the law enforcement officer that the person possessed a weapon or had one readily available. It is of little consequence that a person constructively possessed a weapon in a far-off location.
[67] See Cynthia Lee, Reforming the Law on Police Use of Deadly Force: De-Escalation, Preseizure Conduct, & Imperfect Self-Def., 2018 U. Ill. L. Rev. 629, 665 (2018) ("Unlike civilians, police officers undergo extensive training, including training on threat perception, and are more attuned than the average citizen to behaviors indicative of threat. Therefore, it makes sense to assess the reasonableness of an officer's beliefs and actions from the perspective of a reasonable officer in the defendant officer's shoes.") (Citations omitted.).

RCC § 22E-404. Defense of Property.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes defense of property defense for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The defense applies when a person acts under a reasonable belief that they are protecting their own property or property of another. The RCC defense of property defense is the first codification of such a defense in the District.

Subsection (a) establishes the requirements for the defense. The term "in fact" indicates that no culpable mental state need be proven for the defense requirements in subsection (a).[1]

Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that the person must reasonably believe[2] that property is in imminent danger of a specific, identifiable harm.[3] The word "imminent" should be construed to mean ready to take place or dangerously near. It should not be construed to have the same meaning as "immediate" or to require that the harm will occur at a specific moment in time. The term "property" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 to include services, credit, money, licenses, and benefits. However, the defense of property defense applies only when an actor is protecting real property (including things growing on, affixed to, or found on land) or personal property (i.e. movable property, including an animal).[4] The threatened harm may be damage, taking, trespass, or misuse of property belonging to any person and must be specific and identifiable.[5] The actor's belief that the harm will occur may be mistaken, but it must be objectively reasonable. Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[6]

---

[1] RCC § 22E-207.

[2] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist.

[3] The defense does not apply where a person takes proactive measures to avoid a risk of some indeterminate harm. Consider, for example, a person who believes that an elected official will reallocate funds from community health services funds to benefit a wealthy developer. That person is not justified in kidnapping the elected official to prevent such a generalized, ambiguous harm to others.

[4] For example, a person is not justified in committing fraud to protect their own wealth or in committing assault to protect a friend from being financially exploited.

[5] The defense does not apply where a person takes proactive measures to avoid a risk of some indeterminate harm. Consider, for example, a person who believes that a group of protestors pose a general danger to a neighborhood. That person is not justified in using force against a protestor unless they believe that specific protestor is posing a specific threat to specific property.

[6] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

Paragraph (a)(2) specifies that the person must reasonably believe[7] that the conduct will protect against the harm and that it is necessary in degree.[8] Conduct is not necessary in degree if the harm to property can be avoided by a reasonable "legal alternative available to the defendants that does not involve violation of the law."[9]

Subsection (b) establishes three exceptions to the defense of property defense.

Paragraph (b)(1) makes the defense unavailable when the actor uses or attempts to use deadly force. The term "deadly force" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and means any physical force that is likely to cause serious bodily injury or death. A person may use deadly force even if the person does not intend to cause a serious injury[10] and even if death or serious injury does not occur.[11] The word "attempt" in paragraph (b)(1) should be construed to have the same meaning as in Criminal Attempt under RCC § 22E-301. That

---

[7] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist. The reasonableness of the belief that the conduct is necessary is fact-sensitive and depends in part on the type of harm that is being threatened, the degree of harm that is being threatened, and the actor's relationship to the property. Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others. See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

[8] For example, an actor may be justified in beating a person (causing bodily injury but not serious bodily injury) to prevent that person from setting the actor's home on fire and unjustified in beating a person to prevent them from keying the actor's car or walking across the far edge of the actor's lawn.

[9] See Commentary to RCC § 22E-401, Lesser Harm; Griffin v. United States, 447 A.2d 776, 778 (D.C. 1982) (citing United States v. Bailey, 444 U.S. 394, 410 (1980) ("Under any definition of these defenses one principle remains constant: if there was a reasonable, legal alternative to violating the law, "a chance both to refuse to do the criminal act and also to avoid the threatened harm," the defenses will fail.")).

[10] For example, a factfinder may find that an actor who repeatedly stabs a person in the abdomen with a long knife used deadly force that was objectively likely to kill the person, even though the actor subjectively intended to only inflict a superficial wound. Expert testimony may be required to assist the factfinder in understanding whether particular conduct is likely to cause death or serious bodily injury.

[11] For example, a factfinder may find that a bullet wound was likely to cause a serious bodily injury if not for immediate intervention by a medical professional. Expert testimony may be required to assist the factfinder in understanding whether a particular injury is likely to cause death or serious bodily injury.

is, a person attempts to use deadly force if they engage in conduct that is reasonably adapted to causing serious bodily injury or death.[12]

Paragraph (b)(2) precludes application of the defense when a person is acting to protect someone else's[13] land without their permission.[14] The exception is limited to protection of land and does not include real property that is growing on, affixed to, or found on land.[15] The exception does not apply when the actor reasonably believes[16] they have the owner's effective consent to take action to protect the land, even if the owner does not actually consent.[17] Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[18] The terms "property of another" (and [12] A person does not attempt to use deadly force by merely desiring to seriously injure the other person. For example, a very weak person who intends to kill someone by pinching their arm does not attempt to use deadly force.

[13] The term "property of another" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 to include property in which the actor has some interest. However, the exception does not apply where the actor has the effective consent of any owner, including themselves.

[14] Consider, for example, Tourist A notices Tourist B continuing to take photographs instead of promptly leaving the National Arboretum at closing time. A is not justified under this section in assaulting B and removing them from the grounds unless A reasonably believes that the U.S. Department of Agriculture gave effective consent to A protecting its property.

[15] For example, an actor may be justified in protecting a school window from being criminally damaged, even if the actor does not have the effective consent of the school. However, the actor is not justified under this section in protecting the school from a trespass. But see D.C. Code § 23-582 (concerning citizen arrests).

[16] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist.

[17] Consider, for example, Neighbor A asks Neighbor B to "keep an eye on" A's house while A is away on vacation. B observes an intruder attempting to crawl through A's window and trespasses onto A's lawn and assault the intruder to hinder the burglary. A would have preferred that B call the police instead of trespassing. B's assault is justified is B reasonably believed that the A gave effective consent.

[18] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

"property) and "effective consent" (and "consent") are defined in RCC § 22E-701. An agency relationship may be evidence of effective consent[19] but is not required.[20]

Paragraph (b)(3) precludes application of the defense if the actor is reckless as to the fact that they are protecting against conduct that is lawful.[21] The term "reckless" is defined in RCC § 22E-206 and here requires that the person consciously disregard a substantial risk that the property harm is lawful and that the actor's conduct is a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct. The exception does not require proof that the actor knows the specific law at issue but does require conscious disregard of a substantial risk that the harm to property is lawful in some manner.

Subsection (c) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised defense of property defense clearly changes current District law in two main ways.

First, the revised statute does not categorically require that the harm to be avoided be immediate. The current D.C. Code does not codify a defense of property defense. However the D.C. Court of Appeals (DCCA) previously has approved use of a jury instruction that includes an immediacy requirement[22] and the District's current pattern jury instruction includes an even stronger immediacy requirement.[23] In contrast, the RCC statute requires the harm be imminent, but does not limit the precise timing of the harm to be avoided.. In unusual circumstances, conduct may be necessary to avoid non-immediate but otherwise inevitable harm.[24] This change improves the proportionality of the revised statutes.

Second, the revised statute includes harm to property belonging to a third person. The current D.C. Code does not codify a defense of property defense. However, the DCCA

---

[19] For example, a person who is hired to work as a bouncer at the door of a bar has the effective consent of the bar to protect the land from a trespass.

[20] For example, a fashion model may be justified in using force to protect a runway from an intruder. See Jonah Engel Bromwich and Sanam Yar, Meet the Chanel Crasher, NEW YORK TIMES (October 4, 2019).

[21] For example, an actor is not justified in committing an assault to protect their vehicle from what they know to be a lawful repossession.

[22] Gatlin v. United States, 833 A.2d 995, 1008 (D.C. 2003) ("A person is justified in using reasonable force to protect his/her property from trespass or theft when s/he reasonably believes that his/her property is in immediate danger of an unlawful trespass or taking and that the use of such force is necessary to avoid the danger…")

[23] Crim. Jury Inst. for DC Instruction § 9.520 (2019) ("But s/he must act immediately after the taking has occurred, or in hot pursuit of the person who has taken the property. If time has elapsed, a person may not use force in repossessing the property.").

[24] As the Model Penal Code commentary to Necessity explains, "[I]t is a mistake to erect imminence as an absolute requirement, since there may be situations in which an otherwise illegal act is necessary to avoid an evil that may occur in the future. If, for example, A and B have driven in A's car to a remote mountain location for a month's stay and B learns that A plans to kill him near the end of the stay, B would be justified in escaping with A's car although the threatened harm will not occur for three weeks." See Model Penal Code § 3.02 cmt. at 17 (1985).

has stated that the District follows the common law with regard to defense of property,[25] and at common law the defense is generally believed to be available only with respect to one's own property.[26] Also, in at least one case the DCCA has also held that the defense was available only if the evidence shows the property belonged to the defendant or that the defendant reasonably believed it did.[27] In contrast, the RCC provides that an actor may be justified in protecting another person's property or unowned property, provided that the actor reasonably believes the conduct is necessary in degree. In some circumstances, current law effectively punishes a person who is acting to protect the property of a family member or with reasonable and charitable intentions to help a stranger.[28] Current law also may punish a person who is acting according to their job duties.[29] However, the revised defense also provides an exception in paragraph (b)(2) for a person who is unilaterally acting to protect public or private land without permission from the owner to act.[30] This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Beyond these two changes to current District law, two other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to District law.

First, the revised defense applies to all offenses. The D.C. Code does not codify a defense of property defense. The DCCA has recognized that defense of property is a defense to various offenses, including simple assault and a possession of a prohibited weapon offense[31] that requires proof of specific intent to use the weapon "unlawfully."[32] However, the scope of offenses to which the current defense of property defense applies is largely undefined. To resolve this ambiguity, the RCC clarifies that defense of property may justify any offense. Limiting the defense to crimes involving the use of physical force, as is common in many jurisdictions,[33] may lead to counterintuitive and undesirable outcomes.[34] This change improves the consistency and proportionality of the revised statutes.

---

[25] Jones v. United States, 172 A.3d 888, 891 (D.C. 2017).
[26] § 10.6(e) Property of another, 2 Subst. Crim. L. § 10.6(e) (3d ed.).
[27] Gatlin v. United States, 833 A.2d 995, 1010 (D.C. 2003).
[28] Consider, for example, a person who observes a thief snatch a purse from an elderly person, runs after the thief, retrieves the purse, and returns it to the owner.
[29] For example, a bouncer at a bar.
[30] Consider, for example, Tourist A notices Tourist B continuing to take photographs instead of promptly leaving the National Arboretum at closing time. A is not justified under this section in assaulting B and removing them from the grounds unless A reasonably believes that the U.S. Department of Agriculture effectively consented to A protecting its property. But see D.C. Code § 23-582 (concerning citizen arrests).
[31] D.C. Code § 22-4514(b).
[32] Jones v. United States, 172 A.3d 888, 893 and n. 19 (D.C. 2017).
[33] See Model Penal Code § 3.06.
[34] Consider, for example, an actor who observes a person attempting to spray graffiti on their home. Under the Model Penal Code's formulation, the actor would have a defense to assault for tackling the graffiti artist to the ground but would have no defense to theft for instead stealing the spray paint and carrying it away.

Second, the revised defense of property defense does not apply when the person is reckless as to the fact that they are protecting against conduct that is lawful.[35] The current D.C. Code does not codify a defense of property defense. However, DCCA case law previously has approved a jury instruction that included an unlawfulness requirement,[36] and the District's current pattern jury instruction includes the same language.[37] However, there is no DCCA case law on point. Resolving this ambiguity, the revised statute clarifies that a person cannot assert the offense if they are defending against a damage, taking, trespass, or misuse of property that is lawful and they are reckless as the fact that it is lawful. This change clarifies the revised statute.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change District law.

The revised defense codifies a rejection of the pre-20th century castle doctrine approach to defense of property (permitting deadly force in defense of one's "castle")[38] and categorically bars use of deadly force in defense of property only. The D.C. Code does not codify a defense of property defense. However, the DCCA recently has held that deadly force cannot be used to defend property alone.[39] Elsewhere, the RCC adopts a more

---

[35] For example, an actor is not justified in committing an assault to protect their vehicle from what they know to be a lawful repossession.

[36] Gatlin v. United States, 833 A.2d 995, 1008 (D.C. 2003) ("A person is justified in using reasonable force to protect his/her property from trespass or theft when s/he reasonably believes that his/her property is in immediate danger of an unlawful trespass or taking and that the use of such force is necessary to avoid the danger…") (emphasis added).

[37] Crim. Jury Inst. for DC Instruction § 9.520 (2019).

[38] "It is a familiar maxim of the law, that 'a man's house is his castle,' and that he has a right to defend it." State v. Hooker, 17 Vt. 658, 670 (1845).

> It is sacred for the protection of his person, and of his family. An assault on the house can be regarded as an assault on the person, only in case the purpose of such assault be injury to the person of the occupant, or members of his family, and in order to accomplish this, the assailant attacks the castle, in order to reach the inmate. In this view, it is said and settled that, in such case, the inmate need not flee from his house in order to escape injury by the assailant, but he may meet him at the threshold, and prevent him from breaking in, by any means rendered necessary by the exigency-and upon the same ground and reason that one may defend himself from peril of life, or great bodily harm, by means fatal to the assailant, if rendered necessary by the exigency of the assault.

State v. Patterson, 45 Vt. 308 (1873).

[39] Jones v. United States, 172 A.3d 888, 892 (D.C. 2017) ("It is never reasonable or justifiable, however, to use deadly force—force likely to cause death or 'serious' bodily harm or injury—merely to protect property, even if the intrusion or danger to the property cannot otherwise be prevented. This is because '[t]he preservation of human life, and of modern castle doctrine approach, permitting deadly force under certain circumstances within one's castle.[40] Specifically, the revised defense of self or another person defense[41] provides that the use of deadly force is justified if the actor is inside their own dwelling and reasonably believes the conduct is necessary in degree to protect the actor or another person from bodily injury, a sexual act, a sexual contact, or confinement. However, the revised defense of property defense does not permit an actor to meet an intruder at the threshold of the home and prevent him from entering by deadly force, or to assume automatically that an intruder intended to commit an act of violence therein.[42] This change clarifies the revised statutes.

limb and member from grievous harm, is of more importance to society than the protection of property.'" (internal citations omitted)).

[40] "In some cases, this 'castle doctrine' is described as follows: '[W]hen one is violently assaulted in his own house or immediately surrounding premises, he is not obliged to retreat.'" Jenkins v. State, 942 So. 2d 910, 914 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2006).

[41] RCC § 22E-403.

[42] See, e.g., N.C. Gen. Stat. Ann. § 14-51.2 ("The lawful occupant of a home, motor vehicle, or workplace is presumed to have held a reasonable fear of imminent death or serious bodily harm…"); S.C. Code Ann. § 16-11-440 (same); see also Howell v. State, 144 So. 3d 211, 217 (Miss. Ct. App. 2014) ("[T]he castle doctrine 'creates a presumption of fear and abridges a duty to retreat in certain prescribed circumstances.'").

RCC § 22E-408. Special Responsibility for Care, Discipline, or Safety Defenses.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes several justification defenses based on the actor's special relationship to the complainant for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). Each of the defenses is based on the special duty of care that an actor has toward a complainant. The defenses apply to most offenses against persons in Subtitle II and Subtitle III of the RCC. The revised special responsibility defenses are the first codification of general defenses and replace several defense provisions in specific statutes.[1]

Subsection (a) codifies the requirements of a general parental defense to offenses in Subtitle II and Subtitle III of the RCC, other than those offenses listed in subsection (e).[2]

Paragraph (a)(1) requires that, in fact, that actor reasonably believes[3] the circumstance elements specified in subparagraphs (a)(1)(A) and (a)(1)(B). Subparagraph (a)(1)(A) requires that the actor reasonably believes that the complainant is under 18 years of age. Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[4] "Complainant" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701 that refers to a person who is who is alleged to have been subjected to any criminal offense. Parents of adult children do not meet the requirements of the offense. The term "in fact" is defined in RCC § 22E-207 and specifies that there is no culpable mental state required as to the complainant's age.

---

[1] D.C. Code § 22-3531(e)(4), Voyeurism ("This section does not prohibit the following: … (4) Any electronic recording of a medical procedure which is conducted under circumstances where the patient is unable to give consent.") and D.C. Code § 22-935, Exception [to Criminal Abuse and Neglect of Vulnerable Adults liability] (A person shall not be considered to commit an offense of abuse or neglect under this chapter for the sole reason that he provides or permits to be provided treatment by spiritual means through prayer alone in accordance with a religious method of healing, in lieu of medical treatment, to the vulnerable adult or elderly person to whom he has a duty of care with the express consent or in accordance with the practice of the vulnerable adult or elderly person."). For discussion of how the RCC changes current law for these specific offenses, see the commentary for each specific offense.

[2] Subsection (e) precludes application of the defense to sexual assault and certain human trafficking offenses. In addition, the revised kidnapping and criminal restraint statutes contain defenses to liability for parents and close relatives in certain circumstances. See RCC § 22E-1401(c) and RCC § 22E-1402(b).

[3] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist.

[4] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

Subparagraph (a)(1)(B) requires the actor to have one of two types of relationship to the complainant. Sub-subparagraph (a)(1)(B)(i) first requires the actor reasonably[5] believes he or she is either a parent or a person acting in the place of a parent under civil law. The term "parent" is undefined and is intended to include persons with parental rights by blood or adoption. A "person acting in the place of a parent under civil law" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-701, and that definition is identical to how D.C. case law has defined a person who stands in loco parentis: "both a person who has put himself in the situation of a lawful parent by assuming the obligations incident to the parental relation without going through the formalities necessary to legal adoption, and any person acting by, through, or under the direction of a court with jurisdiction over the child."[6] In addition to being a parent or a person acting in the place of a parent under civil law, an actor must also at the time of the alleged offense be responsible for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant.[7] Sub-subparagraph (a)(1)(B)(ii), alternatively, provides that the actor may also be a person who reasonably[8] believes that they are acting with the effective

---

[5] Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others. See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

[6] See Simms v. United States, 867 A.2d 200, 205 (D.C. 2005) ("The term 'in loco parentis,' according to its generally accepted common law meaning, refers to a person who has put himself in the situation of a lawful parent by assuming the obligations incident to the parental relation without going through the formalities necessary to legal adoption. It embodies the two ideas of assuming the parental status and discharging the parental duties."). See also Criminal Jury Instruction 4.121 (5th ed. 2018) ("… that person must have put himself or herself in the situation of a lawful parent, without going through the formalities necessary for legal adoption, by both assuming parental status and by discharging the duties and obligations of a parent toward a child. …You should consider the intent of the person claiming the status of in loco parentis and the scope of authority given to that person to so act.").

[7] For example, a parent by blood who has lost all custodial rights to a child cannot claim this defense. Whether a given parent is responsible for the health, welfare, or supervision of the child at the time of the offense when there are divorced parents with joint custody over a child is a fact-dependent inquiry that depends on the nature of the custody order.

[8] Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others. See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually consent of a person referred to in sub-subparagraph (a)(1)(B)(i).[9] A person acting without effective consent of a parent or person acting in the place of a parent under civil law may have another defense under RCC § 22E-408, depending on the circumstances, but does not have a defense under the parental defense.[10] "Effective consent" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 as "consent other than consent induced by physical force, an explicit or implicit coercive threat, or deception." Per the rule of interpretation under RCC § 22E-207, the term "in fact" also applies to this element. There is no culpable mental state required as to the actor's relationship to the child, or as to whether the actor reasonably believed he or she was acting with the effective consent of a person referred to in sub-subparagraph (a)(1)(B)(i).[11]

Paragraph (a)(2) requires that for the defense to apply, the actor must act with intent to safeguard or promote the welfare of the complainant. The term "welfare" should be construed broadly but precludes application of the defense where the attack is "gratuitous."[12] Unlike the guardian and limited caretaker defenses, the parental defense may apply to the punishment of misconduct, in addition to safeguarding or promoting the welfare of the complainant.[13] "Intent" is a term defined in RCC § 22E-206 and here means that the actor was practically certain that the conduct would safeguard or promote the welfare of the complainant. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

---

[9] This legal recognition of others temporarily supervising children is consistent with current D.C. law. For example, the D.C. Code currently defines "lawful custodian" as a person designated by the Court "or a person designated by the lawful custodian temporarily to care for the child." D.C. Code § 16–1021.

[10] For example, consider a parent who leaves their young child in a babysitter's care with no instructions as to punishment for misbehavior. While the parent is gone the babysitter punishes the child for a misdeed by spanking, causing a bodily injury. Absent evidence that the babysitter reasonably believed that they had the effective consent of the parent to engage in such punishment, the babysitter could not avail themselves of this defense.

[11] Although no culpable mental state as defined in RCC § 22E-205 is required, subparagraph (a)(2)(B) still requires that the actor subjectively believed that he or she was acting with the effective consent of a person referred to in subparagraph (a)(2)(A)

[12] See Newby v. United States, 797 A.2d 1233, 1242–43 (D.C. 2002) (limiting application of the parental discipline defense to conduct "for the betterment of the child or promotion of the child's welfare—and not [ ] a gratuitous attack.") (quoting Anderson v. State, 61 Md.App. 436, 487 A.2d 294, 298 (Ct.Spec.App.1985)).

[13] This is consistent with D.C. case law. See, e.g., Longus v. United States, 935 A.2d 1108 (DC 2007) (Court found force reasonable where actor had slapped child on the back of the head with an open hand and grabbed child's clothing near neck as punishment for disobedience). See also, Model Penal Code § 3.08 cmt. at 140 (1985) (citations omitted) ("The law has universally allowed a privilege for the exercise of domestic authority, sometimes articulated in the statutes, though often without a definition of its scope.").

is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that the actor actually safeguarded or promoted the complainant's welfare.[14]

Paragraph (a)(3) requires that, in fact, the actor's conduct satisfies two additional conditions. Subparagraph (a)(3)(A) requires that the actor's conduct be reasonable in manner and degree, under all circumstances. The determination of whether a person's actions are reasonable in manner and degree "under all the circumstances" may take into account the complainant's age, size, health, mental and emotional development, alleged misconduct on this and earlier occasions, the kind of punishment used, the nature and location of the injuries inflicted, or other relevant factors. This is a holistic, objective assessment of the actor's conduct, taking into account facts that may not have been known to the actor.[15] This requirement includes consideration of the actor who fails to gain relevant information before acting.[16] Per the rule of interpretation under RCC § 22E-207, the term "in fact" applies to this element. The term "in fact" is defined in RCC § 22E-207 and specifies that there is no culpable mental state required as to whether the actor's conduct was reasonable in manner and degree.

Subparagraph (a)(3)(B) limits the defense in two ways. Sub-subparagraph (a)(3)(B)(i) precludes the application of the defense where the actor's conduct creates a substantial risk of, or causes, death or serious bodily injury. "Serious bodily injury" is defined in 22E-701 as bodily injury or significant injury that involves a "substantial risk of death"; "[p]rotracted and obvious disfigurement"; or "[p]rotracted loss or impairment of the function of a bodily member or organ." Sub-subparagraph (a)(3)(B)(ii) allows application of the defense to situations that do involve a substantial risk of, or cause, death

---

[14] See also, Model Penal Code § 3.08 cmt. at 139 (1985) (citations omitted) ("To require belief in necessity to avoid criminal conviction was thought to be too extreme. Parents may defensibly use force less on the basis of a judgment of necessity than simply with the belief that it is an appropriate preventative or corrective measure.").

[15] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted) ("…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts.")

[16] See Model Penal Code § 3.09 ("When the actor believes that the use of force upon or toward the person of another is necessary for any of the purposes for which such belief would establish a justification under Sections 3.03 to 3.08 but the actor is reckless or negligent in having such belief or in acquiring or failing to acquire any knowledge or belief that is material to the justifiability of his use of force, the justification afforded by those Sections is unavailable in a prosecution for an offense for which recklessness or negligence, as the case may be, suffices to establish culpability.").

or serious bodily injury when the case nonetheless involves the performance or authorization of medical procedures otherwise permitted under local or federal law "by a licensed health professional or by a person acting at the direction of a licensed health professional."[17] Non-medical and illegal medical treatments are not covered by subparagraph (a)(5)(B). Health professional is a defined term.[18] Per the rule of interpretation under RCC § 22E-207, the term "in fact" also applies to this paragraph. There is no culpable mental state required as to whether the actor's conduct creates a substantial risk of, or causes, death or serious bodily injury, or is the performance or authorization of a medical procedure, otherwise permitted under District or federal civil law, by a licensed health professional or by a person acting at the direction of a licensed health professional.

Subsection (b) codifies the requirements of a general guardian defense to offenses in Subtitle II and Subtitle III of the RCC, other than those offenses listed in subsection (e).

Paragraph (b)(1) requires that, in fact, that actor reasonably believes[19] the circumstance elements specified in subparagraphs (b)(1)(A) and (b)(1)(B). Subparagraph (b)(1)(A) requires that the actor reasonably[20] believes that the complainant, in fact, be an "incapacitated individual." "Incapacitated individual" is defined in D.C. Code § 21-2011

---

[17] A medical procedure is an activity directed at or performed on an individual with the object of improving health, treating disease or injury, or making a diagnosis. Experimental medical procedures are included in this definition if they meet the definition of medical procedure, are performed by a health professional, as defined, and are otherwise legal under District or federal law. The definition of medical procedure is intended to exclude cosmetic procedures. Non-medical and illegal medical treatments are not covered by subparagraph (a)(5)(B). When evaluating whether the parental defense justifies the actor's conduct, the jury must consider the other factors of the defense, such as the reasonableness of the conduct.

[18] "Health Professional" means a person required to obtain a District license, registration, or certification per D.C. Code § 3-1205.01. Examples of licenses health professionals include physician assistants, practical nurses, and psychologists. Health Professional also includes any professional certified by the Director of the District's Emergency Medical Services (EMS) under 29 DCMR § 515–524.

[19] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist.

[20] Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others. See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

as "an adult whose ability to receive and evaluate information effectively or to communicate decisions is impaired to such an extent that he or she lacks the capacity to manage all or some of his or her financial resources or to meet all or some essential requirements for his or her physical health, safety, habilitation, or therapeutic needs without court-ordered assistance or the appointment of a guardian or conservator." The term "in fact" is defined in RCC § 22E-207, and specifies that there is no culpable mental state required as to whether the complainant is an "incapacitated individual."

Subparagraph (b)(1)(B) requires the actor to have one of two types of relationship to the complainant. Sub-subparagraph (b)(1)(B)(i) first requires the actor to be a court-appointed guardian to the complainant, whether a guardian appointed by the District or another jurisdiction.[21] Sub-subparagraph (b)(1)(B)(ii), alternatively, provides that the actor may also be a person who reasonably believes that they are acting with the effective consent of the guardian referred to in sub-subparagraph (b)(1)(B)(i).[22] "Effective consent" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 as "consent other than consent induced by physical force, a coercive threat, or deception." Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[23] Per the rule of interpretation under RCC § 22E-207, the term "in fact" also applies to this element. There is no culpable mental state required as the actor's relationship with the complainant, or whether the actor reasonably believes that they are acting with the effective consent of the guardian referred to in sub-subparagraph (b)(1)(B)(i).[24]

Paragraph (b)(2) requires that the actor acted with intent to safeguard or promote the welfare of the complainant. "Intent" is a term defined in RCC § 22E-206 and here means that the actor was practically certain that the conduct would safeguard or promote the welfare of the complainant. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with [21] District law recognizes many types of guardianship. In this section, the term is used generally to refer to any person who is appointed by a court to have a special responsibility or duty of care to another person.

---

[22] For example, if an actor takes reasonable steps to confirm a consenting individual is the complainant's guardian, but is mistaken, the defense would apply to the actor's conduct based on that consent. Similarly, if an actor reasonably but mistakenly viewed a guardian's communication as consent, the defense would apply to the actor's conduct.

[23] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

[24] Although no culpable mental state as defined in RCC § 22E-205 is required, subparagraph (b)(2)(B) still requires that the actor subjectively believed that he or she was acting with the effective consent of a guardian referred to in subparagraph (b)(2)(A).

intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that the actor actually safeguarded or promoted the complainant's welfare.[25]

Paragraph (b)(3) requires that the conduct, in fact, satisfies three additional requirements, listed under subparagraphs (b)(3)(A)-(C). Subparagraph (b)(3)(A) requires that the actor's conduct be reasonable in manner and degree, under all circumstances. The determination of whether a person's actions are reasonable in manner and degree "under all the circumstances" may take into account the complainant's age, size, health, mental and emotional development, alleged misconduct on this and earlier occasions, the kind of punishment used, the nature and location of the injuries inflicted, or other relevant factors. This is a holistic, objective assessment of the actor's conduct, taking into account facts that may not have been known to the actor.[26] This requirement includes consideration of the actor who fails to gain relevant information before acting.[27] Per the rule of interpretation under RCC § 22E-207, the term "in fact" applies to this subparagraph. The term "in fact" is defined in RCC § 22E-207, and specifies that there is no culpable mental state required as to whether the actor's conduct was reasonable in manner and degree.

Subparagraph (b)(3)(B) requires that the conduct is permitted under civil law controlling the actor's guardianship. The defense is not available of the conduct exceeds the authority of the actor's guardianship over the complainant, as determined under civil law. Per the rule of interpretation under RCC § 22E-207, the term "in fact" also applies to this paragraph. The term "in fact" is defined in RCC § 22E-207, and specifies that there is no culpable mental state required as to whether the conduct is permitted under civil law.

---

[25] See also, Model Penal Code § 3.08 cmt. at 139 (1985) (citations omitted) ("To require belief in necessity to avoid criminal conviction was thought to be too extreme. Parents may defensibly use force less on the basis of a judgment of necessity than simply with the belief that it is an appropriate preventative or corrective measure.").

[26] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted) ("…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts.").

[27] See Model Penal Code § 3.09 ("When the actor believes that the use of force upon or toward the person of another is necessary for any of the purposes for which such belief would establish a justification under Sections 3.03 to 3.08 but the actor is reckless or negligent in having such belief or in acquiring or failing to acquire any knowledge or belief that is material to the justifiability of his use of force, the justification afforded by those Sections is unavailable in a prosecution for an offense for which recklessness or negligence, as the case may be, suffices to establish culpability.").

Subparagraph (b)(3)(C) specifies two additional requirements of the defense. Sub-subparagraph (b)(3)(C)(i) precludes the application of the defense where the actor's conduct creates a substantial risk of, or causes, death or serious bodily injury. "Serious bodily injury" is defined in 22-701 as bodily injury or significant injury that involves a "substantial risk of death"; "[p]rotracted and obvious disfigurement"; or "[p]rotracted loss or impairment of the function of a bodily member or organ." Sub-subparagraph (b)(3)(C)(ii) allows application of the defense to the performance or authorization of medical procedures otherwise permitted under local or federal law "by a licensed health professional or by a person acting at the direction of a licensed health professional."[28] Health professional is a defined term.[29] Per the rule of interpretation under RCC § 22E-207, the term "in fact" also applies to this subparagraph. There is no culpable mental state required as to whether the actor's conduct creates a substantial risk of, or causes, death or serious bodily injury, or is the performance or authorization of a medical procedure, otherwise permitted under District or federal civil law, by a licensed health professional or by a person acting at the direction of a licensed health professional.

Subsection (c) codifies the requirements of a general Emergency Health Professional Defense to offenses in Subtitle II and Subtitle III of the RCC, other than those offenses listed in subsection (e).

Paragraph (c)(1) requires that, in fact, that actor reasonably believes[30] the circumstance elements specified in subparagraphs (c)(1)(A)-(F). Subparagraph (c)(1)(A) requires that the actor reasonably[31] believes that the complainant is unable to give effective

---

[28] A medical procedure is an activity directed at or performed on an individual with the object of improving health, treating disease or injury, or making a diagnosis. Experimental medical procedures are included in this definition if they meet the definition of medical procedure, are performed by a health professional, as defined, and are otherwise legal under District or federal law. The definition of medical procedure is intended to exclude cosmetic procedures. Non-medical and illegal medical treatments are not covered by subparagraph (a)(5)(B). When evaluating whether the guardian defense justifies the actor's conduct, the jury must consider the other factors of the defense, such as the reasonableness of the conduct.

[29] "Health Professional" means a person required to obtain a District license, registration, or certification per D.C. Code § 3-1205.01. Examples of licenses health professionals include physician assistants, practical nurses, and psychologists. Health Professional also includes any professional certified by the Director of the District's Emergency Medical Services (EMS) under 29 DCMR § 515–524.

[30] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist.

[31] Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others. See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving consent at the time of the conduct.[32] "Effective consent" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 as "consent other than consent induced by physical force, a coercive threat, or deception." The term "in fact" is defined in RCC § 22E-207 and specifies that there is no culpable mental state required as to whether the complainant was unable to give effective consent at the time of the conduct.

Subparagraph (c)(1)(B) requires the actor to have one of two types of licensure or status. Sub-subparagraph (c)(1)(B)(i) first requires the actor reasonably believe that he or she is a licensed health professional. Health professional is a defined term.[33] Sub-subparagraph (c)(1)(B)(ii), alternatively, provides that the actor may also be a person who reasonably believe believed they were acting at the direction of a person referred to in sub-subparagraph (c)(1)(B)(i). Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[34] Per the rule of interpretation under RCC § 22E-207, the term "in fact" also applies to this subparagraph. There is no culpable mental state required as to whether the actor reasonably believes he or she is a licensed health professional, or whether the actor reasonably believes they were acting at the direction of a person referred to in sub-subparagraph (c)(1)(B)(i).[35] criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

---

[32] For example, if an actor takes reasonable steps to confirm a consenting individual is the complainant's guardian, but is mistaken, the defense would apply to the actor's conduct based on that consent. Similarly, if an actor reasonably but mistakenly viewed a guardian's communication as consent, the defense would apply to the actor's conduct.

[33] "Health Professional" means a person required to obtain a District license, registration, or certification per D.C. Code § 3-1205.01. Examples of licenses health professionals include physician assistants, practical nurses, and psychologists. Health Professional also includes any professional certified by the Director of the District's Emergency Medical Services (EMS) under 29 DCMR § 515–524.

[34] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) ("…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts.") (internal citations omitted).

[35] Although no culpable mental state as defined in RCC § 22E-205 is required, sub-subparagraph (c)(1)(B)(ii) still requires that the actor subjectively believed that he or she was acting with the effective consent of a a person referred to in sub-subparagraph (c)(1)(B)(ii).

Subparagraph (c)(1)(C) requires that the actor reasonably[36] believed that charged conduct is the performance or authorization of a medical procedure permitted under District or federal civil law. Per the rule of interpretation under RCC § 22E-207, the term "in fact" also applies to this subparagraph. There is no culpable mental state required as to whether the conduct is the performance or authorization of a medical procedure permitted under District or federal law.

Subparagraph (c)(1)(D) requires that the actor reasonably[37] believed that the medical procedure is administered or authorized in an emergency. "Emergency" is defined in D.C. Code § 2-1542 as "an unforeseen combination of circumstances or the resulting state that calls for immediate action. The term 'emergency' includes, but is not limited to, a fire, a natural disaster, an automobile accident, or any situation that requires immediate action to prevent serious bodily injury or loss of life." Per the rule of interpretation under RCC § 22E-207, the term "in fact" also applies to this subparagraph. There is no culpable mental state required as to whether the actor reasonably believed that the medical procedure was administered or authorized in an emergency.

Subparagraph (c)(1)(E) requires that the actor reasonably[38] believed that no person who is legally permitted under District law to consent to the medical procedure on behalf

---

[36] Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others. See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

[37] Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others. See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

[38] Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others. See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually of the complainant could be timely consulted. Per the rule of interpretation under RCC § 22E-207, the term "in fact" also applies to this subparagraph. There is no culpable mental state required as to whether actor believed that no person who is legally responsible could be timely consulted. Subparagraph (c)(1)(F) requires that the actor reasonably[39] believed there was no legally valid standing instruction by the complainant declining the medical procedure. Per the rule of interpretation under RCC § 22E-207, the term "in fact" also applies to this paragraph. There is no culpable mental state required as to whether actor reasonably believed there was no legally valid standing instruction by the complainant declining the medical procedure.

Paragraph (c)(2) requires that the actor acted with intent to safeguard or promote the physical or mental health of the complainant.[40] "Intent" is a term defined in RCC § 22E-206 and here means that the actor was practically certain that the medical procedure would promote the complainant's physical or mental health. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that the actor actually promoted the complainant's physical or mental health.

Paragraph (c)(3) requires that, in fact, a reasonable person desiring to safeguard the welfare of the complainant would consent to the medical procedure. This requirement precludes the applicability of the defense to negligent performance.[41] Reasonableness is existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

---

[39] Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others. See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

[40] Physical or mental health should be construed broadly and should be read to include efforts to improve – or avoid the decline of – one's physical or mental condition.

[41] For example, a health professional that performed a medical procedure without taking reasonable steps to investigate and diagnose the complainant's condition would not be able to raise the Emergency Health Professional defense.

an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others.[42] The term "in fact" is defined in RCC § 22E-207, and specifies that there is no culpable mental state required as to whether a reasonable person desiring to safeguard the welfare of the complainant would consent to the medical procedure.

Subsection (d) codifies the requirements of a limited caretaker defense to offenses in Subtitle II and Subtitle III of the RCC, other than those offenses listed in subsection (e).

Paragraph (d)(1) requires, in fact, that the actor reasonably believes[43] that the actor has a responsibility, under civil law, for the complainant's health, welfare, or supervision.[44] The term "in fact" is defined in RCC § 22E-207, and specifies that there is no culpable mental state required as to whether the actor reasonably believes the actor is responsible, under civil law, for the complainant's health, welfare, or supervision.

---

[42] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) ("…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts.") (internal citations omitted).

[43] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist. Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not others. See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

[44] The determination of whether a person has a duty to the complainant under civil law may depend on property law, contract law, family law, civil procedure, or other legal sources. For example, D.C. case law has found that schools do have a duty of care to their students. *See, e.g., District of Columbia v. Royal, 4*65 A.2d 367 (D.C. 1983) (recognizing a school's obligation to supervise its students). Consequently, teachers may utilize the defense under current D.C. case law. However, unlike the parental defense, the limited caretaker defense cannot be applied to the punishment or prevention of misconduct. The defense may apply where teachers are attempting to prevent injury though the conduct must still meet the other elements of the limited caretaker defense.

Paragraph (d)(2) creates two requirements for the actor's intent. Subparagraph (d)(1)(A) requires that the actor had intent that the conduct was necessary to fulfill the actor's responsibility to the complainant. Subparagraph (d)(1)(B) requires that the actor had intent that the conduct was consistent with the welfare of the complainant. "Intent" is a term defined in RCC § 22E-206 and here means that the actor was practically certain that the medical procedure would promote the complainant's physical or mental health. Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that the actor's conduct was actually necessary to fulfill the actor's responsibility to the complainant, or that it was consistent with the complainant's welfare.

Paragraph (d)(3) requires that, in fact, the actor's conduct satisfies two additional requirements defined under subparagraphs (d)(3)(A) and (d)(3)(B). Subparagraph (d)(3)(A) requires that the actor's conduct be reasonable in manner and degree, under all the circumstances. The determination of whether a person's actions are reasonable in manner and degree "under all the circumstances" may take into account a complainant's age, size, health, mental and emotional development, alleged misconduct on this and earlier occasions, the kind of punishment used, the nature and location of the injuries inflicted, or other relevant factors. This is a holistic, objective assessment of the actor's conduct, taking into account facts that may not have been known to the actor.[45] This requirement includes consideration of the actor who fails to gain relevant information before acting.[46] Per the rule of interpretation under RCC § 22E-207, the term "in fact" also applies to this subparagraph. The term "in fact" is defined in RCC § 22E-207, and specifies that there is no culpable mental state required as to whether the conduct was reasonable in manner and degree.

Subparagraph (d)(3)(B) requires that the actor's conduct does not create a substantial risk of, or causes, death or serious bodily injury. Per the rule of interpretation

---

[45] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) ("…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts.") (internal citations omitted).

[46] See Model Penal Code § 3.09 ("When the actor believes that the use of force upon or toward the person of another is necessary for any of the purposes for which such belief would establish a justification under Sections 3.03 to 3.08 but the actor is reckless or negligent in having such belief or in acquiring or failing to acquire any knowledge or belief that is material to the justifiability of his use of force, the justification afforded by those Sections is unavailable in a prosecution for an offense for which recklessness or negligence, as the case may be, suffices to establish culpability.").

under RCC § 22E-207, the term "in fact" also applies to this subparagraph. There is no culpable mental state required as to whether the actor's conduct creates a substantial risk of, or causes, death or serious bodily injury.

Paragraph (d)(4) requires that no other special responsibility defense applies to the conduct. Per the rule of interpretation under RCC § 22E-207, the term "in fact" also applies to this paragraph. There is no culpable mental state required as to whether another special responsibility defense applies to the conduct.

Subsection (e) precludes application of the defenses in this title to offenses in Chapters 13 and certain offenses in Title 16 and in Title 18. Title 13 includes Sexual Assault and related offenses; Title 16 includes Human Trafficking offenses.[47] The conduct required to meet the elements of offenses in these chapters is never in fulfillment of the actor's duties to the complainant. Consequently, the defenses are categorically excluded from application to these offenses. Title 18 includes stalking, obscenity, and invasion of property offenses. Paragraph (e)(8) specifies that the defenses in this section do not apply to creating or trafficking an obscene image of a minor under RCC § 22E-1807, when the actor is charged under subparagraphs (a)(1)(B), (a)(1)(E), (b)(1)(B) or (b)(1)(E). In addition, paragraph (e)(9) specifies that the defense is categorically unavailable for arranging a live performance of a minor under RCC § 22E-1809.

Subsection (f) cross-references applicable definitions located elsewhere in Chapters 2 and 7 of the RCC and, for the term "incapacitated individual," in D.C. Code § 21-2011.

Relation to Current District Law. Seven aspects of the special responsibility for care, discipline, or safety defenses may be viewed as possible changes of law.

First, the RCC parental defense applies to most offenses against persons and all property offenses. While the District has not codified a parental defense, either generally or for any particular offense, current D.C. case law has recognized a parental defense to simple assault and cruelty to children.[48] Current D.C. case law has not addressed the parental defense's applicability outside of these two offenses. To resolve this ambiguity as to the availability of the defense, the RCC parental defense specifies that it applies to crimes against persons in Subtitle II of the RCC, and property offenses in Subtitle III, with the explicit exclusion of certain Human Trafficking, Sexual Assault, and Obscenity offenses as stated in subsection (e). Application of the defense is also limited by subparagraph (d)(3)(B) to conduct that neither causes nor creates a substantial risk of death or serious bodily injury—effectively precluding application of the offense to murder and certain other serious felony charges. This change improves the clarity and consistency of the revised statutes.

Second, the RCC parental defense requires that the actor must reasonably believe that the actor is a parent or person acting in place of parent who currently has responsibility for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant child. There is no relevant statute and current D.C. case law requires that the actor has "put himself in the situation of a lawful [47] This subsection is intended to preclude application of the defense to the trafficking of individuals to exploit them for sex work or other labor.

[48] See, e.g., Lee v. United States, 831 A.2d 378, 380-81 (D.C. 2003); Newby v. United States, 797 A.2d 1233, 1241 (D.C. 2002); Simms v. United States, 867 A.2d 200, 205 (D.C. 2005).

parent by assuming the obligations incident to the parental relation."[49] The precise meaning of this case law—and the contemporaneous nature of the relationship and the alleged criminal conduct—is unclear, however. To resolve this ambiguity, the RCC parental defense requires that the actor reasonably believes that the actor has current responsibility for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant child. This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Third, the RCC parental defense applies to persons who reasonably believe that they are acting with the effective consent of either parents or those acting in loco parentis. There is no relevant statute and current D.C. case law does not address whether the defense is available to persons acting with the effective consent of parents or those acting in loco parentis,[50] let alone whether a reasonable mistake by the actor as to the existence of effective consent is sufficient. To resolve this ambiguity, the RCC parental defense is available to persons acting with such effective consent or reasonably believing they have such effective consent. This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Fourth, the RCC parental defense is generally limited to conduct not creating a risk of, or causing, serious bodily injury or death, but specifically allows the defense for the performance or authorization of certain medical procedures. Current case law does not address the parental defense's applicability to authorization of medical procedures that may be life threatening or involve serious bodily injury. Furthermore, current case law does not limit the applicability of the defense to a certain level of injury–it requires only that the force used cannot be "immoderate or unreasonable."[51] To resolve this ambiguity the RCC parental defense generally precludes application of the defense where the conduct created a risk of, or resulted in, actual serious bodily injury or death. However, the revised defense allows application where the actor has authorized or performed a medical procedure otherwise legal under District or federal law. This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised defense.

Fifth, the RCC recognizes a defense for guardians of incapacitated individuals. The District has not codified a general justification defense for guardians who act with intent to safeguard or promote the welfare of their ward, and case law has not addressed the existence of such a general justification defense.[52] In at least one instance, however, the

---

[49] See Simms v. United States, 867 A.2d 200, 205 (D.C. 2005).

[50] The DCCA has noted the issue, but the specific question of whether such authority can be delegated has not been specifically addressed or presented. See, e.g., Martin v. United States, 452 A.2d 360, 363 (D.C. 1982) ("The complaining witness lived in her paternal grandmother's house, and at no time did the grandmother testify that disciplinary authority over the girl had been specifically delegated to appellant.") (internal citations omitted).

[51] Newby v. United States, 797 A.2d 1233, 1243 (D.C. 2002).

[52] Current District law assigns guardians of incapacitated individuals duties similar to those of parents and guardians of children. See, e.g., D.C. Code § 21-2047 ("…Become or remain personally acquainted with the ward and maintain sufficient contact with the ward to know of the ward's capacities, limitations, needs, opportunities, and physical and mental health… Take reasonable care of the ward's personal effects and commence protective proceedings, if necessary, to protect other property of the ward… Apply any available money of the ward to the ward's current needs for support, care, habilitation, and treatment… Make decisions on behalf of the ward by conforming as closely as possible to a standard of substituted judgment or, if the ward's wishes are unknown and remain unknown after reasonable efforts to discern them, make the decision on the basis of the ward's best interests…").

D.C. Code recognizes a special defense to a statute for persons acting according to a duty of care toward their ward.[53] To resolve this ambiguity the RCC guardian defense applies to guardians but is limited by the elements to specific complainants, actors, and conduct set out in paragraphs (b)(1)-(5). The requirements of the RCC guardian defense closely parallel those of the RCC parental defense but notably do not specifically include in paragraph (b)(3) conduct to punish misconduct.[54] This change improves the clarity, consistency, and proportionality of the revised defense.

Sixth, the RCC recognizes a defense for emergency health professionals. The District has not codified such a general justification defense for emergency health professionals who provide medical procedures with intent to safeguard or promote the physical or mental health of a patient, and case law has not addressed the existence of an emergency health professional justification defense.[55] In at least one instance, however, the D.C. Code recognizes a special defense to a statute for medical professionals acting when a patient cannot give consent.[56] To resolve this ambiguity, the RCC emergency health professional defense recognizes such a defense, which is limited by the elements to specific actors and conduct set out in paragraphs (c)(1)-(5). This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised defense.

Seventh, the RCC recognizes a limited caretaker defense. The District has not codified such a general justification defense for persons who act with intent to fulfill their duty to the complainant, and case law has not addressed the existence of a limited caretaker justification defense.[57] The RCC recognizes such a limited caretaker defense for those acting in accord with their responsibility under District civil law for the health, welfare, or [53] D.C. Code § 22-935, Exception [to Criminal Abuse and Neglect of Vulnerable Adults liability] ("A person shall not be considered to commit an offense of abuse or neglect under this chapter for the sole reason that he provides or permits to be provided treatment by spiritual means through prayer alone in accordance with a religious method of healing, in lieu of medical treatment, to the vulnerable adult or elderly person to whom he has a duty of care with the express consent or in accordance with the practice of the vulnerable adult or elderly person.").

---

[54] The RCC guardian defense does apply to conduct to prevent future misconduct.

[55] In the analogous civil context, D.C. case law has found emergency medical personnel to be protected by the public-duty doctrine. See Woods v. D.C., 63 A.3d 551, 556 (D.C. 2013) ("In both Warren and Miller, this court held that the public-duty doctrine barred a claim that a plaintiff's situation was made worse because the plaintiff relied upon actions taken by District emergency personnel in providing the kind of on-the scene emergency assistance that the District normally provides to the general public. Ms. Woods's claim takes the same form, and we therefore conclude that it is barred by the public-duty doctrine as this court has construed that doctrine. Although Ms. Woods makes three arguments to the contrary, we do not find those arguments persuasive.").

[56] D.C. Code § 22-3531(e)(4), Voyeurism ("This section does not prohibit the following: … (4) Any electronic recording of a medical procedure which is conducted under circumstances where the patient is unable to give consent.").

[57] This defense is distinct from the parental defense, which may be raised by caretakers acting in loco parentis. In loco parentis requires that the actor assume "the obligations incident to the parental relation without going through the formalities necessary to legal adoption." The limited caretaker defense applies where the actor has assumed less than the "obligations incident to the parental relation" but has a responsibility under District civil law for the health, welfare, or supervision of the complainant.

supervision of the complainant.[58] Notably, unlike the RCC parental and guardian defenses, the limited caretaker offense requires that the actor believe the conduct is necessary to fulfill their responsibility to the complainant—no practical alternatives exist to the conduct.[59] Also unlike the parental defense, the limited caretaker defense does not apply to "the prevention or punishment of [the complainant's] conduct."[60] This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised defense.

One other change to the special responsibility for care, discipline, or safety defenses statute is clarificatory in nature and is not intended to change current District law.

The revised parental defense codifies requirements that the parent's conduct be reasonable in manner and degree, under all the circumstances. The current D.C. Code does not codify a general parental defense or specify whether the parent's conduct must be reasonable or committed with a specified intent. However, the DCCA has repeatedly recognized in the context of assault and child cruelty that these limitations on a parental defense exist.[61] The RCC parental defense clarifies these requirements with language that is consistent with other defenses. The RCC parental defense does not specify the particular

---

[58] The determination of whether a person has a duty to the complainant under civil law may depend on property law, contract law, family law, civil procedure, or other legal sources. See, e.g., District of Columbia v. Royal, 465 A.2d 367 (D.C. 1983) (recognizing a school's obligation to supervise its students); Seganish v. District of Columbia Safeway Stores, Inc., 406 F.2d 653 (D.C. Cir. 1968) (finding business's duty to maintain its premises to be reasonably safe for customers); Kline v. 1500 Massachusetts Avenue Apartment Corporation, 439 F.2d 477 (D.C. Cir. 1993) (finding landlord had duty to make reasonable efforts to prevent crimes in apartment building's common area).

[59] By requiring that there be no alternative to the actor's conduct, the RCC reinforces the public policy that otherwise prohibited conduct is an act of last resort and will only be excused when used in those circumstances.

[60] The RCC precludes application of the limited caretaker defense to conduct intended to discipline the complainant in acknowledgment that the use of force toward a child or incapacitated person may only be justified in a narrow set of relationships, and actors attempting to justify such conduct must meet the heightened relationship requirements in the parental and guardian defenses. This follows the Model Penal Code Commentary's rationale for heightened requirements for a justification defense outside of a parental or guardian relationship. Model Penal Code § 3.08 cmt. at 141-42 (1985) ("The variation is designed to make clear the distinction between the position of a person charged with the general care of a minor and that of one performing a more limited protective function.").

[61] See Lee v. United States, 831 A.2d 378, 380-381 (D.C. 2003) (once the defense is raised, government has burden to prove the parent's purpose was not disciplinary or that the force was unreasonable); Newby v. United States, 797 A.2d 1233, 1237 (D.C. 2002); Martin v. United States, 452 A.2d 360, 362 (D.C. 1982) (the defense requires evidence that a jury could find reasonable discipline was used under the circumstances); Powell v. United States, 916 A.2d 890, 893 (D.C. 2006) ("In Lee, we reiterated that a parent's privilege to exercise reasonable parental discipline is presently recognized in the District of Columbia.").

circumstances that must be considered in determining whether conduct is reasonable but does set a threshold on the possible harm in subparagraph (a)(3)(A).[62]

[62] The RCC is consistent with current case law which, in particular cases, has examined different circumstances to determine reasonableness. The District Jury Instruction, recognized by D.C. case law as "widely accepted" include the following circumstances: "if the punishment thus inflicted is not excessive in view of all the circumstances, including the child's age, health, mental and emotional development, alleged misconduct on this and earlier occasions, the kind of punishment used, the nature and location of the injuries inflicted, and any other evidence that you deem relevant." Newby v. United States, 797 A.2d 1233, 1242, n. 12 (D.C. 2002). The RCC, however, is broader than current District practice, as exemplified by the pattern jury instructions, which appears to require consideration of certain factors while allowing the factfinder to, in addition, consider any other evidence relevant to assessing reasonableness. The RCC approach allows factfinders to consider any relevant factor, e.g., relative size of the child to the parent, in assessing reasonableness but does not require any particular circumstances.

RCC § 22E-501. Duress.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes a duress defense for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The defense applies when a person is coerced to commit an offense by threat of unlawful force against himself or another. The RCC duress defense is the first codification of such a defense in the District.

Subsection (a) establishes the requirements for the affirmative defense. Under RCC § 22E-201(b), a defendant bears the burden of proving the affirmative defense by a preponderance of the evidence. However, the defense does not require an admission of guilt.[1] This defense is distinct from any culpable mental state requirements of a given offense and even if the elements of duress are not satisfied, evidence of duress may be relevant in determining if the defendant had the requisite mental state for a particular offense.[2] The term "in fact" indicates that no culpable mental state need be proven for the defense requirements in subsection (a).[3]

Paragraph (a)(1) and subparagraph (a)(1)(A) require that the actor reasonably believe[4] that someone has threatened to cause a criminal bodily injury, sexual act, sexual contact, confinement, or death to the actor or to another person. Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but not

[1] See McClam v. United States, 775 A.2d 1100, 1104 (D.C. 2001) ("Once the defendant requests an instruction, it is not necessary that the evidentiary basis for the instruction stem from the defendant's evidence; it may also be derived from the government's evidence.").

[2] Belief that another person threatened to inflict criminal harm may be relevant to determining whether a defendant satisfied the gross deviation requirements for recklessness and negligence mental states under RCC § 22E-206, as well as the "extreme indifference" required for certain homicide and assault offenses. Extreme indifference, recklessness, and negligence all require risk creation and a finding that the actor grossly deviated from either the ordinary standard of conduct or ordinary standard of care. Factfinders may consider the reasons an actor engaged in risky behavior in determining whether the actor grossly deviated. For example, if a person drives at high speed under threat of being beaten and crashes the car causing property damage, even if the requirements of duress are not satisfied, the threat of being beaten is relevant in determining whether the person's conduct grossly deviated from either the ordinary standard of conduct or ordinary standard of care.

[3] RCC § 22E-207.

[4] Any circumstance element or result element that is the object of the phrase "reasonably believes" need not be proven to actually exist.

others.[5] As in the revised criminal threats offense,[6] the verb "communicates" is intended to be broadly construed, encompassing all speech[7] and other messages,[8] which includes gestures or other conduct,[9] that are received and understood by another person.

Paragraph (a)(1) and subparagraph (a)(1)(B) specify that the actor must reasonably believe that someone is in imminent danger of the threatened harm. The word "imminent" should be construed to mean ready to take place or dangerously near. It should not be construed to have the same meaning as "immediate" or to require that the harm will occur at a specific moment in time.[10] The actor's belief that the threat is genuine may be mistaken, but it must be objectively reasonable. Similarly, the actor's belief that their conduct will prevent the harm may be mistaken but must be reasonable.[11] Reasonableness is an objective standard that must take into account certain characteristics of the actor but

---

[5] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

[6] RCC § 22E-1204.

[7] The term "speech" is defined in RCC § 22E-701 and means oral or written language, symbols, or gestures.

[8] A person may communicate through non-verbal conduct such as displaying a weapon. See State v. Murphy, 545 N.W.2d 909, 915 (Minn. 1996) ("Many physical acts considered in context communicate a terroristic threat. We may find our examples in the case law, such as drawing a finger across one's throat or discharging a firearm over the telephone; in the movies, such as boiling a rabbit on the stove in the tranquil setting of former paramour's new family home, or placing a severed horse's head in a bed; or as here, depositing dead animals at a residence or planting a fake bomb. Life is replete with such examples, and whatever the source, the principle is the same: physical acts communicate a threat that its originator will act according to its tenor." (Internal quotations omitted.)).

[9] For example, if a person consistently beats people who refuse to comply with his demands, this pattern of conduct may constitute a coercive threat when that person makes similar demands of others who know of the behavior. In addition ongoing infliction of harm may constitute communication, if it communicates that harm will continue in the future.

[10] There are circumstances in which it may be reasonable for a person to act without waiting for an immediate threat of death or serious bodily injury. Consider for example, Person A sends a note threatening to sexually assault Person B, who is confined at the D.C. Jail. If Person B escapes, to avoid the sexual assault, without waiting until he next encounters A, the duress defense may still apply, despite the time lapse, if the actor reasonably believed the harm was dangerously near and the other elements of the defense are satisfied.

[11] For example, a person does not lose a duress defense if the threatened harm is carried out.

not others.[12] Conduct is not necessary in degree if it can be avoided by a reasonable[13] "legal alternative available to the defendants that does not involve violation of the law."[14]

Paragraph (a)(2) requires that a reasonable person of the same background and in the same circumstances as the actor would engage in the conduct constituting the offense. In determining whether a reasonable person would do so, factfinders should consider the nature of the potential harm to the defendant or another, the defendant's particular circumstances and background, and the nature of the conduct constituting the offense. A potential harm may satisfy this element of the defense as to a particular defendant, but not another.[15] In addition, harms that would compel a reasonable person to commit a particular offense may not necessarily be sufficient to compel a reasonable person to commit a more serious offense.

Subsection (b) establishes three exceptions to the duress defense.

Paragraph (b)(1) precludes application of the defense if the defendant is reckless in bringing about the situation that places the defendant under duress. The term "brings about" requires that the actor caused the situation requiring the defense. The actor's conduct must have been a but-for cause of the situation, and the situation must have been reasonably foreseeable.[16] An actor can bring about the situation either by instigating others, or by placing him or herself in circumstances in which others pose a risk of harm.[17]"

---

[12] See, e.g., Model Penal Code § 2.02 cmt. at 241-42 (1985) (citations omitted). "…these questions are asked not in terms of what the actor's perceptions actually were, but in terms of an objective view of the situation as it actually existed. … The standard for ultimate judgement invites consideration of the 'care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.' There is an inevitable ambiguity in 'situation.' If the actor were blind or if he had just suffered a blow or experienced a heart attack, these would certainly be facts to be considered in a judgment involving criminal liability, as they would be under traditional law. But the heredity, intelligence or temperament of the actor would not be held material in judging negligence, and could not be without depriving the criterion of all of its objectivity. The Code is not intended to displace discriminations of this kind, but rather to leave the issue to the courts."

[13] Not every legal alternative will foreclose the defense. It must be reasonable to expect the actor to recognize a feasible opportunity to avoid criminal harm.

[14] See Commentary to RCC § 22E-401, Lesser Harm; Griffin v. U.S., 447 A.2d 776, 778 (D.C. 1982) (citing United States v. Bailey, 444 U.S. 394, 410 (1980) ("Under any definition of these defenses one principle remains constant: if there was a reasonable, legal alternative to violating the law, "a chance both to refuse to do the criminal act and also to avoid the threatened harm," the defenses will fail.")).

[15] For example, a threat to punch the actor may be sufficient to cause an infirm and elderly person to comply, but not necessarily a healthy younger person.

[16] Legal causation as defined in RCC § 22E-204 requires that the result is reasonably foreseeable, and that if the result is due to another person's volitional conduct, the actor may be justly be held responsible for the result. However, the term "brings about" only requires that the actor's conduct was a but-for cause of the situation, and that it was reasonably foreseeable. When the situation is the result of another person's volitional conduct, it is not necessary that the actor is justly responsible for the situation.

[17] For example, if a person chooses to participate in a criminal enterprise, reckless that a failure to commit criminal acts will be punished by physical harm, the defense may be unavailable if the person commits a criminal offense due to fear of the physical harm.

"Reckless" is defined in in RCC § 22E-206 and here requires that the person consciously disregard a substantial risk that they would cause the coercion to occur and that the person's disregard of the risk is a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of conduct.[18]

Paragraph (b)(2) precludes application of the defense if the defendant is negligent in bringing about the situation requiring the choice of harms an objective element of the offense requires only a negligence mental state. Negligence is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 and here requires that the person should be aware of a substantial risk that they would cause the coercion to occur and that the person's failure to perceive the risk is a gross deviation from the ordinary standard of care.

Paragraph (b)(3) narrows the availability of a duress defense for the offense of escape from a correctional facility or officer under RCC § 22E-3401. The defense applies whether the duress was directed at a defendant while in official custody or prevented the defendant from returning to official custody following a temporary lawful absence.[19] The defendant must make reasonable efforts to safely return.

Subsection (c) cross-references applicable definitions in the RCC.

Relation to Current District Law. The revised duress defense statute clearly changes current District law in one main way.

The revised statute does not categorically require that the harm to be avoided be immediate. The current D.C. Code does not codify a duress defense. However, District case law requires a reasonable belief that the actor would suffer immediate harm.[20] In contrast, the RCC statute requires the harm be imminent but does not limit the timing of the harm being avoided.[21] This change improves the proportionality of the revised statutes.

Beyond this change to current District law, four other aspects of the revised statute may constitute substantive changes to District law.

First, the revised statute requires the defendant prove the affirmative defense by a preponderance of the evidence. The current D.C. Code does not codify a duress defense,

---

[18] For example, if a defendant agrees to engage in a highly dangerous criminal endeavor, and a co-conspirator then threatens the defendant to commit an additional crime in furtherance of the conspiracy, the duress defense may not be available, if the defendant was aware of a substantial risk that a co-conspirator would compel him to commit an additional crime.

[19] See Stewart v. U.S., 370 A.2d 1374, 1376-77 (D.C. 1977).

[20] McClam v. U.S., 775 A.2d 1100, 1104 (D.C. 2001) ("A duress instruction is appropriate if the evidence is sufficient for a reasonable jury to find that the defendant participated in the offense as the result of a reasonable belief that he would suffer immediate serious bodily injury or death if he did not participate in the crime."). Note, however, that McClam also cites without distinction reference to a requirement the harm be "imminent" in United States v. Jenrette, 744 F.2d 817, 819 (1984). Id. at 1105.

[21] There are circumstances in which it may be reasonable for a person to act without waiting for an immediate threat of death or serious bodily injury. Consider for example, Person A sends a note threatening to sexually assault Person B, who is confined at the D.C. Jail. If Person B escapes, to avoid the sexual assault, without waiting for until he next encounters A, the duress defense should still apply."

and the District of Columbia Court of Appeals ("DCCA") has not addressed whether duress is a traditional defense that must be disproven by the government if it is supported by any evidence, "however weak,"[22] or an affirmative defense that must be proven by the defendant by a preponderance of the evidence. In federal court, a defendant must affirmatively present sufficient evidence of duress.[23] To resolve this ambiguity, the RCC specifies that the defendant must prove this defense by a preponderance of the evidence. This change clarifies the revised statute and improves its consistency and proportionality.

Second, the revised statute includes acting under threat of a criminal bodily injury, sexual act, sexual contact, or confinement. The current D.C. Code does not codify a duress defense. District case law has recognized a duress defense when a person fears serious bodily injury or death,[24] however it is unclear whether other harms may also be predicates for a duress defense. To resolve this ambiguity, the RCC statute specifies a range of threatened conduct that may place a person in duress, including behavior such as a severe beating, rape, or kidnapping. This recognizes that, in some circumstances, a criminal threat of a lesser injury might serve as a powerful incentive to participate in a crime.[25] This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Third, the revised statute includes threats to harm a third person other than the defendant. The current D.C. Code does not codify a duress defense. The DCCA has recognized a duress defense where a person fears their own death or serious bodily injury[26] but has not yet addressed whether the defense applies when a person fears harm to another person. There are instances in which a criminal threat of a harm to a third person might serve as a powerful incentive to participate in a crime.[27] To resolve this ambiguity, the RCC excuses conduct that is the result of a credible threat to harm another person. This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Fourth, the RCC duress defense does not apply when the person is reckless as to bringing about the choice of harms or, for negligence offenses, when the person is negligent about bringing about the choice of harms. The current D.C. Code does not codify a duress defense and current District case law on the duress defense does not address the actor's culpability where the actor is reckless or negligent in bringing about the circumstances requiring a choice of harms. Resolving this ambiguity, the RCC duress defense expressly limits the defense when the actor recklessly or negligently created or appraised the [22] See D.C. Crim. Jur. Instr. § 9.100.

---

[23] Dixon v. U.S., 548 U.S. 1 (2006); but see In re Warner, 905 A.2d 233, 240 n.6 (D.C. 2006).

[24] McClam v. U.S., 775 A.2d 1100, 1104 (D.C. 2001); Stewart v. United States, 370 A.2d 1374, 1376 (D.C. 1977) (recognizing in dicta that other jurisdictions include sexual attacks as a possible predicate for a duress defense but then describing only serious bodily injury and death as predicates in the District).

[25] Consider, for example, Person A threatens that he will beat B severely, if B does not close curtains to conceal A assaulting C. B reluctantly agrees and is charged as an accomplice to A's felonious assault. Under the revised statute, B may defend on grounds of duress even if B feared only a bodily injury or significant bodily injury.

[26] McClam v. U.S., 775 A.2d 1100, 1104 (D.C. 2001).

[27] Consider, for example, a threat to rape a family member.

underlying situation that appeared to require a choice of evils. This change improves the clarity and proportionality of the revised statutes.

Other changes to the revised statute are clarificatory in nature and are not intended to substantively change District law.

The revised statute requires that a person accused of escape[28] make "reasonable efforts to safely return." District case law requires that an escapee defending on grounds of duress "must have immediately returned to custody once the threat of harm was no longer imminent."[29] However, federal law more precisely requires a bona fide effort to return to custody as soon as the claimed duress had lost its coercive force.[30] The revised statute requires a reasonable effort to return. This change clarifies the revised statute.

[28] RCC § 22E-3401.
[29] See Stewart v. U.S., 370 A.2d 1374, 1377 (D.C. 1977).
[30] U.S. v. Bailey, 444 U.S. 394, 412–13 (1980).

RCC § 22E-502. Temporary Possession.

Explanatory Note. This section establishes a temporary possession affirmative defense for the Revised Criminal Code (RCC). The defense applies in several instances in which a person's possession or distribution of contraband is not blameworthy. The revised temporary possession defense is the first codification of a general defense for lawful possession in the District.

Subsection (a) establishes the requirements for the affirmative defense. A defendant has the burden of proving an affirmative defense by a preponderance of the evidence per RCC § 22E-201(b)(3).

Paragraph (a)(1) specifies that the conduct constituting the offense[1] must be a "predicate possessory or distribution offense," as defined in paragraph (b)(2). The defense does not apply where a person is accused of taking,[2] using,[3] or destroying[4] an item. Nor does it apply to charges of tampering with evidence,[5] obstructing justice,[6] or serving as an accessory after the fact.[7] The term "in fact" specifies that the person is strictly liable as to whether the defense is available for a particular charge.[8]

Paragraph (a)(2) requires that the person possess or distribute the item, exclusively and in good faith, with one of several enumerated blameless intents. "Intent" is a defined term in RCC § 22E-206 that here means the defendant was practically certain that they would accomplish one of the goals specified in subparagraphs (a)(2)(A) – (F). Per RCC § 22E-205, the object of the phrase "with intent to" is not an objective element that requires separate proof—only the actor's culpable mental state must be proven regarding the object of this phrase. It is not necessary to prove that the intended outcome actually occurred, only that the defendant believed to a practical certainty that it would.[9]

Subparagraph (a)(2)(A) provides a defense where a person intends to surrender the item to a law enforcement officer or prosecutor to take appropriate action. The term "law enforcement officer" is defined in RCC § 22E-701. The person must be practically certain that the intended recipient is a law enforcement officer or prosecutor.[10] The defense does

---

[1] See RCC § 22E-201 and the accompanying commentary for further explanation of objective elements, including conduct elements.

[2] The defense is not available to a person charged with theft under RCC § 22E-2101, which requires that the person "takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control" over an item.

[3] The defense is not available to a person charged with unauthorized use of property under RCC § 22E-2102, which requires that the person "takes, obtains, transfers, or exercises control" over an item.

[4] The defense is not available to a person charged with criminal damage to property under RCC § 22E-2503, which requires that the person "damages or destroys" an item.

[5] D.C. Code § 22-723.

[6] D.C. Code § 22-722.

[7] D.C. Code § 22-1806.

[8] RCC § 22E-207.

[9] For example, a person may defend on the grounds that they intended to surrender the item to a prosecutor under subparagraph (a)(2)(A), even if it turns out that the defendant is mistaken and the intended recipient is actually not a prosecutor.

[10] See rules of interpretation in RCC § 22E-207.

not apply where, for example, a person sells contraband to an officer who is working undercover. The person must also intend that the recipient take appropriate and lawful action. The defense does not apply where, for example, a person sells contraband to someone who happens to be an officer, for that officer's personal use and enjoyment.

Subparagraph (a)(2)(B) provides a defense where a person intends to surrender the item to their supervisor or to a person in charge of the location where the item was found. The term "supervisor" is undefined and should be construed broadly to include any supervisory context.[11] The phrase "person in charge of the location" is undefined and, per its ordinary meaning, should be construed broadly to include any person with authority over the location.[12] The person must intend that the recipient take appropriate and lawful action. The defense does not apply where, for example, a person sells contraband to someone who happens to be their supervisor, for that supervisor's personal use and enjoyment.

